lava; a muddy sediment rests on the horse-tail and other perennial herbs, which in part conceal the shallowness of the stream; a fat-leaved pale-flowering scurvy-grass appears early in the year, and the razor-edged bull-rush in the summer and autumn. The fen itself has a dark and saline herbage; there are rushes and arrow-head, and in a few patches the flakes of the cotton-grass are seen, but more commonly the sax-aster, the dullest of that numerous and bardy genus: a thrift, blue in flower, but withering and remaining withered till the winter scatters it; the salt-wort, both simple and shrubby, a few kinds of grass, changed by their soil and atmosphere, and low plants, of two or three denominations, undistinguished in a general view of the scenery;—such is the vegetation of the fen, when it is at a small distance from the ocean."

I will give another, perhaps still more striking, instance. It is a description in Rob Roy of a barren moor—of Nature in her very meanest aspect—where,

Far as the eye can reach, no tree is seen,
Earth, clad in russet, scorns the lively green,— and yet, see what, in the hands of a master, can be made even of a country like this:—"Huge continuous heaths, spread before, behind, and around us, in hopeless barrenness,—now level, and interspersed with swamps, green with treacherous verdure, or sable with turf, or, as they call them in Scotland, peat-bogs,—and now swelling into huge heavy ascents, which wanted the dignity and form of hills, while they were still more toilsome to the passenger. There were neither trees nor bushes to relieve the eye from the russet livery of absolute sterility. The very heath was of that stunted imperfect kind which has little or no flower, and affords the coarsest and meanest covering which, as far as my experience enables me to judge, Mother Earth is ever arrayed in."

I have purposely cited nothing in support of the poetical susceptibilities of the higher orders of natural objects—I have confined myself to what relates to Nature's very lowest appearances and attributes, and yet I have, I trust, proved that even these can be, and are, poetical.

Now, that there are numberless objects in Art which cannot by any powers, however great, be made poetical, we have in these days conclusive and most abundant evidence. I do not ask, whether it can be possible for any one to give poetry to the commonest productions of mechanical art,—household utensils, for instance, brooms, mops, pails, and warming-pans;—but look at the attempts of persons of poetical genius confessedly great,—of Mr. Coleridge and Mr. Wordsworth,—to poetise these things;—look at nine-tenths of the lyrical ballads—above all, Mr. Wordsworth's "washing-tub," and his "Alice Fell,"—and say whether it is possible for any genius to dignify objects like these.

I have said, secondly, that the most poetical objects in Nature are more poetical than the most poetical objects in Art. Is not, for instance, mountain scenery, in sunshine, in moonlight, and perhaps still more in storm—is not the ocean in its "boundless magnitude," whether in the heavy heaving of a dead calm, in the smiles and serenity of a light breeze, or in the appalling terrors of a tempest—are not, more than all, the heavens, with their sun and moon and stars, their clouds and winds, their rain and hail and snow, and all their infinite varyings of weather, and thence of atmosphere and appearance—are not these things—this earth and sea and sky—and last, not least, is not human beauty—more poetical than any objects of Art whatsoever?—

I grant that many things in Art are highly poetical;—that Athens, Rome, the pyramids, the remains of ancient sculpture, the master-pieces of painting—I grant that these and numberless other objects of Art may be cited as breathing poetry;—but are they as poetical as the splendid manifestations of Nature I have instanced above? Mr. Bowles says, finely and truly, that the one leads the thought to God—the other to man—that the imagination rises "from Nature up to Nature's God;" this alone, one would think, should decide the question—but let us take an instance.

One of the most beautiful and impressive objects in Nature is the sky on a moonlight night.—What is the blemish in the beauty of the following lines, composed on contemplating the heavens in this state?—lines of high power in themselves, and extraordinary as having been written by Voltaire:—

Tous ces vastes pays d'azur et de lumière,
Tirés du sein du vide, et formés sans matière,

Arrondis sans compas, et tournant sans pivot,
Ont à peine coûté la dépense d'un mot.

What is, I ask, the drawback from these fine verses? why, the associating compasses and pivots, objects of mechanical art, with the grandest ideas of Nature in all her pride. After the line,

Tirés du sein du vide, et formés sans matière,

it is, indeed, a falling off to speak of this magnificent and miraculous heaven as being

Arrondis sans compas, et tournant sans pivot.

(To be concluded in our next.)

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—As the unwarrantable liberties complained of in the following petition (by our Manchester Poet Byrom) are still very common, I shall be obliged by its re-publication in the Iris. L. M.

PETITION OF THE PASSIVE PARTICIPLE.

O hear a passive participle's case!
And if you can, restore me to my place.—
Till just of late good English has thought fit
To call me written, or to call me well.
But what is writ or written, by the vote
Of writers now, hereafter must be wrote;
And what is spoken now, hereafter spoke,
And measures never to be broken, roke.
I never could be driven but in spite
Of grammar, they have drove me from my right.
None could have risen to become my foes;
But what a world of enemies have rose!
Who have not gone, but they have went about,
And torn as I have been, have tore me out.
Passive I am and would be, and implore,
That such abuse may be henceforth forborne,
If not forborne; for by the spelling-book,
If not mistaken, they are all mistook;
And in plain English it had been as well,
If what had fallen upon me had not fell.
Since this attack upon me has began,
Who knows what lengths in language may be ran?
For if it once be grew into a law,
You'll see such work as never has been saw.
Part of our speech, and sense perhaps, beside,
Shakes when I'm shook, and dies when I am died.
Then let the preter and imperfect tense,
Of my own words, to me remit the sense,
Or since we two, are oft enough agreed,
Let all the learned take some better heed,
And leave the vulgar to confound the due
Of Preter tense, and Participle too.

THE FATALIST.

The subject of the following melancholy tale has long ceased to exist, and there is not in the place of his nativity a being who bears his name. The recital will, therefore, wound the feelings of no one; nor will it disturb the ashes of the dead, to give the world the story of his madness, rather than his crime.

The name of John Mackay appears on the criminal records of the town of Belfast, in the north of Ireland. He was the murderer of his own child. It is unnecessary to dwell on the character of this unhappy man; suffice it that, from early education and deeply rooted habits, he was a fatalist. An enthusiastic turn of mind had been warped into a superstitious dread; and the fabric that might have been great and beautiful, became a ruin that betokened only death and gloom. Yet into his breast the Creator had infused much of the milk of human kindness, and his disposition peculiarly fitted him to be at peace with all men. The poison had lain dormant in his bosom, but it rankled there. Domestic sorrows contributed to strengthen his gloomy creed; and its effects were darker as it took a deeper root. Life soon lost all its pleasures for him; his usual employments were neglected; his dress and appearance altered; his once animated countenance bore the traces of shame or guilt; and a sort of suspicious eagerness was in every look and action.

He had an only child; one of the loveliest infants that ever blessed a father's heart. It was the melancholy legacy of the woman he had loved; and never did a parent doat with more affection on an earthly hope. This little infant, all purity and innocence, was destined to be the victim of his madness. One morning his friend entered his apartment, and what was his horror at beholding the child stretched on the floor, and the father standing over it, his hands reeking with the blood of his babe. 'God of heaven!' exclaimed his friend, 'what is here?' Mackay approached, and calmly welcomed him, bidding him behold what he had done. His friend beat his bosom and sunk on a chair, covering his face with his hands. 'Why do you grieve?' asked the maniac; 'why are you unhappy?' I was the father of that breathless corpse, and I do not weep; I am even joyful when I gaze on it. Listen, my friend, listen; I knew I was predestined to murder; and who was so fit to be my victim as that little innocent, to whom I gave life, and from whom I have taken it? He had no crime to answer for;—besides, how could I leave him in a cold world, which would mock him with my name?' Even before the commission of the crime, he had sent to a magistrate, whose officers shortly entered and apprehended him. He coolly surrendered himself, and betrayed no emotion; but he took from his bosom a miniature of his wife; dipped in the blood of his babe, and, without a sigh or a tear, departed. It was this circumstance that made many loath him, and created against him a sentiment of general abhorrence; but when he afterwards, in prison, declared to his friend the storm of passions to which that horrible calm succeeded—that he had torn his hair until the blood trickled down his forehead, while his brain seemed bursting his skull; his friend was satisfied and still loved him. In the prison he was with him: though all others deserted him, he pitied and wept. Still, even to the last, he believed he had but fulfilled his duty in the death of his child; and often, when he described the scene, and told how the infant smiled on its father at the moment he was prepared to kill it, lipping his name as the weapon was at its throat, he would start with horror at his own tale and curse the destiny which had decreed it, but always spoke of it as a necessary deed. The time appointed for his trial approached; he contemplated it without dread, and talked of the fate that awaited him without a shudder. But his friend had exerted himself to procure such testimony of the state of his mind, previous to his committing the dreadful act, as to leave little dread of the result; yet he feared to awaken hopes in the unhappy prisoner which might be destroyed, and had never mentioned it to him. The morning of his trial arrived; he was brought to the bar; his hollow eyes glared unconsciously on his judge, and he gave his plea, as if the words 'not guilty' came from a being without life. But his recollection seemed for a moment to return, he opened his lips and gasped faintly, as if he wished to recal them. The trial commenced, and he listened with the same apathy; but once betraying feeling, when he smiled on his friend beside him. The evidence had been heard; the jury had returned to their box, and were about to record a verdict of insanity, when a groan from the prisoner created a momentary pause, and he dropped lifeless in the dock. He had for some minutes shadowed his countenance with his hand, and no one but his friend perceived its dreadful alteration. He attributed it to the dreadful suspense of the moment, the agony between hope and despair. Its cause was a more awful one;—he had procured poison, had taken it, and, with an almost superhuman strength, had struggled with its effects until he fell dead before the court.

He was buried in the church-yard of his native village, where a mound of earth marked his grave, but there was neither stone nor inscription to preserve the name of one so wretched.

NATURE OUTDONE.

(From the Literary Chronicle.)

In common with almost every one, I have this year had to lament the untimely backwardness of the Spring; Winter has extended his 'iron reign,' and so prevented Dame Nature (all-bounteous as she is) from sending her buds and blossoms among us.

But, really, we cockneys have but little to regret in our rambles from London Bridge to Shoreditch Church, or from Whitechapel to Hyde Park Corner, thanks to the plastic hands of the artificial-flower makers, and the unbounded beneficence of our haberdashers, milliners, and other shopkeepers, who make gay parterres of their windows, and so take away the necessity of gardens altogether.

The other day, I saw, in one of the shops in Burlington Arcade, roses both red and white, such as Nature never made, and never can hope to make; so large, and so red, and so white, and, in short, so every way unlike to Nature's, that it was quite delightful; along with these were some lilies, finer by far, I should conceive, than those that Solomon made so much of; myrtles and vine-leaves on one hand, enough to tempt all the ladies to become Bacchantes; and on the other, beautiful wreaths of nondescripts, enough to tempt them all to return shepherdesses; indeed, to judge by some of the fair heads you meet, it would not require much temptation to induce them, for they seem to carry a whole flower-garden on their bonnets, and look as if they belonged to a female horticultural society, and their respective bouquets were bunches of prize flowers.

One lady looks as though she affected to be Flora, and is loaded with geraniums, pinks, bluebells, and heart's-ease; another is a would-be Ceres, and sports poppies and ripe corn in April; and another, Pomona, who is decorated with apple and peach blossoms; and all this show of nature's choicest productions is the work of art, and would look as divinely in the midst of a Siberian solitude. Who, then, ought to complain of backward springs, and late summers, when they may buy a whole bunch of everlasting flowers for sixpence; nay, more, when they can buy scented artificial blooms even, with their native smells!—for some of these cunning rogues insert certain perfumes in their flowers, that would vastly puzzle many a rustic.

Nature is thus outdone by art; the first, to be sure, works—

'In fields, and woods, and by the fountain's side;'

and the last, up in some garret in St. Giles's, probably; but, then, it must be recollected, that the latter enables us to anticipate Nature, and to look finer than Nature;—would that I could add, as happy. There, I fear, I must stop, and cockney as I am, confess, that along with our artificial flowers, we have also artificial hours, and habits, and pleasures, and vices too often, that are enough to make us turn to Nature, and wait her good time for sending us what is useful and proper, and not force her as we do in every way, but to remember, that—

'God made the country, and man made the town.'

BIOGRAPHY.

MR. EDITOR.—The following short tribute to the amiable and gentle virtues of the late David Whitehead, was written by Mr. William Newton, of Crossbrook, in Derbyshire—the aged and venerable Minstrel of the Peak.

Mr. Whitehead was some time a resident in Manchester, and his character, I should think, must be known and remembered by many who are still living. A biographical sketch of his life would doubtless be an acceptable present to many of your readers; and the elegant tribute now sent to you, may perhaps stimulate some of your correspondents to undertake the pleasing task of doing that justice to his memory, which his talents and his virtues seem to demand.

'As a civil engineer,' Mr. Newton remarks, 'he had few competitors; as a calculator, perhaps not an equal. He looked through a long train of figures, in all their multifarious combinations, with an intuitive glance, and seemed to know their aggregate by inspection, and their results without the intermediate links of gradual approximation. His felicity of invention left him few rivals. He was fruitful in expedients, correct in design, and accurate in delineation. But though great and prominent were the qualities of his head, they were eclipsed and absorbed by those of his heart. No one ever sought the friendship of David Whitehead, and was disappointed. To the ignorant he was a kind instructor; to the friendless, a friend; and to the needy, he was a father. His mild and tranquil spirit was like that of the immortal Newton, whom an elegant and a nervous poet denominates a "child-like sage." To those who knew him, his memory will long be dear; and though they may not be able to rival his abilities, they may at least imitate his virtues.'

Yours, &c.

LINES

On the death of Mr. David Whitehead.

O'er the grave where Whitehead lies,
May the sweetest flowers arise;
On the turf which wraps his clay,
Pour thy richest treasures, May!

Summer's ardent stores be spread
On the sod which hides his head:
Autumn, long with lingering feet,
Guard each tributary sweet:

And, Winter! may a Poet's voice
Change thy mandate to his choice;
O! gently pass this hallow'd spot,
And all thy rigours be forgot!

Spare these sweets, thou hoary king,
Here be one eternal spring;
Breathe ye vernal gases around
Soft on this Myrtlem ground.

Kind was he the sod beneath,
As the gentlest air that breathe;
Warm his heart that lies below,
As the Summer's warmest glow.

Autumn never shone more mild
Than his breast, "meek Nature's child!"
Then, Winter! spare this hallow'd spot;
Here all thy rigours be forgot.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR.—If the following particulars of the birth-place of Sir Isaac Newton are worthy of becoming an appendix to your Anecdotes in Iris No. 68, they are at your service. CIVIS.

Some few years ago travelling with two friends towards the north, we dined at the Angel at Coltersworth, or, as it is commonly called, Coleworth. After dinner we walked to Woolthorpe. In a small sequestered hamlet, exhibiting a scene of repose well fitted for the birth-place and residence of a philosopher, stands the manor house, with its blank side-wall close to the road; a plain regularly formed stone building, its front looking over a neat lawn, fenced along the road side by a cut quickset hedge, and entered by a narrow wicket gate. To the right of the road are a few cottages, and a rivulet crossed by a wooden bridge. On the farther side of the lawn stands a dwarf pear tree whose branches are bowed down so as to form an alcove. This tree is said to have been planted by Sir Isaac; it was then in full bloom, and had a very pleasing effect. While we were contemplating the scene with feelings that could not but be common to every Englishman, the resident owner came from the house, and opening the wicket politely invited us in. The interior of the house is divided into two parlours in front, one on each side of the door way, the entrance about four feet in depth, faced by a dead wall, such as is seen in many dwellings in the country. Ascending a narrow staircase, we were ushered into the room in which the pride and glory of his country first drew that breath which only ceased to expire when he had enlightened the world with new and sublime philosophy: it is over the parlour next the road, square, very scantily supplied with old furniture and a four post bedstead—a well known print of him hangs on the wall, opposite the door; the fire place is in the front corner near the window—over it is placed a white marble tablet, on which is inscribed, as well as reminiscence supplies me,

"Sir Isaac Newton
Born in this room,
On Christmas Day, O. S.—1642."

Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night—
God said let Newton be, and all was light.

THE CABINET.

VAUXHALL-GARDENS.

It is not very generally known that Vauxhall-Gardens is one of the oldest places of amusement in London, and that the place is traditionally said to have been planted for public gardens as early as the reign of Charles I., but does not appear to have been used as such until some time afterwards:—

About the year 1667, as Aubrey tells us in his "History of Surrey," Sir Samuel Morland, to whom they then belonged, gave them a considerable degree of celebrity by building here a fine room, "the inside of which," says he, "is all looking-glass, and fountains very pleasant to behold; and which is much visited by strangers. It stands in the middle of the garden, covered with Cornish slate; on the point whereof he placed a punchinello, very well carved, which held a dial, but the winds have destroyed it." In 1712, Addison, in his Spectator gives an account of a trip by water, from Temple Stairs, with his friend Sir Roger de Coverley, to these gardens; and later, we find, in No. 68 of the Connoisseur, a very humorous description of the behaviour of an old citizen, who, notwithstanding his pensive disposition, had treated his family here with a handsome supper. It was not until the year 1730, however, that these gardens were opened with the present sort of amusement; when they were taken by the eccentric Jonathan Tyers, who rebuilt, or much altered Sir Samuel Morland's mansion; and the gardens, which Sir John Hawkins describes as large, "planted with a great number of stately trees, and laid out in shady walks, obtained the name of Spring Gardens; and the house being converted into a tavern or place of entertainment, was much frequented by the votaries of pleasure." Tyers opened the gardens with an advertisement of a Ridotto al Fresco—a term which the greater part of the people of this country had, till that time, been strangers to. These entertainments were repeated in the course of the summer, and numbers resorted to partake of them. This encouraged him to establish them as a place of musical entertainment for every evening during the summer season. To this end he was at great expense in decorating the gardens with paintings. He engaged an excellent band of musicians; he issued silver tickets for admission, at a guinea each; and continuing to receive great encouragement, he set up an organ in the orchestra, erected a fine statue of Handel in a conspicuous part of the garden, and adopted such other improvements as soon rendered them an object of general attraction.

Of late years, Vauxhall had begun to sink in popularity. The last season, however, redeemed its character, and the present one will confirm it. The improvements consist in trees replanted—walks newly gravelled—boxes new painted—a new theatre for ballets—then for the ascent à la Saqui, we have a Moorish fortress, which Mr. Blackmore scales, on the rope, to a tremendous height. A musical temple, exhibiting the five orders of architecture, a mechanical theatre, cosmoramas, hydraulics, rope-dancing, fireworks, &c. &c. keep the visitors continually on the alert, and continually gratified. The more substantial part of the entertainment—the wine and suppers to wit, are on the same liberal and excellent style.

VARIETIES.

DR. JENNER.—The Society Arti Salutaris met at Amsterdam, May 14, to celebrate the anniversary of the discovery of Vaccine by the immortal Jenner. Mr. Van der Breggen, President of the Society, made an animated address, in which he did merited justice to the illustrious deceased, whose bust, covered with a veil, stood before him. In the middle of his discourse he took off the veil and placed on the bust the civic crown.

TESSELATED PAVEMENT.—On Wednesday se'nnight some labourers working in a field belonging to H. Noyes, Esq., of Thuxton, near Weyhill, discovered, about two feet under the ground, a most beautiful tessellated pavement, supposed to be the flooring of a tent used by some Roman general. The land is cleared away, and, with little exception, it presents a most perfect picture of antiquity. The pavement is composed of small dyes, about half an inch square, of various colours, and, according to the different compartments, varying in size; the workmanship is beautifully shaded, and the figures, which are mostly preserved perfect, shew great art of delineation. In the centre is placed the general, with the right arm extended, clasping a goblet—in the left is a spear—over his shoulder hangs the skin of a wild beast, and his feet are resting on the back of a leopard. The whole is delightfully ornamented, and certainly offers to the curious a choice specimen of early days. The inscription, which is as perfect as at first, is on the upper margin of the pavement, and is as follows:—

QVINTVS NATALVS IVATALINVS ET DODENI.

At the upper side of the square, indeed, just above the letter Q, is a piece of free-stone about two feet square.

REVOLUTIONARY ANECDOTE.—A man, who wished to pass one of the barriers of Paris, in 1793, was required to give his name, &c. to the persons on duty. 'I am Monsieur le Marquis de St. Cyr.' 'Citizen, there are no Monsieurs now.' 'Very well, then, le Marquis St. Cyr.' 'You ought to know, citizen, that there are neither nobles, titles, nor marquises.' In that case, de St. Cyr, if you please.' 'De is not used now.' 'Then say simply, St. Cyr.' 'Ah! but all saints, you know, have been abolished.' 'Well, if it must be so, write Cyr.' 'No, citizen, there are no longer any Sires, (the pronunciation is the same.) Thus, piece by piece, the unfortunate Marquis was stripped by the Revolution, till he found himself at the barrier of Paris without a name.

FINE ARTS.—A numerous and respectable body of artists met at the Freemasons' Tavern on Wednesday evening last, to consider the most eligible means of erecting an extensive suite of rooms for the exhibition and sale of the works of British artists in every department of art,—painting, sculpture, architecture, and engraving,—when a society was instituted, and resolutions passed, declaratory of their determination to proceed on broad and liberal principles; their object being to give to the rising, as well as to the more advanced artists, the means of displaying their works for sale during the season, when the opulent patrons of art are usually resident in the metropolis; a desideratum which has long been required, and which the limited resources of the existing establishments, together with the increasing number of professors, have rendered indispensable.

CURIOUS REPETITION IN THE BURIAL SERVICE.—

It may be remarked that the number three has ever retained a certain mysterious preference; and as the earth was heretofore thrice cast upon the dead, to satisfy the gods below; 'injecto ter pulvere curras,'—having thrice thrown dust upon me, you may hasten on your journey; so doubtless the same harmless, yet affecting custom has been preserved, inadvertently perhaps, in the burial service, to the present day. When the coffin is lowered into the grave, the sexton sprinkles a small portion of soil upon it, three several times, whilst the minister repeats the corresponding expressions, 'earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust.' Now every member of this sentence actually signifies the same thing; and though the beautiful effect of such a repetition may perhaps be thought ground enough for the use of it; yet it is more than probable that these three tautological members were first introduced in order that the mysterious and propitious number might not escape.—The word 'funeral' is derived from 'funes accensi,'—lighted torches; because anciently a profusion of torches accompanied the corpse; and these were thought equally necessary, though the ceremony was performed at mid-day.—Bunt's Vestiges of Ancient Manners.

NEW NOVELS BY THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY.—

It appears by the papers that the author of Waverley has contracted for three new novels, at the enormous sum of 10,000*l.*, which has been paid down. The first of these is Quentin Durward, just published; the second is to appear in October next; and the 3rd early in the ensuing year.

SINGULAR ANECDOTE OF INTREPIDITY.—

At the siege of Tortona, the commander of the army which lay before the town, ordered Carew, an Irish officer in the service of Naples, to advance with a detachment to a particular post. Having given his orders, he whispered to Carew, "Sir, I know you to be a gallant man. I have therefore set you upon this duty. I tell you in confidence, it is certain death for you all. I place you there, to make the enemy spring a mine below you." Carew made a bow to the general, and led on his men in silence to the dreadful post. He there stood with an undaunted countenance, and having called to one of his soldiers for a draught of wine, "Here," said he, "I drink to all those who bravely fall in battle." Fortunately, at that instant, Tortona capitulated, and Carew escaped.—Boswell.

THE CORSICAN HANGMAN.—

The hangman of Corsica was a great curiosity. Being held in the utmost detestation, he durst not live like another inhabitant of the island. He was obliged to take refuge in the castle, and there he was kept in a little corner turret, where he had just room for a miserable bed, and a bit of fire to dress such victuals for himself as were sufficient to keep him alive, for nobody would have any intercourse with him, but all turned their backs upon him. I went up, and looked at him; and a more dirty, rueful spectacle I never beheld. He seemed sensible of his situation, and held down his head, like an abhorred outcast.—It was a long time, it seems, before they could get a hangman in Corsica; so that the punishment of the gallows was hardly known, all their criminals being shot. At last this creature whom I saw, who is a Sicilian, came with a message to Paoli. The general, who has a wonderful talent for physiognomy, on seeing the man, said immediately to some of the people about him, "Behold our hangman." He gave orders to ask the man if he would accept of the office, and his answer was, "My grandfather was a hangman, my father was a hangman, I have been a hangman myself, and am willing to continue so." He was therefore immediately put into office, and the ignominious death dispensed by his hands, had more effect than twenty executions by fire-arms.

It is remarkable, that no Corsican would, on any account, consent to be hangman—not the greatest criminals; who might have had their lives upon that condition. Even the wretch who, for a paltry hire, had strangled a woman, would rather suffer death, than do the same action, as the executioner of the law.—Boncell.

THE EMPRESS MARIA LOUISA AND BUONAPARTE.—While he was visiting the quays at Boulogne, the empress was taking an airing in a boat in the interior of the port: she even went as far as the Estran. On her return, she perceived Buonaparte, who was waiting for her. On quitting the vessel, her foot slipped, and she would have fallen down, if General Vandamme, who held her hand, had not supported her, by putting his arm round her waist. Buonaparte, who was about ten paces distant with the engineer, perceived the accident; he ran up, and said rather angrily,—"What! do you not know yet, madam, how to use your feet?" Maria Louisa, without being disconcerted at this apostrophe, looked at him steadily, and said jocularly,—"To hear you speak thus, Sir, would not one think you never made a false step in your life?" This reproach was made in that tone, mixed with sweetness and dignity, which can only be acquired by an union of the favours of nature and the benefits of superior education. Buonaparte felt how much he was in the wrong, and although little accustomed to such remonstrances, he replied very submissively, "I beg, madam, you will excuse my abruptness, and only attribute it to the fear occasioned by the idea of the harm a fall might do yourself." "Since that is the case," said the empress, still smiling, "I forgive you; give me your arm."—Sarasine's Philosopher.

UNUSUAL VISITANT.—A spotted cock-pheasant, of beautiful plumage and large size, has, during the last and present season, forsaken his own species in the woods, and attached himself to the domestic poultry of the Rev. George Bowness, at the Rectory, Rokeby, Yorkshire. It is seldom absent till the evening, when he generally walks off to roost in his native haunts, but returns to give the maids the benefit of his "clarion" in the morning. He is so tame as nearly to feed from the hand, and has occasionally ventured to enter the dwelling. During the heavy snow in the spring he was invisible, but reappeared with the thaw in full feather and beauty.

METHOD OF TAKING IMPRESSIONS.—A very easy and elegant way of taking the impressions of medals and coins, not generally known, is thus described by Dr. Shaw: Melt a little isinglass glue with brandy, and pour it thinly over the medal, so as to cover its whole surface; let it remain on for a day or two till it is thoroughly dry and hardened, and then taking it off, it will be fine, clear, and as hard as a piece of Muscovy glass, and will have a very elegant impression of the coin. It will also resist the effects of damp air, which occasions all other kinds of glue to soften and bend, if not prepared in this way.

QUALIFICATIONS OF A COOK.—The qualifications of a cook are thus described in a scarce book, entitled "The English Housewife:—"First, she must be cleanly, both in body and garments; she must have a quick eye, a curious nose, a perfect taste, and ready ear; she must not be butter-fingered, sweet-toothed, nor faint-hearted—for the first will let every thing fall; the second will consume what it should increase; and the last will lose time with too much niceness." In the same volume it is recommended, as a preservative from the plague, "To smell on a nosegay made of the tasselled end of a ship-rope."

RABBITS SUCKLED BY A FERRET.—A curious instance of the reconciliation of supposed natural antipathies in animals was witnessed by many persons in Shrewsbury last week. W. Jones, of Frankwell, having taken a nest of seven rabbits, in the Cromere fields, Abbey Foregate, put one of the rabbits into a box in which he kept a female ferret, then rearing three young ones. Instead of instantly devouring the helpless young rabbit, the ferret carried it to her nest, and adapted it as one of her own family. The man put another rabbit into the box, which the ferret carried also to her nest! The other rabbits he gave to other ferrets, which instantly devoured them. During five subsequent days the two adopted strangers were suckled by the ferret with the same kindness as her three legitimate offspring; but, either in consequence of the new sustenance, or the frequent handling, (to gratify the curiosity of strangers,) the two rabbits died. Maternal affection, however, was not even then extinct in the ferret; for she repeatedly carried the dead bodies to her nest whenever they were removed, and betrayed to the last all the anxiety of a parent.

ST. MARY'S SPIRE.—Mr. Wootton completed the repair of St. Mary's Spire, fixed a handsome Vane, and removed his ladders yesterday, we are happy to say, without accident.

QUERY.—[From a Correspondent.]—When did Manchester first return Members to Parliament? and when, and why did the privilege cease?

ELEGIAC STANZAS.

How sweetly could I lay my head
Within the cold grave's silent breast;
Where Sorrow's tears no more are shed,
No more the ills of life molest.

For ah! my heart, how very soon
The glittering dreams of youth are past!
And, long before it reached its noon,
The sun of life is overcast.

THE DRAMA.

MANCHESTER DRAMATIC REGISTER.

Saturday, May 24th, 1823.—The West Indian: with Love, Youth, and Folly.

After a successful season, the Theatre-Royal closed on Saturday evening, the 24th instant; when Mr. Bass delivered the following farewell address to a brilliant and crowded house:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

This being the concluding night of the season, I am deputed to have the honor of addressing you on the occasion.

The Managers beg leave, most respectfully, to offer you their most grateful acknowledgements for your kind attention to their exertions during the season, with the assurance of their future efforts to ensure a continuance of your patronage.

On behalf of the Company, as well as of myself, Ladies and Gentlemen, allow me to return you our most heartfelt thanks, for the uniform applause and encouragement you have bestowed on our professional labours; and at the same time to assure you, that our greatest pride will ever be to be found deserving of it.

In the name of the Managers, the Performers, and myself, Ladies and Gentlemen, allow me respectfully to say—Farewell.

MR. SALTER, who spends the summer season in Birmingham, returns at the next regular opening of the Theatre.

The amount of the Benefits as quoted by our contemporaries, being erroneous, we lay a correct statement before the public.—

MINOR THEATRE.—This little Theatre opened for the season on Monday evening. The taste displayed in the decorations—the new and beautiful scenery—and the excellent dresses, give an ecclat to the performances which we never before witnessed at this place of amusement. We cannot but notice with much pleasure, that very judicious arrangements are adopted by the manager for the prevention of those annoyances and interruptions which have hitherto been frequently severely felt by the respectable part of the audience.

MR. SALTER.

The following paragraph, which we have extracted from the Birmingham Chronicle, will, we doubt not, prove highly gratifying to the admirers of Mr. Salter.

"On Monday evening the play of Henri Quatre was produced: the principal novelty of the evening was the introduction, for the first time before a Birmingham audience, of MR. SALTER, (from the Liverpool and Manchester theatres), who supported the character of Henri with great pathos, judgment, and discrimination; his performance throughout was replete with energy and feeling, and we are happy to say received, as it justly merited, the loudest approbation. On Tuesday Mr. SALTER made his second appearance as Hamlet; and his personation of that most difficult character (which has long been pronounced the touch-stone of histrionic genius), cannot fail to stamp him a favourite in this town. We have seen the part performed by the first-rate actors of the day, and we fear not to say, that it faded not in the hands of Mr. SALTER; in some passages, we were strongly reminded of our old favourite, Macready. To criticise throughout the excellencies of this performance, would exceed our limits; and we shall therefore confine ourselves to pointing out one or two beauties. His delivery of the soliloquy at the opening of the third act, "To be, or not to be," was impressive, dignified, and powerful; and in his following interview with Ophelia, his voice, countenance, and action, harmonized with perfect truth; and we think a finer touch of nature could not be displayed than the look of tenderness and pity he casts upon her ere he finally rushes from her presence. His acting, in the play-scene, before the King and Queen, was a high intellectual treat; the impetuosity and fire with which he burst forth, when the King, conscience-stricken, rises from his seat, and calls for lights—had a striking and almost appalling effect upon the audience, and drew down the most enthusiastic applause. His interview with his mother was a most powerful and successful piece of acting."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Mr. Robert Neikleham, Civil Engineer, has in the press a Practical Treatise on the Various Methods of Heating Buildings by Steam, Hot-Air, Stoves, and Open Fires. With some introductory observations on the combustion of fuel; on the contrivances for burning smoke; and other subjects connected with the economy and distribution of heat. With numerous explanatory engravings.

The Natural History of Meteorites, or of those remarkable masses of iron and of earthy and metallic compounds, which at different periods have fallen from the atmosphere, is in the press, from the pen of Mr. Brayley, junior.

Miss Aikin is preparing for publication Memoirs of her Father, with Original Essays and Miscellaneous Pieces, by the late Dr. Aikin.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. X. will find that both our compositor and reader were attentive to their copy.—In quoting from the ALPHABET, particularly would be fastidiousness, and criticism not only supererogatory, but hominematically preposterous.—Has Boswell ever yet been considered as an authority in orthography?—If not, we see no reason why Tim Bobbin should not as well be contrasted with our great lexicographer.—Johnson!

A Subscriber's first query cannot be replied to satisfactorily, as Johannes' two communications might have been mislaid and overlooked.—We will thank him to favour us with copies, which shall have immediate attention.

Ignoto's queries are inserted in our present number.

In reply to the note of M. R. we have only to say, that we should have much pleasure to insert a good translation of a few of Pascal's admirable Provincial Letters.—We have read the two English translations which our correspondents has alluded to; and we concur with him in opinion, that neither of them gives a correct idea of the point and spirit of the original.—We know of no French classical work which better deserves to be well translated.

Amicus is requested to favour us with the paper alluded to.

Tyro would do well to cast off the mask, and show himself in those better proportions which are so awkwardly concealed: we wish to hear from him in a different style.

R. O. shall not slip through unnoticed;—he is not one of that class, upon which we should merely drop a few words by way of chastisement—we are more inclined to encourage than to animadvert—and, although the subject is somewhat out of our province, we cannot but recommend a judicious prosecution of its leading features.—It will do credit to its author.

L. M.; J. O. G.; Veritas; R.; and Osmond, are received.

ESSAY II.

MINERAL POISONS.

ON ACIDS.

It is not often that the mineral acids are chosen as the instruments of self-destruction, but they have been taken by mistake, and the result has been a forfeiture of life: the public prints have within the three or four past years communicated to us very many awful instances of death from the swallowing of Oxalic Acid in lieu of Epsom Salts, a poison scarcely to be surpassed by any, both for the celerity of its operation, and the fatality of its effects; it is therefore imperatively required that the mineral acids should be admitted into our essays, as poisons of a most formidable description, and oxalic acid in particular, from being so very notorious for its poisonous properties.

SULPHURIC ACID, (commonly known by the name of oil of vitriol) is not likely to be selected for the purpose of suicide, but when taken in the quantity of a few drams in an undiluted state, it will produce death, unless remedies are at hand; and even the hazard is tremendously great, because concentrated acids are powerfully caustic, and therefore exert an immediate action on the mouth, gullet, stomach, and intestines. I shall mention an experiment performed by Orfila, and to be found in his "Traite de Toxicologie," illustrative of the caustic effects of the sulphuric acid. Two drams of concentrated sulphuric acid, mixed an hour before with a dram of water, were introduced into the stomach of a dog, and the gullet was tied. Ten minutes afterwards the animal experienced horrible sufferings, and made great efforts to vomit. At one o'clock (the injection having been made at five minutes after twelve at noon) the dog continued to utter plaintive cries; he made fresh and fruitless efforts to vomit; his breathing did not appear at all incommoded. Half an hour afterwards, he had great inclination to vomit, and was agitated to that degree that he broke the thread with which the oesophagus or gullet had been tied, and which was partly burnt by the sulphuric acid. The dog instantly threw up a great quantity of matter as black as ink, and of the consistence of a thick liquid, similar in appearance to sulphuric acid which has remained a long time upon straw or matches. His sufferings continued very severe, and obliged the animal to remain lying on his belly. The dog died at half-past three o'clock, having survived the introduction of the poison three hours and twenty five minutes. Quarter of an hour after death the body was examined. The internal or mucous membrane of the stomach was destroyed, and partly expelled, by the vomiting. The middle or muscular coat, which was of a cherry red colour, was covered over in some points with a sort of blackish pulp, and exhibited several small ulcerations.—The symptoms caused by a large dose of sulphuric acid, and the appearances which present themselves after death, lead to a conclusion that the sulphuric acid destroys like the solid mineral poisons, by inducing inflammation and disorganization of the stomach, with which the brain and heart (but more particularly the former) are brought into consent, or in other words, to sympathize.

The operation of the NITRIC ACID, as aqua fortis, on the animal economy, is in every respect similar.

The name of OXALIC ACID is sufficient to create a shudder, from the melancholy fact that many have fallen sacrifices to its poisonous influence. This salt is contained in some mineral as well as vegetable substances, and is used occasionally for domestic purposes. At the hotels in Paris it is employed as a substitute for lemon juice, in the making of lemonade and other cooling beverages. In a small quantity it forms a grateful acidulated drink, but a strong solution of it causes rapid dissolution. The first account published shewing the poisonous properties of this acid was in 1814. A woman swallowed half an ounce of it instead of the sulphate of magnesia, or Epsom salts, and expired in forty minutes after, enduring the most horrible agonies. Death, however, has been known to ensue in a much shorter time. Within the last two years a great number of cases in which this poison proved fatal, have appeared in the public newspapers and periodical journals, and the necessity that something should be done to prevent such occurrences has been so urgent that the attention of chemists and scientific men has been directed to the subject. Oxalic acid is a salt presenting small, needle like, white crystals, very much resembling those of the sulphate of magnesia, or the Epsom salts; and to the similarity of the two salts in their external character are to be assigned the fatal mistakes which have happened. Not many months ago publicity was given to a case where a country man and his wife found in the street a paper of salts, which they mistook for Epsom; the man standing in need of an aperient medicine dissolved and swallowed a portion of it, and died in consequence. Seeing the ground of error, it has been suggested that preparers of the oxalic acid should colour it by artificial means, and thereby destroy the resemblance which it naturally bears to Epsom salts: this suggestion is judicious, and the adoption might prevent the mischief. Either this should be done, the sale of it prohibited, or certain restrictions established. The temptation to druggists to vend this article is so great from the profits arising out of it, and from the extraordinary demand, that it will not be easy to persuade them to exclude it from their shops. I was surprised beyond measure the other day to hear of the quantity sold by a druggist in this town, for the purpose, I presume, of cleaning leather, or of that domestic economy adopted by the continental innkeepers. I do not think it necessary that the article should be expelled from the shops, but the druggist should vend it with as great a caution as he would do arsenic, and label it in a conspicuous manner, VIOLENT POISON.

Experiments have recently been made at Edinburgh with a view to determine its modus operandi on the animal economy, and the conclusions drawn were as follow:

1st. That when introduced into the stomach in large doses, and highly concentrated, it irritates and corrodes it, and death takes place by a sympathetic injury of the nervous system.

2ndly. When given in a diluted state, it acts neither by irritating the stomach, nor by sympathy, but through the medium of absorption upon distant organs.

3rdly. Though it is absorbed it cannot be detected in any of the fluids, because probably it undergoes decomposition in passing through the lungs, and its elements combine with the blood.

4thly. It is a direct sedative. The organs it acts upon through absorption, are the spine and brain primarily, and the lungs and heart secondarily; and the immediate cause of death is sometimes paralysis of the heart, sometimes slow asphyxia, and sometimes a combination of both.

TREATMENT OF PERSONS POISONED BY ACIDS.

A fact well known in chemistry is the incompatible existence of an acid and an alkali. If an acid and an alkali be brought into contact, a mutual action takes place, and a new compound arises out of it; that compound will be a neutral salt, provided the acid and alkali are in due proportions according to chemical circumstances, thus from sulphuric acid and soda there will result sulphate of soda, or Glauber's salts—sulphuric acid and potash, sulphate of potash—sulphuric acid and magnesia, sulphate of magnesia, or Epsom salts, and so on. If the respective quantities should exceed the bounds of neutralization, the new salt will contain either the acid or alkali in excess. An alkaline substance then may be regarded as a counter-poison or antidote in cases of poisoning by acids; but a choice out of them must be made, because some are corrosive or caustic, and therefore cannot be given in sufficient quantity with impunity.

Suppose a person swallowed in mistake half an ounce or more of oil of vitriol, the error would be immediately detected. What is to be done in this case? By loss of time life is imminently endangered: our first aim should be to destroy the nature of the poison, and experience has shown that common magnesia is well calculated to do this. A dram or more of this medicine mixed with water should be administered, and repeated twice or thrice at intervals of five or ten minutes. The patient will soon begin to vomit, and this is to be encouraged by frequent potations of tepid water. Should not the whole of the contents of the stomach be rejected, no harm will follow its passing into the intestines, for the compound formed is Epsom salts, which will be beneficial as a mild aperient. Magnesia is at hand almost always, but should it not be a solution of soap may be given instead.

When the acid is thus chemically acted upon, the patient is not be considered as rescued from peril; its effects on the gullet and stomach are yet to be combated: and to do this a medical practitioner must be consulted, great judgment, great care, and active treatment are necessary. To hint at what should be done would be to put into the hands of the unprofessional man a weapon which he would be more likely to abuse than to use.

In poisoning too from aquafortis, magnesia is the antidote best to be relied on.

Oxalic acid proves more rapidly fatal than either the sulphuric or nitric acids. Out of all the cases on record there are only two or three instances of recovery. Some have died in a few hours after taking this poison—some within an hour—one person survived scarcely 15 minutes—and in the London Courier for Feb. 1st, 1823, notice is given of an inquest on the body of a young man who lived scarcely ten minutes. The same substances as act on the acids previously mentioned, act too in changing the chemical nature of the oxalic. Magnesia here is entitled to our preference, both for its simplicity and its efficacy.

Thus the first management of cases of poisoning from acids is very simple. The after treatment involves circumstances which can only be safely trusted to the medical practitioner.

There are other mineral acids beside those mentioned, but official preparations of them are not common. Should any of them however be procured, and criminally given or accidentally taken, the hints thrown out are applicable, and therefore may be extended, to them. S.

REVIEW.

The Pioneers, or the Sources of the Susquehanna, a Descriptive Tale. By the Author of "The Spy." London, 1823.

THIS transatlantic writer, Mr. Cooper, is one of the most successful rivals of our Northern Novelist. Whether we regard the number of his characters, their diversity, or their able development, our admiration is equally elicited, and we evidently follow a pen that has been directed by genius, and governed by the nicest judgment. The Pioneers is intended to represent the manners and pursuits of a back-settlement in its commencement; consequently, we cannot look for deep plot, mysterious character, or romantic story; but in sketchings of scenery, persons, manners, and common and extraordinary incident, it is so extremely natural and beautiful as to reconcile us to it as it is, in all its highly interesting variety and appearances. As our extracts are copious, we feel it incumbent to be concise in our introductory remarks.—

The sleigh was one of those large, comfortable, old-fashioned conveyances, which would admit a whole family within its bosom, but which now contained only two passengers besides the driver. Its outside was of a modest green, and its inside of a fiery red, that was intended to convey the idea of heat in that cold climate. Large Buffalo skins, trimmed around the edges with red cloth, cut into festoons, covered the bank of the sleigh, and were spread over its bottom, and drawn up around the feet of the travellers—one of whom was a man of middle age, and the other a female just entering upon womanhood. The former was of a large stature; but the precautions he had taken to guard against the cold, left but little of his person exposed to view. A great-coat, that was abundantly ornamented, if it were not made more comfortable, by a profusion of furs, enveloped the whole of his figure excepting the head, which was covered with a cap of marten skins, lined with morocco, the sides of which were made to fall, if necessary, and were now drawn close over the ears, and were fastened beneath his chin with a black ribbon; its top was surmounted with the tail of the animal whose skin had furnished the materials for the cap, which fell back, not ungracefully, a few inches behind the head. From beneath this masque were to be seen part of a fine manly face, and particularly a pair of expressive, large blue eyes, that promised extraordinary intellect, covert humour, and great benevolence. The form of his companion was literally hid beneath the multitude and variety of garments which she wore. There were furs and silks peeping from under a large cambric cloak, with a thick flannel lining, that, by its cut and size, was evidently intended for a mason-line wearer. A huge hood of black silk, that was quilted with down, concealed the whole of her head, except at a small opening in front for breath, through which occasionally sparkled a pair of animated eyes of the deepest black.

Both the father and daughter (for such was the connection between the travellers) were too much occupied with their different reflections to break the stillness, that received little or no interruption from the easy gliding of the sleigh, by the sound of their voices. The former was thinking of the wife that had held this their only child fondly to her bosom, when, four years before, she had reluctantly consented to relinquish the society of her daughter, in order that the latter might enjoy the advantages which the city could afford to her education. A few months afterwards death had deprived him of the remaining companion to his solitude; but still he had enough of real regard for his child, not to bring her into the comparative wilderness in which he dwelt, until the full period had expired, to which he had limited her juvenile labours. The reflections of the daughter were less melancholy, and mingled with a pleased astonishment at the novel scenery that she met at every turn in the road.

The mountain on which they were journeying was covered with pines that rose without a branch seventy or eighty feet, and which frequently towered to an additional height, that more than equalled that elevation. Through the innumerable vistas that opened beneath the lofty trees the eye could penetrate, until it was met by a distant inequality in the ground, or was stopped by a view of the summit of the mountain which lay on the opposite side of the valley to which they were hastening.

The sleigh had glided for some distance along the even surface, and the gaze of the female was bent in inquisitive, and, perhaps, timid glances, into the recesses of the forest, which were lighted by the unsullied covering of the earth, when a loud and continued howling was heard, pealing under the long arches of the woods, like the cry of a numerous pack of hounds. The instant the sounds reached the ears of the gentleman, whatever might have been the subject of his meditations, he forgot it; for he cried aloud to the black—

'Hold up, Aggy; there is old Hector; I should know his bay among ten thousand. The Leather-stocking has put his hounds into the hills this clear day, and they have started their game, you hear. There is a deer-track a few rods ahead;—and now, Beas, if thou canst muster courage enough to stand fire, I will give thee a saddle for thy Christmas dinner.'

The black drew up, with a cheerful grin upon his chilled features, and began thrashing his arms together, in order to restore the circulation of his fingers, while the speaker stood erect, and, throwing aside his outer covering, stepped from the sleigh upon a bank of snow, which sustained his weight without yielding more than an inch or two. A storm of sleet had fallen and frozen upon the surface a few days before and but a slight snow had occurred since to purify, without weakening its covering.

In a few moments the speaker succeeded in extricating a double-barrelled fowling-piece from amongst a multitude of trunks and band-boxes. After throwing aside the thick mittens which had encased his hands, that now appeared in a pair of leathern gloves tipped with fur, he examined his priming, and was about to move forward, when the light bounding noise of an animal plunging through the woods was heard, and directly a fine buck darted into the path, a short distance ahead of him. The appearance of the animal was sudden, and his flight inconceivably rapid; but the traveller appeared to be too keen a sportsman to be disconcerted by either. As it came first into view he raised the fowling-piece to his shoulder, and, with a practised eye and steady hand, drew a trigger; but the deer dashed forward undaunted, and apparently unhurt. Without lowering his piece, the traveller turned its muzzle towards his intended victim, and fired again. Neither discharge, however, seemed to have taken effect.

The whole scene had passed with a rapidity that confused the female, who was unconsciously rejoicing in the escape of the buck, as he rather darted like a meteor, than ran across the road before her, when a flat, dull sound struck her ear, quite different from the full, round reports of her father's gun, but still sufficiently distinct to be known as the concussion produced by fire arms. At the same instant that she heard this unexpected report, the buck sprang from the snow, to a great height in the air, and directly a second discharge, similar in sound to the first, followed, when the animal came to the earth, falling headlong, and rolling over on the crust once or twice with its own velocity. A loud shout was given by the unseen marksman, as triumphing in his better aim; and a couple of men instantly appeared from behind the trunks of two of the pines, where they had evidently placed themselves in expectation of the passage of the deer.

'Ha! Natty, had I known you were in ambush, I would not have fired,' cried the traveller, moving towards the spot where the deer lay—near to which he was followed by the delighted black, with the deign; 'but the sound of old Hector was too exhilarating to let me be quiet; though I hardly think I struck him either.'

'No, no, Judge,' returned the hunter, with an inward chuckle, and with that look of exultation that indicates a consciousness of superior skill; 'you burnt your powder only to warm your nose this cold evening. Did ye think to stop a full-grown buck, with Hector and the slut open upon him, within sound, with that robin pop-gun in your hand? There's plenty of pheasants amongst the swamps; and the snow birds are flying round your own door, where you may feed them with crumbs, and shoot enough for a pot-pye any day; but if you're for a buck, or a little bear's meat, Judge, you'll have to take the long rifle, with a greased wadding, or you'll waste more powder than you'll fill stomachs, I'm thinking.'

As the speaker concluded he drew his bare hand across the bottom of his nose, and again opened his enormous mouth with a kind of inward laugh.

'The gun scatters well, Natty, and has killed a deer before now,' said the traveller, smiling good humouredly. 'One barrel was charged with buck shot; but the other was loaded for birds only.—Here are two hurts that he has received: one through his neck, and the other directly through his heart. It is by no means certain, Natty, but I gave him one of the two.'

'Let who will kill him,' said the hunter, rather surlily, 'I suppose the creature is to be eaten.' So saying, he drew a large knife from a leathern sheath, which was stuck through his girdle or sash, and cut the throat of the animal. 'If there is two balls through the deer, I want to know if there was't two rifles fired—besides, who ever saw such a ragged hole from a smooth-bore, as this is through the neck?—and you will own yourself, Judge, that the buck fell at the last shot, which was sent from a truer and a younger hand, than your'n or mine 'ither; but for my part, although I am a poor man, I can live without the venison, but I don't love to give up my lawful dues in a free country.—Though, for the matter of that, might often makes right here, as well as in the old country, for what I can see.'

An air of sullen dissatisfaction pervaded the manner of the hunter during the whole of this speech; yet he thought it prudent to utter the close of the sentence in such an under tone, as to leave nothing audible but the grumbling sounds of his voice.

'Nay, Natty,' rejoined the traveller, with undisturbed good humour, 'it is for the honour that I contend. A few dollars will pay for the venison; but what will requite me for the lost honour of a buck's tail in my cap? Think, Natty, how I should triumph over that quizzing dog, Dick Jones, who has failed seven times this season already, and has only brought in one wood-chuck and a few grey squirrels.'

'Ah! the game is becoming hard to find, indeed, Judge, with your clearings and betterments,' said the old hunter, with a kind of disdainful resignation. 'The time has been, when I have shot thirteen deer, without counting the fawns, standing in the door of my own hut;—and, for bear's meat, if one wanted a ham or so from the cretur, he had only to watch a-nights, and he could shoot one by moonlight, through the cracks of the logs; no fear of his over-sleeping himself, neither, for the howling of the wolves was sartin to keep his eyes open. There's old Hector, '—putting with affection a tall hound, of black and yellow spots with white belly and legs, that just then came in on the scent, accompanied by the siet he had mentioned; 'see where the wolves bit his throat, the night I drave them from the venison I was smoking on the chimney top—that dog is more to be trusted nor many a Christian man; for he never forgets a friend, and loves the hand that gives him bread.'

There was a peculiarity in the manner of the hunter, that struck the notice of the young female, who had been a close and interested observer of his appearance and equipments, from the moment that he first came into view. He was tall, and so meagre as to make him seem above even the six feet that he actually stood in his stockings. On his head, which was thinly covered with lank, sandy hair, he wore a cap made of fox-skin, resembling in shape the one we have already described, although much inferior in finish and ornaments. His face was skinny, and thin almost to emaciation; but yet bore no signs of disease;—on the contrary, it had every indication of the most robust and enduring health. The cold and the exposure had, together, given it a colour of uniform red; his grey eyes were glancing under a pair of shaggy brows, that overhang them in long hairs of grey mingled with their natural hue; his scraggy neck was bare, and burnt to the same tint with his face; though a small part of a shirt collar, made of the country check, was to be seen above the over-dress he wore. A kind of coat, made of dressed deer-skin, with the hair on, was belted close to his lank body, by a girdle of coloured worsted. On his feet were deer-skin moccasins, ornamented with porcupines' quills, after the manner of the Indians, and his limbs were guarded with long leggings of the same material as the moccasins, which, gartering over the knees of his tarnished buck-skin breeches, had obtained for him, among the settlers the nick-name of Leather-stocking, notwithstanding his legs were protected beneath, in winter, by thick garments of woollen, daly made of good blue yarn. Over his left shoulder was slung a belt of deer-skin, from which depended an enormous ox horn, so thinly scraped, as to discover the dark powder that it contained. The larger end was fitted ingeniously and securely with a wooden bottom, and the other was stopped tight by a little plug. A leathern pouch hung before him, from which, as he concluded his last speech, he took a small measure, and, filling it accurately with powder, he commenced re-loading the rifle, which, as its butt rested on the snow before him, reached nearly to the top of his fox-skin cap.

The traveller had been closely examining the wounds during these movements, and now, without heeding the ill-humour of the hunter's manner, exclaimed—

'I would fain establish a right, Natty, to the honour of this capture; and surely if the hit in the neck be mine, it is enough; for the shot in the heart was unnecessary—what we call an act of supererogation, Leather-stocking.'

'You may call it by what learned name you please, Judge,' said the hunter, throwing his rifle across his left arm, and knocking up a brass lid in the breech, from which he took a small piece of greased leather, and wrapping a ball in it, forced them down by main strength on the powder, where he continued to pound them while speaking. 'It's far easier to call names, than to shoot a buck on the spring; but the cretur come by his end from a younger hand than 'ither your'n or mine, as I said before.'

'What say you, my friend,' cried the traveller, turning pleasantly to Natty's companion; 'shall we tan up this dollar for the honour, and you keep the silver if you lose—what say you, friend?'

'That I killed the deer,' answered the young man with a little haughtiness, as he leaned on another long rifle, similar to that of Natty's.

'Here are two to one, indeed,' replied the Judge, with a smile; 'I am out-voted—over-ruled, as we say, on the bench. There is Aggy, he can't vote, being a slave; and Bess is a minor—so I must even make the best of it. But you'll sell me the venison; and the deuce is in it, but I make a good story about its death.'

'The meat is none of mine to sell,' said Leather-stocking, adopting a little of his companion's hantour; 'for my part, I have known animals travel days with shots in the neck, and I'm none of them who'll rob a man of his rightful dues.'

'You are tenacious of your rights, this cold evening, Natty,' returned the Judge with unconquerable good nature; 'but what say you, young man, will three dollars pay you for the buck?'

'First, let us determine the question of right to the satisfaction of us both,' said the youth, firmly but respectfully, and with a pronunciation and language vastly superior to his appearance; 'with how many shot did you load your gun?'

'With five, Sir, said the Judge, gravely, a little struck with the other's manner; 'are they not enough to slay a buck like this?'

'One would do it; but,' moving to the tree from behind which he had appeared, 'you know, Sir, you fired in this direction—here are four of the bullets in the tree.'

The Judge examined the fresh marks in the rough bark of the pine, and, shaking his head, said, with a laugh—

'You are making out the case against yourself, my young advocate—where is the fifth?'

'Here,' said the youth, throwing aside the rough over-coat that he wore, and exhibiting a hole in his under garment, through which large drops of blood were oozing.

'Good God!' exclaimed the Judge, with horror; 'have I been trifling here about an empty distinction, and a fellow-creature suffering from my hands without a murmur? But hasten—quick—get into my sleigh—it is but a mile to the village, where surgical aid can be obtained;—all shall be done at my expense, and thou shalt live with me, until thy wound is healed—aye, and for ever afterwards, too.'

THE DIVER,

A BALLAD TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

(From the New Monthly Magazine.)

'Where is the man who will dive for his King,
In the pool as it rushes with turbulent sweep?
A cap from this surf-beaten Jetty I fling,
And he who will seek it below in the deep,
And will bring it again to the light of the day,
As the meed of his valour shall bear it away.'

'Now courage, my knights, and my warriors bold,
For, one, two, and three, and away it shall go—"
He roar'd, as he said it, the goblet of gold
Deep, deep in the howling abysses below—

'Where is the hero who ventures to brave
The whirl of the pool, and the break of the wave?'

The steel-coated lancemen, and nobles around,
Spoke not, but they trembled in silent surprise,
And pale they all stood on the cliff's giddy bound,
And no one would venture to dive for the prize.

'Three times have I spoke, but no hero will spring
And dive for the goblet, and dive for the King.'

But still they were silent and pale as before,
Till a brave son of Erin, in venturesome pride,
Dash'd forth from the lancemen's trembling corps,
And caught his helm, and his mantle aside,
While spearman, and noble, and lady and knight,
Gazed on the bold strippling in breathless affright.

Unmoved by the thoughts of his horrible doom,
He mounted the cliff—and he pass'd on his leap,
For the waves which the pool had imbibed in its womb
Were spout'd in thunder again from the deep—
Yes! as they return'd their report was as loud
As the peal when it bursts from the storm-riven cloud.

It roar'd, and it drizzled, it hiss'd and it whirl'd,
And it bubbled like water when mingled with flame,
And columns of foam to the heaven were hurl'd,
And billow on billow tumultuously came;
It seem'd that the womb of the ocean would bear
Sea over sea to the uppermost air.

It thunder'd again as the wave gather'd slow,
And black from the drizzling foam as it fell
The month of the fathomless tunnel below.
Was seen like the pass to the regions of hell;
The waters roll'd round it, and gather and boom,
And then all at once disappear in the gloom.

And now ere the waves had returned from the deep,
The youth wiped the sweat-drops which hung on his brow,
And he plunged—and the cataracts over him sweep,
And a shout from his terrified comrades arose;
And then there succeeded a horrible pause
For the whirlpool had stor'd its mysterious jaws.

And stiller it grew on the watery waste,
In the womb of the ocean it bellow'd alone,
The knights said their Aves in terrified haste,
And crowded each pianciple, jetty, and stone;
'The high-bearded strippling is whelm'd in the tide,
Ah! wall him," was echoed from every side.

'If the monarch had buried his crown in the pool
And said: "He shall wear it who brings it again,"
I would not have been so insensate a fool
As to dive when all hope of returning were vain;
What heaven conceals in the gulfs of the deep,
Lies buried for ever, and there it must sleep."

Full many a burden the whirlpool had borne,
And spout'd it forth on the drizzling surge,
But nought but a mast that was splinter'd and torn,
Or the hull of a vessel was seen to emerge,
But wider and wider it opens its jaws,
And louder it gurgles, and louder it draws.

It drizzled, it thunder'd, it hiss'd and it whirl'd,
And it bubbled like water when mingled with flame,
And columns of foam to the heaven were hurl'd,
And stood upon flood from the deep tunnel came,
And then with a noise like the storm from the North,
The hellish eruption was vomited forth.

But, ah! what is that on the wave's foamy brim,
Disgorge'd with an ocean of wreck and of wood,
'Tis the snow-white arm and the shoulder of him
Who darily dived for the glittering meed:
'Tis he, 'tis the strippling so hardy and bold,
Who swings in his left hand the goblet of gold.

He draws a long breath as the breaker he leaves,
Then swims through the water with many a strain
While all his companions exultingly heave
Their voices above the wild din of the main,
'Tis he, O! 'tis he, from the horrible hole
The brave one has rescued his body and soul."

He reach'd the tall Jetty, and kneeling he laid
The massy gold goblet in triumph and pride
At the foot of the monarch, who instantly made
A sign to his daughter who stood by his side:
She fill'd it with wine, and the youth with a spring
Received it, and quaff'd it, and turn'd to the King.

'Long life to the monarch! how happy are they
Who breathe and exist in the sun's rosy light,
But he who is doom'd in the ocean to stray,
Views nothing around him but horror and night;
Let no one henceforward be tempted like me
To pry in the secrets contain'd in the sea.

I felt myself seized, with the quickness of thought
The whirlpool entomb'd me in body and limb,
And billow on billow tumultuously brought
Its cataracts o'er me; in vain did I swim,
For like a mere pebble with horrible sound
The force of the double stream twist'd me round.

But God in his mercy, for to him alone
In the moment of danger I ever have clung,
Did bear me towards a projection of stone:
I seized it in transport, and round it I hung,
The goblet lay too on a corally ledge,
Which jutted just over the cataract's edge.

And then I look'd downward, and horribly deep,
And twinkling sheen in the darkness below,
And though to the hearing it ever might sleep,
Yet still the eye clouded with terror might know,
That serpents and creatures that made my blood cool,
Were swimming and splashing about in the pool.

Ball'd up to a mass, in a moment uncoil'd
They rose, and again disappear'd in the dark,
And down in the billows which over them boil'd
I saw a behemoth contend with a shark;
The sounds of their hideous duel awaken
The black-bellied whale, and the slumbering craken.

Still, still did I linger forlorn, and oppress'd
With a feeling of terror that curd'd my blood;
Ah think of a human and sensible breast
Enclosed with the hideous shapes of the flood;
Still, still did I linger, but far from the reach
Of those that I knew would await on the beach.

Metthought that a serpent towards me did creep,
And trailing behind him whole fathoms of length,
He open'd his jaws; and I dropp'd from the steep Round which I had clung with expiring strength:
'Twas well that I did so, the stream bore me up,
And here is thy servant, and there is the cup.

He then was retiring, a look from the King
Detain'd him: "My hero, the cup is thine own,
'Tis richly thy meed, but I'll give thee this ring,
Beset with a diamond and chrysolite stone,
If again thou wilt dive, and discover to me
What's hid in the deepest abyss of the sea."

The daughter heard that with compassionate thought,
Quick, quick to the feet of the monarch she flew:
'O father, desist from this horrible sport,
He has done what no other would venture to do,
If the life of a creature thou fain wilt destroy,
Let a noble take place of this generous boy."

The monarch has taken the cup in his hand,
And tumbled it down in the bellowing sea;
"And if thou canst bring it again to the strand,
The first and the best of my knights thou shalt be:
If that will not tempt thee, this maid thou shalt wed,
And share as a husband the joys of her bed."
Then the pride of old Eirin arose in his look,
And it flash'd from his eye-balls courageously keen,
One glance on the beautiful vision he took,
And he saw her change colour, and sink on the green.
"By the stool of Saint Peter the prize I'll obtain;"
He shouted, and instantly dived in the main.
The waters sunk down, and a thundering peal
Announced that the time of their sojourn was o'er;
Each eye is cast downward in terrified zeal,
As forth from the tunnel the cataracts pour,
The waters rush up, and the waters subside,
But ah! the bold diver remains in the tide.

THE CHILD ANGEL:—A DREAM.

I chanced upon the prettiest, oddest, fantastical thing of a dream the other night, that you shall hear of. I had been reading the "Loves of the Angels," and went to bed with my head full of speculations, suggested by that extraordinary legend. It had given birth to innumerable conjectures; and, I remember, the last waking thought, which I gave expression to on my pillow, was a sort of wonder, "what could come of it."

I was suddenly transported, how or whither I could scarcely make out—but to some celestial region. It was not the real heavens neither—not the downright Bible heaven—but a kind of fairy-land heaven, about which a poor human fancy may have leave to sport and air itself, I will hope, without presumption.

Methought—what wild things dreams are!—I was present—at what would you imagine!—at an angel's gossiping.

Whence it came, or how it came, or who bid it come, or whether it came purely out of its own head, neither you nor I know—but there lay, sure enough, wrapt in its little cloudy swaddling bands—a Child Angel.

Sun-threads—filmy beams—ran through the celestial napery of what seemed its princely cradle. All the winged orders hovered round, watching when the new-born should open its yet unclosed eyes: which, when it did, first one, and then the other—with a solicitude and apprehension, yet not such as, stained with fear, dims the expanding eye-lids of mortal infants—but as if to explore its path in those its unhereditary palaces—what an inextinguishable titter that time spared not celestial visages! Nor wanted there to my seeming—O the inexplicable simpleness of dreams!—bowls of that cheering nectar,

—which mortals cauld call below—

Nor were wanting faces of female ministrants,—stricken in years, as it might seem—so dexterous were those heavenly attendants to counterfeited kindly similitudes of earth, to greet with terrestrial child-rites the young Present, which earth had made to heaven.

Then were celestial harpings heard, not in full symphony as those by which the spheres are tutored; but, as loudest instruments on earth speak oftentimes, muffled; so to accommodate their sound the better to the weak ears of the imperfect-born. And, with the noise of those subdued soundings, the Angelet sprang forth, fluttering its rudiments of pinions—but forthwith flagged and was recovered into the arms of those full-winged angels. And a wonder it was to see how, as years went round in heaven—a year in dreams is a day—continually its white shoulders put forth buds of wings, but, wanting the perfect angelic nutriment, anon was shorn of its aspiring, and fell fluttering—still caught by angel hands—for ever to put forth shoots, and to fall fluttering, because its birth was not of the unmixed vigour of heaven.

And a name was given to the Babe Angel, and it was to be called Ge-Urania, because its production was of earth and heaven.

And it could not taste of death, by reason of its adoption into immortal palaces; but it was to know weakness, and reliance, and the shadow of human imbecility; and it went with a lame gait; but in its goings it exceeded all mortal children in grace and swiftness. Then pity first sprang up in angelic bosoms; and yearnings (like the human) touched them at the sight of the immortal lame one.

And with pain did then first those Intuitive Essences, with pain and strife to their natures (not grief), put back their bright intelligences, and reduce their etherial minds, schooling them to degrees and slower processes, so to adapt their lessons to the gradual illumination (as must needs be) of the half-earth-born; and what intuitive notices they could not repel (by reason that their nature is to know all things at once), the half-heavenly novice, by the better part of its nature, aspired to receive into its understanding; so that Humility and Aspiration went on even-paced in the instruction of the glorious Amphibium.

But, by reason that Mature Humanity is too gross to breathe the air of that super-subtile region, its portion was, and is, to be a child for ever.

And because the human part of it might not press into the heart and inwards of the palace of its adoption, those full-natured angels tended it by turns in the purlieus of the palace, where were shady groves and rivulets, like this green earth from which it came: so Love, with Voluntary Humility, waited upon the entertainment of the new-adopted.

And myriads of years rolled round (in dreams Time is nothing), and still it kept, and is to keep, perpetual childhood, and is the Tutelar Genius of Childhood upon earth, and still goes lame and lovely.

By the banks of the river Pison is seen, lone-sitting by the grave of the terrestrial Mirzah, whom the angel Nadir loved, a Child; but not the same which I saw in heaven. A pensive hue overcasts its lineaments; nevertheless, a correspondency is between the child by the grave, and that celestial orphan, whom I saw above; and the dimness of the grief upon the heavenly, is as a shadow or emblem of that which stains the terrestrial. And this correspondency is not to be understood but by dreams.

And in the archives of heaven I had grace to read, how that once the angel Nadir, being exiled from his place for mortal passion, upspringing on the wings of parental love (such power had parental love for a moment to suspend the else irrevocable law) appeared for a brief instant in his station; and, depositing a wondrous Birth, straightway disappeared, and the palaces knew him no more. And this charge was the self-same Babe, who goeth lame and lovely—but Mirzah sleepeth by the river Pison.—Lond. Mag.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—While the Magazines and Newspapers teem at the commencement of every month with profuse reports of female fashions, from the feather to the shoe-tye, it has been a matter of considerable surprise to me, and, no doubt, of great concern to many, that the Corinthians, Exquisites, Dandies, and Demi-dandies, should so long remain neglected in the list of public notice, and have been without some "Speculum modicum," to guide them to the pinnacle of fashion; as well as to hand down to posterity, the exquisite taste of our own tasteful, and variegating period, in the art of male decoration.

Peaceful and propitious as the times now are, when "Arma cedant togæ," a report of this nature would unfailingly be received with approbation, studied with admiration, and followed by inclination. Therefore, in order to set a laudable example in an affair of such importance, I hand you a report for the last month; or rather a prospectus of what may be done to gratify so large a body of your readers, if some more able correspondent would take up the cause, and vindicate the modes of men, as is done of women, or in politer phraseology, gentlemen and ladies.

REPORT FOR MAY.

The last month most inauspiciously commenced—

"Child'd by rude gales, while yet relictant May "Withheld the beauties of the vernal day;"

and, while

"Winter revel'd with protracted power,"

both trees and fashionables were prevented from shooting forth in their gay and spring-like attire. Benjamins and travails still enveloped the Corinthians, and the dingy winter campaigning black or blue trowsers, held a too long reign of hard worn service.

Spring has at last enlivened us by her genial presence, and the hemisphere of fashion is displayed in its full luxuriance.

The few observations we have hitherto been enabled to make convince us that grey hats, after the temporary banishment of a few years, are likely to become once more prevalent and produce a plentiful crop; among those already sported, we think, we recognise a few that are somewhat shorn of their pristine honour.

The hair is disposed in so peculiar a form, that we scarcely know how to report it,—the front rising in perpendicular assurance of its appearing as if saturated and emitting sparks of electric fancy, while the sides, in negligence and confusion, seem to bid defiance to the comb, and demand the assistance of the fingers only.

Black and occasionally blue stocks still keep their stations round the necks of both old and young—contrived to buckle behind—with ends in front which tie nothing—and pins or brooches which fasten nothing. They far outdo the dull inventions of our ancient bon monde. The angles of the shirt collars, (vulgarily called shams) are not quite so acute as of late, and we perceive them lowered about the eighth of an inch. This has a very becoming effect on the bust and general contour. Coats and coats are both worn, the latter however confined for the present to the exquisites—while the short frocks remind us of the out-grown ones of our childhood, reaching only a little below the knees.

Some upper and under waistcoats have appeared with a high military like collar, and buttoned close to the neck; we see neither the ornament nor utility of this mode, excepting occasionally to hide unbleached linen—they are chiefly confined to Corinthians and Demis—Wristbands as low as the knuckles still prevail; but we observe among the Demis that they seldom appear beyond the first or second day of the week; some few again shew themselves about Thursday, but this is by no means general.

White kid gloves bear a very ephemeral beauty, like premature old age fast fading into grey.

Of the light striped trowsers we have occasion to make the same remarks; but we think the present rage of wearing them down to the ground extremely well adapted to preserve the brilliancy of Day and Martin on the heels and insteps, and particularly useful in keeping the boots clean in miry weather. The tops of whole or riding boots are almost universally covered with drab kerseymere—this we think wonderfully well imagined: our foolish ancestors wore boots to protect and cover their woollen hose; we more wisely protect and cover our boots with woollen tops.—Of these matters however, we may simply conclude with the poet that

Fashion in every thing bears sovereign sway,
And boots and pantaloons have each their day.

ON NATURE AND ART IN POETRY.

(Concluded from our last.)

Lord Byron himself furnishes a striking and beautiful instance of the superiority of Nature to Art in its effect on human passion, as pictured in poetry—

*They were alone, but not alone as they
Who, shut in cham'ers, think it loveliness;
The silent ocean, and the starlight bay—
The twilight glow which momentarily grew less—
The voiceless sands, and dropping caves, which lay
Around them, made them to each other preas,
As if there were no life beneath the sky,
Save theirs, and that their life could never die.*

Such, indeed, is the true effect of Nature upon the soul. The lines under which I have run my pen are the most direct exemplification of my position. They were not alone in the chambers of man, but in the vast dome of Nature;—the most gorgeous scenes of worldly art would not have drawn their hearts together like the simple solitude of the evening shore, and the solemn aspect of its natural beauty.

Again—Take the following splendid passage from Manfred—for from Lord Byron's own mouth will I judge him:—

*My joy was in the wilderness, to breathe
The difficult air of the ice'd mountain's top,
Where the birds dare not build, nor insect's wing
Fill'd o'er the herbless granite;—or to plunge
Into the torrent, and to roll along
On the swift whirl of the new-breaking wave
Of river-stream, or ocean in their flow.
In these my early strength exulted, or
To follow through the night the moving moon,
The stars and their developments; or catch
The dazling lightnings till my eyes grew dim;
Or to look, list'ning, on the scatter'd leaves,
While autumn winds were at their evening song.*

Now, could a mind like Manfred's—fallen, indeed, but originally, and at the time to which these lines have reference, of the highest mould possible for humanity to be cast in,—could this mind have derived the same sensations from gazing on any objects of Art, as it did from communing thus with Nature in the scenes and seasons of her wildest and grandest sublimity?—I think not.

It is also observable, that every image in this passage of exquisite poetry is drawn from Nature—not one single one from Art. The same remark is generally applicable to the whole of the splendid poem from which these lines are taken—and, indeed, with few exceptions, to all Lord Byron's works. But it is natural that it should be so,—for all our most poetical poets (if I may so speak) derive the great majority of their images from Nature. I will defy the best-read Shakspearian to point out in his works more than one image in ten not deduced from the poetry of Nature.

Lord Byron has made great appeal to sculpture in support of the doctrines which he upholds so much in his theory, but from which he departs so wholly in practice—and he cites the Venus as being more beautiful than (almost) any thing he has ever seen in Nature. I shall not take advantage of his exception in favour of Lady Charlemont and the Albanian road-maker,* I shall merely say that I have seen numberless women who, however inferior to the Venus in form, have far excelled her in general beauty, inasmuch as a woman of marble must always yield in expression to a woman of flesh and blood. Marble may have—the Venus has—all the beauty of perfection of form and feature, and of gracefulness of attitude—but can it have that far superior grace, the grace of motion? Can a statue have that magical variety of beautiful colouring which delights us in the eyes, lips, teeth, hair and complexion of a living woman? Can the surface of stone possess that exquisite texture which nothing but the skin of lovely living flesh can have—that mingling of velvet and satin, with the freshness of life superadded? Can the hair of a statue float on the wind? Can the glance of its eye shift? Can the smile of its lip change?—These, it will be said are impossibilities—they are so; stone cannot be made to equal a living being—Art cannot be made to equal Nature.

How beautifully this idea is expressed in the following lines:—

*They said her cheek of youth was beautiful
Till withering sorrow blanched the bright rose there—
And I have heard men swear her form was fair,
But grief did lay his icy finger on it,
And chilled into a cold, joyless statue.†*

These lines certainly were written without the slightest reference to the rivalry of Nature and art—but they were written in the true spirit of poetry, and they represent the effect of withering grief on a lovely woman, as being that

*Song and smile—beauty and melody,
And youth and happiness are gone from her,
and that her form is "chilled into a cold and joyless statue;"—that, in short, she has faded from a being, instinct with beautiful life, formed by Nature,—to motionless "shapen stone," chiselled by Art. May we not say, then, physically, as Godwin has said,*

* Lord B., in the following lines, directly contradicts the position here advanced in his letter—but, indeed, his precepts in the pamphlet are in direct opposition to his practice in poetry:—

*"—she was one
Fit for the model of a statuary,
(A race of mere impostors, when all's done.)
I've seen much finer women, ripe and real,
Than all the nonsense of their stone ideal."—So have I.*

† Bertram.

morally, "It is better that man should be a living being than a stock or a stone?"

Has Art any thing so poetical as the desert—with its ocean-like extent—its columns of moving sand—its burning and death-bearing winds—and, more than all, its occasional green spots and gushing springs, rendered doubly beautiful and grateful by their contrast to all around? I believe there is no image more frequently made use of in poetry, especially by Lord Byron himself, than this very one of a fountain in the midst of the desert—

As springs in deserts found seem sweet, all brackish though they be; [me.]

So, midst the withered waste of life, those tears would flow to
How is it that caravans add poetry to the desert? It is not by the contrast between the littleness of man and the immensity of the wilds through which he journeys?—by his toil, his privations, his peril? We see him exposed to be swept from the face of the earth by the whirlwinds of sand, or to perish from drought in the desert; and we reflect how little he is, and how vast and awful is the wilderness around him. Which is it, then, which confers poetry—the caravan on the desert, or the desert on the caravan? Each certainly heightens and adds to the interest of the other, but the desert would still be sublime, though man never crossed its surface,—whilst the bales, and slaves, and camels of the merchants would lose all poetry, were they unconnected with the wildness and grandeur of the desert.

But there is one whole class, and that the highest class, of poetry, in which Nature is all—Art nothing.—I mean that of feeling and of passion. I think it will be conceded, that the highest of all poetry is that which portrays the workings of the human mind—the conflicts of the human heart.—And is not this all Nature? Is not the jealousy of Othello, Nature? Is not the love of Romeo, Nature? Are not the irrelative guilt and vacillating ambition of Macbeth—the relentless cruelty of Richard—the broken-hearted madness of Lear, Nature? Truly may we say with him—"Nature's above art in that respect." I would willingly rest my quarrel upon this ground. Strike out from poetry all that relates to Man, and what have you left? 'Twere endless to prove by citation that all poetry which does relate to man, is wholly derived from, and dependent upon, Nature—and has no connection with Art. To do this I might quote the better half of the poetry of the better half of poets—to do this I might quote nearly the whole of Shakspeare. You have only to take down from your shelf the first volume of Shakspeare that falls under your hand, to see how truly Nature was the well-spring from which the streams of his genius flowed. Hence is it that he still lives within the soul of all those to whom his language is known.—His contemporaries reared their structures on the shifting sands of Art, and the advancing tide of society has undermined them, and made them fall;—the rock of Nature was the foundation on which Shakespeare built—it is immutable, and the glorious edifices stands unshaken, unshakable, by ages.

In conclusion, I must guard against being supposed to deny the poetical susceptibility of many objects of Art. I fully admit that it exists, and that to a high degree, but not to the very highest. The master-pieces of Art are the highest manifestations of the human mind, but the master-pieces of Nature are manifestations of the Deity himself. I regard, in fine, Art to yield to Nature; inasmuch as the noblest of the works of God are superior to the noblest of the works of man.—Albion.

THE DAISY IN INDIA:—

Supposed to be addressed by the Rev. Dr. Carey, the learned and illustrious Baptist Missionary, at Serampore, to the first plant of this kind, which sprang up unexpectedly in his garden, out of some English earth, in which other seeds had been conveyed to him from this country. The subject was suggested by reading a letter from Dr. Carey to a botanical friend, in England, an interesting extract from which is given at the foot of these verses.

1.
Thrice welcome, little English Flower!
My mother country's white and red,
In rose or lily, till this hour,
Never to me such beauty spread:
Transplanted from thine island-bed,
A treasure in a grain of earth,
Strange as a spirit from the dead,
Thine embryo sprang to birth.

Thrice welcome, little English Flower!
Whose tribes beneath our natal skies
Shut close their leaves while vapours lower;
But when the sun's gay beams arise,
With unabashed but modest eyes
Follow his motion to the west,
Nor cease to gaze till daylight dies,
Then fold themselves to rest.

3.
Thrice welcome, little English Flower!
To this resplendent hemisphere,
Where Flora's giant offspring tower
In gorgeous liveries all the year:
Thou, only Thou, art little here,
Like worth unfriended or unknown,
Yet to my British heart more dear
Than all the torrid zone.

Thrice welcome, little English Flower!
Of early scenes beloved by me,
While happy in my father's bower,
Thou shalt the blithe memorial be:
The fairy sports of infancy,
Youth's golden age, and manhood's prime,
Home, country, kindred, friends,—with these
Are mine in this far clime.

5.
Thrice welcome, little English Flower!
I'll rear thee with a trembling hand:
O for the April sun and shower,
The sweet May-dews of that fair land,
Where Daisies, thick as starlight, stand
In every walk!—that here might shoot
Thy scions, and thy buds expand,
A hundred from one root!

Thrice welcome, little English Flower!
To me the pledge of Hope unseen:
When sorrow would my soul o'erpower
For joys that were, or might have been,
I'll call to mind, how—fresh and green,
I saw thee waking from the dust,
Then turn to heaven with brow serene,
And place in God my trust.

J. MONTGOMERY.

Extract from a Letter of Dr. Carey, in India, to Mr. J. Cooper, of Wentworth, Yorkshire.

"With great labour I have preserved the common Field Daisy, which came up accidentally in some English earth, for these six or seven years; but my whole stock is now only one plant. I have never been able, even with sheltering them, to preserve an old root through the rains, but I get a few seedlings every year. The proportion of small plants in this country is very inconsiderable, the greater number of our vegetable productions being either large shrubs, immense climbers, or timber trees. By the kindness of yourself and other gentlemen, who have lately sent me roots or seeds, our number of small shrubs is much increased, and our stock of bulbous plants become very respectable. Still, however, tulips, hyacinths, snow-drops, most of the lilies, &c. are strangers to us. I have a great desire to possess honeysuckles, especially the common woodbine. I mix the seeds which I send you with twice or thrice their bulk of earth, and ram the whole in a box (a cask would do better), and nail or hoop them up close. I have no doubt but a quantity of most of your wild seeds, and many others, would succeed here, if well packed in earth as I have done with this box. A cask of your peat-earth, thus full of seeds, would be an invaluable treasure, as the earth itself would be of great service in the culture of many plants. We have no peat in India. All our soils are either strong clays, deep loam, or loose, but fertile, sands. I need not say, that the seeds should be packed as soon as possible after they are ripe. Old seeds have scarcely ever succeeded in this country."

MEDITATIONS ON AN OLD COAT.

Quæque ipse vidi,
Et quorum pars magna fui.

I hate a new coat. It is like a troublesome stranger that sticks to you most impertinently wherever you go, embarrasses all your motions, and thoroughly confounds your self-possession. A man with a new coat on is not at home even in his own house; abroad he is uneasy; he can neither sit, stand, nor go like a reasonable mortal.

All men of sense hate new coats, but a fool rejoiceth in a new coat. Without looking at his person, you can tell if he has one on. New coat is written on his face. It hangs like a label out of his gaping mouth. There is an odious harmony between his glossy garment and his smooth and senseless phiz; a disgusting keeping in the portrait. Of all vile exhibitions, defend me from a fool in a new blue coat with brass buttons! Avant then, new coat! Hence horrible substance, broad-cloth mockery hence! But come, thou old coat fair and free; be thou my muse, be thou my Charon! Conduct me to the Elysium of threadbare essayists, battered beaus, and jobbing tailors, where the genius of shreds and patches dwells in some fairy Monmouth-street, while eternal cabbage springs beneath his feet.

An old coat is like an old acquaintance. However stiff you may have felt with either at first introduction, time makes you perfectly easy with both; with both you take equal liberties; you treat neither with much ceremony. An accidental breach with either is soon repaired.

An old coat is favourable to retirement and study. When your coat is old you feel no tendency to flaunting abroad or to dissipation. Buffon, they tell us, used to sit down to write in his dress wig, and Haydn to compose in a new coat and ruffles. I cannot conceive how they could manage it. I could no more write an article in a new coat than in a strait waistcoat. Were I to attempt it my very good friends, the public, would be severe sufferers.

A happy thought, by the way, just strikes me. You may tell by the manner of an author how he is usually dressed when composing. I am convinced that Sir Walter Scott writes in an old coat. Lord Byron without any coat at all. Barry Cornwall in an elegant morning-gown and red slippers. Geoffrey Crayon in the ordinary dress of a gentleman, neither new nor old. Cobbett in a coat very often turned. Moore in a handsome brown frock and nankeen trowsers. Croly in full dress. Leigh Hunt in a fashionable night-gown, of a fantastic pattern, and somewhat shabby. Wordsworth in a frieze jacket and leather gaiters. The late Mr. Shelley wrote in a dreadnought. Coleridge in a careless dress, half lay, half clerical. Hazlitt in an old surtout, that was never brushed. Gifford in a fine pepper and salt; and—in a fustian jacket.

Your old coat is a gentle moralist; it recalls your mind from external pomps and vanities, and bids you look within. No man ever thinks of drawing the eyes of the ladies in an old coat; their flattery is not likely to turn his head as long as his coat remains unturned. A friend asked me to go with him last night to the Opera; I consulted my old coat, and stayed at home to write for the benefit of posterity.

I cannot say that I have so great an attachment to other aged articles of dress as I have to an old coat. An old waistcoat is well enough; but old breeches are treacherous friends, too apt to desert you on a pinch: their friendship rests on a very slight foundation, and they often fail those who are in need.

Not so an old coat: it sticks by you to the last. With a little care you may wear it for years, nay, for life. The vulnerable parts of an old coat are the arm-pits, the elbows, and the skirts; of those you must be cautious. I remember a friend who was rather attached to emphatic gesticulation, and used to elevate his arms to an indiscreet height long after his coat had passed its grand climacteric: this should be avoided. I recollect another, an old brother soldier, who, Joseph like, left his skirts in his washerwoman's hands one morning, and went to parade in a short jacket, though not belonging to the light infantry.

I have seen an old coat appear to its advantage on the body of a great buck; as thus—he was well dressed in all other respects, immaculate waistcoat, unexceptionable inexpressibles, silk stockings in perfect health, but coat as old as Adam. Thus attired, he used to caper at a ball with immense applause. Next morning he visited his partners in a suit that Sir Rd. Steele would call fire-new.

The indifference with which you can look on sorts of places and adventures when your coat is old, your gallant independence of the weather, your boundless scorn of coaches and umbrellas, the courage with which you brave every accident by flood and field, are all conspicuous advantages of an old coat.

The last benefit I shall notice of an old coat is the exercise it affords to the genius of the wearer. Judgment, taste, and fancy are equally strengthened by the patching, disguising, and setting of it off to the best advantage. I found a friend the other day busily engaged on a blue coat that, to all seeming, was in the very last stage of decrepitude. First, he patched the elbows, &c. and strengthened the tottering buttons. Next came brushing and dusting, a finishing operation let me tell you. Then watering; your water is a sore refresher of a weather-beaten old coat. Then came a second brushing, with a soft brush. Then he took a sponge, dipped it in ink mixed with vinegar, and rubbed the seams of the garment with it. Lastly, he polished the buttons with a piece of leather. After all this, the coat was not to be recognised by its most intimate friends. There was as much difference between it and its former self, as between an old beau of sixty when he first rises in the morning, bald, grizzled, rough and toothless, and the same beau shaved and dressed, with his false teeth, his painted eyebrows, and his new black wig.—Museum.

THE PERIPATETIC.

Dandies in general—Dandy Automata, and their Tailors—Dandies in Wax—Grecian and Roman Dandies—French Petits-maitres and Gourmands—Duke of Cumberland's Wig—Dandy Relics.

It is a common notion, that the present age abounds more than any preceding one in those frivolities of dress, which, in different times, have been known by so many various designations. And the man of grave habits, (I may use this expression in a double sense,) who is occasionally obliged to do penance as a pedestrian, through the fashionable haunts of the 'West End,' encountering, on his route, the swarm of dandies, that, 'thick as autumnal leaves in Vallombrosa,' are scattered along that quarter of the town, seldom fails to return home with the most alarming impressions against the unparalleled foppery of the age. For my own part, however, I am much disposed to set down this notion among our 'vulgar errors,' since I cannot but think, that the insignificant tribe in question, whether under the appellation of beaux, fops, petits-maitres, dandies, or exquisites, have equally abounded in all ages, and have, for the wisest purposes, been destined to act as a foil or set-off to the more sober part of their species.

Accordingly, when, in my peripatetic excursions, I fall in with any of these non-descripts, the circumstance throws me into a fit of philosophical speculation on the insanity of their pursuits, as contrasted with the more important objects of mankind. And the latter are proportionally elevated in my opinion, as they are thus brought into a comparison so much in their favour. The frivolous creature, who lives only in his clothes, may justly be considered as being nothing out of them;—he is in fact no more than an automaton, made to shew off the newest fashion,—a mere walking figure, designed to display to the best advantage the dexterity of his tailor, and too often, his own in the bargain, when he happens to walk away, much to the cost and chagrin of the foresaid ingenious artificer. And this, by the bye, is the grand mark of distinction between the walking dandy and that of wax, which remains stationary in the tailor's shop-window to the great edification of all admiring passengers. But, whatever ingenuity the automata in question may occasionally evince in this particular, I still hold them to be as unqualified for any rational functions as Punch and Judy themselves, and should as little think of entering into conversation with them, as with the Italian images that parambulate our streets, or with the royal effigies in the tower.

But I have said, that the race of irrationals under consideration are by no means confined to our age and country. On the contrary, we read of them in all times and among all nations. Even those sage and philosophical people, the Greeks and Romans, were not exempt from them. A modern traveller in Greece discovered amongst the ruins of the Parthenon, the representations of several Grecian dandies, attired in the full costume of jockey-boots and gipsy-hats, and thus exhibiting complete prototypes of certain well-dressed gentlemen in the present day. But the wise man has said, that 'there is nothing new under the sun;' and it is, therefore, probable, that all the inventive powers of our modern fabriquans des habits have been unable to add any thing material to the discoveries of their precursors of Athens and Rome.

It is among the Romans, however, that we are to look for the ancient dandies in the greatest perfection. Not only are they described by their poets, and depicted in their statues, but they are even recorded by their historians. For myself, I have no wish, at present, to set forth my learning in this abstruse science, by introducing, as I might, an erudite dissertation on the toga, stola, paludamentum, or cinctus gabinus. Yet these, with a thousand other varieties in the Roman costume, would form an edifying study for the dandies and tailors of this metropolis, who might thus add materially to the grace and refinement of the art in which they so much delight. Among all the garments worn by the beaux of Rome, the multitum seems to have been the favourite: it was of a fine transparent nature, and therefore well adapted to display the human shape to advantage. Juvenal, in whose time this effeminacy appears to have been all the rage, inveighs against a distinguished warrior of the day, for having assumed it. These are his words:—

Non facient alii, cum tu multitum sumas, Cretice!

What, valiant Cretians, won't others do,
When thus we see such foppery in you!

But the ultra-dandies of Rome went still further than this, and not content even with the transparency of the multitum, appeared frequently, as to the upper part of their persons, puris naturalibus. Thus Horace in allusion to a bea of the name of Telephus, says:—

'Dum tu, Lydia, Telephi
Cervicem, roseam, et cerea Telephi
Laudas brachia, &c.'

While Telephus's blooming charms,
His rosy neck and waxen arms,
With rapture, Lydia, you admire.

Far be it from me, however, as a grave and moral peripatetic, to insinuate that our modern fops ought to emulate those of Rome in abandoning, à la Byron, their cravats and collars, or in appearing without sleeves to their coats or shirts. All this may be very well on Moulsey Horst or Hornsey Down, but would, I admit, be quite against all bien-séance in Pall Mall or the Park. For this reason, I would, by no means, insist on this point, much as I might be disposed to recommend the Roman toga in preference to the tight-laced dandy jacket, to say nothing of the stays, now so much in vogue.

It would be easy enough to show, that the rage of dandyism, under other names, has ever prevailed, more or less, in this country, and that France, in particular, was, at no very distant period, the grand mart for all things needful for our bodies, whether externally or internally, whence it became the perpetual resort of our milliners, caterers, cooks, beaux, epicures, et hoc genus omne.

Our dandies, therefore, remain the same witless automata they have always been. But it may be some consolation to them to reflect, that, a century hence, their hats, stays, or trowsers, (should they luckily escape the ravages of time and old-clothesmen) may become objects of as great curiosity, and be as highly prized by antiquarians and virtuosos, as a roman citta or pilum would be now, or as the great Duke of Cumberland's wig was, about ten years ago, when it was bought for fifty pounds sterling. It may then be worthy the consideration of our fops and exquisites, whether, instead of bestowing their cast-off habiliments on a set of thankless valets and grooms, it would not be more advisable to direct them, by their last wills, to be carefully treasured for the benefit of posterity, so that, by being disposed of as pieces of virtue, they might acquire a value which never belonged to their wearers.—Lit. Chron.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

A GREEN COLOUR EXTRACTED FROM COFFEE-BERRIES.

At Venice a certain method has been lately discovered for composing a fine unchangeable emerald-green colour. A certain quantity of coffee is boiled in river-water: spoiled coffee (café avarié) is preferable. By means of a proportional quantity of pure soda a green precipitate is obtained, which is suffered to dry for six or seven days, upon polished marble, stirring it about occasionally, in order that every part of it may be in contact with atmospheric air, from which it receives a new vivacity of tint. The green lake obtained by this process has resisted the action of the acids, and even the influence of light and moisture.

NEW PRINTING MACHINERY.

DR. WILLIAM CHURCH, of Boston, whose improvements in printing we lately noticed, is now in England, procuring the construction of his apparatus and machinery. A principal object of this improvement is to print constantly from new types, which is effected by simplifying the process for casting and composing. The type is delivered perfect by machinery, and laid as it is cast in separate compartments, with unerring order and exactness. The composition is then affected by other apparatus, directed by keys like those of a piano-forte, and the type may be thus arranged in words and lines, as quickly as in the performance of notes in music. No error can arise, except from touching the wrong key; hence an expert hand will leave little labour for the reader. The form may be worked as usual, either by a printing-press or machine. It is then found less expensive, under Dr. Church's economical system of recasting, to remelt the types, and recast them, than to perform the tedious operation of distribution. The melting takes place without atmospheric exposure, by which oxydation and waste of metal are avoided. It is calculated that two men can produce 75,000 new types per hour, and in recomposing one man will perform as much as three or four compositors. In the production of types, the saving is ninety-nine parts in a hundred, and in the composition, distribution, and reading, three parts in four. In regard to press-work, Dr. C. has invented a machine to work with platens instead of cylinders, from which he will be able to take thirty fine impressions per minute; and some of these have been ordered by London printers.—An establishment is about to be commenced in New York, in which these inventions will be applied to the reprinting of popular works, and to printing in general.

THE CABINET.

A PROPER ENGLISH GENTLEMAN.

A curious trial took place not very long ago, to determine whether a particular person were a Gentleman or not? it arose out of the following circumstances:—A match had been made to run some horses which were to be ridden by Gentlemen—on the day appointed the race took place, and was won by a horse, ridden by a person of upwards of seventy years of age, an old sportsman, but who, according to the feelings (not to say prejudices) of the other parties, did not come up to their ideas of a Gentleman. The prize therefore was disputed, and the dispute brought into open court; I was not present at the trial, but the report of it soon after passed through my hands, and though I cannot undertake to give it exactly, some circumstances struck me so forcibly, that I believe I may venture to vouch for their truth. Those who had made the match, and some who rode, were young men of very large fortunes, and to mend the matter M. P.'s, which being interpreted means, Members of Parliament. They were of course, all subpoenaed as witnesses on the trial.

Unfortunately, the cause did not come on so soon as was expected, and after all, in the evening of the day of trial, at an hour when all the young M. P. witnesses, having finished their libations at the hotel, came into court by no means so sober as the Judge. They came in also just as they had ridden into the town in the morning, booted, spurred, splashed, and dirty. Vexed at having been kept waiting longer than they expected, and impatient to be gone, they behaved very rudely to the Judge, the Jury, and the Counsel for the defendant. The latter, who rose afterwards to one of the highest stations in Westminster Hall, and to the dignity of the Peerage, began with very gravely stating to the Court, that he was afraid he must throw up his brief, for that though he came into Court fully persuaded that his client was a Gentleman, he now despaired, from what he saw, of being able to prove him so, for as the other parties, from the very nature of the case, must be presumed to be, beyond all dispute, proper Gentlemen, he could only proceed in the way of comparison. He was therefore afraid to call the attention of the Judge and Jury to the manners and appearance of those Gentlemen, because if they exhibited proper specimens of the conduct and character of a real Gentleman, his Client was decidedly not one.

That his habits of life, for instance, were of that temperate and sober cast, that nothing he was sure would have induced him (but especially at such a time) to drink to such excess, as to stupify his understanding, and bewilder his senses, which was evidently the condition of all the Gentlemen in the witnesses' box. Had his client been to attend personally, he was confident he would have felt such an awe and respect for the Court in general, as well as for the laws and public institutions of his country, as to have suffered his tongue to be cut out, rather than utter such speeches as had been so recently addressed to the Judge, the Jury, and himself, by the Gentlemen who appeared against him. His client was a man so attentive to all matters of established decorum, that it was most likely, that if he had been called to appear before the Court, he would have been seen there in decent, clean, and comely apparel, not in dirty boots, and dirty shirts, and dirty breeches, like the Gentlemen then before them.

To judge therefore from appearances, and comparing his client with the 'Gentlemen' who disputed his right to that appellation, he was afraid he must give way upon those three points, inasmuch as being sober, civil, and cleanly, he could not be such a Gentleman as they were.

But there were other traits in his client's character, which he was afraid, upon comparison with the characters and habits of the Gentlemen before them, might tend still farther to degrade him in their eyes. His fortune for instance, was small, not exceeding a few hundreds a year, but entirely unincumbered, which he was apprehensive would be thought not gentlemanlike by many persons of much larger fortunes; nor yet his mode of spending his income, for he never went beyond it; never squandered any portion of it in idle, useless, and unnecessary expences; never gambled with it; never ran in debt. He bred up his family (three daughters and a son) in a plain and frugal manner. He was careful to set them the example of a moral and religious life. He hallowed the sabbath, and gave rest to all dependent on him, to man and beast. He was careful above all things, not to travel on a Sunday, to the disturbance of the rest of others, and profanation of the Lord's Day; in fine, however ungentlemanlike it might appear to the opposite party, he did not wish to conceal from the court, that his client was in all respects a good Christian, a good husband, a good father, a good master, a good neighbour, and a good friend!—for, after all, it was friendship alone that had brought him into the predicament in which he now stood. Friendship not for the living, but the dead. It was entirely in consequence of an old promise to a dead friend, that at 70 years of age he had acceded to the proposal of his friend's son, to ride the race. He need not go further into particulars; he had stated these things exactly as they were, for the information of the Court. What effect they might produce, he could not pretend to judge; there were those present, who seemed to say, that a person of this description did not come up to their ideas of a Gentleman; it would remain with the Court and Jury to say whether it came up to their ideas of such a character.

I am happy to have to record, that this worthy person so described was in the fullest manner allowed by the Judge and Jury to be a proper English Gentleman, to the great satisfaction of a most crowded hall, who hailed the decision with the loudest acclamations!

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

RHUBARB JAM.—An excellent jam may be made with a mixture of two thirds of red currants to one third of garden rhubarb. Good jam may also be made with two thirds of red rough gooseberries, not quite ripe, and one third of rhubarb; and raspberries succeed as well as currants. The flavour is best if not overdone with sugar; and, if the jam is made with gooseberries, it will be spoiled should they hang on the trees until fully ripe.

VARIETIES.

SINGULAR INTERMARRIAGE.—A Mr. Hardwood had two daughters by his first wife, the eldest of whom was married to John Coshick; this Coshick had a daughter by his first wife, whom old Harwood married, and by her he had a son; therefore, John Coshick's second wife could say as follows:—

My father is my son, and I'm my mother's mother;
My sister is my daughter, and I'm grandmother to my brother.

BUONAPARTEAN RELICS.—At the sale at Mr. Bullock's Museum, of the articles taken by the Prussians in Flanders, belonging to Napoleon, nothing could exceed the eagerness with which they were bought up. The following statement of the prices given for some of the things, will serve to show in what estimation these relics were held:—the worn-out carriage, 168*l.*; small opera glass, 5*l.* 5*s.*; Tooth-brush, 3*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*; Snuff-box, 166*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*; Military stock, or collar, 1*l.* 17*s.*; Old slippers, 1*l.*; Razor (common), 4*l.* 4*s.*; Piece of sponge, 17*s.* 6*d.*; Shaving brush, 3*l.* 14*s.*; Shirt, 2*l.* 5*s.*; Comb, 1*l.*; Shaving-box, 7*l.* 7*s.*; Pair of old gloves, 1*l.*; Old pocket handkerchief, 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* Many other articles were sold for prices equally high.

A FALSE ALARM.—A few weeks ago, the inhabitants of one of the principal cities in the West of England were filled with conjecture and consternation at the following notice, painted in large capitals on the front of a house, recently fitted up and repaired, 'Mrs. M. —, from London, deals in all sorts of Ladies.' All was consternation! Inquiry was instantly set on foot as to who this Mrs. M. might be? No one could tell; she was a stranger from London about to establish a new concern. Great anxiety prevailed as to this equivocal proclamation of the new establishment. For two whole days all was injustice and consultation. On the third morning, behold, the mystery was unravelled. The house-painter, who had, it seems, been suddenly attacked by a severe fit of gout, returned to finish his work, and in ten minutes concluded it by adding—"and gentlemen's wearing apparel."

ENGLAND AN IMPROVING NATION.—Who, twenty years ago, would have supposed that, in the year 1823, ladies and gentlemen would be forced from London Bridge to Calais in twelve hours, by a kettle of boiling water; or that, while we were stirring our drawing-room fire, we should be feeding the lamps at our hall-door? Every thing has improved—how much is public taste refined! Instead of barrel organs, grinding English ballads through the streets, we have Savoyards, gaily dressed, playing foreign airs. Instead of two long parallel rows of people jumping awkwardly about a room, by way of dancing, we have the attitudinizing quadrille and the twining waltz; our shops are saloons; our warehouses emporiums; our packets are yachts; our country boxes villas. A man who cures deafness is an aurist; a man who cooks one's dinner is an artist; a gig, with a head, is a cabriolet; a boys' school is a seminary, and a girls' school an establishment. An actor's benefit is appointed now—not fixed (like Sylvester Daggerwood's.) Instead of common-place exhibitions, such as we had of old, we have fourteen coloured prints stuck on a wall, and called a cosmorama; we have a peristritic panorama of the coronation; we have equestrian exercises instead of horsemanship, and gymnasia instead of tumbling; even Punch himself has grown genteel.

THIEVES.—Thieves have of late hit upon a novel mode of deception, while engaged in the work of depredation. When picking a lock in the night, they conceal the sound of the operations by imitating the cry of cats!

EPSOM RACES.—Of all the races in this race-loving, cock-fighting, fisty-cuffing, bull-baiting, beef-eating, hard-working, money-getting, money-spending, jolly, comfortable, careless nation, none are at any time so multitudinously attended as those at Epsom—Epsom, famed alike for fun and physic; and of all the preceding races at this favourite spot, none have been more largely attended than the present.—Thursday was the grand day—the day for the decision of the Derby Stakes; and perhaps greater interest never was excited by a single race. So early as eight o'clock in the morning all London seemed to be in an unusual bustle, and for full three hours thereafter the gayer part of its population poured over the different bridges into Surrey in continuous torrents. Princes and Peers, Knights and Squires, and merchants and shopkeepers of all sorts; jockeys, handicraftsmen, beggars, black-legs, and thieves, with ladies of every caste to match, all rolling, or spanking, or jogging, or toddling, or trudging, or fagging, in barouches, in tilburies, in buggies, in caris, and waggon; on horse-back, on donkey-back, and on blistered feet, yak-hup for Epsom! beneath a burning sun, and beneath a cloud of dust that obscured the country for a quarter of a mile on either side the road throughout the whole distance. By one o'clock there must have been at least fifty thousand persons assembled on Epsom Downs; and when it is recollected that the greater part of them had horses or equipages of some kind or other, some idea of the scene may be formed. What they all went thither for is best known to themselves, but certainly not one twentieth part of them saw the race, and the only other amusements were, broiling on an arid heath, beneath a mid-day sun, or sitting in booths crowded to suffocation, amidst the fumes of tobacco and all sorts of hideous uproar. There were a superabundance of gambling tents, and pick-pockets out of number.

FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

CARRIAGE DRESS.

High dress, of pale blue silk, fastened in front, and ornamented with a trimming of the same material, and edged with satin of the same colour: the trimming is fast, united, and broad in the centre, but separates and gradually diminishes; each division seems to be fastened by a silk button, and terminates in three points: the trimming is very broad at the bottom of the skirt, but lessens as it approaches the waist; it continues to the throat, and nearly covers the front of the corset; the collar is square, and falls over, admitting a lace ruff within; and the cape is rounded off to display the front. The long sleeve is nearly tight, and has a very free half sleeve, set in a band rather narrower than that of the waist, and is ornamented to correspond with the bottom of the skirt, where rays, emanating from a point, form a semicircular trimming, which appears to rise from the satin rosette that edges the dress. The ruff is a similar, though smaller trimming than the front. The cap is particularly light and novel, having the appearance of a coronet: it is made of tulle, and set in a white satin frame, with a wreath of Syrian roses, and is generally worn at the back of the head, with the hair in very full curls. Embossed gold earrings and chain, and circular eye glass, Jon-quil-colour gloves; blue corded silk shoes.

BALL DRESS.

Dress of white crepe lisse over a white satin slip; the corset is without fulness, and shaped à la française, narrow at the shoulder, but approaches so as to form a stomacher in front, which is simply ornamented with three bands, each consisting of two rows of satin piping, uniting with those that descend from the waist; two slopes from the front, and are rounded off just above the bouillonne that decorates the bottom of the skirt: on each band is placed a cluster of roses, the highest being in the centre; the waist has a broad satin band, fastened behind with a gold buckle. Short full sleeve, tastefully confined by bands of double piping set in a broad band of satin and gold, and finished by a deep Vandyke of blond lace: bands of double piping head and finish the bouillonne, which is very full and broad, and divided transversely by satin bands. Gold tulle, embellished with rubies and turquoise, and a pendant pearl in the centre: the hair parted in front, with short light curls on the temple; the hind hair brought up to the top of the head, and fastened by a bodkin of gold and turquoise. Necklace and earrings of turquoise. Long white kid gloves. White satin shoes. Painted Ivory fan.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Friend's intention is very good; but, being wholly ignorant of the parties, should we implicitly confide for a continuance? And, if so, are we to hold a discretionary power of inserting, or retarding articles, without the fear or possibility of offending?—Entertainment being our chief object, we cannot enter into profound disquisition; nor, in any measure, embark in the controverted points of politics, ethics, or divinity.

Our London Correspondent will oblige us by forwarding the essays.—We are not fastidious—our only aim is to amuse and edify.

W. K.'s wish shall be complied with in our next.—We hope to hear from him frequently.

Johannes—in our next; and we shall be glad to receive the promised paper.

CHESTER CHRONICLE.—In the Manchester Iris, No. 88, our reply to a Chester Correspondent contains the following clause,—"We heard of the preposterous puff so pointedly advertised upon; but think its weakness and fallacy too gross for reprehension."—This censure the astute Chronicle gratuitously, and, we will add, very candidly and justly, takes to himself, and, subsequently, favours us with a notice, which, coming from him, we esteem creditable.—In return (requesting the sanction of our respected correspondent, for the liberty we take of selecting from his very judicious structure) we compliment him with our friend's address:—

Yes, Chester Chronicles shall land thy muse,
And gull the public with their stale reviews;
Inspid scribbles—destitute of wit,
Assuming humour, but not having it;
A set of fools—without the least pretence
To judgment, decency, or common sense!
Oh! H—H—think't thou't unknown,
That slipshod pertness, and that vapourish tone,
Where e'er thou go'st, will still proclaim 'tis thee,
A worthless blockhead for the world to see!
Bet stop my muse; and vent not thus thy wrath
On men whose brains are nought but wind and froth
Base hiring critics, by whose venal pen,
Authors are praised'd, then damn'd, then praised'd again.
Chester, May 14th. JULIAN.

+ Only imagine, gentle reader, the Editor of the Chester Chronicle sitting down to review poetry—

Oh! ye shades
Of Pope and Dryden are we come to this? I.

HORÆ OTIOSÆ.—(No. I.)

THE NIGHTINGALE.

Le rossignol fait entendre des sons mélodieux et plaintifs :
et ses tendres accens remplissent les coteaux les vallons et les bois. STURM.

THE Nightingale derives its name from night, and the Saxon word, galan, to sing. This universally admired chorister is about six inches in length; and is in no wise remarkable for the beauty or variety of its plumage. On the contrary, its whole appearance is mean and shabby; but these seeming imperfections are more than compensated, by the variety and exquisite sweetness of its strains. The males annually arrive about the middle of April, and the females a week afterwards; and, they do not erect their nests till the following month. They build in close quickset hedges, and produce two or three broods in a year. During their stay in this island, great numbers are taken by the bird-catchers. A gentleman, who has for many years made the study of ornithology his chief amusement assures me, that Nightingales possess less cunning than any other kind of birds; to which circumstance he is indebted for having caught such vast numbers of them. They feed chiefly on insects, worms, and the eggs of ants. In a state of domestication, their best food is raw sheep heart, mixed with boiled egg, in the proportion of three parts of the former, to one of the latter. They leave us in September, and in all probability retire to Asia, as we are informed by men of the strictest veracity.

"This sweet harbinger of the light," says Fryer, "is a constant cheerer of the groves of Persia, charming with its warbling strains, the heaviest soul into a pleasing ecstacy."

In Aleppo there are many persons who obtain a livelihood, by letting out Nightingales on hire.* The Nightingale is the sweetest musician of the woods. Oft have I lain reclined beneath the shadowy trees, secure from the scorching beams of the noon-day sun, and fed with admiration on her soul enlivening strains. At midnight too, when nature assumes her general sleep, I oftentimes have sought the solemn walk in wandering mazes lost; and listened to her exquisite strains, which, aided by the surrounding gloom, have pressed a weight of pleasing grief upon my heart, and caused the tears to flow in torrents down my cheeks. "He, that at midnight," says an interesting writer, "when the very labourers sleep securely, should hear, as I have heard, the clear air, the sweet decants, the natural rising and falling, the doubling, and redoubling of her voice, might well be lifted above earth, and say, 'Lord! what music hast thou provided for thy saints in heaven, when thou affordest bad men such music upon earth.' It is generally believed that the Nightingale never sings in the day time. Hence, Shakspeare says,

"The Nightingale, if she should sing by day,
When ev'ry goose is cackling, would be thought,
No better a musician than the wren."

But this opinion, however general it may be, is certainly incorrect. She sings all the day long, as well as during the night; and is in fact, the most garrulous songstress of the grove. That Milton was acquainted with this fact, is evident from the following passage:—

"From branch to branch, the smaller birds with song
Solace the woods, and spread their painted wings
Till even; nor then, the solemn Nightingale
Ceases to warble; in shade'st covert hid,
She all the night tunes her soft lays."

There is no other bird of the same size as the Nightingale, in which the muscles of the larynx are so strong: consequently, no other bird of the same size is capable of such violent thrilling sounds. Who, that has not heard the Nightingale, can believe so small a bird to be capable of such violent exertions without rupturing its lungs? or that her notes, soft, quivering and melodious, can be heard to the distance of half a mile? At the lonely hour of midnight, when not a star twinkles, and there is no light, save that which is afforded by the numerous glow-worms shining on the green-wood side; then, the music of the sweet-tuned songstress, which during the day was in the highest degree enlivening, becomes plaintive or melancholy.

"Darkling she wails the sadly pleasing strains,
And melancholy music fills the plains."

It is a well known fact, that Nightingales may be taught to adopt the notes or calls of other birds: they may also be taught to articulate words and sentences.† During my residence in London, in the summer of 1821, I witnessed a remarkable instance of this kind in a Nightingale, the property of a young sailor who resides in the Borough. This bird very distinctly articulated the following short sentences in my hearing:—"Poor Tom"—"pretty boy"—"bless the king." Upon interrogating the boy concerning his bird, he informed me that he took it from the nest about two years ago, since which time it had received no tuition from any person whatever, but from being constantly in company with a male parrot, it had learned to speak several short sentences, among which were those I had already heard. He also informed me that it could not sing a single note, a circumstance scarcely worth recording, as it has long since been proved that the peculiar notes or calls of birds, are no more innate than language is in man. The Nightingale was ever a favourite bird with the poets, and perhaps no person ever spent more agreeable hours than Thomson did while listening to those which used to frequent Richmond Gardens. Equally with Thomson was it a favourite with Milton, and beautiful as is Thomson's celebrated Ode, there are passages in the Il Penseroso, and Paradise Lost, which are justly entitled to a superiority over its most prominent beauties.

The ancients considered it as the most exquisite of singing birds, and while they listened with ecstasy to its enchanting strains, they compared it to those persons who have neither elegance of form, nor beauty of features to recommend themselves; but whose minds are stored with amiable qualities, and pregnant with solid and polite literature. The same may be said of the moderns; for they have likewise enjoyed the luxury which so much delighted their ancestors.

Elegance of form, uncombined with mental beauty, can never secure the admiration of those persons who are worthy of our esteem.

THE SOLDIER'S RETURN.

Slowly vanish'd the shade of the rich setting sun,
And sad, lonely, and hoarse did the convent bell toll,
Philomela her heavenly strains had begun,
And the murmuring waters did mournfully roll;
When Edwin the path to yon fair village trod,
And high beat his kind heart, now in hope, now in fear,
As he view'd the lov'd and the well known abode,
Where contented, tho' poor, dwelt his family dear.

Many years had flown past, since Edwin was torn
From the village he lov'd by a merciless band;
Who left aged and helpless the father to mourn,
And the son forced to fight in a far distant land:
Oh how shall I paint the distraction which reign'd,
What pangs tore the heart of his Anna, his love;
To his heart-broken parents how oft he was stral'd,
While they sought for relief from the heav'ns above!—

From the bosoms bereft heaven heard the fond prayer,
And, when on the death-strewn and horror-clad plain,
Watch'd o'er her lov'd son with a father's kind care,
Till sweet peace brought him back to his village again:
Now he hop'd, with what joy, what pleasure, to cheer
Their old age of care, while from labour they'd rest:
To wipe from his Ann's beautiful cheek the blest tear,
To clasp those he lov'd in his joy-throbbing breast.

O'er the scene Luna's softest effulgence was thrown,
As nearer and nearer the village he drew,
As he gain'd the white cottage with woodbine o'ergrown,
And with quick-beating heart to the threshold he flew:
He knocks—hears a foot, strangers open the door,
And despair to his breast as lightning swift fled;
For his parents he asks—alas they're no more;
For his Anna—but she too was dying, or dead.

How blest had he fall'n on the gore- crimson'd field,
He then should not know that soul- overwhelling grief,
As breathless he stood; nor would tears their ease yield,
Nor give his sear'd soul one short moment's relief:
My father, he moan'd, your prediction was true—
"Ah, before you return we shall sleep in the grave,"
And my Anna, my lov'd, my betroth'd—and must you—
Oh God will no pray'rs from the tomb my love save!

Heart-blighted and fainting, he sank on the chair;
But short was oblivion's balm to his soul,
His features were stamp'd with the hue of despair,
And wand'ring and frenzied his eyes 'gan to roll:
"Who said," he exclaim'd, "that my parents were dead,
That the lips which have blest me are cold in the earth;
Who said that my Anna's pure spirit had fled,
To give to the Angels its beauty and worth?"

Ah sir, they replied, when your parents had lost
The dear child of their age, their fondly-loved son,
By poverty they were relentlessly cross'd,
Ere yet death in pale sickness his purpose begun:
But still they would hope the Creator would hear
And protect you when dire in the battle-rod'd death;
And hop'd yet to see all on earth they held dear,
Then with blessings resign in his arms their last breath!

Destroy'd was their balm-breathing prospect the day
That tidings arriv'd—none their anguish can tell—
When they heard that a corpse, 'mong the slaughter'd you lay
The arrow of death pierc'd their breasts and they fell!

* Vide my Essay on "Ornithology," Imperial Mag. vol. col. 814.

† Pliny informs us that the sons of the Emperor Claudius, kept several of these birds that spoke to their masters in Greek and Latin; but the whole story is ridiculous and contemptible.

But death was their comfort,—they wished not to live,
For the child of their hope new on earth was no more;
Without him e'en wealth no true comfort could give,
And they left for his Heaven, time's treacherous shore!

Your Ann heard the tale, and, oh sad is her fate—
Not the least spark of hope for her life is descried:—
Your parents not long languish'd in their lorn state,
With your name on their lips the next evening they died.
"But my Anna—she lives!"—Edwin breathlessly spoke,
"To thy aid—O, thy merry Eternal!—I fly—
Spare, spare her, sell death, from thy withering stroke,
Or strike here—and lifeless with her let me lie!"

They lead him where faint on the couch she reclin'd,
Pale and wan was that cheek the rose once had o'ercast;
And dim that bright eye which bespoke the gay mind,
In those hours of delight, which for ever had past!—
"My Anna," he moan'd, as he sank by her side;
She rais'd her fair form, where each grace lent their charms—
"Tis he—'tis my life—'tis my Edwin," she cried—
With the last kiss of love she expir'd in his arms!

He shriek'd—'twas the cry of one mad with despair,
He gazed on that form, ah still beautiful, tho' dead,
His gestures were frantic, his shrieks rent the air—
And his wild glaring eyes spokes his senses were fled!—
'Neath the low drooping willow a grave they unclosed
The remains of the lovely and fair to entomb;
The sun on that morn o'er the village ne'er rose,
And it seem'd as though heaven wept 'mid the deep gloom.

And while o'er the plain to the churchyard she's borne,
Edwin after the corpse, shrieking frantically, trod;
The coffin he clasps—from his clasp it is torn,
And a deep hollow groan sends his spirit to God!—
In evening's sweet hour, oft the villagers rove,
And strew o'er their grave the fair flow'rs of the year:
They think of their youth, and their beauty, and love,—
And their mem'ry embalm with the sorrow-fraught tear.

BIOGRAPHY.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF HUMPHREY CHETHAM, FOUNDER OF THE SCHOOL AND LIBRARY AT THE COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

(From Fuller's Worthies of England.)

Humphrey Chetham, third son of Henry Chetham, of Crompsall, gentleman, is thought (on just ground) to descend from Sir Jeffrey Chetham, of Chetham, (a man of much rank in former days) and some old writings in the hands of worshipful persons, not far remote from the place, do evidence as much, but the said Sir Jeffrey falling in troublesome times into the King's displeasure, (in effect) was long since ruined.

But it seems his posterity was unwilling to fly far from their old (though destroyed) nest, and got themselves a handsome habitation at Crompsall, hard by, where James, elder brother of this Humphrey Chetham, did reside. The younger brethren, George, Humphrey, and Ralph, betook themselves to the trading of this county, dealing in Manchester commodities sent up to London, and Humphrey signally improved himself in piety and outward prosperity. He was a diligent reader of the scriptures, and of the works of sound divines, a respecter of such ministers, which he accounted truly Godly, upright, sober, sincere and discreet. He was high sheriff of this county, 1635, discharging the place with great honour. Inasmuch that very good gentlemen of birth and estate did wear his cloth at the assize, to certify their unfeigned affection to him, and two of them* of the same profession with himself have since been sheriffs of the county.

Grudge not, reader, to go through so long a porch, for I assure thee it leads unto a fair palace; to as great a master-piece of bounty as our age hath afforded. This Mr. Chetham, by his will, bearing date the 16th of January, 1651, gave 7000*l.* to buy a fee-simple estate of 420*l.* for ever, for the education of forty poor children in Manchester at school, from about six till fourteen years of age, when they are to be bound out apprentices. They must be the children of poor but honest parents, no bastards, nor diseased at the time they are chosen, not lame nor blind, in regard the town of Manchester hath ample means already (if so employed) for the maintenance of such impotents. Indeed he intended it for a seminary of religion and ingenuity, where the aforesaid boys were to have diet, lodging, apparel, and instruction. He gave 1000*l.* for books to a library, and 100*l.* to prepare a place for them. He bequeathed 200*l.* to buy books (such as he himself delighted in) for the churches of Manchester, Bolton, and other chapels thereabouts; he gave the remainder of his estate (debts and legacies first paid) to the increase of the books in the library.

Now, as the loaves in the gospel multiplied in the breaking; so Mr. Chetham's estate did not shrink but swell in the calling of it in; inasmuch that the aforesaid surplussage is known to be the better part of 2000*l.* Dying a bachelor, he appointed George Chetham, Esq. citizen and grocer of London, (whereof he was chosen alderman, 1656, and fined for the same) and Edward Chetham, gent. executors of his will and testament.

ANECDOTES OF THE FAMOUS ROGER BACON.

[Communicated by R. T.]

This great man was born near Ilchester, in the year 1214; and began his studies very early, at Oxford. He afterwards went to Paris, where he learnt physic and mathematics. On his return to Oxford, he applied himself to languages and philosophy; in which he quickly made such progress, that he wrote a Latin, Greek, and Hebrew grammar; and improved the latter considerably. He also wrote several tracts on chemistry; some of which are to be seen in the Bodleian library, and in that of the Earl of Oxford. He speaks of almost every operation now used in chemistry, and mentions the incineration of Fern, from which the English made glass. He also describes the method of making tinctures and elixirs. He understood, and explained the nature of concave glasses, on which he wrote a treatise, shewing their force in burning things at a distance. How far he advanced optics, in all its branches, is sufficiently evident from his book on perspective, where he discourses of the reflection and refraction of lights, and describes the camera obscura, and all sorts of glasses which magnify or diminish any object, bring it nearer to the eye, or remove it farther off. Among the rest, the use of the optic tube, or telescope, thought to be a modern invention, was plainly known to him. In short, he was the miracle of the age he lived in; and perhaps, the greatest mechanical genius that ever appeared in the world since the days of Archimedes. His mathematical instruments cost 300*l.*; and he says, that in twenty years, he spent 2000*l.* in them and books: a prodigious sum for such expenses in those days.

Roger Bacon was almost the only astronomer of that age. He found out an error in the calendar, in relation to the quantity of the solar year, which had been increasing from the time of Julius Cæsar; and proposed a plan, to Pope Clement the Fourth, in 1267, how it should be corrected: and, above three hundred years afterwards, Pope Gregory the Thirteenth, followed that very plan, in the reformation of the Julian Calendar, with this difference only, that Roger Bacon would have begun it from the birth of Christ; whereas the Gregorian correction reaches no higher than the Nicene Council. His penetrating genius did not stop here: he entered into the depth of mechanical science, and was so well acquainted with the force of elastic bodies, that, in imitation of Archytas, who contrived a wooden dove that could fly, he, as we are told, could make a flying chariot, and had the art of putting statues in motion, and producing articulate sounds from a brazen head. He hit upon the secret of gun-powder, and describes the materials of its composition, and the amazing effects of its noise and light. "These," says Dr. Friend, "are great discoveries in so ignorant an age, especially considering that he had no master to instruct him." But it is still more wonderful that such discoveries should lie so long concealed, till others should start up, in the succeeding centuries, and lay claim to those very inventions which Roger Bacon only had a right to.

He went on prosecuting these studies, with indefatigable application, more than forty years. He was a very learned man, in a very illiterate age: and performed such things, by the help of mathematics, that he was suspected of magic, and persecuted by his own fraternity: they would not receive his works into their libraries; and, at last, got him imprisoned. Such was the gross ignorance of people, in those ages, that extraordinary actions done, by knowledge of the arts, and a judicious application of the powers of nature, were, by them, attributed to conjuration; and accordingly, they deemed this great man neither more nor less than a conjurer or magician.

It was the subject of this brief biographical sketch who taught philosophy not to advance a single step without leaning on the crutch of experiment; and it is by following this lesson that the study of Nature is now become, the science of facts.

TO AN ALMOND TREE.

Imitated from a French translation of some Spanish Lines.

Sad Winter still prolong'd his stay,
Nor yet the timid zephyr's sigh
Proclaim'd from far the summer's day—
The sultry eve—the rosy sky.

Pale Almond tree—I viewed thee then
In em'rald vestments richly drest,
Imploping nature—once again
To let thee bloom the earliest.

Thou op'd thy bloom—ere yet the rest—
Of solitary beauty vain—
Thou deem'd'st thyself the happiest
Of Flora and Pomona's train.

Poor Almond tree—the charm soon past—
Gay pleasure lull'd thee but an hour;
Alas! a rude relentless blast
Tore from thee both thy fruit and flower.

Like thee I err'd:—alas! no less
Were folly and imprudence mine—
Too soon I grasp'd at happiness,
And lost for ever Eveline.

TO STELLA.

Stella, tell me lovely maid,
Why it is that thou'rt so sad:—
Why that sigh—that look so drear—
That pensiveness—that limpid tear
Sparkling in thy downcast eye,
Which erst with eastern gems might vie!
Shall from thy cheek the blushing rose
Be rudely snatch'd ere yet it blows?
Thy sprightliness and spring of soul,
Shall dim despondency controul?
Is it decreed that thou should'st know
The gloomy truth, which years bestow?
That happiness is but a dream—
A bubble floating down a stream?
That life is but a chain of woe—
A path where numerous briars grow—
And though a cheerful hour may pass,
Yet pain and anguish form the mass!

Oh no!—again that husky eye
Shall dart its wonted brilliancy—
That palpitant cheek shall yet disclose
The deepening blushes of the rose:—
Dependancy no more shall grieve
With heavy hand thy sprightliness—
No more thy gentle mind be fraught
With mournful and embitter'd thought.—
Thy gloom—thy pensiveness shall flee,
Supplied by smiling gaiety.

THE PIONEERS.

(Concluded from our last.)

The following account of the escape of Elizabeth and her friend, from a Panther, is particularly interesting.

They proceeded along the margin of the precipice, catching occasional glimpses of the placid Ontego, or passing to listen to the rattling of wheels and the sounds of hammers, that rose from the valley, to mingle the signs of men with the scenes of nature, when Elizabeth suddenly started, and exclaimed—

'Listen! there are the cries of a child on this mountain! is there a clearing near us? or can some little one have strayed from its parents?'

'Such things frequently happen,' returned Louisa. 'Let us follow the sounds; it may be a wanderer, starving on the hill.'

Urged by this consideration, the females pursued the low, mournful sounds, that proceeded from the forest, with quick and impatient steps. More than once, the ardent Elizabeth was on the point of announcing that she saw the sufferer, when Louisa caught her by the arm, and pointing behind them, cried—

'Look at the dog.'

Brave had been their companion, from the time the voice of his young mistress lured him from his kennel, to the present moment. His advanced age had long before deprived him of his activity; and when his companions stopped to view the scenery, or to add to their bosquets, the mastiff would lay his huge frame on the ground, and await their movements, with his eyes closed, and a listlessness in his air that ill accorded with the character of a protector. But when, aroused by this cry from Louisa, Miss Temple turned, she saw the dog with his eyes keenly set on some distant object, his head bent near the ground, and his hair actually rising on his body, either through fright or anger. It was most probably the latter, for he was growling in a low key, and occasionally showing his teeth, in a manner that would have terrified his mistress, had she not so well known his good qualities.

'Brave!' she said, 'be quiet, Brave! what do you see, fellow?'

At the sounds of her voice, the rage of the mastiff, instead of being at all diminished, was very sensibly increased. He stalked in front of the ladies, and seated himself at the feet of his mistress, growling louder than before, and occasionally giving vent to his ire by a short, surly barking.

'What does he see?' said Elizabeth; 'there must be some animal in sight.'

Hearing no answer from her companion, Miss Temple turned her head, and beheld Louisa, standing with her face whitened to the colour of death, and her finger pointing upward, with a sort of sickening, convulsed motion. The quick eye of Elizabeth glanced in the direction indicated by her friend, where she saw the fierce front and glaring eyes of a female panther, fixed on them in horrid malignity, and threatening instant destruction.

'Let us fly!' exclaimed Elizabeth, grasping the arm of Louisa, whose form yielded like melting snow, and sunk lifeless to the earth.

There was not a single feeling in the temperament of Elizabeth Temple, that could prompt her to desert a companion in such an extremity; and she fell on her knees, by the side of the inanimate Louisa, tearing from the person of her friend, with an instinctive readiness, such parts of her dress as might obstruct her respiration, and encouraging their only safeguard, the dog, at the same time, by the sounds of her voice.

'Courage, Brave,' she cried, her own tones beginning to tremble, 'courage, courage, good Brave.'

A quarter-grown cub, that had hitherto been unseen, now appeared dropping from the branches of a sapling, that grew under the shade of the beech which held its dam. This ignorant, but vicious creature, approached near to the dog, imitating the actions and sounds of its parent, but exhibiting a strange mixture of the playfulness of a kitten with the ferocity of its race.—Standing on its hind legs, it would rend the bark of a tree with its fore paws, and play all the antics of a cat, for a moment: and then, by lashing itself with its tail, growling, and scratching the earth, it would attempt the manifestations of anger that rendered its parent so terrific.

All this time Brave stood firm and undaunted, his short tail erect, his body drawn backward on its haunches, and his eyes following the movements of both dam and cub. At every gambol played by the latter, it approached nigher to the dog; the growling of the three becoming more horrid at each moment, until the younger beast overleaping its intended board, fell directly before the mastiff. There was a moment of fearful cries and struggles, but they ended almost as soon as commenced, by the cub appearing in the air, hurled from the jaws of Brave, with a violence that sent it against a tree so forcibly, as to render it completely senseless.

Elizabeth witnessed the short struggle, and her blood was warming with the triumph of the dog, when she saw the form of the old panther in the air, springing twenty feet from the branch of the beech to the back of the mastiff. No words of ours can describe the fury of the conflict that followed. It was a confused struggle on the dried leaves, accompanied by loud and terrible cries, barks and growls. Miss Temple continued on her knees, bending over the form of Louisa, her eyes fixed on the animals, with an interest so horrid, and yet so intense, that she almost forgot her own stake in the result. So rapid and vigorous were the bounds of the inhabitant of the forest, that its active frame seemed constantly in the air, while the dog nobly faced his foe, at each successive leap. When the panther lighted on the shoulders of the mastiff which was its constant aim, old Brave, though torn with her talons, and stained with his own blood, that already flowed from a dozen wounds, would shake off his furious foe, like a feather, and rearing on his hind legs, rush to the fray again, with his jaws distended, and a dauntless eye. But age, and his pampered life, greatly disqualified the noble mastiff, for such a struggle. In every thing but courage, he was only the vestige of what he had once been. A higher bound than ever, raised the wary and furious beast far beyond the reach of the dog, who was making a desperate, but fruitless dash at her, from which she alighted in a favourable position, on the back of her aged foe. For a single moment, only, could the panther remain there, the great strength of the dog returning with a convulsive effort. But Elizabeth saw, as Brave fastened his teeth in the side of his enemy, that the collar of brass around his neck, which had been glittering throughout the fray, was of the colour of blood, and directly, that his frame was sinking to the earth, where it soon lay prostrate and helpless. Several mighty efforts of the wild cat to extricate herself from the jaws of the dog, followed, but they were fruitless, until the mastiff turned on his back, his lips collapsed, and his teeth loosened; when the short convulsions and stillness that succeeded, announced the death of poor Brave.

Elizabeth now lay wholly at the mercy of the beast. There is said to be something in the front of the image of the Maker, that daunts the hearts of the inferior beings of his creation; and it would seem that some such power, in the present instance, suspended the threatened blow. The eyes of the monster and the kneeling maiden met, for an instant, when the former stooped to examine her fallen foe; next to scent her luckless cub. From the latter examination it turned, however, with its eyes apparently emitting flashes of fire, its tail lashing its sides furiously, and its claws projecting four inches from its broad feet.

Miss Temple did not, or could not, move. Her hands were clasped in the attitude of prayer, but her eyes were still drawn to her terrible enemy; her cheeks were blanched to the whiteness of marble, and her lips were slightly separated with horror. The moment seemed now to have arrived for the fatal termination, and the beautiful figure of Elizabeth was bowing meekly to the stroke, when a rustling of leaves from behind seemed rather to mock the organs, than to meet her ears.

'Hist! hist!' said a low voice—'stoop lower, girl; your bonnet hides the creature's head.'

It was rather the yielding of nature than a compliance with this unexpected order, that caused the head of our heroine to sink on her bosom; when she heard the report of the rifle, the whizzing of the bullet, and the enraged cries of the beast, who was rolling over on the earth, biting its own flesh, and tearing the twigs and branches within its reach. At the next instant the form of the Leather-stocking rushed by her, and he called aloud—

'Come in, Hector, come in, you old fool; 'tis a hard-lived animal, and may jump ag'in.'

Natty maintained his position in front of the maidens, most fearlessly, notwithstanding the violent bounds and threatening aspect of the wounded panther, which gave several indications of returning strength and ferocity, until his rifle was again loaded, when he stepped up to the enraged animal, and, placing the muzzle close to its head, every spark of life was extinguished by the discharge.

The death of an Indian is beautifully sketched.—

Elizabeth took from the hand of Edwards the liquor which he offered, and then motioned to be left again to herself.

The youth turned at her bidding, and observed Natty kindly assiduous around the person of Mohegan. When their eyes met, the hunter said sorrowfully—

'His time has come, lad; I see it in his eye;—when an Indian fixes his eye, he means to go but to one place; and that the wilful creators put their minds on, they're sure to do.'

A quick tread diverted the reply of the youth, and in a few moments, to the amazement of the whole party, Mr. Grant was clinging to the side of the mountain, and striving to reach the place where they stood. Oliver sprang to his assistance, and by their united efforts, the worthy divine was soon placed safely among them.

'How came you added to our number?' cried Edwards; 'Is the hill alive with people at a time like this?'

The hasty but pious thanksgivings of the clergyman were soon ejaculated; and when he succeeded in collecting his bewildered senses, he replied—

'I heard that my child was seen coming to the mountain: and when the fire broke over its summit, my uneasiness drew me up the road, where I found Louisa, in terror for Miss Temple. It was to seek her, that I came into this dangerous place; and I think but for God's mercy, through the dogs of Natty, I should have perished in the flames myself.'

'Ay! follow the hounds, and if there's an opening, they'll scent it out,' said Natty; 'their noses be given to them the same as man's reason.'

'I did so, and they led me to this place; but, praise be to God, that I see you all safe and well.'

'No, no,' returned the hunter; 'safe we be, but as for well, John can't be called in a good way, unless you'll say that for a man that's taking his last look at the 'arth.'

'He speaks the truth!' said the divine, with the holy awe with which he ever approached the dying;—'I have been by too many death-beds, not to see that the hand of the tyrant is laid on this old warrior. Oh! how consoling it is, to know that he has not rejected the offered mercy, in his hour of strength and of worldly temptations! The offspring of a race of heathens, he has in truth been 'as a brand plucked from the burning.'

'No, no,' returned Natty, who alone stood with him by the side of the dying warrior, 'it's no burning that ails him, though his Indian feelings made him scorn to move, unless it be the burning of man's wicked thoughts for near fourscore years, but it's nater giving out in a chase that's run too long.—Down with ye, Hector!

down, I say!—Flesh isn't iron, that a man can live for ever, and see his kith and kin driven to a far country, and he left to mourn, with none to keep him company.'

'John,' said the divine, tenderly, 'do you hear me? do you wish the prayers appointed by the church, at this trying moment?'

The Indian turned his ghastly face to the speaker, and fastened his dark eyes on him, steadily, but vacantly. No sign of recognition was made; and in a moment he moved his head again slowly towards the vale, and began to sing, using his own language, in those low, guttural tones that have been so often mentioned, his notes rising with his theme, till they swelled to fullness, if not to harmony:

'I will come! I will come! to the land of the just I will come! No Delaware fears his end; no Mohican shrinks from death; for the Great Spirit calls, and he goes. My father I have honoured; I have cherished my mother; to my tribe I've been faithful and true. The Maquas I have slain!—I have slain the Maquas! and the Great Spirit calls to his son. I will come! I will come! to the land of the just I will come!'

'What says he, Leather-stocking?' inquired the priest, with tender interest; 'sings he the Redeemer's praise?'

'No, no—'tis his own praise that he speaks now,' said Natty, turning in a melancholy manner from the sight of his dying friend; 'and a good right he has to say it all, for I know every word of it to be true.'

'May Heaven avert such self-righteousness from his heart!' exclaimed the divine. 'Humility and penitence are the seals of christianity; and without feeling them deeply seated in the soul, all hope is delusive, and leads to vain expectations. Praise himself! when his whole soul and body should unite to praise his Maker! John! you have enjoyed the blessing of a gospel ministry, and have been called from out of a multitude of sinners and pagans, and, I trust, for a wise and gracious purpose. Do you now feel what it is to be justified by your Saviour's death, and reject all weak and idle dependence on good works, that spring from man's pride and vain-glory?'

The Indian did not regard his interrogator, but he raised his head again, and said, in a low, distinct voice—

'Who can say that the Maquas know the back of Mohegan! What enemy that trusted in him did not see the morning? What Mingo that he chased ever sung the song of triumph? Did Mohegan ever lie? No; for the truth lived in him, and none else could come out of him. In his youth, he was a warrior, and his moccasins left the stain of blood. In his age he was wise; and his words at the council fire did not blow away with the winds.'

'Ah! he has abandoned that vain relic of paganism, his songs,' cried the good divine;—'what says he now? is he sensible of his lost state?'

'Lord! mau,' said Natty, 'he knows his ind is at hand as well as you or I, but, so far from thinking it a loss to him, he believes it to be a great gain. He is now old and stiff, and you've made the game so scarce and shy, that better shots than him find it hard to get a livelihood. Now he thinks he shall travel where it will always be good hunting; where no wicked or unjust Indians can go; and where he shall meet all his tribe together, ag'in. There's not much loss in that, to a man whose hands be hardly fit for basket-making. Loss! if there be any loss, 'twill be to me. I'm sure, after he's gone, there will be but little left for me to do but to follow.'

'His example and end, which, I humbly trust, shall yet be made glorious,' returned Mr. Grant, 'should lead your mind to dwell on the things of another life. But I feel it to be my duty to smooth the way for the parting spirit. This is the moment, John, when the reflection that you did not reject the mediation of the Redeemer, will bring balm to your soul. Trust not to any act of former days, but lay the burthen of your sins at his feet, and you have his own blessed assurance that he will not desert you.'

'Though all you say be true, and you have scripture gospels for it, too,' said Natty, 'you will make nothing of the Indian. He has't seen a Moravian priest sin the war; and it's hard to keep them from going back to their native ways. I should think 'twould be as well to let the old man pass in peace. He's happy now; I know it by his eye; and that's more than I would say for the chief, sin' the time the Delawares broke up from the head-waters of their river, and went west. Ah! me! 'tis a grievous long time that, and many dark days have we both seen together, sin' it.'

'Hawk-eye!' said Mohegan, rousing with the last glimmering of life. 'Hawk-eye! listen to the words of your brother.'

'Yes, John,' said the hunter, in English, strongly affected by the appeal, and drawing to his side; 'we have been brothers; and more so than it means in the Indian tongue. What would ye have with me, Chingachgook?'

'Hawk-eye! my fathers call me to the happy hunting-grounds. The path is clear, and the eyes of Mohegan grow young. I look—but I see no white-skins; there are none to be seen but just and brave Indians. Farewell, Hawk-eye—you shall go with the Fire-eater and the Young Eagle, to the white man's heaven; but I go after my fathers. Let the bow, and tomahawk, and pipe, and the wampum, of Mohegan, be laid in his grave; for when he starts 'twill be in the night, like a warrior on a war party, and he cannot stop to seek them.'

'What says he, Nathaniel?' cried Mr. Grant, earnestly, and with obvious anxiety; 'does he recall the promises of the mediation? and trust his salvation to the Rock of Ages?'

Although the faith of the hunter was by no means clear, yet the fruits of early instruction had not entirely fallen in the wilderness. He believed in one God, and in one heaven; and when the strong feeling excited by the leave-taking of his old companion, which was exhibited by the powerful working of every muscle in his weather-beaten face suffered him to speak, he replied—

'No—no—he trusts only to the Great Spirit of the savages, and to his own good deeds. He thinks, like all his people, that he is to be young ag'in, and to hunt, and be happy to the ind of eternity. It's pretty much the same with all colours, parson. I could never bring myself to think that I shall meet with these hounds, or my piece, in another world; though the thoughts of leaving them for ever sometimes brings hard feelings over me, and makes me cling to life with a greater craving than becometh three score and ten.'

'The Lord, in his mercy, avert such a death from one who has been sealed with the sign of the cross!' cried the minister in holy fervour. 'John—'

He paused; for the scene, and the elements, seemed to conspire to oppress the powers of humanity. During the period occupied by the events which we have related, the dark clouds in the horizon had continued to increase in numbers and magnitude; and the awful stillness that now pervaded the air announced a crisis in the state of the atmosphere. The flames, which yet continued to rage along the sides of the mountain, no longer whirled in the uncertain currents of their own eddies, but blazed high and steadily towards the heavens. There was even a quietude in the ravages of the destructive element, as if it foresaw that a hand, greater than even its own desolating power, was about to stay its progress. The piles of smoke which lay above the valley began to rise, and were dispelling rapidly; and streaks of vivid lightning were dancing through the masses of clouds that impended over the western hills. While Mr. Grant was speaking, a flash, which sent its quivering light through the gloom, laying bare the whole opposite horizon, was followed by a loud crash of thunder, that rolled away among the hills, seeming to shake the foundations of the earth to their centre. Mohegan raised himself, as if in obedience to a signal for his departure, and stretched forth his wasted arm towards the west. His dark face lighted with a look of joy, which, with all other expression, gradually disappeared, the muscles stiffening as they retreated to a state of rest; a slight convulsion played for a single instant about his lips; and his arm slowly dropped, rigid and motionless, by his side, leaving the frame of the dead warrior reposing against the rock, with its glassy eyes open, and fixed on the distant hills, as if the deserted shell were tracing the flight of the spirit to its new abode.

ON QUEUES.

I have an instinctive, hereditary love of queues. I do not mean to extend my veneration, (though I like them also,) to those graceful, tapering wands, with which captains in country quarters, and aspiring under-graduates, illustrate the abstruse problems of chances and angels. Yet I admire a game of billiards, without exposing my temper or my pocket to its temptations; for I am not ashamed of my mediocrity, and have no dislike to receiving a red-hazard. But I was not thinking of such queues. The queues which command my ever-ready respect, are those which a few stately, gray, primitive gentlemen, of a past generation, carry about with them, in all seasons and into all companies. They tell a tale of other days, and I delight to read them.

There are only two queues extant in the town in which I was born, and in which I have lived from my boyhood. How many of my old, queue-bearing friends, who used to smile when I, wanton rogue, climbed up their chairs and reverently laid their queues upon their powdered shoulders, how many have passed into the oblivious grave! I sometimes see their venerable shades in my day-dreams, with their ample rouleaus of curls around their temples, and their neatly twisted queues behind their backs. They are gone;—and they are succeeded by a cropped and degenerate race.

I am old enough to remember the 'decline and fall' of the empire of queues. Faithful companions, duteous followers, ye succumbed to the tyranny of the greatest of Tories. The fatal tax upon hair-powder exterminated you. Slowly and sadly did ye decay; and one by one did ye depart from the cares of this transitory life! Frail and innocent beings, ye were untimely plucked, and cut off from your abiding-place and your inheritance! In a few short years I saw ye almost all yield to the avarice of those who should have cherished you. They cast you off in the hollowness of their friendship; and they went shorn into the bleak world, honourless, comfortless, queueless.

I could never entirely tolerate the volunteer mania; for it completed the destruction of the persecuted queues. There was only one officer in our corps, of glorious memory, who had the magnanimity to bear his queue without a blush. Methought it gave him the look of those who knew how fields should be won. But there was a corporal who did not partake of my reverential feelings. As the veteran marched in advance of the battalion, the mischievous subaltern (he was a tailor) would perk the queue in his lieutenant's face. I could have brought the corporal to a court-martial; it was flat mutiny, and unparalleled in the annals of warfare.

There were four queues in my native place who survived the oppression of the times; but they owed their existence to a rare combination of favourable circumstances. They were trimmed and watered by an ancient professor of queues, who had commenced his practice not very many years after the disunion of the two illustrious occupations of barbery and surgery. The professor was necessary to the wearer of the queues; and the four queues were a quiet and obedient family, that he loved with a complete and unmingled devotion. He was not a vulgar and every-day professor. He had saved a small fortune in the happier times of curls and toupees, and he despised the ordinary clients of these later days of unpowdered pertness. He received an annual guinea from each of his queue-bearers; and he resigned himself exclusively to the cultivation of this his small estate.

MR. GREEN'S ASCENT.

On Tuesday last, Mr. Green, the aéronaut, ascended from the Mermaid Gardens. He has since published a Narrative, of which the following is an extract:—

"At a quarter before 8 o'clock I again entered the car amidst the doubts and fears of a most respectable assemblage, but they were instantly dispelled by my gradual ascent in an eastward direction, amidst the acclamations of assembled thousands. I was afraid of coming in contact with the tower in Hackney churchyard, which I passed within a very few yards, but avoided it by throwing out a quantity of ballast. Several persons on the top of the tower were so very near to me as to put out their hands to shake hands with me. I could not possibly refrain from laughing at the circumstance, and they cheered me loudly as I passed. After I had thrown out the ballast, I ascended rapidly, and reached an elevation of at least two miles and a half, where I found it so intensely cold, that my fingers were paralyzed. I passed over the left of Hackney Wick, the lead-mills in the marshes, Laytonstone, Barking Side, part of Epping-forest, and to the left of Romford; and I descended in a clover-field belonging to Mr. Staines, at Nore-hill, four miles northward of Romford. My fall was so very easy, having checked the accelerated velocity of the descent by the continued discharge of ballast, that I came to the ground without receiving the least shock or concussion. The appearances that I witnessed during my voyage (it having been made at a different time of the day from any other of my aerial excursions) very greatly from those I had previously observed. The sun was setting at the time I entered the clouds, and the reflection of its rays variegated them, and gave to some of them the similitude of red vapor. The appearance of the river Thames, which on my former ascent resembled a sheet of polished metal, now was obscured from my view by a mass of clouds of vapor rolling over it; the land on each side of it at the same time appearing very distinct. Epping-forest, as I passed over one part of it, appeared of a triangular form, and resembled a coppice covering two acres of land, the trees of which did not appear to my visual organs to be higher than gooseberry-bushes. I mention this to explain a statement made by Captain Sowden, who passed over the same forest with a balloon, in company with M. Garnerin, 'That although Epping-forest did not appear larger than a gooseberry-bush, he could distinctly see the ruts and furrows in the fields.' I have no doubt but that gentleman mistook cross-roads and lanes for ruts and furrows, which any person on a first ascent would be likely to do; and I conceive that his observation as to the gooseberry-bush referred merely to the height of the trees. The beauties of the various scenes—the diversified appearances of the earth, occasioned by the setting of the sun—and the immense horizon which my sight compassed, surpassed every thing I had previously witnessed on my former ascents at an earlier period of the day; and I certainly should have gratified myself by remaining up much longer, had I not pledged myself to return, if possible, to Hackney, the same night; but which I was prevented from effecting by being detained by Mr. Staines, who, very illiberally as I conceived, forcibly seized my balloon, because some trifling injury had been done to his clover by persons who ran into the field to witness my descent, and whose natural curiosity induced them to witness a close inspection of the aeronautical machine. But, notwithstanding this impediment, I arrived at the Mermaid, at Hackney, at two o'clock on the following morning. My thanks are due to the Magistrates who were present, and to Mr. Garton, the head officer of Worship-street, by whose exertions I am mainly indebted for the preservation of the peace, and the safety of my person and balloon.

AFRICA: CAPTAIN OWEN'S EXPEDITION.

We have been favoured with the sight of a letter from an officer on board the Severn, the flag ship of the little squadron which was fitted out in the spring of last year, under the command of Captain William Owen, to survey the east coast of Africa. The letter is dated St. Mary's, East Coast of Madagascar, end of December, 1822. The Severn, and the Cockburn,

Tender, left Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope, early in September, and arrived at Algoa Bay in the middle of the month; sailed again in three days, and reached Delagoa Bay at the end of the month, when they were joined by the Barracouta, which had been left behind at the Cape. Boats were manned to explore English River, the most considerable of three which fall into Delagoa Bay. While engaged in this service, one of the boats was attacked and nearly destroyed by a Hippopotamus. The crew, however, succeeded in reaching the shore without loss, and the whole party encamped for the night. About midnight a fierce attack was made on them by a body of nearly 800 natives, who were, however, soon repulsed, and the only casualty was one of the Severn's men being wounded. After an absence of ten days the boats returned to the ships, where a deadly fever soon began to prevail, which in a short time swept off 37 of the crews of the two ships, among whom were Captain Lechmere and many other valuable officers. As soon as the fever showed itself, Captain Owen sailed for Madagascar, and by the time he had reached St. Mary's the contagion had ceased. Preparations were making, at the departure of the letter, for renewing the survey; and as the unhealthy season was past, hopes of better success were entertained.—Lit. Gas.

THE HUMBLE PETITION OF ABUSED H.

SHEWETH,

That many ladies, and gentlemen, and likewise other persons of different occupations, trades, characters, and dispositions to whom H. used to have free access, have now either totally forsaken him, or have associated him with a company of strangers, among whom he cuts a most ridiculous figure.—A young lady (to the great mortification of H.) was observing the other day, "that the ills made a pretty contrast with the valleys below: that the owes were prettily interspersed among the woods, and that she was fond of earing the howls of a hevening. She admires the arbour of Portsmouth, and is constantly shooting harrows at susceptible arts in the middle of summer, she drinks hals at her meals, and heats hartichokes without receiving any arm from them; she ates of weather, but likes a clear eaven," and yet I assure you this all-accomplished maiden has fine air, sweet hies, quick hears, delicate herms, and a good art, earth and appiness. The other morning the same young lady upon meeting a gentleman, she observed to him "that he looked arty," and he in return exclaimed (stretching out his harms and yawning) that the ours ung very early on his ands.—In short, poor H. is so frequently abused by people of all denominations, that he is obliged in this public manner, most humbly to pray for better usage in future, and to remind those who thus wantonly injure him, that they can never be happy without him.

GOOD COUNSELS OF CHAUCER.

Flee from the crowd, and be to virtue true,
Content with what thou hast, tho' it be small:
To hoard brings hate;—nor lofty things pursue:
He who climbs high, endangers many a fall.
Envy's a shade that ever waits on Fame,
And oft the sun that raises it, will hide;
Trace not in life a vast expansive scheme,
But be thy wishes to thy state allied.
Be mild to others, to thyself severe;
So Truth shall shield thee, or from hurt or fear.
Think not of bending all things to thy will,
Nor vainly hope that Fortune shall befriend;
Inconstant she; but be thou constant still,
Whate'er betide, unto an honest end.
Yet needless dangers never madly brave,
Kick not thy naked foot against a nail;
Or from Experience the solution crave,
If well and pithy strive which shall prevail,
Be in thy cause as in thy neighbour's clear,
So Truth shall shield thee, or from hurt or fear.
Whatever happens, happy in thy mind
Be thou; nor at thy lot in life repine;
He 'scapes all ill whose bosom is resign'd,
Nor way nor weather, shall be always fine.
Beside, thy Hane's not here; a Journey this;
A Pilgrim thou; then hie thee on thy way;
Look up to God, intent on heavenly bliss,
Take what the road affords, and praises pay.
Shun brutal lusts, and seek the Son's high sphere,
So Truth shall shield thee, or from hurt or fear.

in tail. The hour of his morning visit was an hour of happiness; it was a full hour. It was his to spread the flowing hair over the ample shoulders; to smooth out the broad black ribbon, which he carefully renewed when its lustre was sullied; to gather up the scattered locks into a solid girth of leather; and then to bind them fast, roundly and taperingly, till his power should again give them a temporary freedom. Poor F——! he sung "Time has not thinned," with an exquisite tremulousness; and he told the scandal of his profession with a sly and solemn air, which at once bespoke his discretion and his sincerity. He loved his queue-bearers alike, and he left to each of them a ring.

His four stewards are alive; but two of his cherished family are defunct. I was sorry when I heard that A—— had discarded the faithful attendant of so many years. He is of a rough and generous nature, and should have bethought him that the oak suffers the embrace of the ivy without a loss of power or dignity. As for P—— I expected it of him. He was always a time-server, a slave of custom, a worshipper of the rising sun. He cast off the friend that never would have forsaken him; he had not soul enough to feel the honour of being one of "the last of the Romans."

Had I once worn a queue I could never have parted with it. I was born after the refined days of hair-worship. The progress of intelligence has deposed these sinless and harmless adornments. But had it been my fate to have ever exhibited such an appendage to manhood, I would as soon have lost my hand as have suffered a sacrilegious scissors to have despoiled me of it. There is a mystical nature about a queue which approaches to the sublime: it is at once a part of the man, and a part of his dress; it will wear out fifty of his garments, and yet it does not seem wholly and essentially belonging to his body. Possessing the power of dismissing this ancient follower, I would have permitted my prerogative mercifully to have slumbered, till we had laid down together in the bosom of our common mother. How many fond recollections would have hung upon my queue! The loved one who dallied with it; the children who were tickled with it! Psha! I have no such delightful associations; I am cropped once a month, and my dishonoured locks are swept into the highway.

There are only three queues in Parliament. They look to me like the pillars of the British constitution. I used to reverence the tall, stately George R——, walking through the dirt of Palace Yard, in his black silks, with the grace and equanimity of an old cavalier. Such courtly guise has given place to the trowsers and frock-coats of the bustling city. But a trio of my queues are still there. There is Sir William Q——, the fox-hunter, whose thin, long queue has streamed in the breeze of many a misty morning:—there is W——, the retired lawyer, whose thick sturdy queue has shaken "pestilence and war" in many a wordy debate:—and there is A——, the worn-out West-Indian planter, whose pert diminutive adjunct ever reminded me of pigtail. Praise and honour to their constancy!

I went at Christmas to Covent Garden to see the pantomime; and I was offended. Grimaldi had a long red queue, insolently mimicking the glories of the mighty dead. And the audience laughed! I could not look upon Grimaldi again; but I walked round the degenerate house,—and there was not a queue in the whole dress circle. The age of gentlemen is passed!—Knights Quar. Magazine.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I vow and protest I never was in such a passion in all my life, as when I read, in your last Iris, the report of the Fashions for Gentlemen, by that quizzical "Q in the corner." I am sure he's ugly by his manner, and I'll lay an apple to an orange he's an old Bachelor—a quizzical ugly old Bachelor, that's what he is; do pray, if you have any wish to please the ladies, turn him off, and get somebody who will praise all that is fashionable, and declare every thing that is new very becoming; for my part, I think that the beaux dress, now-a-days, very gaily and very smartly, and that the present fashion makes a handsome young man look very handsome indeed; I'm sure it does—and I can tell you this, that many young gentlemen of my acquaintance are very angry at your suffering that old ugly—but I hate to think of him—to write so. Papa prodigiously admired the odious account, and that's what makes me hate it worse; and young Mr. Inkle, who pays great attention to me, declares he is taken off in it, and I verily believe papa thinks so too, for, when he came to tea last evening, he eyed him from top to toe; but I am certain all such sneers have nothing to do with him, for though to be sure his grey hat is not new, it's so nicely done up, it looks just as good as ever, and his frock, as you call it, looks much better this year than it did last when it was much longer; as for his wristbands, he wears them to be seen every day, that is, every evening, for he always carries a pair in his pocket to slip on when he leaves the warehouse to pay his devoirs to me.—For striped trowsers, and Day and Martin, and boots, and such stuff, he need not mind that, for he always wears long shorts, and so I tell him to be above thinking himself taken off by that ugly old ——— O, how I hate him. If you would be advised by me, and are not engaged, Mr. Inkle will suit you to a T; he has such a fine taste in dress, and reads the female fashions and explains all those French names, the gros de Naples, a la Grece, and so on, and writes such moving epitaphs on dead linnets, and butterflies, he would be quite an acquisition; I am almost tempted to inclose a copy of his verses on my pricking my finger with a needle—they are so tender and so pathetic;—but I am afraid, as he is exceedingly diffident of his own talents. After all, I again vow and protest, that if you put any more of those half-laughs into the Iris again, I will

"Throw it behind the fire, and never more, Let that vile paper come within my door."

that is, my papa's, but its all the same, I assure you.

LYDIA LANGUISH.

THE CABINET.

NOBLE BEHAVIOUR OF THE LATE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.

A gentleman, named Carlowinski, on an excursion to his country seat, which was but a few miles from Petersburg, accidentally saw a young woman, daughter to one of his vassals, with whose person he was so much pleased, that he sent an order to her father, desiring that she might be brought to his house that evening, very plainly declaring for what purpose he made the request. The old man, who had an exquisite sense of natural honour, was greatly shocked at the command, and took the liberty of waiting on his lord, at whose feet he instantly fell, and implored, in the humblest manner, that he would not insist upon the violation of his daughter. Instead of being moved with the tears and entreaties of his vassal, Carlowinski was enraged, to the last degree, at finding the opposition to his will, and immediately ordered his servants to throw the offender upon his face, and beat him with sticks, upon his naked back, which they did, till he was totally insensible through the excess of pain, and loss of blood. The young woman hearing, by some means, of her father's treatment, and perhaps imagining she might be used with equal severity, posted instantly to Petersburg, to wait for an opportunity of throwing herself at the feet of the Empress, and begging her protection. Very fortunately, as she entered the city, she met her imperial Majesty returning from church, and followed the royal coach so closely, that she found no difficulty in executing her purpose, as the Empress stepped out. Her majesty was much affected at the recital of the poor girl's melancholy story, and ordered her to be properly taken care of, till the arrival of Carlowinski, for whom she instantly sent. The moment he appeared, her majesty ordered the young woman to be called in; and finding her complaint to be in every circumstance just, she reprimanded Carlowinski, in the severest terms, and ordered him to make a proper atonement for the scandalous injustice and inhumanity of his conduct. He endeavoured to excuse himself, as well as he possibly could, mentioning something of the right, which every nobleman had, to the person and property of his vassals: to which her majesty made this remarkable reply:—"Right, Carlowinski! Nothing can be right which is repugnant to the laws of justice and nature. Would it not appear very extraordinary in me, if I were to seize your property and life, without having the smallest reason for so great a severity? And can you possibly have so good a claim to any thing belonging to your vassal or tenant, as I have, both as mistress and sovereign, to every thing which is my subject's? I am sorry to say, Carlowinski, you are a fool, as well as a libertine; but, know this from me, Sir, that your vassals are my people; and, be assured, that I will soon take such measures as shall make the greatest man in my dominions tremble, who thinks of exacting an obedience to his power, from the unhappy peasant, which is not due to his virtues. The poorest wretch in my empire, as a man, is entitled to my warmest protection, and shall always find a refuge in me, as long as he continues, by honesty and justice, to deserve it."

The consequence of this affair was, that the old man, and his daughter, were immediately declared free; and Carlowinski obliged to settle one hundred rubles a year upon them, for ever; to which her majesty ordered as much more to be added, out of the public revenue. And, though a few of the nobility appeared dissatisfied at this abridgment of their ancient power, yet, the Empress had the satisfaction of hearing her behaviour loudly applauded by the general voice of the best and wisest in the kingdom.

ASTONISHING ACT OF HEROISM,

Performed by a Planter at the Cape of Good Hope, who fell a victim to his humanity.

[Communicated by R. T.]

A violent gale of wind setting in from the north-west, a vessel in the road dragged her anchors, was forced on the rocks, and bulged; and while the greater part of the crew fell an immediate sacrifice to the waves, the remainder were seen from the shore struggling for their lives, by clinging to different pieces of the wreck. The sea ran so high, and broke over the sailors with such dreadful fury, that no boat would venture off to their assistance. Meanwhile, a planter, considerably advanced in life, had come from his farm to be a spectator of the shipwreck; his heart was melted at the sight of the unhappy seamen; and knowing the bold spirit of his horse, and his particular excellence as a swimmer, he instantly determined to make a desperate effort for their deliverance. Seating himself firmly on his saddle, he rushed into the midst of the breakers. At first, both disappeared; but it was not long before they floated on the surface, and swam up to the wreck; when taking two men, each of whom held by one of his boots, he brought them safe to shore. This perilous expedition he repeated so seldom seven times, and saved fourteen lives to the public; but, on his return the eighth time, his horse being much fatigued, and meeting a most formidable wave, he lost his balance, and was overwhelmed in a moment. The horse swam safe to land, but his gallant rider was no more!

ANECDOTE OF A PAWNEE BRAVE.*

The facts in the following anecdote of a Pawnee Brave, son of old Knife, one of the delegation who visited Washington last winter, were taken, by permission, from a very interesting MS. journal of Capt. Beil, of his expedition, with major Long, to the foot of the rocky mountains in 1821, and are sanctioned by Major O'Fallon, Indian agent near the scene of the transaction here related, and also by the interpreter who witnessed this scene. This Brave, of fine size, figure, and countenance, is now about 25 years old. At the age of 21, his heroic deeds had acquired him in his nation the rank of the bravest of the Braves. The savage practice of torturing and burning to death their prisoners existed in this nation.† An unfortunate female, of the Padon nation, taken in war, was destined to this horrid death. The fatal hour had arrived; the trembling victim, far from her home and friends, was fastened to the stake—the whole tribe was assembled on the surrounding plain to witness the awful scene. Just when the funeral pile was to be kindled, and the whole multitude of spectators were on the tiptoe of expectation, this young warrior having, unnoticed, prepared two fleet horses, with the necessary provisions, sprang from his seat, rushed through the crowd, liberated the victim, seized her in his arms, placed her on one of the horses, mounted the other himself, and made the utmost speed towards the nation and friends of the captive. The multitude, dumb and nerveless with amazement at the daring deed, made no effort to rescue their victim from her deliverer.

* The Braves are warriors who have distinguished themselves in battle, and stand highest in the estimation of the tribe.

† This custom does not now exist in the surrounding tribes.

They viewed it as the immediate act of the great spirit, submitted to it without a murmur, and quietly retired to their village. The released captive was accompanied three days through the wilderness towards her home; he then gave her the horse on which she rode, with the necessary provisions for the remainder of her journey, and they parted. On his return to the village, such was his popularity, no enquiry was made into his conduct, so censure was passed on it. And since this transaction no human sacrifice has been offered in this or in any other of the Pawnee tribes. The practice is abandoned. Of what influence is one bold act in a good cause. The publication of this anecdote at Washington led the young ladies of Miss White's seminary, in that city, in a manner highly creditable to their good sense and feeling, to present this brave and humane Indian with a handsome silver medal, with an appropriate inscription, as a token of their sincere commendation of the noble act. Their address, delivered on this occasion, closed thus—"Brother, accept this token of our esteem—always wear it for our sakes—and when again you have the power to save a poor woman from death and torture, think of this, and of us, and fly to her relief and her rescue." The Pawnee's reply was—"Sisters, this medal will give me ease more than I ever had, and I will listen more than I ever did to white men. I am glad that my brothers and sisters have heard of the good act that I have done. My brothers and sisters think that I did it in ignorance, but I now know what I have done—I did it in ignorance, and did not know that I did good; but by giving me this medal I know it."

INSCRIPTION

Upon a window, very neatly written with a diamond, at the Clerk's house in the village of Prestbury, near Macclesfield, which commands a view of the Church-yard, where 'the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.'

Behold there, the remains of many generations, crowded together in the dust,—silent, lifeless, motionless! Behold, and be wise. What a hopeless place to retrieve lost time, to rectify past miscarriages, to reform from past vices, to discharge neglected duties, to execute the great business of life,—to prepare for immortality, and to acquire a disposition for heaven. Therefore, 'whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it now, with all thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest.'

He is truly a happy man who, in the sullens, or in the King's Bench, or in rainy weather, can coin cheerfulness from his mistress' glance, Bank-notes from his mistress' hand-writing, or sunshine from his mistress' smile.

When fortune forsakes me,
Sigh not for me!
When trouble o'erakes me,
Sigh not for me!
In thee I shall find
My lost peace of mind;
There is hope in thy charms,
There is joy in thine arms;
I cannot despair,
While thou art so fair!
Should sickness come nigh me,
Sigh not for me!
Should riches still fly me,
Sigh not for me!
In thee I have health,
In thee I have wealth,
In thy beautiful face,
In thy gentle embrace;
I cannot depend,
While thou art so fond!
If honour should leave me,
Sigh not for me!
If friendships deceive me,
Sigh not for me!
I will think upon fame
As a troublesome name,
And friendships shall seem
The shade of a dream;
How can I repine
Whilst Anna is mine.

EPITAPHS.

MR. EDITOR,—Visiting the Church-yard of Syston and Rothley, in Leicestershire a few days since, my attention was directed to the following singular Epitaphs, which, in point of composition and style of writing, may be ranked, I think, among the "queer set." Time! which "Moulders into beauty many a tower" has nearly obliterated some of these 'silent monitors' and the stones on which they are written are falling to the dust; yet by making good use of the optic nerve, I was enabled to trace as below. If you think them worthy of a place in your valuable Miscellany, (not doubting they will create a smile, if not prove interesting to your numerous readers) by inserting them you will oblige,

Sir, Yours &c.,

Lenton Terrace.

W. L. S.

IN ROTHLEY CHURCH-YARD.

Lo! here she lies
Who for a flower
By water dies
In one sad hour.

French Katherine, Buried Sept. 16, 1686.

ANOTHER.

She was ———
But words are wanting
To say what ——— Think what a wife should Be ———
And she was that.

IN LYSTON CHURCH-YARD.

Here lieth the body of William Needham.
Need I confess began my name, but that was but sham,
For this world's pelf I wanted not, until I lost my ham.

What I gave I have
What I spent I had
What I left I lost by not giving it.

ON ANOTHER STONE BY THE SIDE OF THE ABOVE.

To the memory of Mary, wife of Thomas Needham, 1735, Aged 24 years.

In my time, was in my prime
And lived in this Town;
A lilly fresh and I was flesh,
And death soon cut me down.

ON ANOTHER.

Now I am dead—laid in the grave,
And all my bones are rotten;
When this you see remember me,
Lest I be quite forgotten.

VARIETIES.

A SNAKE IN A WATER-BUTT IN THE METROPOLIS.—On the 28th ult. was discovered, in a water-butt, in the house of Mr. James Robertson, Old North-street, Red Lion-square, a large snake, three feet in length, of the common kind, which was seen swimming in the water with its head partly out: on its being touched, it made a disagreeable hissing noise until it was killed. What makes this occurrence very extraordinary is, the manner in which the snake found its way into the water-butt, which cannot be accounted for, unless it came through the pipe that conveys the water from the New-river, in which case it must have come a distance of nearly two miles out of its own natural element. In other respects the water-butt is so situated (being surrounded by a wall nearly ten feet high) that all idea of the snake gaining access from any other quarter is precluded.

BOERHAAVE.—Boerhaave, was born at Woerhout, near Leyden, in the year 1668. In 1693, he was created Doctor of Physic, which he then regularly practised; at this time he could scarcely exist by his labours, and was compelled to teach the mathematics to procure the bare necessities of life, although he left at his demise the vast fortune of two hundred thousand pounds. Whilst Boerhaave presided in the chair of chemistry, medicine, and botany, the city of Leyden was considered the school of Europe in those sciences. In 1715, when Peter the Great went to Holland to study maritime affairs, he regularly attended the lectures of Boerhaave, and sought every leisure opportunity of associating with him. So widely diffused was his fame, that a Mandarin in China wrote to him a letter, thus superscribed: "To the illustrious Boerhaave, physician, in Europe;" and it was regularly received.

INCREASE IN POPULATION.—An eminent boarder has computed that there are now twenty-six thousand new houses contracted for in and about London. If an average of four inmates to each house be allowed, this would make an increase of population, within the bills of mortality, of upwards of one hundred thousand souls.

QUAKERS.—Bishop Parker tells the following story; that they not only met the oftener because they thought they were forbidden to meet by stat. 35th Elizabeth, but that a large assembly of them, in the reign of Charles II. having protracted their sitting to a very long and tedious period, could not be prevailed with to break up till a merry wag thought of this stratagem; he caused it to be proclaimed in the king's name, "that no one should depart without his leave." On hearing of which, they all immediately rose and went away, that it should not be said they paid obedience to any man.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.—The daily publication of reports is one of the most remarkable circumstances in the history of these times. It is truly astonishing to think that a debate, which has commenced at five o'clock in the evening and lasted until five the next morning, shall be taken down in short-hand, written out, corrected, printed, struck off by thousands after correction for press, distributed by the newsmen, and on every breakfast table in London before mid-day, nay, before the speakers have left their beds, and within 24 hours read in Devonshire and Yorkshire.

CURE FOR RHEUMATISM.—A remedy for Rheumatism has been introduced into this country by Mr. Churchill, of Princes-street, Leicester-fields. It is termed Acupuncture, and consists in cautiously inserting needles, to a given depth, into those muscular parts which are the seat of the disease. It has been long held in repute by the Chinese and the French, who have adopted it, and speak of it with praise. Mr. Churchill relates several cases in his own practice, in which it has been decidedly useful. It is said his Majesty consulted his physician on the propriety of adopting it in his own case. It appears also that Lady Burrell, daughter to the Earl of Egremont, witnessed its usefulness in the hands of Mr. Martin, of Horsbam, in Sussex; and as it is represented as producing no pain, determined on having a needle introduced to her own person, to ascertain the fact, previously to recommending it to her father, who had been suffering from sciatica. The result was confirmatory of the assertion; for she described the sensation produced by it as resembling the drawing a needle across the hand so slightly as not to produce a scratch. The Earl had tried every remedy which could be suggested, without experiencing relief. He therefore submitted to an introduction of the needle, and in a few minutes was completely cured, and the next day able to go out shooting. At Brighton it was quite "town talk," and the remedy is much recommended by Sir M. Tierney.

Some years since, a large public meeting of the Society of Friends was held at Whitby, in Yorkshire; and as there was no other building sufficiently capacious, it was announced to be held in the Theatre of that place. On which occasion the following Lines were affixed on the doors, by some person unconnected with the Society, a short time before the company assembled for religious worship.

Readers! if you have time to spare,
Turn o'er Saint Matthew's leaves:
You'll find that once a house of prayer
Became a den of thieves:
But now the times are altered quite,
O! reformation rare!
This modern den of thieves, to-night,
Becomes a house of prayer.

EXTRAORDINARY PHENOMENON.—Eight months ago, a youth, about 12 years of age, named Oldham, in Christ's Hospital, went to bed at the usual hour, and in the morning rose totally dumb: he preserved every other faculty, but was obliged to write on a slate for every thing he wanted that he could not explain by signs. Every means of internal remedy, and also electricity, were resorted to without effect: galvanism was also attempted, but was so much resisted in its application by the boy's fears, that it could not then be applied. His general health was invariably good. At length, by strong recommendation, his fears of galvanism were overcome, and it was applied five different days; on Friday week, being the evening of the fifth application, and exactly eight months to a day, he retired to bed as usual, and awoke suddenly about eleven o'clock, making so much noise as to awaken some of his school-fellows. Their astonishment induced so much alarm, that the nurse opened the door of her adjoining apartment to learn the cause, when many voices exclaimed, "O nurse, Oldham can speak again!" The nurse doubting the fact, immediately went to him, and discovered the reality of this extraordinary phenomenon. In the morning the boy had quite recovered his speech; and on being asked if he felt any peculiar sensation, merely said he thought he was being galvanised, as he felt the tip of his tongue affected, together with a rambling in his inside. His speech has continued perfect ever since.

BAKED MONKS.—In the monastery of St. Bernard, it is the custom to preserve the dead bodies of the monks, and afterwards place them erect in niches along the walls. This is effected by baking them for five or six months in a very slow oven, contrived for that purpose, and they will remain thus preserved for centuries, without changing or being the least offensive. They are dressed in their hoods and cloaks when placed.

CURE FOR CANCER.—A medical Gentleman has recently published the following account of a mode of cure for the cancer, which he says has been successfully practised: "Apply a strong vegetable ointment with hemlock to the schirrous tumour, and at the same time keep the patient entirely on a vegetable diet, and the copious use of the sarsaparilla and other vegetable beverages."

THE GREAT UNKNOWN.—At the dinner of the Pitt Club in Edinburgh, the Lord Provost, after a short speech, gave "The Great Unknown Author of Waverley." Lord Hermand, in his peculiarly jocular manner, here said, that the worthy Chief Magistrate had needlessly wrapped up his toast in mystery; for the author of those works was perfectly well known; at least he (Lord Hermand) had no doubt in his own mind who the author was, nor should he make any question about it. Sir W. Scott was present, and heartily joined in the loud applause which the toast called forth.

A Northern paper says, "We can state upon good authority, that the publisher of the Waverley novels has paid the author, for the Pirate, Nigel, Peveril, and Quentin Durward, £26,000."

A DANDY'S BOOTS.—A Dandy called, the other day, at a boot-maker's, requiring to be fitted with a pair of half-boots. Several pairs were shown him, which he tried, but not one would suit. "Here, I think, is a pair that will do," said Crispin, reaching down an excellent pair of cordovan. "No," said the dandy, "those should cover the calf." "Then," said Crispin, dilly measuring him with his eye, "they must be five feet eight."

PRINTING PRESS.—We have seen this morning a proof sheet specimen of printing, on an octavo form, pica type, by a new printing press, got up in this city, with improvements upon the London steam-press, by Mr. James Booth. The impression is perfect, and will throw off twenty-five hundred sheets an hour, and requires only two hands to feed it. The engine which moves the whole machinery is only one horse power.—New York Evening Post.

APPEARANCE.—I became poor, and my apparel soon evinced it—I was universally avoided—I passed through the streets as through a desert. I had three old hats—I gave them all for a new one; put it on, and went out—I was immediately accosted by dozens. My wife contrived to get up one tolerable coat out of two old ones—I put that on also, and went out—every one now recognized me, and I was shaken hands with at every corner. Those that unfortunately have more brains than bank-notes can apply the moral.—New York paper.

THE BIVOYACK OF AN ARMY.—It is a pleasing sight to see a column arrive at its halting ground. The camp is generally marked out, if circumstances allow of it, on the edge of some wood, and near a river or stream. The troops are halted in open columns, arms piled, picquets and guards paraded and posted, and in two minutes all appear at home. Some fetch large stones to form fire-places; others hurry off with canteens and kettles for water, while the wood resounds with the blows of the bill-hook. Dispersed, under the more distant trees, you see the officers; some dressing, some arranging a few boughs to shelter them by night; others kindling their own fires; while the most active are seen returning from the village laden with bread, or from some flock of goats feeding near us, with a supply of new milk. How often, under some spreading cork tree, which offered shade, shelter, and fuel, have I taken up my lodging for the night; and here, or by some gurgling stream, my bosom fanned by whatever air was stirring, made my careless toilet, and sat down, with men I both liked and esteemed, to a coarse but wholesome meal, seasoned by hunger and by cheerfulness. The rude simplicity of this life I found most pleasing. Strange, indeed, to observe how soon men, delicately brought up, can inure themselves to any thing. Wrapt in a blanket, or a cloak, the head reclining on a stone or knapsack, covered by the dews of the night, or drenched perhaps by the thunder-shower, sleeps many a youth, to whom the carpeted chamber, the curtained couch, and the bed of down, have been from infancy familiar. A bivouack in heavy weather does not, I allow, present a very comfortable appearance. The officers sit shivering in their wet tents, idle and angry till dinner time, after which they generally contrive to kill the evening with mulled wine, round a camp kettle lid filled with hot wood-ashes by way of a fire. The men, with their forage caps drawn over their ears, huddle together under banks or walls, or crowd round cheerless, smoky fires, cursing their commissaries, the rain, and the French.—Recollection of the Peninsula.

SWIMMING MACHINE.—A number of experiments have lately been made at Paris with a swimming machine, called a Rouanette, from the name of the inventor, M. Rouan. It is made of tin, and has the appearance of two cones, lengthened into a tapering form, and very strongly united. It is fixed under the arm-pits; and whoever has it on may cross a river, even if loaded with a burden, without any apprehension.

OSTRICHES.—His Majesty has, we understand, in his possession, at Windsor, two very fine Emews, or Southern Ostriches, from Van Diemen's Land. The female has brought forth seven eggs, six of which are hatched, and the birds are fine and strong upon the legs. We understand that such is the attention of the male to the young brood, he boldly presents himself to prevent any one approaching them.

PHYSIC v. LAW.—Two Cross-Bills were filed in Chancery, some years ago, by an Attorney and an Apothecary, who had done business for each other. The prayer of the libel was the same, viz: for the production of the account; and the cause assigned was also the same. Each of the parties declared upon oath, that he was afraid to deliver his account first, as he verily believed that, let it amount to what it might, the other would make his own larger.

CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.—The two most admirable writers that modern Europe ever produced, were Shakespeare and Cervantes, who both died on the same day in the same year—namely, April 23, 1616.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

The plans for the new structure are completed, and Mr. Smirke the architect is ready to commence building the moment the Chancellor of the Exchequer has obtained the requisite grant from the House of Commons. It is proposed to raise three sides first, some feet beyond the area of the present building; the contents of the Museum will then be transferred to their new home, the old walls will be pulled down, and the fourth side of the new structure will stand on the ground which was before occupied by the fourth side of the former one. By this plan the expense of the new erection will be lightened to the public, by coming upon them gradually, and in addition to this the treasures of art and science will not be closed against visitors for an hour.

In making this statement of course we have not supposed any objection on the part of the house to the required grant. How, indeed, can a British Parliament object to a measure, which tends to raise the capital in the scale of nations? The barbarous times of military glory are rapidly passing away, and nations are not valued so much from their dexterity to destroy as from their pre-eminence in arts and science, and all else that may tend to elevate the understanding, or ameliorate the manners of mankind. Such a building as this now proposed, will be an honor to the metropolis, and its utility will hardly be doubted by those who are acquainted with the present state of the Museum. We hope too that the improvements will not be confined to stone and mortar: according to the present arrangement, the Museum is closed nearly half the year to the public: there are 52 Sundays and 52 Saturdays, to begin with, that are close days, and those amount to three months, two weeks, and six days; then come Whitsun week, Easter week, &c. Some of our readers will perhaps object to Sundays being in the list, but surely after morning and evening church, a stroll through the rooms of the Museum is a much more harmless recreation for the lower orders than the drinking room of a public house. But this perhaps is dangerous ground, and in these days of innovation, every plan for improvement, even where improvement is absolutely called for, should be well weighed before it is carried into practice.—Museum.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'The Manuscript of 1814.' A work under this title will be published in the course of a few days. It appears that Napoleon had given orders to his confidential secretary, Baron Fain, to assemble together all the materials necessary for writing the History of the Campaign of 1814, and of the first abdication. This order was executed, and the Manuscript was presented to Napoleon in 1815, on his return from Elba. He, however, made so many additions and alterations, that it became necessary to have it entirely re-written. The work was completely finished in 1817, and Baron Fain endeavored to find means of conveying it secretly to Saint-Helene: not being able to accomplish this object, he determined to wait till some favorable occasion should present itself. The existence of this Manuscript was well known, and large offers were made for it, but without effect, as the Baron could not dispose of what he regarded as a deposit; but when the death of Napoleon took place, he considered himself free from all restraint, and the publication was immediately resolved on.

A Memoir of Central India, with the History, and copious Illustrations, of the past and present Condition of that Country, will shortly appear, in 2 vols. 8vo. with an original Map, Tables of Revenue and Population, a Geological Report, &c. By Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B.

Mrs. Holderness has a volume in the press, entitled New Russia, being some account of the colonization of that country, and of the manners and customs of the colonists. To which is added, a brief detail of a Journey overlaid from Riga to the Crimea by way of Kieo, accompanied with Notes on the Crim Tartars.

Mr. J. Frederic Daniell, F.R.S., has in the press a volume of Meteorological Essays, embracing, among others, the following important subjects:—On the Constitution of the Atmosphere; on the Radiation of the Heat in the Atmosphere; on Meteorological Instruments; on the Climate of London; on the construction and uses of a New Hygrometer.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

R. N. is mistaken.—We cannot pledge ourselves in the way he requires; nor do we think very highly of his delicacy in so strongly urging a measure to which he very justly anticipates our objection.—We must retain a discretionary power; and whilst we answer correspondents respectfully, we wish to be understood as being positive.

We perfectly agree with our Liverpool Correspondent "Observer," but think that a revival of the subject would be equally unpleasant and injudicious.

An Acrostic by J. S. emanates from ignorance, impertinence, and folly.—We pity the writer.

T. P. on examining the "little pieces of original poetry" which occupy his portfolio, will probably find something more suitable for our pages, than the "Lines" just to hand. The numbers required by T. K. have been forwarded to our Liverpool Agents.

S. X. on referring to "A Key to Lennie's Principles of English Grammar," Fifth Edition, page 25, will find the plural of Attorney, Journey, &c. thus explained:—"I y always changed into ies."—No; y with a vowel before it is not changed into ies.—When is it changed into ies?—Only when there is a consonant before it.—When you see a noun ending with y, then, what are you first to consider about? Whether the y has a vowel or a consonant before it.—If it has a consonant before it what do you do?—Change y into ies, because nouns in y change y into ies.—But if it has a vowel before it what do you do?—I add s only; as days.—In proper names y with a consonant before it takes s only; as the eight Henrys.—y in the termination cry is changed into ies, as, in soliloquies, soliloquies, because the y in this case has the sound, and of course the nature, of y.

FUGITIVE RECOLLECTIONS.

AT seven o'clock, Gaspard, my servant, knocked at my bed-room door, and called out that Monsieur de Montauban was below; I rose immediately, and having dressed myself, undrew my window curtains, and let down the window to admit the refreshing fragrance of the breeze. It commanded a full view of the spacious garden which environed the house, and of the neighbouring scenery.—It was a delightful morning, in the month of June,—not a cloud could be seen in the rich blue firmament, and the sun shone with unintercepted splendour;—in the night there had been a storm, accompanied with heavy rain; it had cleared the stagnant atmosphere, and the fields and hedges being still wet, shewed their lively verdure to the greatest advantage. All was serene and still—nothing could be heard but the song of the lark in the distant sky—and, every now and then, the hallowing of the peasant-boy to his cows, which he was driving from the pasture home to be milked.

I stood musing; partly on the beauty of the prospect before me, and partly on the little time I had to spend with my friend, before he would be in a distant land. There was a kind of melancholy association between the fields I was gazing on, the garden where we had so often enjoyed ourselves, and had passed so many agreeable hours—the umbrageous lanes we had so frequently paced together, and the circumstance of his departure.—I thought how often we had been seated in the willow arbour, which was immediately opposite to me, reading one to the other each his favourite author—discussing the merits of the volume—and enjoying all the luxuries of literary converse. The hum of the toiling bee recalled to my mind, how often we had amused ourselves with beating the hawthorn bushes for insects (so passionately fond were we of the study of natural history) and with tearing up the half-decayed bark of the old chesnut trees, to discover their retreats.

My reflections were broken by another knock at my bed-room door; Gaspard thought I was longer than usual, and that I had perhaps fallen asleep again. I was down stairs immediately. I found my dejected friend seated in the little parlour where I kept my books, and which served me for a study:—he had taken up a volume, and appeared to be perusing it. He rose as I entered the room, and with a languid smile which betrayed the anguish of mind under which he was labouring, accosted me in his native tongue with, "Ah! Monsieur, vous m'avez oublié avant que je suis parti," and put out his hand to me. After an interchange of some trifling and unimportant remarks, he resumed his seat, and took up the volume again; I perceived, however, that though his eyes were fixed upon it, yet his mind was otherwise occupied, and that he was in deep thought. I scarcely know how the time passed till breakfast;—it was painful to him, I fancied, for me to press conversation,—I was silent, therefore, and affected to be absorbed in thought myself, in order that he might indulge his reflections without interruption. We sat a considerable time over our coffee, though little if any thing was said by either of us;—at length breakfast was over, and as I pulled the bell for Gaspard to clear the table, my friend gave a deep sigh, got up, as I imagined with some slight amendment of spirits, and walked up to the little gothic window. The scene which met the eye from it was an extensive pasture-field, in which a great number of cows and sheep were grazing; on the opposite side, were groups of trees, amongst which, in the distance, were visible the chimnies, and part of the roof and gable-end of a small white cottage. He had not stood there many minutes, before he turned abruptly, paced hastily over the floor to the chair he had just quitted, and with another deep sigh threw himself into it;—I saw, poor fellow! that he was experiencing a severe conflict in his breast; his lip quivered; he said something in a broken accent which was scarcely audible,—at last he burst into tears.

Reader! thou wilt guess that the anguish of mind under which Montauban was labouring, proceeded from a cause much more powerful than that of separation from his friends.—Shall I tell it thee? The day was come when he was to bid farewell, for ever, to Julia Faulkner—to her whose image he had so long made an inmate of his bosom—and alas! eventually, only to be torn away!

She was the only daughter of a gentleman who had acquired a small independency, and had retired from the turmoils and anxieties of mercantile life. She had lost her mother when very young. Nature appeared to have been truly felicitous when she formed her. She was one of those beauties one sometimes chancas to meet, whose eyes do not dart glances of fire, but beam a mild refulgence—there was something so delicately soft about her—so gentle—so amiable, that one almost imagined her too pure and innocent for earth, and that to love her as a woman was verging on presumption; one gazed upon her as a being of celestial order, and was lost in admiration. The education she had received could not be called liberal—indeed, it was only simple; her acquirements were not splendid; and, in the glittering circle of fashionable life, she had seldom ventured, for she seemed to have little taste for its pleasures. Her ambition was only to attend to the comforts and ease of her dear father, and to shew him all the kind attentions and tender offices he once received from her regretted mother. Montauban met her by chance shortly after his arrival in England, at a friend's house where he occasionally visited. He was only too sensible of her irresistible charms—for on the first look he cast upon her, he experienced an emotion in his breast, to which till then he had been a stranger, and felt an unaccountable tremour steal over his whole frame. He had self-penetration enough, to be sensible, that to see Miss Faulkner again would be dangerous in the extreme; for there was a strong likelihood of its involving him in a passion, which, eventually, would plunge him into the deepest distress, and probably the object on whom he doated; as not the most faint hope of an union could be entertained, for in the course of a few months, or a year at the farthest, he would be under the necessity of returning to his native land, and of separating from every friend. For some weeks reason contended against the seducements of beauty and loveliness, but alas! these at last prevailed, and Montauban, my unhappy friend, Montauban, was weak enough to court an acquaintance with the unsuspecting Mr. Faulkner, to journey deliberately to the gulph of misery he had beheld at a distance, and to throw himself into it.

My friend sat with his handkerchief to his face, and leaned back in his chair. I went up to him, seized his arm, and strove to rouse him from the state of torpor into which he had sunk, using every intreaty for him not to give way so much to grief;—employing every argument which shews the folly of regretting that which is irreparable;—requesting him to make an effort to recover himself, and to strive to regain fortitude.—I pulled out my watch: it was time for us to proceed. It was agreed the evening previous, that after he had breakfasted with me, I should accompany him to Laurel Grove, the name of Mr. Faulkner's residence, and (having bade farewell to all his friends) that he should get into the London Mail from that place as it passed close by the house. We were soon in the road which led to Julia's. As we slowly walked along, I recollect his taking out his pocket-book, and shewing me a pretty sketch in pencil of Mr. Faulkner's neat little cottage and garden. Scarcely a sentence dropped from the lips of either of us now, till coming to a break in the trees, which presented a delightful view of the house, he stopped, and I fancied I saw something like a ray of happiness in his eyes;—some expressions of regret fell from him, and we went on. In a short time we reached the place of our destination. We knocked at the door and Mr. Faulkner himself opened it. We had been longer on the way than we supposed we had, and there were now but a few minutes for Montauban to bid farewell to Julia—to her father—to myself. We entered, and after some little interchange of civilities, Mr. F. poured out for each of us a glass of wine, at the same time expressing his sorrow at parting from one whom he esteemed so highly, and to whom, from the first interview, he had felt so much attached. Just as we were about to raise the glasses to our lips, Miss Faulkner entered.—She appeared more lovely, I thought, than I had ever seen her.—She was attired in a white morning gown, and wore a light and elegant cap, which was placed much backwards, displaying her fine forehead, and beautiful dark hair, which was parted in front, and hung in graceful negligence on each side of her face. There was a deep melancholy spread over her sweet countenance, which bespoke the painful emotions she was experiencing. From what I had seen before we set out, I was afraid Montauban's fortitude would entirely forsake him now, and that I should have to witness something which would operate still more strongly upon my feelings. Indeed my own fortitude was beginning to relax—to weaken. The idea that I should, most likely, never pass another hour with Montauban—with the only friend, I might almost say, I acknowledged, affected me much. I wished, earnestly wished, the trial was over, and felt an inclination to be the first to say "Farewell!"

The rattling of the coach soon roused me from my busy thought—we all got up—Montauban and Julia approached each other—he grasps her arm—she sinks upon his shoulder—both are drowned in tears: his livid quivering lips dart on her streaming cheek, and implant a hasty kiss upon it:—he rushes from her, while she falls senseless into her chair again—seizes the hands of Mr. Faulkner and myself, and in a voice stifled with agony, pronounces the relentless word, "Adieu," and we behold him no more.—

Reader! my friend's passion for Julia Faulkner was the first he had ever felt—it was his first love,—the one which so seldom is crowned with success, but which, on the contrary, commonly ends in disappointment. Alas! thought I, as I paced slowly and pensively home, why should the only pure and totally disinterested passion one ever knows, thus be blighted?—Surely it is too innocent—of too celestial a nature, for this fallen sphere: a tender flower which cannot live in our degenerate soil, but which perishes as soon as it has taken root.

"Ah me! for aught that ever I could read,
Could ever hear by tale or history;
The course of true love never did run smooth;
But either it was different in blood,
Or else misgranted in respect of years—
Or else it stood upon the choice of friends,
Or if there was a sympathy in choice
War, death, or sickness, did lay siege to it,
Making it momentary as a sound,
Swift as a shadow—short as any dream—
Brief as the lightning in the coldest night."

PHILOCRITO.

ODE.

Thou art my only joy, my greatest bliss,—
To his fair Juno spoke immortal Jove;
And seal'd his plaudit with a balmy kiss,—
The husband's kiss of fond confiding love:
Ask any boon, I swear by all divine,
By the stygian lake, it shall be thine.
Thou gav'st, she said, as soft her tender arms
Round his fair neck in dalliance entwined,—
Thou gav'st to woman beauty's heav'nly charms,
A gentle, sensible, and lovely mind.
The power to sooth man's eve, and bless his noon,
For woman then, I beg from thee this boon.
Yon nymph behold, array'd in simple vest,
Upon her cheek the smiles of virtue beam
In elegance are all her actions dress,
And in each look her excellence we deem:
Give thou, to the sweet daughters of thy earth,
This maid, that they may imitate her worth!
It shall be so, the awful ruler spoke,
Thy love for virtue, Juno, this attests;
Celestial music from the spheres awake,
Sweet as her voice who lives within our breasts.
Goddess, he cried, to earth thou must repair,
There shalt thou reign a pattern to the fair.
Beauty, immaculate, in power shall live,
And e'en deformity shall wear a charm;
Where thou, lov'd maid, thy matchless grace shalt give,
At thy bright presence age's heart shall warm.
Thy form shall be ador'd, while time shall be,
And man, fair nymph, shall call thee Modesty.

VIMTS TO BACHELORS.

To marry, or not to marry, has long been a question warmly debated in my mind; I am not by any means insensible to female charms; in fact, I have an unhappy propensity to fall in love with pretty faces and pleasing manners, which frequently occasions me no small share of uneasiness; but then I have also the misfortune to be prudent, and to possess a degree of foresight which generally dispels the illusion. When a sweet girl is accompanying herself on the piano, I hang over her entranced; but it often happens that a musical squabble with a fair rival, brings out notes from the charming songstress much nearer allied to discord than to harmony; and I begin to fear that she can scold, as well as sing. Then, when I am shown, as wonderful proofs of industry, card-racks, and hand-screens, and work-boxes, and piscushions, ingeniously constructed from the cheapest materials, I am apt to look at the 19 flosses, and straightway fall to calculating the probable amount of the milliner's bill I saw one once, and it has made me tremble ever since.

I wish I knew more of the characters of women, or less; the one perchance would induce me to relinquish all intention of ever becoming a Benedict; the other would precipitate me headlong into matrimony, and when once the deed was done I must make the best of it. Cool consideration often suggests very mortifying ideas on the subject.

I have amused myself by drawing up a list of essentials, which I do not see how I could diminish or retrench by a single iota. My wife must be active, but not bustling; she must blend liberality with economy, for meanness I detest, and extravagance would prove our mutual ruin; she must be blessed with a kind and yielding temper, yet possess sufficient spirit to controul her household, and support her dignity; she must be gifted with strong religious principles, or what could I hope for the morals of my children? She must be discreet, or I could not seek her counsel; well informed, or I could not make her my companion; and a perfect gentlewoman, or I should shrink from the intimacy of my friends. The catalogue ended, I ask myself on what personal excellence I presume to demand so many fine qualities in the woman who is to share my limited fortune, and bear with the infirmities of temper, which, not to make myself worse than the rest of my sex, are pretty equally distributed amongst the sons of Adam. And, even if heaven, in the abundance of its bounty, threw a creature, such as I have described, in my way, I know not that I could bring my stubborn heart to love, unless nature had blessed her with some share of beauty; or that even when thus adorned, I could reduce my ideas of the rent-roll, which I now think necessary for the annual expenditure of a family man, to the sum total of my income, without any addition on the part of the lady who was to be honoured with my hand. Ten thousand pounds have hitherto been the lowest price which my modesty could ever be persuaded to set on myself, as the portion of a wife, who brought beauty, virtue, and good-sense to boot. Any failure in these articles I consider it but fair to remedy by an additional bonus; and so rigorously have I fixed the imperfections of the weaker sex, that I have thought 50,000 pounds an inadequate remuneration for the burthen of any considerable defect.

Whether it is that girls of fortune have caught the infection from their male companions, I know not, but they seem to be pretty even with us in the extravagance of their pretensions, and require cent. per cent. for every pound they bring. Indeed, when a young man of my acquaintance very liberally offered to settle the whole of her property on an heirless, the lady replied that she was much obliged to him for his generosity, but, it being her own already, she should feel more flattered if he would present her with part of his estate: it is needless to add, that this mercenary feeling on her part broke off the match.

Under all these circumstances, I have begun to think my entrance into the holy pale rather a hopeless affair, and in order that we might see what sort of a life bachelors lead, I have lately availed myself of several invitations to their domiciles: my anxiety to learn the best modes of enlivening existence was of course confined to elderly bachelors; so long as youth remains, the free untrammelled spirit has undoubtedly the best of it: every door flies open: a party is divested of its attractions unless it can boast of single, unwrinkled beaux; quadrilles would be absolutely extinct without them, waltzing abandoned, and then what a zest they give to a round game, or a supper table! But a man must begin to look to his own home for solid enjoyments when he is easily lured out to eat in at a rubber of whist, carve a turkey, or escort some dozen of forlorn damsels to a public place.

My first visit was to M—s, who has long been ensconced in snug chambers in the Albany. Though I knew that I should meet with nothing but men, I leekily dressed myself in proper dinner costume, which I found was particularly acceptable to the neat habits of my host. Here at least, thought I, there seems to be no necessity for female aid, though I have been told it is indispensable for the preservation of cleanliness. The bars of the fire-grate were of polished steel, the iron of equal brilliance; not a thread or an atom of dust rested on any part of the furniture. One of the party having walked, left a slight foot print on the carpet as he entered. M—s, fidgeted a little, and then took up the hearth-brush, and cautiously removed the mark; as act of determined housewifery, which no gentleman in the valour of her zeal could have committed, and which I was even less prepared to see in a man. Politics, and the news of the day, engrossed our conversation; but as the hands of a chimney piece pointed to five minutes past six, M—s evinced tokens of the most fervent impatience. We were as yet only seven in number, and he told us that he made it a rule never to fill his table with more than eight persons, and he had also a particular aversion to sit down with less, it made a blank, and spoiled the look of every thing. He imagined all sorts of reasons for the detention of his friend P—s, but he could not find it in his heart to excuse his want of punctuality, and his omitting to send word if he should be ultimately prevented from joining the party, for half an hour's notice would have supplied the deficiency, and now Clarke, the usual hack on these occasions, would not be dressed, or gone to the club. Meanwhile, the cook despatched emissaries to inquire whether the dinner should be dashed; and the fear of having the good things spoiled, and the temerity with which he clung to the hope of still maintaining his favourite number, so completely discomfited him, that had not the tranquillity of his mind been restored by the arrival of the absentees, the harmony of his day would have been so completely ruined, as though he had possessed a contumacious termagant of a wife to disappoint all his hopes and wishes.

As I know that the first question which many persons ask on the return of a relative or a friend from a party is, "Well, what did they give you for dinner?" I make no apology for setting forth the dishes at M—s table, especially as the enumeration will develop a trait in his character.—A turbot, surrounded with fried soles, graced the top; multigawtewney soup, in the middle; at the bottom, a saddle of mutton; boiled fowls, a tongue, fricandeau of veal, and stewed giblets, constituted the corners. The fish was succeeded by a hashed olive's head; the soup, by a ham and beef; and the mutton, with a larded turkey. Then, every thing being cleared away, came woodcocks, lobster pie, a trifle, green apricots and wine, sour tarts, a lemon pudding, and German punch. The cookery was exquisite; and having warmly expressed my admiration, M—s said, with a glow of satisfaction on his face: "Stevens understands these things pretty well; I usually give a dinner once a fortnight; and as I am able to get the viands, which you have seen, all the year round, with the exception of the woodcocks, which may always be replaced by game, or small birds, I seldom make any alteration in my bill of fare, as I have observed that more mischief is occasioned by a vain attempt at constant variety, than by any other error in housekeeping. By this means Stevens has acquired a degree of skill in dressing particular dishes, which it would be hopeless to expect from a heterogeneous mixture continually changing; for in this art, as well as in all others, universal excellence in every branch is not to be obtained by a single individual; therefore, whenever I am desirous to introduce a new dish, I make Stevens operate on it when I have no company, until by slow degrees he has reached perfection, ascertained the exact quantity of every ingredient, and become so completely master of his subject, that failure is impossible, or as nearly so as the nature of human wisdom will allow. By keeping a sort of roster of my friends, I can take care to regulate my invitations, so that they shall all come in turn, and that the repetition of the same dinner shall not produce satiety.

I was somewhat diverted by the dissertation, which at least proved that in escaping the conjugal yoke, he had not been freed from all the troubles of the kitchen; the independence of a chop when he dined alone; and a dinner from a neighbouring hotel on company days, had not entered into his schemes. The education of half a dozen children could scarcely have been attended with greater trouble than he bestowed on the manufacture of a new soup, or a ragout; and though deeper heartaches might be occasioned by a spendthrift son, and an unruly daughter, I much question whether any thing short of moral turpitude in the conduct of his offspring, had he ever married, would have produced more vexation than a double dose of pepper administered by mistake, or any other fatal catastrophe befalling one of his favourite dishes at a party.

Not disposed to take a lesson from the final preciseness of my friend M—, I prepared to visit another bachelor acquaintance in Farnival's-inn, who I had some reason to believe lived in the true spirit of ease and freedom.—Museum.

TABLE-TATTLE.

OR OPINIONS OF MEN AND MATTERS.

TEMPER.—I know not whether it be not as honoring an act of humanity for a man to throw himself in between a good friend and the devil Temper, that haunts him as the foul fiend followed honest Launcelot, as it were to fling yourself into a river after a drowning wretch, or to step in with a preventing arm between a 'swashing blow' and its intended victim: and whether a man should not, when he observes an old companion laboring with an oppressive fullness of spleen, pick a feigned quarrel with him, (or if he is married, and of Othello's mind, to kiss his wife rather warmly in his presence; or if he is humane, even in the worst mood of his temper, to kick his dog; or if domestic and attached to particular situations and things, to take his arm-chair by the fire; or dispraise his wine which he is chary of, and praises for its antiquity; or do any thing which may contradict and fret him) and so serve, as the conductor to the lightning, to carry the fire of his temper harmlessly off. One may sometimes see men going about for hours in this storm-brewing state, unable to find something to vent themselves on; just as a storm-cloud traverses the sky, seeking to pick a quarrel with some brother cloud; at last it meets one, or perhaps elbows some giant of a mountain, and storms, and raves, and flashes forth its anger, weeps a bit as its passion spends, and then, its spleen being exhausted, walks quietly off about its business. And so it is with the clouds that darken the sky of the human mind, till they are so relieved.

CONSEQUENCE.—The common expression 'a person of consequence,' is, by implication, as severe a censure of the lord or the lady to whom it is applied, as one could wish to fall on pride or pretensions.

DEATH.—The debt of nature is one which all of us must pay; for though death sometimes consents to take it by instalments, he will have the sum total at last.

RICHES.—Riches and time are of a more relative value than is perceived: they are never ours but whilst we use them; yet men are ever hoarding up the first, and throwing away the latter. If indeed a man, with the parsimonious savings of his purse, could hoard up the hours of his youth, to expend when the hours of his age were run down to a moment between the mortality of life and the immortality of death, it were then not unwise to save a penny for something for the needful wants of these saved hours; but as no man can do this, to do the other is but providing for that to-morrow which may never come.

TRANSLATORS.—There are more qualities essential to a good translator than is usually counted in the catalogue of their effects. The best translators are the best poets. None others can greatly succeed; and therefore none others should be tolerated. Yet men who are not poets from their own genius, have undertaken to transmute the poetical genius of others. Hoole is one of the worst examples of this class; a man who never engendered an original line of poetry in his life. Fairfax is the only good instance of a man, who was not an original writer himself, becoming, by the depth and delicacy of his discernment, and his love and feeling for poetry, a fine and free translator of a native and noble poet. We may suppose of Fairfax that he might have produced an original work if he would; but he was better delighted to hear others sing, than to warble himself.

Kindred spirits alone should attempt to convey into other lands and speak through other tongues, the souls of superior geniuses. If Shakspeare had had Greek enough for the task, who ever lived, or is likely to live, that could be so fitted in all things else, for the translation of Sophocles and Euripides to the English stage? If Homer had been Latinised, who was so capable as Virgil? None but such men, I again repeat, should be interpreters to such minds. A Byron should translate a Dante, and a Moore an Anacreon, which happily for the merry old Teian and his admirers, the latter has done; but unhappily the noble poet is too independent in genius and circumstances to lend himself to the task. Let us, however, imagine Moore, instead of wisely knowing his own powers, and using them well, undertaking Dante; and nothing would seem more ludicrously ambitious, or promise a more certain failure. And yet men with less capacity for such a task have undertaken it, and have failed as they were sure to fail. How the last age could tolerate the Moration odouring of the Francisces and Creeches, men who were not poets in themselves, or when anticked out in the mask and visor of another, is one of those literary puzzles that astonish us, but which we feel no interest in making out. Horace has either never been translated, or he is not worth it. But he surely is worthy of an English second-birth; I will take the chirping old Herrick's word 'for a thousand' that he is; and if there is any man living who could translate him, it is that vivacious poet and thinker, Leigh Hunt, a man whom it is now become almost a literary damnation to mention, unless to censure him, but who is nevertheless a writer more qualified for the task than all the Creeches that ever lived and all the Francisces yet unborn. He must however be tied and tethered down to his text by a superintending judgment, for his own would otherwise run loose among modern matters and men.

COMPLAINTS OF LIFE.—Those who most complain of life are those who have made it disagreeable. Some men stuff their beds with the thorns of remorse, instead of the down of repose, and when they lie down on them, they roar with the agony they have wilfully inflicted on themselves. As reasonably might the ass complain of the thistles which wound his mouth, when he will persist in chewing them. Those who most feel the load of life complain the least of it.

It was a humorous rebuke that a really unfortunate man gave a more fortunate friend, who was complaining bitterly, with every abundance about him, of the misfortunes of life. 'There are a great many ups and downs in the world!' groaned the rich man. 'Not so many as there were,' interrupted the poor but merry humorist, 'since so many fairs have been suppressed.'

MINDS.—There are minds which have a natural antipathy to each other, as much as the flaunting vine has to that vulgar vegetable, the cabbage. Again, there are minds that without any apparent antipathy to one another, yet never can assimilate; you should as soon persuade oil and water to become one fluid, or subdue snow and fire into an insensibility to each other.

FOOLS.—Pay a foolish man the compliment of thinking him wise, and in the next minute he will let you learn that he considers you a fool.

There are some who are fools from an entire want of wit; and there are others who are fools from having too much wit.

PROMISERS.—If Performance, the steward, were half as punctual in payment as Lord Promise, his master, is generous in proffer, what a bounteous world would this be to live in! One of those emigrants from the Promised Land was repeating and enforcing again and again his wordy endeavours to persuade a poor man of genius how much he meant to serve him, when the poor wit, who knew too wisely the worth of words, interrupted him by requesting, 'Pray, Sir, write your promises in chalk round the crowns of my hat, or I shall forget them when I break it to-morrow.' The promiser was dumb, for he saw that he was understood.

CHARITY.—The second good in benevolent giving is, seeing that what you give is bestowed. Never entrust him to be the almoner of your charity who is not in himself charitable; it were as wise to despatch by the teeth of a hungry dog a mouthful for my 'Lady Brach' his mother: the odds are, that he would eat it himself.

POETS.—We may sometimes hear the vulgar ask 'of what use is a poet in this working world?' These are the men who, if they were listening to the singing of a nightingale, would regret that he was not a goose that they might eat him.

POVERTY.—The poverty which excites one man's spirit to a stronger exertion and a more daring enterprise, will put down another's; as the same wind that blows a spark into a blaze will blow out the feeble flame of an exhausted lamp.

KNOWLEDGE.—There are many things which it may improve our heads to know, and which make them wiser; but do not benefit our hearts, and make them happier.

PHYSICIANS.—It is no slander to say of some men who call themselves physicians, that they treat their patients as dry-salters do the pigs they intend for bacon,—they kill them, and so cure them.

THE MODESTY OF IMPUDENCE.—Two fellows of no common assurance were disputing with each other as to their relative shares, the one denying that he had half the impudence of the other: 'Pho, pho,' interrupted his colleague, 'you have, but your modesty will not allow you to confess it.'

VIRTUE.—It is somewhat strange that there are not more virtues than vices in this world; for there is no action, however vicious, which the actor will not, if possible, disguise, in the doing, in the robes and semblances of virtue,—an unwilling acknowledgment of the comeliness that there is even in the aspect of Virtue, which, one would think, might make her more fashionable. A young and likely fellow who had married an old and exceedingly ugly woman, for the sake, as it must be believed, of her fortune, which was the only handsome thing about her, on being twitted by his friends, who were demanding of him how he could think of marrying a woman who was old enough to call his mother a 'chit,' and ugly enough to keep Acco herself in countenance, replied, 'That indeed it might be true that his wife was ugly, but that he looked at the beauties of her heart, and not at those of her face.' It was happily suggested, that he should then get his wife to wear her heart where her face was.

VICE.—Whatever disgusts us at first in vice is not so disagreeable as it seems to be, but, like the most nauseous medicines, goes down glibly at last, though we make wry faces over it. Let us hear or see the thing that disgusts us twice or thrice, or oftener, and we shall find that there is a closer affinity in our antipathy to it than we wot of; and that the most coarse and ugly vice becomes 'fine by degrees, and beautifully less.'

SACRED MELODY.

— "Through God we shall do valiantly; for he it is that shall tread down our enemies."—PSALM LX. V. 12.

Rejoicing, oh God! we'll march onward with thee,
Secure 'neath the shade of thy wing;
We'll shout as before our enemies flee,
The praise of our heavenly King!

The glory which beams from thy mercy, O Lord!
Will shine like the clear morning's ray;
And though rugged and dark be our path, yet thy word
Will safely direct us the way.

With Charity's ensign, our banners unfurl'd,—
And Faith on our swords gleaming bright;
We'll joyfully march, the delight of the world,
The sons of a glorious fight!

The arrows of sin may unceasingly fly,
But they harm not the heart of the just,
'Fore thee, like a poor wither'd leaf they shall die,
And be mingled and trod in the dust! H. B. P.

HORÆ OTIOSÆ.—(No. II.)

(Written for the Iris.)

MONUMENTAL INSCRIPTIONS.

Friend, for thy epitaphs, I'm grieved. — POPE.

IT is a matter of regret, that the generality of epitaphs are better calculated to excite contempt, or elicit smiles, than to remind the reader of the certain decay of his body, and of the immortality of his soul. How often do we read epitaphs that border upon blasphemy; or, that are so ridiculously pompous as to create an utter abhorrence for the persons who wrote them. The monumental inscription placed over the remains of the unfortunate Rousseau, is much more worthy imitation than that on the tomb of Nelson. In my opinion, an epitaph should contain little more than the name and age of the departed; yet, we frequently find them to consist of more than a hundred lines. The daisy and primrose which bloom on the mound of green earth over the poor peasant's remains, is much more elegant, than the studied panegyric inscribed on the tomb of a nobleman, who lived and died an enemy to himself, to mankind, and to his God. He that died without atoning for the sins of this world, will have ample cause to regret he cannot die again; and will find that neither a leaden coffin, nor the most costly monument, can shield him from the wrath of a sin-avenging God. Some men have been so extremely foolish, as to leave particular directions for their funeral ceremonies and epitaphs; while many of the best and wisest of men, have studiously declined every species of pomp and ceremony. Pope wished that no monument might be erected to perpetuate his memory; and Sir William Temple, though he was conscious his body would be interred in Westminster Abbey, desired his friends to enclose his heart in a silver casket, and place it under the sun-dial in his own garden. The amiable custom of planting shrubs and ever-greens, on the graves of beloved friends, cannot be too much encouraged. Though their relics lie mouldering in the dust, their virtues are cherished in the breast; and who can blame a son for paying respect to the shade of a beloved father, or a father for raising some fond memorial to perpetuate the virtues of children, who during their lives, were dearer to him than every other terrestrial blessing?

The affectionate custom of planting violets, roses, and other sweet-scented flowers on graves, still prevails in China. The tomb of Anacreon was planted round with ivy and flowerets.

"This tomb be thine, Anacreon: all around
Let ivy wreath, let flowerets deck the ground,
And from its earth, enrich'd with such a prize,
Let wells of milk, and streams of wine arise;
So will thine ashes, yet a pleasure know,
If any pleasure reach the shades below."

That there are many good epitaphs in our language, is a fact that few persons will deny; but surely no attentive observer can have missed seeing many, both in the town and country church-yards, that are a disgrace to national taste. What step, then, should be taken in order to render our church-yards more interesting and instructive? This improvement must entirely depend on the ability and good will of our clergymen, one part of whose duty, ought to consist in examining all monumental inscriptions previous to their admission into the church-yards.—If this plan were put into execution, we should no longer read the same lines over a dozen graves; and the manly and pathetic inscriptions would no longer be neglected, for the punning and epigrammatic.

JOHANNES.

FROM MY MEMORANDUM-BOOK.

There is something feelingly sublime in the funeral service of our Church, a genuine and striking simplicity which cannot fail to impress on the mind the dreadful truth that we must soon depart to 'the House appointed for all living.'

From my childhood I always felt a sensation of delight when reading it, and never was there a funeral at our parish church which I did not attend. Unlike other boys of the same age. I would wander through the silent cemeteries; and, accompanied only by a bosom friend of my own standing, cull the various epitaphs which are found in such variety and abundance in country church-yards.

Conversing at times with the old sexton as he dug the grave of some poor wanderer, I learnt the characters of our neighbours, who gradually sunk away; and many were the strange histories he related to us. Frank, for that was the name of my friend, and who, always being provided with a memorandum-book in his pocket, never failed to note down the words, as our historian recounted the actions of his old acquaintance.

That book is now in my possession; it was the last bequest of a valued and departed friend. I have heard the earth sound on his coffin lid, I have paid the last tribute that friendship requires, and have dropped a tear on the cold grave of him whom I shall see no more. When the words 'dust to dust' were pronounced over his remains, a solitary tear started from the eye of the old sexton, and with a tremulous hand he cast the little mound upon the coffin—yes! that eye which had witnessed without emotion the burial of hundreds, was suffused with tears ere the service was completed;—but he is gone, snatched in the prime of life from one of the fairest prospects mortal could look forward to, blessed with relatives, and crowned with wealth and happiness! We had many a time painted to ourselves the days of years to come, when connected by every tie of friendship we should lead lives untroubled by any cares, and unconcerned at the mighty deeds of heroes, and changes in principalities and empires. But to men futurity is so dark, that they draw veils which shall perhaps never be realized, and look to future years, little thinking that long ere they arrive the sand of life may be run out, and the speculators be accounted amongst the dead. But let me leave such dark, such disheartening scenes, and proceed to my task, a task which, though it raises bitter feelings of grief for a deceased friend, yet recalls many pleasing recollections of past times.

It will be perceived that the narratives are totally ungarlished; nay, even some of them are written in that simple style of language in which the aged reciter told them. Some few I have myself added, and it has been my pride to continue the volume.

I am just returned from a ramble in K. B. church-yard, the scene of many of my solitary wanderings: never did I find a place more congenial to sorrow, than this last home of humanity. The towering elms which surround it form a protection from the nipping blast, and they also lend their aid to the cooling breezes of summer. Numerous, and great in variety, are the stones which grace the yard, and tell of days and years that once were, and of beings who then flattered in all the gayety of fashionable life; but those days are past, and another age has risen, also soon to elapse, when a future generation shall tread over their fathers; and, perhaps on my very tomb, make similar reflections to those which now flit across my brain!

Beneath a towering elm, surrounded by iron palisades, which are almost hid with the creeping woodbine and fragrant rose tree, the wanderer is struck by a plain marble slab, with this inscription:

To the memory of a daughter—a sister—and a Christian—this stone is placed by a grieved family.

The simplicity and singularity struck me forcibly, and I inquired of every one who passed through the yard the name of the deceased, but my inquiries were fruitless, and I spent many hours in vain endeavours to satisfy my curiosity, and at length determined to pursue my researches on the following day.

As I approached the church, I heard the passing bell toll solemnly. To me there appeared more melancholy than usual in its sound, it reverberated longer in my ear, and pealed more suddenly. The slab was removed from its place, and, beneath where it yesterday rested, yawned the gaping grave; but before I had time to reflect on the change, the funeral chant, borne from the distance on the gentle breeze, aroused my thoughts to the passing scene of woe. Gradually the procession moved along the winding avenue, and the notes of the choir became more distinct till it approached the door of the church, when the tones of the organ, from within, joined the funeral note, and ushered the mournful group into the church.

Melancholy and sad was this scene; there was the tender husband leaning over the remains of a lost partner, and a young family bewailing the loss of their affectionate parent. Loud and heart-rending were the sobs of the old man, and with tottering steps he followed to the grave his beloved wife.

Never did I witness such a moving scene; happy indeed was I when it terminated, and the last farewell was sobbed over the grave. I remained, but it was some time before I could speak, so full was my heart with the scene I had just witnessed. I inquired of the sexton, 'that aged chronicle,' the name of the deceased; it was a name that I well remembered, I had heard a tale of woe attached to it, a tale which is so far impressed on my memory that I will relate it for my friend.

In the pleasant town of resided a family of the first respectability; happy in their own circle, and blessed with all the conveniences and comforts of life. Out of four children there were two daughters, who seemed to vie with each other in beauty; but a heavy languor about the eyes, in a great degree detracted from the perfections of the elder: of a reserved and studious turn of mind, she seldom left the house, and whilst her younger sister would ramble over the towering orags, and pull the heath from the rising hills, she would retire to her chamber, and there pore over the relics of antiquity, and cull the musty volumes of departed centuries: gradually the colour forsook her cheeks, and her mind became confused, amongst the many traditionary tales she read, her fancy carried her to regions which never existed, and her intellect seemed to waver as she joined the ring round the fire. There would she sit, for she was her mother's favourite, with her head reclining on her bosom, apparently insensible to the cheerful conversation of her father, or the singular tales which her brothers picked up amongst the superstitious peasantry, and which they daily retailed for their parents' amusement.

It was at that season of the year in which Nature appears exuberant, and the powerful heat of a summer's sun drives all creatures to the cool shade and refreshing stream, that strangers visited the town of D. . . . to enjoy the wild sea air, and reinvigorate themselves by bathing. Amongst the number, which then flocked in additional and increased proportions, was Edward S., a young man whose features shewed to the most trivial observer that the cause of his visiting the sea side was more serious than that of the generality of those who surrounded him. His countenance, which was by no means without expression when lighted up by a smile, in general was depressed, and his demeanor was steady and melancholy. You might read depicted on his face that his earthly pilgrimage was fast drawing to a close, and that the curtain of life was dropping, but his views were extended to another state of being, his hopes were rested on God.

He would wander solitary and alone amongst the neighbouring groves, and whisper to the evening breezes his woes. Sometimes in these rambles would he meet Eliza (for that was the name of the elder sister) pursuing with thoughtful attention a work which would engage her so intensely as to remove her observation from all other objects.

The scene of many of his lonely wanderings was a long avenue of trees, about two miles from the town, which led to a delightful valley, down a gentle declivity. At the foot of this slope was a smooth and meandering rivulet, babbling its low notes to the music of the waving trees. Through the various openings of the grove might be seen the village church rearing, in modest simplicity, its ancient tower, covered with parent ivy, and forming a pleasant break to the rich and luxuriant landscape. Eliza seemed alike to frequent this charing walk, and to delight in the surrounding scenery, gazing, as the cattle frisked their innocent gambols over the adjoining lawn, seemingly spell bound. There is indeed nothing more grateful to the religious mind, than to see one of Nature's loveliest works contemplating the productions of the Creator which cover this vast theatre, and drawing from them a lesson which Nature alone can teach.

It was here that Edward first attracted her attention on the close of one of the hottest days of summer, when after the scorching sun has run its course, the evening air fans with its cooling breezes the parched earth. They were both seated, and though at some distance, yet in sight of each other, when a low and melancholy bleating called their attention to an adjoining field; Edward, with all the alacrity of youthful ardor, immediately cleared the hedge which separated them, and with little difficulty extricated a young lamb from the thorny brambles in which its fleece had got entangled. He soon regained his seat, and, as he darted past the reclining figure of Eliza, his eyes caught her's, in which he read her approving smile, and heard her lips mutter an observation of gratitude.

Having introductions to several gentlemen who resided in the neighbourhood, his time was chiefly spent amongst them, and, by these means, his acquaintance increased rapidly. The first opportunity that was afforded him of speaking to Eliza was at the house of her uncle, at which he was a constant and welcome guest. And here that attachment was formed, which though honorable in every motive, was yet productive in the end of real misfortune. From their frequent meetings, and the marked attention he always paid Eliza, her father drew conclusions, and doubted not but that with such dispositions, an union would be sought, and to which he could never give his sanction. Of a proud and overbearing spirit, he had laid a particular injunction upon his family to remember that the blood of Scotland's kings ran in their veins, and warned them never to mix it with that of any of the plebeian race.

(To be concluded in our next.)

TO ———, THIRTEEN YEARS OF AGE.

Thy smiles, thy talk, thy aimless plays,
So beautiful approve thee,
So winning, light, are all thy ways,
I cannot choose but love thee:
Thy balmy breath upon my brow
Is like the summer air,
As o'er my cheek thou leapest now
To plant a soft kiss there.

Thy steps are dancing toward the bound
Between the child and woman;
And thoughts and feelings more profound,
And other years are coming;
And thou shalt be more deeply fair,
More precious to the heart;
But never can'st thou be again,
That lovely thing thou art!

And youth shall pass, with all the brood
Of fancy-fed affection;
And care shall come with womanhood,
And waken cold reflection:
Thou'lt learn to toil, and watch, and weep,
O'er pleasures unreturning,
Like one who wakes from pleasant sleep
Unto the cares of morning.

Nay, say not so! nor cloud the sun
Of joyous expectation,
Ordain'd to bless the little one,
The freshling of creation!
Nor doubt that He, who now doth feed
Her early lamp with gladness,
Will be her present help in need,
Her comforter in sadness.

Smile on, then, little winsome thing!
All rich in nature's treasure,
Thou hast within thy heart a spring
Of self-renewing pleasure.
Smile on, fair child, and take thy fill
Of mirth, till time shall end it;
Thy nature's wise and gentle will,
And who shall reprehend it?

FOR THE BIRTH-DAY OF MR. T— B— R—.

As when hope's visions o'er the senses steal,
And, of the future, brightest scenes reveal—
So be this day—and be each hour possess'd,
With choicest pleasure as supremely blest.

THE FRIEND.—(No. I.)

'Amicus verus est magnus thesaurus.'

I am an old man. Yet, let not my readers imagine that this confession implies an incapacity for the office I have assumed. Youth is the season when spirits are buoyant, and when the chase of pleasure is an engagement uninterruptedly pursued. When indiscretion, folly, and weakness, are often productive of many sorrows, dangers, and troubles; and when the voice of reason, the suggestions of prudence, and the dictates of conscience, are but seldom regarded, and, if listened to, often, very often disobeyed. But age has generally for its concomitants, wisdom, prudence, and circumspection: it lessens desire of enjoyment, weakens the rebellious passions of the soul, and excites a reverence for religion and every hallowed feeling, and an ardent wish to taste of the real and unalloyed happiness of which it is the unfailing source. Seldom is the man who bears many winters on his back, a libertine either in principle or practice. The young man often in both. He, therefore, who has lived to a good old age, may, I hope, presume to give advice, may endeavour to shew the necessity of curbing the vicious propensities, and may seek to afford amusement by interesting the passions, pleasing the imagination, and informing the mind, without fear of being censured as officious, or condemned as an enemy to regulated pleasures. 'The Friend' is neither of an intermeddling, morose, nor gloomy disposition. His temperament is the very reverse. He wishes not to preach up total abstinence in any respect whatever. His principal object is 'to hold as 'twere the mirror up to nature,' to show virtue her own loveliness, vice its own deformity; to extol the observance of, and a due regard for, the one, and to deprecate and stigmatise the practice of the other. Let not my readers, however, conceive the idea, that I am ignorant of the importance of the task I have voluntarily undertaken. I know, indeed, that many with motives equally good and laudable as my own, and with exertions as indefatigable and unremitting as any I can manifest, have failed in their endeavours to promote the well-being, and to contribute to the happiness of their fellow-creatures, in the various characters of Observer, Guardian, Moralizer, Scrutineer, &c. And in order that my hope of success may be less liable to bitter disappointment, I invite, I earnestly solicit all who have feeling hearts, that can rejoice in the prosperity of man, to assist me in the cause I have espoused, to add by their essays, &c. to the interest 'The Friend' would excite, in order that his directions to ensure permanent comfort here, and bliss unutterable hereafter, may be deliberately and impartially considered; and that when found after examination to be wise and prudent, they may be strictly obeyed. My readers, however, must not suppose that my lucubrations will be wholly confined to subjects of serious moment. No:—it is the wish of 'The Friend' to offend not even the most fastidious of his readers. He is desirous to conform to the taste of every one by turns.—Perhaps his motto might be

'Du grave au doux, du plaisant au sévère.'

'From subjects grave, to airy ones he turns.'

I have, now, I hope, said enough to make myself known to those who will do me the honour of perusal, and as I do not wish to trespass beyond the limits of the Iris, I shall reserve all further remarks on this subject for No. 2 of 'The Friend,' which will contain a fuller explanation of my designs, &c. In the interim to all and each of my readers, 'a fair good night.'

IRON MINES IN SWEDEN.

(From Travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa.
By E. D. Clarke, LL.D.)

For grandeur of effect, filling the mind of the spectator with a degree of wonder which amounts to awe, there is no place where human labour is exhibited under circumstances more tremendously striking. As we drew near to the wide and open abyss, a vast and sudden prospect of yawning caverns and of prodigious machinery prepared us for the descent. We approached the edge of the dreadful gulph whence the ore is raised, and ventured to look down; standing on the verge of a sort of platform, constructed over it in such a manner as to command a view into the great opening as far as the eye could penetrate amidst its gloomy depths: for, to the sight, it is bottomless. Immense buckets, suspended by rattling chains, were passing up and down: and we could perceive ladders scaling all the inward precipices; on which the work-people, reduced by their distance to pigmies in size, were ascending and descending. Far below the utmost of these figures, a deep and gaping gulph, the mouth of the lowermost pits, was, by its darkness, rendered impervious to the view. From the spot where we stood, down to the place where the buckets are filled, the distance might be about 75 fathoms; and as soon as any of these buckets emerged from the gloomy cavity we have mentioned, or until they entered into it in their descent, they were visible; but below this point they were hid in darkness. The clanking of the chains, the groaning of the pumps, the halloving of the miners, the creaking of the blocks and wheels, the trampling of horses, the beating of the hammers, and the loud and frequent subterraneous thunder from the blasting of the rocks by gunpowder, in the midst of all this scene of excavation and uproar, produced an effect which no stranger can behold unmoved. We descended with two of the miners, and our interpreter, into this abyss. The ladders, instead of being placed like those in our Cornish mines, on a series of platforms as so many landing-places, are lashed together in one unbroken line, extending many fathoms; and being warped to suit the inclination or curvature of the sides of the precipices, they are not always perpendicular, but hang over in such a manner, that even if a person held fast by his hands, and if his feet should happen to slip, they would fly off from the rock, and leave him suspended over the gulph. Yet such ladders are the only means of access to the works below; and as the labourers are not accustomed to receive strangers, they neither use the precautions, nor offer the assistance, usually afforded in more frequented mines. In the principle tin-mines of Cornwall, the staves of the ladders are alternate bars of wood and iron: here they were of wood only, and in some parts rotten and broken, making us often wish during our descent, that we had never undertaken an exploit so hazardous. In addition to the danger to be apprehended from the damaged state of the ladders, the staves were covered with ice or mud; and thus rendered so cold and slippery, that we could have no dependence on our benumbed fingers, if our feet failed us. Then, to complete our apprehensions, as we mentioned this to the miners, they said,—'Have a care! It was just so, talking about the staves, that one of our women fell, about four years ago, as she was descending to her work.' 'Fell!' said our Swedish interpreter, rather simple; 'and pray what became of her?' 'Became of her!' continued the foremost of our guides, disengaging one of his hands from the ladder, and slapping it forcibly against his thigh, as if to illustrate the manner of the catastrophe,—'she became (pankaka) a pancake.'

As we descended farther from the surface, large masses of ice appeared, covering the sides of the precipices. Ice is raised in the buckets with the ore and rubble of the mine: it has also accumulated in such quantity in some of the lower chambers, that there are places where

It is 16 fathoms thick, and no change of temperature above prevents its increase. This seems to militate against a notion now becoming prevalent, that the temperature of the air in mines increases directly as the depth from the surface, owing to the increasing temperature of the earth under the same circumstances and in the same ratio; but it is explained by the width of this aperture at the mouth of the mine, which admits a free passage of atmospheric air. In our Cornish mines, ice would not be preserved in a solid state at any considerable depth from the surface.

After much fatigue, and no small share of apprehension, we at length reached the bottom of the mine. Here we had no sooner arrived than our conductors, taking each of us by an arm, hurried us along, through regions of 'thick-ribbed ice' and darkness, into a vaulted level, through which we were to pass into the principal chamber of the mine. The noise of countless hammers, all in vehement action, increased as we crept along this level; until at length, subduing every other sound, we could no longer hear each other speak, notwithstanding our utmost efforts. At this moment we were ushered into a prodigious cavern, whence the sounds proceeded; and here, amidst falling waters, tumbling rocks, steam, ice, and gunpowder, about 50 miners were in the very height of their employment. The magnitude of the cavern, over all parts of which their labours were going on, was alone sufficient to prove that the iron ore is not deposited in veins, but in beds. Above, below, on every side, and in every nook of this fearful dungeon, glimmering tapers disclosed the grim and anxious countenances of the miners. They were now driving bolts of iron into the rocks, to bore cavities for the gunpowder, for blasting. Scarcely had we recovered from the stupefaction occasioned by our first introduction into this Pandemonium, when we beheld close to us, hags more horrible than perhaps it is possible for any other female figures to exhibit, holding their dim quivering tapers to our faces, and bellowing in our ears. One of the same sisterhood, snatched a lighted splinter of deal, darted to the spot where we stood, with eyes inflamed and distilling rheum, her hair clotted with mud, dugs naked and pendulous; and such a face, and such hideous yells, as it is impossible to describe:—

Black it stood, as Night—Fierce as ten Furies—
Terrible as hell—

If we could have heard what she said, we should not have comprehended a syllable: but as several other Paras, equally Gorgonian in their aspect, passed swiftly by us, hastening tumultuously towards the entrance, we began to perceive, that if we remained longer in our present situation, Atropos might indeed cut short the threads of our existence; for the noise of the hammers had now ceased, and a tremendous blast was near the point of its explosion. We had scarcely retraced with all speed our steps along the level, and were beginning to ascend the ladders, when the full volume of the thunder reached us, as if roaring with greater vehemence because pent amongst the crashing rocks, whence, being reverberated over all the mine, it seemed to shake the earth itself with its terrible vibrations.

ON SENSIBILITY.

Sensibility I conceive to be an acute feeling (as it relates to the mental faculties) of either joy or sorrow, in the same manner as (when applied to the animal functions) of pain or pleasure. Hence the reason that people of sensibility are generally either the most happy, or the most miserable of their species. Many apply this feeling both to modesty and bashfulness, and I am inclined to think that it is the origin of both. Though sensibility is here taken in a mental view, yet it has, even in this case, a very powerful connection with the animal system. Thus bashfulness is accounted for by that timid sensibility of nerve which shrinks from the touch of publicity, hides itself from the glare of observation, and delights to shut itself up in the shade of obscurity.—Modesty too, from the peculiar sensibility of its nature, shuns the fulsome adulation of flattery, retires from the loud echoes of fame, and rushes with indignation from the presence of indecency. A sensitive mind is according to circumstances, either a great blessing or evil to its possessor—it enhances every joy, and aggravates every misery—it lifts us at one moment to extatic bliss, and plunges us in the next into the utmost depths of despair.—It is so acute in its operations, that whether it leads to excess of joy or sorrow, it leaves the frame, languid, nervous, and emaciated. It is too refined to confine itself to our corporeal pains and pleasures, and insidiously entwines itself with those of the mind. Sensibility of soul, is, in a word, the beatific angel of felicity, or the diabolic demon of despair:—When allied to sympathy, it is directly opposed to selfishness—creates a participation in the feelings of others, and adds to, or diminishes our joys accordingly as those feelings are actuated. Many imagine that sensibility cannot exist without sympathy; but I conceive that there is a morbid kind, which is alive only to self, and which has no connection whatever with a reciprocal feeling for others. Thus many will bewail for years, nay, sometimes for life, the death of a favourite child, whilst they can view with the calmest indifference, the most aggravated miseries of the poor, or the heart-rending horrors of war; and can listen with unconcern to the horrible details of calamity, by fire, shipwreck, pestilence, or massacre!—To such I would say,

"Hence to the shades of hell! nor dare pollute
This earth with your ignoble, selfish thoughts—
Hence to where Demons reign—where ye shall find
No sympathetic soul to share your griefs,
Nor animate your joys: if such there are
In yonder dark and damnable abodes."

But when sensibility is united with sympathy, it becomes one of the most amiable feelings that influence the human breast—it creates and promotes charity in the most extensive sense of the word; in fact, rises superior to the grosser feelings of common humanity, and becomes almost a divine sensation.—What can be more amiable, (I had almost said what can be more heavenly-minded) than to sympathize with the sorrows of others.

"Then child of misfortune, come blither,

to administer comfort in their distresses, and to soften their griefs? What, I say, can be more amiable than to prevent a renewal of their sorrows, by all those tender attentions, and affectionate duties, which win upon and bring the soul back to itself? And what more delightful than to inspire them with fortitude, and enable them to bear up against all the miseries and distresses with which they are encompassed? Speak ye, whose hard unfeeling hearts ne'er felt the force of sympathy, or the soft blandishments of pity—say, can ye find a joy to equal these? Sensibility increases the delights of both love and friendship, and, I am inclined to doubt whether a person can feel either, without first possessing it. A truly sympathetic, sensitive mind, must be capable of the most refined love, and heroic friendship, and, by such a mind alone can these two feelings be properly appreciated.

Almost every man has naturally a small share of sensibility, yet it must be increased, and persons of a cultivated taste and understanding, generally acquire and possess the greatest portion. It is this superior degree which makes them capable of enjoying more happiness, than persons who are not possessed of it so eminently, for the quickness of preception, (of which it is the source,) causes them to find pleasure in pursuits which others cannot comprehend, and consequently are unable to estimate.—Were a man to be deprived of it, its absence would involve that of all the virtues and noble feelings to which it gives rise, and would have him in a state little removed from the brute creation. In fine—sensibility gives life to love, friendship, charity, or benevolence, and all the domestic virtues—adds a zest to our religious duties, and, inspiring us with the most noble and grateful feelings towards the creator of worlds, and of systems, lifts up our souls from earthly joys, to the most heavenly and extatic delights.

MEETING OF THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH ARMIES IN SPAIN.

(From Recollections of the Peninsula.)

Two hours before break of day, the line was under arms; but the two hours glided by rapidly and silently. At last, just as the day dawned, a few distant shots were heard on our left, and were soon followed by the discharge of cannon, and the quick, heavy, and continued roll of musquetry. We received orders to move, and support the troops attacked: the whole of Hill's corps, amounting to fourteen thousand men, was thrown into open column, and moved to its left in steady double quick time, and in the highest order.

When within about a furlong of one of the points of attack, from which the enemy was just then driven by the seventy-fourth regiment, I cast my eye back to see if I could discover the rear of our divisions: eleven thousand men were following: all in sight, all in open column, all rapidly advancing in double quick time. No one, but a soldier, can picture to himself such a sight: and it is, even for him, a rare and grand one. It certainly must have had a very strong effect on such of the enemy as, from the summit of the ridge, which they had most intrepidly ascended, beheld it, and who, ignorant of Hill's presence, thought they had been attacking the extreme of the British right. We were halted exactly in rear of that spot, from which the seventy-fourth regiment, having just repulsed a column, was retiring in line, with the most beautiful regularity, its colours all torn with shot. Here a few shells flew harmlessly over our line, but we had not the honour of being engaged. The first wounded man I ever beheld in the field was carried past me, at this moment: he was a fine young Englishman, in the Portuguese service, and lay helplessly in a blanket, with both his legs shattered by cannon-shot. He looked pale, and big drops of perspiration stood on his manly forehead: but he spoke not—his agony appeared unutterable. I secretly wished him death; a mercy, I believe, that was not very long withheld. About this time Lord Wellington, with a numerous staff, galloped up, and delivered his orders to General Hill, immediately in front of our corps; I therefore distinctly overheard him. 'If they attempt this point again, Hill, you will give them a volley, and charge beyond it; but don't let your people follow them too far down the hill.' I was particularly struck with the style of this order, so decided, so manly, and breathing no doubt as to the repulse of any attack; it confirmed confidence. Lord Wellington's simplicity of manner in the delivery of orders, and in command, is quite that of an able man. He has nothing of the truncheon about him; nothing full-mouthed, important, or fussy: his orders on the field are all short, quick, clear, and to the purpose. The French, however, never moved as throughout the day: their two desperate assaults had been successfully repelled, and their loss, as compared to ours, exceedingly severe. From the ridge, in front of our present ground, we could see them far better than the evening before: arms, appointments, uniforms, were all distinguishable. They occupied themselves in removing their wounded from the foot of our position; but as some of their troops broke up, it was generally concluded that they would renew their attacks on the morrow.

In the course of the day our men went down to a small brook, which flowed between the opposing armies, for water; and French and English soldiers might be seen drinking out of the same narrow stream, and even leaning over to shake hands with each other. One private, of my own regiment, actually exchanged forage-caps with a soldier of the enemy, as a token of regard and good-will. Such courtesies, if they do not disguise, at least soften the horrid features of war: and it is thus we learn to reconcile our minds to scenes of blood and carnage. Towards sun-set, our pickets were sent down the hill, and I plainly saw them posted among the corpses of those who had fallen in the morning. Nothing, however, immediately near us, presented the idea of recent slaughter; for the loss, on our side, was so partial, and considering the extent of our line, so trifling, that there was little, if any, vestige of it: not so the enemy's; but as they suffered principally on their retreat down the hill, their slain lay towards the bottom of it; from whence, indeed, they had been removing their wounded.

The view of the enemy's camp by night far exceeded in grandeur its imposing aspect by day. Innumerable and brilliant fires illuminated all the country spread below us: while they yet flamed brightly, the shadowy figures of men and horses, and the glittering piles of arms, were all visible. Here and there, indeed, the view was interrupted by a few dark patches of black fir, which by a gloomy contrast, heightened the effect of the picture; but, long after the flames expired, the red embers still emitted the most rich and glowing rays, and seemed, like stars, to gem the dark bosom of the earth, conveying the sublime idea of a firmament spread beneath our feet. It was long before I could tear myself from the contemplation of this scene. Earnestly did I gaze on it: deeply did it impress me; and my professional life may never, perhaps, again present to me any military spectacle more truly magnificent. Every one was fully persuaded that the morning would bring with it a general and bloody engagement.

The battle-array of a large army is a most noble and imposing sight. To see the hostile lines and columns formed, and prepared for action; to observe their generals and mounted officers riding smartly from point to point, and to mark every now and then, one of their guns opening on your own staff, reconnoitring them, is a scene very animating, and a fine prelude to a general engagement. On your own side, too, the hammering of flints and loosening of cartridges; the rattle of guns and tumbrils, as they come careering up to take their appointed stations; and the swift galloping of aid-de-camps in every direction, here bringing reports to their generals, there conveying orders to the attacking columns, all speak of peril and death, but also of anticipated victory; and so obsoberingly, that a sensation of proud hope swells the bosom, which is equal, if not superior, to the feeling of exultation in the secure moment of pursuit and triumph.

LINES TO ZOE.

When e'er my brow steals sorrow's deepening shroud,
Oh bid me not the darker cause reveal;
Not for the wealth of worlds would I o'ercloud
Thy young clear spirit with the woes I feel!
It is not meet thine early years should share
The painful knowledge Time must render thine;
Yet Heaven avers that even Time should e'er
Instruct thy soul as fatally as mine!
No! be thou still the light of this fond soul,
Whose life in joy or grief thou still must be;
Then, e'en if Woe my destiny controul,
I still may hope—I yet may smile—in thee!
Not all forlorn the wither'd tree is seen,
O'er which the ivy has its mantle thrown;
And many an eye mistakes the clustering green
That veils the leafless branches, for their own.
Ah, if thy light of gladness should depart,
If Hope no more in those dear eyes should shine,
How could I live!—This much-enduring heart
Bears its own sorrows—but must break with thine.

A REVERIE.

I often in wand'ring away from my home,
Think of the days that are yet to come;
I think of those who in future years,
Will walk through this vale of sorrow and tears;
Who will dwell on the spot where now I tread,
Long after
I think of the people who now are on earth;
I think how little their lives are worth;
When a few short years they must all be laid
Beneath the gloom of the cypress shade;
What will their glory or honours avail,
Or the sadness of those who their loss bewail,
Who stand o'er the graves of departed friends,
Where the glory of life and its misery ends!
I list to the sound of the ocean's roar,
Leaving the beach of the western shore;
I list to the shriek of the sea bird wild,
Like a mother lamenting her only child,
I turn to my home and think of the day,
When all earthly things must pass away. E. P. C.

THE CABINET.

DEVOTIONAL FEELINGS.—The words of your admirable discourse, my dear friend, upon the awful subject of death, so suitable to this time of sickness, and so peculiarly applicable to my own case, have left an impression on my mind, that, were I destined to reach the utmost limit of my existence, never would leave me. On this occasion outward objects also contributed their most powerful aid to heighten my feelings; for as I approached the church under a thick, dark-clouded sky, and caught the first view of that venerable and stupendous pile, with the light issuing from its windows of rich-wrought fairy work of stone, the effect was striking; but when for the first time I had ever entered it at the hour of darkness, and found it illuminated with a brilliant blaze of light, which lost itself in the spell-bound vaulted roof—when there opened upon my sight thousands of my fellow-creatures, thronged together for the solemn purpose of offering the accumulated incense of the most fervent devotion to that God who knows every aspiration of the heart, I felt as if enveloped in the effulgence of the divine Shekinah—and when the slow solemn peal of the organ swelled upon the ear, and the choir sang the songs of praise with the mellowed sweetness, the captivating softness and solemnity which the stillness of night conspired to render more enchanting, the effect was most imposing. It was only then that I felt the full force and value of those outward associations, as calculated to inspire awe, and perceived how powerfully they tended to chain down the wandering senses to the exclusive act of profound devotion. As I walked down the aisle, supported by these earthly blessings, these ministering angels—and here he threw a glance of such soft affection upon his daughters as drew forth crystal streams of tears—'Methought I was already entering a paradise of joy; sickness forsook me—respiration became easy—the film was removed from my sight; I breathed nothing earthly, and heaven seemed opened to my view. I listened with a rapture surpassing all former experience, when you so feelingly aroused the reflection of those around you to the momentous consideration of death and eternity. The words which I heard scarcely seemed the address of uninspired man—I was struck as with the voice and language of an Apostle—of a special messenger from on high, who conveyed the solemn admonitions to my heart. Yes; I felt it to have been the unequivocal summons, the last warning that will ever here be vouchsafed to me; and I left the holy temple with the strong conviction, unaccompanied by any sort of fear, that my next entrance into its sacred walls would be when I should be carried thither for my burial.'—Body and Soul.

The following beautiful verses are from the same edifying and very interesting work:—

For me, oh world! no chaplet weave:
Thy frowns I fear not, nor believe
Thy wanton smiles, and summer glow,
Deceptive as retiring snow;
For me, thy grandeur's all too high,
And danger lurks in steps too high:
Then not for me thy chaplet weave,
For all thy pleasures but deceive.
Let Beauty, with its eye of fire
With maddening love the gay inspire;
Let War, in panoply arrayed
Unsheathe the Chieftain's ready blade;
Let Glory rear its plumed crest,
And dabble with its glittering vest:
Yet not for me thy chaplet weave;
Thy smiles are false—thy hopes deceive.
Let the full cup of Pleasure teem
With draughts from fair Calypso's stream
Which shrouds the soul's immortal flame
Beneath the brote's degraded frame;
Though fair the flow'rs that here entice,
All, all too costly is the price;
Such chaplet, therefore, do not weave,
The flow'rs decay—the draughts deceive!
Nor weave for me Ambition's wreath,
It is the bloody meed of Death;
As like, foul murder nestles there,
Entwined with folds of grim despair;
And oh! weave not the wreath that binds
The brows of sordid, selfish minds;
Like those entwined no wreaths for me,
They show too much, oh! world, of thee!
Nor the bright wreath of riches twine,
Dag from Golconda's purest mine;
Nor dazzling stones, that proudly gem
An empire's envied diadem.
No; twine for me the Christian's crown,
And let the wreath that decks my brow
From pure Religion's branches grow.

LADIES' PRIVILEGES.—Though ladies are not allowed to have seats in Parliament, or personally to assist in making laws, I do not see why, when they possess sufficient property, they should not, in some way or other, enjoy the elective franchise. I am only speaking of the justice or equity of such a claim, if it were properly urged. I am not dissatisfied with the disqualification, if ladies themselves are not so. I think they are just so much the more amiable, as they are detached from politics. But it is remarkable, that in the reign of Edward III. when he wanted to raise money for the defence of Ireland, he scrupled so much to tax any person's property without their consent, that regular writs were issued to the ladies who possessed lands there, commanding them to send their proper attorneys to consult on the exigency of affairs. If this could be done by attorney in those days, why not now? the acting by attorney might obviate some of the most objectionable impediments to the personal interference of our British ladies in contested elections. As to influence, it is a different question. Perhaps the real difficulty is to be found there; and if so, their disqualification may be regarded as a compliment. There is certainly no calculating the extent of female influence. 'The movements of the tender passions,' says Mr. Turner in his History of the Anglo-Saxons, 'are more eccentric than the wanderings of the heathy meteor, and yet, under the Anglo-Saxons, females were admitted into their Witan-Genot.' I confess my own opinion is, that one elegant, accomplished and beautiful Miss Bull, might now and then outweigh all the John Bulls in the kingdom; and one female constituent carry a point against a whole host of the other sex. Of their rhetorical powers we have a good account in the Spectator, No. 252, where may be seen the exceeding force which the female eye in particular possesses, as an instrument of persuasion. See also No. 510 of the same work, marked thus in the Index of the 7th volume, Beauty, the force of it. There is no knowing then what might happen. I am inclined to regard it a very delicate compliment paid to the virtues, charms, and accomplishments of the British fair, that they stand excluded from all personal interference in the choice of our Legislators, as well as in their proceedings in the senate.

That ladies may be complimented out of their rights and privileges, I am able to prove from a case in point, which I learned from a very near relation, who was a Member of the House of Commons at the very time it happened. Till that memorable day, ladies had been freely admitted into the galleries to hear the debates. From some circumstances or other (I will venture to say it was no excess of chattering and talking) it was thought expedient to exclude them; but no particular member could be found bold enough to propose it. At length however an opportunity presented itself. A Bill being under discussion, which greatly affected the interests of a noble family of high and extensive connections, the galleries were daily crowded with the female relatives of the party, most of them, as may be easily imagined, in full possession of the highest possible attractions, as youth, beauty, wit, &c. &c. On which, a member got up and begged to put the question to the Speaker, whether the credit and character of the house did not most peremptorily require, that in all their deliberations they should be free from any undue or extraordinary influence, and whether any of that honorable house could cast their eyes up to the galleries and say that they were so at that moment. He should therefore move, that that bevy of beauties should immediately retire. The ladies obeyed, and have never been admitted since in the same manner.—Hereditary Anomalies.

VARIETIES.

SWALLOW-TAILED COATS.—Merostor, a Correspondent of the Scotsman, writes as follows:—'Not a week now passes without advertisements announcing the loss of considerable sums of money. After much meditation, I am persuaded that the root of the evil lies in those swallow-tailed coats which are stuck upon the bodies of our dandies, evidently for the purpose of ornament rather than shelter. In these, the pockets are so shallow, and so ingeniously contrived by their shape to disgorge the contents, that if I had not a profound respect for the corporation of tailors, I should imagine that they had a retaining fee from the society of handkerchief, glove, and note-stealers. Unless a jury of tailors shall recommend the adoption of pockets of another construction, I see no prospect of relief from this heavy mercantile calamity. I had hopes that the Town Council, the Royal Society, the Pitt Club, or the General Assembly, would have taken up the grievance, but, alas! there is no virtue extant either in church or state! As a last resource, I can only recommend to merchants and bankers to turn off such of their clerks whose pockets will not hold a decent octavo volume."

CRICKET EXTRAORDINARY.—On the 23d ult. a match of cricket was played at Hockwold-cum-Wilton, in Norfolk, between 11 married and 11 single females, for 11 pairs of gloves, which terminated in favour of the former. The parties were dressed in jackets and trousers, decorated with blue ribbands.

SHOOTING.—A singular match of shooting lately took place between a certain Lord and a Baronet, for a wager, which could hit the most blue bottle flies at twenty feet distance from the trap, charge unlimited. Forty was the number, and his Lordship won by seven shots.

MONKEYS.—A King of Egypt was so successful in training monkeys to the art of dancing, that they were long admired for the dexterity and gracefulness of their movements. At length, a citizen, who loved fun, threw some walnuts into the ball room; when the creatures instantly forgot all their capers, and sprang to the booty.

FORTUNE.—Some painters have figured Fortune blind, and on a rolling rock, while others have given her hands and wings, but no feet. When Apelles was asked why he represented her in a sitting posture, he replied, because she had not yet learned to stand on her feet.

THE DEAD.—David Morrison has been sentenced to seven years' banishment by the Scotch High Court of Justiciary, for violating the sepulchres of the dead. On his trial, Dr. Barclay, a teacher of anatomy, deposed that some bodies became decomposed in a few days, others lasted much longer; in some the features could not be known in 48 hours, while in others they might be recognized for a week: but much depended on the previous illness; the longest he ever knew was the features of a Lascar, which remained recognizable for a fortnight. In three weeks a subject would be unfit for the purposes of dissection. In two weeks the outer skin comes off, with it the nails, and the hair would be loose, but marks on the body might be identified. He had known frequent cases where relatives were mistaken in the bodies they claimed, and instanced one where a body made of leather was insisted on as being the one they were in search of. Dissectors are obliged, in order to distinguish one subject from another, to affix marks.

THE POKER.—The writer of this essay is a great contributor to all the crack Magazines of the day:—"There is a more than common importance attached to that most useful article of domestic economy, the Poker. 'I have known you seven years, so I may stir your fire,' is a proverbial piece of courtesy. It is an English idea, and has more philosophy in it than a German stove can supply. When I sit alone, in the calm interval between dinner and tea, with my feet on each hob, and my rum-and-water on the mantle shelf, the poker is my magician's wand. With this I can annihilate castles, or build up rocks;—with this I can quench the volcano of a gas-spouting coal, or sweep off the Ariel wings of the filmy bars. A Lord Chamberlain's staff is a thing to be flung away after birth-nights, or broken over graves;—but a poker is an ever present appendage to home delights. No ill-tempered man ever used a poker skilfully. A Scotchman pokes a fire timidly from niggardliness:—an Irishman rashly, from a careless and self-willed abstraction."

NEW FIRE ENGINE.—A new species of fire engine, which is called a pump aspirant, has been invented. It is so constructed, that, placed in any running water or basin, it readily imbibes a mass of water so considerable, as to keep up without interruption a jet rising to the height of 125 feet, and to feed two ordinary pumps or engines at the same time.

WATER-PROOF CLOTH.—A chemist of Glasgow, has discovered a simple and efficacious method of rendering woollen, silk, or cotton cloth, completely water-proof. The mode adopted is to dissolve caoutchouc in mineral oil, which is procured in abundance at the gas-works; by a brush, to put five or six coatings of this mixture on one side of the cloth or silk, on which another piece of cloth is laid, and the whole passed through between two rollers. The adhesion is most complete; so much so, that it is easier to tear the cloth than to separate either piece from the caoutchouc.

ENTHUSIASM OF GENIUS.—John Sebastian Bach, the famous German musician, was left an orphan before he was ten years old, and was placed under the care of his brother, who was an organist, and who taught him to play on the ancient instrument called clavichord or clavicord. The boy rapidly mastered the pieces given him, and continually requested more difficult ones. He begged in particular a book containing the most celebrated compositions of the old clavicord masters, which his brother kept locked up in a cupboard. This was continually refused, but his eagerness was such that he contrived to get it clandestinely. The cupboard had a latticed door, through the chequers of which his hands were small enough to pass; and as the precious book was only stitched in a wrapper, he contrived to roll it up and draw it forth. For want of a candle, however, he could only copy it in moonlight nights; and it took him six months to complete his laborious task. After all too, his brother discovered the copy, and forced it from him, and he did not recover it till after his brother's death.

PENMANSHIP.—"George the First signed his name in a high, stiff, ungainly style, George the Second even worse—as ugly and feebler. The late King wrote a fine and free, though old-fashioned hand. It was just what might have been expected from his temper and character, extremely plain—extremely uniform—completely the hand-writing of a high-bred gentleman, destitute of the slightest affectation. Of his present Majesty's performance we have never happened to see more than some signatures. There is not a man in the island that could make such a capital G. The whole George is written as if without lifting the pen—the letters small, round, distinct, and beautiful in the highest degree. The R is not quite equal to the G, but still boldly done and beautiful too. There is about the whole effect something eminently graceful, composed, and PRINCELY—and that, compared with the hideous ragamuffin Napoleon of the late Emperor of France, shews in the most striking manner what a difference there is between the uneasy strut of an Usurper, and the calm Majesty of a born King."—Blackwood's Mag.

THE ELM.—Madame de Genlis speaks of an elm of great size in this country, in the hollow trunk of which a poor woman gave birth to an infant, and where she afterwards resided for a long time. This tree, which is a great curiosity, is still standing in the village of Crawley; but as the parish is not willing to be burdened with all the young elms that might have been brought forth from the trunk of this singular tree, the Lord of the Manor has very wisely put up a door to the entrance of this Lying-in-Hospital, and which is kept locked, except upon particular occasions, when the neighbours meet to enjoy their pipes, and tell old tales in the cavity of this elm, that is capable of containing a party of more than a dozen. The interior of this tree is paved with bricks, and in other respects made comfortable for those that it harbours.

INVISIBLE CEMENT.—Isinglass boiled in spirits of wine will (it is said) produce a fine transparent cement, which will unite broken glass so as to render the fragments almost imperceptible.

MATRIMONY.—A remarkable instance of absence, or indifference, occurred the other day in high life. A bridegroom, recently united to a most amiable young lady, on the evening of his marriage, and previously to the ceremony, was observed loitering over the railings in the park, seemingly perfectly unconscious of the approaching event, when he was suddenly addressed by an intimate friend, "My dear Lord, have you forgotten that you are engaged to dine with the Duke of ——— to-day, and that you are to be married at the same time?"—"Good God!" said the Noble Lord, "So I am."

TO-MORROW.

How sweet to the heart is the thought of To-morrow,
When Hope's fairy pictures bright colours display;
How sweet when we can from futurity borrow,
A balm for the grief that afflicts us to-day.

When wearisome sickness has taught me to languish,
For health and the comforts it bears on its wing;
Let me hope, oh! how soon would it lessen my anguish,
That To-morrow will ease and serenely bring.

When travelling alone, quite forlorn, unbefriended,
Sweet the hope, that To-morrow my wanderings shall cease;

Then at home, when with care sympathetic attended,
I should rest unmolested, and slumber in peace.

When six days of labour each other succeeding,
When hurry and toll have my spirits oppress;
What pleasure to think, as the last is receding,
To-morrow will be a sweet sabbath of rest.

And when the vain shadows of time are retiring,
When life is fast fleeting and death is in sight;
The Christian believing, exulting, expiring,
Beholds a To-morrow of endless delight.

The Infidel, then, sees no joyous To-morrow,
Though he knows that his moments are hasting away;
Poor wretch! can he feel without heart-rending sorrow,
That his joys and his life will expire with to-day.

MINOR THEATRE.—The performances at the Minor Theatre, have, during the present week, been particularly attractive. The taste and spirit with which the different pieces are brought forward do the Manager (Mr. Farrell) much credit, and we are happy to see that his exertions are appreciated by numerous and highly respectable audiences. Miss Seymour, from the English Opera House, is a considerable acquisition to the company, and has already become a favourite. This young lady possesses all the requisites of a good singer,—her voice is sweet and powerful—her articulation distinct—and her manner easy and unassuming. With more finished execution she would unquestionably attain very considerable distinction.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR.—I should be glad to learn, through any of your correspondents, in whose possession the copy of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales is, of which Tim Bobbin was possessed, and of which he makes mention in a letter to Mr. H. Whittaker, Manchester, Dated Nov. 26, 1770—(Rochdale Edition 1819, p. 366). In the same letter he says that the one he bought was imperfect, but if he could procure the loan of a perfect copy, he would copy the type of the two defective leaves so exactly as not to be perceived.—Could you procure his autograph so as to give your readers a Fac-simile, it would, I have no doubt, give pleasure to the admirers of that most eccentric character.—He has, I believe, a Son and Grandson now living in Rochdale.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Gonbly's lines are very humiliating.—To lessen our admiration of beautiful, complex, and perfect organisations because they cannot eternally retain a certain symmetry, is not very judicious; we should rather acknowledge the skill, power, and benevolence of the architect, and cheerfully render him the homage of praise and gratitude.

F. W. I. will perceive that we are satisfied with his assurance. W. M. P.'s Lines on 'a bunch of dead Flowers,' contain as instructive and important moral; but they are so very incorrect that we cannot insert them.

Laertes was anticipated.

L.'s communication was mislaid.—He will be kind enough to accept our apology.

Ignoto; D. N.; Rusticus; and Elisa—are received.

THE POWER OF VIRTUE.

(Translated from the French of D'Arnaud, by a young Lady.)

THERE is no power so commanding as that of virtue: the most characterized vices, even the most hardened criminals, are, as it were, forced to acknowledge its almost celestial power. Independently of the miracles of religion, what other cause produced those sudden conversions with which the Pagans seemed to be thunder-struck? It was the exalted virtue, which the first Christians displayed in all its heroism. The trait which I have to present, can only add to so many sublime examples, so much more striking, as it partakes of the marvellous, and is founded on fact.

The Governor of a state prison, (it is of little importance to know in what country the event occurred) Mr. B—, united all the qualities which make us esteemed and beloved; he had an enlightened sensibility; his decided taste for literature only served to render him still more humane, more susceptible of generous and benevolent impressions; his prisoners were considered by him as unfortunate beings, whose situation he endeavoured to alleviate, while he was fulfilling the orders of the Sovereign, and made them undergo the punishment prescribed by justice; he was to them a father, moved by the fate of his guilty children, and who judged them more or less worthy of all his compassion: hence, these very victims of the indispensable rigour of the laws, saw not, in the Governor, a man armed with authority to punish them, but a humane friend who endeavoured to ease their chains; they blessed heaven, since their unfortunate destiny had submitted them to such a trial,—for having fallen into merciful hands, which wiped away their tears, which anticipated their wants, and shed a soothing balm upon the wounds, which they were obliged to inflict.

That species of innate desire, the first passion of man—the love of liberty, was, however, hardly able to yield to the sentiment of gratitude, which the affecting behaviour of Mr. B— excited; these unfortunate captives, while they loved him, and acknowledged all the obligations which they owed him, could not refrain from sighing after the end of their confinement.

A plot was formed, which was to restore to them that liberty so precious, so dear to all creatures; there was not a single prisoner, whose chains would not be broken by this contrivance; they had succeeded in concealing their operations from the eyes of their overlookers; an opening which was effected through the thickness of a strong wall, facilitated a safe escape; they are all ready upon this kind of breach; they are going to be free; their souls, if it be allowed so to say, already wander in those fields of which their sight embraces, with transport, the immense extent. One of their fellow prisoners, at the moment he was going to extend his foot to give the signal for flight, stops: "My friends," says he, "deign to hear me, but for an instant! What are we going to do? It is true, we shall recover our liberty, that liberty the object of all our wishes, that possession, without which all others have but little value. I am impatient, like you, to tear myself from this miserable abode; but are you well aware of the consequences of our proceedings? At what price shall we purchase this liberty? by plunging a dagger into the bosom of a respectable man, the best of men, who treated us like his own children; yes, we shall be the assassins of Mr. B—; he will be accused of negligence by Government, he will lose his place, his fortune, we shall cause him a grief which, without doubt, will lead him to the grave, and this will be our gratitude! It is thus we shall repay him for so much attention, for so many kindnesses!—Believe me, my friends, let us renounce our project; let us rely upon heaven, upon the clemency of our master, upon the tenderness of our relations, that they will put an end to our captivity; as to me, I return to resume my chains. No, never, never shall I have the resolution to execute a project, which would cause the ruin of Mr. B—; and he immediately makes a movement to regain his cell. What results from this glorious sacrifice of personal interest, from this admirable act of sensibility for another? The other prisoners stand motionless, look at one another, and, animated by the same transport, exclaim; N— is right: that would undo poor Mr. B—, who shews us so much beneficence; it is impossible we should be the authors of his misfortune. Let us return."

And in fact, each of them retired to his room.

The magnanimous prisoner, who had caused a revolution so noble, so unexpected, does not rest at this fine action, which cannot be too much exalted: the next morning he asks permission to speak to the Governor, goes to him, and says with animation: "Sir, I am come to confide to you a secret, which will much surprise you: I shall not conceal from you, that it only depended on me last night to have escaped from this prison; I not only delivered myself from my chains, but likewise all those of my unhappy companions were broken; the castle,—in one word, was empty of prisoners: the moment we were ready to take flight, the image of your kindnesses struck us: we feared to be the cause of your ruin; we returned to resume our chains." Mr. B—, seized with surprise and admiration, runs, into the arms of the hero, for what name can we give to that man whose name should have been transmitted to posterity: "Is it possible, my friend? is it possible!—so much virtue,—so much sensibility for my sake! You must believe that you have acquired rights upon my heart for life, that I shall employ my feeble credit, that of the first men at court, to restore you your liberty, as well as that of all your companions, to whom you have lent your sublime soul. All shall be informed of your heroic proceeding." The prisoner replies, enters into the details of the expedients to which they had recourse; and ends by saying to the Governor:—"Hasten to cause this opening to be closed! Let them redouble the precautions! let your overlookers be more attentive, for, Sir, I must not disguise it from you; you are acquainted with the human heart; I would not be answerable that another time I should be listened to, and I will say more, that I myself should be capable of such an effort—which was so well due to you; you are so kind to us!

Mr. B— could no longer contain his tears:—"O worthy man! (embracing him) are you fit to be in chains? Sir, answered he, this is, what it is to be compassionate, to relieve the unfortunate! come, beneficence cannot be too much rewarded."

HORÆ OTIOSÆ.—(No. III.)

(Written for the Iris.)

LUMINOUS INSECTS.

Bright stranger welcome to my field
Here feed in safety, here thy radiance yield!
To me, oh! nightly be thy splendour given!
O could a wish of mine the skies command,
How would I gem thy leaf with lib'ral hand,
With ev'ry sweetest dew of Heav'n's!

Sweet child of stillness! amidst the awful calm
Of pausing Nature thou art pleas'd to dwell;
In happy silence to enjoy thy balm,
And shed through life, a lustre round thy cell.

DR. WALCOTT.

THE common glow-worms, (lampyris noctiluca) is a species of beetle, which the God of nature has endowed with the singular faculty of absorbing and emitting at pleasure, a beautiful bluish light from the two or three last joints of the body. The female insect is about three quarters of an inch in length; and bears but little resemblance of a perfect beetle: it is underneath the body partly tinged with rose colour, and its back is a dull earthy brown. The resplendent lustre of this self-lighted lamp, proceeds from a whitish sulphur coloured patch, situated on the two or three last joints of the body. The male insect alone has wings and wing sheaths; and the phosphoric light of the female, is much more vivid than that of the male. It has been asserted by many naturalists, that the males of the numerous species of lampyris do not possess the luminous property; but the investigations of Geoffrey, Miller, and Ray, have almost succeeded in inducing every naturalist of the present day, to adopt the contrary opinion. A very brilliant phosphorescence is produced by immersing a common glass vial, containing five or six of these insects into a vessel of cold water; and the light produced by the same number when placed in a large bell-glass filled with vital air, is so very considerable, that I have frequently been able to read the smallest print, by moving the paper along the exterior of the bell-glass. It is a singular fact that nature has endowed a sparrow of Hindostan, with the instinct to light up its nest with "these little planets of the rural scene," which it fastens to the inside of its little edifice, with admirable skill and dexterity.* The reader may make many edifying reflections on this poor inoffensive insect. Look at the female glow-worm! where is her beauty—where her majestic appearance?—Consider, O man! the seeming imperfections of her exterior! contemplate the beautiful regularity with which her functions are performed! gaze upon her splendid emerald light, and glorify her creator and thine!

Wide Asiatic Register, for 1802.

Naturalists have described no less than sixty species of these insects. Radiant monarchs of the night, to me 'tis ecstasy, to gaze with sober moralizing eye upon your unobtrusive gems, which deck the green-wood side as thick as shines the cope of heaven with stars! When 'tis night, and all creation's sons are laid asleep;—when nature seems to pause, and not a single sound is heard;—save that from yonder ired oak—the fierce night-owl at intervals repeats his miserable scream; or the gentle murmurs of the neighbouring brook, add sweetness to the strains of plaintive philomel:—then do I love to tread the green-wood-path, and in silent meditation gaze upon your emerald lights, which with increased splendour oftentimes you deck, wishful to attract the long-lost rambles home.

On the fair tresses of the roseate morn
Translucent dew as precious gems appear,
Not less dost thou than the night's dark hour adorn,
'Like a rich Jewel in an Ethiope's ear.'
Though the rude bramble, or the fan-like ferns,
Around thee, their o'ershadowing branches spread,
Steady and clear thy phosphor brilliance burns,
And thy soft rays illuminate the shade.
Thus the calm brightness of superior minds,
Makes them amid misfortunes shadow blest,
And thus the radiant spark of genius shines,
Though skreened by envy, or by pride oppressed.

C. SMITH.

A species of glow-worm, (lampyris Italica) is very common in Italy, both sexes of which are provided with wings; and it is no uncommon thing to see hundreds of these beautiful insects on a dark night bespangling the air like so many stars. A writer of some celebrity informs us, that on all grand occasions it is customary for the Italian beaux to place a number of these living diamonds into the head dresses of the ladies; and it is curious to observe what influence education has over the human mind, it being a well known fact that the lower orders of society believe them to be a spiritual nature, issuing from the burial grounds; and hence, they shun them as they would a pestilence.† Besides the numerous species of lampyris, there are several other species of insects of the beetle tribe, which yield a much more vivid light than the glow-worms, amongst which may be particularized elater ignitus, and elater noctilucus. The elater noctilucus is rather better than an inch in length, and is endowed with so much strength and elastic powers, that it is enabled when placed upon its back, to spring to the height of five or six inches in recovering its former posture. These insects we are informed by several celebrated natural historians, are very common in the savannas of the warmer parts of America; and in woods, bushes, and shady lanes, in the West India Islands, more especially in St. Domingo. They fly with amazing fleetness; and present to travellers a beautiful, splendid nocturnal appearance. Walton informs us that on certain festival days, the people catch great numbers of them on purpose to decorate the garments and horses of young people, who on dark nights gallop through the public streets, diffusing a large and brilliant mass of moving light. These insects are the same that Oviedo informs us the Indians fasten to their hands and feet when travelling in the night, and by the phosphoric splendour of which they dance, spin, weave, paint, &c. they are also the same insects that so seriously alarmed Sir Thomas Cavendish, and Sir John Dudley, upon their first landing in the West Indies, who mistook them for the Spaniards advancing upon them, and hastily retreated to their ships. The present Poet Laureate has rather happily introduced this insect in his Madoc, (an uninteresting poem in blank verse,) as being the only light by which Coatel delivered the British hero from the Mexican priests.

"Their lustre. By that light did Madoc first Behold the features of his lovely guide."

When eight or ten of these flies are placed under a wine glass, they afford a much more splendid light than a common wax candle. The natives of the West India islands, hold them in great value as candles, and also for devouring the gnats, which were it not for the fire-flies would soon become extremely troublesome. "How they are a remedy for so great a mischief," says Pietro Martire, it is a pleasant thing to hear, Hee who understandeth that he hath, those guesstes (the gnattes) at home, diligentlie hunteth after the cucuij. Whoso wanteth cucuij, goeth out of the house in the first twilight of the night, carrying a burning fire-brande in his hande, and ascendeth the next hillock, that the cucuij may see it, and hee swingeth the fire-brande about, calling Cucui aloud, and beating the ayre with often calling out, Cucui, Cucui." There is also another tribe of insects, several species of which, outrival any of the luminous insects above described. These insects, of which there are about twenty-five species, constitute a genus of the class, insecta, order hemiptera. The genus is called fulgora, and the insects have received the appellation of lantern-flies. The most curious insects of this tribe are the fulgora lanternaria, fulgora candelaria, fulgora pyrrhorynchus, and fulgora diadema. The fulgora lanternaria, called by the French, la fulgora porte Canterne is a most extraordinary, as well as a most beautiful insect. Its head is nearly half the length of the whole body, and the phosphoric irradiation of this splendid insect proceeds entirely from its head, or lantern. Its body is about three inches in length; and from wing's end to wing's end it measures nearly six inches. The wings are beautifully variegated, and much more elegant than those of any other insect I have yet seen. It is a native of South America; and it sheds a much more vivid light than any other insect. Madame Merian asserts that the light emitted by one of these insects, is sufficient to read a newspaper by.* "The Indians," says this authoress, once brought me, before I knew they shone by night, a number of these lantern-flies, which I shut up in a large wooden box. In the night they made such a noise that I woke in a fright, and ordered a light to be brought, not knowing whence the noise proceeded. As soon as we found it came from the box, we opened it: but were still much more alarmed, and let it fall to the ground at seeing a flame of fire come out of it; and as many as came out, so many flames of fire appeared. When we found this to be the case, we recovered from our fright, and again collected the insects, highly admiring their splendid appearance." The fulgora candelaria is about two inches in length; and from the tips of the extended wings, it measures two inches and an half. This insect is a native of China. It transmits a very considerable share of light, but is in every respect inferior to the ful. lantern. The fulgora diadema is an elegant insect, and if I may judge from the specimens I have seen, it is rather larger than the last mentioned species.† The wings are black, and tipped with red at the edges, and it is a native of India. I have never seen the fulgora pyrrhorynchus; but according to Donovan it is a remarkably splendid luminous insect. The cancer fulgens, scotopendra electrica, and several other insects possess a high degree of phosphorescence; but the limits of this paper will not allow me to notice them. What is the remote cause of the luminous property of insects? This is a query that has racked the brains of many an excellent philosopher; but which no one has ever been capable of answering in a satisfactory manner. What is the use of the luminous property of insects? The most plausible opinion, is that which is the most general; namely, that it consists in discovering the sexes to one another. But this is far from being the opinion of every naturalist: some of whom imagine that it is intended to guard themselves from the annoyance of their nocturnal enemies; and Dr. Darwin, very seriously conjectures that the luminous property is of no other use, than to enable them to find their food in the night, and to prevent them from flying against objects. Surely these gentlemen must have forgot, that out of the almost infinite number of night insects, whose functions are performed with never-deviating regularity, very few are possessed of the luminous property.

STONEHENGE.—A PRIZE POEM.

(Recited at Oxford, June 12, 1823.)

Wrapt in the veil of Time's unbroken gloom,
Obscure as death, and silent as the tomb,
Where cold oblivion holds her dusky reign,
Frowns the dark pile on Sarum's lonely plain.

Yet think not here with classic eye to trace
Corinthian beauty, or Ionian grace;
No pillar'd lines with sculptor'd foliage crown'd
No fluted remnants deck the hallow'd ground;
Firm, as implanted by some Titan's might,
Each rugged stone appears its giant height,
Whence the poised fragment tottering seems to throw
A trembling shadow on the plain below.

Here oft, when evening sheds her twilight ray,
And glids with fainter beam departing day,
With breathless gaze, and cheek with terror pale,
The lingering shepherd startles at the tale,
How, at deep midnight, by the moon's chill glance,
Uncertain forms prolong the viewless dance;
While on each whisp'ring breeze that murmurs by,
His busied fancy hears the hollow sigh.

Rise, from thy haunt, dread genius of the clime,
Rise, magic spirit of forgotten time!
'Tis thine to burst the mantling clouds of age,
And fling new radiance on Tradition's page:
See! at thy call, from Fable's varied store,
In shadowy train the mingled visions pour;
Here the wild Briton, 'mid his wilder reign,
Spurns the proud yoke, and scorns th' oppressor's chain;
Here wizard Merlin, where the mighty fell,
Waves the dark wand, and chants the thrilling spell.
Hark! 'tis the bardic lyre, whose harrowing strain
Wakes the rude echoes of the slumbering plain;
Lo! 'tis the Druid pomp, whose lengthening line
In lowliest homage bends before the shrine.
He comes—the priest—amid the sullen blaze
His snow-white robe in spectral lustre plays;
Dim gleam the torches through the circling night,
Dark curl the vapours round the altar's light;
O'er the black scene of death each conscious star,
In lurid glory, rolls its silent car.

'Tis gone! e'en now the mystic horrors fade
From Sarum's loneliness, and Mona's glade;
Hush'd is each note of Taliesin's lyre,
Sheath'd the fell blade, and quench'd the fatal fire,
On wings of light Hope's angel form appears,
Smiles on the past, and points to happier years;
Points, with uplifted hand, and raptur'd eye,
To yon pure dawn that floods the opening sky;
And views, at length, the Sun of Judah pour
One cloudless noon o'er Abdon's rescued shore.

FROM MY MEMORANDUM-BOOK.

(Concluded from our last.)

I was present when he first demanded of the trembling Eliza if she had not made promises she could not, as his child, ever perform; she did not attempt to deny that her heart was no longer her own, but, in all the modest simplicity of truth, acknowledged that nothing but an union with the object of her dearest affections could make her happy here, and she in vain besought her parent to ratify her choice with his blessing. It were impossible to describe the eloquence of her eyes as she pleaded for the object of her affection, and exclaimed, in the fervency of her love—

"Is it in heav'n a crime to love too well?"

But her cruel parent was inexorable, and denied him for ever admission to his house. Eliza now flew, in all the agony of despair, to her doating mother; but her father had reached the room before her, and she sunk lifeless, to all appearance, beneath his cutting glance. Many weeks elapsed before she could leave the house, or even approach her father, so much were her nerves affected, and her frame shaken.

Day after day did Edward repair to the place of rendezvous, but in vain, no Eliza was there, and no tidings of her reached his ear; he dared not to call, lest her father should question him on a subject he had never been bold enough to mention, and which, from report, he feared would never be sanctioned. A month elapsed but Eliza appeared not; he lingered about the house, and still no form of his beloved presented itself. The heart-rending idea that she was faithless to her vows, frequently flashed across his mind; but, too well convinced that such ideas must be groundless and that her former conduct gave him no reason for them, they were soon banished; and, though worn with anxiety for her safety, this assurance removed the greater load from his mind.

About this time he was obliged to fulfil an engagement which he had long been under, to visit some relations who resided a few miles from the town, and, though he spent the whole morning in traversing the street in which his adored Eliza lived, yet the hour arrived when he must depart, without having obtained a sight of her.

Dull flew the hours that were occupied in the journey, for his heart beat little in unison with the lively scene which surrounded him, and when the door of the stage was opened to announce the completion of the journey, he seemed to awake as from a reverie of pain and mental suffering. During his visit the hours and days glided on tediously, and his whole time was spent in melancholy solitude. His friends remonstrated with, and endeavoured to convince him, that by confinement he was counteracting all those beneficial effects which his visit should impart, but it was in vain. His features assumed a steady melancholy, and his eyes, instead of their usual brilliancy, sunk deep in his head, and were almost lost beneath his protruding eye-brows. And when he did, for a short time, leave the house, it was but to wander in a neighbouring wood, where he would gather large bunches of that beautiful, but unassuming flower, "Forget me not," and with it, and it done, would he adorn his room, and he would now and then place a sprig between the leaves of any book from which he had received pleasure or information in the perusal. Such were the occupations of Edward, and it was too plain to his ever-watchful friends, that something unknown to them, weighed heavily on his mind, and was carrying him fast to his long home. It was on one of the finest mornings of summer, that he arose earlier than usual, and accompanied his cousin in her walk before breakfast, his spirits seemed, for the first time since his visit, to have returned with double force, and every small flower that decked the garden drew forth strong marks of admiration; still, in all his gaiety, there was a hurried manner totally unnatural to him, a rapid flow of speech in which he seldom expressed himself. He strolled many miles apparently unconscious whither he went, and seemed totally to have forgotten his cousin, whom he had left far behind. But, from the distance, the accustomed bell sounded its summons to the morning repast, and for the first time did it now convey any pleasure to his ears, when with hasty steps he traversed the highly cultivated domain through which his road lay.

Many were the congratulations he met with during breakfast, and most heartily did he appear to chime in with the joy of the party. All seemed harmony and love, nor was the assembly broken up till the following day was fixed to celebrate the anniversary of his cousin's birth, by a rural fete, to which the young people of the neighbourhood were to be invited. The day passed with the various delights that a beautiful country affords in the midst of summer. Whilst some formed a party in the fragrant bower, and joined the late with their soft voices, Edward accompanied his cousin in a small punt, which was always ready on a piece of water that ran through the grounds. A pleasant breeze formed a slight ripple on the stream, and the thrush and blackbird warbled sweetly from amongst the waving trees. With light hearts, they rowed to one of the largest islands, where they purposed preparing a scene, which they were confident would prove as gratifying as unexpected to their young party, and soon reached the shore, which was more steep than usual, from the little rain that had fallen during the season.

Edward immediately proceeded to surmount this difficulty, by placing the oars in such a position as to form a bridge from the boat to the land. He succeeded in the attempt, and springing upon them, was ready to assist his companion, when his foot slipped, and he was precipitated into the lake.

So sudden was the shock to his astounded friend, that she scarcely knew what had happened, but the awful truth, with all its attendant horrors, rushed upon her mind, and she sank with a shriek in the boat, which was fast drifting towards the shore. The alarm spread, and the water was soon surrounded by the servants who were engaged in preparations for the morrow's festival. Seeing the boat floating down the stream, but neither visible, they doubted not but both had found a watery grave. At the moment when the vessel reached the shore, in which they saw the pale and distracted Mary, the remainder of the party who had amused themselves in various ways, and were then in search of their companions, arrived at the water's edge, little suspecting the awful scene that awaited them: or deeming how soon the brightest sunshine, and fairest day may be darkened and overcast by a sudden and unexpected cloud.

Mary was borne out of the boat apparently lifeless, and in vain did she attempt to speak, the words died upon her lips. Their first object was to convey her to the house, and prepare ropes, and other necessary apparatus for finding the body. Many hours elapsed before they succeeded, and then the vital spark had fled for ever.

In a few hours the scene of youthful gaiety was turned into mourning, and the chief of the party was gone. Altered but little were those peaceful features, for though animation was fled, there was still the pale countenance stamped with resignation and hope as when he breathed.

Mary soon recovered, but when she heard the fatal truth, it was almost too much for her enfeebled nerves. In a small writing-case was found a letter, containing his last wish:—that he might be buried in — church-yard, close to the walk where he first met Eliza. There was also a locket containing his own hair, and beside it the following lines, which, though only drawn up as a rough sketch, were evidently intended to accompany it:—

When these dim eyes no more can see,
When death shall seal my wayward lot,
And close my earthly destiny—
Forget me not.

When 'neath the damp and heavy clay,
This form shall fill one little spot,
Tho' by my grave you ne'er should stray—
Forget me not.

Or should the haunts where we have been,
Attract you, in that beauteous grove
Wash'd by the billows clear and green—
Forget me not.

But let this simple token prove
That there is one to whom thy lot
Was dear; thy only could I love—
Forget me not!

The day fixed for the solemn obsequies was bright, and the noon-day sun shone upon the sable plumes of the hearse, as they nodded beneath the gentle breeze. He was now passing, for the last time, the scene of his love; the path along which so often he had wandered in company with Eliza, was now pressed by the wheels of that hearse which conveyed him to the silent tomb. He who once was now about to add to their number, over whom a monument should rise to occupy the thoughts of future generations. The blackbird and thrush still warbled their notes, unconscious that he who had so often listened to them, was now deaf to their melody, though so near.

"lov'd to dwell,
'Midst skulls and coffins, epitaphs and worms,"

Eliza had rambled to her favourite retreat for the first time this day since her indisposition, and looked with impatience for him, whose habitation was soon to be the tomb. As the bell tolled upon her ear, she strayed into the church to witness the last offices performed over a fellow mortal. Little was she prepared for the awful scene which awaited her, but her feelings were congenial with the place and ceremony which was about to occupy her, and as she followed with her eye the sacred remains into the house of God, a tear started from it, but she dashed the intruder from her face ere it was yet visible. But when the coffin was placed uncovered on the bier, and she read the name—the name of him she loved, she adored,—she uttered a wild and piercing shriek, which echoed along the vaulted roof, and darted from the mansion of God.

The day waned, and the cold breezes of evening blew along the coast, but no Eliza returned home; her doating mother fancied a thousand things, and as one idea arose, it was as quickly dispelled by another. All was dismay and confusion, her brothers went from house to house, but no one had seen her, no person in the town could give any information respecting her.

Little was the rest which her family shared during the night, and, as soon as morning broke, messengers were despatched in every direction to seek the unfortunate wanderer. No news was heard of her, and another night was passed in like suspense.

All hopes were now abandoned; the morning was thick and stormy, and the wind whistled along the beach. About evening they saw a female on a high rock, over which her white garments waved in the breeze; she appressed to hail them, and unaccountable as it was, they immediately put off a boat, and with difficulty reached the only point from which the rock on which she stood was accessible. After a rough scramble, they succeeded in placing her in the vessel, and steered for — the only word she could pronounce. No sooner had they reached the harbour, than anxious enquiries were made whether they had seen any person similar to the description. The inquirer was shewn into the cabin, where he beheld his sister, but a deadly paleness was upon her, and she spoke not.

Her mother had taken no nourishment since her loss, and when she saw her daughter, she knew her not. Eliza, alike unconscious, spoke nothing, nor did she appear to know those by whom she was surrounded; the kind affection of her friends was unheeded, for she remained in a listless and inanimate stupor.

Her sisters watched by her bed side the long night, but no voice disturbed its silence, all was still as death, she had breathed her last without a sigh, without a struggle. She lies buried beneath that slab, her memory is cherished—she died beloved by all!

"When sorrows come, they come not single spies,
But in battalions."

From that time her parent remained senseless to every thing, until the awful hour, when, in a fit of desperation, she terminated her existence.—She now lies beside her daughter, the good, the fair, the beautiful!

It was her funeral that I witnessed; the impression it made is deeply graven on my memory—she sleeps in peace!

HAY-MAKING.

Would you know
The time to mow
And duly get your hay in?
'Tis when the moon's without a haze,
'Tis when the morn's without a blaze,
And the eastern gales are playing.

head to foot, all intermediate parts of the body being therein comprised. The quality of cousin of Mahomet, of whom indeed there are no small numbers, does not exempt you from it. It is true they do not belabour a relation of the prophet until they have first taken off, with every mark of respect, the green turban which marks his consanguinity, which turban they also return to him with equal respect after the ceremony. A Cadi never fails in this; for, in Turkey, as elsewhere, they have much deeper consideration for any thing not man than for man himself.

To thrash a Roman citizen was to dishonour him: the moderus are in this respect true Romans. To beat a man is to inflict upon him the greatest possible dishonour.

Insolence and baseness often go together; a stick can alone do justice to this association: it is the power which the madman Cyrano de Bergerac employed against Montfleur, whom he had under his thumb. One day this comedian, who was enormously fat, displayed less docility than usual to the caprices of the Gascon poet: 'Because it takes a whole day to beat him,' said Bergerac, 'the rogue thinks I have given up making myself obeyed.'

Baurn, who was a wit in the court of Anne of Austria, received more than once a store of dry blows as a reward for his epigrams. I forget what nobleman it was, who, meeting him with a stick in his hand, said, 'Baurn reminds me of St. Lawrence with his gridiron; he cannot separate himself from the instrument of his martyrdom.'

Actors do not scruple to give and take blows upon the stage, and this shocks certain fastidious persons. The French academy required of Molière, before they would admit him, that he should, if he would not renounce the stage, at least give up those characters in which he used to receive a beating. That philosopher would not, however, purchase the honours of a place in the academy by such a concession.—What sort of honours could they be which appeared to him inferior even to a bastinadoing?

Some philosophers have classed outgelling among the arguments, and certain ingenious dialecticians have employed it in a very conclusive manner. It was with a thick stick that they used to demonstrate the existence of pain to the Pyrrhonists.

In England, where the wives are under the empire of the outgel, as well as under that of their husbands, by virtue of a custom of equal force with a positive law, there is a village in which this custom prevails in its fullest vigour. There, as elsewhere, those of the stronger party sometimes abuse their power: a young and humane magistrate, however, taking up the interest of the wives, resolved to modify a law which he could not abrogate. He therefore procured a decree, by virtue of which wives should not in future be beaten with a stick of greater circumference than his finger, not specifying which finger. From the period of this judicious decree, it is said that the door of the judge is daily besieged by a crowd of wives, who go for the purpose of comparing the instrument of their punishment with the juridical finger, and to measure themselves the size of the outgels.

TO ELIZA.

Fare thee well! we meet no more
In earthly hall or earthly bower.
Those golden times will ne'er return
Which then I prized, and now I mourn;
Those cheerful evenings long and gay,
When joy chased every tear away,
When every social charm combin'd
To banish grief and calm the mind,
Those scenes will never be renewed,
But oft in fancy's eye be viewed.
When winter's howling blasts arise
And veil with dark'ning clouds the skies,
I'll think how happy I should be,
If I could spend an hour with thee.—
And when in clear expanse of sky,
The moon has hung her lamp on high,
With all the glittering stars attending,
Their little light to mortals lending,—
I'll think that thou art gazing too,
On the fair scene that meets my view.
And when our souls have winged their way
To regions of eternal day,
We'll meet again in endless joy,
In happiness without alloy.
Till then, farewell—we meet no more,
In earthly hall, or earthly bower.

A MECHANIC'S JOURNAL OF A TOUR FROM LONDON TO PARIS, IN 1822.

(From the Literary Chronicle.)

FINDING employment extremely scarce in London, and having an anxiety, like my betters, of seeing that far-famed city, of which it is said, 'he who has not seen Paris has seen nothing,' I resolved to start while my finances were equal to the task; although I had to walk the whole distance, through a country entirely unknown to me, having but an imperfect knowledge of the language, and being unacquainted with the habits and manners of the people. The whole of my cash was £3:7s. and a handkerchief contained all my luggage. I had procured my passport some days previous. Tuesday morning, April 23, was the day fixed for my departure. I rose with a heavy heart, and, I verily believe, I should have resigned my purpose, if the fear of being laughed at had not fixed my resolution. I passed over Westminster Bridge at five in the morning, the rain descending in torrents. This seemed, indeed, a bad omen, but I was not to be diverted from my purpose, but trudged on with a depression of spirits, such as I think, all must feel, who are about to leave their own and enter a foreign country. After experiencing much fatigue, I arrived at Dover, on Thursday, at five in the evening. It was new, for the first time in my life, that I saw the ocean. The sun was, apparently, sinking into it, and never did I feel such emotions in my breast before. Which ever way I looked, nothing was to be seen but water bounded only by the horizon. I slept at the Fleur de Lis, and understanding the packet sailed at nine next morning, I rose early to walk over the castle and the cliffs. A warden shewed me and another young man the different curiosities of the castle, among which, is the cannon named Queen Anne's pocket piece. It is a similar looking gun to the one in St. James's Park; but is longer by about two feet. It was given to this queen by the Dutch, and there is an inscription on it in the same language, which, freely translated, signifies:—

'Load me well and keep me clean,
I'll carry a ball to Calais green.'

But I was informed it would not carry further than three miles. Near this spot, is a hill, from which, two merchants crossed the channel to Calais a few years back. In the centre is the tower, supposed to have been built by Julius Caesar, but it is little better than mere ruins. The number of guns and mortars here is very great. The view of the sea from this height is majestic in the extreme. We next ascend the cliffs on the other side of the town. After passing through a long passage cut out of the rock, we had the choice of three flights of stone steps, each winding over the other to the top, where they all meet. I understand it was constructed thus, to prevent the enemy from rushing up in a body, if they should enter the harbour; but I don't see how that would be possible, as the cliffs are mounted with cannon as well as the castle, and must sink every thing within their reach. The highest of the cliffs is Shakespeare's Cliff, so named from his beautiful description of it in 'King Lear.' The view from here is terrific; the men in the town seeming but children—the vessels on the water appearing mere specks. The rock is excavated in different parts; and barracks are built there, which are completely defended both from the fire and an enemy, or the raging wind that continually blows on this elevated spot. The time had now arrived for the vessels to start, but the wind had got up so much, and the sea beat so high over the pier, that none of the vessels would venture out; and the carriages and &c. were reloaded, it not being considered safe to cross. About half-past three in the afternoon, the captain of the government packet made preparations to sail, being resolved to pass with the mail if possible, although the wind had not abated. I with only another went on board, each paying 5s.—the fare in the steerage. It is particularly necessary to make an agreement, or they will charge whatever they please when at sea,—where they take your fare and enter your name in a book. It was a sailing boat, no steam boats being then established. My heart sank, as we passed out of the harbour, at the idea of leaving my native shores, perhaps, for ever. We had left the coast three or four miles before we experienced the very heavy sea that continued the rest of the passage.—I now began to feel the sensation of sickness, and it was not long before my stomach was cleared of every thing in it. Those only who have felt this sensation can describe it. When about half-way over, we first had a view of Calais, for the cliff seen from Dover is several miles from that town. At seven o'clock, we arrived about half-a-mile from the harbour, but there was not water enough to admit us; and though the French put off two boats to land us, yet the surf was so great, that they had not the courage to approach us, but rowed in shore again. We were, therefore, obliged to remain till the next tide, which was half-past one in the morning. It was here I felt more than I ever felt in my life before, by hunger, cold, and sickness combined, having eaten nothing since ten in the morning, and having nothing to rest on but the sails soaked with sea-water—the motion of the vessel preventing my taking the least sleep.

At last, half-past one was announced, and orders given to sail; in a few minutes we were in the harbour, but I still remained below; for those who have felt sea sickness, know that it deprives them of all power of exertion. In about half an hour, with the assistance of my companion, I went on deck. All was darkness, and scarcely a person could be discerned; but the perpetual babble and confusion convinced me I was not now in England. We were led to the custom-house, and slightly searched, leaving our passports. We then passed through the gate of the town, for which they demanded, from each, half a frank. After having fruitlessly marched over half the town to find a vacant bed, they being all occupied at the English houses, we were happy, at last, in getting a night's rest in a little house, kept by a Frenchman, in Rue-de-la-Mer. It was not long before an omelet was ready for our empty stomachs, and never did I enjoy a meal better; and, indeed, I had never tasted an omelet before. With this we drank wine, coffee, and brandy; and when our passports were copied into a book, kept by all aubergistes, we retired to rest, in what appeared more like tents than bedsteads. However, fatigue silenced all objections.

In the morning, before breakfast, we walked round the town, which consists of very little more than the market-place, which is certainly very handsome, containing the lighthouse, an ancient church, the Bureau de Police, and coffee and other houses.—Here I first found the inconvenience of having no pavement to walk on, as most of the principal streets have flag stones.—The houses here are much superior to those in Dover, being built with stone, and are loftier, yet they have a prison-like appearance; the harbour much surpasses Dover harbour. On the pier head is a pillar of stone, about 20 feet high, and two feet in diameter, mounted with a large gilt fleur de lis; and near the base is an inscription commemorating the landing of Louis XVIII. on this spot. I was greatly struck with the great difference of discipline between the English and French military; here was a soldier on guard in an old ragged grey coat, his face and clothes all covered with dirt, and he in busy conversation with an oyster wench; I will only remark that I don't think a Frenchman a worse soldier for being so much at his ease. I now parted with my companion, and paying two francs for a provisional passport, I started on my destination, and at the very first village I had a specimen of that politeness for which the French are so justly praised; for, on asking the road to Boulogne of a ragged looking object, he informed me with all the grace imaginable, and then reminded me that I had not saluted him by putting my hand to my hat; though this was rather repugnant to the feelings of an Englishman, yet I did not fail following his advice afterwards. I went into a cottage for some refreshment, and was struck with the great contrast between this and an English cottage; here every thing was dirt and filth, with literally ground for the floor, which had not been swept for ages; the persons of the cottagers, were in keeping with their habitations, being dressed almost wholly in woollen clothes; they had a meagre and half starved appearance, which even their dogs and cats partook of, making a horrible noise while the family were eating, all out of the same bowl, what they called soup, but which in fact was nothing more than a composition of peas, lard, herbs, pepper, and salt, with thin slices of black bread soaked in it. I soon found that I was not to expect meat for my meals, unless I was content with that which had been stewed for hours to make soup, I therefore contented myself, nearly the whole of the road, with eggs cooked different ways; but I was forced to keep a sharp look out to prevent them from putting lard or garlic into my food, which they themselves are so fond of. Those who have never seen a drove of French pigs, can form no idea of them, I can compare them to nothing better than to a pack of greyhounds, so miserably deficient are they in flesh.

I arrived at Boulogne about five in the evening;—a gay delightful place, having an excellent harbour, though it is difficult to approach by sea; the principal streets are paved. In this town, even in preference to Paris, I would wish to reside, but I found it had obtained a bad name on account of the immense number of runaway English who were settled here. It had acquired no less an appellation than the new Botany Bay. Next morning I started again, and passing through several villages, arrived in sight of Montreuil, which has a majestic appearance from the distance; but on entering the town the illusion vanishes, and nothing presents itself but a cluster of dirty lanes, so steep that the horses are obliged to wind half round the town to ascend. I could not find one person who could speak English. This town is strongly fortified by nature, but the works are rapidly falling into decay; it was here I first observed a great want of decency in the females exposing themselves, where crowds were passing every minute. I continued my road till I arrived at Nampont, a dirty straggling village celebrated by Sterne, but I am certain by no one else, for it is the most miserable village I ever saw, even in France. Here I was forced to rest for the night, being much fatigued and sore at foot. The next morning, being Sunday, I set off again, arriving at noon at Abbeville, a large noble town, containing a magnificent cathedral, with fine houses and streets, but not a morsel of pavement. As far as here my progress had been smooth, but now my troubles began, for I had no sooner left the walks than I was saluted by a blacksmith asking me for my papier. Not comprehending the meaning of this word, and thinking this one of the many instances of vexatious interruptions practised on Englishmen, I forced myself from him and the crowd who had collected; but was stopped by him while a boy was sent for a gens d'armes, to whom I showed my passport and departed. I arrived about seven o'clock at Amiens. Here I was again overhauled and taken before the mayor, who kept me standing more than an hour, while my passport was being signed and countersigned. I was then obliged to shew my money, and asked my object in going to Paris, but my invariable answer was that I was going to my friends. They told me I must not sleep in the town, but I was resolved not to sleep out of it; therefore when I had passed the walls, I took my lodging for the night. Inquiring for my bed, my hostess informed me that, it being Sunday evening, there would be dancing and music in the house, and if I remained up, I should be highly entertained; but I declined,—little thinking that I should be a forced spectator. My bedstead was placed in a niche (which is common in France) of a very large room. I found my bed about a foot too short for me, but, by lying from one corner to the opposite one, I was enabled to fall asleep. I had slept about an hour, when I was aroused in a fright by the noise of several musical instruments, and, peeping through the curtains, I saw several couples dancing, while others were singing. As sleep was out of the question, I contented myself with peeping at them, for about two hours, when they departed. I floated for some time at the striking contrast between these and my own countrymen, and could not help thinking, that a little innocent amusement like this, although on a Sunday-evening, was yet better than wasting time and health in a public house. Full of these thoughts I fell fast asleep.

BIOGRAPHY.

WILLIAM COOMBE, Esq.

It is not, we assure our readers, with the common newspaper regret, which grieves or rejoices in proportion as the proprietors are paid for it, that we announce the death of the ever to be admired author of 'DR. SYNTAX,'—the octogenarian Dr. Coombe. This gentleman, who has long been known to the literary world by his various productions, but who has never affixed his name to his works, died on Thursday, at his apartments, Lambeth-road, in the eighty-second year of his age. He originally excited great attention in the fashionable world by a poem entitled, 'The Diaboliad,' the hero of which was generally understood to be a nobleman lately deceased. Many other poems issued from his pen, but none ever bore the stamp of his name. Within the last few years, under the liberal patronage of Mr. Ackermann, who continued to be a generous friend to him till his last moments, he brought forth a work which became very popular and attractive, under the title of 'The Tour of Dr. Syntax in search of the Picturesque.' This work, which he extended to a 'Second and Third Tour,' with nearly the same spirit and humour as characterized the first, will for ever rank amongst the most humorous productions of British literature. He afterwards produced poems entitled 'The English Dance of Death,' and 'The Dance of Life,' which were written with the same spirit, humour, and knowledge of mankind that marked his other works. His last poem was 'The History of Johnny Quæ Genus, the Little Foundling of the late Dr. Syntax.' All these works were illustrated by some admirable prints, from the designs of Mr. Rowlandson.

Among the other works of this gentleman was 'The Devil upon two sticks in England,' in which many very distinguished characters at that period were introduced, and the whole fairly entitles him to rank the English Le Sage. He was the author of several political pamphlets, which made a considerable impression on the public, and also of letters, which appear under the title of 'Letters of the late Lord Littleton.'

Mr. Coombe began life under the most favourable auspices. He was educated at Eton and Oxford. He possessed great talents and a very fine person, as well as a good fortune, which, unhappily, he soon dissipated among the high connections to which his talents and attainments introduced him, and he subsequently passed through many vicissitudes of life, which at length compelled him to resort to literature for support. Innumerable are the works of taste and science which were submitted to his revision, and of which others had the reputation. A love of show and dress, but neither gaming nor drinking, was the source of his embarrassments. He was, indeed, remarkably abstemious, drinking nothing but water till the last few weeks of his life, when wine was recommended to him as a medicine; but, though a mere water drinker, his spirit at the social board kept pace with that of the company. He possessed musical knowledge and taste, and formerly sung in a very agreeable manner. His conversation was always entertaining and instructive, and he possessed a calm temper with very agreeable manners. He was twice married. His second wife, who is now alive, is the sister of Mrs. Cosway, and possessed of congenial taste and talents.

The life of Mr. Coombe, if impartially written, would be pregnant with amusement and instruction; but those whose literary contributions might have provided interesting materials, are probably most of them with him in the grave; and he will be hereafter chiefly remembered as the author of 'Dr. Syntax.' We ought not to conclude this article without bearing testimony to the firm reliance which Mr. Coombe placed in the Divine origin of the Christian religion, and a future existence; and to the fortitude and resignation with which he supported his full conviction of the near approach of his final release from all sublunary troubles.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ASCENT OF MR. GREEN AND MR. SPARROW, IN A BALLOON.

Oxford, June 14.—The ascent of the balloon was fixed for one o'clock at the gas works: upwards of 5,000 persons were assembled to enjoy the sight. The ascent was, however, delayed for more than two hours by an accident that happened to the poles from which it suspended.—About half-past two the inflation being completed. Mr. Green mounted the car, accompanied by a young gentleman from London, of the name of Sparrow, who paid the aéronaut £50 to be allowed to encounter the perils of the voyage. Nothing could exceed the intrepid self-possession of them both. The beautiful and majestic vehicle rose with extreme slowness, and Mr. Green immediately threw out part of his ballast, but not with entire effect; for the net work, encircling the balloon, caught the corner of the chimney of one of the gas furnaces, by which the car was nearly upset, and at the moment a feeling of horror pervaded the breasts of the thousands below. Fortunately, however, the aéronauts kept their seats, and instantly Mr. Sparrow waved his flag gaily and frequently, in token of the car having recovered its balance. Mr. S. has given a particular narrative of their course.—On rising from the ground it appeared as if they were impelled upwards, not unlike the feeling excited by the action of a swing; the concussion when the car struck the chimney of the gas-work was electric, and gave the car a vertical movement. On clearing this obstruction, they took an oblique direction, inclining to south-west, when a light current of air springing up, they again charged for due east, and rose perpendicularly and rapid, from the quantity of ballast they had thrown out to clear the gas-works. It is not in the power of language to express the gratification the aéronaut experienced on viewing the expanse above him into which he was gradually and almost imperceptibly rising. They here (at about half a mile from the earth) encountered a variety of currents, which produced a retrograde and sometimes angular motion. To avoid any sensation of fear from looking too suddenly down on the objects beneath, the young aéronaut accustomed himself to the view by gradation, taking the more distant objects first, and in a short time he was able to look with the greatest confidence on the surface of the earth, which at this time presented the most beautiful variety of colours, resembling a mosaic pavement, heightened by the sun's reflection. Around them, the clouds appeared an ocean of snow; beneath, the splendid carpet of nature spread forth her gay varieties over an immeasurable expanse. The accident at starting had injured the barometer, but so as to prevent their calculating the heights. On leaving the earth, the mercury stood at 29 inches 7-10ths. At the greatest altitude to which they rose, it was at 31 inches 3-10ths; from this they calculate they were above two miles in height from the surface of the earth. The thermometer fluctuated greatly; the lowest point was 55, and the highest 70. As the barometer would not answer to the descent, they had recourse to an expedient, by placing one of the flags over the side of the car, and observing the action of the air upon it: by this means they ascertained when they were descending or rising. When they had been in the air about one hour and a half, the cap of the neck of the balloon came off, and they were compelled to stand up and tie a silk-handkerchief round; by which means they succeeded in preventing the too rapid escape of gas. Nothing material occurred for the next hour and a half, until they began to descend. Mr. Green conceived they hovered over Nettlebed-heath, where the woods are unusually thick. They had now little ballast left, and therefore no choice of selecting a more favorable spot; they continued to descend rapidly, and at about a thousand feet from the earth, Mr. Green gave his companion instructions to throw out the cushions and cling fast to the hoop from which the car was suspended to the balloons: they had scarcely done so before they experienced a most violent concussion, from the machine striking the earth and rebounding a height of 50 feet; it then rose and passed a few yards when, on a second descent and shock, Mr. Sparrow was thrown out, and the balloon thus lightened, rose again, with Mr. Green, and at about a distance of 150 yards, Mr. Sparrow having recovered from the shock, and caught hold of the ropes, the netting and car became entangled in the tops of some very high trees; in this perilous situation immediate assistance was afforded by the labourers in Lady Stapleton's Park, where they had first fallen upon a rising ground, and within 300 yards of the mansion-house. Stapleton Park is two miles from Healey, and 22 from Oxford. The balloon was, by the exertions of a dozen strong fellows, soon secured, and Mr. Green descended down a rope to terra-firma. The car was dashed to pieces by the violence of the shock. Lady Stapleton instantly sent and invited the aeronauts to partake of some refreshments, and offered them every assistance in securing and conveying the balloon to Oxford, where they arrived about twelve o'clock on Friday night. A large sum of money was collected on the ground for admission to view the process of filling.

THE CABINET.

THE ICE-HILLS, OR RUSSIAN MOUNTAINS.

(From Dr. Clark's Travels.)

The frozen Neva presents a crowded and busy scene. In one part, booths are erected on the ice, where brandy and drams of every kind are sold; in another direction are pedlars, mountebanks, and jugglers, and the pastimes of Bartholomew Fair; in a different place are dramatic representations of a burlesque and ridiculous nature, to which the spectators are admitted for a few copecks. The ice-hills afford an amusement to the populace, peculiar to the inhabitants of Russia. A scaffolding of wood is raised on the river, to the height of forty feet; from the summit, an inclined plane, having a steep descent, is covered with blocks of ice, firmly united together by water poured over them. The sides of the steps, or ladder, which lead by the back part of the scaffolding to the top, are decorated with fir-trees. The low sledge, resembling, in shape, a butcher's tray, descends the hill with a rapidity sufficiently great to carry the person seated in it over a large tract of ice cleared of the snow, to an opposite scaffolding, constructed in a similar manner. Here he takes his sledge on his back, mounts the steps, and proceeds as before. Those who do not wish to descend alone, have a guide, who seats himself in the sledge as far back as he can, raising his legs at the same time; the other person is placed before him, and between his legs, in a similar position. The sledges, horses, and carriages, moving about in various directions, and the crowds of spectators who assemble to behold this amusement, present a very striking and animated scene.

BENEDICTION OF THE WATERS OF THE NEVA.

From the same.

A small temple, of an octagon form, made of wood, painted and adorned with crosses and pictures, representing parts of the history of John the Baptist, is erected on the Admiralty Canal: an inclosure is formed around it, and within is a hole out in the ice. A platform, covered with scarlet cloth, leads from the palace to the temple: along which the procession advances, consisting of the archbishop, accompanied by bishops and dignitaries of the church, the imperial family, and persons attached to the court. Having arrived at the temple, different prayers are recited; after which, the archbishop descends a ladder placed within the octagon building, and dips the cross thrice in the water; the benediction being pronounced at the same time. Some of the water is then taken up in a vessel, and sprinkled on the surrounding spectators. The military, with their standards; the religious orders, in their different dresses, the presence of the imperial family; and the crowds of people assembled together, form a very striking scene. The last occasion on which Peter the Great appeared in public, was at the celebration of this ceremony. He was previously indisposed; a severe cold attacked him on the day of the benediction of the waters, increased his disorder, and in a short time brought on his death.

At the celebration of a ceremony of the same kind, which was instituted in the early period of the empire at Moscow, an image of the Holy Virgin was plunged into the river; the water was blessed by the patriarch; and the Czar, and the persons of the court who were present, were sprinkled with it.

SILVER MINES OF KONGSBERG.

(From the same.)

The silver occurs in lumps of native metal: but so unusual is this circumstance, that when the mine was first discovered, many refused to give credit to the fact of such masses being actually brought to light. We shall mention some of the most considerable. The first is that preserved in the Royal Museum at Copenhagen; its weight being five hundred and sixty Danish pounds, and its value five thousand rix-dollars. It is a mass of native silver, nearly six feet in length, and in one part above eighteen inches in diameter. Similar masses were discovered in the year 1630, and in 1719, and in 1727, which severally weighed from two hundred and fifty to two hundred and eighty, and three hundred pounds, each. In the shaft called St. Andrew, a piece of pure silver was found, in 1727, weighing two hundred and seventy-nine pounds; and, in the same year, another, weighing three hundred and four pounds, was found in God's Blessing shaft. These occasional masses, occurring casually in the rock, and being soon interrupted in their passage through it, or dwindling gradually to nothing, the miner must continue to dig through the barren stone until he has the good fortune to meet with more of the same nature, which, in one day, may reward the fruitless labour of months, and perhaps of years.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Not clearly comprehending the following extract, I have to request an elucidation from some of your philosophical readers.

I am, &c.

Manchester, June 23rd.

D.

"God, in creating the first individual of each species, animal or vegetable, not only gave form to the dust of the earth, but a principle of life, inclosing in each, a greater or smaller quantity of original particles, indestructible and common to all organized beings. These pass from body to body, supporting the life, and ministering to the nutrition and growth of each. And when any body is reduced to ashes, these original particles, on which death hath no power, survive and pass into other beings, bringing with them nourishment and life. Thus every production, every renovation, every increase by generation or nutrition, supposes a preceding destruction, a conversion of substance, an accession of these organical particles, which ever subsisting in an equal number, render nature always equally full of life. The total quantity of life in the universe is therefore perpetually the same. And whatever death seems to destroy, it destroys, no part of that primitive life, which is diffused through all organized beings."

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—In answer to your correspondent L. (in your last paper) I beg leave to hand you an account of the book he inquired after; I derived my information from Mr. R. Collier, a grandson of Old Tim's, and was once present at an interview between Mr. C. and the person alluded to which took place in a room near Mr. D. Holt's factory.

Some years since the imperfect copy of Chancer belonged to (I believe) a daughter of Tim's; at all events she was sent to Mr. R. C.: during her life, it is said, she lent the work to some person for perusal, but the old lady died before it was returned; it was in the hands of Mr. J. to whom Mr. R. C. applied for the book after his aunt's death, but after repeated solicitations, and as many promises that it should be returned, he was never so fortunate as to obtain it.—A report reached Mr. C's ear that the book had been sold to Earl Spencer (who was also possessed of an imperfect copy) to make his own complete, for £400 or guineas. On hearing this report Mr. C. directed an attorney to write to the Earl respecting it, who very politely replied "that it was true he had purchased the same from a person of the name of J., but that he never told his most intimate friends what sums he expended in his literary pursuits."

THE TARANTULA.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Your correspondent S. has quoted Orfila on the poison of the Tarantula, and affirms that "Experiments have overthrown the opinion that the bite of the Tarantula is mortal, as some have maintained, and as to the agency of music in luring its effects, a serious attempt to refute it cannot be necessary." The writer of the accompanying extract was not remarkable for credulity; and, indeed, many popular philosophical dogmas seem, to disinterested inquirers, almost tottering before his objections. For my own part, I cannot admire mammy, but I do believe that important effects are very often produced by means which appear too simple for the development of mechanical operation. To chance, or accident, we are indebted for many admirable discoveries; in the animal economy, instinct is often an unerring guide to certain antidotes; and the historical account of some of the chief articles of the Materia Medica shows that we have availed ourselves of much valuable information from people who possessed but little scientific knowledge.

However, as the opinion of the fatal effects of the Tarantula bite is very general, and I am (probably with others of your readers) wholly ignorant of the experiments alluded to by your correspondent, his favouring me with an account of one of two of the most conclusive, will oblige—yours, &c.

Manchester, June 25th.

A. Q.

"A Tarantula is a kind of spider, chiefly found near the city of Tarantum, in Apulia. It is about the size of an acorn, and has eight eyes and eight feet. Its skin is hairy; from its mouth rise two trunks, a little crooked and exceedingly sharp. Through these it conveys its poison: they seem likewise to be a kind of moveable nostrils, being in continual motion, especially when it is seeking its food. It is found in other parts of Italy, but is dangerous only in Apulia. And there it does little hurt in the mountains (which are cooler) but chiefly on the plains. Indeed it is venomous but in the heat of summer, particularly in the dog-days. It is then so enraged as to fly upon any that come within its reach."

"The bite causes a pain, like that by the stinging of a bee. In a few hours the patient feels a numbness, and the part is marked with a small livid circle, which soon rises into a painful tumour. A little after he falls into a deep sadness, breathes with much difficulty, his pulse grows feeble, and his senses dull. At length he loses all sense and motion, and dies unless speedily relieved. An aversion to blue and black, and an affection for white, red, and green, are unaccountable symptoms of this disorder."

"There is no remedy but one. While he lies senseless and motionless, a musician plays several tunes. When he hits on the right, the patient immediately begins to make a faint motion. His fingers first move in cadence, then his feet: then his legs, and by degrees his whole body. At length he rises on his feet, and begins to dance, which some will do for six hours without intermission. After this he is put to bed, and when his strength is recruited, is called up by the same tune to a second dance."

"This is continued for six or seven days, at least till he is so weak, that he can dance no longer. This is the sign of his being cured; for if the poison acted still, he would dance till he dropt down dead. When thoroughly tired he awakes out of sleep, without remembering any thing that is past. And sometimes he is totally cured; but if not, he finds a melancholy gloom, shuns men, seeks water, and if not carefully watched, often leaps into a river. In some the disorder returns that time twelvemonth, perhaps for twenty or thirty years. And each time it is removed as at first. Can even Dr. Mead account for this?"

"Equally unaccountable are the two relations published some years since, by a physician of undoubted credit. The first is, a gentleman was seized with a violent fever, attended with a delirium. On the third day he begged to hear a little concert in his chamber. It was with great difficulty the physician consented. From the first tune, his face assumed a serene air, his eyes were no longer wild, and the convulsions ceased. He was free from the fever during the concert; but when that was ended, it returned. The remedy was repeated, and both the delirium and fever always ceased during the concerts. In ten days, music wrought an entire cure, and he relapsed no more.

"The other case is that of a dancing-master, who through fatigue, fell into a violent fever. On the fourth or fifth day he was seized with a lethargy, which after some time changed into a furious delirium. He threatened all that were present, and obstinately refused all the medicines that were offered him. One of them saying, that perhaps music might a little compose his imagination, a friend of his took up his violin, and began to play on it. The patient started up in his bed, like one agreeably surprised, and shewed by his head (his arms being held) the pleasure he felt. Those who held his arms, finding the effects of the violin, loosened their hold, and let him move them, according to the tunes. In about a quarter of an hour, he fell into a deep sleep. When he awoke he was out of all danger.

"We have many other odd accounts of the power of music; and it must not be denied, but that on some particular occasions, musical sounds may have powerful effect. I have seen all the horses and cows in a field, where there were above a hundred, gathered round a person that was blowing a French horn, and seeming to testify an awkward kind of satisfaction. Dogs are well known to be very sensible of different tones in music; and I have sometimes heard them sustain a very ridiculous part in a concert.

"The great old lion which was some years since kept at the infirmary in Edinburgh, while he was rearing with the utmost fierceness, no sooner heard a bagpipe, than all his fierceness ceased. He laid his ear close to the front of the den, nuzzled his nose and his teeth against the end of his pipe, and then rolled upon his back for very glee. I have seen a German flute have the same effect on an old lion, and a young tiger in the Tower of London."

VARIETIES.

STARCH.—A great improvement has been made in the manufacture of starch by M. Herpin, of Metz. In the ordinary method, for the purpose of decomposing and destroying the gluten which conceals the starch, flour is allowed to ferment for a fortnight or a month with a certain quantity of water; by which means ammoniac is disengaged, and a very fetid odour is spread through the manufactory. M. Herpin makes starch in the course of an hour, by a process by which he obtains at once both the gluten and the starch, without having to endure any odour whatever. To effect this, it is sufficient to knead the flour with a few drops of water, in a bag of fine linen. The water carries off the starch, and the gluten remains in the bag. The water and the starch are passed through a silk sieve, and are received into a vessel. When the starch is deposited, the water is poured off; and contains a quantity of saccharine matter, which may be advantageously employed in the preparation of some cheap beverage.

ANATOMY.—The first part of a very fine anatomical work has lately been published at Paris, called "Anatomical Plates of the Human Body of the size of Nature, accompanied with Explanatory Observations by Dr. Antommarchi, (formerly Anatomical Professor at Pisa, and afterwards with Buonaparte at St. Helena,) edited by M. de Lasteurrie." The plates are admirably executed. The first three represent the entire body of an adult. The sub-cutaneous vessels, arterial and venous, are all exhibited, as well as the nerves that cover the first layer of muscles. Each class of organs is distinguished by a particular mode of execution. Thus the muscles are represented by parallel series of lines and dots; the tendons by finer and closer lines; the arteries by lines and little oblique hatchings; the veins by longitudinal and transverse lines, which very happily show their round forms; the nerves by straight lines; the lymphatics and their swellings by winding lines; and so on. It seems that the work has excited general admiration at Paris.

Mr. Haydon's two great pictures, the Raising Lazarus, and Christ's Entrance into Jerusalem, have been sold; the former for 350 pounds, bought by Mr. Binns; and Christ's Entry for 220 pounds, bought by Mr. Mair.

CHINESE RICE.—The Chevalier Rosa has been endeavouring, and with much success, to cultivate Chinese rice at Brescia, in Italy. In his first experiment, made in 1820, he obtained from only four grains, fifty-eight ears, containing 2680 grains. The harvests of the succeeding years have been equally productive.

A SCRAP OF ANTIQUITY.—At a time when the custom of Ring wearing is of almost universal adoption, it may not be misplaced to admit the glittering fingered, within the pale of our locubrations. In a polyglot Dictionary, published in the year 1625, by John Minshew, are the following observations under the article—Ring-Finger.

- A Soldier, or Doctor to him was assigned the thumb.
- A Sailor, the finger next the thumb.
- A Fool, the middle finger.
- A Married or diligent person, the fourth or ring finger.
- A Lover, the last or little finger.

TURKISH LOVE OF LITERATURE!—The Ottoman Porte has given orders to sell by weight all the fine libraries at Constantinople. Among others are mentioned those of the Princes Morisi, who have become the objects of the jealousy and hate of that despotic government, in consequence of their wealth, patriotism, and talents.

NEW YORK.—There are at New York fifty churches and places of worship. They are as follows:—1st, Catholics, 7; 2dly, Reformed Churches, 5; 3dly, Reformed German Calvinists, 1; 4thly, German Lutherans, 1; 5thly, Presbyterians, 7; 6thly, Reformed Presbyterians, 1; 7thly, Reformed Associated Presbyterians, 3; 8thly, Dissenters, (Seceders) 2; 9thly, Baptists, 6; 10thly, French Protestants, 1; 11thly, Ebenezer, 1; 12thly, Methodists, 7; 13thly, Moravians, 1; 14thly, Universalists, 1; 15thly, St. Peter, 1; 16thly, Cathedral of St. Patrick, 1; 17thly, Ancient Meeting of Friends, 1; 18thly, New Meeting of Friends, 1; 19thly, Jew Synagogue, 1; 20thly, African Baptists, 1.—Total, 50.

BON MOT.—When Judge Day returned from India, the minister represented to his late majesty that knight-hood was an honour to which the judge was entitled. 'Poh, poh,' said his majesty, 'I cannot turn day into night; it is impossible.' At the next levee, which was about Christmas, his majesty was again entreated to knight Mr. Day. The king enquired if he was married, and was answered in the affirmative. 'Well, well,' said the monarch, 'then let him be introduced, and I will work a couple of miracles; I will not only turn Day into Knight, but I will make Lady Day at Christmas.'

FRENCH MONARCHY.—It is calculated that the French monarchy contains 29,800,000 inhabitants, of whom 108,000 speak Basque, 900,000 speak the Kymrique, or Low Breton, 160,000 speak Italian, 1,700,000 speak German, and the remaining 27,000,000 speak French. It is also calculated, that of these there are 26,400,000 Catholics, 2,300,000 Calvinists, 1,100,000 Lutherans, 60,000 Jews, 2,000 Herrnhutians, and 550 Quakers.

ROMAN RELICS FOUND NEAR YORK.—The Mount, without Micklegate Bar, the principal entrance into York from the south, was, in Roman times, sacred to the interment of the dead—There, before the introduction of christianity amongst them, the bodies of deceased friends were burnt, and their ashes deposited in urns.—A short time ago, as some workmen were digging a cellar on a piece of ground lately purchased by Mr. Knowlson, of that city, on the left hand side of the road, at the southern extremity of the Mount, they found eight Roman urns, of various sizes, four of which were quite perfect, but the others were broken—some containing burnt ashes, and one of them, which was larger than the others, containing a great number of bones. They found an old copper coin of one of the Roman emperors, but, with the description so much defaced, as to be scarcely legible. There were also, at the same time, dug up, a great number of skulls and other human bones.

IMPROMPTU.—The late Lord Salisbury made the following impromptu to a fly on a lady's lip:—

'Oh happy, happy, happy fly!
If I were you, and you were I,
Then I should be the happy fly,
And you would be Lord Salisbury.'

WATTIE AND JOHNNIE; OR THE PLEASURES OF THE GREEN-SWAIRD, A SCOTTISH PASTORAL.—One of the most gifted of the poets of Scotland is, we understand, employed on a poem under the above title. He has chosen the dramatic form, in imitation, we suppose, of RAMSEY. The first scene is somewhat unpoetical—it is laid in a tavern, where a number of life and fortune men have met to display their loyalty and zeal for religion. After a few speeches, in which jobbing is shown to be essential to religion, and the denial of this grand truth is proved to be blasphemy, a number of obscene songs are sung for the entertainment of the revered and learned party,—all things being permitted to the saists. Some scenes follow of rather an agitating nature; others in which the ludicrous preponderates. A soliloquy on boozing embraces the leading qualifications of a court-sycophant; but accident will sometimes frustrate the best laid plan—witness the broken wine-glass. The scene which gives the title to the poem, exhibits Johannie alighting from the London mail, to join Wattie, who is waiting for his arrival on a green swaid, near Edinburg. Johannie is crowned with laurel, and carries a newspaper in one hand, and in the other a picture, in which the members of a certain assembly are represented prostrate at his feet. While Wattie is congratulating him on his getting once more footing on the green swaid of his native land, Johannie, who carries his head rather high, steps inadvertently into one of those deposits which profusely adorn most of the green-swairs of that part of the island, loses his footing, and drags Wattie along with him into one of the many brooks which flow from Edinburgh into the Frith of Forth. The rest of the scene may be more easily conceived than satisfactorily described by us. It is enough to say that even the air of Edinburgh felt the entrance of Wattie and Johannie. The pencil has been pressed into the service of the poet. A vignette in the last page exhibits a Welshman (for so the look in his hat denotes him to be) turning up his nose at Johannie, and making some very significant gestures.

MY EARLY YEARS.

Half early years! namix'd with toll or pain,
When in yon valley I was wont to stray,
Where now the wand'ring minstrel's pleasing strain,
Swells on the ear—now softly dies away!
A stranger to the world—fair virtue's child,
Calmly the day in innocence flow'd by;
I pick'd the blossom from yon hawthorn wild,
Unknown the quiv'ring tear—unknown a sigh.
Dear happy years! as ye rise in my mind,
A sudden anguish seizes on my breast—
I weep—I prove that then the myrtle twind
Around this languid head—that I was blest!

Johannes will oblige us by stating how we should merit in communications.—So far, we retain the original signature for the sake of uniformity; but having concluded our packet, we wish for his decision on this point with his next favour. ARTS AND SCIENCES.

[We are indebted to a small work recently published, entitled "Cottage Economy," for the following remarks and instructions respecting the kinds and preparation of Grass for Bonnets; we strongly recommend the book itself to the perusal of those persons who reside in the neighbourhood of towns where no manufacture is carried on.—Ed.]

ENGLISH GRASS,

And Grain Plants cut green, into Straw, for the purpose of making Plat for Hats and Bonnets.

THE practice of making hats, bonnets, and other things, of straw, is perhaps of very ancient date; but, not to waste time in fruitless inquiries, it is very well known, that, for many years past, straw coverings for the head have been greatly in use in England, in America, and indeed in almost all the countries that we know much of. In this country the manufacture was, only a few years ago, very flourishing; but, it has now greatly declined, and has left in poverty and misery those whom it once well fed and clothed.

The cause of this change has been, the importation of the straw hats and bonnets from Italy, greatly superior, in durability and beauty, to those made in England. The plat made in England was made of the straw of ripened grain. It was, in general, split; but, the main circumstance was, that it was made of the straw of ripened grain; while the Italian plat was made of the straw of grain, or grass, cut green. Now, the straw of ripened grain or grass is brittle; or, rather, rotten. It dies while standing, and, in point of toughness, the difference between it and straw from plants cut green is much about the same as the difference between a stick that has died on the tree, and one that has been cut from the tree. But, besides the difference in point of toughness, strength, and durability, there was the difference in beauty. The colour of the Italian plat was better; the plat was brighter; and the Italian straws being small whole straws, instead of small straws made by the splitting of large ones, there was a roundness in them, that gave light and shade to the plat, which could not be given by our flat bits of straw. In addition to these differences, there was, on our side, the further disadvantage of being compelled to use brimstone and other things, to bleach, or, rather, to clean and to give a colour to our straw. This caused the articles made of our straw to change colour when they came to face the rain and sun; while the Italian articles, though usually somewhat clarified in the same way, remained unchanged, because the straw of which they were composed had been cut green, and bleached by scaling.

It seems odd, that nobody should have set to work to find out how the Italians came by this fine straw. The importation of these Italian articles was chiefly from the port of Leghorn; and, therefore, the bonnets imported were called, Leghorn Bonnets. The straw-manufacturers in this country seem to have made no effort to resist this invasion from Leghorn. And, which is very curious, the Leghorn straw has now begun to be imported, and to be platted in this country. So that we had hands to plait as well as the Italians. All that we wanted was the same kind of straw, that the Italians had: and it is truly wonderful, that these importations from Leghorn should have gone on increasing, year after year, and our domestic manufacture dwindling away at a like pace, without there having been any inquiry relative to the way in which the Italians got their straw! Strange, that we should have imported even straw from Italy, without inquiring whether similar straw could not be got in England! There really seems to have been an opinion, that England could no more produce this straw than it could produce the sugar-cane.

Things were in this state, when, in 1821, a Miss Woodhouse, a farmer's daughter in Connecticut, sent a straw-bonnet of her own making to the Society of Arts, in London. This bonnet, superior in fineness and beauty to any thing of the kind that had come from Leghorn, the maker stated to consist of the straw of a sort of grass, of which she sent, along with the bonnet, some of the seeds. The question was, then, would these precious seeds grow and produce plants in perfection in England? A large quantity of the seed had not been sent; and it was therefore, by a Member of the Society, thought desirable to get, with as little delay as possible, a considerable quantity of this seed. It was in this stage of the affair that my attention was called to it.

SORTS OF GRASS OR GRAIN.—The Engraving exhibits a pretty good representation of three sorts of Grass, just at the season when they are coming out into bloom. Figure 1. is the Sweet-scented Vernal Grass; Fig. 2. the Crested Dog's Tail; and Fig. 3. the Bennet Grass, or Ray Grass. By attentively looking at this Engraving, any one may soon learn to distinguish these sorts from others. But, the reader is not to conclude, that these are the only sorts that will answer the purpose; nor, indeed, is he to conclude that they are the best sorts that can be found. They are the best that I have yet found. They make very fine and beautiful straw; but, amongst the great multitude of sorts of grass, other sorts may be as well or better suited to the purpose. The grass made use of by Miss Woodhouse is, unquestionably, the common Couch Grass. It is a great mistake to suppose, that there is any sort of grass growing in Connecticut, that does not also grow in England.

But, there are many other sorts of grass. The yellow oat-grass, particularly, is very fine; I think the finest of all. This straw would make plat a great deal finer than that of the bonnet of Miss Woodhouse. Not only finer, but a great deal finer. Perhaps it is not more than half the size of the straw made use of by Miss Woodhouse, while the colour is as beautiful as it possibly can be. It is not, however, of the straw of grass only, or even principally, that I have to speak. None of the immense quantity of hats and plat imported from Leghorn, is made of the straw of grass. The Leghorn manufacture is made of the straw of grain, and principally of the straw of wheat, which, though not nearly so fine, in point of size, as the straw of many kinds of grass, is, perhaps, in point of colour, equal to the straw of even the best sorts of grass. This is what the Italians make their plat of. This is the material of which all those thousands upon thousands of bonnets are made that we see upon women's heads in England! How astonishing, then, is it, that English manufacturers in straw should have fallen into beggary, supposing all the while, that they could not make plat like that of the Italians for want of the materials to make it of, or for want of sun sufficiently bright to bleach those materials! The simple facts are these: the Leghorn bonnets are made of wheat straw; but, this straw comes from plants that are very fine and spindling in consequence of their standing very thick upon the ground; and, this Italian wheat is cut while it is green instead of remaining till it be dry. This makes it tough, instead of being rotten; and the smallness of the stalk enables the platters to make fine plat of the whole round straw, instead of making use of the straw when split.

THE SEASON FOR CUTTING THE PLANTS.—As to the season of the year, all the straw, except that of one sort of couch grass, and the long coppice-grass, which two were got in Sussex, were got from grass cut in Hertfordshire on the 21st of June. A grass headland, in a wheat field, had been mowed during the forepart of the day; and, in the afternoon, I went and took a handful here and a handful there out of the swaths. When I had collected as much as I would well carry, I took it to my friend's house, and proceeded to prepare it for bleaching according to the information sent me from America by my son; that is to say, I put my grass into a shallow tub, put boiling water upon it until it was covered by the water, let it remain in that state for ten minutes, then took it out, and laid it very thinly on a closely mowed lawn in a garden.* But, I should observe, that, before I put the grass into the tub, I tied it up in small bundles, or sheaves, each bundle being about six inches through at the butt-end. This was necessary, in order to be able to take the grass, at the end of ten minutes, out of the water, without throwing it into a confused mixture as to tops and tails. Being tied up in little bundles, I could easily, with a prong, take it out of the hot water. The bundles were put into a large wicker basket, carried to the lawn in the garden, and there taken out, one by one, and laid in swaths as before-mentioned.

It was laid very thinly; almost might I say, that no

* Might not the same method prove beneficial in preparing flax before the process of steeping.

stalk of grass covered another. The swaths were turned once a day. The bleaching was completed at the end of seven days from the time of scalding and laying out.

PART TO BE USED.—No part of the straw is used for platting, except that part of the stalk, which you find between the upper joint and the seed-head, or tassel, or bunch of flowers, or, to speak in the language of the Botanists, the panicle. When the straw has been bleached in the sun, you pluck the top part of the stalk out of the upper joint. This pulling of the straw may be performed by the fire-side. The way to go to work might be this. Here, I should say to a labouring man's wife, is a bundle of rough straw, weighing ten pounds. I have found, by experience, that every ten pounds of rough straw yield two pounds of pulled straw. Take this bundle, bring me back two pounds of pulled straw, and I give you so much money. The pulled straw would have the seed-heads, or panicles, on it; and would probably be sold, in that state, to the platters, or the employers of the platters. This is the state in which the straw is now imported from Italy.

THE PLATTING.—There will scarcely be any difficulty in finding people to plat English straw, seeing that there are enough already found to plat the Leghorn straw, imported into this country. This work has been for some time carried on by the industrious and most praiseworthy inhabitants of the Orkney Islands.

THE KNITTING OF THE PLAT TOGETHER.—The English straw plat is put together as boards are put on the side of a barn; that is to say, the plat, or lists of plat, are made one to cover a part of the other; and they are sewed through and through, the needle and thread performing the office of the nails in the case of the barn. Not thus is it with the Leghorn hats and bonnets. In order to make these, the plat is not lapped, a part of one list over a part of the other; but the lists are fastened to each other after the manner, or form, of boards put together by glue; that is to say, the edge of one list of plat is fastened to the edge of another list; and thus throughout the whole bonnet, just as boards, joined on to the edges of each other, form a table; and so neatly and so cleverly is this work of knitting the lists of plat performed, that you can no more discover the joinings of the plat in the one case, than you can the joinings of the boards in the other case. This is called knitting the plat; and there are at present, as far as I understand, not many persons in England, and those who are here are principally foreigners, who know how to do this business. Now, then for the honour of the girls of Old England! Shall we be compelled to send young fellows to Italy and Connecticut to fetch us Italians and Yankees to carry on this work of knitting together plat made of English straw? Recollect, the Yankee girls found out the way to knit the plat together. There were no foreigners to go to do the work for them or to teach them to do it. There is Miss Woodhouse's Bonnet at the apartments of the Society of Arts. That bonnet is knit together after the Italian manner; and am I to have the cruel mortification of hearing one single English woman express a doubt of her being able to do the same thing?

THE COST, TO THE IMPORTER OF LEGHORN PLAT AND STRAW.—The Plat which is imported from Leghorn in the shape of plat, pays a duty of seventeen shillings the pound weight, and stands the importer in about sixty shillings a pound, altogether. The plat which is imported in the form of hats, pays a duty of five and eight-pence per hat, unless the hat exceed twenty-two inches in diameter, and then the duty is double. What the prime cost of the hat is, when bought in Italy, and what the amount of the freight and insurance, I cannot say. Of Leghorn straw no great quantity appears to have been imported. Some, however, is imported, and it pays a duty of twenty per cent.; and probably stands the importer, all charges included, in three, four, or five shillings a pound. Now, I will pledge myself to furnish any quantity of straw of any degree of fineness, not finer than hog's bristles, to persons ready to contract with me for it. I should not be afraid to say that I would furnish straw, equal in all respects to Leghorn straw, for less than half the price which Leghorn straw costs. How cheaply, then, can such straw be furnished by persons who live in the country, who have the land, the grass, the grain, the barns, and, into the bargain, the labouring people, all ready to their hand!

THE PHILANTHROPIST.

ON POISONS.

SECTION II.—ON ALKALIES.

IN the last Section, which was the first of the Second Essay, we considered the poisonous properties of acids, and the counteractive measures in accidents resulting from them. We will, in the present paper, speak of Alkalies.

An Alkali (a word of Arabian origin, signifying the dregs of bitterness) is distinguished from other substances by the following qualities:—it changes the blue juices of vegetables to a green, renders oils miscible with water, and combines with an acid so as to form a salt, which is of a neutral kind, provided a due proportion of acid and alkali be employed.—(See the last paper.)—Some of the alkalies are called fixed, these are soda and potash; ammonia is of a volatile nature; and lime, barytes, &c. all named alkaline earths.—We shall select soda and potash from the alkaline salts, and lime from the alkaline earths, for our present purpose; they all have the same or a similar operation on the animal economy, and from being easily procured, because often used for domestic purposes, they may now and then be taken undesignedly in so great a quantity as to kill. Some of the neutral preparations of soda and potash are in common use as purgatives,—such are the Glauber's salts, or sulphate of soda, phosphate of soda, sulphate of potash, &c. &c. hence, in a state of combination they are valuable medicines, but uncombined they are caustic, and will corrode and kill the living animal fibre to which they are applied. It is well known how they act on the exterior of the body, and when taken internally, their action is similar. The following case will illustrate the effects of a small dose of soda in a caustic state, and between them and those from potash there is no sensible distinction.

A person was requested to make use of some aperient effervescing powders, and to prepare the same, three salts were given to him in three distinct papers; one of the papers contained the subcarbonate of soda, a second the tartaric acid, and a third the tartarized soda. He was told how to mix them, and what quantity of each to employ; but through carelessness, instead of taking about a scruple of the subcarbonate of soda, and two drams of the tartarized, he reversed the doses, and swallowed the solution, after mixing it with a sufficient quantity of acid to neutralize a scruple of the subcarbonate of soda; thus full five scruples of the subcarbonate were taken into the stomach in a caustic state. In a little time the gentleman experienced great heat in his mouth, throat, and stomach—vomiting followed—a surgeon was called in, who, on being informed of the mistake, ordered some lemon juice and water, and in a little time the urgency of the symptoms abated, but great thirst and uneasiness in the belly continued for several days. Two drams of the subcarbonate of soda or potash in a solid form, are enough to kill a dog of middle size. Experiments have confirmed the fact. Immediately after taking it the animal is affected with very acute sufferings. He soon vomits, and breathes with difficulty—these symptoms go on increasing until death happens, which in one case occurred in twenty-five minutes. On dissection, the membrane of the mouth, the living membrane of the gullet, and the internal coat of the stomach, were found highly inflamed, particularly the last of these parts; the organs of the chest were natural, therefore the difficulty of breathing must have been a mere sympathetic affection. The caustic preparations of soda and potash, all act as corrosive poisons; in a minor dose, they inflame the parts with which they come in contact; in a larger dose they produce a degree of inflammation, which will threaten a termination in mortification; and in a very considerable dose, they absolutely destroy the texture of the passage to the stomach, and portions of the stomach itself, by that caustic property which they possess, and of which their operation on the external surface of the body, is so decided a testimony. Quicklime is less intense in its effects than the alkaline salts; on giving it in powder to a dog, in the quantity of two or three drams, vomiting is excited in from five to ten minutes, and the animal seems to suffer much, the result may be death, but not immediately, for two or three days will elapse ere it takes place; when it happens the cause is inflammation of the stomach. Thus all the alkaline salts, and earths, act upon the animal economy nearly in the same way.

TREATMENT OF PERSONS POISONED BY ALKALINE SUBSTANCES.

The reader may infer from what we said in our last paper on the antidotes to acids, as to the treatment applicable in cases of poisoning by alkalies.—Our aim must be to destroy the chemical nature of the caustic by decomposition, and an acid is capable of effecting this. It is not materially important what acid we make choice of, but as vinegar, and lemon juice are always at hand, and simple to manage, we may mention them as being preferable to all the rest. The vinegar should be mixed with water if too powerful of itself; it should, however, have a marked acidity, therefore, unless very strong, the dilution may be dispensed with.

We are then to employ vinegar, or lemon juice mixed with water, in those cases where soda, potash, ammonia, lime, or other alkaline substances have been accidentally swallowed in a dangerous quantity. They act by decomposing the caustic; but after-attention is necessary here, as in poisoning by acids, in order to prevent bad consequences from the impression which the caustic made prior to the exhibition of the antidote; but to impart a little knowledge in the after-treatment would be to do harm. I am sure that he who lends himself as a pillar to support empiricism, inflicts an injury on society, and the cause of humanity; daily observation must convince us of this awful fact.

THE FRIEND.—(No. II.)

"It may be that my grey head may devise counsel and aid for young life."

In fulfilment of the promise given in the first number of "The Friend," I shall proceed, after a few preliminary remarks, to state what are the principal objects I have in view in undertaking the office of periodical essayist. It is necessary to remind my readers that I have lived a considerable time in the world, and that I have not neglected to note down, on the tablet of my memory, those transactions of mankind which appeared to me worthy to be had in remembrance. With an attentive observance of the business of human life, and an accurate register of such things as made impressions on my mind, I may mention, as fitting me for the office of Friend, an ardent desire, which I have always felt, to pour oil on the boisterous waves which in their fury threaten shipwreck to the joys and happiness of my fellow-creatures. I have scrutinized too, the actions of those who are journeying through the world around me; and have traced, as far and as often as I was able, the spring, design, and issue of human conduct; and I am induced from observation, to believe that a great part of the misery said to be the lot of man, exists more in the imagination than is generally supposed. Indeed, I am convinced that he who would live happily in this state of existence, has only to act in agreement with the pure dictates of the heart, and as conscience dictates, and all will then be well. The shoals and quicksands that often oppose our progress in the journey of life, and endanger our peace and happiness, would be avoided and probably unknown, did man always steer the course which has been pointed out by the hand that cannot err.

"The Friend" addresses his lucubrations to the young and old—to the man of virtue and to the man of pleasure—to him who seeketh instruction, and also to him who readeth merely to beguile time. For all such persons, he proposes occasionally to cater, and as a moraliser, and a writer for amusement, he intends to avail himself of the advantages age brings with it. The pious man shall meet with nothing, in the subsequent papers, which can possibly offend. I am very far from wishing to stain the pages of the Manchester Iris, with any sentence I should blush to acknowledge in broad day-light as my own. I have a becoming regard for religion, and consequently admire its sincere and upright votaries.

With respect to my means of amusement, I have only to say, that my subjects shall be properly diversified, and that I am in possession of a considerable number of untold tales and interesting adventures. Romances I detest, and there are very few novels that I approve. Nevertheless, to those who are fond of both, I say, fear not that "The Friend," by reason of his dislike of the trash that generally fills the shelves of our circulating libraries, will be unable to administer to your entertainment, or to cause you to while away a quarter of an hour, pleasantly and without a feeling of ennui. And lastly, my readers, themselves, must pronounce their verdict, as to whether I am justified or not in saying that I am not altogether destitute of what will contribute to and promote their instruction. Old age, 'tis true, is often garrulous, and I know the adage, Garrula lingua nocet, but unlike many of my neighbours, I have learned, happily, in some measure to restrain the desire age feels to indulge offensive loquacity, and therefore hope the readers of "The Friend" will not have to complain that he said more than he performed.

WRITTEN ON MY BIRTH-DAY,

(In imitation of Dr. Johnson's Lines to Mrs. Thrale on her birth-day.)

Sadness—mirth—have rolled o'er,
Till I've got to twenty-four,
Four and twenty (fearful age)
Places us at manhood's stage.—
Of wisdom we should have a store,
When arriv'd at twenty-four.
'Tis not mine to pluck the flow'r,
Now I've got to twenty-four;—
Childhood's days are known no more
When our years are twenty-four.
Many dream of fortune—pow'r,—
When advanc'd to twenty-four.
Let me after virtue soar,
Now arriv'd at twenty-four.
Alas! who knows, 'chance long before
I have doubled twenty-four,
Pain and pleasure floated by,
Mine will be Eternity.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The enclosed lines were shown me this day as the production of a very amiable lady in this town. I was so much struck with the picture of maternal affection, piety of sentiment, and beauty of expression, that I immediately determined on taking a copy and handing it to you, feeling confident that you would afford it insertion in your interesting miscellany.

I am, &c.

LINES

Addressed to one who seemed to doubt the eternal happiness of those who die in Infancy.

Oh! say not, in pity, a flame so bright,
Tho' quenched in its earliest hour,
Shall set in the shades of eternal night,
To rise no more.

Oh! rather say that the spirit of light
To a frame so unworthy given,
Ere it caught the taint of corruption's blight
Flew back to Heaven.

Ah! do ye not hear the voice of wail
As it floats on the midnight air?
Ah! see ye that mourner, with watching pale,
As she kneels in pray'r!

Ah! mark ye that eye with distraction wild?
Those tears that unceasing flow?
'Tis a mother who weeps o'er her only child,—
Her hope below!

Her blossom of beauty is torn from her side,
The plant she so tenderly cherish'd
In the earliest dawn of its youthful pride
Has untimely perish'd.

Yet, mark, as she bends o'er her infant's bier,
A radiance illumines her brow,
A smile dispurses the gathering tear—
Yes! she smiles in woe.

For she feels that a heavenly hand shall nourish,
And shield it from sorrow and care,
Shall transplant it to bowers of bliss, to flourish
Immortally there.

And say! would you blast a hope so pure?
Would you quench the consoling ray
That bids her with patient affliction endure,
And points to a brighter day?

Ah no! then say not a flame so bright,
Thus quenched in its earliest hour,
Shall lie in the shades of eternal night
To rise no more!

Oh! rather say that the spirit of light,
To a frame so unworthy given,
Ere it caught the taint of corruption's blight,
Has escaped to Heaven!

But weep no more—thy infant is not dead;
He lives—but not in this frail house of clay—
The little prisoner of earth is fled
To realms of day:—

Where cherubim and seraphim adore,
Far, far above this darkness earthly clod;
He stands in rapturous ecstasy before
His Father God.

THE YORKSHIRE ALEHOUSE.

(From the London Magazine.)

"A dusty road makes a drouthy passenger." Such was the motto which, written beneath an open mouth and a foaming tankard, seemed to frame an excuse for the wayfarer whom it sought to entice into an alehouse in one of the woody dales of merry old Yorkshire. To the enticement of this homely sign and summer proverb, the house held out the farther, but more dubious inducement, of a mounted Saint George slaying the dragon, bearing a notice, in the manner of a legend, "entertainment for man and horse." More comprehensible symbols of good and various cheer abounded; the burnished bottoms of pewter drinking-vessels were seen, elevating and elevated, within the open windows, and amid the summer air—the smacking of palm on palm, in friendly and clamorous salutation, was heard; while before the door stood, with interlaced bridles, many horses, neighing an acknowledgment over their corn to the anxious steeds of passing travellers, who, with eyes averted from the pressing seductions of the change-house, hastened on to more remote accommodation. The great northern waggon, heaped houses high with the woollen treasures of the county, and drawn tediously along by ten fine horses, stood by the way-side, watched by a vigilant bull-dog, while its cautious conductors sat within sight, giving, at every mingled morsel of beef and ale they despatched, a wary glance at their travelling repository of English wealth. Nor was this caution without cause—for a roving horde of gypsies had pitched their tent within sight, under the shelter of a holly-tree—the thin blue smoke from their little fire curled quietly upward into the twilight air, and half a dozen asses grazed at a short tether-length, with the double burthen of old brass, and tawny children, on their backs. A fair-haired girl waved the ringlets backwards on her shoulders, as she glided towards them, bearing a flagon of ale, and returned not without the assurance of a merry bridal, and a potent bridegroom, from the presiding sybil of the horde. I saw her look at her white palm, as she came smiling back; every step she took was lighter with increase of joy; while a head or two, with tawny visages and sun-burnt locks, looked after her with a suppressed laugh, enjoying the double pleasure of having passed upon her credulous heart, and unpractised eye, imaginary happiness and a bad sixpence.

The alehouse itself was not without its external attractions. It stood on the verge of an ancient forest, where the cultivated and uncultivated land met; and it presented to the highway a peaked and carved front of stone, of that mixed style common in the days of Queen Bess and King James. The architraves of door and windows had been covered with rich carving; and the heads of deer, and chace-dogs, and hunting horns and bows, might still be distinguished amid the profusion of leaf and blossom with which the skill of the carver had wreathed each window-lintel. An infant river was seen glimmering among the short massy shafts of a multitude of oak and elm-trees, which studded an extensive pasture land in front; while behind, a pretty abrupt hill, clothed to the summit with natural wood, interposed between the eastern blast and this ancient hunting-lodge of a branch of the house of Percy. I am not one insensible to the influence of ancient names; and I love those of our old English and Scotch worthies before the names of all meaner persons. I also know that a baron's hall in romance is a right hospitable place with an open door and a full table smoking with festal dinners; and that a palace in poetry is a place flooded with nectar, and strewn with couches, and filled with luxuriant feasting, and ringing with pleasant sounds. But by the honest faith of one who has travelled far, and proved the matter by that rough instructor—experience, I have ever found the best accommodation and comfort in places where aristocratical poesy, and regal romance, had no colours to bestow; and I care not who hears me declare that to the palace of a Percy, a Howard, or a Dacre, I prefer the humble house of homely comfort before me—and that, to the fellowship of lords, I prefer that of Gilbert Gauntree, the owner of the George and Dragon, there where he stands filling up the porch with his most portly person—a visible type of excellent ale and soft accommodation—a personification of provincial jollity and good cheer.

I might as well have said sooner, that I had been on the road from the rising of the sun, and it was now setting—that the day had been close and saltry, and the motion of our horses (for you will find presently that I had a companion) had stirred the dust around us in clouds, rendering a place of rest a desirable thing. As I turned my horse's head to the house, the owner moved towards me with what speed he might—the earth, accustomed to the load, forbore to groan; but it certainly shook while my horse—purchased among a spare race of people, and unacquainted with the miracles which the fattened calf and the foaming tankard work among the jolly children of the south—stood stone-still, and seemed to examine, with a suspicious eye, the approach of this walking prodigy. "Welcome, master, welcome," said he of the George and Dragon; "a dusty road makes a drouthy passenger, as the sign says—and, if ye were as dry as dust, I have the stuff that will slocken ye, as the cannie lads of the north say." My horse, at this address, slackened his knees, unarched his neck, and, compressing his nostrils, broke out with a long quavering neigh, which had more of a laugh in it than I ever heard in any uttered sound short of a human laugh. Whether laughter or speech, honest Gilbert began to interpret it to his own advantage: "Aye, aye, my bonnie grey, that was a neigh demanding winnowed corn—and corn thou shalt have, lad, a heaped measure—thou mightest have neighed long for corn in Scotland, I trow—there heather springs, instead of hay, and corn-cakes grow like cockles. Whew, Dicken, boy, Dicken—plague on thee for a snail; canst thou not leap instead of crawl? Art thou twenty-seven stone neat of flesh and bone, like thy master, that thou comest as if thy boots were lead? Here, take this horse, and rub him down like a lord's, and litter him to the knees." And, giving the horse to a kind of goblin of all work, he turned to me, and said, "Now, master, come to as good a supper as ever smoked, as soft a bed as ever weary bones rested in, and a flagon of as nappy ale as ever reamed o'er the lips of a bicker, as ye say in the north—for a cannie Scotchman I trow ye be." "But, honest Gilbert," said I, "how knowest thou that I am from the north? Resolve me that, thou slender lord of the open mouth and the drouthy motto—thou entertainer of man and horse." "Ah, master," replied he, "these are the marks which I know the three kingdoms by. 'Foremost of all comes my hot Irishman, shouting out 'Wine! by the powers, wine! Ale, you tun of man! would you poison a born gentleman with your muddy ale?—By Saint Patrick, I shall grow as thick i' the wit as one of you foggy islanders, if I drink such vile potations—I disown the drink, by the hand of Noah, who plucked the first grape.' Next comes my own happy countryman, finding fault with every thing, devouring every thing, and paying for every thing. He curses the post-boy for going too slow—and time, for going too fast—vows we have never had good weather since the French Revolution—nor aught but dusty roads since the change of ministry—drinks a bottle of brandy to cool himself—eats three pounds of the best beef in the North Riding to make him sleep sound—grows a prayer—and goes to bed with his boots on. And, lastly, comes my cautious Scot—he walks round the house three times—ponders upon the sign—dives into the meaning of the motto—tells the waiter it is a Scottish proverb, and asks him the price of his twopenny ale, and what is the charge of an hour's sleep by the fire. Ah, sir, they are a cannie people—I could pick ye out a Scotchman among a thousand men—the land of cakes appears at the second word he speaks."

While Gilbert was concluding this hasty sketch of national character, I began to fear that my companion, faint with the heat and weary with the long journey, would become anxious to know if accommodation for the night could be obtained. The look of the establishment satisfied me that this abounded; so I waved my hand, and forward she came. "I swear by the drouth of man, by which I live," said he of the George and Dragon, "that here comes a lady to be my guest. Bless her sweet face, and her kindly look. I will wait upon her myself—it will do my heart good." And, setting himself in motion, and shouting out, "Rebecca, love! Rebecca!" he produced a chair, and, with unlooked-for agility, placed it for my companion to dismount by, softened down the rough outward man, and demeaned himself like one aware that good manners and civil carriage were necessary now. His daughter Rebecca came—a sweet slender girl of seventeen, with a light foot and a merry eye, and cheeks like the damask rose. "Rebecca, my love!" said he, "show this lady into the little chamber with the brown hangings—wait upon her, and see that all is in order. The room, madam, is as fragrant as a rose—the floor as white as a lily—the bed as soft as down can be, and the sheets are like new-fallen snow. There's not such a chamber in all the North Riding. And these words of boast, madam, are not mine—they are the words of young lady Kiplettillem, who slept here when she ran away, and was wed to lance Corporal Maccraw, of the Fusiliers. And now," said he, as my companion followed Rebecca, with a smile at Gilbert's historical notice of the promised chamber, "let me do the needful to your honour. Will you like to sit in the parlour by yourself, and look at my paintings till dinner is ready?"

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE CHIEFTAIN'S SON.

(By Mrs. Hemans.)

Yes, it is ours!—the field is won,
A dark and evil field!
Lift from the ground my noble son,
And bear him homewards on his bloody shield!

Let me not hear your trumpet's ring,
Swell not the battle-horn!
Thoughts far too sad those notes will bring,
When to the grave my glorious flower is borne!

Speak not of victory! in the name
There is too much of woe!
Hush'd be the empty voice of Fame
—Call me back his whose graceful head is low!

Speak not of victory!—from my halls
The sunny hour is gone!
The ancient banner on my walls
Must sink ere long—I had but him—but one!

Within the dwelling of my sires
The hearths will soon be cold,
With me must die the beacon fires
That stream'd at midnight from the mountain-hold.

And let them fade, since this must be,
My lovely and my brave!
Was thy bright blood pour'd forth from me,
And is there but for stately youth a grave?

Speak to me once again, my boy!
Wilt thou not hear my call?
Thou wert so full of life and joy,
I had not dreamt of this—that thou couldst fall!

Thy mother watches from the steep
For thy returning plume;
How shall I tell her that thy sleep
Is of the silent house, th' untimely tomb?

Thou didst not seem as one to die,
With all thy strong renown!
—Ye saw his falchion's flash on high,
In the mid-figh, when spears and crests went down!

Slow be your march!—the field is won!
A dark and evil field!
Lift from the field my noble son,
And bear him homewards on his bloody shield.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The following pleasing lines, are inscribed in a cavern (called Reynard's Banqueting House) at Hawkstone, the seat of Sir John Hill, (Lord Hill's father) near Shrewsbury, and as they are not generally known, they will prove interesting to many of your readers. Yours, &c. GEORGIUS.

Long unmolested in his sport,
Here Reynard held his festive court,
While scatter'd turkeys, geese, and chickens,
Proclaim'd bold Reynard's dainty pickings;
Thus thieves oft-times most nicely feed,
While honest men are left in need!

REYNARD'S REPLY.

Hated by all, what can I do!
Sure I must eat as well as you.
Instinct, not vice, points out my food,
And tells poor Reynard what is good.
Can I the laws of nature change,
Which force me out by night to range?
Doom'd to defy the farmer's ire,
(When oft his rusty gun mis'd fire)
Can I the fates of hunger stay,
No more eat fowls, or feed on hay?
Behold me, at the risk of life,
Evade the watchful farmer's wife;
With pickfork arm'd, (I own the fact,
Old Maryret caught me in the act)
Mounted she stood on ladder's height,
Resolv'd to see, one moonshine night,
What thief, with two legs or with four,
Had stole of chickens half a score;
Whilst, of her family beset,
The ancient hen alone was left.
Instant upon the roost I sprang,
While Maryret to her ladder clung,
Then hurl'd her pitchfork at my head,
And cried, "I've kill'd the villain dead!"
But while she spoke, down slipp'd old Peg,
And, by good luck, she broke her leg.
But there's a charge, I can't endure—
Why I am deem'd an epicure.
When an old turkey from her nest,
Of all my meals is oft the best?
So hard, so tough, so out of season,
To call me nice shows want of reason.
Once when I gnaw'd John Dobson's goose,
My jaws were tired, my teeth were loose:
No wonder; when I understood
She just had hatch'd her twentieth brood;
But truly, if I might presume,
The cackling dame had saved old Rome.
Is it my crime to eat undress'd?
What's tortur'd by your cooks profess'd?
What though I neither roast nor boil,
I nought by pampering sauces spoil:
Anchovy, Cayen, Chutney,
Are all alike unknown to me;
And 'tis a truth by all confess'd,
That of all sauces hunger's best.

But hark, each censuring child of man,
Then blame poor Reynard if you can;
This lesson learn—what want requires,
And what mere wantiness desires,
Short are the terms, distinct and clear,
As in one instance shall appear:
By keenest want alone oppress'd,
The harmless Hare I ne'er distress'd;
While the great Nimrods of the day,
When to the chase they haste away,
With hearts unfeeling, to prolong
The griefs which cause the hunting song.
No sport can boast, no joys can know,
But what from helpless sorrow flow,
Or eke from mine with—Talle-hoe!

THE CLUB.

No. XXXIV.—FRIDAY, JUNE 27, 1823.

To the Members of the Club at the Green Dragon,—

GENTLEMEN,

I recollect that when I was at school, nothing pleased me more than to have my task performed by some of my companions. This was particularly the case when objects of a different kind occupied my attention. Often have I been placed in a very awkward situation, when a school exercise has prevented me from partaking with others, of an interesting game, or a pleasant excursion. Under these embarrassments, to be supplied with assistance which set me free for the time at liberty, was a pleasure which I still remember, as among the greatest enjoyments of my early life. Every one who has been brought up in a public school, can sympathize with me in these feeling recollections.

They have taught me one lesson which I hope I shall never forget: The pleasure which I, when a youth, received from the friendly assistance just mentioned, has induced me to afford to others, during the rest of my life, any aid which I could offer, and they might require. When a man is inclined to be generous, he is not long before he finds objects upon which he can bestow his favours. I have found many; and in the exercise of this quality, I have discovered that there is pleasure to be derived from conferring a benefit, as well as in receiving one. I perceive, Gentlemen, that I am, all at once, becoming egotistical; but let it be considered, in my behalf, that a person who always speaks well of others, ought to be allowed to speak sometimes favourably of himself. An egotist may be less vain than the person who condemns him. I always suspect the man who rails at the vanity of others. It is generally only an artifice to conceal his own.

I perceive, Gentlemen, with regret, that other pursuits, doubtless of more importance, have caused you to suspend those interesting articles to which I always looked forward, at regular intervals, with pleasurable expectation; I have, therefore, consistently with my usual practice, resolved to supply you, as far as in my power, with occasional assistance.

For my services, you will not, I persuade myself, long have occasion.—The vacational rambles of the School-master; the low spirits of the Doctor; the business of the Secretary, or the curious reveries of the Antiquarian, with various pursuits of the other members, may only exist for a season, after which you will, I trust, return to your literary labours with renewed activity.

I have, indeed, heard it whispered that the Club has been discontinued. That there are persons who, for reasons best known to themselves, should desire this report to be true, I have some ground for suspecting. But I have the pleasure to believe, that these persons who, I doubt not, think themselves very shrewd and very knowing, will be disappointed.

I always listen with interest to every thing which transpires respecting your lucubrations. Upon this subject, I purpose to send you, now and then, a few particulars. Allow me to assure you, in support of my own good opinion in your favour, that I never heard your papers spoken of with disrespect, excepting by a stupid fellow, or by an old maid.

I have heard the Club criticized by those who could not put three sentences together in English. One person, who has no learning enough to write an intelligible note of invitation, took upon him, forsooth, to make some very grave remarks upon the style of your papers. I have, moreover, heard several very wise personages complain that your articles are very dull, and cry out for ludicrous papers, as if you were a set of literary merry-andrews, and had no other object but to keep your readers always grinning! I trust, however, that you will never condescend to encourage this perverted taste. The notion which this class of critics seem to have of your views, reminds me of an anecdote which was related to me some years ago.—Two Cockneys were making an excursion of pleasure through some of the most beautiful and romantic parts of Scotland.—They observed, at some short distance, a building apparently deserted, which awakened their curiosity. One of them went up to some women, whom they saw in an adjoining field, and eagerly inquired the name of the old castle, while he pointed his finger in a self-important manner, to the building in question. It was not until after much explanation that he could make the women comprehend what he meant. At last, after they had stared at the stranger, and then cast a side glance at each other, one of them answered, with a most tantalizing smile, (the effect of which was increased by her attempts to conceal it)—“that castle, Sir!—that’s no a castle—it’s its only our pigeon house, Sir!” The traveller, mortified by this exposure of his mistake, and hardly knowing which way to look, hastened to his friend, determined to be more circumspect in his future inquiries.

It has even been conjectured in print, that all the papers of the Club are written by one pen. The author of the remark perhaps wished to shew the acuteness of his critical talents. I should not be surprised if the sagacity of this gentleman enable him to discover, that even this letter has been composed by the single author of the Club. Allow me to assure him, that he will not by any means, give me offence by the propagation of such a conjecture. I would also whisper to him, that he may circulate the report with perfect safety; since, for the reason which I have just mentioned, I shall not take any trouble to set him right.

I have dwelt in this letter so long on affairs of a personal nature, that I am obliged to defer topics of a more general kind till a future period.

If you think an appearance of harshness, in some of the preceding remarks, rather incompatible with my prudential character, I beg you will attribute the circumstance to my zeal in your favour, which will hardly let me give a person credit for possessing common sense when I hear him indulge in a censorious or an idle remark at the expense of the Club.

I remain, Gentlemen,
Your warm advocate and friend,
ANTHONY PRUDENT.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

Comical stories them, Mr. Editor, about the lemmings and foxes; and perhaps many people would doubt the truth of the account, and the traveller to the North Cape be considered cousin-german to Baron Munchausen. In such matters I am little skilled; but the following plain statement of facts was given by Old Ben Marlin to some young sprigs of fashion, who listened with wonder and astonishment.—“Why say, young gentlemen, you may well say sailors see strange things. They are a sort of hum-ab-ius animals, that often stand in the imminent deadly breach, as Shakespear has it; for d’ye see, the breech of a gun is its stern, as a body may say; and I’ve often elevated and depress’d my breech when the shots were flying about so thick, that you couldn’t stick a marlin-spike atwixt ‘em. Well, I often wonder I didn’t get knock’d down in the many blow-ups I’ve been in, but suppose I was bomb-proof. I remember when I was boatswain’s mate of the Firefly frigate, Captain Tommymhawk, we were cruising off the coast of Norway to look for the flying Dutchman, ‘cause, d’ye see, the Nabob of Arcot—him as lives at Pondicherry, in the north of Scotland—had sent an express to the Lords of the Admiralty in a fire-balloon, to inform ‘em she was cruising about there, to the great annoyance of our merrytime subjects; so we were commissioned to send the ghost aloft in a shower of Congreve’s rockets. Well, d’ye see, we’d got as far northward as sixty-six, when one afternoon, about three o’clock, it being then pitch dark, we catch’d sight of her. Up comes Captain Tommymhawk; he was a ruddy subject, always full of spirits, and so was the first Lieutenant for matter o’ that. Well, we made all sail in chase, and the officers swore it was she; for which ever way we put the ship’s head, still she was on the starboard-bow, and none but a fan-tom could do that. The rockets were prepared, the matches were lighted; and just as we were going to fire, the officer of the watch discovered we had been chasing the anchor-stock that stuck up above the cat-head, and look’d large in the dark; but that warn’t the best of it, for it came on to blow great guns. The wind was at south-sou-north, and we lay a north-east and by west course. The night was as black as the Emperor of Morocco; however, we got her under close-reef’d pudding-bags, balanced the cook’s apron for a try-sail, and stow’d the masts down in the hold. Away she went—sky-pole and bobbing-pole, scupper-hole and hawse-hole, all under water. It took five men to hold the Captain’s hat on, and we were obliged to shove our heads down the hatchways to draw breath. The first Lieutenant had all his hair blown off, and has worn a wig ever since. The Boatwain’s call was jam’d so fast in his jaws, that it took a dozen men to bowse it out with a watch-tackle. The Master was bellowing through his speaking-trumpet, when a squall took every tooth out of his head as clean as a whistle. His gums were as bare as the hour he was born, but that didn’t matter; he lived on suction, grog, and bacca, though he’s chew’d upon it ever since. Oh what a sight to see the whales and dolphins jumping over us just like flying fish! and a shark swallowed the jolly-boat at one gulp! We drove all night, and about eleven o’clock next forenoon, just as day began to break, we heard a most tremendous roaring; it was like—but I can’t tell you what it was like. The charts were examined, and every body pull’d long faces, for it was discovered to be the Moll-strum, that swallows every thing up. My eyecse, there was a pretty perdieckment! When it was broad day-light we were close to it, and nothing could save us. You’ve seen soap-suds run round in a ring down a gully-hole? Well, what do you think of a whirlwind—a whirlpool I mean, whose horror-face was as wide as it is from here to Jerusalem? Ah, you may stare! but it was a complete earthquake. Up comes the Chaplain, and he soon began his dive-ocean, for a lump of a sea lifted him up above the heads of the people, and overboard he went; but we saw him afterwards on the back of the Monument; but still we kept on an even keel, though I’m certain we went at the rate of fifty miles a minute, and floated on the surface of the whirlpool. They said this was occasioned by gravitation. I know we were all grave enough upon the occasion, expecting to be buried alive. Well, we kept at this for some hours, and then the Captain swore we should come out at the other end of the globe; and he supposed the French man who found out the variation of the compass proceeded from an internal motion, had gone that way before us. For my part I couldn’t tell what to make of it. Well, we kept at this, as I told you before, for some hours, when it began to get plaguy hot, and the water steam’d again. ‘Boiling springs!’ says the Captain; we’re under Lepland, and the witches are all at work under this huge cauldron! We had only to dip our beef overboard, and it was cook’d in two minutes! Well, young gentlemen, we soon found out where we were; for though ‘twas as dark—aye, as black as my hat one minute, yet in an instant, in an amagraphy, I may say, we burst from the water into the middle of a roaring fire, and was shot out of the top of Mount Hecla like a pellet from a pop-gun. How would you like that now? How high we went I can’t say, but the sparks got hold of the rockets and set them off; and I understand the Astronomer Royal, at the house up there, was looking out that night, and took it for a whole fleet of comets. We had a fine bird’s-eye view of the world—saw Captain Parry jam’d up in the ice, Captain Franklin chasing the wolves, and Mr. Brookes killing the lemmings. Well, I can’t say how high we went. Says the Master, says he, ‘A little higher, my lads, and we shall be able to catch hold of the tail of the Great Bear, pass a hawser round it, and make fast to repair damages; but mind your helm, boy, yer ‘un spur us on to Boetes, knock Kiss-you-peeper out of her chair, or run away with the Northern crown—though the Emperor of Russia takes pretty good care of that! However, we didn’t go quite so high, but come rattling down in a tremendous hurry, pass’d close to Riggles in Li-o, and nearly poked the eye out of Medusa's head. Well, we fell at last upon a mountain of snow, keel downwards; it broke our fall, and happily we sustained but little injury—made a fine dock for ourselves—shored the frigate up—got all afloat in a few days—and waited for the melting of the snow; when one morning the stocks fell, and we were left upon the wide ocean. The fact was, we had tumbled on to the back of a kraken that had been asleep for a century; the snow had gathered upon him in mountains; our thump woke him, though I suppose it took a fortnight to do it thoroughly; down he went, and we returned in safety to Old England! Here I am, you see, God bless His Majesty!—all dangers past—safe moored at last in Greenwich Hospital. I've nothing to complain of but one thing, and I think if I was to write to the Commander-in-chief at the Parliament-House, he'd take it under his pious consideration; and that's this here: We ought to get our bacca duty free, as we used to do in actual service. My old Captain, Sir Joseph, might jaw a bit about it, and come York over 'em; and Sir Isaac Coffin, however grave on other subjects, ought not to be mute in this, but commence undertaker in the cause, that we mayn't get pall'd at last, and have it shrouded in obscurity, or buried in oblivion; for d'ye see, right Virginia is a baccanalian treat to such a dry quid snuff as

AN OLD SAILOR.

'A LONDON GHOST.'

(From Ghost Stories, just published.)

'In the year 1704, a gentleman, to all appearance, of large fortune, took furnished lodgings in a house in Soho Square. After he had resided there some weeks with his establishment, he lost his brother, who had lived at Hampstead, and who, on his death-bed, particularly desired to be interred in the family-vault at Westminster Abbey. The gentleman requested his landlord to permit him to bring the corpse of his brother to his lodgings, and to make arrangements there for the funeral. The landlord, without hesitation, signified his compliance.

'The body, dressed in a white shroud, was accordingly brought in a very handsome coffin, and placed in the great dining-room. The funeral was to take place the next day, and the lodger and his servants went out to make the necessary preparations for the solemnity. He staid out late; but this was no uncommon thing. The landlord and his family, conceiving that they had no occasion to wait for him, retired to bed as usual about twelve o'clock. One maid-servant was left up to let him in, and to boil some water, which he had desired might be ready for making tea on his return. The girl was accordingly sitting all alone in the kitchen, when a tall, spectre-looking figure entered, and clapped itself down in a chair opposite to her.

'The maid was by no means one of the most timid of her sex; but she was terrified beyond expression, lonely as she was, at this unexpected apparition. Uttering a loud scream, she flew out like an arrow at a side door, and hurried to the chamber of her master and mistress. Scarcely had she awakened them, and communicated to the whole family some portion of the fright with which she was herself overwhelmed, when the spectre, enveloped in a shroud, and with a face of death-like paleness, made its appearance, and sat down in a chair in the bed-room, without their having observed how it entered. The worst of all was, that this chair stood by the door of the bed-chamber, so that not a creature could get away without passing close to the apparition, which rolled its glaring eyes so frightfully, and so hideously distorted its features, that they could not bear to look at it. The master and mistress crept under the bed-clothes, covered with profuse perspiration, while the maid-servant sunk nearly insensible by the side of the bed.

'At the same time the whole house seemed to be in an uproar; for though they had covered themselves over head and ears, they could still hear the incessant noise and clatter, which served to increase their terror.

'At length all became perfectly still in the house. The landlord ventured to raise his head, and to steal a glance at the chair by the door; but, behold, the ghost was gone! Sober reason began to resume its power. The poor girl was brought to herself after a good deal of shaking. In a short time, they plucked up sufficient courage to quit the bed-room, and to commence an examination of the house, which they expected to find in great disorder. Nor were their anticipations unfounded. The whole house had been stripped by artful thieves, and the gentleman had decamped without paying for his lodging. It turned out that he was no other than an accomplice of the notorious Arthur Chambers, who was executed at Tyburn in 1706; and that the supposed corpse was this arch-roguer himself, who had whitened his hands and face with chalk, and merely counterfeited death. About midnight he quitted the coffin, and appeared to the maid in the kitchen. When she flew up stairs, he softly followed her, and, seated at the door of the chamber, he acted as a sentinel, so that his industrious accomplices were enabled to plunder the house without the least molestation.'

THE GOOD OLD TIMES.

(Translated from the French.)

Yesterday I had a fine dream, which I will relate, that our philosophers or our divines may explain it to me. I found myself in the midst of a vast plain, covered with a countless multitude of men of all countries and of all ages, from Kamtschatka to Spain, and from the fat lux up to the present time. I was with my aunt, a good old woman, very fond of old customs and of good old times. As soon as she espied a man in the costume of Louis the Fourteenth's time, she exclaimed, 'Oh, what good times there were during that great king's reign!'—'Devil take thee, silly conceited old woman,' replied the man in a large wig, 'those times were hellish: wars, misery, crimes, corruption, meanness, and pride, were what I witnessed under this great monarch. But look at that man in his broad-brimmed hat, his plaited collar, and large shoes, he has seen good times, for he lived under the good Henry IV.'—'Plague take the fool,' returned the man in question; 'I saw nothing but civil wars, rebellions, assassinations, monkish superstitions, poisonings, and famine; yonder warrior, doubtless, knew good times, for his dress bespeaks him to have been a soldier of the great Charlemagne.'—'Thou art terribly out in thy reckoning,' answered Charlemagne's knight; 'Hast thou not heard of the sorcerers of those times, of the excesses committed under the cloak of religion, of the peasantry preyed upon by the vassals, the vassals by the petty gentry, the petty gentry by the liege lords, and the liege lords themselves despoiled by the monks? Observe that man in a tunic, he is a Roman and must have known good times.' 'Ignorant Gaul!' said the man of the Tiber, 'thou hast then neither read Suetonius nor Tacitus. Thou knowest nothing of Tiberius, Caligula, Nero, nor Caracalla! Cast your eyes upon that man in a toga; he is the one who has seen good times; he served under the republic.' 'By Bacchus,' exclaimed the man with a long curly beard, 'thou speakest of what thou knowest little of. Thy boasted republic was a barbarous period; wars, battles, combats, carnage, deceivings, tribunes, revolutions, the agrarian law, elections determined by blows, perpetual dictatorships, proscriptions,—were those good times! Look at that man wearing a chlamys, he was more fortunate; his, indeed, were good times.' 'Yes,' answered the Athenian, 'the iron age! Poor Greece, always the prey of tyrants or rogues; a hundred little states ever ready to attack their neighbours or quarrel among themselves,—petty kingdoms, small republics, tyranny, aristocracy, democracy, oligarchy, factions, wars, treasons, and slavery, under the name of liberty—such was Greece. Yonder man, who wears a tiara, lived under Semiramis, and those were the only good times.' 'O Heavens! what nonsense!' exclaimed the man in the mitre, 'Nineveh, Ecbatana, Babylon, Suza, Persepolis, were all infamous cities; the age was corrupt, and miserable Asia knew neither peace nor happiness; these, however, were once to be found. See yon venerable old man,—he is Adam; he knew good times—no one else has known them.' 'May the serpent bite thee, with thy good times!' replied the first of men; 'there existed then but one woman, she was a coquette. I had but two sons—one killed the other. Look at the angels, they have known good times.' 'Thou liest,' cried Lucifer; 'the angels fought each other like devils, and even attacked the Divinity; and if the Supreme himself has seen good times, it was before he called any being into existence.'

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—When I last addressed you by letter, containing two songs, the music of which still rings in my ears, I little thought that I was copying the compositions of the sweet warbler, whose lips so gently breathed forth the dulcet sounds; but I have seen her, I have heard her story, and again listened to the melody of her voice. Though once beautiful, grief has marked her brow, and a heavy sadness has stamped her countenance; yet, through this dark foreground the lustre of her black eyes shines more powerfully, and darts, a vivid radiance, from beneath the lashes. When I approached her, I discovered a manner so superior to the situation in which she was placed, a modesty of demeanor so striking, that I felt she was moved from a higher sphere, which she was evidently born to grace and dignity. I was prepared for the interview, having made the errand for the sole purpose of hearing her. One of the pieces, she sung in a low and melancholy strain, and I found it impossible to catch more than a fragment. The other I have added; but faint is the representation of what I enjoyed, the words without the music being as far from the perfection in which I heard them, as the wild Indians' war-cry is from the power and beauty of our martial music.

Tho' later now the day-light sets
Tho' spring in beauty's come,
Tho' lovely blow the violets,
Yet Edward's far from home.

He promis'd ere the winter drear,
That he would come to me,
But far away is Edward dear
Upon the stormy sea.

Oh, may his lot be kinder now
When Edward shall regain,
Once more, his native shores—but how Till then ease I my pain?

I'll rest me where the willows weep,
Beside the gentle stream,
I'll lay me on the bank, and sleep,
And of my Edward dream.

I'll rest me where the rushes grow,
Along the river side,
And as the gentle waters flow,
I'll murmur to the tide.

Then Edward come, nor tarry more
Upon the stormy sea,
But haste, and live with her e'er more
Who only lives for thee.

Thus she finished and my errand was completed—I saw and heard her.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE WHITE AND BLACK ANTS OF INDIA*

The following observations on the habits of two species of Indian ants, were communicated by a person who resided some time in India. They are more worthy of attention, because they tend to confirm some of the most interesting facts mentioned by Smeathman and others, whose narratives have been suspected of exaggeration; and were made by a lady, who was wholly unacquainted with the writings of these authors:

'The White Ant of India is particularly fond of burrowing in the mud walls of the Indian houses. My attention was one morning attracted by the appearance of a wet spot on the coloured wall of my apartment, at a season, and in a situation, to preclude the supposition of this having been occasioned by rain, or by accident. This led me to examine the spot, and, on slightly touching it, the plaster gave way, and I discovered that a part of the wall behind was hollow. From this I concluded that there was a nest of young ants lodged in it; and, on looking narrowly, I heard a sound produced by a rapid succession of strokes, a mimic alarm-beat, and immediately a great number of white ants came to the place, with their mouths filled with wet mud, with which they repaired the breach in a few minutes. Their whole proceedings were so curious and interesting, that I frequently amused myself with pulling down what they repaired, and observed that there was always an alarm beat before they came to build it up.

* This interesting notice was communicated to Dr. Brewster, by Dr. Trail of Liverpool.

† The White Ant of India is Termes bellicosus, Linn.

"I have been highly amused with the conduct of the Black Ants, animals much more daring, though less destructive, than the white ones. I have often observed, that when one or two of them found a large dead insect, or any such substance, too big for them to carry off, that they would go away, and soon return with a number of their species sufficient for the purpose. A gentleman several times sprinkled one or two black ants, engaged in examining a dead insect, with hair powder. They retreated, and soon after he saw his powdered acquaintances at the head of a large column of ants, marching to secure the prize, which had been discovered by their scouts. I have also observed the black ants removing from one place to another in a large body, marching in a very regular column, excepting a few, who seemed to act as overseers. These last marched on each side of the large body, and occasionally turned back, when any thing deranged the line of march; and they never failed to hasten the advance of the loiterers."

* The black Ant of India appears, from description, to be the Formica elongata, Linn.

MANNERS OF THE ASIATIC RHINOCEROS.

The following very interesting account of the manners and habits of the Asiatic Rhinoceros, clothed in armour, and having the welled hide, has been given by Sir Everard Home, in a paper in the Philosophical Transactions for 1822. He obtained the particulars from the young man who was its keeper for three years at Exeter 'Change, where it died. "It was so savage," says he, "that about a month after it came, it endeavoured to kill the keeper, and nearly succeeded. It ran at him with the greatest impetuosity; but fortunately the horn passed between his thighs, and threw the keeper on its head: the horn came against a wooden partition, into which the animal had forced it to such a depth, as to be unable for a minute to withdraw it, and during this interval the man escaped. Its skin, though apparently so hard, is only covered with small scales, of the thickness of paper, with the appearance of tortoise-shell; at the edges of these, the skin itself is exceedingly sensible, either to the bite of a fly, or the lash of a whip; and the only mode of managing it at all, was by means of a short whip. By this discipline, the keeper got the management of it, and the animal was brought to know him; but frequently, more especially in the middle of the night, fits of frenzy came on, and, while these lasted, nothing could controul its rage, the rhinoceros running with great swiftness round the den, playing all kinds of antics, making hideous noises, knocking every thing to pieces, disturbing the whole neighbourhood, then all at once becoming quiet. While the fit was on, even the keeper durst not make his approach. The animal fell upon its knees, to enable the horn to bear upon any object. It was quick in all its motions, and devoured all kinds of vegetables, appearing to have no selection. They fed it on branches of the willow. It possesses little or no memory, dinged in one place, and, if not prevented, ate the dung, or spread it over the sides of the wall. Three years confinement made no alteration on its habits."—See Phil. Trans. 1822, 43, 44.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—A correspondent in your last No. wishes for some explanation of the following theory. "God, in creating the first individual of each species, animal or vegetable, not only gave form to the dust of the earth, but a principle of life, inclosing in each, a greater or smaller quantity of original particles, indestructible and common to all organized beings. These pass from body to body, supporting life, and ministering to the nutrition and growth of each. And when any body is reduced to ashes, these original particles, on which death has no power, survive and pass into other beings, bringing with them nourishment and life."—See page 11. This, I believe, has been the opinion of many philosophers, but evidently without a shadow of consistency. Some have even endeavoured to account for the origin of all organized beings by the fortuitous energy of these particles, but we have no evidence of their existence. It is altogether a gratuitous theory, a vain illusion of the imagination, the last refuge of Atheism. It is evidently a modification of the theory invented by Buffon. "He supposes there are certain indestructible particles of matter, capable of originally forming, and afterwards nourishing animals and vegetables, and that the arrangement constitutes the only difference betwixt a man and a cabbage." Thus doing away with the necessity of a Creator. What is meant by indestructible particles, I know not. The particles of matter are all indestructible. He who created matter can undoubtedly destroy it, yet each atom of the universe is numbered, and may bid bold defiance to every power short of Almighty. But this theory is, in all its parts, most absurd, and not worthy of a serious refutation. It is, however, acknowledged to be one of the brightest ever invented in support of Atheism.*

Pendleton, July 2nd, 1823.

A FRIEND.

* "The most beautiful theory, though equally untrue with the rest, is that of the elaborated natural historian Buffon. It is the most ingenious doctrine that has ever been held forth; and is certainly all but true."

THE CABINET.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—A friend of mine, some years since, having had the temerity to steal a kiss from the lips of a beautiful young lady; and being desirous of recovering the favour of his mistress, I was commissioned to write an apology for the offence. As the lady was of so christianian a disposition as not to let the sun go down upon her wrath, I am certain no one will be offended by seeing the lines in your entertaining publication.

THE STOLEN KISS—AN APOLOGY.

Why deny me, dear Laura, the sweets of the bliss,
That glows in the touch of an innocent kiss;
Why pout that sweet lip, at an action so civil,
That none can deny e'en the shadow of evil:
'Twas the sweet kiss of friendship! (not any thing more)
Of which, for my friends, I have myriads in store!

FOND FATHERS.—The warlike Agesilaus was, within the walls of his own house, one of the most tender and playful of men. He used to join with his children in all their innocent gambols, and was once discovered by a friend, showing them how to ride upon a hobby-horse. When his friend expressed some surprise at beholding the great Agesilaus so employed, "Wait," said the hero, "till you are yourself a father, and if you then blame me, I give you liberty to proclaim this act of mine to all the world."

The grave Socrates was once surprised in nearly a similar situation by Alcibiades, and made nearly the same answer to the scoffs of that gay patrician. "You have not," said he, "such reason as you imagine to laugh so, at a father playing with his child. You know nothing of that affection which parents have to their children; restrain your mirth till you have children of your own, when you will, perhaps, be found as ridiculous as I now seem to you to be."

The elder Cato, in the busiest periods of his life, always found time to be present at the bathing and dressing of his son; and when he grew up, would not suffer him to have any other master than himself. Being once advised to resign the boy to the care of some learned servant, he replied, that "He could not bear that any servant should pull his son by the ears, or that his son should be indebted for his learning and education to any other than himself."

Charles the Great was so fond a father, that he never dined nor supped without his children at table; he went no where, but he took them along with him; and when he was asked why he did not marry his daughters, and send his sons abroad to see the world, his reply was, "That he was sure he could not be able to bear their absence."

ANECDOTE OF NICOLÒ ISOARD, THE MUSICAL COMPOSER.—One day Nicolo went into the country to dine with the Count —, and, being extremely warm, he seized, as he entered, the first bottle which came to his hand. Supposing it was wine, he poured out a large glass, which he drank, and proceeded to the saloon, where he found a numerous company. Somebody remarked that he seemed disturbed, as in fact he was. On being pressed to explain the cause, he confessed to one of the ladies of the house that he felt a singular heat in his stomach, and feared that he might have made some mistake in the liquor he had been drinking: "Why did you not apply to one of the servants?" said the lady:—"do you know to what you have exposed yourself?" "No," replied the musician. "Why the liquor you have taken," she pursued, "is——" "Poison?" asked he in agitation. "Certainly, if the dose be too strong. It is a stomachic tincture, and should only be taken by drops." "My God, madam, what is it you tell me? I drank a whole glass full of it." "Well," said the lady, "the evil may happily be remedied; and, by good fortune, we have a physician here."

M. Musson, a notorious mystifier, was at hand. In the character of a physician, he ordered his poisoned patient some broth; tea, and a rigorous diet. But the last injunction was unnecessary, for the patient had already lost his appetite. The company then went to dinner; while poor Nicolo, remaining in bed, fulfilled with the most scrupulous punctuality the doctor's injunctions. Frequent messages were sent from the dining-room to ascertain the state of his health. At length they learnt that the heat had altogether subsided, but that a state of great weakness had succeeded, which was nothing more than a very ravenous appetite. They now thought that it was time to put an end to the joke: "You are a good deal better," said the physician to him, "and I think I may venture to let you take a little soup."

"A poisoned man eat soup! My dear doctor, do you think my stomach can digest it?"

As he continued to assert that he was poisoned, the physician asked him if he should know the bottle again from which he had drank. "Alas, yes, too well!" he replied. "Is this it?" "Exactly," "Well, then, we shall now finish it to your better health."

The bottle was then emptied by the company who stood around, and who invited poor Nicolo to leave his bed for the table. The poison was cherry-brandy.

EGOTISM.—Colardeau, who was celebrated for his charming versification, was carried off by a premature death. He was in the very extremity of his malady, when Barthe, a cotemporary writer, came to see him. Friendship for the dying man was, however, the last motive which had induced him; for Barthe, without being a bad man, was any thing but a sensitive one. Without troubling himself to inquire into the sick man's condition, he began to chatter to him about prose and verse, and soon drew from his pocket an enormous manuscript, which poor Colardeau, though surrounded by the terrors of death, could not look upon without trembling. "I wish," said Barthe, "to have your advice upon a comedy which I am about to finish. It is a large work; it is in five acts. I have entitled it Egotism, or the Selfish Man. Do not scruple to say what you think of it; for, to tell you the truth, I have come for the purpose of having your opinion."

"My good friend," said Colardeau, "the only and the best advice I can give you is, that you would try to introduce in your piece the incident of a man in perfect health coming to read to a poor creature in the last agonies a comedy in five acts—all through,—that is the most complete specimen of egotism that I can imagine."—And he expired.

VARIETIES.

PREVENTION OF DUELS.—The projector requires an Act, of the following nature, to be passed by the legislature, to ensure the total suppression of this honourable species of homicide throughout the kingdom, viz. "that all other methods of duelling shall be illegal and punishable by death, but that by pistols: that under the same penalty, the parties shall be obliged to fight in spencers, waistcoats, or coats without skirts, at their choice: that under the same penalty, they shall be compelled to stand with their backs facing each other: and, that under the same penalty, each shall take aim at the life of the other, by stooping himself forward, and firing between his own legs at his opponent. The projector contends, and it must be allowed with some show of truth, that the ludicrous position in which each party would view the other at the fatal moment, would inevitably lead to good humour and reconciliation. He further adds, that no man of honour, in his opinion, could think of taking another person's life behind his back, as he must do in the situation prescribed by the projector."

BRITISH MUSEUM.—The House of Commons has voted £40,000 to the British Museum, to be particularly applied for the reception of the King's Library. Mr. Croker made the strongest objections to the grant, and charged the Museum with insufficiencies and errors.

BESSEL'S SURVEY OF THE HEAVENS.—That excellent and assiduous astronomer, M. Bessel of Königsberg, is engaged in an important work, containing a Survey of the Heavens in zones. The first part of the work will speedily appear.

MR. RAMAGE'S NEW REFLECTING TELESCOPE OF A LARGE SIZE.—Mr. Ramage, of Aberdeen, has finished the speculum of a new reflecting telescope, FIFTY-THREE FEET in focal length. The diameter of the large speculum is twenty inches.

STEAM SHIPS BUILDING BY GOVERNMENT.—Two steam-vessels have just been fitted out in Deptford dock-yard, one of 225, and another of 180 tons burthen. Other two are building, each of 296 tons, and 126 feet long, to be impelled by engines of 100 horsepower.—London Journ. of Arts, vol. v. p. 151.

A CHANCERY MINUTE.—A celebrated Counsellor began his speech by stating that he should not, as his learned friend had done, tell his Lordship that he would only occupy his attention one minute, and then make it five-and-twenty: "however," continued the Barrister, "that is, I suppose; what my learned friend calls a Chancery minute."

RHEUMATISM AND GOUT.—A Frenchman, being afflicted with the gout, was asked, what difference there was between that and the rheumatism. "One very great difference!" (replied Monsieur) Suppose you take one vice, you put your finger in, you turn de screw, till you bear him no longer—that is de Rheumatism—den, suppose you give him one turn more, dat is de Gout."

LUDICROUS SPECTATOR.—On Monday morning, while the drovers were attempting to get four oxen into a slaughter-house behind a butcher's shop in Bow-street, Covent-garden, one of them, in passing through the passage of the house, took a sudden turn and walked up two pair of stairs into a front room, from the window of which he looked down on the astonished passengers!

METEORIC STONE IN THE DEPARTMENT OF THE VOSGES.—On the 18th September 1822, a meteoric stone fell in the commune of la Baffe, during a thunder storm, accompanied with intense lightning. At 7 A. M. a noise was heard like that of a carriage descending over a rough road; it lasted seven minutes, and became at last terrific. The meteor then exploded on the ground, and fragments of a meteoric stone were found in a round hole.—Ann. de Chim., vol. xxi. p. 17.

IRISH KNIGHTS.—Pursuant to a Royal Mandate, the Judges assembled on Tuesday at Lord Chief Justice Dallas's, to determine the question of the Lord Lieutenant's right to make Knights, which has for some time hung suspended between the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor General of England, and that of the Attorney and Solicitor General of Ireland.—The Chief Justice Dallas and Mr. Justice Richardson, were unable to attend through illness, but the other Judges decided in favour of the opinion given by the Attorney and Solicitor General of the Sister Kingdom, thereby establishing the right of the Lord Lieutenant to the privilege in question, and which we believe has been exercised without dispute for more than 500 years.

ON THE CAUSE OF THE ASCENT OF CLOUDS IN THE ATMOSPHERE.—M. Fresnel has ascribed the ascent of clouds in the atmosphere principally to the following cause. Air and all colourless gases allow the solar rays, and even radiant heat, to pass through them, without heating them sensibly. When a cloud, therefore, is composed of small globules of water, or minute crystals of snow, the air in the interior of the cloud becomes heated, by its numerous contacts with these globules which are susceptible of being heated. Hence the air will dilate, and the cloud will rise in the atmosphere, to a height depending on the fineness of the particles of the cloud, and on the intervals which separate them.—See the Bull. de la Soc. Math. in Oct. 1822, p. 159.

ON THE CAUSE OF THE SUSPENSION OF CLOUDS.—M. Gay Lussac, in the Ann. de Chim., vol. xvi. p. 59, ascribes the suspension of clouds to ascending currents, which push them upwards, until this force of impulsion is balanced by the weight of the cloud. A soap bubble, he remarks, will not rise in a room, but will descend directly when left to its own weight; but if the bubble is blown in the open air above a heated soil, it will rise to a height more or less considerably. It remains, however, to be determined, how much of this effect is owing to the cause assigned by M. Fresnel, and how much to the mere mechanical force of the current of heated air. It is quite obvious, that both causes operate to a certain extent.

GARRICK'S PICTURES.—The collection of pictures, once the property of the celebrated Garrick, were on Monday sold by auction by Mr. Christie. The room was crowded. The pictures were 71 in number. The lot which excited the greatest interest was the celebrated set of election pictures by Hogarth,—the Canvasser, the Poll, the Chairing, and the Election Feast. The first bidding for the set was 500 guineas; the price advanced to 1,650 guineas, at which sum they were purchased by Mr. Soane the architect. Another picture by Hogarth, the subject of which was "Garrick seated at a table, composing his prologue to Taste, and Mrs. Garrick behind interrupting him," sold at the low price of 70 guineas. Several landscapes by Wilson and Louthburgh, and a bust of Pope, created much competition.

COLOUR OF THE ARABIAN SEA.—Soon after two o'clock of February 12, 1811, a partial line of green water such as generally indicates shallows, and perfectly different from the blue of a deep sea, was perceived extending considerably. It appeared at first to be two or three miles before us, and was probably eight or nine from land. The navigating master did not suppose that it was occasioned by a shoal, but ascribed it rather to the late fall of rain. Some thought it the effect of tides, or feared that we had approached a sand bank; and the pilot acknowledged that many parts of this coast were but little known, as vessels mostly inclined to the opposite Arabian shore. Our ship, therefore, was put about. We then sounded, and were relieved from any apprehension by finding the depth to be sixty-three fathoms. Towards evening we sailed directly into the line of green water; and so strongly and suddenly was it distinguished from the blue surface which we had left, that, as a passenger remarked, the Lion must have been at one moment floating in a sea of two different colours. Here we again sounded, but could not find bottom at less than seventy-nine fathoms. Had this phenomenon been peculiar to the Persian Gulph, not far from the entrance to which we observed it, the epithet green, bestowed on that branch of the ocean by eastern geographers, would seem more applicable than many terms used in the description of other seas.—Gore Ouseley's Travels, vol. i. p. 152.

RULES FOR RIDING AND WALKING.

The rule of the road is a paradox quite,
In riding or driving along,
If you go to the left you are sure to be right,
If you go to the right you are wrong;
But the rule of the foot is as clear as the light,
And none can its reason withstand,
On each side of the way you must keep to the right,
And give all whom you meet the left hand.

FASHIONS FOR JULY.

MORNING DRESS.

Dress of plain jaconet muslin; the corsage made high, close to the shape, and fastened behind. The elegant fashion of ornamenting the front of the skirt has become very prevalent; many have a pagoda trimming formed by bands edged with cord, and narrow trimming of work descending gradually and regularly till it reaches the bottom, where there are four narrow worked flounces, each headed by flat corded bands, the upper one surmounted by a row of delicate insertion-work, the same as is introduced on each side of the pagoda trimming. The corsage is nearly covered with similar bands, corded, trimmed and arranged on clear book muslin, narrow at the waist both in front and back, but extending the whole width on the shoulder: falling collar of worked muslin leaves; long sleeve, nearly tight; worked ruffle, and small pagoda trimming at the wrist, where it is tied with primrose-colour ribbon drawn through a narrow puffing of book muslin; the epaulette is divided in the centre, and tied at the top in a bow, and trimmed with a row of puffed book muslin and narrow work.

Round morning cap of sprigged net satin, and primrose-colour gauze ribbon: border of British Mechin lace, plain in the front, and in large puffs on each side. Primrose-colour kid shoes and gloves.

BALL DRESS.

British tulle dress worn over a white satin slip: the corsage composed of white satin bands, branching from the front; each band corded and trimmed with narrow blond; two bands continue over the shoulder, and reweave the same trimming at the back: the sleeve is of the melon form, with sprays of satin combining the tulle; in the centre is a circular space, occasioned by the omission of the satin, and a cluster of China roses is introduced, which has a novel and elegant effect. The tucker is of fine blond, surmounting a satin band of French folds; from the wrist descends a succession of small oval baskets of tulle, edged with white satin, each containing a China rose and leaves: three rows of the same light tasteful baskets are continued round the bottom of the dress, which is finished with a broad white satin rouleau; white satin sash, with double bow behind.

Milanese head-dress, composed of thirteen pins, two stationary and one pendant ball; the pins are of gold, with the heads of patent pearl, and are stuck circularly in a plaited band of the hind hair: this is a very pretty novel head-dress, and accords with the grace of feminine beauty and youthful fancy. Necklace, earrings, and Bracelets, of embossed gold and pink topazes interspersed. White kid gloves, with a quilting of blond at the top; white satin shoes, and a rose-bud introduced in the centre of the white satin rosette.

MINOR-THEATRE.—The novelties produced at this elegant little Theatre, have, during the present week, (notwithstanding the inimitable Mathews' contemporaneous performances at the Theatre-Royal) been very attractive.—Several of the scenes in the pantomime are executed in a chaste and splendid manner,—in particular we notice the Apartment of the Sleeping Beauty, painted by Mr. Phillips. The town views (by Messrs. Phillips and Kerry) are delineated with tasteful accuracy; indeed, the designs and style throughout so much credit to the Artists; and entitle the management of Mr. Farrell to distinction and patronage.

EFFLUVIA OF FLOWERS.

Gentle gales
Fanning their odoriferous wings dispense
Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole
Those balmy spolia.

MILTON. Par. Lost, lib. iv.

WITH what pleasure doth the rural christian contemplate the beauties of his flower garden! He gazes on the most worthless flowers in profound admiration; and while he lifts up his voice in gratitude to his Creator, he is unspeakably pleased in the reflection, that to his own skill, and unwearied industry, they owe much of their elegance! With what delight he supports the tender shoots, and recalls the straggling branches! Aided by him they blossom, and bear fruit in wonderful profusion! aided by him they diffuse more exquisite odours! aided by him they flourish more kindly! He cultivates his garden with a skilful hand, and is amply repaid for his assiduity. How beautifully diversified are the tints and colours which Nature has displayed in the formation of the immense profusion of vegetable productions, diffused over every part of the habitable globe! To the vegetable kingdom we are indebted for many indispensable articles of food: we receive our greatest luxuries from the same source; nor is the Materia Medica less indebted to the inexhaustible treasures of the vegetable world. But let us confine ourselves to the effluvia of flowers. We are acquainted with no less than forty-four thousand species of plants; and yet, the odours which emanate from their flowers, are dissimilar in every species, though we are not able to discover in what the difference consists. The odoriferous particles that emanate from flowers must be extremely subtle; and according to Mr. Boyle it appears that the effluvia of assafoetida are not more than the ~~part~~ part of an inch in magnitude. "The smell of the rosemary, (says Sturm) which grows in Provence, is perceived twenty leagues distance at sea." The odours of some flowers cause us to turn away in disgust, while others delight us beyond the power of expression: but we are not able to account for this difference, unless we allow habit to have some influence over the nervi olfactorii. What can be more delightful than the grateful odours of the new-mown hay, or the exquisite fragrance of the thyme, sage and rosemary, which flourish in the most uncultivated parts of our gardens? What delicious effluvia emanate from the unsullied petals of the virgin lily! How stately blooms the variegated tulip! but it yields no fragrance. How different the rose! the favourite flower of Milton and Vetrivius. Well might the Persians celebrate it as the queen of flowers; and introduce it so frequently into their poetical writings! Here we find all that can gratify the eye, and captivate the smell: elegance of shape, unrivalled fragrance, and brilliancy of colour, united in an individual flower. What a ravishing fragrance does this bed of rosemary afford!

How its aromatic odour elevates my soul! Surely this single bed affords a more delicious treat, than the most sumptuous banquet. How fortunate it is that this herb is hardy enough to endure the most rigorous winters, even though it be exposed to the coldest winds! Rosemary has been admitted into the London Pharmacopæia principally on account of its antispasmodic and stimulant properties. When administered internally it is also supposed to strengthen the memory. Hence, Shakespeare says,

There's Rosemary, that's for remembrance.

And hence, the ancients considered it as the emblem of fidelity, and each person wore a sprig of it at every wedding or funeral he attended. In fine it is still a custom prevalent in many parts of Europe, to distribute small branches of this plant among the company. In one instance a branch was placed in the hand of the departed, which vegetated so vigorously, that when the grave was opened at the expiration of a few years, the face of the corpse was actually covered with rosemary. The Chinese consider flowers and vegetable perfumes, as indispensable articles in their funeral ceremonies. They also plant violets, jessamines, roses, and other odoriferous flowers on the graves of their friends and relatives. This elegant custom still prevails in several parts of Europe; but is not near so general as formerly,† for we find frequent allusions to it in the ancient poets. Lady Montague informs us that the burying-grounds about Constantinople, are more extensive than the whole city. "Sometimes I have seen," says this celebrated authoress, "burying-places of several miles, belonging to very inconsiderable villages, which were formerly great towns, and retain no other mark of their ancient grandeur than this dismal one. On no account do they remove a stone that serves for a monument. The ladies have a simple pillar, without other ornament, except those that die unmarried, who have a rose at the top of their monument. The sepulchres of great families are railed in and planted round with trees." The "Song of Solomon" has many beautiful passages, in the praise of odoriferous gums, and fragrant flowers,‡ the Lord commanded Moses to make a perfume of stacte onycha, galbanum, and frankincense, to be used in the tabernacle;§ and it was a practice, prevalent among the kings of Tunis, to mix vegetable perfumes with their food. He who can be insensible to the ravishing effluvia of the pink, the auriculus, the hyacinth, the narcissus, and numerous other flowers which decorate our gardens; or to the odoriferous sweets emanating from the neglected flowers of the field, is destitute of sensibility and virtue.

Manchester, July, 1823.

ESSAY

On the question—which period of human life is the most favourable to happiness—Youth, Manhood, or Age?

IT will be observed that were the question worded "which period of life is the happiest?"—that it would be difficult to solve, as it depends entirely upon the contingent circumstances attached to each, and which might happen as well in one period as another; whereas, as it now stands we have only to search for the causes of happiness or what is likely to promote it, and to find out where they are most prevalent. We must beware of trusting too much to appearances, and must search deep into the hidden springs which conduce to it. It would be as well to explain, that by the word happiness as used in the question, I mean that rational intellectual enjoyment which is unalloyed by any sensual gratification, and which must consequently be considered as purer and more real than that derived from any other means. Every one must allow, that sensual pleasures are inferior to intellectual in their genuine enjoyment. This granted, I shall proceed to treat on this subject by first examining the causes which do or do not conduce to our happiness in Youth, secondly, in Age, (placing it before Manhood as) thirdly, I shall endeavour to shew my reasons for supposing this period of life to be the most favourable to real intellectual enjoyment.

First of Youth, in which I include all the time which elapses from infancy to the age of 31 years. Many have asserted that it is the most proper time for enjoying life, on account of the few cares and troubles it has,—the little knowledge of the world it possesses,—and the many hopes of future pleasures which are constantly presenting themselves to its view. This idea is frequently and forcibly impressed upon the minds of children, in order to make them fancy themselves happier at that time than ever they will be afterwards, thus infusing prejudices into their minds which perhaps are not thoroughly eradicated for many years, nor until they begin to see the fallacy of them. It is said that youth has no cares or troubles, or at least that they are so trivial as to sink into insignificance, when compared with those we meet with in manhood or age. True—but let us see how far the mind of youth is capable of sustaining them, and in so doing we shall find that those evils on which the mind of man looks down with deriding contempt, appear, and are, in fact, to the youthful fancy of as great magnitude as any which may assail them in after life. Montaigne furnishes me with an excellent illustration: speaking of the plays of children, he says—"it is to be noted that the plays of children are not performed in play, but are to be judged in them as their most serious actions;" consequently the reverse will hold good in my argument. The fly dreads the spider as the quadruped the tiger, so the mind of youth shrinks from lesser as the mind of man from greater evils, and though when taken abstractedly, they scarcely admit of comparison to one another, yet their effects when working upon different minds, are indisputably the same. The infant mind is not capable of sustaining much, and raises up bog-bears to terrify itself, therefore we must consider that what in manhood we account as trifling evils, were to our youthful ideas exaggerated into serious ones. Again, it is said that the little knowledge of the world which a youth possesses conduces to happiness. But, even this I cannot be brought to allow, for we must remember that every school is in itself a world in miniature, in which there are the same enmities, the same jarring interests, the same jealousies, and the same strife for power and superiority that we meet with in real life, only on a smaller scale; but which at the same time cause as much anxiety and trouble in the minds of youth, as the same things do in more advanced age. It is likewise said youth is full of hope, and that this contributes very materially towards its happiness. True—but the hopes of manhood are much more rational, and have recourse to refined sensations, whilst those of youth are generally comprised in wishes for some ideal pleasure, or some idle personal gratification. Intellectual enjoyments, as I said before, must be allowed by every one to be the most lasting and rational in their nature, at the same time they leave the most pleasant reflections, and consequently produce the greatest happiness in their effects. I would be understood to include also in them those joys which spring from religion. They are the fruits of knowledge, and the youthful mind not being sufficiently refined and cultivated, is not capable of receiving them. It may be compared to a garden in which the seeds of knowledge are sown, but where they only shoot up and blossom during the spring; neither do they at maturity, nor bring forth fruit until the summer of manhood arrives, when the sun of reason which has then obtained its zenith, darts its genial and invigorating rays upon them, and brings them to perfection.

When a youth arrives at an age when he is to choose the profession or business he must follow through life, he then enters into the bustle and tumult of the world, and, like a giddy thoughtless being, too frequently grasps at every pleasure that lies in his reach. His passions now first begin to show themselves in their native force, and gain every day a stronger ascendancy over him, for devoid of experience and his reason not sufficiently matured, he finds himself either unable to curb or withstand their powerful attacks. Too frequently, alas! he gives way to them, at once plunging head-long into every species of dissipation and extravagance, often entailing upon himself years of contrition and sorrow. However, as he approaches to manhood, reason begins to assume her sway, his intellectual faculties develop themselves, and experience teaches him to avoid those rocks and shoals on which his former happiness was wrecked.

I shall endeavour to shew how far old age is or is not favourable to happiness. In this, as in youth, we shall find that there are many causes which render it infinitely inferior to manhood in the promotion of genuine and rational gratification. Age is accompanied by infirmities of almost every nature—aches, pains, sickness, are what we expect to find when we arrive at this period of life. It is generally petulant and peevish, fretful at every little disappointment, apt to fancy itself neglected—full of cares, and sick, and tired of the world. Some of the passions are subsided into tranquillity, but others remain which have acquired ten-fold force from years, and which bring the acutest misery on their possessors, now bereft of strength of mind to subdue them. The faculties of the soul begin to decay, consequently there is not that zeal for intellectual enjoyments which there formerly was; and the relish for enlightened society (one of the greatest pleasures in life) is nearly lost. But all are not so—God forbid!—I only speak generally. How can such a period of life be considered the most favourable to happiness, when those very faculties which encourage it are chilled by the hoary winter of life, and nature herself is tottering to decay. Age is like the remains of a magnificent temple, whose ruined aisle formerly the sanctuary of learning and religion, whose towering and lofty pillars which reflected the last rays of the declining orb of day, and whose mouldering walls which once enclosed the most sublime productions of the pencil and chisel, are now falling fast into oblivion touched by the annihilating hand of time, and “proclaiming loud the instability of human greatness.”

Manhood, I conceive to commence at that period when as I before mentioned, reason assumes her sway, when the intellectual faculties have developed themselves, and when experience has taught us to avoid falling into the errors of youthful folly. The hey-day of youth is over—instead of being volatile and thoughtless man begins to think for himself—his reason teaches him to curb his passions, and keep them within the bounds of prudence—he is in the full enjoyment of health and possessed of the greatest vigour both of body and mind. He has the free use of his faculties—the noble energies of his soul are neither paralyzed by impotence nor enfeebled by decay. His mind, the seat of wisdom and knowledge, is now the best adapted to receive religious impressions untinged with the superstitious terrors of youth or the gloomy enthusiasm of age, and he is most capable of enjoying that virtuous, refined, and sentimental feeling of love in all its purity “unruined by the storms of passion or the sallies of desire” wisely designed by our beneficent creator to soften the rugged path of life, and to strew our way with flowers.

Society is one of the greatest sources of happiness to man when he can ascertain its value and duly appreciate its comfort. It is in manhood that we are best enabled to do so—we enjoy it in its fullest extent when we can gather useful knowledge, information from the lips of others, and can store it up in our memories—it is then that we truly feel it to be the “Feast of reason and the flow of soul.”

In fine—manhood must be allowed to be by far the most favourable to intellectual enjoyment, to love, to friendship, to knowledge, and to all the refined pleasures of civilized society—it is the summer of life, when the sun of reason shines resplendent in meridian glory, unobscured by the clouds of ignorance or the mists of prejudice; casting around the genial and invigorating rays; penetrating the fathomless depths of science; searching into the most secret recesses of nature; illuminating and unravelling the most intricate mazes of philosophy; nourishing and encouraging the growth of piety, virtue and happiness, and dispelling by the bright refugence of his beams the gloomy darkness of superstition and fanaticism. Manhood then, must consequently be more favourable to happiness (as I use the term) than youth or old age.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The “Lines addressed to one who seemed to doubt the eternal happiness of those who die in infancy,” which appeared in your paper of last Saturday, I have met with before, and think them very poetical; but I was much surprised to see attached to them two stanzas of a little poem written by a near relative of mine when quite a youth, on the death of an infant nephew, not being aware that it was known to any but those of his own family. I shall feel obliged by your inserting the whole in your entertaining miscellany.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

Manchester, July 8th, 1823.

SOROR.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF AN INFANT BOY.

For laurel wreaths let more aspiring bards,
To themes ambitious tune exalted lyres;
A sister's kindest love the sole rewards

My song requires.

Ye kindred souls! that e'er have felt the charm
Of sympathy divine your bosom quest,
That e'er have drank the bleeding potion warm

From pity's breast:

Aidst my numbers by your pious care,
To paint the genuine feelings of my heart;
And whilst I in a sister's sorrows share,

Relief I impart;

Oh! could I catch a Young's pathetic fire,
When mourning o'er his loved Narcissa's bier,
Fraternal feelings should in me inspire

Immortal verse.

To tear-dewed melancholy's sacred shrine,
Where weeps a mother o'er her infant dead;
By sweet affection's influence benign

I'm pensive led.

Peace to the spotless tenant of the tomb!

In grateful quiet shall his ashes sleep;
Borne from the cradle to the earth's dark womb,
No more to weep.

O may the moss-grown heap, and grassy blade,
That verdant flourish o'er what once was fair,
Be long unconscious of the cruel spade!

A Brother's prayer!

But when at last thou shalt resign thy breath,
And with thine infant seek a long repose,
Ere then, may some kind messenger of death

These eyelids close!

methinks I see thee at the ev'ning hour,
Venting in sighs the burden of thy grief;
While from thine eyes the streaming torrents pour

A sad relief.

But weep no more—thy infant is not dead;
He lives—but not in this frail house of clay—
The little prisoner of earth is fled

To realms of day.

Where cherubim and seraphim adore,
Far, far above this darksome, earthly clod,
He stands—in rapturous ecstasy before

His Father, God!

THE YORKSHIRE ALEHOUSE.

Thus invited, into the house I went; and looking to the right, there I beheld half the running horses, and fatted oxen, of the west—flourishing in fullness of pedigree—dressed with all the skill of the district sign-painter, and hung in succession like the male and female portraits of families whose genealogical trees take root about the time of Hengist and Horsa. I looked to the left, and there I saw something much more to my fancy—a large hall with a ceiling white as snow, a floor of stone sifted over with fine white sand—the walls hung round with fitches of bacon as if with tapestry, and the mantelpiece glittering with burnished copper and tin. A large fire, though it was the middle of summer, glowed in the chimney; and, over many simmering-pans and moving spits presided a squat middle-aged dame, sprinkled with the fatness of many feasts, and with a face broad and imperious, from which the fire itself might have obtained increase of heat. She moved from side to side of the immense fire-place, preparing consolation of various kinds for many desiring mouths; and casting a look upon each of the groupes of longing travellers, as any of her numerous undertakings miscarried, in which one might plainly read that she gave them all, body and spirit, to flames everlasting.

I seated myself at a vacant table, and began to peruse the faces of those among whom it was my lot to be cast—there were various groupes, and several solitaires; but the looks of all were rivetted on the fire, and on the demon who ruled over pot and spit. “My good girl,” said a tall traveller, brandishing his knife and fork and leaning forward upon the table like one eager for a feast, “when am I to have my morsel from the fire? Here am I fasting from all, save a single pot and a pound of corned beef at the Gled and Gosling, and a whet at the Robin Hood. I am so ravenous that I could demolish, at a cut or two, your whole mess of steaks, and and eat the gridiron they were broiled on.” “Come, then, cormorant,” said the increased cook, “fall on, and the fiend give thee good o’th, hot iron and all!” And she placed the gridiron, reeking with collops, before him—a thick and fat vapour eddied away in a long stream, as nothing displeased, and with a sharp and diligent knife, he began to make the smoking dainty disappear.

The fragrance of the traveller's meal reached a figure seated in a stuffed arm-chair—and so huge in person, and utterly unwieldy, that he must have come by the waggon—for no common vehicle could have moved under him. He was so over-laid with outward man, that he might be compared to a candle over-dipped. He sat with his eyes fixed on the revolving spit—if eyes they might be called, of which you could only distinguish the faint glimmer of satisfaction increasing as the roast approached to a conclusion, so deeply were they overbuilt by cheek and brow. When the reek of the broiled collops was wafted across his face he gave a grunt of delight; and a large bull-dog, as overgrown as himself, which lay beneath his chair, with its broad square nose resting on its fore-paws, arose, and looked in its owner's face, shook its tail, and licked its lips, and uttered a whine of most clamorous desire. “Curse thee,” said the virago of the pan and spit; “must thou have it raw and bloody from the cows’ haunch too? Lie down; or I will thrust a collop down thy throat with the red hot tongue.” At this moment in glided mine host's daughter, Rebecca. "Ah Squire Featherstone," said the damsel, "it's a kind wind that blows you here;" and she stood beside her huge guest, and her eyes shining with gladness. The squire roused himself up as much as a man of his calibre might; and, stroking down the curling ringlets of the maiden with a hand rivalling in weight a shoulder of mutton, said, "Thank thee for thy good will, girl—and see if thou hast not a cap and feather the better for't at Midsummer. Wind that blew me here, Rebecca, wench? In faith, lass, it could not be less than a storm that blew me here—yet I have seen, on a day, when I could have crept through the bore of an inch-suger, and leapt hop-step-and-jump, with the lightest lads of the three Ridings. But, Becky, lass! come, stir thee—stir thee. I come not here to look in thy pretty face, and set these ringlets on thy shoulders—but, hark in thy left ear—if thou wouldst come and be dame Featherstone, I would comb thy locks with a golden comb, wench—I would." To all this Rebecca answered with a laugh, and sidelong look, which seemed to measure and weigh this mighty production of the North Riding. Her eye became graver, as she looked; and growing doubt seemed gathering beneath her lids. She went to a small table—covered it with a white cloth—removed, with a careful hand, a roasted fowl from the fire, and set it smoking before him. In a moment, all else that the world contained vanished from mind and eye—the fowl, dismembered, lay distilling fat dew—he neither looked to the right or the left; but with both hands carried an incessant supply to that insatiable crevice which man call the mouth, and then dropped the fragments to his four-footed comrade at his feet.

Apart from him, and divided at equal distances round a little table, sat three of those wise and profound persons who settle all movements by land and sea, taxation, tithes, parliamentary influence—and what perhaps promised, from their course of life, to be of more importance—parochial settlements, and the blessing of having charity doled out to the moiety of mankind by the reluctant hand of the legislature. In imitation, too, of their Saxon ancestors, who debated all serious subjects once drunk and once sober, they had commenced in drink, knowing there would be time for reflection and sobriety soon, when cash grew scant, and credit scarce. "Confound all your flowered and open-stitch luxuries," said one, a journeyman manufacturer of the finest Yorkshire broad cloth; "confound them all, say I, since wool may clothe them all like peacocks and princesses. Away with your flimsy silk, and your gandy satin, and your fine woven laces, and your striped and flowered muslins; and up with the fleece and the comb. One of our best blues, with a cut-steel button from Rhodes of Sheffield, might become men, were they all demigods. It will never be a merry country again, till the wool-comb puts down the spinning-jennies and the lace-looms; and then for the beef, and the bread, and the beer." And he emptied a quart of ale at a draught—and flourished the burnished vessel around his head, in defiance of contradiction.

"I will tell ye my mind, plump and plain," said a travelling dealer in cattle, balancing in his hand, at the same time, a flaggon of ale crowned with white foam like a competition cauliflower, which he held halfway between the table and his lips, like one resolved to be brief. "I tell ye what—I would pull down the mills, and make a bonfire of the machinery, and hang one half of the weavers by the light of their own blazing looms, and banish the other. I would turn pleasant Lancashire into good grass parks, where you would hear nought but the low of fattening cattle, and see nought but merry men making bargains, and giving glorious luck-pennies, in the corner of every field. And should any one ask you who said so, ye may say it was Dick Desborough, of the North Riding, damn me." And the concluding flourish of swearing was quenched to a whisper in the flaggon of ale, into the foam of which he instantly dived.

"Dick Desborough," said his other comrade, balancing himself with difficulty on his seat, and spilling the ale at every attempt which he made to lift it to his lips; "Dick Desborough I will dispute with no man—opinion is free—or what have we signed the petition to parliament about, and given the king good advice? Opinion, Dick, is no taxed commodity—thanks to Hampden and Hunt for that—it is as free as the wind—as free as the light of the eye, Rebecca, my dear: so here goes opinion. Confound yarn winnals, grass, parks, lowing cattle, cattle dealers, and all luck-pennies, glorious or inglorious. Confound them, kide and hair—fell and flesh, skin and bone. Give me a sharp ploughshare—a free furrow cut as clean as Rebecca's ribbon, a shawery and sunny summer, and a hot harvest, and then I will shew you a merry Old England again. The flaggons will foam, the lasses will dance, the lads will sing, and all men will laugh at sharp taxation and rotten boroughs, and lying evils and standing armies. Confound pasturage and spinning-mills says Bill Swingletree; and so said his father before him."

"And who laughs at standing armies, I shall be glad to know," said a tall and blooming virago, who, seated in a corner between two travelling heroes of the firelock and knapsack, seemed to be considered as appertaining to both. The arm of a little carrot-headed corporal had invaded, and partly occupied, the ample circumference of her waist; while her upper works were in the possession of a brawny private, with long waxed mustaches, a grim eye, and a menacing aspect. "And who laughs at the lads of the gun, and the sword?" said the heroine, rising up to give greater emphasis to what she was about to say. "I have seen better men, and handsome, thrown by the dozen, like sand-bags, to fill a wet ditch during a hasty march, than the cleverest one among ye. Confound ye for clod-hoppers, and combers of wool, and drivers of cattle! Does it become such fellows as you to speak slightly of our gallant soldiers! You who sit, full-fed, and warm, and safe, at home, when the bullets fly and the bayonets are crimsoned, and the brooks of a foreign land are increased with English blood? Ye eat when ye are hungry—ye drink when ye are dry—ye go to bed when ye please—and ye rise to the crowing of the cock, or the sound of the harvest horn—ye hide your head when the rain falls—and ye work but when the sun shines—and ye dance, and ye sing, and ye make mouths at your betters—and to whom are ye indebted for all these indulgences, but to the good and gallant soldier? And yet must I hear words of scorn for those who keep bloodshed from your doors, by many a gallant deed, on many a bloody field! I would not give the little finger of poor Sandie Frazer, who lies buried in the gory dykes of Bergen-op-zoom, for a whole North Riding of such productions as you—And I am a North Riding lass, myself—Nancy Rutherford by name."

"And is poor Sandie Frazer dead?" said a young woman, entering the door of the ale-house, with a child in her arms, and another at her foot. Then my pilgrimage is ended, and these bonnie babes are fatherless." And she sunk down on a seat at the threshold—drew the children to her bosom, and sobbed aloud. "But let me understand you, lass," said Nancy of the North Riding. "Our Sandie Frazer may not be your Sandie Frazer,—our lad was tall, with sunny hair, bright blue eyes, liaped somewhat in his speech, and his speech was very sweet—he smiled when he spoke, sung like a thrush, and danced as light as a leaf in the wind." "Enough, enough," said the young woman, "ye have seen my Sandie Frazer; there was but as lad whom the mother of these two children loved, and he lies dead in a trench. Woe's me for ye, my two sweet wee unhappy weans." "A pot of Burton ale to a drink of ditch-water," said the other, "that ye are the lass he always sighed for and spoke about—ye have the very look of the one he described to me—only saddened down like, and touched with sorrow somewhat. Sorrow's a sad hand for a fair face—she has laid a finger on me in her time. But speaking of bonnie Sandie—d'ye come from near Dumfermline? and is your name—I forget now—it is a queer name, a Mac—something; but if ye be she, your father disowned ye, and your mother turned ye from the door, cause ye wedded corporal Frazer. Plague on their Scottish pride."

The young woman replied, with a shriek of pleasure and agony, "And dkt he aye speak about me, say ye—and dkt he tell ye the story of our love? Then shall I seek bread for his bairns through the wide world, with a contented though a sorrowful heart. Will ye say what ye ken of his death? I can bide it, I can bide it." "It's a tale soon told," said she of the North Riding; "I marched with Corporal Cater then—he's dead and buried in bloody grave, as well as your bonnie Sandie—oh the dykes of Bergen-op-zoom!—I saw them full of water at night, and found them filled with dead bodies in the morning. The first known face I saw was that of black Dick Ratcliffe, of Scarborough. But let me tell my tale right—and first let me advise my Dumfermline lass to taste a drop of this neat cheering article—a sorrowful heart's always dry. Well, well, ye wont—ye'll grow wiser, lass,—I was soft like thyself, when I first followed the camp; but I soon learned—a marching regiment's a prime school; and I am far from dull in my comprehension. However, I will tell ye what I saw—I saw seventeen hundred bonnie lads, and your Sandie Frazer among them, marching out at dead of night to the storming of that dirty Dutch town. They went out as silent as the grass o'er which they trod; and with them went two caravans—one drawn by grey horses, and the other by black—I thought, as I followed them, that it looked like a funeral; the caravans belonged to the surgeons, and were for bearing back the wounded. As they went along, I heard Corporal Frazer say to the chief surgeon, "If ye bring me back, let me come with the grey; for the black looks like a hearse;" and an old Scotch soldier, who marched by his side, said, "We shall not need, Frazer—we shall lie stark and stiff, with many a pretty man, before the dawning. I have seen—but it will dispirit our comrades I say what I have seen. Bergen-op-zoom is the last place we shall see, and we shall not behold it by day."

"Come, come, Nan, lass," said the little corporal, "you have said too much about that puddle dub—all-weedy ditch and frog-marsh—old mother twenty trows, dull dirty Holland. Can't you say to the girl at once, that Frazer and five hundred others were shot in the ditch, and have done with it—damme, you are as tedious as a gazette."

"And damn swampy Holland, Nan, my good girl," said the tall private, "it's not worth the fag-end of a blank cartridge. Give me good old Spain, say I, where you can have a bullock for a bullet, a madonna to cock it, and replenish your canteen—where the floors are silver, and the reliques pure gold. Ah! many's the pretty little saint of the right metal I have had in my knapsack; here's to a merry Spanish campaign, say I, and let Holland go to the hogs—where a man cannot have a mouthful of meat without the current metal—a curse upon the land, say I; and may the dykes break, and the sea resume its empire."

"Peace, thou moiety of manhood," said she of the North Riding, "and silence, thou mere flint-snapper." "And now, my bonnie lass of Dumfermline town, as poor Corporal Frazer called thee, I will tell thee of the last of his marches. We went out at midnight, as silent as shadows, and halted not till we saw the dykes and ramparts dark before us—with here and there a twinkling light, and here and there a sentinel pacing his rounds. We moved on—a dog barked, and a soldier saw us, and fired; and, without a shout, down rushed our men, and then the work of death began. Shot after shot—knell after knell—small-arm first, and then cannon—men falling from the ramparts, and men dropping in the ditch—the sound of trumpet, the shout and the huzza—formed a concert fitter for devils than men. I said it was midnight, and scarcely a light twinkled—it was as bright as mid-day soon, and lights in thousands and tens of thousands were flashing in every direction. Flights of rockets, thrown from the town, hung over us like a canopy of stars—ye might have counted every musket—numbered every button—called every man by his name; while from the batteries the balls flew on us like hail. Think ye not that our gallant lads were idle—the ramparts were thrice lost and thrice won. But why should I make a long tale of sorrow and distress? Day at last dawned, and showed me the dykes damned with the dead and dying. One of the first I saw was my own poor corporal: two balls, and a pike, had done their work—all in the bosom; and a true bosom it was to me! and I have been faithful to his memory while I could—but resolution cannot last ever, and tears cannot run like a stream. Close beside him lay bonnie Sandie Frazer—pike and bullet had been dealing with him too—a ball to the brow—and a white broad brow it was—and a pike to the bosom—and so go our gallant spirits away! It was hot work, my bonnie lass of Dumfermline; it was hot work."

"Ye have said enough," said the young woman; "I expected all this. On the night of the storming that fatal place—it might be twelve o'clock—I was lying with my two babes in a farmer's barn, and I thought I was sleeping—but your story tells me I was awake. A light came into the barn, and I put my hands over my babe's face, that it might not awake; and looking up I saw Sandie Frazer wiping the blood from his brow. He gave a smile, and I could not but smile—but it was soon changed to shrieking, for he vanished away; and the farmer came running when he heard my cries, and said it was a dream, only a dream."

"Hilloah, my herties," said the driver of the waggon, entering, "I have shouted out these ten minutes—we must wag.—Come 'long, Nan, with your two troopers—come, trot—jog's the word—waggon and water will wait for no one. And come, too, if ye like, my canny Scotch lass with your two bairns—if ye go southward, I will give ye a cast of the waggon for pure love. Nay, don't weep, woman; a face like thine will find a husband any where." "I was going southward once," said she; "but I shall turn northward now.—Come, my two sweet fatherless weans, we cannot weel be more desolate—we shall find a bush and a field somewhere." And she rose, and was about to depart. "Nay, nay," said Nan of the North Riding, "we will not sunder so, my sweet lass of Dumfermline. I have a few trinkets, and popish baubles, and some broad gold pieces, which have survived the Spanish and the Flemish wars; and for the sake of bonnie Sandie Frazer, ye shall share them: I need them not. Here's the two lads that will win cash for me. Pluck up your heart, and come to the south with us—your story shall win you a pension, or I will write your wrongs on the secretary's forehead with my ten nails."

The waggon moved on, and the ale-house was emptied of most of its inmates. Those whom our little, simple, and perfectly authentic story has at all interested, will be pleased to learn that the young widow of Dumfermline lives in a warm cottage, on a small pension; and that honest Nancy of the North Riding, won from the folly of her ways by the relict of bonnie Sandie Frazer, forsook the south, much to the sorrow of two entire regiments, and married a douce and sponable widower on the border, and became a subscriber to seven moral and religious tract associations, and an example to three parishes.

SURNAMES.

(From the New Monthly Magazine.)

Men once were surnamed from their shape or estate,
(You all may from History worm it)
There was Lewis the Bulky, and Henry the Great,
John Lackland, and Peter the Hermit.
But now, when the door plates of Mistery and Dames
Are read, each so constantly varies
From the owner's trade, figure, and calling, Surnames
Seem given by the rule of contraries.

Mr. Fox, though provoked, never doubles his fist,
Mr. Burns to his grate has no fuel,
Mr. Playfair won't catch me at hazard or whist,
Mr. Coward was wing'd in a duel.
Mr. Wile is a dunce, Mr. King is a Whig,
Mr. Coffin's uncommonly sprightly,
And huge Mr. Little broke down in a gig
While driving fat Mrs. Golightly.

Mrs. Drinkwater's apt to indulge in a dram,
Mrs. Angel's an absolute fury,
And meek Mr. Lyon let fierce Mr. Lamb
Tweak his nose in the lobby of Drury.
At Bath, where the feeble go more than the stout,
(A conduct well worthy of Nero)
Over poor Mr. Lightfoot, confined with the gout,
Mr. Heavisdale danced a Bolero.

Miss Joy, wretched maid, when she chose Mr. Love,
Found nothing but sorrow await her:
She now holds in wedlock, as true as a dove,
That fondest of mates, Mr. Hayter.
Mr. Oldcastle dwells in a modern-built hut,
Miss Sage is of madcaps the archest;
Of all the queer bachelors Cupid e'er sent
Old Mr. Younghusband's the starchest.

Mr. Child, in a passion, knock'd down Mr. Rock,
Mr. Stone like an aspen-leaf shivers,
Miss Poole used to dance, but she stands like a stock
Ever since she became Mrs. Rivers.
Mr. Swift hobbles onward, no mortal knows how,
He moves as though cords had entwined him,
Mr. Metcalfe ran off, upon meeting a cow,
With pale Mr. Turnbull behind him.

Mr. Barker's as mute as a fish in the sea,
Mr. Miles never moves on a journey,
Mr. Gotobed sits up till half-after-three,
Mr. Makepeace was bred an attorney.
Mr. Gardner can't tell a flower from a root,
Mr. Wilde with timidity draws back;
Mr. Ryder performs all his journeys on foot,
Mr. Foote all his journeys on horseback.

Mr. Penny, whose father was rolling in wealth,
Kick'd down all the fortune his dad won,
Large Mr. Le Fever's the picture of health,
Mr. Goodenough is but a bad one.
Mr. Cruikshank steeped into three thousand a-year,
By showing his leg to an heirless,—
Now I hope you'll acknowledge I've made it quite clear
Surnames ever go by Contraries.

BIOGRAPHY.

MADAME DE STAEL.

By Robert Scott, Editor of the Cabinet of Portraits.

This astonishing woman, whose maiden name was Anne Louis Germaine Necker, was born at Paris in 1768. She was the daughter of the celebrated minister, Necker, and Susan Curchod, a Swiss, who was admired by Gibben during his residence in that country.

Born of such parents, and her infant ideas associated with the intelligence of Marmontel, Diderot, Buffon, St. Lambert, Thomas, and all the learned men of Paris, who formed the circles of her mother, it is not surprising that her mind imbibed those principles which she so warmly advocated in all her writings. Her first publication consisted of three tales, and appeared in 1785. This was followed in 1786 by a comedy, Sophie; and in 1787 by two tragedies, Jane Grey and Montmorency. The first work, however, that stamped her reputation, was her Letters on the Works and Character of J. J. Rousseau. A short time previous to this, through the influence of her mother, she gave her hand, but not her heart, to the Baron of Stael-Holstein, the Swedish ambassador at Paris, by whom she had two sons and two daughters.

In 1790 Madame de Stael accompanied her father to his retirement at Copet, but, the year following, returned to Paris, and took an active part in the affairs of those eventful times. She formed intimacies with Talleyrand and Sieyès, La Fayette, Narbonne, Lameths, Barnave, Vergniaud, and other conspicuous characters in the Constituent, Legislative, and similar bodies. In 1793 she was compelled to fly with her husband to Copet, to evade the wrath of the revolutionists; but in 1795 returned to Paris, and published her Thoughts on Peace, addressed to Mr. Pitt. This year Legendre more than once denounced Madame de Stael and her party, as directing the political intrigues of the day.

On the death of her mother she composed at Lausanne the first part of an essay on The Influence of the Passions upon the Happiness of Individuals and Nations. This appeared at Paris in 1796, and the second part the year following. In 1798 she produced a work on The Influence of Revolutions upon Literature, and a dramatic piece, entitled The Secret Sentiment. In 1802 appeared Delphine, a novel of great celebrity. In 1803 she was banished by Buonaparte to the distance of forty leagues from Paris; and on the death of her father, in the year following, appeared Manuscripts of M. Necker, published by his Daughter, with a short Memoir of his Life. To divert her mind from the loss of her father she travelled into Italy, and there collected materials for her celebrated work Corinna, or Italy. After the completion of this she repaired to Jena, and formed the plan of her work entitled Germany. This was printed at Paris, but, previous to publication, the whole impression was destroyed by order of Buonaparte; on which its author repaired to England, and printed it in both English and French.

On the restoration of Louis XVIII. Madame de Stael's long exile terminated, and she again resided in Paris, where her house became a rendezvous for the most celebrated literary and political characters of the time.

After a long illness, this eminent woman died on the 15th of July, 1817; some time previous to which she had the satisfaction to see her eldest daughter married to the Duc de Broglie, a peer of France.

A MECHANIC'S JOURNAL OF A
TOUR FROM LONDON TO PARIS, IN 1832.

I ARRIVED next morning at Beauvais, a tolerably large town, containing a fine place, in which is the town hall, and near it a fine cathedral. The thought of this town often causes amusement to me, even now. I breakfasted at a house before I entered the gates of the town, and then passed through it, going out, as I then imagined, by the right gate, and taking the road to Paris; I was in excellent spirits at the idea of arriving there on the same day; but how great was my disappointment, for, on riding about twelve miles (for which I gave the driver part of a bottle of wine), and walking many miles more, I arrived at five o'clock in the evening, at the identical house I had left in the morning. No one can describe the consternation I felt, knowing the consequence of being seen a second time in the same place; however, I was almost proof against difficulties, and made a bold push once more for the gate, but I was espied, and marched into the house with as much solemnity as if I had been a spy. An officer and two privates of the gens d'armes were immediately sent for; they cross-examined me severely, and I explained myself as well as I could.—After closely inspecting my passport, they measured my height, and asserted that I was one inch below that specified in the passport. They next obliged me to write my name, to see if it corresponded with my signature, which they said it did not. They then held a long consultation together; during which I was playing my part, by eating a hearty dinner. By this means I got the landlord on my side; and afterwards the whole of them saw that I was an unfortunate traveller, and I departed apparently in good humour, but, in reality, cursing them for a tyrannical set, and lamenting the time I had lost. The wine I had drank animated me, and I was resolved to make good my lost time, if possible; but meeting with a Frenchman, who was going to the next village, we got into conversation, and, of course, to drink together, till I was unable to go any further, but fell asleep. Awakening, I found my man was gone, and had paid for all. This was one of many similar traits that I met with. I was very ill that night, and without the kindness of the hostess, who made me some strong tea and jellies, I could not have departed next day. When I left the house, she shook my hand, and begged I would not drink any more. It was not long before I recovered my strength, and met nothing worth relating till I arrived at St. Denis, which, indeed, at first, I imagined to be the entrance to Paris; it is a pretty lively town, full of soldiers. Passing this, I came in sight of Montmartre, a very high and steep hill, with eight windmills at the top, besides many houses; here the city of Paris burst on my sight, and never shall I forget the sensation it created. It was not that of delight, but, on the contrary, my very heart sank within me, at the idea of entering a place on which my mind had feasted for years; these sensations increased till I entered the walls. I then passed the gate of St. Denis.

Now, indeed, I found I was in Paris! All around me was Babel-like confusion. A second Bartholomew Fair, on a larger scale! Here was a conjurer, playing all the tricks of an Indian juggler; there was a quack doctress on horseback, with serpents winding round her arms. The number of marchands, as they call themselves, is so innumerable, that an Englishman can form no idea of them. Every article to gratify the taste or sight, may be purchased here; but an Englishman can easily discern misery under the garb of pleasure. The Boulevards, the Quais, and every vacant space, are lined with miserable objects, selling their goods, with a number dangling from their stalls; for every thing is licenced here. As the houses have no yards or gardens behind them, many things are done in the open streets, as roasting coffee, &c. by which Paris is never free from smells. The poorer classes of people wash their linen in sheds, erected on the river Seine, beating them with bats. The Seine scarcely deserves the name of a river, being a shallow muddy stream, without tide, and on which not a boat is to be seen. What is called the Cité, is a wretched mass of mud; the dirt and mud being swept against the walls, taken away every morning by the scavengers.—As there are fountains in nearly every street, they are always muddy; besides not a morsel of pavement is to be seen in all the town. The smell that first offended my nostrils was now increased by the stench of cookery, &c.

Notre Dame is a fine building, superior, in my opinion, to Westminster Abbey; but St. Paul's has no equal here. In the grass plot of the Palais Royal is a small cannon, which is discharged every day, by the rays of the sun falling on a magnifying glass which is suspended over it. The Garden of the Tuilleries is a delightful place, being so shaded by trees that the heat of the sun cannot penetrate. I was, one day, witness to a battle between two men; fights do not happen often, I believe, but when they do, let not the French boast of humanity; for one had no sooner got the other down, than he kicked and struck him unmercifully, till the other cried for quarter. The shops, with respect to beauty, bear no resemblance to ours, having a mean dirty appearance. Those of the linen drapers are the handsomest, having a good sign hung over the door. The cafés are superb, some of them being lined with looking glasses. Strolling down by the side of the river, I saw the word 'Morgue' written over the door of a stone building; I entered, and what a sight: on each side are boards, in an inclining position, on which were two men and one female, naked, with a small exception. The head of the first was shattered to pieces; he had shot himself: the other was an old man, who had been taken out of the river. The woman, who seemed to have been young and handsome, had likewise been found in the Seine; it was supposed the cause was jealousy. Their clothes were hung over their heads, that they might be recognised by their friends. The smell was intolerable, yet there were two ladies looking on with the utmost composure. On Sundays, the Boulevards are crowded, and the shops are partially open till five or six in the evening. The French may boast of their Champs Elysées, but they are not equal in beauty to Kensington Gardens, although the former are prettily studded with little cafés, which gave them a very picturesque appearance. The Museum of the Louvre is an immense long gallery, full of paintings; under which is a handsome hall, containing three or four hundred beautiful statues, and having a very different appearance from a mason's-shop-looking place in the British Museum. But the finest sight is the Jardin des Plantes: here are to be seen every plant and tree in the known world; in addition to which, in a fine stone building, are immense numbers of stuffed birds, beasts, reptiles, and insects. In another part of the garden is a large collection of living wild beasts, and among them is an old bear, named Martin; he has killed two men, the last of whom was a veteran in the army; the circumstances are these: a lady, who had imprudently approached too near the cage, let her reticule fall, which the bear instantly drew into the cage. The lady was much concerned, as it contained twenty-six Napoleons. The veteran offered his services to regain it for the reward of one of them; and having procured a ladder, he descended by a trap door, which opened at the top; he had a sword drawn, and secured the reticule, the bear having retired in a corner; but, being roused by his ascending, he pounced on him and crushed him. The bear was, seriously, tried for it, and if he had been convicted, his life had been the forfeit: but his counsel, for he had one, argued that Martin had acted only in self-defence, as the man had no right to invade his premises, besides he acted from interested motives. The bear was acquitted. There is now a soldier placed there, to prevent the too near approach of any person. Fiacres and cabriolets are very numerous in the streets, but gentlemen's carriages are seldom seen, as few are rich enough to keep them. The Théâtre Français is the principal theatre, and at which Talma plays. In tragedy, the same scene continues all through the piece, making it one uninterrupted piece of declamation, undivided by acts or change of scenery.—I have one more grave remark to make, and which is the last; for who can go further than the silent habitations of Père la Chaise. This burial ground is on a hill, from which you have a fine view of Paris. Here are tombs of the most illustrious as well as the most humble. The ground is purchased by the person who intends to make this his last resting place: they even go so far as sometimes to have the stones engraved, with an account of their deaths, leaving a space for dates, &c.; it is a most enchanting place, every grave being decorated with garlands, which are renewed from time to time. I remained in Paris about a fortnight, scarcely ever thinking of business, but passed my time in going to every place worth notice. Finding, at last, that, though Paris is a fine place to spend money, yet it is no place to get it, I resolved to return to London, which I was enabled to do, by the assistance of a gentleman I met here. After obtaining my passports, which cost me two whole days and ten francs, I took the diligence to Amiens, a distance of one hundred miles, for twelve francs, finding the road paved the whole distance. The town is large, and contains a fine cathedral. I was shown the house in which the hollow peace of 1801 was concluded; here I entered a sacre, which took me to Boulogne, whence I walked to Calais, and taking my place in the packet to Dover, arrived in London, fully convinced, that, for an Englishman, no place is like England. POEM BY DR. FRANKLIN.

We believe (says the editor of the Salem Observer, an American paper) that it is not generally known that this eminent philosopher was no inconsiderable poet. The following ode, which, for some reason or other, does not appear in his works, was written on the institution of the Royal Academy, by his Majesty, George III., A. D. 1769.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE ARTS.

When discord late her baneful influence shed,
O'er the fair realms of science and of art,
Neglected genius bent his drooping head,
And pierc'd with anguish every tuneful heart;
Apollo wept the broken lyre,
Wept to behold the mournful choir
Of his lov'd muses now an exil'd train,
And in their seats to see Alecto reign.
When, lo! Britannia, to the throne
Of goodness, makes her sorrows known,
For never there did grief complain,
Or injur'd merit plead in vain,
The monarch heard her just request,
He saw, he felt, and he address'd;
Quick with a master hand he tunes the strings;
And harmony from discord springs.
Thus good by heaven's command from evil flows,
From chaos, thus of old, creation rose;
When order with confusion join'd,
And jarring elements combin'd,
To grace with mutual strength the great design,
And speak the architect divine.
While eastern tyrants, in the trophied car,
Wave the red banner of destructive war,
In George's breast a nobler flame
Is kindled, and a fairer fame
Excites to cherish native worth,
To call the latent seeds of genius forth,
To bid discordant factions cease,
And caltivate the gentle arts of peace.
And, lo! from this auspicious day,
The sun of science beams a purer ray:
Behold! a brighter train of years,
A new Augustan age appears;
The time, not distant far, shall come,
When England's tasteful youth no more
Shall wander to Italia's classic shore;
No more to foreign climes shall roam,
In search of models better found at home.—
With rapture the prophetic muse,
Her country's opening glory views,
Already seen, with wond'ring eyes,
Our Titians and our Guido rise,
See new Palladios grace th' historic page,
And British Raphaels charm a future age.
Meantime, ye sons of art, your offerings bring,
To grace your patron and your king,
Bid sculpture grace his honour'd name
In marble, lasting as his fame:
Bid painting's magic pencil trace
The features of his darling race,
And as it flows through all the loyal line,
Glow with superior warmth and energy divine.
If tow'ring architecture still
Can boast her old creative skill,
Bid some majestic structure rise to view,
Worthy him and worthy you;
Where art may join with nature and with sense;
Splendour with grace: with taste, magnificence;
Where strength may be with elegance combin'd,
The perfect image of its master's mind
And, oh! if with the tuneful throng
The muse may dare to mix her humble song,
In your glad train permit her to appear,
Tho' poor, yet willing, and tho' rude, sincere,
To praise the sovereign whom her heart approves,
And pay this tribute to the arts she loves.

MR. PERKINS'S NEW STEAM ENGINE.

On the application of Mr. Perkins's principle to Steam Engines of the old Construction.

BY DR. BREWSTER.

GREAT as the invention is which we have described,* yet we are disposed to think that the application of the principle to old steam-engines is not less important. When we consider the enormous capital which is at present embodied in Great Britain in the substantial form of steam-engines, and the admirable elegance and skill with which these noble machines impel and regulate the vast population of wheels and pinions over which they reign, we feel as if some vast innovation were proposed upon our established usages, by the introduction of Mr. Perkins's engine. The very idea that these potentates of the mechanical world should be displaced from their thrones; that their strongholds should be dismantled; their palaces demolished, and their whole affairs placed under a more economical management, is somewhat startling to those who dread change, and admire institutions that both work and wear well. Mr. Perkins, however, has saved them from such a degradation. He has allowed them to retain all their honours and privileges, and proposes only to invigorate them with fresh influence and power.

In this new system, the old engines, with their boilers, are retained unaltered. The furnaces alone are removed. Mr. Perkins constructs a generator consisting of three horizontal tubes of gun-metal, connected together, filled with water, and supplied with water from a forcing-pump, as in his own engine. This generator is exposed to heat in an analogous manner, so that, by means of a loaded valve, which opens and shuts, the red hot fluid may be constrained till forced out of the generator into the water in the boilers of Bolton and Watt. By this means, as much low pressure steam of four pounds on the square inch may be generated by one bushel of coals, as could be produced in the old engine by nine bushels. This most important result, was obtained by actual experiment.

Since these great improvements have been effected, Mr. Perkins has made a discovery that seems, in its practical importance, to surpass them all. He now entirely dispenses with the use of the condenser, and works the engine against the atmosphere alone; and by methods with which we are not acquainted, and which indeed it would not be prudent for him to disclose at present, he is enabled to arrest the heat after it has performed its mechanical functions, and actually pump it back to the generator, to unite with a fresh portion of water, and renew its useful labours. In an operation like this, a considerable portion of the heat must still be lost, but the wonder is that any should be saved; and we venture to say, that the most sanguine speculator on the omnipotence of the steam-engine, never dared even to imagine the possibility of such an invention.

We are well aware, that, in announcing this discovery, we are exposing ourselves to the criticisms of those whose belief is naturally limited by their own experience; but it is satisfactory to know, that Captain Basil Hall, (whose account of Mr. Perkins's discoveries and inventions, as delivered before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, gave such universal satisfaction,) has been entrusted with Mr. Perkins's discovery, and that he speaks confidently of the soundness of its principles, as well as in the practicability of its application.

We cannot quit this subject, without congratulating the country on the brilliant prospects with which these inventions promise to invest on all our national concerns. At any period of the history of British industry, they must have excited the highest expectations; but, originating as they have done, when our commerce, our manufactures, and our agriculture, the three stars of our national prosperity, had just passed the lowest point of their orbit, and quitted, we trust for long, the scene of their disturbing forces, we cannot but hail them as contributing, to ensure the pre-eminence of our industry, to augment the wealth and resources of the nation, and, by giving employment to idle hands, and direction to idle minds, to secure the integrity and permanence of our national institutions.

† It is due to the truth and candour of philosophical history, to mention, that Mr. Perkins is not our countryman; but the age of jealousy against America has happily gone past, and we hail, with sincere pleasure, any circumstance which contributes to the scientific renown of our great descendants, and companions in freedom and intelligence.

NEW COINAGE.—It is reported that the British Mint is, in future, to have the aid of Mr. Chantrey's talents and that a new coinage of double sovereigns, in imitation of the double napoleons, is in preparation; the head of the King is said to be an exquisite copy from Chantrey's bust.

INIMITABLE BANK NOTE.—A gentleman, who has given, for some time past, considerable attention to the subject of the prevention of forgery of Bank of England notes, adopts the following plan for the construction of what he considers an 'INIMITABLE BANK NOTE.' He does not hesitate to make it known, as its publication will be of no avail to the forger: the very attempt to experimentalize involving the latter in endless uncertainty and expense. The note is fabricated after the following manner:—Take a given quantity of platina, alloy it with copper, silver, or gold, in any given proportion; draw the same into an exquisitely fine wire; this thread or wire is woven (secundum artem,) into a web or net-work of great delicacy, (which will add about ten grains in weight to the note in circulation,) and forms the basis or ground on which the pulp is deposited in the formation of the blank paper, (and how is the forger to get such?) which, being thus completed, is fit to receive the usual superscription. The principal characteristic of this note consists in its capability of producing, by chemical agency, on its surface, oxides of various hues, and possesses the property besides of being by ordinary means infrangible, and partially incombustible. These are its tests more especially, though it admits of other distinguishing features.

ANTIQUITIES.—Some splendid remains of antiquity have been recently discovered in a field, on the estate of W. Greenwood, Esq. of Brockwood, in Southampton. Six tessellated pavements have been already cleared, two of which are of the most intricate and beautiful workmanship; the smallest of these contains representations of eight of the heathen gods (four of which are perfect), round a Medusa's head as a centre piece. The larger has a very beautiful octagonal centre piece, representing Hercules and Anteus, and a reclining armed figure extending her hand to the wrestlers. This is surrounded by four large heads and an intricate arrangement of highly ornamented squares, forming octagons, diamonds, &c. This last room appears to be built on arches, and the hollow beneath it is connected with the upper air by flues at equal distances in the walls. The remainder of the pavements (except a very small mutilated imperfect pattern in a sort of passage) are plain, and very perfect, and composed of bricks about an inch square. About thirty yards from what appears the main building, a very large rough bricked pavement has been found, nearly two feet beneath the surface, the connection of which with the above pavements is as yet unexplored. A few coins only have yet been discovered; one of them is a very perfect coin of Tassius, having on the reverse a figure with scales; the circumscription, Æspitas, Aug. But the most singular discovery, and which may afford matter for antiquarian ingenuity, is an arrangement of small cells, about four feet beneath the surface, formed by a number of red tile columns, about a foot square. This is about 80 yards from the pavements, and has hitherto been cleared only to a small extent. Previous to the discovery of the pavements, a large excavation in the solid chalk was cleared away, about 13 feet in depth, entirely filled with mortar, rubbish, tiles, bones of great variety, of animals, earthenware, &c. Among the last the fragments of a small vase have been found, sufficient to give the entire form. The excavations are about a mile from the village of Bramdean, near Alresford, on the manor of Woodcote. Tradition having long marked out Bramdean, as the site of a palace of Alfred, and the broken ground and tiles on the surface of the fields indicating some ancient building, some gentlemen of Mr. Greenwood's family commenced, by themselves, a search on the second instant, and the shepherd having, on the following day, pointed out a place which seemed to sound hollow beneath the crubar, the large vault was found. In the endeavour to extend the discoveries, Mr. Morgan, the tenant of the fields, struck on a walk on the fourth, at the bottom of which the first pavement was found.

THE CARPET.

LINES

To the Myosotis Arvensis or "Forget me not," a wild flower, planted by the Author in a friend's garden.

So small is thy attractive power,
So transient thy most brilliant hour,
Thou wilt art named, thou simple flower!

"Forget me not."

But though small homage waits on thee,
In thy frail form a charm I see,
Which seems to whisper still to me

"Forget me not."

And have I chosen thee to tell
What makes my labouring bosom swell,
And when I'm gone to say, "Farewell,"

"Forget me not."

To those whose kindness many a day
Drove care and sorrow far away,
I would each opening bud to say

"Forget me not."

And when thy summer glories die,
And winter's terrors rule the sky,
Thy form, though faded, still to sigh

"Forget me not."

Sweet flower! I seek no fairer tomb
Than e'er my dust that thou may'st bloom
To whisper 'midst-mourning gloom

"Forget me not."

INFLUENCE OF THE IMAGINATION ON HEALTH.

A youth of sixteen, of a weakly constitution and delicate nerves, but in other respects quite healthy, quitted his room in the dusk of the evening, but suddenly returned, with a face pale as death and looks betraying the greatest terror, and in a tremulous voice told a fellow-student who lived in the same room with him, that he should die at nine o'clock in the morning of the day after the next. His companion naturally considered this sudden transformation of a cheerful youth into a candidate for the grave as very extraordinary: he enquired the cause of this notion, and as the other declined to satisfy his curiosity, he strove silently to laugh him out of it. His efforts, however, were unavailing. All the answer he could obtain from his comrade was, that his death was certain and inevitable. A number of well-meaning friends assembled about him, and endeavoured to wean him from his idea by lively conversation, jokes, and even satirical remarks. He sat among them with a gloomy, thoughtful look, took no share in their discourse, sighed, and at length grew angry when they began to rally him. It was hoped that sleep would dispel this melancholy mood; but he never closed his eyes, and his thoughts were occupied all night with his approaching decease. Early next morning I was sent for. I found, in fact, the most singular sight in the world—a person in good health making all the arrangements for his funeral, taking a affecting leave of his friends, and writing a letter to his father, to acquaint him with his approaching dissolution, and to bid him farewell. I examined the state of his body, and found nothing unusual but the paleness of his face, eyes dull and rather inflamed with weeping, coldness of the extremities, and a low contracted pulse—indications of a general cramp of the nerves, which was sufficiently manifested in the state of his mind. I endeavoured, therefore, to convince him by the most powerful arguments, of the futility of his notion, and to prove that a person whose bodily health was so good, had no reason whatever to apprehend speedy death: in short, I exerted all my eloquence and my professional knowledge, but without making the slightest impression. He willingly admitted that I, as a physician, could not discover any cause of death in him; but this, he contended, was the peculiar circumstance of his case, that without any natural cause, merely from an unalterable decree of fate, his death must ensue; and though he could not expect us to share this conviction, still it was equally certain that it would be verified by the event of the following day. All that I could do, therefore, was to tell him, that under these circumstances I must treat him as a person labouring under a disease, and prescribe medicines accordingly. "Very well," replied he, "but you will see not only that your medicines will not do me any good, but that they will not operate at all."

There was no time to be lost, for I had only twenty-four hours to effect a cure. I therefore judged it best to employ powerful remedies in order to release him from this bondage of his imagination. With this view a very strong emetic and cathartic were administered, and blisters applied to both thighs. He submitted to every thing, but with the assurance that his body was already half dead, and the remedies would be of no use. Accordingly, to my utter astonishment, I learned when I called in the evening, that the emetic had taken but little or no effect, and that the blisters had not even turned the skin red. He now triumphed over our incredulity, and deduced from this inefficacy of the remedies the strongest conviction that he was already little better than a corpse. To me the case began to assume a very serious aspect. I saw how powerfully the state of the mind had affected the body, and what a degree of insensibility it had produced; and I had just reason to apprehend that an imagination, which had reduced the body to such extremity, was capable of carrying matters to still greater lengths.

All our inquiries, as to the cause of his belief, had hitherto proved abortive. He now disclosed to one of his friends, but in the strictest confidence, that the preceding evening, on quitting his room, he had seen a figure in white, which beckoned to him, and at the same moment a voice pronounced the words:—"The day after to-morrow, at nine in the morning, thou shalt die!" and the fate thus predicted nothing could enable him to escape. He now proceeded to set his house in order, made his will, and gave particular directions for his funeral, specifying who were to carry and who to follow him to the grave. He even insisted on receiving the sacrament—a wish, however, which those about him evaded complying with. Night came on, and he began to count the hours he had yet to live, till the fatal time the next morning, and every time the clock struck, his anxiety evidently increased. I began to be apprehensive for the result; for I recollected instances in which the mere imagination of death had really produced a fatal result. I recollected also the feigned execution, when the criminal, after a solemn trial, was sentenced to be beheaded, and when, in expectation of the fatal blow, his neck was struck with a switch, on which he fell lifeless to the ground, as though his head had been really cut off: and this circumstance gave me reason to fear that a similar result might attend this case, and that the striking of the hour of nine might prove as fatal to my patient as the blow of the switch on the above-mentioned occasion. At any rate the shock communicated by the striking of the clock, accompanied by the extraordinary excitement of the imagination and the general cramp, which had determined all the blood to the head and the internal parts, might produce a most dangerous revolution, spasms, faintings, or hemorrhages; or even totally overthrow reason, which had already sustained so severe an attack.

What was then to be done? In my judgment every thing depended on carrying him, without his being aware of it, beyond the fatal moment; and it was to be hoped that as his whole delusion hinged upon this point, he would then feel ashamed of himself and be cured of it. I therefore placed my reliance on opium, which, moreover, was quite appropriate to the state of his nerves, and prescribed twenty drops of laudanum with two grains of ben-bone to be taken about midnight. I directed, that if, as I hoped, he overslept the fatal hour, his friends should assemble round his bed, and on his awaking, laugh heartily at his silly notion, that, instead of being allowed to dwell upon the gloomy idea, he might be rendered thoroughly sensible of its absurdity. My instructions were punctually obeyed; soon after he had taken the opiate, he fell into a profound sleep, from which he did not awake till about eleven o'clock the next day. "What hour is it?" was his first question on opening his eyes; and when he heard how long he had overslept his death, and was at the same time greeted with loud laughter for his folly, he crept ashamed under the bedclothes, and at length joined in the laugh, declaring that the whole affair appeared to him like a dream, and that he could not conceive how he could be such a simpleton. Since that time he has enjoyed the best health, and has never had any similar attack.

THE EMPEROR PAUL.—He once shut his wife up in a fortified place; and ordered a mock-battle to be fought, pretending to take on himself the defence of it against the attack of the supposed enemy. Nothing offended him more than the refusal of Catherine to allow him to command the Russian army, in the campaign against the Porte in 1787.

On one occasion he had the audacity to cane an officer: the unfortunate victim of his cowardice retired to his house, and shot himself, leaving a note for the Emperor, containing these words: "He who has the courage to lose his own life for an insult, might take away the life of him who caused it. Let this be a warning to you."

It is well known, that, among other instances of folly, he ordered, by a special ukase, many of the buildings in the empire to be painted in a particular manner, according to his directions. A lady, whom he admired, appeared one evening at a ball with a pair of gloves of a red colour; The next morning his palace was painted red.

Some excellent paintings in the palace had been removed, by his orders, for the purpose of being varnished; and a few common sea-pieces, executed in the very worst manner, were hung, in the mean time, in room of them, to cover the wall: he noticed one, as he passed through the apartments, declared it to be the finest thing he had ever seen in his life, and angrily asked why such excellent paintings were placed so high, and out of sight. Presently, twenty soldiers entered with ladders, to take down the picture, that he might have it near him while he was at dinner, though it hung in the adjoining room.—Clarke's Travels.

RICHARD I.—Richard's poetical taste indicated a mind capable of greater things than the grovelling pursuits of mere sense. Its productions must not be tried by the modern gauge of literary merit; but they are not behind the standard of the poetical talent of the times in which he lived. One of these curious effusions is the following serenade, which he composed during his captivity in Germany:

"No prisoner can speak justly of his misfortune without grief; yet for his solace he may make a song. He may have friends, but how poor are their gifts! They should feel shame, that two winters are passed without my ransom."

"My English, Norman, Gascon, Poltoun Barons, I have had no companion so miserable, whose deliverance I would not have purchased. I will not reproach you; but—I am still a prisoner!"

"It is, indeed, true, that a dead man has neither relations nor friends; since to save some gold and silver, I am suffering from my misfortunes; but I suffer more from the want of feeling in my subjects! How reproachful to them, if I should die in my captivity!"

"I am not surprised that I should grieve. My feudal sovereign is ravaging my lands, although we swore to respect each other's possessions. But one thing consoles me,—I will not be slow in taking my revenge."

"Chail and Pensévin! my ministers! my friends! I have loved you: I love you now. Sing, that my enemies will have little glory in attacking me; that I have not shewn to them a heart false and perfidious; that they will not like real villains if they war against me while I am in prison!"

"Lady Soir, heaven guard your sovereign merit! and her's whom I claim, and to whom I am a captive!"

The only other poem of Richard's which has been preserved, is a serenade against the Dauphin of Auvergne, and his cousin, whose alliance against the French king, Richard had solicited in vain.—Illustrations, &c. of the Novels by the Author of Waverley.

EPITAPH.

"Here lies an author—pray forgive
The work that fed his pride—
Long after death he hoped to live,
And long before it, died."

BEWARE OF COMPARISONS.

(From Snobs for all Seasons.)

Henry the Eighth (as I have read),
To his ambassador once said,
"My Lord, you're neither grace nor shape,
In look an owl, in dress an ape."
To whom politely thus he spoke,
"Your majesty is pleased to joke;
I know not whether most or least
I'm like a bird, or like a beast,
But this I certainly do know
(And here he spoke distinct and slow)
The honour's oft conferr'd on me,
To represent your majesty."

LOOK AND SEE.

(From the same.)

A stubborn school-master declared
That see and look's the same;
A man, who this decision heard,
Said, "Sir, you're much to blame;
"You've made a wonderful mistake,
Which you'll not fail to find,
If you'll suppose, for reason's sake,
That you, alas, were blind.
"If I to you glass-eyes should sell,
This truth would then befall;
That, tho' you'd look extremely well,
You could not see at all."

VARIETIES.

PETER PENTEMAN.—Penteman having been requested to paint an emblematical picture of mortality, representing human skulls and bones, surrounded with rich gems and musical instruments, to express the vanity of this world's pleasures, amusements, or possessions; that he might imitate nature with the greater exactness, he went into an anatomical room, where several skeletons hung on wires from the ceiling, and bones and skulls lay scattered about, and prepared to make his designs. While he was thus employed, owing either to fatigue or to intense study, he fell asleep; but was suddenly roused by the shock of an earthquake, which happened at that instant, on the 18th of September, 1692. The moment he awoke, he observed the skeletons moving in different directions, and the skulls rolling from one side of the room to the other: being totally ignorant of the cause, he was struck with such horror, that he threw himself down stairs, and fell into the street half dead. His friends took all possible pains to efface the impression made on his mind, and acquainted him with the real cause of the agitation of the skeletons; but in vain; it affected his spirits in so violent a manner, that it brought on a disorder, which shortly ended his days.

SUPERSTITION THE BEST DOCTOR.—The eldest daughter of a French lady residing in Bouverie-street has been afflicted with a most severe and excruciating nervous complaint for the period of 18 months. When she attempted to leave her bed, the depending posture of the legs produced the greatest agony in the stomach and bowels; and after the attempt, she would lie for several hours suffering under acute hysterical flatulency, distention, and violent head-ache. In short, her agony was extreme, and she became completely bed-ridden, she was constantly bedewed with clammy perspirations, her face was exsanguine, her body emaciated. The most eminent physicians in this city attended this young lady; by expectorations and emetics she endeavoured to rouse her exertion—by medicines and diet to correct the deranged state of the human system, but to no purpose. Six days after his last visit he received a long letter from this young lady, stating herself to be recovered. She had written to Prince Hohenlohe.—He ordered her to say mass thrice, and pray for him; at the same time he would pray for her, and after the third mass she would be restored to perfect health. The attempts to kneel down at the two first masses were prevented by the tortures usually experienced upon trying to quit her bed. Dread and apprehension lest she should lose the chance of recovery, enabled her to perform genuflection at the third mass, though her attempts to quit bed were equally excruciating. She rose quite well from her last devotions.—[The Times contains the above, and adds, "In conformity with the wish of the writer, we withhold his name: he is, however, an eminent physician, and he has given, as vouchers of his statement, the names of the two other physicians of the very first rank."]

LIFE AND DEATH.—If life be good, death is its fruit. If life be an evil, death is its period.

BEETHOVEN.—The celebrated Beethoven, according to a recent letter, is become so completely deaf, that he is entirely lost to all society. Nevertheless, he has but lately finished two great works—a mass, which was bought for Berlin; and a new symphony, for the Philharmonic of London.

GARDEN WALKS.—The destruction of worms and insects by the use of salt is an effectual preservative of the beauty of gravel walks. Where worms rise much in the morning, strew a moderate quantity of salt over night, if the weather be dry.

THE MUFF AND TIPPET.—The following mistake is said to have been made a few days since, by a child of three years old, at a village in Cumberland: A lady passed the door with her muff and tippet; the child never having seen such ornaments, cried out, "Mother, mother, here is a woman with a dog in her arms, and its tail round her neck."

ONE EVIL BETTER THAN TWO.—A merchant having sustained a considerable loss, desired his son to mention it to nobody. The youth promised silence, but at the same time requested to know what advantage could attend it. "If you divulge this loss," said the father, "we shall have two evils to support instead of one; our own grief, and the joy of our neighbours."

NOTICE of coffee, from Sir H. Blunt's Travels in 1634. "They, (the Turks) have another drink called cauphe, made of a berry as big as a small bean, dried in a furnace, and beat to powder, of a sooty color, that they seethe and drink, in taste a little bitterish, but as they may be endured:—it is thought to be the old black broth used so much by the Lacedemonians: it drieth ill-humours in the stomach, comforteth the brain," &c. &c. &c.

SINGULAR RESEMBLANCE.—John Ambrosius Bach, a German composer, and father of the celebrated musician, John Sebastian Bach, had a brother named Christopher, also a musician, who so exceedingly resembled him, that even their own wives could only distinguish one from the other by the difference of dress! The brothers tenderly loved each other: their voices, dispositions, tastes, dislikes, even the style of their music, were similar. If one sickened, the other became ill; and they died within a short time of each other.

ILLEGAL COMMANDS.—When the King of France ordered his army to take off the Protestants, in the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew, it was a noble answer, worthy the gallantry of a true soldier and a loyal subject, he received from the Viscount d'Ortez:—"Sire, I have communicated your Majesty's orders to your faithful inhabitants, and to the troops in the garrison: I found there good citizens and brave soldiers, but not one executioner."

SKELETONS.—On removing, last week, an old partition in the house of Mr. Charles Reesby, miller, of Stamford, the skeleton of a cat was discovered, wedged between the partition and the wall; and what constitutes the singularity of the discovery is, that between the extended fore-legs of the cat, the skeleton of a rat was also found. The inference is, that the cat, in pursuit of the rat, forced itself into so narrow a cavity, that it could not retreat with its prey, but instinctively continued to hold it in its paws till death relieved both animals from their sufferings.

RETORT.—The Arabs of the Desert have always been remarkable for their freedom of speech even to crowned heads. A Caliph being at the table, a Bedoin presented himself, and was desired to sit down. He obeyed, and immediately commenced a tremendous attack on a roasted lamb, which he devoured with unrelenting voracity. "In the name of Allah," said the Caliph, "who are you that are thus tearing this poor lamb with so much fury? One would suppose that his mother had given you a terrible butting with her horns." "No," replied the Arab, "but to judge from your annoyance at my eating him, we might conclude that his mother had at least been your nurse."

THE GREEKS.—What an idea do we form of the energies of liberty, when we contemplate Attica,—whose territory exceeded a medium English county,—resisting the invasion of the Persian monarch, the powerful descendant of the all-conquering Cyrus!—We see the Persian, to make sure of his prey, pour into this little Grecian state, an hundred thousand chosen men. Ten thousand Athenian citizens arm, and march: and they are joined by one thousand Plateans. Meanwhile the invaders penetrate to within 20 miles of Athens. Jealous of the Athenian fame, and anxious to share with their ally in the glory of defending their common country, or to perish in the attempt, the hardy sons of Lacedæmon march 210 miles in three days. Unparalleled effort! Glorious enthusiasm!—But they have the mortification to arrive too late. The eleven thousand have already triumphed, and immortalized the field of Marathon!—Lord Abington.

A LESSON FOR DUELLISTS.—Two friends happening to quarrel at a tavern, one of them, a man of a very hasty disposition, insisted on the other's fighting him the next morning. The challenge was accepted, on condition that they should breakfast together, previous to their going to the field, at the house of the challenged. When the challenger arrived the next morning, according to appointment, he found every preparation for breakfast, and his friend, his wife, and children, all ready to receive him. Their repast being over, and the family withdrawn, without any hint of the fatal purpose having transpired, the challenger asked the other if he was ready to attend. "No, Sir," replied he, "not till we are more upon a par; that amiable woman, and those six innocent children, who just now breakfasted with us, depend solely upon my life for their subsistence: and till you can stake something equal, in my estimation, to the welfare of seven persons, dearer to me than the apple of my eye, I cannot think we are equally matched."—"We are not, indeed!" replied the other, giving him his hand, and they became firmer friends than ever.

BLEACHED GRASS.—In our last number we gave an account of the process of Bleaching Grass for the manufacture of Bonnets: a friend has since called upon us with a small quantity, prepared as directed, and which may be seen by calling at the Iris Office.

ENIGMA.

BY THE RT. HON. C. J. FOX.

If it be true as Welshmen say,
Honour depends on pedigree,
Then stand by—clear the way:
Retire, ye sons of haughty Gower,
And all the race of all Glendour,
And let me have fair play;
For if you pry in ages dark
And trace your pedigree to Noah's ark,
I'm older still, for I was there;
And before that, I did appear
With Eve in Paradise.
For I was Adam—Adam I;
And I was Eve, and Eve was I,
In spite of wind and weather,
But mark me, Adam was not I,
Neither was Mrs. Adam I,
Unless they were together.
Suppose then Eve and Adam talking—
With all my heart—but if they're walking,
There ends all simile.
For though I've tongue, and often talk,
And also legs, yet when I walk
It puts an end to me:
Not such an end, but that I've breath;
Therefore to such a kind of death
I feel but small objection;
For soon again I come in view;
And though a christian, yet 'tis true
I die by resurrection.

of CHRISTIANITY. With INTRODUCTORY OBSER-VATIONS on the POPULAR CAUSES of INFIDELITY.

CHARACTER OF THE WORK.

"This is an excellent work, which requires only to be known to be duly valued.....The work is divided into five books, and these again are subdivided into chapters. The first book infers the truth of Christianity from the nature and fulfilment of prophecy; the second founds its truth on the evidence furnished by profane authors: and the third reaches the same conclusion from sacred and early Christian writers. The fourth book is but remotely connected with the grand subject of the work. It contains three chapters, which treat of the Divinity of Christ, the Plurality of the Godhead, and the Unity of the Godhead. The fifth is chiefly employed in stating Mr. Ladd's argument in favour of Christianity, and in answering objections raised by infidels against the authenticity of the sacred volume.
The whole concludes with a summary of Mahometanism, as it stands compared or contrasted with the Christian system."
Imperial Magazine.

"To those who have not the original works, this concise view of the Evidences of Christianity, is certainly valuable; and to those who possess them, it will prove a convenient compendium."—Evangelical Magazine.

"This is a book which we can most cordially recommend.
The proofs are striking, comprehensive, and well arranged;
and the whole work is admirably calculated to remove the doubts of the intelligent enquirer, and to confirm him in an unswerving belief of the Gospel Dispensation."—Manchester Iris.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Juvenals' will oblige us by forwarding the conclusion of the Tale—it shall be inserted.—We have a slight recollection of the paper named, and think it was rather grave for our columns.

Laelius' opinions are at variance with every just, humane, and honorable feeling.—We are sorry to find that Duelling has a single advocate; and still more so, that that one should be a person whom we would gladly enumerate amongst our correspondents.—We are perfectly convinced that Duelling is neither "a very honorable" nor an "indispensable custom."

Soror's communication is inserted.—We shall be glad to hear again from the same quarter.

PRIZE POEM.

AUSTRALASIA.

(A Poem which obtained the Chancellor's Medal at the Cambridge Commencement, 1823.)

BY WINTHROP MACKWORTH PRAED, OF TRINITY COLLEGE.

The Sun is high in Heaven: a favoring breeze
Fills the white sail, and sweeps the rippling seas,
And the tall vessel walks her destined way,
And rocks and glitters in the curling spray.
Among the shrouds all happiness and hope,
The busy seaman coils the rattling rope,
And tells his jest, and carols out his song,
And laughs his laughter, vehement and long,
Or pauses on the deck, to dream awhile
Of his babes' prattle, and their mother's smile,
And nods the head, and waves the welcome hand,
To those who weep upon the lessening strand.

His is the roving step and humor dry,
His the light laugh, and his the jocund eye;
And his the feeling, which, in guilt or grief,
Makes the sin venial, and the sorrow brief.
But there are hearts that merry deck below,
Of darker error, and of deeper woe,
Children of wrath and wretchedness, who grieve
Not for the country, but the crimes they leave,
Who, while for them on many a sleepless bed
The prayer is murmured, and the tear is shed,
In exile and in misery, look within
Their dread despair, their unrepented sin,—
And in their madness dare to gaze on Heaven,
Sullen and cold, unawed and unforgiven!

There the gaunt robber, stern in sin and shame,
Shows his dull features and his iron frame;
And tenderer pilferers creep in silence by,
With quivering lip, flushed brow, and vacant eye.
And some their are who, in their close of day,
With dropping jaw, weak step, and temples gray,
Go tottering forth, to find, across the wave,
A short sad sojourn, and a foreign grave;
And some, who look their long and last adieu
To the white cliffs that vanish from the view,
While youth still blooms, and vigor nerves the arm,
The hapless female stands in silence there,
So weak, so wan, and yet so sadly fair,
That those who gaze, a rude untutor'd tribe,
Check the coarse question, and the wounding gibe,
And look, and long to strike the fetter off,
And stray to pity, though they seem to scoff.
Then o'er her cheek their runs a burning blush,
And the hot tears of shame begin to rush
Forth from their swelling orbs;—she turns away,
And her white fingers o'er her eye-lids stray,
And still the tears through those white fingers glide,
Which strive to check them, or at least to hide!
And there the stripling, led to Plunder's school,
Ere Passion slept, or Reason learned to rule,
Clasps his young hands, and beats his throbbing brain,
And looks with marvel on his galling chain.
Oh! you may guess from that unconscious gaze
His soul hath dreamed of those far fading days,
When, rudely nurtured on the mountain's brow,
He tended day by day his father's plough;
Blest in his day of toil, his night of ease,
His life of purity, his soul of peace.
Oh yes! to-day his soul hath backward been
To many a tender face, and beautiful scene;
The verdant valley, and the dark-brown hill,
The small fair garden, and its tinkling rill,

His grandame's tale, believed at twilight hour,
His sister singing in her myrtle bower,
And she, the maid, of every hope bereft,
So fondly loved, alas! so falsely left,
The winding path, the dwelling in the grove,
The look of welcome and the kiss of love—
These are his dreams;—but these are dreams of bliss!
Why do they blend with such a lot as his?

And is there naught for him but grief and gloom,
A lone existence, and an early tomb?
Is there no hope of comfort and of rest
To the seared conscience and the troubled breast?
Oh say not so! In some far distant clime
Where lives no witness of his early crime,
Benignant Penitence may haply muse
On purer pleasures, and on brighter views,
And slumbering Virtue wake at last to claim
Another Being, and a fairer Fame.

Beautiful Land! within whose quiet shore,
Lost spirits may forget the stain they bore.
Beautiful Land! with all thy blended shades
Of waste and wood, rude rocks, and level glades,
On thee, on thee I gaze, as Moslems look
To the blest Islands of their Prophet's Book,
And oft I deem that, linked by magic spell,
Pardon and Peace upon thy valleys dwell
Like two sweet Hours beckoning o'er the deep
The souls that tremble, and the eyes that weep.
Therefore on thee undying sunbeams throw
Their clearest radiance, and their warmest glow,
And tranquil nights, cool gales, and gentle showers,
Make bloom eternal in thy sinless bowers.
Green is thy turf; stern Winter doth not dare
To breathe his blast, and leave a ruin there;
And the charmed Ocean roams thy rocks around,
With softer motion, and with sweeter sound:
Among thy blooming flowers and blushing fruit
The whispering of young birds is never mute,
And never doth the streamlet cease to swell
Through its old channel in the hidden dell.
Oh! if the muse of Greece had ever strayed,
In solemn twilight, through thy forest shade,
And swept her lyre, and waked thy meads along
The liquid echo of her ancient song.
Her fabled Fancy in that hour had found
Voices of music, shapes of grace, around;
Among thy trees, with merry step and glance,
The Dryad then had wound her wayward dance,
And the cold Naiad in thy waters fair
Bathed her white breast, and wrung her dripping hair.

Beautiful Land! upon so pure a plain
Shall Superstition hold her hated reign?
Must Bigotry build up her cheerless shrine
In such an air, on such an earth as thine?
Alas! Religion from thy placid Isles
Veils the warm splendor of her heavenly smiles,
And the wrapt gazer in the beautiful plan
Sees nothing dark except the soul of man.

Sweet are the links that bind us to our kind,
Meek, but unyielding, felt, but undefined;
Sweet is the love of brethren, sweet the joy
Of a young mother in her cradled toy,
And sweet is childhood's deep and earnest glow
Of reverence for a father's head of snow!
Sweeter than all, ere our young hopes depart,
The quickening throb of an impassion'd heart,
Beating in silence, eloquently still,
For one loved soul that answers to its thrill.
But where thy smile, Religion, hath not shone,
The chain is rivet'd, and the charm is gone,
And, unawakened by the wondrous spell,
The Feelings slumber in their silent cell.

Hush'd is the voice of Labor and of Mirth,
The light of day is sinking from the earth,
And Evening mantles in her dewy calm
The couch of one who cannot heed its balm.*
Lo! where the Chieftain on his matted bed
Leans the faint form, and hangs the feverish head;
There is no lustre in his wandering eye,
His forehead hath no show of majesty,
His gasping lip, too weak for wail or prayer,
Scarcely stirs the breeze, and leaves no echo there,
And his strong arm, so nobly wont to rear
The feather'd target, or the ashen spear,
Drops powerless and cold! the pang of death
Looks the set teeth, and chokes the struggling breath;
And the last glimmering of departing day
Lingers around to herald life away.

Is their no duteous youth to sprinkle now
One drop of water on his lip and brow?
No dark-eyed maid to bring with soundless foot
The lulling potion, or the healing root?
No tender look to meet his wandering gaze?
No tone of fondness, heard in happier days,
To sooth the terrors of the Spirit's flight,
And speak of mercy and of hope to-night?

All love, all leave him!—terrible and slow
Along the crowd the whisper'd murmurs grow.
The hand of Heaven is on him! is it our's
To check the fleeting of his number'd hours?
Oh not to us, oh not to us is given
To read the Book, or thwart the will of Heaven!
Away, away! and each familiar face
Recoils in horror from his sad embrace;
The turf on which he lies is hallowed ground,
The sullen Priest stalks gloomily around,
And shuddering friends, that dare not soothe or save,
Hear the last groan and dig the destined grave.
The frantic widow folds upon her breast
Her glittering trinkets, and her gorgeous vest,
Circles her neck with many a mystic charm,
Clasps the rich bracelet on her desperate arm,
Binds her black hair, and stains her eye-lid's fringe
With the jet lustre of the Henow's tinge;
Then on the spot where those dear ashes lie,
In bigot transport sits her down to die.
Her swarthy brothers mark the wasted cheek,
The straining eye-ball, and the stifled shriek,
And sing the praises of her deathless name,
As the last flutter racks her tortured frame.
They sleep together; o'er the natural tomb
The lichen'd pine rears up its form of gloom,
And lorn acacias shed their shadow gray,
Bloomless and leafless, o'er the buried clay.
And often there, when, calmly, coldly bright,
The midnight Moon flings down her ghastly light,
With solemn murmur, and with silent tread,
The dance is order'd, and the verse is said,
And sighs of wonder, sounds of spectral fear
Scare the quick glance and chill the startled ear.

Yet direr visions e'en than these remain;
A fiercer guiltiness, a fouler stain!
Oh! who shall sing the scene of savage strife,
Where Hatred glories in the waste of life?
The hurried march, the looks of grim delight,
The yell, the rush, the slaughter, and the flight,
The arms unwearied in the cruel toil,
The boarded vengeance and the rifled spoil,

* This sketch of the death of a New Zealander, and of the superstition which prevents the offering of any consolation or assistance under the idea that a sick man is under the immediate influence of the Deity, is taken from the narrative of the death of Dauterra, a friendly chieftain, recorded by Nicholas, Vol. II. p. 181.

And, last of all, the revel in the wood,
The feast of death, the banquetting of blood,
When the wild warrior gazes on his foe
Convulsed beneath him in his painful throes,
And lifts the knife, and kneels him down to drain
The purple current from the quivering vein?
Cease, cease the tale; and let the Ocean's roll
Shut the dark horror from my wildered soul!

And are there none to succour? none to speed
A fairer feeling and a holier creed?
Alas! for this, upon the Ocean blue,
Lamented Cook, thy pennon hither flew;
For* this, undaunted o'er the raging brine,
The venturesome Frank upheld his Saviour's sign.
Unhappy Chief! while Fancy thus surveys
The scattered islets, and the sparkling bays,
Beneath whose cloudless sky and gorgeous sun
Thy life was ended, and thy voyage done,
In shadowy mist thy form appears to glide,
Haunting the grove, or floating on the tide;
Oh! there was grief for thee, and bitter tears,
And racking doubts through long and joyless years,
And tender tongues that babbled of the theme,
And lonely hearts that doated on the dream.
Pale Memory deemed she saw thy cherished form
Snatched from the foe, or rescued from the storm;
And faithful Love, unswerving and untired,
Clung to each hope, and sighed as each expired.
On the bleak desert, or the tombless sea,
No prayer was said, no requiem sung for thee;
Affection knows not, whether o'er thy grave
The Ocean mormur, or the willow wave;
But still the beacon of thy sacred name
Lights ardent souls to Virtue and to Fame;
Still Science mourns thee, and the grateful Muse
Wreathes the green cypress for her own Peyrouse.

But not thy death shall mar the gracious plan,
Nor check the task thy pious toil began;
O'er the wide waters of the bounding main
The Book of Life must win its way again,
And, in the regions by thy fate endeared,
The Cross be lifted, and the Altar reared.

With furrowed brow, and cheek serenely fair,
The calm wind wandering o'er his silver hair,
His arm uplifted, and his moistened eye
Fixed in deep rapture on the golden sky,—
Upon the shore, through many a billow driven,
He kneels at last the Messenger of Heaven!
Long years, that rank the mighty with the weak,
Have dimmed the flush upon his faded cheek,
And many a dew, and many a noxious damp,
The daily labor, and the nightly lamp,
Have reft away, for ever reft, from him,
The liquid accent, and the buoyant limb:
Yet still within him aspirations swell
Which time corrupts not, sorrow cannot quell,
The changeless Zeal, which on, from land to land,
Speeds the faint foot, and nerves the withered hand,
And the mild Charity, which, day by day,
Weeps every wound, and every stain away,
Rears the young bud on every blighted stem,
And longs to comfort, where she must condemn.
With these, through storms, and bitterness, and wrath,
In peace and power he holds his onward path,
Curbs the fierce soul, and sheathes the murderous steel,
And calms the passions he hath ceased to feel.

Yes? he hath triumphed!—while his lips relate
The sacred story of his Saviour's fate,
While to the search of that tumultuous horde
He opens wide the Everlasting Word,
And bids the Soul drink deep of Wisdom there,
In fond devotion, and in fervent prayer,
In speechless awe the wonder-stricken throng
Check their rude feasting and their barbarous song:
Around his steps the gathering myriads crowd,
The chief, the slave, the timid and the proud;
Of various features, and of various dress,
Like their own forest-leaves, confused and numberless.
Where shall your temples, where your worship be,
Gods of the air, and Rulers of the sea?
In the glad dawning of a kinder light,
Your blind adorer quits your gloomy rite,

* From the coast of Australasia the last despatches of La Peyrouse were dated.

And kneels in gladness on his native plain,
A happier votary at a holier fane.

Beautiful Land! farewell!—when toil and strife,
And all the aigis, and all the sins of life
Shall come about me, when the light of Truth
Shall scatter the bright mists that dazzled youth,
And Memory muse in sadness on the past,
And mourn for pleasures far too sweet to last,
How often shall I long for some green spot,
Where, not remembering, and remembered not,
With no false verse to deck my lying bust,
With no fond tear to vex my mouldering dust.
Thy busy brain may find its grassy shrine,
And sleep, untroubled, in a shade like thine!

THE CLUB.

No. XXXV.—FRIDAY, JULY 11, 1823.

"A woman is a dish for the gods, if the devil dress her not."
SHAKESPEARE.

WE are great admirers of the fair sex; and therefore take much interest in those changes of fashion which have, in any way, a tendency to increase or diminish the charms of our pretty countrywomen. It always gives us concern to see a fine form sacrificed at the shrine of fashion. On the contrary it gives us much pleasure to observe the fair sex taking pains to heighten those personal charms which nature has lavished so unsparringly upon them.

There is no mode of dress we are so much averse to as that of long tight waists. We fear that, if not checked by the good sense of the ladies, upon which we always place much reliance, it will be again revived.

No fashion certainly can be more ungraceful. It not only gives, during its continuance, an awkward stiffness to the form, but, like the ravages of the small pox, it often leaves behind it indelible traces of its existence. The Grecian women, who have ever been distinguished for their fine figures, are said to have been particularly careful, not to injure the beauty of their forms, by a mistaken taste in dress. The steel stays, and the greyhound body were unknown to them. They did not waste their ingenuity in contriving means to produce deformity. They set off to advantage the fine proportion of person for which they have been celebrated, and do not, like our lovely countrywomen, strive to squeeze themselves into the shape of dumb-bells, protuberant at both ends and thin in the middle. Artists, whose judgment on this point is of the highest authority, never represent ideal beauty in the form of a modern belle, gasping for breath in the agonies of tight stays.

The hooped petticoat, and strange head-dress of our great grandmothers, against which the wit of Addison was so happily directed, were far better than the strait waist which is now coming again into fashion. The former were at least harmless. A lady was not the worse for the fashion when it had been changed. But the case is different with the tight stays. They are not only the mould of deformity, but the source of disease. We might here enter into some rather delicate explanations in support of our assertion, had we not some consideration for the feelings of those among the fair sex, whose modesty will protect them from the fatal consequences of the practice to which we refer.

"I was once," said a member, when the question was last mentioned at the Club, "acquainted with a lovely female who appeared to possess, in a high degree almost every personal attraction. The correctness of my appreciation of her appearance was confirmed by every beholder. A very genteel and becoming mode of dress was succeeded by the strait waist which is now beginning to prevail. The young lady caught the contagion; and was literally so much compressed that her breathing manifested the inconvenience which she endured. Still, however, she persisted; and in a short time her form, which had the fullness of health and vigour, became lean and emaciated;—her whole appearance lost its interest; and she, who had been accustomed to hear the most flattering compliments addressed to her, soon saw, with feelings doubtless not very pleasurable, the cool looks of her once warm admirers, and the triumph of rivals whom her departed charms had often begrimed."

The fair sex never appear so lovely as when they are dressed with elegant simplicity; and they can never be so in any dress which does not combine the qualities of ease and gracefulness.

Let us not be regarded as cynical in consequence of the apparent severity of our strictures. The ladies are no where more highly respected than at the Club at the Green Dragon. We can see, without complaining, almost any fashion when it is kept within the bounds of moderation.

The waist may be slightly compressed without much injury or inconvenience being suspected; it may, to a certain extent be lengthened without much impairing the gracefulness of the female form; but these limits are too frequently passed by the ardour of rivalry on the depravity of taste.

Since then this odious fashion is detrimental to gracefulness;—since it converts beauty into deformity, and health into disease;—since it excites the suspicion and ridicule of the other sex;—and since it would greatly increase the number of old maids, those jarring chords of society, let us conjure our lovely countrywomen to leave it to the only part of the sex who can find any excuse for adopting it.

C. L.

ON THE LOSS OF FRIENDS.

OF all the misfortunes which assail us in life, the loss of friends is perhaps one of the heaviest. "May he outlive every relative and friend" is one of the direst curses that can be denounced against a man. The loss of fortune may be borne with easily, because it may be remedied, but the loss of friends is irreparable. As they die fast around us, it seems as though the different links which chain us to existence were snapping asunder, and enforces the idea that the time will shortly arrive which is to let loose our souls from the thralldom of flesh and blood, and allow them to range enfranchised and immortal over the boundless immensity of space.

It is a common, nevertheless a just observation, that we never know the value of our friends until we have lost them—it is at the moment when the first burst of grief is giving place to melancholy retrospection, that "busy, meddling memory" recalls to us in the fullest force their genuine worth—it is when the mind is softened, that we view their actions through a medium which palliates their failings, but adds a lustre to their virtues—it is then that we recall to mind their kind attentions, their various good offices, and the many pleasant hours we have passed together;—imagination embodies them to our view—we see them as they were in life smiling complacently upon us—we read the secret workings of their souls which team with fond affection towards us—we reverence them as we would beings of a superior order, nor does the fond delusion cease till sad reality breaks in and bursts the air-drawn bubble.

We may view with comparative apathy distant relatives borne to the tomb—cousins, uncles and aunts may die without causing any long duration of sorrow; nay, even in the event of the death of a brother or a sister, though it may cause in us at first strong emotions of grief, yet where their place in our esteem can be supplied by the survivors, our affliction may easily be surmounted. But surely the grim tyrant becomes most truly the King of Terrors when his unwelcome visit deprives a family of their father or a husband of his wife: here he cuts asunder the nearest and dearest ties—here he dashes to the ground the sweetest cup of human life. What in the world can be a more gratifying sight to a mind of true sensibility, than that of an amiable matron surrounded by her blooming family, instilling into their young minds the seeds of knowledge and of virtue, and by her own bright example encouraging them hereafter to become the ornaments of society—what more appalling than to see this parent stem cut down by the remorseless hand of death, leaving the saplings destitute of their natural support, and ready to wither with the overburthening heats of prosperity or the keen frosts of adversity? Though the grief that may be felt by children for the loss of the parent may be overpowering, yet who can paint or who describe the agonies of the doting husband, the widowed father. Words cannot express them, nor can an idea be formed of the feelings at such a moment but by those whom sad experience has taught.

"Have you felt a spouse expiring
In your arms, before your view?
Watch'd the lovely soul retiring
From her eyes that broke on you?"

Did not grief then grow romantic,
Raving on remembered bliss?
Did you not, with fervour frantic,
Kiss the lips that felt no kiss?"

Deprived of the object most dear to him in life, to whom his every wish was law—the being who added to every joy, and lightened every woe—with whom his life passed gently on unruffled by the storms of passion, loving and beloved—where can the husband look for comfort? He turns towards his family—but they, alas! are inadequate to the task, and look to him for support.—Say, sceptic, is reason now to grant its aid, sunk as it is by this afflicting shock! Or is your natural philosophy to bear him through? No—learn that he looks beyond the world for comfort, and trusting on his Saviour's promise, views through the dark mist of sorrow which encircles him, the brightening period when he shall be again united to her he loves in the regions of unspeakable bliss, where joy shall ever reign and grief shall be no more.

"Let those deplore their doom,
Whose hope still grovels in this dark sojourn;
But lofty souls who look beyond the tomb,
Can smile at Fate, and wonder how they mourn."

THE MENDICANT.

FOUNDED ON FACT.

"In the name of God have compassion upon me who is fast sinking under the pressure of misfortune!"—This earnest appeal, uttered in a tone of desperation and despair, suddenly arrested my progress.—I turned round to survey the object from whom the sound proceeded. Before me stood a pale and emaciated being—Time had traced her furrow on his brow, and features that evidently once possessed the glow of animation, and manly beauty, were now sickly and woe-begone—a prey to famine and disease.

His was indeed a most heart-rending tale,—one continued recital of human suffering and unabated sorrow—such as are often related, but which too frequently remain unpitied and unregarded. Misfortune, and the numberless evils which attend in her train, are become too familiar to the public ear to claim much sympathy or commiseration, and the numerous impostors which pervade our streets have hardened the heart to the claims of true charity. But there was something in the appearance, the manner of this unfortunate, which denoted his having seen better days,—been witness to more prosperous hours!—Of a manly deportment, and seemingly endowed with an excess of sensibility, it appeared as though "his poverty and not his will" had urged him to this last necessity. On the mention of all that was near and dear to him in life—his discousolate wife and wretched family, his feelings overpowered him and he burst into a flood of tears—the heavy throbs succeeded quickly from his bosom—and it was long ere he could regain his former composure.—I could not but participate in his emotion—neither could I avoid feeling in some degree as he felt. Could I be a dupe or was he an impostor? Impossible! His voice had a slight touch of the Northern accent. I had heard of the general integrity of these people—and such I had every reason to believe belonged to him.

By the time he had finished his story he was already master of the little I could afford—I regretted it was not more!—Never shall I forget that look of gratitude!—never will that silent thankfulness with which he regarded me be obliterated from my memory!

There is a chord in the human breast which, if strung by the hand of sensibility, produces the most delightful symphonies—and he who has journeyed through the sterile waste of affliction, will be the first to sympathize with its melodious thrill;—whilst the devotee to pleasure, or child of passion, unheeding listen to its strains,—the son of misfortune takes a melancholy delight in their cadence, as yielding ideas which assimilate with his own wayward fate!

DUELLING.

"A moral, sensible, and well bred man
Will not affront me, and no other can."

COWPER.

A few weeks since I saw a humorous proposition in the Iris, that the Legislature should enact a law that all duellists should stand back to back, then stooping down discharge their pistols between their legs, in hopes that by the ridiculous figure each would present to the other, the risible faculties might be excited, and thus an end would be put to the affair.

With the writer of the above I perfectly agree as to ridicule being the most likely weapon wherewith to assail and reform the honorable world; legislative enactments being in a cause of this nature worse than nugatory, it being perfectly accordant with the principles of the professed duellist that the more laws he violates, either divine or human, the more he displays his independent spirit. What can we imagine more truly absurd than two hot headed simpletons standing to be mutually shot at? and how generally do we find the cause of dispute and contention to be insignificant in the extreme, and sometimes even imaginary. An unguarded word, aye, even a look will call forth the ready ire of these knights of the pistol, and place a man, who perhaps did not intend to offend, in the disagreeable predicament of either exposing his person to the almost unerring aim of these madmen, or of forcing himself to apologize to a compound of pride, ignorance, and vulgarity. I am fully aware that Dr. Johnson has advocated the practice of duelling, on the ground that all men are by this means placed on an equality, that the man of diminutive stature and weak frame of body finds himself at least equal to the strong and athletic. If we were to live in constant expectation of an affair of this nature, the argument might stand good; we should then of course by frequent practice endeavour to obtain an expertness in the use of the pistol, but this, happily, not being the case, the inequality continues as great as ever. I am acquainted with a naval officer who can extinguish a lighted candle, or kill a sparrow at the distance usual amongst duellists, whilst I myself could not make sure of hitting a full grown oak at the same distance. Let us in conclusion examine what the passions are that urge a man to send a fellow mortal to his last account (Shakespeare is too hacknied) boiling over with the worst feelings that human nature is capable of, and to expose himself in a similar manner to the like sudden exit from life. Pride, thou fiend incarnate, thou fell enemy to man, I here again detect thee stalking in all thy native majesty, surrounded by thy constant attendants, envy, jealousy, and revenge; "from pride alone cometh contention."

THE STORY OF NINETTE.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

IN the time of the Regents there lived, or rather flourished, at Yvetot, a sweet little girl named Ninette. If the portrait which I have now before me be faithful, nothing so gracious, so ravishing, had yet appeared in the kingdom, which does not measure less than a league and a half in circumference, and the name of which must ever recall to recollection that bon petit Roi immortalized by our Horace. In the earliest spring of her life, Ninette had an elegant and flexible figure, a beautiful face, a bewitching smile, and eyes so full of tender expression, that one look alone, even when a child, revealed her destiny. She was an orphan; the rich Prior of a neighbouring abbey adopted her from infancy, and when she had attained her fourteenth year, called her his niece. The Prior was seized by a dangerous malady, and for reasons which I shall not investigate, sent away his niece before the arrival of a crowd of cousins, attracted by the hope of sharing his wealth. Ninette arrived at Paris, with the little baggage and the little purse which she had received from her uncle, who died a few days after her departure.

The manuscript from which I extract my information, says nothing of Ninette during the first four months of her residence at Paris. It is however probable that, in some obscure retreat, she concealed her sorrow and indulged her affectionate regret; for when she presented herself to the persons to whom she had been recommended by the Prior, and who refused to receive her, the roses had faded from her cheeks, and the brilliancy of her beauty had quite disappeared.

Ninette had exhausted her feeble resources, and began to feel the pressure of want and despair, when one fine evening a lady, who had followed her some time under the arcades of the Place Royale, addressed her in the most affable manner, and so insinuated herself into the confidence of the poor child, that she obtained from her all her history. The lady pressed her to go home with her, and Ninette cheerfully complied with the ardent request of her generous protector. They mounted an elegant carriage, which was in waiting on the Boulevard, and alighted at a very fine hotel in Rue Culture Sainte Catherine.

Ninette passed some weeks in a pavilion from which she witnessed the promenades and amusements of other young ladies, with whom she could not associate or converse; and though she occasionally felt some anxiety for the result of the extraordinary attentions she received, she had only to cast her eyes on the mirror, and observe the returning tints and the improving beauty of her countenance, to be satisfied and cheerful. Agreeable as was her situation, her solitude at length began to be irksome; and one day on leaving the bath, she ventured to give a hint on the subject to her protector, who herself assisted her, and performed for her the most minute services. "My child," said her friend, "your health and beauty are restored, and I will now inform you of the honour that awaits you. My name is La Fillon, and is celebrated in Paris. I am the friend of the Prince, and my house is a sort of merry chapel to his parish." Ninette had commenced a string of questions, which occasioned the utmost mirth to the lady, when Monseigneur was announced. "Your Excellence has arrived most fortunately," said the dame: "Ninette, just from her village, is ignorant of every thing; but I can assure you she is worthy of your high protection." Ninette justified the recommendation; and as a shrewd woman has more wit than a prime minister, she succeeded in inspiring a passion as sincere as a man of the Prince's character could experience, and he placed her virtue under the safeguard of La Fillon, who was personally responsible.

Cardinal Dubois had followed the advice of Horace, and his establishment united l'utile, et l'agréable. It was at once an agency of pleasure and of police. He pretended that the femmes galantes, by their habit of deceit, had a great advantage over the most expert politicians; and that in the company of certain nightly witnesses, the most profound diplomats committed important indiscretions. This idea induced the Cardinal to give a degree of vogue to the boudoir of La Fillon, and to attract there, especially, the diplomatic corps. The female agents had orders to re-double their zeal and activity on the occasion of a plot which was on foot against legitimacy, since known as the conspiracy of the Marquis de Cellamere. In spite, however, of every precaution, the Abbé Porto Carrero, nephew of the Portuguese Ambassador, succeeded in deceiving the vigilance of the Regent and of his ministers. Every thing was prepared for the triumph of the cause of the Duc de Maine; and Don Velasquez, secretary of the embassy, was to set off in the night for Madrid, with the Abbé Porto Carrero, and the definitive arrangements of the conspirators who were to put the reins, now held by the Regent, into the hands of a bastard of Louis XIV. So much it has been necessary to say of politics, to give the key to what remains of the adventures of Ninette. Cardinal Dubois, in order to amuse Ninette in the separate and select part of the Harem to which she was confined, ordered her to have masters in all the fashionable accomplishments, and to enjoy every gratification consistent with his political plans in the administration of his establishment. It so happened that the same drawing-master had the honour of instructing the lovely Ninette and the intriguing Don Velasquez; and the terms in which the instructor spoke of the young lady so excited the curiosity of the Secretary, that he was determined to see the treasure so carefully concealed in the house where he was an assiduous visitor. The praises of Don Velasquez, in which the old master often indulged Ninette, produced on her a similar effect; and, as curiosity easily triumphs over feebleness, the desire of seeing each other was soon equally felt by both the young scholars.

The desire of the young admirers was not long opposed. La Fillon demanded only, as the price of her compliance with the wishes of the demoiselle, that she should be informed of all the movements of the young diplomat. Ninette, who knew not the importance of the stipulation, promised and kept her word. The intimacy continued regular and ardent during two months. Don Velasquez, increasingly charmed by his fair captive, seldom missed his opportunity; he arrived about midnight, and departed before daylight by a door in the garden, of which he possessed the key.

"One evening he arrived as early as nine o'clock, and without being less tender, he had a melancholy and distracted air. Ninette was alarmed; her inquiries were answered by caresses and by mysterious words, which she remembered without being able to comprehend. The night advanced; he asked for paper to write a note, and when it was finished he desired Ninette to address it to S. A. R. Mad. la Duchesse du Maine a Sceaux. Instantly he rose, concealed the note in the folds of his cravat, embraced tenderly his friend, and rushed from her arms. She flew after him through the garden, but could not reach him before he had mounted a chaise de poste, in which she saw another person. 'Route d'Orleans,' the orders given to the postillion, were the only and the last sounds which she ever heard from his lips.

In tumult and despair Ninette awoke her protector, and told her all that had passed. La Fillon rose in haste, flew to the hotel of the Cardinal Dubois, and without informing him how she had obtained her intelligence, apprized him of the events which her harem had so recently witnessed. The circumstances confirmed suspicions which the sacred Minister had already entertained. Couriers were despatched on the road to Spain. Don Velasquez and the Abbé Porto Carrero were arrested at Poitiers; their persons and papers were searched, the conspiracy was discovered, and the son of Made. Montespan lost the regency, because the Cardinal had the wit to entrust the police of the kingdom to his filles de joie, and because a young lover could not quit Paris without a last embrace of his mistress. On what slender threads are the destinies of empires suspended!

The greater number of women know no other perfidy but that which love suggests. The Cardinal determined to recompense Ninette for the service she had rendered the Government, but she refused the reward of a treason which her heart disavowed; and when she learnt that she had been the innocent cause of the ruin of Don Velasquez, whom she passionately loved, she resolved to abandon her present course, and return to privacy and to virtue. From the very bosom of corruption she rose, and retired to find, in the sentiment of her shame, the energy to escape from infamy. The very day on which she had been presented by the Cardinal Dubois to the Regent, she left the harem of La Fillon by the garden gate, of which Don Velasquez had left the key, and took refuge in the Penitentiary which Mad. de Beauharnais Miramont had founded at the close of the seventeenth century, under the name of Sainte Pelagie.

The venerable Ecclesiastic who superintended that pious establishment, himself the model of apostolic virtue, received with kindness the young penitent, raised her above despair, and talked to her of her beauty and her charms, in order to increase in her own estimation the value of the sacrifice she voluntarily made. Accustomed to read the human heart, he soon perceived that the beautiful Ninette, in indulging the emotions of a religious affection, only sought to modify the natural feelings by which she was agitated. She wished to take the veil; he dissuaded her from a purpose conceived by a troubled, and not a calm and enlightened soul. His tender exhortations triumphed over her passions, and she left the asylum to return to Yvetot, where her beauty and her grace vanquished all suspicion, and closed the mouth even of envy itself.

A young descendant of the Lord of the country loved Ninette, and in spite of a confidential disclosure of the scenes of her past life, he wished to make her his wife. They were married, and la fille de bonne volonté became the most faithful of wives and the most tender of mothers. The retreat, opened aux filles de bone volonté by Mad. de Beauharnais Miramont, in which another Mad. de Beauharnais was imprisoned in the reign of terror, is now a prison for debtors, for vagabonds, for men of letters; and it is within its walls that this history of Ninette has been composed.

TO MISS S — M — .

Fair Venus, who oft amongst mortals goes rambling,
Was lost 't'other day and she somewhere went rambling.
It put all the Gods to their trumps to find out
Her dress, her disguise, her engagements or route;
Apollo and Cupid, who seldom unite,
(Love and Reason being different as darkness and light)
Agreed to go out in search of the dame,
And at dusk to the green of a temple they came;
"I have found her," says Cupid, "Apollo, look there!"
"Tis my mother. I know her deportment and air;"
"Your mother!" says Reason, "you blundering calf,
Your mother was never so handsome by half;
Look again, you young archer, repeating you'll own,
Such beauty can be S — M — alone."

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

On the Prejudices and superstitious Ideas of the Peasants of that part of Livonia called Lettland (Lettonia.)
(In a Letter from Count Bray, Minister from the King of Bavaria at St. Petersburg.)

At the return of spring, the Lettonian peasant takes care not to expose himself to hear the cuckoo the first time, either when he is fasting or has no money in his pocket. If this should happen to him, he would believe himself in danger of famine and want for the rest of the year. This is what he calls being bewitched by the cuckoo; he therefore is very guarded to have money about him, and to eat something very early in the morning before he leaves his house. He has the same fears, and takes the same precautions, on the first arrival of the lapwing.

When a hare or a fox crosses his path, he considers it as a bad omen; but if it is a wolf, the omen is favourable.

When the Lettonian peasant has taken his fowling piece, and on going out of his house the first person he meets is a woman or a girl, it is a bad sign, and he will have no sport; he therefore returns, and does not proceed till, on going out again, the first he meets is a man or a boy. If he goes out fishing alone, he does not communicate his intention to any body, or that would bring him ill luck. It is only when he wants an assistant that another person, besides the latter, may be informed of it without doing any harm. If he is angling, and having laid his line on the ground somebody treads upon it, he is convinced that he shall never catch any thing with that line.

The peasant does not allow any person to admire or praise any thing he possesses, especially his flocks, his poultry, his corn, &c.; he is convinced that every thing so praised will perish.

If his cattle are affected by any disease, he does not fail to attribute it to the witchcraft and malevolence of some neighbour: he then takes care to perform his stables with assafœtida.

Their hives are usually placed on the largest trees in the forest, or they make holes in those trees where the bees have settled of themselves. They always take a companion to gather the honey, and they divide the honey and wax with the most scrupulous equality, being convinced that the slightest fraud would cause the bees to emigrate or to die.

They ascribe a particular virtue to all plants gathered on Midsummer Eve, for which reason they carefully preserve them, to give to their cattle in case of sickness. Before Midsummer they pluck up all the grass which they give to their cattle in the stable: they are persuaded that if it were cut with a scythe it would make the cows lose their milk. After Midsummer Eve they use the scythe without fear or scruple. On this same Eve, which is more important to them than the holiday itself, no family neglects to bring from the garden and the fields a stock of pot-herbs for the winter.

When they happen to find in a field ripe ears of corn crossed in a particular manner, or united in bunches, they ascribe it to the malevolence of some envious person, who has endeavoured to draw some sorcery upon their crop. The reaper takes care not to touch such bewitched ears, and passes without cutting them.

A great number of the peasants, unfortunately, still entertain the superstitious notion that fire kindled by lightning is not to be extinguished. When such an accident happens they are discouraged, and do hardly any thing to check the progress of the flames.

A funeral must never pass through a tilled field, not even in winter, though it might considerably shorten the way. The peasant is fully persuaded that a field through which a funeral has passed becomes barren.

Except on extraordinary occasions, no funerals are allowed on Mondays and Fridays.

A peasant who is in search of a wife, never goes, except on a Thursday or Sunday, into the house where he expects to make his choice. The bride and bridegroom are not to give their bare hand to any body, on the day of their marriage, except to each other at the altar; otherwise they are threatened with poverty during the whole of their union. It is also a very bad sign if, when the bride returns from church, she finds any body on the threshold of her door.

When a young girl finds a leaf of trefoil divided into four instead of three parts, it is a sign that she will be married within the year; at all events she carefully preserves this leaf till her wedding-day.

If on the 1st of February the sun shines only so long as is necessary to saddle a horse, they expect fine weather for hay-making.

On Christmas Eve the countrymen are accustomed to drive about a great deal in sledges: they think that this will cause their hemp to be more abundant, and higher: they do not fail to visit the alehouse, and to drink heartily, the same evening, being convinced that this is a way to make them look well till the following Christmas.

In summers when flies are abundant, they expect an ample crop of back wheat; and if the prunus padus is thickly covered with blossoms, they expect a very rainy summer.

The Lettonians never destroy crickets by fire, being persuaded that those which escape will destroy their linen and clothes.

When a peasant loses his way in a wood after sunset, he avoids calling any person to show him the way, being convinced that in that case the evil spirit of the forest would cause him to plunge still deeper into its recesses.

When the peasants intend to build a house, they carefully observe what species of ant first appears on the spot, or seems to be common in the neighbourhood: if it is the common large ant (formica rufa, Linn.) or the black ant (formica rubra, Linn.) they choose another place.

NATIONAL MANNERS.

John Bull is accused of a strong national prejudice, yet, let him see other countries, and you will find no one so impartial, so little addicted to this imperfection. A Briton travels (in general) more than his neighbours; if nobility or wealth be his lot, he goes abroad as a matter of polished necessity; if a mercantile character, his interest leads him thither, money is no impediment. Economy, and a narrow policy keep our neighbours more at home; and when they travel they are apt to measure their road and researches by the purse, and (being circumscribed in all) fail not to be equally limited in liberality. I have known a thousand persons of different nations abroad, some in their own, some in contiguous countries, but how few have I found divested of blind partiality, or generally informed as to the manners, customs, virtues, and rooted defects of other states; even those who had passed thrice seven years on English ground, and had tasted both its freedom and hospitality, turned jealousy to ungrateful home, (I speak of emigrants) and spoke lightly of the benefits of constitutional greatness, and of firm yet tolerant power.

Count — the second time expatriated, on account of the unfashionableness of immutable fidelity to one unaltered family and cause, met me at Naples, after seven years separation. He was evidently disgusted with revolutionized France, and found that he returned to a country, but not to a home, yet was he so much a Frenchman at heart, that neither grey hairs, vicissitudes, disappointments, nor the third of a century having rolled over his head, could divest him of superannuated nationality, and (to my utter astonishment) he began (in an evening walk) to blame certain English customs, which led me to place those of the Continent in comparison therewith. He insisted on that our single women enjoy too much freedom; that they mingle too much, and at too early a period, with the world; that they were allowed to walk arm in arm with a cousin, or with a friend of the family of the other sex; or to parade the streets and parks alone, followed only by an overgrown laquais and a long cane, which was a mere matter of form; for (added he) this automaton may be stopped for whole hours at a circulating library, a music seller's, or a lace merchant's, or a dress maker's, or even dismissed at a relation's door, and ordered to return in an hour. "Hon y voit qui mal y pense," replied I. "But it is so," triumphantly resumed he: "and then again a single woman may ride on horseback in an independent masculine style, through town and country, with a groom a quarter of a mile behind her; and she may pick up as many beaux as she pleases, without the least scandal. Now what facilities these customs afford for seducing the young mind, what favourable opportunities for forming dangerous connexions, for a bad match, an unfortunate attachment, nay, even for intrigue itself! Whereas abroad the unmarried lady is all circumspection, she never goes shopping unattended by some relation or governess, she has no access to these convenient houses for rendezvous, and is seldom from under a parent's eye; 'no taking the carriage all alone to make calls, or for a breath of air.' Even at church she must not go alone; and if she is not at a convent or at some seminary for education, her pleasures are moderate, rare, and never so public as to make her familiar to the vulgar eye. It is not until she enters the wedded state that she is perfectly her own mistress, then (concluded the count) I allow that she makes up for lost time; her flirtings then begin, and I do not approve of all the habits in married life, in France and in warmer climates: your's are more domesticated in general; but, in the highest classes, you are not much behind your neighbours."

Such was the amount of his remarks, which I counterbalanced by a few instances of what had passed under my own eyes; my readers will decide between us.

The greatest reserve is imposed upon young unmarried ladies abroad; they come timidly into society. Mamma, (a word pronounced ostentatiously by high and low with an infantine air of simplicity) tires the listener's ear with "my daughter is so young;—at her age late hours are fatal;—she never tasted wine—she is a stranger in the world" (le monde), by which in public life is meant. Yet governesses and femmes de compagnie in France, duennas in Spain, and even beguines in Flanders, prevent not attachments being formed. The old and incorruptible have neither ears nor eyes, and the young, servile, and indifferent, may be gained, and as easily put off their guard as the long footman and long cane, or the groom at a quarter of a mile's distance from Lady Mary. I knew a certain princess who had all her first interviews with the noble but ruined prince, whose widow she is, at their parish church. At Florence, I could not help admiring a lovely creature about sixteen years of age, pale, dejected, and withering (as I thought) from a decline; I inquired the cause. "Mal d'amore," replied her mother, with a shrug of her shoulders. "Love-sick?" thought I, and I looked uncertain as it were. "Si," added she, in order to convince me, la natura e sempre la natura, (nature is always nature.) This was animal in the superlative degree, and such a thing could not be named in England.

So much for the great delicacy of unmarried life, in which state caution seems to be all, sentiment a nominal part only: the wedded fair on the continent are charming, but custom effects strange things amongst them. I should have offered my arm, or rode on horseback, tête à tête, a thousand times with any of my unmarried countrywomen, without a doubtful or stray thought, at Naples, Rome, Florence, Milan, Pisa, &c. I should have obeyed the orders of any unmarried dame, but the idea of a cavaliers servente cannot be explained in English; yet take things as they are, weigh them in the scale of propriety, value, and comparison, and it is difficult to say where the preponderance may fall. A most attractive and amiable Marchesa, allowed me to conduct her in an open carriage from Naples to Gaeta, the day became oppressively hot, on her arrival, she went to bed, and summoned me to read English poetry to her. And here, candid reader, I pledge my veracity, that neither the Marchesa nor her reader, cherished any idea beyond friendship, and the complaisance which well bred men owe to commanding beauty accustomed to charm and to rule; nevertheless, there is but one opinion in the mind of

THE HERMIT ABROAD.

A COXCOMB PUNISHED.

I had the misfortune to dine at Beauvillier's, what is called en comité, one day, and, was amazed beyond measure at the conceit, stunder, and garrulity of a beardless youth, spoiled, like many others, by travelling. The thing was self-sufficient as if he had been a man of the highest importance; loquacious about his travels, as if no one had visited the Continent but himself; and his breath was a blight and mildew on every female name, his foul lips uttered. He must have been as wicked as weak, not to have weighed the probability of detection in a company in which there were three men of distinction and experience, one a laurelled and travelled veteran, and other two gentlemen of age and talent, long acquainted with the Continent, and one of whom had been attached to different embassies: the rest of the party, it is true, were gossling university men and military recruits exquisites; so that our loquacious puppy expected to have had the majority in his favour.

After the backkied coxcombical tricks of sporting rings, seals, snuff-boxes, antiques, cameons, and immodest paintings, to prove the extent of his Continental tour, he rang the changes where he had been, by adding some adventure, in order to bring in the thing with more éclat, and to shew his consequence, his success, and the high company which he kept. At Florence, he had the good fortune to gain the affections of a principessa, who offered him her fortune, which he rejected; but accepted of her person, until attracted by a French duchess, at Venice. At Naples, he lost two houses worth five hundred guineas each; and, at Rome, had been stabbed by a jealous husband, whose wife eloped with him. In the march of Ancona, he was over-turned in a Russian princess's barouche; in the Tyrol he was pursued by another jealous rival, a man of the highest birth; was obliged to exchange shots with him, and to "wing the cursed fellow!"—Here he swallowed a bumper of hock. Then at Florence, he was en famille with Burghersh; hand and glove with the Duchess of Albany; had a cover at all the foreign ministers; Cockburn, at Stuttgart, was his chief crony; he knew Cambridge quite intimately at Hanover; and Prussia (meaning the king of that country) at Aix-la-Chapelle.

The young people stared, the elderly smiled contempt. He now proceeded to show a long lock of auburn hair, which he said belonged to an English lady of high birth, naming her at full length: and offered to read a love letter from another titled lady then residing at Paris. After a couple of glasses of Champagne, he produced a second love letter, from a general officer's unmarried daughter, and circulated it round the table, (my next neighbour observing to me in a whisper) that he knew the hand writing to be the fellow's own. As the wine circulated, he began to lose recollection, and confounded name, place, and time, committing himself more and more as he went on, and giving himself the lie at each fresh adventure. He concluded, by informing us of an intrigue he had commenced the day before; and giving us the name of a lady with whom he had an appointment at ten o'clock, "but whom he meant to cut, as he had a serious notion of seducing a poor navy officer's daughter under promise of marriage, and then ('the old story,' said he) putting her off for fear of incurring my rich uncle's displeasure."

Every man of sense was now indignant, but the general could bear it no longer. "Young man," said he, "I have a doubt which preponderates in your character, scoundrel or the liar; but they are both closely blended."—"Do you know, sir—" cried the boaster, in a rage,—but I held him in his chair, that he might hear all, and advised him to make his reply when my honourable friend had done speaking. "The first of your culpable fooleries this day," continued the general, "was to show us a naked figure on a snuff-ox, which you asserted to be that of a princess in Italy, (your oast-off mistress!) Now, sir, I was asked to purchase that very box yesterday, in Rue de Richieu, but I thought it too dear and too indecent. The French duchess, whose favours you boasted of at Venice, happened to be at the same time your name at Lausanne; for I was there myself. The lock of auburn hair you bought of Aspasia, an unfortunate paphian, for a Napoleon, and I saw you receive the bargain in the arcade. The English lady of high birth who smiled upon you, as you pretend, might have smiled 'as in scorn' on you, when you, yesterday, impudently tried to get acquainted with her at the Opera. The great people whom you mention as your intimates abroad, are only known to you by name. The first letter which you offered to produce, is your tailor's unpaid bill, and here it is, as you let it fall; and the second is known by one in company, to be your own hand writing. Your adventure of yesterday, I take to be another falsehood; and your serious intentions of seducing my friend's daughter, I shall prevent, by informing him of it, and by procuring for you some corporeal chastisement, such as your base-ness and unmanliness deserves. And now, sir, quit the company, either by the door or the window, for not one second more shall you infect the room with your pestiferous slander."

The youth withdrew, covered with the contempt and hatred of all around, muttering, that the general should hear from him the next day, and that one of them should fall; but, by six in the morning, the hero had left Paris, and has not since been heard of by

THE HERMIT ABROAD.

THE BEGGAR.

IN crossing La Rue de la Paix, I was stopped at the corner of the Boulevard by a gentleman, who, with all imaginable politeness, held out his hat to me, and requested alms, inquiring at the same time after my health. The novelty of this proceeding surprised me. I threw a glance at the civil mendicant, from whom my suspicion forced a smile. He was dressed in a green great coat, nankeen pantaloons, and a blue and white striped waistcoat. A large cravat sustained his double chin, which had just been shaved; his shoes were fastened by silver clasps; his hair was powdered; and he held in his hand a stick that reminded me of the gold-headed canes carried by footmen. At first I fancied that I was the dupe of a mischievous jest; and I was beginning to be angry, when my petitioner again extended his hat, and begged that I would not "terminate the happiness of his day."

The tone of his voice, the affectation of his expressions, the singularity and neatness of his dress, all inspired me with a feeling of curiosity which I could with difficulty resist. Slipping my hand slowly into my pocket, in the hope of exciting his expectation, I kept clinking a few pieces of money, while I asked him what were the causes that could have reduced him to practice a profession which so ill accorded with his language and his habit? Charmed with the sound of a few crowns, which in his own mind he already appropriated to himself, our beggar meditated for an instant, and then declared that he merely followed his judgment and taste. "What?" answered I, "at your age (he appeared to be at most 50 years old), when there are so many ways which would lead you to a peaceful and happy life?" "I have travelled them all," he replied, "and I never tasted a tranquillity, a happiness, equal to that which I have enjoyed during the few last months. I have proved all conditions—none suited me. Driven from one post by intrigue, I entered on another, through patronage, which I left from caprice. I lost my fortune in trade, my health in the army. When I was rich, exciting envy; when poor, calling forth pity; obliged to bend to the wishes of great men; dreading the treachery of little ones; tormented by the desire of adding to what I possessed, or by the fear of losing what I had acquired; compelled to shew respect to those whom I hated; employing disreputable stratagems to obtain preferment, and ambiguous means to retain it; continually occupied with anxiety for the future;—I passed the greater part of my life in a perpetual agitation; in a mixture of hope and suspense; of short snatches of happiness, and vexations the end of which I could scarcely ever discover. One luck day, braving prejudice, which has only the strength that one gives it oneself, scorning shame, which ought not to attach to the beggar on foot more than the beggar in a coach, I did that which most men do—I turned to account the self-love and pride of my fellow creatures; I levied a contribution on all the human passions. Free from the duties which society imposes, from the obligations it commands; without attachment, without family, alone in the midst of all; I created for myself a resource which has never deprived me of my independence. Exempt from the pains, from the bustle which attend fortune and rank, I live without care, without solicitude for the morrow." "But does it not happen that charity—" "I never reckon on charity. My calculations are surer. There is more to be gained by the vices of men than by their virtues. You shall judge for yourself, from the history of my days.

"I seldom rise early. However, when that does occur, I go and try my fortune on the Boulevards. You must be well aware that I never address those honest artisans whose compassion I might easily awaken, but whose beneficence my habit would deter. Sometimes, however, betrayed by custom, I have accidentally applied to a workman singing as he goes along to his shop. In almost all such cases, I have instantly perceived my mistake; and more than once I have bestowed alms on him from whom I had requested them.

"About nine o'clock I watch for those young girls who, alone, and in a morning dress, walk with a quickness which induces me to suspect that they are in pursuit of pleasure. Their whole minds engrossed by a single idea, they look neither to the right nor to the left. I glide softly after them. My voice, in the mildest tone, strikes their ear with a timid prayer, to which I take care to add with a little more emphasis these words, which never fail of effect—"it will insure your happiness."—Immediately, and without stopping, they open their little purse of green silk, and give me a small piece of money, thanking me at the same time, by an almost imperceptible smile, for an expression which they have the goodness to regard as a prophecy.

"I return slowly, laughing inwardly at the idle clerk and the self-important master who are going to their offices. I see the author who racks his brains for a rhyme or a couplet, and the actor who repeats his parts in an under tone and without gesture, that he may not incommodate passengers. Seldom do I interrupt these honest people. Nevertheless, last week I ventured to implore the aid of a performer at a minor theatre, to whom I bethought myself to lend for a moment the name of our most celebrated tragedian. His countenance sparkled, he made me repeat my request, and paid me for my mistake like a man who was more pleased than surprised at it. I meet, on my way, the advocate who is going coldly to plead the cause of a client whose pretensions he has himself condemned; the bailiff who hurries to the lodgings of a young man of fashion against whom he has for six months had a warrant of arrest, the execution of which, in virtue of certain gratuities, he has repeatedly postponed. I have never dared to solicit the pity of this last. To be successful, it would be necessary to attack his weak side, and I am always afraid of mistaking it.

"At ten o'clock see me near the Tortoni, or the Café Anglais. I continue my moral observations; and I find that the cries of misery must not be poured into the ears of a man who has just risen from table. There I am never served until after the waiter, whose eyes dispute with me the remainder of the small change which he has just given, and which is thrown to me with a disdain that relieves me from the necessity of acknowledgment.

"I then generally visit the garden of the Thuilleries. It affords me a rich harvest on a fine day. If you did but know the value to me of the words, 'Monsieur le Chevalier'—'Monsieur le Baron'—'Monsieur le Comte'—'Monsieur General'—applied to Officers with only a single epaulette! Do I meet, coming from church, one of those good women who have not memory enough to recollect the sermon they have just been hearing, I accost her; and after a refusal, often expressed with acrimony, I reiterate my request, pronouncing aloud the name of heaven. That name produces a magical effect; and the alms are doubled on account of the importance she attaches to the good opinion of those who surround her. There are many persons who exhibit charity only when spectators are at hand to applaud it.

"Before the close of the morning, I stop at the doors of several of the gaming houses. I salute with respect, mingled with sympathy, the unfortunate man who descends with measured steps, and in whose face the disastrous state of his finances are easily read. I address almost laughingly the gambler whom chance favours with good fortune which he did not expect. His gifts are generally beyond my hopes; but, alas! they are too often loans rather than gifts. Frequently have I been asked at night for the half crown which has been bestowed on me in the morning; and in the hope of a change of luck, I have not hesitated to return it.

"I dine in that part of the town in which I find myself at the dinner hour; but I take care to dine alone, lest it should happen to me to sit at table with one of my customers, whom such a little accident might cause me to lose.

"In the evening I wander about the Palais Royal, or the Champs-Élysées. I have in reserve a store of misfortunes, of which I avail myself according to the rank or probable sentiments of the person to whom I speak. I ruin myself as I choose; sometimes by the ingratitude of my family, sometimes by the treachery of my friend. I carefully examine my listeners, that I may make no mistake in my history, should they have the patience to hear me a second time. It is seldom that my eloquence is not crowned with happy results; for while I apply for compassion, I never forget self-love."—"Nevertheless, you may fail sometimes; and you will allow me to believe that at the moment when you were entrusting to me the secret of your mode of life—" "I adopted the only proper course with you. My confession is a new proof of my skill. I have frequently heard your name; I know that one of your chief employments is to collect remarks on the manners of the capital; and I thought you would not be displeased at having the materials furnished you for one of your next dissertations."

I had nothing to reply; so I drew my hand from my pocket, and took my leave of my interlocutor, who followed, overwhelming me with his thanks.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ANIMAL ELECTRICITY.

Mr. Glover has published the following method of receiving the electrical shock from a cat.—Place the left hand under the throat, with the middle finger, and the thumb slightly pressing the bones of the animal's shoulder, then gently passing the right hand along the back, sensible electrical shocks will be felt in the left hand.—Phil. Mag.

ULTRAMARINE.

The editor of the Annals of Philosophy, one of the most skilful chemists of the present day, has lately been engaged in some researches to discover the nature of the colouring matter of ultramarine. He has not, however, been able to attain his object, though he has found some fresh reasons for believing, with M. Thénard, that it is a peculiar substance.

Mr. Phillips has discovered a ready method of detecting the articles with which ultramarine is sometimes fraudulently adulterated. If the suspected specimen contain bleu verdier, (carbonate of copper), it may be ascertained by heating the specimen on a piece of silver or platinum foil in a spirit lamp, when the compound will become first greenish and eventually black. The presence of prussian blue causes the ultramarine to be much darkened by heat; and to become browner, and not brighter, on being boiled in a solution of potash. Lazulite is detected by the purple vapour which rises on the application of heat, and by its retaining its colour while under the action of sulphuric acid. Smalts is also detected by its refusing to yield its colour to any acid. The colour prepared from oxide of cobalt and alumina is discovered in the same manner as smalts.

The above processes are very simple, and, to the dealer in ultramarine, must be very important. The results obtained by Mr. Phillips, though not altogether satisfactory, are certainly curious. They present a stimulus to farther inquiry, which may, perhaps, open some new views in relation to the arts in which ultramarine has been employed.

CAPTAIN PARRY'S EXPEDITION.

Two summers have now passed over, and it is pretty clear that they have not carried him into the Pacific, unless indeed, which is merely in the chances, he may have taken the route of China and the Cape of Good Hope, which, from his ample supply of provisions remaining, is not quite improbable. Had he run for Kamatsatka, or along the coast of America in the Pacific, we should, before this time, have heard of him. We know he calculated upon three summers, and only wished that, if not heard of in the beginning of 1824, a vessel with provisions might be sent into Behring's Strait in the autumn of that year. He was last seen near the Upper Savage Islands, on the 22d of July, 1821, steering with a fair wind and through an open sea, direct for Repulse bay; and as Captain Franklin left Cape Tarnagin on the 25th of August of the same year, the latter was on his return before Captain Parry could have reached that point.* In the event, however, of his having done so in the course of that season, it is not improbable that he would enter that deep gulf of which the Cape forms the eastern and northern extremity; the less so, from its being situated in the same longitude nearly as the Copper-mine River is laid down on Arrowsmith's chart; a point which he would, undoubtedly, deem it expedient to visit; and if so, he would meet with the flag-staff and letter left by Captain Franklin, and, probably, pass the winter in one of the many snug harbours which the Arctic gulf affords. The second season would, with ease, bring him to that point of the coast which is terminated by the Rocky Mountains, a little beyond Mackenzie's River, the only spot where we can conceive any difficulty to occur; here Captain Parry would, probably, pass the second winter; and, if so, the third summer would, without difficulty, carry him through Behring's Strait. And when we consider the commander, who would leave nothing behind him unexamined, (and from the indented nature of the coast, there is much to examine), we are not in the least surprised at his taking three seasons, which, indeed, he always calculated upon to accomplish his task; and which, if not possible, he may, therefore, be expected to do in the course of the present summer. With regard to risk, we apprehend none beyond that to which all navigation in the icy seas is liable, and which the long frequented whale fishery, conducted in vessels not half so strong nor half so well manned, has proved to be little more than common sea risk. Indeed, with ships as strong as wood and iron can make them; stored with provisions and fuel for nearly four years; with a commander excelled by none in the various duties of his profession; endued with intellectual faculties of the highest order, and full of zeal and energy, tempered with due prudence and discretion; with experienced officers and crews of picked seamen; we cannot persuade ourselves that any reasonable ground of alarm for their safety need be entertained.—Quarterly Review.

BELZONI.—Interesting extracts of a letter from this enterprising Traveller have been given in the Cambridge Chronicle: we cordially rejoice to learn that his prospects are so auspicious. The letter is dated Fez, May 5.

"In the short letter I wrote to you from Tangier, dated the 10th of April, I informed you that I had gained permission from his Majesty the Emperor of Morocco, to enter his country as far as Fez, and that I had great hopes of obtaining his permission to penetrate farther south. I have now great pleasure in acquainting you, my dear friend, of my safe arrival at Fez, after having been detained at Tangier till a letter had been forwarded from Mr. Douglas, his Britannic Majesty's Consul at Tangier, to the Minister at Fez, to obtain permission from the Emperor for me to approach his capital. As soon as a favourable answer was received, we started for this place, and in ten days arrived here in safety with my better half, who, having succeeded in persuading me to take her as far as Tangier, has also enforced her influence to proceed to Fez; but this, though much against her will, must be her 'Non plus ultra'."

"Yesterday I had the honour to be presented to his Majesty the Emperor, and was highly gratified with his reception of me. He was acquainted that I had letters of introduction from Mr. Wilmot, to the Consul in Tangier, from whom I received indeed the greatest hospitality, and who did all in his power to promote my wishes. The fortunate circumstance of my having known the Prime Minister of his Majesty, whilst in Cairo, on his return from Mecca to this country, is also much in my favour; and though a great deal has been said against my project by the commercial party, particularly from the Jews of this country, who monopolize all the traffic of the interior, I obtained his Majesty's permission to join the caravan, which will set out for Timbuctoo, within one month."

"If nothing should happen, and if promises are kept, I shall from this place cross the Mountains of Atlas to Taffet, where we shall join other parties from various quarters, and from thence, with the help of God, we shall enter the great Sahara to Timbuctoo. Should I succeed in my attempt, I shall add another 'votive-tablet' to the Temple of Fortane; and if, on the contrary, my project should fail, one more name will be added to the many others which have fallen into the River of Oblivion. Mrs. Belzoni will remain at Fez, till she hears of my departure from Taffet, which place is eighteen or twenty days' journey from hence, and as soon as that fact is ascertained she will return to England."

PHILOSOPHER'S STONE.—A letter from New York, dated June 9, says,—"If the long-sought-for philosopher's stone, by which baser substances could be transmuted into gold, has not yet been found, an invention of still greater importance has at length crowned the efforts of American chymists. It has long been known that the diamond, the most precious of all substances, is composed of carbon in its pure state. But although the powers of chymical analysis have been sufficient by repeated experiments clearly to establish this fact, yet the knowledge of it was of no practical importance to the world, because the powers of synthesis failed, and no mode had been devised of imitating nature by uniting the constituents of this precious gem. In other words, the philosopher was able to convert diamonds into carbon, but he was ignorant of the art of converting carbon into diamonds. If the experiments of Professor Silliman can be relied on, this desideratum has in part been supplied. The last number of his Journal of Science contains an article on the philosophical instrument called the diaphanator invented by Professor Hare, of Philadelphia, by which it appears that charcoal, plumbago, and anthracite, have been fused by the power of that instrument, and transmuted into diamonds."

SHAWL MANUFACTORY AT CASHMEER.

The most remarkable production of Cashmeer is its shawls, which supply the whole world, and which are said to be manufactured at sixteen thousand looms, each of which gives employment to three men.

The following is an extract from the report drawn up by Mr. Strachey, who made many enquiries on this subject, and who had some shawl stuffs made under his own inspection, of wool procured at Umritsir. The manufacturers were pioneers belonging to the embassy, and they worked in a common tent; yet they appeared to find no difficulty in their employment. A shop may be occupied with one shawl, provided it be a remarkably fine one, above a year, while other shops make six or eight in the course of that period. Of the best and most worked kinds, not so much as a quarter of an inch is completed in one day by three people, which is the usual number employed at most of the shops. Shawls containing much work are made in separate pieces at different shops, and it may be observed that it very rarely happens that the pieces when completed, correspond in size.

The shops consist of a frame work, at which the persons employed sit on a bench; their number is from two to four. On plain shawls two people alone are employed, and a long, narrow, but heavy shuttle is used: those of which the pattern is variegated are worked with wooden needles, their being a separate needle for the thread of each colour: for the latter no shuttle is required. The operation of their manufacture is of course slow, proportionate to the quantity of work which their patterns may require.

The Oostaud, or head workman, superintends while his journeymen are employed near him, immediately under his directions. If they have any new pattern in hand, or one with which they are not familiar, he describes to them the figures, colours, and threads which they are to use, while he keeps before him the pattern on which they happen to be employed, drawn upon paper.

During the operation of making, the rough side of the shawl is uppermost on the frame, notwithstanding which the Oostaud never mistakes the regularity of the most figured patterns.

The wages of the Oostaud (the employer furnishing materials) are from six to eight pice per day; of the common workmen, from one to four (a pice in Cashmeer may be about three half-pence.)

A merchant entering largely into the shawl trade frequently engages a number of shops, which he collects in a spot under his eye; or he supplies the head workmen with thread, which has been previously spun by women, and afterwards coloured; and they carry on the manufacture at their own houses, having previously received instructions from the merchant respecting the quality of the goods he may require, their colours, patterns, &c.

After the goods are completed, the merchant carries them to the custom-office, where each shawl is stamped, and he pays a certain duty, the amount of which is settled according to the quality and value of the piece. The officer of the government generally fixes the value beyond what the goods are really worth. The duty is at the rate of one-fifth of the price.

Most shawls are exported unwashed, and fresh from the loom. In India there is no market for unwashed shawls, and at Umritsir they are better washed and packed than in Cashmeer. Of those sent to the westward, many are worn unwashed. The wool of which the shawls are made is imported from Tibet and Tartary, in which countries alone the goat which produces it is said to thrive. That which is brought from Rodauk is reckoned the best. Its price in Cashmeer is from ten to twenty rupees for a turrak (which is supposed to be about twelve pounds): the whitest sort is the dearest.

* Among the number of idle conjectures which appear, from time to time, in the public prints, (and which are productive of no other effect than awakening the anxiety of the friends of those employed on the expedition), one writer is surprised that Captain Franklin met with no traces of Captain Parry, though it was impossible; and a Frenchman has discovered him on the coast of Siberia; and an English journalist announces the two ships to have been seen off Icy Cape by some fishing-boats of the Aleutian islands, which is just the same as if the picaroon fishermen of the coast of Cornwall had discovered them off the North Cape of Norway, the distance in each case being about the same.

It would perhaps be difficult to determine with accuracy the quantity of shawls manufactured annually; supposing, however, that five of all kinds are on an average made at each shop or loom in the course of a year, the number would be eighty thousand, which is probably not far from the truth.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR.—If the following among the many freaks of that sickle Goddess Fortune, is worthy of a place in your miscellany, it is at your service—of the fact you may rely—

'Tis sixty years since (as Waverley has it,) when, in the vicinity of the Royal Exchange, London, there lived three brothers, who, to their shame be it spoken, were all bachelors. George the eldest was either a Stock-broker or Clerk in the Bank of England, I forget which; William was a dancing-master, and Nicholas a clergyman. George I do not personally recollect, he having died before I arrived at years of discernment. William was a complete old beau of George the Second's time, and taught me to dance, and when he died, being his last scholar, for I used to practise in the court room of Girdler's hall, and set to right hand and left among half a dozen chairs in locis saltatorum to the squeaking of his kit, I became heir to his fiddles, kits, and gilt headed cane. Nicholas the clergyman was Rector of the parish in which I was born, married my Father and Mother, and christened all us, their children: from him we had each a legacy.—But George is the subject of my story. He was used regularly to frequent a small tavern in Bartholomew Lane, where, as was the general custom sixty years since, a few neighbours were wont to meet in the evening, under the rose or cauliflower, to smoke their pipes over a tiff of punch and talk of the price of Stocks and news of the parish. Among these was an old gentleman, who, by frugality and industry, for in those days there were few gigs or country houses kept by the worthy and pains-taking citizens, and afterwards by successful speculations in the funds, had become very wealthy, and had long been set down as a plum. Being taken ill, he sent for his notary or scrivener, a race now extinct, to make his will—having neither kith nor kin as he knew of, or, perhaps, that he wished to know, after naming several of his fellow clubbists to very pretty legacies, he observed that having believed thought of those he had any regard for, he should leave the residue of his property among various charities, the notary told him he was rather surprised he had omitted one—his old friend George. Bless me, said he, I had like to have forgot George sure enough. Put him down ten thousand pounds. A. Q.

Manchester, July 14th. 1823.

VARIETIES.

THE KING AND THE RUSTIC.—Lately as his Majesty was passing Egham, in his low Phaeton, dressed in a light drab coat, in company with Lord Conyngham, not one person in twenty recognized him. In going up the middle hill which leads to the cottage, at a walking pace, a remarkably stout man, named Benjamin Hoades, a farmer, who had just come out of the hay-field, was standing against his gate, without his coat and waistcoat, and who attracted his Majesty's attention, and caused him to smile. The farmer seeing his Majesty smile at him, good-naturedly said, not knowing it was the King, "How do you do, old chap?" The King immediately increased his laugh, when the old farmer replied, "You seem, old chap, to make yourself very merry at my expense!" Honest Ben, on enquiring of a neighbour "who that ere gentleman was?" felt much surprised on being told it was the King! "Be that as it may (said Ben) he seems to be a jolly good-natured fellow for all that."

PRESENTS FROM THE NABOB OF OUDE TO THE KING.—The Glasgow frigate has brought to England, as presents from the Nabob of Oude to his Majesty, several articles of considerable value, being estimated at upwards of 200,000*l*. Among them are a sword set in diamonds, a belt, and sword knot; the latter composed of diamonds and other precious jewels, and suspended to it is an emerald of great value, it being considered the largest extant, and nearly the size of an egg. A bird of Paradise alive has also been brought in this ship, believed to be the only attempt of this kind ever made with success. A bull and cow, of a small white breed, which the Hindoos worship, have also arrived as a present to the Princesses.

TYPHON OF THE CHINESE SEA.—It is alleged by Tilesius, who accompanied Krusenstern, that the cause of the typhon of the Chinese sea is to be sought for in the bowels of the earth, and depends on agitations at the bottom of the sea.

LEGHORN BONNETS.—It appears, by a return made to Parliament, that in the year ending 5th April, 1823, there were 136,045 Leghorn straw hats or bonnets imported into Great Britain, and 3312 pounds of straw plaiting.

RECIPE FOR A SORE THROAT.—Take a glass of olive oil and half a glass of spirits of turpentine; mix them together, and rub the throat externally, wearing the flannel round it at the same time. It proves most effectual when applied early. Sweet oil will answer the purpose equally well.

AFRICA.—We are sorry to see it stated in the Ship News of Portsmouth, that Captain Owen's Survey in Delgoa Bay has entirely failed. The natives are represented as being in the grossest state of ignorance, with little, if any idea of a Supreme Power, and incapable of comprehending figures beyond the number ten. The expedition into the interior, under Lieut. Browne, &c. was to proceed up the river Zambesi, for Qualamane to Senno, two hundred miles, and then be guided by circumstances.

STATUE OF SHAKESPEARE.—The celebrated statue of Shakespeare, sculptured by Roubiliac for Garrick, and bequeathed by him to the British Museum, was removed to that national institution on Thursday. It is in fine preservation, and will be an attractive ornament to the Museum.

ROCKETS.—A person in Austria, it is said, recently invented a species of rocket, which ascends to a prodigious height, so as to be seen at a distance of more than forty leagues! If this be a fact, these rockets may be of great use as signals, especially in geographical admeasurements of the earth.

STEAM ENGINES.—It appears that the number of steam engines at the present in action in this country may be reckoned at 10,000; and the one with another each may be estimated to be equal in power to 20 horses; that each horse will do the work of 6 men, and that consequently the acting powers of our steam engines are equal in effect to 200,000 horses, or 1,300,000 men.

EPICURUS.—It appears from accounts handed down to us, that nobody was less of an epicure than Epicurus himself. He had carefully studied the sources of pleasure, and found nothing more conducive thereto than temperance, patience, probity, friendship, and public spirit.—Tucker's Light of Nature.

WIT.—Mr. Moore's wit is nothing more than easy and playful. We doubt if his temperament be favourable to the more forcible species. Our very greatest wits have not been men of a gay or vivacious disposition. Of Butler's private history nothing remains but the record of his miseries, and Swift was never known to smile. Men of Saturnine tempers find a refuge in the ridiculous when their minds are sore and wearied with the conflict of life; and perhaps, if such were to examine the periods of their mental operations, they would find they had started the most ludicrous ideas in bitterness of spirit. At those times the mind is very highly, though painfully excited, and, if it be naturally strong, its impressions of every kind being aggravated, the relief which it has the power of throwing in by means of ludicrous associations will share the force of its other impulses, and acquire more from the contrast with them. The will of Chatterton may be alleged as a strong evidence of this condition of the mind; and indeed, his whole character, his long fits of moroseness, and his burst of levity are equally in point.—Quarterly Review.

THE DRAMA, ETC.

THEATRE ROYAL.—On Saturday Evening last Messrs Blanchard and Knight, and Miss Smithson, appeared in Morton's Comedy entitled, "A Care for the Heart Ache;" and Mr. St. Albin, Madame Searle, and Madmie. Garbois delighted the house by their graceful and elegant dancing in the Pantomime of "Cinderella."—Just before the conclusion of the latter piece, as Miss Wallis and Miss Radcliffe came forward to assist in the last dance some fastidious observers thought proper to manifest a want of taste and feeling, by biases and other marks of disapprobation;—this illiberality we were happy to see promptly and spiritedly resented by the respectable part of the audience.

MINOR THEATRE.—Each new piece produced at this place of amusement rivals in splendour that which preceded it. This has been more particularly the case in the two brought out this week. The opening scene in the interesting Venetian Melo-Drama of—Who owns the Hand? is, without exception, one of the most picturesque we ever witnessed,—and many of the succeeding ones are most beautiful. The principal characters are well sustained, and the piece throughout was received with universal applause. We would recommend several of the subordinate performers in this establishment to pay a little more attention to the business of the stage, as much effect is frequently lost for want of it.

We understand that Mr. St. Albin and Madame Searle will make their debut at this theatre on Monday next.

PHIL-HARMONIC CONCERT.—The third public night this year took place on Friday the 11th inst.—Of the performances in general we have little to notice. Rossini's Overture to Tancredi was given with much effect; and the glees—"Mynheer Van Doek," and "From the fair Lavinian Shore," was loudly and deservedly cheered.—The Scotch Duet—"Ye banks and braes of bonny Doon," was sung by Miss S. Travis and Miss Stansfield, in a manner which did them much credit.—We never heard the fine tenor voice of the latter young lady, who took the second, to greater advantage.

LITERARY NOTICES.

There is forthcoming "Poetical Sketches, with Stanzas for Music, and other Poems," by Alaric A. Watts. This little volume was printed about twelve months ago for private circulation, and the notice it attracted has led to its open publication.

A Romance from the pen of the Rev. C. R. Matua, author of "Bertram," is expected in the ensuing winter.

Naturalists' Repository, or Monthly Miscellany of Exotic Natural History. An Order in the Council of the Linnean Society has been lately passed, by which Mr. Donovan will be allowed to enrich his New Monthly Work, the 'Naturalist's Repository,' with the Icons of those choice and very beautiful species of the Paltaeus and Columba Tribe, which are described in the 13th Vol. of the Linnean Transactions; the greater part of which, if not the whole, are of such rarity, as to be found only in the Museum of the Linnean Society.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Melo-Drama, entitled "Harvest Home," although displaying considerable ability, is, nevertheless, unfit for the purpose for which it was submitted.—It will be returned on application at our office.

L. M. will perceive that his paper on Duelling is inserted.—The other in our next.—We have only to observe that a particular scrutiny of the opinions of others, and a deliberate consideration of the subject itself, will seldom fail to enable an intelligent mind to form correct ideas, and to connect them in a judicious and interesting manner.—Without Observation and Reflection there cannot be good or useful writing. Nescius Juvenis; I. H.; Eliza; A Sonnet to Summer; and A Rhapsodist, are received.—We should be glad to hear from J. A. of Salford.

ELIZA.—A FRAGMENT.

The gentle maid, whose hapless tale
These melancholy pages speak;
Say, gracious lady, shall she fail
To draw a tear adown thy cheek?

WALFORD.

WE are frequently told that every man loves at least once in his life. Can every being that usurps the name of man feel a disinterested passion; or in other words, can a man destitute of almost every virtue, love a virtuous and accomplished woman? Titus loved not Berenice, Horace loved not Lydia. The words love, and desire, have no similarity. Noble minds are alone susceptible of an ardent affection, and to love a virtuous woman requires many amiable qualities. Thus was I musing as I traversed the little grove at the extremity of the fishpond, when my attention was suddenly arrested by hearing Herrick's "Mad Maid's Song," sung in a sweetly plaintive voice.

Good-morrow to the day so fair!
Good-morning, sir, to you!
Good-morrow to mine own torn hair
Bedabbled with the dew!
Good-morning, &c.

I stood fixed to the earth, as it were by enchantment, and before I had recovered from my surprise, the meagre form of a beautiful female stood before me. She was rather taller than the generality of women, and though it was evident that the worm had long been preying upon her vitals, she assumed an air of gayety that ill accorded with the tender feelings of her heart. Her dark blue, and expressive eyes, her regular and finely polished teeth, and her bosom finer than the most beautiful alabaster, made impressions on my heart which the powerful finger of time will never be able to erase. Her countenance was beautifully expressive, but her cheeks were pale; and her intelligent eyes shone sweetly, through the pearly drops of grief, by which they were in part concealed. A plain garment, white as snow, covered her finely polished limbs; and her beautiful auburn hair, which flowed in luxuriant negligence over her shoulders, was hung with flowers. "Young man, (said she, presenting me with a full blown rose) observe that flower: yesterday its beauties were scarcely disclosed, to-day it shines in the meridian of magnificence, to-morrow its beauties, and all its sweetness will be fled for ever. Observe it, and let it teach thee humility." She covered her eyes—a tear of sympathy stole from mine—it was the first I had shed for years. "Remember the admonitions of the forlorn Eliza; Adieu!" So saying, she fled from me, and was out of sight in an instant. Night was fast approaching, and the birds had already ceased their song. The beautiful solemnity of the surrounding scenery, which I had so often contemplated in raptures, only served to render my heart more susceptible of painful emotions. The beautiful form of the unhappy sufferer seemed rooted in my heart. I commenced a tune upon my flute, but music could not erase the figure of Eliza. I walked slowly on indulging in the most melancholy reflections, and was soon joined by a number of hay-makers, who were returning from their daily labour. I made myself familiar with these rustic sons and daughters of contentment, and among other subjects, asked the history of the poor maniac. "Alas, poor girl!" exclaimed an aged countryman, "the whole village delighted in her, she was a benefactress to the aged and poor. Her parents lived in peace and affluence; but they loved her more than riches—they regarded her as the richest gift of Heaven. In a neighbouring village lived Horatio S—, only son of Mr. S—; a gentleman of immense property. The happy parents of the young couple had long been witness to a growing passion, and had given their united consent to the match. The ceremony was to take place immediately on Horatio's return from Philadelphia, whither he was going to receive the blessing of his uncle, who lay lingering in the last stage of a fatal disease. The youth landed safe at Philadelphia, but, alas! he never returned. Numberless inquiries were made after him, but they were fruitless. He never reached his uncle's house, and though four years have flown away, his fate still remains a mystery." The man's voice ceased, apparently from emotion; I told him I had already heard too much of the melancholy story, so giving him a trifle to drink my health, I made the best of my way home, my thoughts still dwelling on the meagre form of ELIZA.

JOHANNES.

THE MARRIED MAN!

I have no taste for Bachelors—I used to have; at one period of life, when advancing up the green mount which led to maturity under the refulgent beams of pleasure, they were the images on which I loved to dwell, they were my constant companions even in imagination.—If care had weighed me down, if misfortune had scathed me, if disappointment had crossed me—they were still my hope and solace, I hastened to their haunts of delightful revelry and a black bottle, a good toast and better pun, or a still merrier song, dispelled every shade of gloom. I looked for the moment of separation from the business of the day with anxious hope, and my whole soul was enveloped in the thoughts of a Bachelor's party. How I have roared with laughter at the satirical humour of my friend Ned Needless, when cast upon those mouldy worm-eaten pieces of animated clay called Married Men;—how my eyes sparkled at the recital of some casual piece of information, slyly stolen from that race of non-descripts;—to me the sight of one rocking the cradle, or teased with the uproar of his son and heir, was a fund of enjoyment not easily lost sight of.—"A change came o'er the shadow of my dream"—I fell in Love;—gentle reader you may have loved;—I need not tell you the thousand varieties of feeling which alternately rise within the breast of him who loves sincerely—where his passion is as sacred to him as his thoughts of heaven, pure as the unsullied snow, faithful as the sun which gives him light. I need not tell you of the hopes, the fears, the joys, the sorrows which haunt him as his shadow. Suffice it to say I was similar to the rest of my friends in the same situation. I was at first repulsed, a viper crossed my path and stung me, love, however, unchanging love soon cured the wound, and returning to the contest, I crushed the wily enemy beneath my feet, and towering above him, was loved in return. Is there in language power to express, or in imagination to paint, the delight, the happiness of courtship. To look upon her, so fondly loved, and to meet in her returning gaze, the answer "I am thine;" to be welcomed to her home, her parents, and friends, where lately every step was taken with the diffidence of an intruder, to meet the smile of a fond mother, the encouraging conversation of a good father, and to pass your time in all that union of soul which you have so long anxiously prayed for—these are moments which none can picture but he who has experienced. At length the long looked for day arrived when I was to become the happiest of men. I arose early, and opening my window surrounded by the twining honeysuckle, gazed upon the prospect which nature had extended in all her loveliness before me. The wandering stream of liquid silver sparkled and danced more gaily than I thought I had ever seen it; the fields looked more lovely, the many birds which hovered round sang more sweetly, the sun was more refulgent, and the azure blue of the vaulted sky, and the fleecy clouds which sailed along chequering its beauty, were brighter and fairer than I had ever looked upon,—all nature appeared to be dressed in her richest garb, and the very air I breathed seemed to give new life and a buoyancy of spirit which I never before had experienced. I descended, and entering the parlour soon found myself amongst friends who would soon be linked in closer bondage, though already tied by the strong hold of affection. She—the destined partner of my fortunes, had not appeared, but soon entered the very picture I could have wished—she was to become my wife, and had her robe been sackcloth this title made her lovely. I felt the force of her presence—my heart was full—I could have wept—I could have pressed to my heart my bitterest foe; I saw the tears start into the eyes of our parents, but the smile of affection was still there. We hastened to church, and in the face of heaven took the vow of eternal fidelity, to love, honor and cherish till death should part us.

I am now a married man. How I look back upon all the vacant follies of a Bachelor's life. How lonely and desolate he appears,—born amidst the thousand blessings of human life without the power of enjoyment; the very circumstances I formerly considered the bane of matrimony I now consider the principal sources of pleasure. There is more eloquence in the eyes of my wife and children, than in the finest oration; the sound of their voice is dearer than the softest music, and their presence the source of more enjoyment than all the bottles, toasts, songs, or puns, in the whole routine of a Bachelor's life. What can equal the delight I receive when on returning home, after the hours of business, I sit down surrounded by their smiles of welcome. The snug parlour, the clean hearth and cheering fire, the buzzing tea kettle, the rattle of cups and saucers, the conversation of a loving wife, the prattle of two innocent little emblems—what can be dearer? I would have all Bachelors taxed for their mistaken ideas of enjoyment, if nothing else,—they heartily deserve it. They tell you they cannot afford to keep a wife; they talk of the vast expence attendant upon housekeeping, and finish the argument by inviting you to join a Bachelor's party where an ocean of wine is to be swallowed at Ned's expence, thus spending in one afternoon as much as a wife and family would spend in a week.—Beside this a married man is looked upon in the world in a far higher light than a Bachelor; he is respected and esteemed, confidence is more cheerfully reposed in him, and he will retrieve himself from misfortune where a Bachelor would be overwhelmed; he saves, what a Bachelor expends.—Even whilst writing this I have had a glance,—but a single glance—which I would not exchange for all the pleasures I ever received as a Bachelor. PAUL PRY.

ON SUICIDE.

"Happy the man who, innocent,
Grieves not at the ill he cannot prevent." GREEN.

I have been induced to treat of Suicide as a crime on a cursory view appearing only to affect the wretch who commits it;—this I know to be the opinion of many, who, not considering the powerful effect produced on society by the influence either of good or bad example, conclude at once that as only one human being is concerned in the perpetration; so the matter rests entirely between him and his maker. These opinions I shall endeavour to confute, and to prove that the act under consideration is not only an offence against reason and conscience, but also one of the blackest cast, as it affects the best interests of society. Doubtless many an unhappy creature has been led by the extremity of mental anguish to wish with distracted Hamlet, "that this too, too solid flesh would melt, thaw, and resolve itself into a dew," and has like him been checked in his career of desponding thoughts by the consciousness that there is "a something after death," and that "the everlasting has fix'd his cannon 'gainst self-slaughter." This upon a slight consideration will be found to be the certain conclusion of sound reason. Let a man ask himself a few plain questions such as the following. Am I my own creator? Do I know whence I come or whither I go? Can I produce or prolong life? What other answers can be returned to these and such questions, than that so far from having had any hand in my own creation, I know not either my origin or destiny; and that as it is infinitely beyond my power to animate a single atom, or prolong life one moment when its time of departure is arrived, so it is contrary to the just conclusions of reason to suppose that I have a right to "take that life I cannot give." From this conclusion none I think can dissent. Next as it affects society. Who is there among the various gradations of rank so insignificant as not to be missed by some when the thread of life is either drawn out by the gentle operation of the hand of time, or snapped in sunder by the rude and unhallowed hand of the self-destroyer? Some I allow are so far sunk into the dregs of human existence, that they may be swept off this mortal stage and be little thought of after, but this is by no means generally the case; few are found who by hastily withdrawing themselves from life do not in some degree injure relations, friends, and society in general, and how many instances have we met with of the father of a family plunging into the depth of misery a friendless wife and helpless progeny, by suddenly depriving them of their only help and support! I will now address that unhappy mortal who has at any time suffered his mind to border on the confines of despondency. Think, O man, wherever thou art, think, ere it be too late, of the consequences of allowing the advances of those passions which as certainly produce inquietude and distraction of mind, as the day succeeds to night. Nip pride in the bud ere it ripen into bloom, and shed its baneful seed through every crevice of thy heart, and influence all thy actions;—never forget that pride is the greatest enemy to human happiness. If discontent assail thee, look around,—then, if thou findest none more unfortunate than thyself, check it not. We have heard religious melancholy assigned as a cause of suicide. Surely this is a perversion of language, for that any feelings engendered by religion should instigate to so rash and unwarrantable an act is totally inadmissible; on the contrary I am fully convinced that all who have a right knowledge of religion will find "her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths lead to humility, contentment, and peace."—Let not religion then be associated with so gloomy a subject, its effects, when rightly understood, are not, cannot be the production of melancholy, but in all our trials and disappointments that equanimity of disposition which will enable us to say with patient Job, "all the days of my appointed time I will wait, till my change come, the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord!"—Say not, reader, that I am taking upon me the office of a preacher, far be it from me unnecessarily to cast any shade approaching to gloominess over the pages of the entertaining publication now in your hand, but in conclusion I beg leave to state, that I have been induced thus far to connect my subject with religion, from a thorough conviction that with religious feelings no one would dare to rush uncalled into the presence of his judge; and without them that there is no sure stay for the mind of man, when racked and tormented by the cares and disappointments of the world.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

"I've lost one eye, and I've got a timber toe."

Sung old Joe Jennings, as he swivelled round on his wooden pin, whilst bustling through the comical Jack-in-the-box gate at the east end of the Naval Asylum going into Greenwich Park—

"I've lost one eye, and I've got a timber toe."

"And where did you leave your eye, Joe?"—"In the Gut of Gibraltar."—"Well, Joe, you'll never see double again, so what do you say to another glass? Come, let's freshen the nip, my old boy, and spin us a tough yarn."—"No, no, thank ye all the same.—No, no, thank ye, I'd rather not; for whilst I am spinning the yarn you would be winding me up, and then I should go reeling it to my cabin, and catch the yellow fever."—"But where did you lose your leg, Joe?"—"Why I'll tell you all about it as soon as we come to anchor under the trees. There, now you shall have it. Why, d'ye see, I lost my leg when I lent a hand to take the R—French 80, and warm work we had of it."—"Avast, there, Joe, avast! you know it's all a fudge," said old Tom Pipes, as he came hobbling up—"You know it's all a fudge. Warn't you groggy? and didn't you jam your foot atwixt the shot-locker and the combings, and capsize down the hatchway? and now you want to persuade the gummus it was done in action."—"Aye, aye, Tom, you're always running foul of me—but no matter, you know better. Zounds! didn't you hold the step of my precious limb while the surgeon dock'd it and saw'd away the splinters? and avast I got the shot to this hour?"—"Yes, Joe, yes; but tell the gummus about Nancy and her husband;—my scorpers run over whenever I think of it."—"Why, aye, he shall have it, and do you lend me a lift if I should break down, though I don't much fear it. Why d'ye see, Sir, Bill Neville was our messmate, and he used to tell us a little of his history. And so, Sir, he was brought up in a country village, and loved his wife when only a little girl; and he went to sea, thinking to make his fortune for her sake. Well, he got to be Master of a merchantman, and then they were married. Who can describe the pleasures of that moment when their hands were spliced at the altar, and he hailed her as his own! But he was obliged to sail again. 'Oh!' said Nancy, 'should you never return, what shall I do?—where shall I go?—where end my wretched days?' His heart was too full to speak; one hand clasped in her's, the other pointed to the broad expanse, where the noon-day sun was shining in meridian splendour. It had a double meaning—Nancy felt it: 'There is a God, trust in him!' or, 'If not on earth, we meet in heaven!' Well, Sir, eighteen months roll'd away, during which, in due time, Nancy brought into the world a dear pledge of affection—a lovely boy. But oh the agony of the mother in every day dragg'd on without intelligence from William! When she look'd at the sweet babe—was it indeed fatherless, and she a widow? You'll excuse my stopping, Sir, but indeed I can't help it—I've shed tears over it many a time.

"Well, Sir, eighteen months was turned, when one morning Nancy arose to pour out her breast before her Maker, and weep over her sleeping child. The sun had just risen above the hills, when a noise in the little garden which fronted the cottage alarmed her. She opened the casement and putting aside the woodbine—bush, delightful yet agonizing sight—her dear, her long-mourning William, handcuff'd between two soldiers, while others, with their side-arms drawn, seem'd fearful of losing their prey! His face pale, and his emaciated body worn down with fatigue and sickness, his spirit seem'd ready to quit its frail mansion, and was only kept to earth by union with his wife. Nancy forgot all, and clasp'd him in her arms; but the rattling of the irons pierced her soul. I do not mean to condemn the policy, Sir; but 'tis a cruel practice, that of pressing. Ah! I well remember it—though I always served it! King, God bless him! Yet I've witness'd many an aching heart, and heard many a groan of agony. But to proceed: William was press'd; Nancy hastened into the cottage, and wrapping the sleeping babe in its blanket, she prepared to accompany them. Cannot you picture to yourself the first glance which the wretched parent cast upon his child? Oh it was a sad, sweet joy that wrung the soul! I shall pass by their meeting, their dear delight, their bitter anguish. If you can feel, it is already engraven on your heart. Suffice it to say, William had been shipwreck'd on the African coast, and though he had lost the whole of his property, yet boats had spared his life, and his the only one. Sickened came on him, and but for the humanity of a poor untamed negro, he might have breath'd his last. She was black—she was a negro—but God searches the heart. He had procured, with much difficulty, a passage home. The ship arriv'd; he set out, and walk'd many a weary mile, led on by love, and cheer'd by hope, till the roof of his cottage appeared in view. Here he sunk upon his knees, and poured forth his heart in trembling anxiety and fervent petition. A sailor can pray, Sir, and it matters not, so it be right, whether it be in a matted pew at church, or swinging like a oat at the mast head. He arose, and with haster step reach'd the wicket, when — but I dare not repeat the story—I've told you already he was press'd. Well, he was drafted on board of us, and his dear Nancy permitted to be with him. The evening before the action, she was sitting on the carriage of the bow gun, with her baby cradled in her arms, and William by her side—they were viewing, with admiration and delight, the beautiful scenery displayed by the sinking clouds in a thousand fantastic shapes, tinged with liquid gold streaming from the setting sun, and caressing the little innocent, while all the parent kindled in their hearts. But hark! a hoarse voice is heard from the mast head—all is hush'd. 'Halloo!' said the Captain. 'A sail on the larboard bow, Sir.'—'What does she look like?'—'I can but just see her, Sir, but she looms large.'—'Mr. Banks,' said the Captain, 'take your glass aloft, and see if you can make out what she is. Call the Boatswain—turn the hands up—make sail.' In a moment all was bustle; the topmen were in their station, and every man employed; and in a few minutes every stitch of canvas was stretch'd upon the yards and booms. The officer that was sent aloft reported it a ship of the line, which look'd like a foreigner. Every heart was now elate, but Nancy's—it might be an enemy! Oh that thought was dreadful! And as William conducted her below, the tears chased each other down her pale face, and the heavy sigh burst from her gentle bosom. William mildly reproved her, and again pointing to heaven, drew to his post. The stranger had hauled to the wind, fired a gun, and hoisted French colours. Up went ours with three cheers; and there's seldom a moment of greater pride to a British tar than when he displays the ensign of his country in presence of the enemy. Three cheers resounded through the ship, and broadside upon broadside shook her groaning timbers. Where was Nancy? William was first in every danger. Three times we boarded the foe, but were repulsed. Dreadful grew the scene of blood and horror through the darkening shades of night. No one bore tidings of the fight to Nancy, none, save the poor sailor whose shattered limb came to suffer amputation, or the wounded wretch to be dress'd, at which she assisted with fortitude. Two hours had pass'd in this awful suspense and heart-rending anxiety, when a deep groan and piercing shriek from the lower deck convulsed her frame. She knew the voice, and snatching the infant in her arms, rush'd to the spot. Soon she found the object of her search: his manly form mangled and shattered; that face, once ruddy with the glow of health, now pale and convulsed; the blood streaming from his side and breast! He saw her too. 'Nancy!' said he, and raising his feeble hand pointing to heaven—it fell—and William was no more! Looking on the lifeless body of her husband, Nancy knelt with the dear babe still in her arms? when, oh mysterious providence! at that very moment, while senseless and inanimate, at that very moment, a ball entered through the vessel's side—it pierced her bosom! 'God I tell the rest? They were pleasant and lovely in their lives, and in their death they were not divided.'

AN OLD SAILOR.

[This pathetic story is founded on facts which actually occurred; and we have reason to believe that the Orphan is still alive.]

ON THE VANITY OF POSTHUMOUS HONOURS.

Ὁν ἐραμαι κλισίῳ βασιλῆϊ ἐγκατακείσθαι
"ἐθνεύς" ἀλλὰ τι μοι ζῶντι γένοιτ' ἀγαθόν.

THEOGNIS.

On princely couch I wish not to recline
When dead; but living, may some good be mine.

So where, amid you mute admiring throng,
The rich man's bier moves sadly slow along;
What stately stoles that crowd of mourners wear!
What awful pomp attends him to the grave!
Death the marble pile his dust is laid,
And all the solemn dues of death are paid.

Ah vain deceits! how impotent to charm
The breast with beating life no longer warm!
Say, was it this—these honours to obtain,
That life was spent in paltry schemes of gain?
That interest bade each social bliss depart,
And quench'd the noblest feelings of the heart?

Oh! be through life each soft endearment mine,
And o'er my grave let humble oaks twine;
I ask no mournful train, no sable plume,
No weeping statues heaving o'er my tomb.
Ere those to whom unending days belong,
For ever blooming in immortal song,
I envy not;—their tedious days were spent
Far from the peaceful vale of calm content:
They never knew through flowery fields to rove,
And taste at eve the shade delights of love;
They never felt the pleasures, pure, refined,
Which spring from kindred souls by Friendship joined;
The muse ne'er led them forth in woods alone,
Her sacred haunts were all to them unknown;
Far hence Ambition's pole-star, gleaming wild
Like the red meteor blaze, their steps beguiled.

Oh! might I find some still, secluded spot,
Where dove-eyed Peace might bless my humble lot;
Where, far remote from scenes of jarring strife,
Blessing and bless'd, might pass my pious life!
And, oh! should Fortune smile, and Heaven so please,
Perhaps a gown might yield me "learned ease";
With books refused, yet still in manners plain,
The respected Pastor of a village train.
My cottage, with the scented woodbine bound,
And fenced with rows of neat-trim'd box around,
Might lift perhaps its unassuming head,
Some little higher than the ploughman's shed:
In front the jasmine and the rose might bloom,
And the green sweet-brier shed a mild perfume.
There, on my sacred office duly bent,
My life might teach the awais to live content;
Might lead them humbly in His steps to tread,
"Who had not where on earth to lay his head."
My bounty might the poor man's wants relieve,
My words might sooth whom death had taught to grieve,
Might lead their views on wings of Faith to soar,
Where pain, and death, and mourning are no more.

Ah peaceful state! ah life serenely bless'd!
One long, calm sabbath of unwearied rest!
With no dull schemes of sordid gain perplex'd.
This life a sacred prelude to the next.
To teach mankind, that earth-born joys are woe,
And Virtue only, Happiness below;
To watch the smiling saint's departing breath,
And whisper round the bed of death.

POPULAR PREJUDICES AND SUPERSTITIOUS IDEAS PECULIAR TO THE ESTHONIANS.

The Esthoniens participate in most of the prejudices entertained by the Lettonians, but they have also long retained recollections and customs connected with paganism. They have a great veneration for particular places, especially certain fountains or springs, which they regard as sacred.

A brook, called in the Esthonian language Wöhhanda, which has its source in a grove near a high hill, was, even in the last century, the object of a worship truly idolatrous. Its pure and limpid source was surrounded by a sacred grove,—it was exactly like a lucus of the Romans. The veneration of the people for this spring, and the sacred wood which surrounded it, was extreme. The axe was never permitted to approach it, and no sacrilegious hand was to trouble the water of the fountain. This spring, successively increased by the junction of others in the neighbourhood, formed a considerable stream, the cool and pure water of which abounding in fish, crossed numerous districts, and was called Peka jogge, or the Sacred Stream. The country was threatened with sterility and all the imbecility of the seasons, if the water of the sacred stream was profaned, or if it was checked or disturbed in its course. On the contrary, if its source was cleaned, and its bed cleared from all obstacles and impurities, they could depend on a fine season and abundant harvests. The proprietor of an estate through which the Peka jogge flowed, having attempted to make use of the water by throwing a dam across, and building a mill, the peasants of the country rose in a body, and with dreadful cries demolished this sacrilegious building. The government was obliged to use force to prevent more serious excesses. A woman having bathed in it, her body swelled in a dreadful manner, and she did not recover her health until she had appeased the irritated nymph by offering sacrifices.

If the people wished to be informed respecting the abundance of the harvest, they placed three fishermen's baskets in the stream. If they found in the middle basket fish without scales, it was an unlucky sign; if the fish had scales, the omen was good. When it was unfavourable, they endeavoured to appease the divinity by sacrifices. They sacrificed an ox; and when fresh trials led them to imagine that the divinity was still hostile, forgetting the strongest sentiments of nature, they even sacrificed a child!

The Esthoniens have long retained, and have still a great veneration for thunder. They considered it as the protector of their houses, and consecrated to it offerings and victims. These striking remains of paganism were very observable so late as the last century.

Most of these purely pagan customs have disappeared, some of them have assumed the forms of Christianity; but the superstition remains, having only changed its emblems. In order to escape the vigilance of the police, the peasants conceal these unlawful practices under the cover of the night.

Midsummer-day is particularly honoured by the Esthonian peasants, but Midsummer-eve more so. The chapels consecrated to Saint John the Baptist are held in particular veneration. Less than a century ago, a clergyman in a certain district of Esthonia discovered one of these pagan practices in the garb of Christianity. The peasants of this district resorted to a place where there were large stones placed upright and others lying down. The tradition ran, that it was a whole annual procession which had been thus petrified; that the bride and bridegroom and their relations were changed into large stones, but the company into small ones. They danced and made invocations round the large stones for rain, and round the little ones for dry weather.

There was another chapel dedicated to St. John, round which barren women were to run three times, perfectly naked, uttering certain words in order to become fruitful. To cure the peasants of this ridiculous superstition, the lord of the district had this chapel destroyed by his own people, one of whom happening to fall ill suddenly, and dying a few days after the transaction, the peasantry, from that time to the present, have preserved a sacred regard for the spot on which the chapel stood.

Some Esthoniens still believe in the existence of malevolent beings, with human countenances and fishes' teeth, whom they call in German, Nack. These beings pursue particularly young children whom they find on the banks of the rivers, and devour them. Many Esthoniens hold, that before the deluge, beasts could talk; that the devil created wolves, and in general every thing that is hurtful.

The Esthoniens have even now a great variety of superstitious notions and practices relative to Marriage: for instance—Most of them settle and conclude marriages at the time of new moon, because they believe that then all sorts of blessings will come upon the young couple; among others, that their beauty and health will be preserved the longer.... A young peasant going to ride to the house of her whom he intends to marry, takes care not to mount a mare: the consequence of this would be, that all his children would be daughters.... As soon as a young woman is affianced, a red tape is tied round her body. When the marriage is completed, she must swell herself up so as to break this thread. This is a sure preventive against evil in cases of maternity. For the same reason, as soon as the bridegroom is seen coming on horseback, they are eager to loosen the girth of his horse.... In some places the young couple, immediately after the ceremony, on leaving the church, begin to run as fast as they can. This is to signify the rapid progress of their domestic labours. . . . When the bride is led to church, if she happens to fall, it is a sign that her first three or four children will die young. . . . They carefully avoid letting the bride go through a door by which a coffin has lately passed. . . . Immediately after the marriage, the strongest of the relations present at the ceremony, lifts up the young couple as high as he can. This is a means to increase the happiness that awaits them. . . . At the moment that they are to take possession of the house destined for them, somebody must carefully watch near the hearth, that no malicious person may come, and with the fire from the hearth practice some sorcery, or call down some malediction on the young couple. . . . The bride, as soon as she enters the house, is led through all the rooms and closets, the stables, the baths, the kitchen, the garden; and she must every where throw some piece of money or ribands, even into the fire and the wells. . . . The first time she sits down, a male infant is placed on her knee, that she may have many boys. . . . They watch with the greatest attention to see which of the two first falls asleep on the wedding night, in order to know which will die first. . . . If it rains on the wedding day, it is a sign that the bride will shed many tears during the course of her union. . . . When the bride arrives at the house of her husband, part of the surrounding wall is quickly thrown down, that she may enter without difficulty. It is a happy omen for her future lyings in.

THE CABINET.

MR. EDITOR,

The two well-known and universally admired Riddles, "Twas in heaven pronounced," and "Inscribed on many a learned page," the former of which was generally ascribed to the pen of Lord Byron, are both inserted in an elegant collection of poems, chiefly M.S. and from living authors, edited by Mrs. Baillie. The extensive and very respectable list of subscribers, printed at the beginning of the volume, amounts, in number of copies subscribed for, to 2,350, at one guinea each. After deducting the expenses of publication, which, owing to the liberality of her bookseller, printer, and stationer, are merely those of cost charges, the Editor has been enabled to realize a profit of about £1,500, for the benefit of her friend, a respectable but unfortunate lady, with a numerous family of young children.

The Riddles, above mentioned, were written by Miss Catherine Fanshawe, who also contributed to the same volume, two other pieces, of sterling merit,—“An Elegy on the Death of the Minnet, or the Abrogation of the Birth-night Ball,” and a very ingenious and truly laughable Epistle to Earl Harcourt, on his wishing her to spell her name, Catherine, with a K instead of a C. This poem is certainly too long for the limited columns of your Miscellany; but an abridgment, or rather a choice selection from it, I doubt not, will be acceptable to your readers, and enable them to form an opinion of the merits of this well-written Epistle, on a particular question in orthography, namely, whether the name Catherine should begin with a C or a K.

Yours, &c. S. X

EPISTLE TO EARL HARCOURT.

BY MISS CATHERINE FANSHAWE.

And can his antiquarian eyes,
My Anglo-Saxon C despise?
And does Lord Harcourt, day by day,
Regret th' extinct initial K?
And still, with ardour unabated,
Labour to get it re-instated?
I know, my Lord, your generous passion
For every long exploded fashion;
And own the 'Katherine' you delight in,
Looks irresistibly inviting,
Appears to bear the stamp and mark
Of English, used in Noah's Ark;
“But all that glitters is not gold;”
Nor all things obsolete are old.
Would you but take the pains to look
In Doctor Johnson's quarto book,
(As I did, wishing much to see
Th' aforesaid letter's pedigree.)
Believe me, 'twould a tale unfold,
Would make your Norman blood run cold.
My Lord, you'll find the K's no better
Than an interpolated letter,—

A wand'ring Greek, a franchis'd alien,
Deriv'd from Cadmus or Deucalion,
And why, or wherefore, none can tell,
Inserted 'twixt the J and L.

And since this K, of hateful sound,
First set his foot on English ground,
'Tis not, as antiquarians know,
A dozen centuries ago.
That darling theme of English story,
For learning fam'd, and martial glory,—
Alfred, who quell'd the usurping Dane,
And burst indignant from his chain;
Who slaves redeem'd, to reign o'er men,
Changing the saulehion for the pen,
And outlin'd with a master's hand,
Th' immortal charter of the land;
Alfred, whom yet these realms obey,
In all his Cyngdom own'd no K,
From foreign arms and letters free,
He wrote it with a Saxon C.

This case in point, from Alfred's laws,
Establishes my Client's cause;
Secures a verdict for Defendant,
K pays the costs,—and there's an end on't.

But grant some specious plea prevailing,
And all my legal learning failing;
There yet remains so black a charge,
Not only 'gainst the Keys at large,
But th' undivided K in question,
You'd tremble at the bare suggestion,
Nor ever more a wish reveal
So adverse to the public weal.

Dear gentle Earl, you little know
That wish might work a world of woe;
The ears that are unborn would rue
Your letter patent to renew
The dormant dignity of shrew.
What has not Shakespeare said and sung,
Of our pre-eminence of tongue!
His glowing pen has writ the name
In characters of fire and flame;
See him the comic muse invoking,
(The merry nymph with laughter choking,)—
While he exhibits at her shrine
The unshallow'd form of Katherine;
And there the Gorgon image plants,
Palladium of the termagants.

If practice e'er with precept tallies,
Could Shakespeare set down ought in malice?
From nature all his forms he drew,
And held the mirror to her view;
He flatter'd not an ugly flaw
But mark'd and copied what he saw;
Strictly fulfilling all his duties
Alike to blemishes and beauties.
So that in Shakespeare's time 'tis plain,
The Katherines were scolds in grain,
No females louder, fiercer, worse:—
Now contemplate the bright reverse;
And say amid the countless names,
Borne by contemporary dames,—
Exotics, fetch'd from distant nations,
Or good old English appellations,
Names hunted out from ancient books,
Or form'd on dairy maids or cooks,
Ruths, Rebecas, Rachels, Sarahs,
Charlottes, Harriets, Emmas, Claras,
Nannys, Fannys, Jennys, Bettys,
Dollys, Mollys, Biddys, Hettyes,—
Say, is there one more free from blame,
One that enjoys a fairer fame,
One more endow'd with christian graces,
(Although I say it to our faces,
And flattery we don't delight in.)
Than Catherine, at this present writing?

Where, then, can all the difference be?
Where? but between the K and C:
Between the graceful curving line,
We now prefix to atherine,
Which seems to keep, with mild police,
Those rebel syllables in peace,
Describing, in the line of duty,
Both physical and moral beauty,
And that impracticable K,
(Who led them all so much astray,)
Was never seen in black and white,
A character more full of spite!
That stubborn back, to bend unskilful,
So perpendicularly willful!
With angles, hideous to behold,
Like the sharp elbows of a scold,
In attitude, when words shall fail,
To fight their battles, tooth and nail.

In modern times observe the fate
Of that unhappy potentate,
Who, from his palace near the pole,
Where the chill waves of Neva roll,
Was snatch'd, while yet alive and merry,
And sent on board old Charon's ferry.
The Styx he travers'd, execrating
A Katherine of his own creating.
—Peter the Third—illustrious peer!
Great autocrat of half the sphere!
(At least, of all the Russias, he Was Emperor, Czar of Muscovy)—
In evil hour, this simple Czar,
Impell'd by some malignant star,

Bestow'd upon his new Czarina,
The fatal name of Katherine;
Twas Katherine, with a K,—
He rued it to his dying day:
Nay died, as I observ'd before,
The sooner on that very score.—
The Princess quickly learnt her cue,
Improv'd upon the part of shrew,
And as the plot began to thicken,
She wrung his head off like a chicken.
In short, this despot of a wife
Robb'd the poor man of crown and life;
And robbing Peter, paid not Paul;
But clear'd the stage of great and small,
No corner of the throne would spare,
To gratify her son and heir,
But liv'd till three score years and ten,
Still trampling on the rights of men.

Thy brief existence, hapless Peter!
Had doubtless longer been, and sweeter,
But that thou wilfully disturb'dst
The harmless name she brought from Zerbui.
Nor was it even then too late,
When crown'd and register'd a Kate;
When all had trembling heard, and seen,
The shriller voice, and fiercer mien—
Hast thou e'en then, without the measure,
That Russian boons adopt at pleasure,
On publishing a tedious akase,
To blab to all the world the true case,—
By virtue of the impartial knout
But whipt th' offending letter out;
She, in the fairest page of fame,
Might then have writ her faultless name,
And thus retain'd thy life and crown,
Till Time himself had mow'd them down.

SUPERNATURAL APPEARANCE.

It is not many years ago, since Mr. — accompanied some friends on a visit to York cathedral. The party was numerous; and amongst them were a gentleman and his two daughters. Mr. — was with the eldest of these ladies, exploring the curiosities of the building, rather at a distance from the rest of their companions. On turning from the monument to which their attention had been directed, an officer in a naval uniform was observed advancing towards them. It was rather an unusual circumstance to encounter a person thus accoutred, in a place so far distant from the sea, and of so unmilitary a character. Mr. — was on the point of making a trivial observation on the subject to his companion; when, on his turning his eyes towards her, and pointing out the approaching stranger to her notice, he saw an immediate paleness spread itself over her face, and her countenance became agitated by the force of the powerful and contending emotions which were suddenly excited by his presence. As the stranger drew more near, and his figure and his features gradually became more distinctly visible, through the evening gloom and the dim religious light of the cathedral, the lady's distress was evidently increased. She leant on the arm of Mr. — with the weight of one who was painfully afflicted, and felt the necessity of support. Shocked at the oppression which he witnessed; but wholly ignorant of the cause—alarmed—hurried—supposing her to be suffering from the paroxysm of some violent and sudden indisposition. —Mr. — called to entreat the assistance of her sister. The figure in the naval uniform was now immediately before them. The eyes of the lady were fixed upon him, with a gaze of silent and motionless surprise, and a painful intensity of feeling: her lips were colourless and apart; and her breath passed heavily from the full and over-burthened heart. The form was close upon them. It approached her side—it passed but for an instant—as quick as thought, a low, and scarcely audible, voice whispered in her ear “There is a future state;” and the figure moved onward through the retiring aisle of the minister. The father of the lady arrived to the assistance of his daughter; and Mr. —, consigning her to his protection, hastened in pursuit of the mysterious visitor. He searched on every side: no such form was to be seen in the long perspective of the path by which the ill-omened stranger had departed. He listened with the most earnest attentiveness; no sound of retreating footsteps was to be heard on the echoing pavement of the cathedral. Baffled in his attempt to discover the object whose presence had thus disturbed the tranquility of the time, Mr. — re-sought his friends. The lady was weeping on the shoulder of her father. She avoided every inquiry respecting the cause, the seat, and the nature of her illness—"It was slight: it was transient: it would immediately be over." She entreated the party to continue their examination of the building, and to leave her again to the protection of her former companion. The request was granted. And no sooner had she thus possessed herself of an opportunity of confidential communication, than she implored him, with a quick and agitated voice, to conceal for a little while, the occurrence of which he had been a witness. "We shall never be believed: besides, it were right that my poor dear father should be gradually prepared for the misery that he is destined to undergo. I have seen the spirit, and I have heard the voice, of a brother, who exists no longer—he has died at sea. We had agreed that the one who died the first, should re-appear to the survivor, if it were possible—to clear up, or to confirm, doubts which existed in both our minds."

In due time, the account of the event occurred in completion of the spiritual intimation.—The brother was indeed no more—his death had happened on the very day and hour, in which his form was seen by Mr. — and his sister, in the north aisle of York cathedral.

ANECDOTE OF CAPTAIN HORNBY.

Mr. Richard Hornby of Stokely, was master of a merchant ship, the Isabella of Sunderland, in which he sailed from the coast of Norfolk for the Hague, June 1, 1744, in company with three smaller vessels recommended to his care. Next day they made Gravesend Steeple, in the Hague; but while they were steering for their port, a French privateer, that lay concealed among the Dutch fishing boats, suddenly came against them, singling out the Isabella as the object of attack, while the rest dispersed and escaped. The strength of the two ships was most unequal; for the Isabella mounted only four carriage guns and two swivels, and her crew consisted of only five men and three boys, besides the captain; while the privateer, the Marquis de Brancas, commanded by Captain Andre, had ten carriage guns and eight swivels, with seventy-five men and three hundred small arms. Yet Captain Hornby nothing daunted; having animated his little crew by an appropriate address, and obtained their promise of standing by him to the last, hoisted the British colours, and with his two swivel guns, returned the fire of the enemy's chase guns. The Frenchmen, in abusive terms, commanded him to strike. Hornby coolly returned an answer of defiance, on which the privateer advanced, and poured such showers of bullets into the Isabella, that the captain found it prudent to order his brave fellows into close quarters. While he lay thus sheltered, the enemy twice attempted to board him on the larboard quarter; but by a dexterous turn of the helm he frustrated both attempts, though the Frenchmen kept firing upon him both with guns and small arms. At two o'clock, when the action had lasted an hour, the privateer running furiously in upon the larboard of the Isabella, entangled her bowsprit among the main shrouds, and was lashed fast to her. Captain Andre now bawled out in a menacing tone, "You English dog, strike." Captain Hornby challenged him to come on board and strike his colours if he dared. The exasperated Frenchman instantly threw in twenty men on the Isabella, who began to hack and hew into the close quarters; but a general discharge of blunderbusses forced the assailants to retreat as fast as their wounds would permit them.

The privateer being now disengaged from the Isabella, turned about and made another attempt on the starboard side, when the valiant Hornby and his mate shot each his man as the enemy were again lashing the ships together. The Frenchman once more commanded him to strike; and the brave Englishman returning another refusal, twenty fresh men entered, and made a fierce attack on the close quarters with hatchets and pole axes, with which they had nearly cut their way through in three places, when the constant fire kept up by Captain Hornby and his crew, obliged them a second time to retreat, carrying their wounded with them, and hauling their dead after them with boat hooks.

The Isabella continuing still lashed to the enemy, the latter, with small arms, fired repeated and terrible volleys into the close quarters; but the fire was returned with such spirit and effect, that the Frenchmen repeatedly gave way. At length Captain Hornby seeing them crowding behind their mainmast for shelter, aimed a blunderbuss at them, which being by mistake doubly loaded, containing twice twelve balls, burst in the firing, and threw him down, to the great consternation of his little crew, who supposed him dead. In an instant, however, he started up again, though greatly bruised, while the enemy, among whom the blunderbuss had made dreadful havoc, disengaged themselves from the Isabella, to which they had been lashed an hour and a quarter, and sheered off with precipitation, leaving their grapplings, and a quantity of pole axes, pistols, and cutlasses, behind them.

The gallant Hornby now exultingly fired his two starboard guns into the enemy's stern. The indignant Frenchman immediately returned, and renewed the conflict, which was carried on yard-arm and yard-arm, with great fury, for two hours together. The Isabella was shot through her hull several times, her sails and rigging were torn to pieces, her ensign was dismounted, and every mast and yard damaged; yet she still bravely maintained the combat, and at last, by a fortunate shot, which struck the Brancas between wind and water, obliged her to sheer off and career. While the enemy were retiring, Hornby and his little crew sallied out from their fastness, and erecting their fallen ensign, gave three sheers.

By this time both vessels had driven so near the English shore, that immense crowds had assembled to be spectators of the action. The Frenchman having stopped his leak, returned to the combat, and poured a dreadful volley into the stern of the Isabella, when Captain Hornby was wounded by a ball in the temple, and bled profusely. The sight of their brave commander streaming with blood, somewhat disconcerted his gallant companions, but he called to them briskly to keep their courage, and stand to their arms, for his wound was not dangerous. On this their spirits revived, and again taking post in their close quarters, they sustained the shock of three more tremendous broadsides, in returning which, they forced the Brancas, by another well aimed shot, a second time to sheer off and career. The huzzas of the Isabella's crew were renewed, and they again set up their shattered ensign, which was shot through and through into honourable rags.

Andre, who was not deficient in bravery, soon returned to the fight, and having disabled the Isabella by five terrible broadsides, once more summoned Hornby, with terrible menaces, to strike his colours. Captain Hornby turned to his gallant comrades. "You see yonder, my lads," pointing to the shore, "the witnesses of your valour." It was unnecessary to say more; they one and all assured him of their resolution to stand by him to the last; and finding them thus invincibly determined, he hurled his final defiance at the enemy.

Andre immediately ran his ship upon the Isabella's starboard, and lashed close alongside; but his crew murmured, and refused to renew the dangerous task of boarding, so that he was obliged to cut the lashings and again retreat.

Captain Hornby resolved to salute the privateer with one parting gun; and this last shot fired into the stern of the Brancas happening to reach the magazine, it blew up with a tremendous explosion, and the vessel instantly went to the bottom. Out of seventy-five men, thirty-six were killed or wounded in the action, and all the rest, together with the wounded, perished in the deep, except three, who were picked up by the Dutch fishing boats.

This horrible catastrophe excited the compassion of the brave Hornby and his men; but they could, unfortunately, render no assistance to their ill-fated enemies, the Isabella having become unmanageable, and her boat being shattered to pieces.

Mr. Hornby afterwards received from his sovereign a large gold medal, in commemoration of his heroic conduct on this occasion; conduct, perhaps, not surpassed by any thing in the annals of British naval prowess.

DESCRIPTION OF A WEST INDIAN HURRICANE.—A hurricane is usually preceded by awful and certain prognostics. An unusual calm prevails; not a breath of wind is felt; the atmosphere is close and sultry, the clouds wild, broken, and perpetually and rapidly shifting; at length a deep and portentous gloom gradually settles and overspreads the hemisphere; the sun is enveloped in darkness; a deep, hollow, and murmuring sound is indistinctly heard, like the roaring of a distant cataract, or the howling of winds through remote woods; rapid and transcendent gusts of wind and rain speedily succeed; various birds of passage are seen hastily driving along the sky, or are thrown down by the violence of those gusts; even the cattle, grazing in the fields, as if instinctively aware of the approaching danger, withdraw to the adjacent thickets for shelter. The blasts soon become more impetuous; at one moment they rage with inconceivable fury, and the ensuing instant seem as it were suddenly to expire. In a few hours the hurricane reaches its acmé of violence—when all the winds of heaven, and from every point of the compass, winged with destruction, seem let loose from their caverns. The largest trees are thrown prostrate, or shattered and stripped of their foliage; the provision-grounds are laid waste; the sugar-canes levelled to the earth, and, in the more exposed situations, torn up by the roots, and wafted about like chaff. Many of the dwellings are blown down, or unroofed, and their inhabitants too often either buried in the ruins, or driven forth to periah unsheltered.

Nothing can be more appalling than the wild howling and threatening violence of a hurricane during the night, when the vivid and quickly-succeeding gleams of lightning, dart athwart the heavens, and make "darkness visible," and heighten the horrors of the scene. Well might the witness of such a scene exclaim with King Lear,

"Let the great gods,
That keep this dreadful pother o'er our heads,
Find out their enemies now. Tremble, thou wretch,
That hast within thee undivulged crimes,
Unwhipt of justice!"

TO PLEASURE.

Pleasure, stay thy rapid platoon,
Stay, and sooth this breast's alarms;
Spring declares her gay dominion,
And I woo thee to my arms.

Long these eyes have vainly sought thee,
Long this heart thine absence wail'd;
Tho' Hope fair promises oft brought me,
Still her fairest promise fall'd.

Pleasure, prit' d but when we lose thee,
Vain'd only when too late,
Oft thy calm delights refuse we,
Dazzled by the glare and state

Of a Jade whose wiles enchanting,
Doom her votaries to pain,
That wooes by meretricious flouting,
Guilt and death are in her train.

Vile enchantress, who (fair maiden Stole from thee thy deathless name),
Like the fiend which haunted Eden
Smiles but to allure to shame!

'Tis not her soft arts, enthralling,
Which can prompt this breast to sigh;
Tho' her breath's as odours falling,
And mirth lights her azure eye:—

Tho' her iv'ry arms entwined me,
Tho' her tongue did witcheries pour;
Tho' each blandishment did bind me—
Would I break the Syren's lure.

But to thee, bright star of heaven,
I attune my votive shell;—
To thee, the power to charm is given,
Thee—whose smiles my cares dispel!

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

HOUSE FLIES.—These troublesome little insects may be effectually destroyed without the use of poison: take half a tea-spoonful of black pepper in powder, one tea-spoonful of brown sugar, and one table-spoonful of cream; mix them well together, and place them in a room on a plate where the flies are troublesome, and they will soon disappear.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

THE FIRE OF ST. ELMO.

In the month of June 1808, passing from the Island of Ivica to that of Majorca, on board a Spanish polacca ship, fitted as a cartel, and manned by about thirty ruffians, Genoese, Valencians, and Catalonians; a fine southerly gale, by seven in the evening, brought us within 6 or 7 leagues of the anchorage in Palma Bay. About this time, the sea-breeze failing us astern, was shortly succeeded by light and baffling breezes off the land. No sooner had the setting sun withdrawn his golden beams from the tops of the lofty hills, which rise to the westward of the town, than a thick and impenetrable cloud, gathering upon the summit of Mount Galatzo, spread gradual darkness on the hills below, and extended at length a premature obscurity along the very surface of the shore. About nine, the ship becalmed, the darkness was intense, and rendered still more sensible by the yellow fire that gleamed upon the horizon to the south, and aggravated by the deep-toned thunder which rolled at intervals on the mountain, accompanied by the quick rapidity of that forked lightning, whose eccentric course, and dire effects, set all description at defiance. By half-past nine, the hands were sent aloft to furl top-gallant-sails, and reef the top-sails, in preparation for the threatening storm. When retiring to rest, a sudden cry of St. Elmo and St. Ann, was heard from those aloft, and fore and aft the deck. An interpreter called lustily down the hatchway, that St. Elmo was on board, and desired me to come up. A few steps were sufficient, and, to my great surprise, I found the topsail-yards deserted, the sails loose, and beating in the inconstant breeze, the awe-struck and religious mariners, bare-headed, on their knees, with hands uplifted, in voice and attitude of prayer, in earnest and muttering devotion to St. Elmo or St. Ann, according to the provincial nature of their speech.

On observing the appearance of the masts, the main-top-gallant-mast-head, from the truck, for three feet down, was perfectly enveloped in a cold blaze of pale phosphorous-looking light, completely embracing the circumference of the mast, and attended with a fitting or creeping motion, as exemplified experimentally by the application of common phosphorus upon a board; and the fore and mizen top-gallant-mast-heads exhibited a similar appearance in a relative degree.

This curious illumination continued with undiminished intensity for the space of eight or ten minutes, when, becoming gradually fainter and less extensive, it finally disappeared, after a duration of not less than half-an-hour.

The seamen, in the mean time, having finished their devotions, and observing the lights to remain stationary, returned promptly to the yards, and, under favour of this "Spirit of the Storm," now quickly performed that duty, which, on a critical conjuncture, had been abandoned, under the influence of their superstition and their fears. During the prevalence of the lights, as well as through the remaining hours of night, the wind continued, except in occasional puffs, light and variable; and the morning ushered in, with a clear sky, a hot sun, and a light southerly breeze, which, in due time, brought us safe to the anchorage of Palma.

Conversing with the interpreter on the nature of this extraordinary atmospheric phenomenon, he expressed his implicit belief that it was provided by the immediate power of St. Elmo, the tutelar deity of "those who travel on the vasty deep," in regard to their interests in a moment of sudden danger; and used every argument to persuade me, that the present safety of the ship was due to the very timely and friendly interference of this aerial demigod; and that no accident could possibly have happened to the sails, while the seamen were at prayers, as long as the light glowed stationary on the mast. Had the light, he continued, descended gradually from the mast-head to the deck, and from thence to the keelson, as he had often seen it, the event would have prognosticated a gale of wind or other disaster, and, according to the depth of the descent, so would be the nature of the evil to come. In the present instance, the lights gradually disappeared, like the snuff of a candle, and the weather continued clear and fine for several subsequent days.

This phenomenon, by many, is held to be fabulous, and is so alluded to by the greatest living poet of the day:

"Of witch, of mermaid, and of sprite,
"Of Erik's cap, and Elmo's light;"

but Falconer, both seaman and poet, writing from experience, says,

"High on the masts with pale and wild rays,
"Amid the gloom portentous meteors blaze."

In order, however, to illustrate more fully the character of those very pious and devoted seamen, who attracted the favour of the saint on the present occasion, it must be understood, that this visitation of St. Elmo took place immediately on the first burst of the Spanish Revolution, and that these very men had but recently figured as the bloody instigators and perpetrators, along with other patriots, in the massacre of several unfortunate Frenchmen, long resident in the city of Valencia for the peaceful purposes of commerce.—Edin. Phil. Journal.

REMOVAL OF A HOUSE.—The singular application of the mechanical powers to the removal of an entire building, which has been successful in one or two instances, in Italy and the Netherlands, has also been attempted in America, and we quote, from a New York paper, the following account of the experiment:—

New York, June 4, 1823.

The interesting and novel performance of removing a brick house was witnessed in this city yesterday, for the first time, and it is said to be the first attempt ever made to remove a building entirely of brick. In the improvements going on by widening Maiden Lane, it was necessary that the house, No. 85, should be pulled down or removed to a distance of 21½ feet from its former front. The house is three stories high, 25 feet wide, and 45 in depth, has a slated roof, and is a valuable building. The project of removing it, was conceived and undertaken by Mr. Simeon Brown, who has before removed about twenty buildings, some of them built partly with brick, and in some instances, without disturbing the families or removing the furniture. This house was estimated to weigh about 350 tons, and was removed with all the chimneys, windows, doors, &c. standing. Being previously placed upon ways, the removal was commenced yesterday morning, and was performed by three bed-screws in the front, each of which worked by two or three men. What was deemed the most difficult part of the undertaking, was, that the house was to be raised two feet from its former foundation—this was however done by two other screws placed underneath, which raised the building gradually in the exact ratio required. In the course of the day, the building was removed about 16 feet, without the least detriment or jar—the other 5 feet will be finished this morning about 9 o'clock, when those who have not seen the performance, may have another opportunity. Great numbers were present yesterday and much gratified by the sight. There was so little danger manifest, that during the time the house was moving, the owner entertained about 150 persons within it, with a handsome collation. We conceive this successful undertaking to be important, particularly to a city requiring so many improvements as this, and think Mr. Brown deserves much praise for his ingenuity. We have ascertained that the expense of removing the building, is about one fifth of its value, and there is no doubt that this plan will in future, in many instances, be adopted, and a great portion of the expense of pulling down and rebuilding saved.

PILLAR IN HONOUR OF HIS MAJESTY.—The commissioners of King's-town Harbour have succeeded in erecting the great granite pillar in commemoration of our gracious sovereign's departure from Dublin, which rises over the harbour, and measures, in one solid stone, sixteen feet. The column, it is intended, should be forty feet high. It is placed on the remaining part of a ridge of rocks, which extended from the shore into the interior, which are now used in making the great pier. It has an admirable effect, as the spot on which it stands is all that now remains of the great ridge. The base rests in the bosom of this old fragment, and immediately under the pillar are four great granite orbs.

VOLCANO OF BARREN ISLANDS.—This volcano was visited by Capt. Webster, of the Juliana, in March last. Having entered a small bay, with the view of landing, they were, at the distance of 100 yards from the shore, assailed by a hot puff of wind, and, upon dipping their fingers in the water, they were surprised to find it as hot almost as if it had been boiling. The stones on shore, and the rocks exposed to the ebbing of the tide, were smoking and hissing, and the water bubbling all round them. The cone appeared from hence about one-fourth of a mile distant. Having landed in a cove, they ascended a precipice, holding by the grass that grew out of the ashes, and having reached the top, after no slight danger, they found a small tree, under the shade of which they had a full view of the volcano. Its height is about half a mile. The diameter of the base is supposed to be 300 yards, and about 30 at the top, the whole of the space seeming to be occupied with the mouth. It discharged continually a thin white smoke. The cone stands in the centre of an amphitheatre of hills, which nearly closed around it. In order to examine the crater, Captain W. ascended thirty or forty yards sinking ankle deep in ashes at each step, but he found it impossible to reach the mouth.

THE MERRY HEART.

By William Smyth, Esq.

I would not from the wise require
The lumber of these learned lore;
Nor would I from the rich desire
A single counter of their store.
For I have ease, and I have health,
And I have spirit, light as air,
And more than wisdom, more than wealth,
A merry heart, that laughs at care.

Like other mortals of my kind
I've struggled for dame Fortune's favour,
And sometimes have been half inclined
To rate her for her ill-behaviour.
But life was short—I thought it folly
To lose its moments in despair;
So slipp'd aside my melancholy,
With merry heart, that laugh'd at care.

And once, 'tis true, two witching eyes
Surpris'd me in a luckless season,
Turn'd all my mirth to lonely sighs,
And quite subdued my better reason.
Yet 'twas but love could make me grieve,
And love you know's a reason fair,
And much improv'd, as I believe,
The merry heart, that laugh'd at care.

So now, from idle wishes clear,
I make the good I may not find;
Adown the stream I gently steer,
And sift my sail with every wind.
And half by nature, half by reason,
Can still with pliant art prepare,
The mind, attund to every season,
The merry heart, that laughs at care.

Yet, wrap me in your sweetest dream,
Ye social feelings of the mind,
Give, sometimes give, your sunny gleam,
And let the rest good-humour find.
Yes, let me hail and welcome give
To every joy my lot may share;
And, pleas'd and pleasing, let me live
With merry heart, that laughs at care.

PECULIARITIES OF
THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

OF the various calamities to which an individual is liable, I know of none greater than happening to live in a generation which admits of no variety beyond one's tradesmen's bills and the newspaper. But, thanks to Fashion and Folly, an author in this age cannot want a topic, and if he will not make use of what they offer, it is his own fault. Metaphysicians have traced with great ingenuity the changes of human nature in different ages, from the authentic data of beards, noses, and whiskers; but as men are beginning to act for themselves in politics, religion, and ornament, I fear that future moralists will be much at a loss for want of definite rules. Those obliging theorists who have decided that man is the slave of circumstances, are every day approaching nearer to correctness from events which they could not have foreseen. A man now regulates his conduct by his treasury; if it offends against the philosophical canon by admitting of a vacuum, he lets his beard grow, like a Spartan dandy; on the contrary, when he feels it swelling like an inflated balloon, he allows the barber to board his lower deck, and submits to receive a polish.

'Never, my dear boy,' said a man of fashion to his son, at first coming out, 'never offer your arm to a demi-lady; the reward is not equal to the trouble.' A similar motive of action runs through the present generation, but they do not act up to the precept; they cry 'vive la bagatelle,' and compass heaven and earth to obtain it.

But it is for our discoveries that we challenge the admiration of posterity. The 'Pontic monarch of old days,' when he perfected his Mithridate, did not benefit the human race half so much as the inventor of Anticardium. No exquisite of the second water thinks of ordering a new coat at his tailor's; he permits himself to be rigged on coming of age, and periodically smears the suit with the renovator. But invention is kind even to the extravagant, for such as are weak enough to be measured for a new coat may dispose of the old one to the dyer, who converts it again to wool; like Cænis in the Metamorphoses and Æneid,

—first a woman, then a man,
But ending in the sex she first began.

It is more laudable however to use the reviving fluid, and render one's garments literally habitual.

Revolving heels, it is said, were invented by an unsteady politician, who found them useful in practising the pirouette. What indeed can be so desirable to a beau in a drawing-room, among a crowd of acquaintance, as the power of turning round in an instant, and saluting all he condescends to recognise, with one nod, of that species which logicians term univocal? To copy Homer's invocation to the Muses when he ventures on his arithmetic, would be trite, as every body reads Pope or Morris, but without some such assistance it is impossible to reckon the improvements of the present century. Have we not new royal societies, and systems of cookery? Magazines and reviews, and permission to deposit rubbish at corners? New drops at the Old Bailey and the jeweller's? Little-gees at the university, and go-carts in the nursery? Does not every wall teem with directions for health? Are we not favoured with Scotch novels at the rate of three volumes per month? In short, have we not ample reason to thank our stars that we were born in the age we live in?

Alas! in spite of the ingenuity of our cotemporaries, much remains to be done before man can be considered as a perfect animal. To stimulate exertion, to rouse talent, and to reward both, I hereby propose a set of prizes for such as shall discover the following requisites:—

1. To learn by heart without communicating with the subject.
2. To produce a fourth epic.
3. To discover an esculent or portion that shall excite hunger and allay thirst, or vice versa.
4. To avoid being present at the dressing of one's own hair.

Communications to be addressed to the Philharmonic Society, and determined on by a jury of Chelsea pensioners.

By classifying its principal objects, I may perhaps induce future writers to dilate on the merits of the 19th century. To the historian I offer,—Fonthill Abbey, the Duke d'Angoulême's inexpressibles, parliamentary reform, the Poyais settlers, the Liberal, Mademoiselle Mercandotti (now Madame Ball), Geoffry Crayon, and humbug in general.

The most obvious topics for antiquaries are,—the Critical Review (obiit anno humanæ salutis 1821), the Marybone Chapel, old English urbanity, instances of dying for love, the marriage act, Shakespeare's monument, constitutions in the south of Europe, and the Vision of Judgment; nor let them forget to add that, while the British Museum was repaired by act of parliament, the London Museum was pronounced by public voice sound and durable.

ADVANTAGES OF UGLINESS.

Experto crede.—Hor.

Physiognomists regard the face as an indication of the mind; as faulty a criterion as judging the merits of a book from its list of contents, or, as an Oxonian would say, getting-up logic by a St. Clement's analysis.* However, as few persons feel any great trouble on account of their internal organization, I shall waive the subject in favor of some phrenological lecturer; observing, that many who carry 'the form of woe' in their countenance, have 'that which passes show' within, and good liquor is often to be found under an ill-executed sign.

The objections and advantages to which ugliness is liable may be comprised in this,—that the possessor considers himself, or rather is considered by others, as lying under a sort of degradation, and ranks in the same class in a drawing-room with non-freeholders at an election. The ladies smile, but their smiles are not for him. A mirror is suspended over the mantel-piece, but he flies it as a thief in a library does the Newgate Calendar. If he talks of learning, he is sure to be reminded of pedantry; and if he presumes to discourse on elegance, somebody introduces the subject of 'the Pretender.' His soliloquies run on neglected merit, favoured impudence, &c. and his constant axiom is, that the world plays at blind man's buff without ever catching a prize.

Beauty and pride are considered as twins by moralists, but ugliness and haughtiness should seem to be more nearly allied. Whoever saw a person of ordinary features without a flattering opinion of his own merit, and persuaded that it lay concealed only for want of opportunity? Does not every plain woman (if such exist) affect a taste for literature? It would be unpardonable to insinuate the converse.

Having thus shown that beauty and ugliness are morally on a level, I shall now proceed to physical demonstration, according to strict rules of art. Is not, I ask, a flat, regular lawn, with all its artificial varieties of shrubs and flower-pots, the most wearisome thing to look at? But do we not burst into raptures at the sight of a bold irregular outline, with here a hill and there a valley, an oblique view on one side and a dark wood on the other? The connexion may be easily proved:—painting is a copy from nature, and the ladies have long taught us that no difference exists between painting and their faces.

The curve, according to Hogarth, is the line of beauty; of course it applies to the human nose, mouth, and legs. If the oblong be esteemed in architecture, why should not an eye of the same form possess attractions? If a gentle slope is admired, why should a receding forehead be decried? Must the axiom that 'variety is charming,' be withheld from the features alone? And finally, since white is an emblem of purity, ought not a pale face to be coveted for par excellence on every physiognomical principle?

The owner of a pretty face may pique himself on his property, but the lord of an ugly one should glory in his. The chances are that he is the fac-simile of some great character, with whom he may claim relationship;—that he has the wart of Queensberry, the legs of Suett or Stephen Kemble, the voice of Inchbald, or 'the red ray of the warrior's dark eye,' recorded in the 'Poet's Child.'† An honest but ill-favored couple enjoyed a handsome annuity from an eminent painter, to sit for gorgons and devils whenever he was employed on mythological or sacred subjects; and, in barbarous countries, should the royal countenance exhibit an irregularity, the courtiers are bound to provide themselves with copies. 'Wretch,' said a belle of Owyhee to an English sailor, 'you have not a slit in your ear!'

For such as are dissatisfied with their allotment of features, I know but of one remedy,—to persuade themselves that others have erred in their ideas of beauty: if they cannot make converts to their opinion, they have the greater reason for maintaining it. One thing is certain, that no person ever spoke of another as ill-looking, without being convinced that his own face inclined to the contrary. A lady judges of beauty in pictures and statues by their resemblance to herself; and would no doubt be angry were she told that it is but as the rind of an orange, exceedingly pretty to look at, when mere looking is required, but disregarded when we wish to examine into its contents.

A friend of mine lately expressed a serious resolution of leaving off dandyism from motives of economy. What with cosmetics for the face, pomatum for the hair, curling and dyeing fluids for the whiskers, and perfumes for the tout ensemble, to say nothing of a new coat once a fortnight (the average duration of a new fashion), his purse was unable to honour the demands on it. In fact, he considered himself handsome, and therefore bore for a time with all this thralldom. But ugliness is a state of liberty; it despises the hair-dresser, scorns the perfumer, and rebukes the tailor; it dares the cold without any fear for its complexion, and treats the overtures of a rising pimple with a stoical indifference. The miserable cares of beauty, the anxieties of puppyism, are a matter of derision to it. Rich in defects, it entertains no apprehensions of corroding time, and hears philosophers assert that the human form undergoes a complete change in seven years without regret. Finally, it sets off the merit of the possessor, while it secures him from the fate of Narcissus. Had its advantages been sufficiently understood in ancient times, it would have been dubbed a divinity, or a constellation at least. It remains for the moderns to do all that lies in their power,—let them honor, cherish, and covet it.—Museum.

FINE ARTS.

PICTURE OF THE DEATH OF CHATHAM.—Lord Liverpool has bought the picture of the Death of Chatham for 1000 guineas.

WILKIE'S FIRST PAINTING.—It is not generally known that a juvenile painting by our celebrated countryman Wilkie, is in possession of a gentleman of Cupar, who purchased it for ten guineas. It is, perhaps, the first essay of this great master. The brief history of the production is this:—Wilkie, during his pastime from school hours, was ever exercising his creative genius in the rudiments of that art in which he was destined to hold so unrivalled a place; and from the chalking out of any thing, however trivial, that struck his fancy, he at last took for his subject a boy leading a "grey horse to water." This is the painting alluded to. The grey horse was originally sported as a sign-board to a tavern at Holekettle Bridge, latterly as such in Cupar, and finally came into the possession of its present owner. We have seen the painting, and considering the age of its artist (nine), it is really a wonderful performance.—Edinburgh Observer.

GOLD AND SILVER MONEY COINED IN 1822.—Total value of the gold moneys coined from January 1 to December 31, 1822, £5,356,787. 12s. 6d. Total value of the new silver moneys coined from January 1 to December 31, 1822, £31,430. 7s. 1½d.

CURIOUS INVENTION.—Mr. T. George, a clockmaker, of St. George's in the East, London, has lately invented an apparatus, which by the sole agency of a clock, wakes the workmen and lights a candle, at any desired time of the night or morning!!

KING'S ADVOCATE.—Sir Thomas Hope was Advocate to Charles I. Three of his sons being, at the same time, Lords of Session, it was thought indecent that he should plead uncovered before them, which was the origin of the privilege the King's Advocates have ever since enjoyed.

A NICE POINT.—A periodical writer, whose entertaining papers appeared about the middle of the last century, tells of a Lord Mayor's hall that was thrown into great confusion, by a dispute for a precedence between a "Watch-spring-maker's lady, and the wife of a Watch-case-joint-finisher."

BIBLES.—The Bible Society has, throughout the Russian Empire, 54 divisions, in the different governments, and 166 auxiliary societies. The society of Moscow published and distributed, within the two last years, 106,000 copies, in thirty-two languages; and, since its first establishment, in 1813, has printed more than 550,000.

EXTRAORDINARY POST OFFICE.—At the desolate Island of Ascension, in the Atlantic, between Africa and Brazil, there is a peculiar crevice in a large rock, termed The Sailor's Post Office, in which the crews of vessels passing to India, or returning, leave such letters as they wish to send back, and which are punctually taken to their destination by the next ship that passes in a contrary way.

WHITE TEETH.—The famous Sanderson, although completely blind, and who occupied, in so distinguished a manner, the chair of the mathematics in the University of Cambridge, being one day in a large company, remarked of a lady who had left the room, but whom he had never before met, or even heard of, that she had very white teeth. The company were extremely anxious to learn how he had discovered this; for it happened to be true. "I have no reason," said the professor, "to believe that the lady is a fool, and I can think of no other motive for her laughing incessantly, as she did, for a whole hour together."

"THE YOUNG DAUPHIN."—The Quarterly Review states that the Duchess d'Angouleme's Account of Proceedings in the Temple, "contradicts the Report that the Dauphin was poisoned; he was only poisoned, she says, by filth, by harshness, and by cruelty." The Review says, "to this work is added a most curious paper, giving an account of a visit made by a Committee of the Convention to this poor little Prince, a few months before his death. It exhibits the most extraordinary instance of sensibility and firmness in so young a child (he was eight years old when he was first imprisoned) that we have ever met with. Every one knows that the poor child was forced to put his name to a deposition against his mother and his aunt, but we now, for the first time learn, that from the moment he had done so, he never spoke again! He was docile, obedient, and courteous, but he never spoke again! He understood all that was said to him, showed a perfect sense of his situation, and even diverted himself with building houses of cards, and similar quiet amusements, but HE NEVER SPOKE AGAIN!"

SCOTCH AND ENGLISH.—The national precedence between the English and Scotch may be settled by this, that the Scotch are always asserting their superiority over the English, while the English never say a word about their superiority over the Scotch. The first have got together a great number of facts and arguments in their own favour; the last never troubled their heads about the matter, but have taken the point for granted as self-evident.—Hazlitt's "Characteristics."

INDIAN SIMPLICITY.—Captain Franklin, in his interesting Journey to the Polar Sea, gives an amusing instance of the simplicity of the Copper Indians. The old chief had a daughter, who was considered the greatest beauty in the whole tribe, and so much the object of contest among her countrymen, that, although under sixteen years of age, she had successively belonged to two husbands. Mr. Hood drew her portrait, much to the annoyance of her aged mother, who was extremely afraid, she said, that her daughter's beauty would induce the Great Chief who resided in England to send for the original, after seeing the likeness!

THE PERFECT EXQUISITE.—The facetious Mr. Brummell do not furnish a higher specimen of dandyism than the following:—A few days since, one of the most finished fops that ever drove a cabriolet, drew up in the street, and stopping a respectable passer by, this conversation ensued:—"Pray, my good friend, (lisping) what is the name of this place?"—"Piccadilly, Sir."—"No, no, not the street, my good fellow; what is the name of the town?"—"London, Sir," replied the unsuspicious man with a stare. "Oh, ah, so it is; thank ye, friend, I had quite forgot!!!"

PETER THE FIRST AND LEWIS THE FIFTEENTH.—When Peter visited Paris, Lewis was a child, and one day, when they were going out together in state, some difficulties arose in the French Court, how it should be managed that, in getting into the carriage, the little King should take place of the great Emperor. Peter perceived what they were about, and not willing to compromise his imperial dignity, as they were passing through the crowd, between the palace and the coach, he pretended to take compassion on his baby brother, and, to save him from the pressure of the people, fairly took him up in his arms, and conveyed him to the carriage, as a nurse would carry her infant!

A MISER.—Lately died, at Gosberton, Lincolnshire, Mr. Crosby; it is supposed that he has left behind him more than 50,000l., and yet in his life he would hardly allow himself common necessaries. It was his delight to have his apparel always of the meanest kind; a hat at the price of 2s. 6d. was an extravagance. It is said that many persons who did not know him, have given him alms on account of his appearance.—Neither of the Elweses, nor even Dancer himself, could be more squalid, or more penurious in a general way; and yet this man kept a good table as far as beef and bacon went, and was always accessible to any poor man that might call at his house: rich, and what were called "fine men," he detested.

THE TOOTHLESS COMPANY.—A very old gentleman told me that he was once invited to dine with a lady of some distinction at Bath, about his own age, and where he met a party of inmates to the number of eight, the lady herself making one. On sitting down to the table, the seven guests looked at the dinner with some surprise, there being nothing solid to be seen in any one of the dishes; no joint of any sort, but soups, minced meats, stewed vegetables, jellies, syllabubs, creams, &c. This old lady amused herself a short time with witnessing the strange looks of her company, before she explained to them the mystery. She then told them, that, having an exact knowledge of their circumstances, and a sympathetic feeling towards them, she had resolved to make a feast for the whole party, suitable to their condition. That she had reason to know, that, though eight in number, they had not one tooth amongst them all, and she had, therefore, ordered a dinner, upon which they need not bestow a thought upon the lost power of mastication. Such an odd piece of kindness, as the old gentleman told me, kept me laughing so all dinner time, that they found the toothless meal almost as difficult to swallow as if it had consisted of bones.—Heraldic Anomalies.

TOO MUCH OF A GOOD THING.—A certain country squire had a warren, and the village curate was, Sunday after Sunday, regaled with the delicacy of rabbits, till he became so sick of them, that he took the liberty of showing his dislike of the standing dish to the host, in the following Grace, on rising from the table:

"Of Rabbits hot, of Rabbits cold,
Of Rabbits tender, Rabbits tough;
Of Rabbits young, of Rabbits old,
I thank the L-d, we've had enough!"

SINGULAR FASHION.—Of all the extravagance of dress, I think none can well exceed what we read of in Queen Elizabeth's days, and, as we live in times when the same part or parts of the male apparel are none of the smallest, I shall venture to notice it, not with a view to its adoption, but as a hint to our modern dandies, to guard against such extremes; especially, if there should be any amongst our members of Parliament, at the House of Commons, since the union with Ireland, is scarcely roomy enough for the whole body of representatives, even if they were sans culottes. In Queen Elizabeth's days then, Mr. Strutt tells us, they were breeches so large, that there was actually a scaffold erected round the inside of the Parliament-house, for the accommodation of such members as wore those huge breeches. In the next age the custom was revived, and one man was detected of carrying therein, a pair of sheets, two table cloths, ten napkins, four shirts, a brush, a comb, and a nightcap!—Heraldic Anomalies.

THE DRAMA, ETC.

THEATRE ROYAL.—Sheridan's comedy of the Rivals was performed at our theatre on Saturday evening last, and the principal characters sustained by Metropolitan performers.—Mr. Blanchard appeared as Sir Anthony Absolute; Mr. Webb as Sir Lucius O'Trigger; Mr. E. Knight as David; Mr. Meadows as Acres; and Miss Smithson as Lydia Langish.—We have seen the play much better performed, notwithstanding the presence of so much talent.—Mr. Webb's songs were sung with much effect, and several of them were loudly and deservedly encored;—we have no doubt but that his re-appearance this evening, will prove peculiarly gratifying.

MINOR THEATRE.—Madame Searle and Mr. St. Albain have proved a strong attraction at this house during the present week.—The exertions of the manager, for the entertainment of the town, continue unremitting.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. B.'s silence inclines us to think that he has forgotten his promise. Scrutator is at full liberty to refute, censure, or applaud.—We wish to be liberal, and can by no means admit unwarranted animadversion.

Arnold is humorous; but there is an affectation throughout his entire composition.—We would advise him to remodel it. R. P.; Imiah; S. N.; An Enemy to Stays; A Constant Reader; An Admirer of the British Fair,—are received.

ERRATUM.—The thirty-eighth line was omitted in the Poem entitled "Australasia," in our last.—

CLARA'S TOWER.

(From the German of Schiller.)

After many long days of blood and terror, the spring had begun to spread its smiling lustre upon a devastated valley, the unfortunate inhabitants of which, among the evils of war, reckoned as the greatest of all that of being bent under the hand of the conqueror. Nature, in its reanimation, was covering the meadows with flowers and verdure; the sweet notes of the birds were still the same; man alone presented the image of destruction, and breathed nothing but the accents of despair. Every thing in this unhappy country was overturned; the kindly bonds of society were broken, and its scattered members sought in vain to find again the land in which they were born. Among the evils caused by the ravages of this disastrous war, a village had been reduced to ashes; its inhabitants, flying from it with the small portion of their property which they could carry, found an asylum under the hospitable trees of a neighbouring forest, and established themselves there in expectation of more fortunate times.

Nothing was to be seen on the desert which they had inhabited but a heap of ruins and ashes, which, driven by the wind, were stopped at the foot of an insulated tower, the only remaining part of an ancient castle which had just been destroyed, and had involved in its destruction all the hopes of an illustrious family. Close to this tower a heap of earth freshly raised, and surmounted by two black crosses, pointed out the tomb of the brothers, Conrad and Walter, the sons of that family, who had fallen fighting for their honour and their country, and had left destitute of protection a young sister, the last of their race.

She had taken refuge in the tower during the combat in which her brothers had fallen; and, when the tumult of the battle had subsided, and the victors had marched away, this young and delicate maiden, gathering strength from her desperation, had roamed over the field of battle in search of her brothers. She found them lying side by side, pierced with wounds, the last of which seemed to have struck both of them. Accompanied and aided by the village priest, she bore them to the tower, and, having interred them beneath the escutcheons of their ancestors with as much solemnity as the time would permit, she resolved to take up her desolate abode in this tower. With the assistance of Martha, an old servant of her family, an apartment was rendered habitable, and here the winter passed in solitude and in sorrow.

Martha relieved the dull and tedious tenour of the days by legendary stories, of which her memory was full. Sometimes, when, in the course of her relation, she saw her young lady cast her eyes towards a little recess, where was placed the sculptured figure of a veiled woman, she would exclaim, "I beseech you, Madam, do not look there so often; leave that image in peace!" and, when Cunegonda asked any questions respecting it, she always avoided them. But one day, Cunegonda's curiosity being raised, she seriously requested Martha to explain the mystery which was connected with this figure.

"Since you command it," said Martha, in a low and reluctant tone, "I must obey you. Know, then, that that figure conceals a door, since blocked up, which led into a small apartment, where a young lady, named Clara, was buried alive by the order of her father. She was condemned to this punishment for having formed a clandestine marriage with one of her pages. I do not venture to pronounce judgment either upon that brave nobleman or upon his ill-fated daughter; but this is certain, that the name of Clara is often heard to issue from this window: the room is vulgarly called Clara's Cell, and inspires a general terror. I, who cannot help partaking this terror, have seen your establishment here with pain, and would have given all the world if you would have consented to come and live with me at the good forester's house, where you would have been treated as the child of the family."

A slight blush came at these words into Cunegonda's face; however, she kindly replied, "You are wrong, Martha, to trouble yourself about me: far from accusing the destiny which has placed me in such a neighbourhood, I bless that Providence which has made me an object of pity without exposing me to disgrace or shame."

The war in the mean time had carried its ravages to a greater distance, but the foreign dominion destroyed all the means of repairing the evils of its bloody track. The unhappy peasant wandered sullenly and pensively over the uncultivated fields, which offered him no hope of harvest. An accident happened to throw trouble and alarm into the heart of Cunegonda: her old nurse, who did not usually pass one day without coming to see her, had now been absent for several. The anxiety of Cunegonda was no less than her embarrassment: the entire consumption of her few provisions compelled her to think on the means of procuring others, and the only way of doing this was going herself in search of Martha.

Cunegonda proceeded on her journey in some alarm, and, having arrived at the entrance of the forest, seated herself upon a boundary stone, which, partaking of the ruin that surrounded it, had been cast down. Absorbed in the thoughts which filled her bosom, she did not perceive that she had become the object of the attention of several young chasseurs. Astonished at first, but soon emboldened, they approached and surrounded her. One of them drew her from her reverie by a loud laugh: "I thought," said he, "that I saw a statue! but, indeed, I was very much deceived; far from being of stone, you seem to belong to those handsome birds of passage which have spread themselves lately over the country." As he spoke he seated himself unceremoniously by her side, and attempted to draw aside the veil which covered her. Cunegonda, holding it with one hand, repulsed him with the other.

At this moment another chasseur, also very young, and who was sleeping at some distance, rose, and, parting the black clustering ringlets that shaded his forehead, he no sooner observed his unworthy companion, than, raising his fusil, he threatened to shoot him on the spot if he did not desist. He then offered his protection to escort Cunegonda to the forester's, whither she was going, and the experience of the insult to which she had been lately exposed induced her to accept it without hesitation. Nothing could be more striking than the contrast of this young man's appearance with his condition: a proud gait, easy and graceful manners, seemed to pronounce him a person distinguished as well by education as by birth. The more Cunegonda observed, the less could she comprehend that he was really what he appeared. His physiognomy, handsome and imposing, expressed the consciousness of a superior merit; and when, pointing out to Cunegonda the situation of the place to which they were going, he stretched out his hand, his attitude might have spoken him the lord of the country.

The sound of horns was now heard in the distance, and Cunegonda's conductor having announced that they were near the end of their journey, she hoped to see a noble castle appear; but nothing met her sight except a very plain house, of the most common appearance.

"Is the master at home?" asked the young chasseur, to a girl who was working at the door.

"Yes, he is," answered she, as if she was speaking to her equal.

"Master," repeated Cunegonda to herself—"his master."

This single word alone caused all her illusions to vanish, and she felt so violent a sensation that for some instants she could not ask for Martha.

"Ah? is it you, madam?" said the young girl, getting up hastily, and respectfully courtesying several times, while Cunegonda remembered having seen her in the castle garden. The girl then hastened to introduce her to old Martha, who had been afflicted with a paralysis, which had deprived her of her memory for a few days, and her first lucid moment was at the entrance of Cunegonda into her room. "Thank heaven," exclaimed she, "you are here, dear lady, you have forsaken, I hope, that fatal abode; by remaining here you will deliver me from a cruel anxiety."

Cunegonda remembered how often Martha had made this proposal to her. "He is the son of a forester," said she to herself; "he is only the son, if he is not even something less." Her family pride revolted at this idea, and she quickly replied that she had resolved to return. The forester's wife at this moment entered, when Cunegonda requested her to suffer the young girl to attend her in the tower until Martha should have recovered. The good woman agreed, and, upon Cunegonda's departure, escorted her on some part of her journey, in the course of which she informed the young lady, in answer to her question, that the young chasseur was only an assistant of her husband.

After the good woman quitted her, she met, near the devastated village, a troop of gipsies. A child belonging to them, suddenly running up to her, cried in a singular and disagreeable voice, "Give me that flower," meaning a tulip which Cunegonda held, "and you shall have this in exchange." She held out the flower to him, which he took, and put into her hands a rusty iron ring. At the same moment some of the hags cried out to her, "Timid dove, it is in vain that you fly the hunter. He will have your heart—he will have your heart." The others of the troop echoed this sentence, and Cunegonda was almost sinking with terror, when she saw the young chasseur again at her side: "Fear nothing, madam," said he, "I shall remain here until I see you are in safety." With an inclination of the head she entered her solitary tower in tears.

The image of the hunter, far from being effaced by her tears, only appeared to her more interesting and more handsome. "Oh, heaven!" she cried, "am I not then sufficiently reduced? must an unworthy affection degrade my dignity?" Prostrated on the ground, she long implored the divine mercy; but, amongst the ideas which succeeded each other in her mind, the most forcible were those of the unprotected state in which she was—of the impossibility of inhabiting these ruins—and, finally, of the necessity in which she must find herself, on leaving them, to accept the hand and support of a protector.

Cunegonda could not prevent the suggestions of a heart smitten for the first time; but, having still force enough to resist their ascendancy, "No!" exclaimed she, quickly, "thou liest, thou liest! deceitful Clara! the honour of Conrad and Walter shall survive their death, and never will Cunegonda stain their memory. Oh, no! dear brothers, the remembrance of you shall preserve me from this misfortune." And, turning round at these words towards the black crosses, she swore by them to overcome every sentiment unworthy of her birth.

More composed after this vow, she went to bed, and soon slept; but her sleep was agitated by a dreadful dream: she saw seated in the recess of the window a woman covered with a long veil, down to her feet, employed in rubbing on her clothes the iron ring which Cunegonda had received from the gipsy-boy; then, advancing towards the bed, she pointed with the ring, which now shined very brightly, towards the window, and disappeared.

A low moaning and the dull sound of the rain beating against the windows awoke Cunegonda. She waited for the day impatiently, and, still full of terror, at the first rays of the morning she ran to the window to take up the ring which she had laid there the evening before, and as it was wet, she wiped it, till she could read these words inscribed in gold:

"Mystery covers our passion." "The world knows not our vows." "It cannot sever our soft bonds."

"Poor lovers!" said Cunegonda; "Heaven, I hope, has forgiven you, and that over your sufferings, as over mine, its consolation may be extended."

These words, which seemed to her to be inspired, spread in her mind a consolatory balm; she tied the ring with a ribbon, and put it on her neck in remembrance of the lovers; then, taking her work, she eagerly employed herself, often addressing her prayers to Heaven.

At night, however, the same dream came to torment her: the figure appeared to her in the same manner as the night before; it took the ring from the ribbon, and, again pointing to the window, it vanished.

She was awake by the same noise as the evening before, and now heard it still more distinctly. She saw it the third night approach with terror, but, resolved to put an end to such a torment, she determined on obeying the signs of the spectre, if it returned again; and, fortified by prayer and the reflections of a good conscience, she immediately got out of bed after the same dreams and the same noises had waked her, and ran to the window, resolved to follow all the signs which might be made to her. The moon's soft rays covered the earth with a carpet of silver; all was in silence. Cunegonda felt herself reanimated by the beauty of the light, when she saw suddenly two greyhounds leaping upon the bed of tulips, and making some plaintive sounds like those which had several times waked her. The hunter was slowly following them, and appeared to Cunegonda much taller and much more imposing.

"Great God! assist me!" exclaimed she; "every thing here is enchantment!" and then, persuaded that this extraordinary being was the lover of Clara, who was coming to recover his ring, she took it from her neck, and, in an agony of terror, threw it out of the window, exclaiming, "May Heaven have pity on thy soul, and grant thee repose in the arms of thy love." But with these words departed all the strength and courage of Cunegonda, and she fell senseless upon the floor. A burning fever seized her, and during several weeks rendered her insensible to the pains of her mind, and equally to the cares of the forester's wife, who, on her recovery, greeted her with the pleasing intelligence that her countrymen had been victorious in battle, and that peace was restored. Cunegonda greatly rejoiced at this news, the results of which to herself, however, remained as yet uncertain. No fear now disturbed her; the dreadful remembrances were almost effaced; and, seeing peace revisit the beings of this world, she hoped that those of the other were also tranquillized. She was one day surprised, and somewhat frightened, at seeing once more in her garden the two greyhounds, followed by a gentleman in the full uniform of an officer of chasseurs. He passed before the tower, and stopped at it.

At the same instant the sound of warlike music was heard, and, a short time after, a considerable body of chasseurs filed off at a short distance. Their chief had gone before them, but without taking his eyes from Cunegonda's window as long as he could perceive it.

Martha soon came to her, quite heated, and exclaimed, in opening the door, "Ah, madam! who could have thought it? This unknown chasseur, concealed so long in the house of the forester, insignificant as he then seemed, turns out to be a great nobleman; he has charged me to present to you the respects of Herman de Hausen, the companion in arms of your dear brothers. Their good souls have slept long since, but he has arrived safe and sound, and has crossed the forest this morning with his regiment. He has stopped at our house, and has sent me to you. He says that you know him, and, as a proof, he sent this ring with this ribbon. There are some fine words on it, which I cannot read."

While she was speaking the young colonel appeared, and, advancing towards Cunegonda, and taking the hand in which she still held the ring, "Madam," said he to her, "we are acquainted with each other through those who were my brothers as well as yours: you inspired me at first sight with a passionate, but painful, admiration. Misfortunes had made us related; but the despotism which then held us enslaved, and the indignation I felt at it, hindered me from expressing my sentiments. As my arms had then the happiness of protecting you, deign to make it the support of your future life."

Cunegonda felt embarrassed, but she did not hesitate; her inclination accorded to the promises made to Conrad and Walter. Her looks were mechanically directed towards the figure of Clara, which the rays of the sun seemed to crown with a rainbow. The ring was in the hands of the colonel—he left it there; and, in giving heart to the noble warrior, she abandoned to him with confidence the care of her future happiness.

Thus ended the dreams, and thus were the enigmas explained. The happy days of peace came to repair all past evils; the village and castle were rebuilt, and, when Martha came to congratulate the happy bride, she received from her a comfortable dwelling for the rest of her life. The colonel laid aside his arms: Cunegonda passed with him many happy days, and transmitted to a numerous posterity the lustre of her virtues.

TO A REDBREAST.

On hearing it sing one fine evening.

Hail, happy songster! that with glee
Perch'd in the adjacent meadow tree
Chantest thy grateful melody

In evening's ear:
Thou sing'st from care and sorrow free,
Nor ill dost fear.

The clouds all gold and crimson blending
In splendour o'er that sky extending,
Where Sol in glorious blaze descending
Lights up the main;
Inspire you while to Heaven you're sending
Your pleasing strain.

Beneath this elm's overshadowing boughs,
Your song I'll listen to its close;
That while your strain melodious flows,
My weary breast
Forgetting all its heart hid woes
Awhile may rest.

I love to hear you, Robin, sing,
When Nature first awakes in Spring,
In Summer-morn's when vales ring
With minstrel glee:
Or evening, perch'd with flitting wing,
In some old tree.

When snugly housed the ripened corn
And Phoebus' rays oblique adorn
The Winter-verging Autumn morn
And th' hour of Night
In dew dissolves upon each thorn,
All glittering bright.

Then sweet your cheerful songs to hear
Our gardens whistled in, or near;
Or when on chimney-tops, to cheer
You sing on high;
Reminding us that Winter drear
Approaches nigh.

The wilds where late you'd sweetly roam,
Grown cheerless, you reluctant come
To shelter 'neath the humble dome
Of cot or shed,
And careful watch to peck each crumb
Of scatter'd bread.

But first with cautious look and shy,
Around our dwellings oft you fly:
Sweet bird wouldst thou our friendship try,
Come, venture in;
Thy meek soft glancing timid eye
All hearts will win.

Come shelter in our cottage warm,
We'll shield thee from the wintry storm,
Our prattling children's hearts 'twill charm
When they are told
What Redbreasts did for babes perform
In days of old.

And when again sweet Spring we view,
Paint Nature's storm-beat scenes anew,
Then, Ruddock, farewell then to you;
Far far away
You'll wing, and with glad choir renew
Your vernal lay.

In woods and groves harmonious ringing,
While flowers are on the green earth springing,
Back all the sweet emotions bringing,
Of early days:
With charms around our hearts still clinging,
Sweet as your lays.

So when life's cheerful day is fading,
Its evening shades around us spreading,
When Age, of which there's no erasing,
The drear approach;
And death our citadel invading,
On us encroach.

Safe through the wintry storms of time
May he who spread those heavens sublime,
Still shield, and teach our souls to climb
Heaven's Umbra's light,
To join the choir in that fair clime
Of pure delight.

Where golden harps for ever sounding,
In mansions of Jehovah's founding,
And joys felicitous abounding,
The soul engage;
While vast eternity is rounding
In endless age.

KIBITZ.

(From popular Tales and Romances of the Northern Nations.)

There was once a poor peasant named Kibitz, who, though but little favoured by fortune, enjoyed nevertheless more contentment and satisfaction than many of his neighbours; his chief maxim was to make the best that he could of every thing; and, if affairs proceeded untowardly, to hope that they might take a turn for the better, without vexing himself unnecessarily. One day, as he was ploughing his little field with his two oxen, he thought that he heard some one call him, and, looking round, perceived that it was a bird which repeated his name several times; it being the Kibitz, or pewee, whose cry resembles the sound of its own name. The simple clown, conceiving that the bird was mocking him, felt provoked, spite of his usual good-nature, and took up a heavy stone to fling at it; the bird, however, flew away, very leisurely, while the stone falling, unluckily, upon one of his oxen, killed it on the spot. This was a terrible misfortune for Kibitz; yet there was no means of restoring the dead animal to life, so thinking that its yoke-fellow would be but of little service by itself, he, without more ado, killed the other also, then flaying them both, carried the hides to a tanner, in order to make thereby some little trifle in return for the heavy loss he had sustained.

When he arrived at the tanner's, finding that so one seemed very anxious to answer his knocking, he peeped in through a casement, and perceived that the poor man's wife was cramming a gullant into a chest, in order to conceal him from her unwelcome visitor. Master Kibitz was not altogether so displeased at this scene, as the tanner himself would have been, for he shrewdly thought that he might turn it to his own advantage. In a little while the dame opened the door, and, bearing his errand, informed him that her husband was absent, and that she could not transact the business on which he was come. Kibitz said that she need not refuse him, for though she had no money, yet he would be contented with that old lumber-chest which stood in one corner, and it would be an excellent bargain for her. To this proposal the dame demurred, as may well be supposed: Kibitz insisted upon having it, saying, that it was the best bargain she could possibly make, while she as resolutely refused to comply; for it is in vain to offer the most advantageous bargains in the world, if people are so blind to their own interests as to refuse them. In short, they quarrelled so loud and so long about the matter, that the tanner himself returned, in the midst of the affray, and so settled the dispute by insisting upon his wife's complying with their customer's whim, and letting him have the old worm-eaten chest; heartily glad to obtain the two hides so cheaply, and at the same time considering Kibitz to be a very great blockhead. The latter, therefore, obtained his wish, in spite of the good wife's objections and opposition, and boasting his prize into a cart which he had brought with him, drove off towards his home. He had not proceeded far, however, before the inhabitant of the chest, who conceived himself not to be included in the purchase, took care to let him know that he was carrying away more than he had any right to, and to entreat, therefore, that he would let him out. This, however, was a proposal to which Kibitz was but little disposed to accede; he set about proving formally, according to the best logic he was master of, that in purchasing the chest, he had also perched him. The gallant finding himself driven to extremity, and thinking it hopeless, immersed as he was, and with very little breath to waste upon words, to think of refuting an adversary who could give his lungs full play, fairly surrendered at discretion, and was permitted to march out, upon giving up all his valuables and money. As it so happened, the latter was a very considerable sum, sufficient to purchase several pairs of oxen, instead of those which the countryman had lost.

Kibitz now returned home quite rich; and his neighbours being informed of the excellent bargain he had made by his hides, killed their oxen also, and took their skins to the same tanner. But, instead of obtaining as much as they expected, they were informed that Kibitz had gotten only an old beast, hardly worth a single hide. Heronupon supposing that they had been maliciously imposed upon by him, in order that they might be induced to kill their cattle, they determined upon putting so envious a fellow to death. Fortunately, our good Kibitz received some information of their designs: for a long time he was puzzled in contriving some stratagem whereby to defeat their murderous intent; and, at length, conceiving that his poor wife would be quite inconsolable at being left a widow, he generously resolved to spare her this exceeding affliction. He told her, therefore, that he had a mind, by way of frolic, to let her wear the breeches for once in her life; and, accordingly, ordered her to dress in his clothes, and go and work in the garden. Like an obedient spouse, accustomed to humour all her lord's whims, however extravagant they might be, the poor woman complied. The wicked neighbours shortly after came, and finding her digging in the garden, they fell upon her and put her to death; then immediately fled, satisfied that they had revenged themselves on Kibitz.

Our friend Kibitz, in the mean while, was too overjoyed at the singular success of his stratagem, to have much time to bewail his wife. On the contrary, he thought that she might even yet prove of some service to him; he therefore took her, and having dressed her in her ordinary attire, put a basket of flowers in her hand, and seated her by the road side, as if she were offering nosegays for sale. Presently a stately equipage passed by, and the lady who was in the carriage, being smitten with the beauty of the flowers, ordered one of her lacquies to inquire the price. This he did several times, but receiving no answer, and, therefore, supposing she was asleep, he shook her somewhat rudely, in order to wake her. Instantly she fell down into a deep ditch, Kibitz having taken care to place her in a ticklish situation; and he, being on the watch, now rushed out upon the fellow, exclaiming, that he had killed his wife, and protesting that he would accuse all of them of murder. The lady, alarmed at the accident, and the unpleasant circumstances in which she might be involved, offered, by way of pacifying him, to give all the money she had about her, and also a fine horse, upon which a groom was mounted. Kibitz protested that he had lost the best wife in the world, yet he was far from bearing malice, seeing that the lady was heartily sorry for what had happened, and would therefore comply with her request, out of pure good nature. So lifting his pockets, and mounting on his steed, Kibitz set off home, well pleased with his own prudence and ingenuity.

As he passed through the village, every one looked at to see who it should be mounted on so fine a horse, at how great was their astonishment, at perceiving that it was Kibitz, whom they thought they had fairly killed. But though at first somewhat alarmed, conceiving it to be his spirit, on finding that it was really himself, they determined to get rid of him at all events; and, in order to do so the more effectually, seized hold of him, and shut him up in a large cask, in which they resolved to throw him into the sea. All now seemed to be over with poor Kibitz. His good fortune appeared quite at an end; chance and good luck, however, often effect escapes that prudence cannot conceive. The stars had decreed that Kibitz should be prosperous.

It so chanced, that in their way to the sea they passed by an ale-house, and considering that Kibitz could hardly run away while imprisoned in the cask, they left it standing in the road, while they went in to fresh themselves with a draught. No sooner did Kibitz find himself alone than he began to consider how he might best avail of those few precious moments, in order to regain his freedom. At almost the very same instant, he heard a flock of sheep pass by; upon which he began to cry out "I will not be chosen burgo-master. I am determined not to be a burgo-master." The shepherd, astonished at his exclamation, went up to the cask and questioned him as to the cause of his being there. "Friend," replied Kibitz, "according to an ancient and singular custom of our town, whoever is chosen burgo-master, is borne in procession by the inhabitants of our town, in this cask. I am appointed to this honour; but am by no means ambitious of it."—"How!" exclaimed the shepherd with astonishment, "are you in earnest, when you say that you do not wish for the honour? I would then that it were some other person's good-luck to be chosen burgo-master."—"Well, then, my honest fellow, do but let me out of this cask, and take my place as quickly as you please." This was no sooner said than done: and Kibitz being extricated himself, inclosed the ambitious clown in his new shell, in which he was to be hatched into a burgo-master; then thinking that the poor sheep would be at a loss for want of a master, or if left there, might fall into worse hands than his own, he determined at once to drive them home.

On returning from the tavern, the boors began to roll the cask on again, in spite of the cries of the unfortunate shepherd; and, at length, fairly plunged it into the water.

Satisfied that they had now got for ever rid of Kibitz, they were returning very leisurely to the village, but how extreme was their surprise, on suddenly meeting him, not only quite safe and sound, but driving a fine flock of sheep.

"Is it possible, Kibitz, that it is you?" exclaimed they altogether, concealing their vexation as well as they could.

"Aye, even so, my kind and worthy neighbours. I perceive your astonishment; you are doubtless much surprised to see these sheep, but I will explain the whole business. You noticed the white foaming spray when you plunged me into the water? Now you must understand, that there is a little enchantment in the case, for—thanks to the violence with which you soured me in, the cask broke, and at my catching at the foam, it turned to sheep, and very fine sheep they are—many thanks, therefore, to you; and to prove to you my gratitude, I would advise you, one and all, to enrich yourselves in the same manner."

No sooner had they heard this, than each determined forthwith, to make the experiment, after having before them such a convincing proof of its success. Away, they scampered back to the water: the foremost jumped in at once, the others directly after him: but, although they made foam and froth enough with their plunging about, no sheep appeared; on the contrary, they baffled each other about in the water at such a rate, that they were all drowned. Thus did Kibitz safely rid himself of all his envious neighbours at once, and thereby render himself master of the whole village.

THE FAITHFUL SERVANT.

(From the French of D'Arnaud.)

SELF-INTEREST has so manifest a power over man, that we can hardly refrain from astonishment, when we see Virtue triumph over it: we cannot be familiarized with such great sacrifices; he who can forget and immolate himself for another, is assuredly worthy of the highest praise.

Pertharit, king of the Lombards, had experienced vicissitudes of fortune; Grimoald, a fortunate usurper, (for success often attends crimes supported by force and audacity) had taken possession of his throne, and retained him in a kind of captivity; at least all the movements of the unfortunate Sovereign were watched, and the moment was at hand, when the raviisher of his crown was going to consummate his outrageous enterprise, by putting an end to Pertharit's existence.

Unulph, attached to the service of Pertharit, had shown this prince a fidelity independent of events: he hastens to see his master, who had just retired to rest, after having partaken of a repast with the few friends, who, he flattered himself, were still left to him.—He exclaims; Sire, you are undone. The traitor Grimoald has only displayed a false generosity, while he seemed to ease your chains, for this palace is now your prison: know, it is surrounded by soldiers, they are plotting some project, the execution of which will be fatal to you. I am come to save you:—my cares have provided what you may want. Disguise yourself in this slave's dress, which I have been able to conceal under my own vestments, and give yourself up to my zeal:—(Pertharit was going to interrogate him) Sire, this is not the moment to satisfy your curiosity; deign only to attend to your evasion, and—hasten to depart; there is no time to lose.

The monarch puts on the garb which is presented to him; Unulph loads him with household goods, and makes him walk before him, chiding him for his unskilfulness: to make his stratagem the more secure, he adds blows to his reproaches; the deceived guards suffer him to leave the palace; the faithful servant conducts Pertharit to a place where some friends were waiting for him; he descends the ramparts by a rope, mounts a horse, takes the road to Turin, and speedily reaches the frontiers of France, which, at all times, has been the asylum of unfortunate Sovereigns.

Unulph had not been able to follow the feigned slave in his flight: he feared with reason that he would be much more observed than the Prince, concealed under an obscure disguise: the least indiscretion would have been fatal to his enterprise: he retraces his steps, returns to the palace, and shuts himself up in the apartment of Pertharit. Grimoald intended this very night to make an attempt on the Prince's life: he orders him to be brought before him: the guards run, loudly knock at the door, and demand it to be opened. Unulph calmly satisfies them: they enter with impetuosity, fly to the bed of Pertharit, and not finding him there, address the courageous servant: By what chance is not your master here? Discover us the place of his concealment?—Unulph merely answers: Conduct me to Grimoald!—These vile instruments of crime, enraged at seeing their prey escaped, load Unulph with chains, and drag him, in that state, to the feet of the usurper: they relate to him what has happened. How! said Grimoald, has Pertharit escaped from hence? Yes, replies Unulph boldly, and without changing his countenance, he is even now removed from all perils, I was informed of the fate which you prepared him: I immediately went to acquaint him with the storm which threatened him. In a word, I have fulfilled my duty, I have saved my master.—If you think that I am guilty, that I have merited death, pronounce the sentence; I await it. Grimoald is amazed, overwhelmed with this excess of virtue and firmness: Turning himself towards his courtiers, he says: in what manner, do you think, ought I to treat this man? they all instantly reply:—Let him die, O King; let the last drop of his blood be shed by the hands to which you will entrust the care of his punishment! My opinion differs from yours, (says Grimoald) Unulph, you merit a reward rather than death; yes, accept the recompence of your fidelity: remain with me; be as much attached to me as you have been to Pertharit, I will lavish my favours on you, I will enrich you, I will raise you to the summit of human greatness. Unulph, bathed in tears, throws himself at the feet of Grimoald, embraces them, and says; Most gracious King, you will deign to crown these generous proceedings; you will permit me to rejoin my master; he is unfortunate, he is in need of consolation: it is when they are in misery that Princes feel the necessity of being loved; and never was my Sovereign dearer to me than now! I would rather live with him, exposed to all the trials of indigence, than be on the steps of your throne, and enjoy there your most distinguished favours. Grimoald could not conceal his emotion:—I cannot help (exclaimed he) envying the fate of Pertharit, since in his distress he still possesses so faithful a servant! Return then to him, take all that belongs to you: I add to it my bounties and my esteem: (addressing his courtiers) What power has virtue upon the heart, and how difficult is it to resist it!

MARRIED MEN.

I sincerely congratulate Paul Pry on the domestic felicity he experiences in the thrice happy state of Wedlock, and have no doubt he speaks the language and enjoys the feelings of numbers in this our populous town, as well as in every city, town, village and hamlet, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain. No one under heaven would be less willing to cast the slightest shade over the brilliant picture of human felicity he has painted in such glowing colours. The snug parlour, clean hearth, and buzzing tea kettle; the loving wife and prattling children, are comforts and delights scarcely enjoyed any where, so really, as in an Englishman's dulce domum. Yet it appears to me a little queer, that, possessing all these envied blessings, such numbers of married folk should quit their paradise of pleasure, to smoke their evening segar, and tippie cobblers' punch in hotels, taverns, &c. I often, as a Bachelor, read the papers, and take my glass in such places of nocturnal rendezvous; and I scarcely ever remember to have met a dozen associates, but at the least two thirds were married men. If, when sitting in the corner of a news room, cogitating on my own forlorn condition; no happy home, no kind wife, and sighing, "Hail wedded love," I have happened to cast my eyes on one of those should be happy beings, he has appeared to me as another Adam, expelled paradise for tasting forbidden fruit—many a time and oft have I helped to swallow oceans of wine, as Paul has it, at Ned or Tom's expense; but, a Bachelor there, has been as much a rara avis, as at any other assembly of general amusement. Oft have I cracked the midnight bottle with as jovial a set of spouses, as ever called for a cup of sack with Prince Hall and Sir John, at the Boar's Head in Eastcheap; aye and with as rubicund phizzes as the one which o'er-top'd the shoulders of friend Bardolph. If bachelors must be taxed for their mistaken ideas of enjoyment, heavy indeed should the penalty fall on the heads of those who forsake the reality. Was I a member of a club of bachelors, I would hail the visit of a married man with as cordial a welcome, as I am often received with, at many a happy domestic fire side, and think him a wise man for occasionally indulging in the charms of variety; but to be the constant frequenter of evening revels, as so many are,—this I own puzzles a bachelor's philosophy.

Spare me the room, once more to congratulate Paul Pry and every other married man, who has acquired his sentiments and participates in his feelings, who possesses the taste and judgment to appreciate the opportunity a wedded state has given him, in the social converse of that amiable sex, by nature so well qualified, and by inclination so well disposed to render the abode of man a scene of felicity unequalled on earth, excelled only in heaven.

SOUTHPORT.

THERE is no enjoyment—no pleasure that will bear the scrutiny of reflection, unless it be accompanied with the necessary attendant economy. It is this little ingredient thrown amidst the mixture of our delights, which gives it the sweetest of flavours,—it overpowers the poison of excess, and is the only comforter when time and money are passed away. I love to see those around me happy—there is nothing gives me greater delight, than to view, and even to associate with my children in their innocent amusements:—to see their happy thoughtlessness, lost to every care in their joyous revelry. To muse upon the rising growth of disposition and character which is so visible in every look and action. Frequently have I placed in the hands of an unthinking youth an unexpected penny, merely to note the sudden effect it would have upon his mind,—what a source of delight—it is the sudden transition from poverty to wealth, and he is happy. What a world this world would be, what a second paradise, if we all were thus to act towards each other; and what a reflection, that when happiness may be given to our neighbours with so little injury to ourselves, it is not more frequently put into practice. Recreation is necessary. Surely we are not to be condemned for taking advantage of those pleasures, which are sent here as it would seem, purposely for our enjoyment—it is not the use, but the abuse of an amusement which renders it criminal in the sight of heaven. I cannot here help admiring the custom now becoming so prevalent, in all parts of England, of retiring a few weeks from the cares of business, to the quietude of the sea side. Southport has lately become a place of great resort; it has risen from the barren heath, and plains of sand, with here and there a straggling fisherman's hut, to a neat and elegant watering place. The sea is very open, the horizon extending in view more than two miles along the coast. I have spent many happy hours here, far from the noise, the bustle, and smoke of Manchester,—walking upon the shore and watching the adventurous little bark, loaded with light hearts, and smiling faces, dance upon the glassy ocean;—catching the light breezes that came floating past upon the wings of health. Mounting the highest pinnacle of land to view the departing glories of the sun, riding down hills of gold, into the silvered bosom of the water, shedding his last rays around him, like a faithful friend who leaves us with regret. Again turning to the animated scene upon the shore—the invalid bending under the pressure of disease, leaning upon the arm of a wife, a husband, or friend. The emaciated form, the pallid cheek, the languid eye, the listless gaze on all around as though the soul had found already a world, before, unknown. The lover with his smiling brow, and active form, lost to the world and the world's cares in the delightful conversation of his mistress, who leaning upon his arm is overwhelming him with a thousand little histories, which had taken place in her last week's loneliness. She had often thought of him—sleeping or waking his image was continually before her. Several beaux had been offering their kind services, but all were rejected. She had anxiously expected his arrival, and had been twenty times to meet him. Did not he think she looked much better, for her stay—she had experienced many narrow escapes in sailing, and a thousand other such pretty questions and answers equally interesting. The husband and wife too are there, with half a dozen smiling cherubs round them, all busily employed, producing to their seemingly astonished and really delighted father, the wonders of Southport, and its "vasty deep," discovered in their various peregrinations, one little urchin placing a shell to his ear, bids him listen to the roar of the ocean, another is pulling the skirt of his coat to attract his attention to a poor star-fish, which the treacherous waves have left behind, a third comes mounted on a poney hired at sixpence an hour, and is anxious to shew papa how able he is to gallop away his money or to manage a nag if he would but purchase one. He must have the eyes of Argus to pay attention to them all. I could dwell upon this scene for ever, and frequently have I sat until the absence of my performers has told me the farce was over—and that twilight with all its dream of happiness had passed away. I had one evening gazed so long upon the retiring glory of the day, that I felt completely abstracted from the scene before me, and lost in the bewildering thoughts of days long past, I did not wake from my reverie until night had advanced, and the silvery light of the moon stealing her silent course over cities, nations, and worlds, gave to the calm ocean a brilliancy of the most enchanting appearance. Not a breath was stirring, not a sound was heard except the slow and feeble rising of the surge. Peeping however from the horizon I beheld a small black cloud—but as a speck upon the vast expanse of ethereal blue. It advanced however and every moment gave it power—a light breeze came murmuring over the waters, as a child waking from a placid slumber, the cloud expanded and mingling with others, carried darkness with it. The voice of the wind became louder, the sea moaned as if in anger at being disturbed, then rose in vengeance, dashed and foamed and belloved forth in rage,—the lightning flashed; the thunder rolled in awful discord, the sea birds screamed—all was changed to seeming madness and despair. At length, by the aid of an occasional lengthened flash of lightning, I beheld a poor vessel, and her wretched crew, buffeting against the strife of ocean. Now riding aloft upon the white foam of the waves, then hurled as if for ever, into the yawning gulph beneath—the signal gun was fired, but from the dread of the innumerable sand banks around, no one durst venture to their assistance. All was hopeless, and I hastened home from the horror of the scene. In the morning awaking early I strolled to the beach and there beheld, the remains alone of the poor vessel—she had sunk, and none lived to tell the story of their misfortunes—all perished. Fathers and sons, all had sunk, and many a heavy heart followed that night.

PAUL PRY.

LUIGI, THE HONEST LACQUEY.

He who is on his travels and loves ease,
Ease and companionship, should hire a lacquey.
Such as thou wert, Luigi. Thee I found,
Playing at Mora on the cabin-roof
With Pulcinella—crying, as in anger,
"Tre! Quattro! Cinque!"—'Tis a game to strike

Fire from the coldest heart. What then from thine?
 And, ere the twentieth throw, I had resolved,
 Won by thy looks. Thou wert an honest lad;
 Wert generous, grateful, not without ambition.
 Had it depended on thy will and pleasure,
 Thou wouldst have numbered in thy family
 At least six Doges and twelve Procurators.
 But that was not to be. In thee I saw
 The last of a long line of Carbonari,
 Who in their forests, for three hundred years,
 Had lived and laboured, cutting, charring wood;
 Discovering where they were, to those astray,
 By the re-echoing stroke, the crash, the fall,
 Or the blue wreath that travelled slowly up
 Into the sky. Thy nobler destinies
 Led thee away to jostle in the crowd;
 And there I found thee—by thy own prescription,
 Crossing the sea to try once more a change
 Of air and diet, landing, and as gaily,
 Near the Dogana—on the Great Canal,
 As tho' thou knewest where to dine and sleep.

First didst thou practise patience in Bologna,
 Serving behind a cardinal's gouty chair,
 Laughing at jests that were no laughing matter;
 Then teach the Art to others in Ferrara—
 At the Three Moors—as Guide, as Cicerone—
 Dealing out largely in exchange for pence
 Thy scraps of knowledge—thru' the grassy street
 Leading, explaining—pointing to the bars
 Of Theseus' dungeon, and the Latin verse,
 Graven in the stone, that yet denotes the door
 Of Ariosto.

Many a year is gone
 Since on the Rhine we parted; yet, methinks,
 I can recall thee to the life, Luigi!
 In our long journey ever by my side,
 O'er rough and smooth, o'er apennine, maremma;
 Thy locks jet-black, and clustering round a face
 Open as day and full of manly daring.
 Thou hadst a hand, a heart for all that came,
 Herdsman or pedlar, monk or muleteer;
 And few there were that met thee not with smiles.
 Misad passed o'er thee like a summer-cloud.
 Cares thou hadst none; and they who stood to hear thee
 Cast the infection and forgot their own.
 Nature conceived thee in her merriest mood,
 Her happiest—hot a speck was in the sky;
 And at thy birth the cricket chirped, Luigi,
 Thine a perpetual voice—at every turn
 A lullum to the echo. In a clime,
 Where all the world was gay, thou wert the gayest,
 And, like a babe, hushed only by thy slumbers;
 Up hill and down, morning and noon and night,
 Singing or talking; singing to thyself
 When none gave ear, but to the listener talking.

E. ROSSA.

TO MARY.

The following sweet lines (says the Literary Gazette) are by the Author of the Duke of Mantua, a Tragedy.]

When first I knew thee, still too dear,
 I fondly loved thee too;
 Apparent worth, a heart sincere,
 Made me believe thee true—Mary.

Each cheering smile thy cheek had worn,
 Then linger'd but for me;
 But now the mask's thrown off, I scorn
 To waste one thought on thee,—Mary.

Thine image once came o'er my heart
 Like sunshine mid the storm;
 But now its light must hence depart,
 That beam no more can warm,—Mary.

No more thy smile around me plays,
 And darkness turns to light,
 As soon might you dull meteor-blaze
 Dispel the gloom of night,—Mary.

That rosy smile, to others given,
 My heart esteems no more;
 Its hue, pure as the blush of heaven,
 No power can e'er restore,—Mary.

It falls upon my withered breast,
 But cannot cheer it now;
 The fondest love we once confess'd,
 Now leaves no quickening glow,—Mary.

And yet as bright, as sunny still,
 Those smiles break o'er the soul;
 But, oh! 'tis darkness visible,—
 They round my bosom roll,—Mary.

Passion's wild burst—the stormy brow,
 Their wrath I'd sooner brave,
 Than sunny smiles that mock my woe,
 Like flowers that deck the grave,—Mary.

Oh, hadst thou still to me been true,
 As once thy lips confess'd,
 No power had torn—as now I do—
 Thine image from my breast,—Mary.

But thou art false—inconstant thou—
 The rest I need not tell;
 Another's arms await me now—
 For ever fare thee well,—Mary.

DIGESTION.

(From the French.)

There are differently constituted stomachs in this world. Peter will eat five pounds of veal at his dinner, and dance after it as if he had eaten nothing; Dorlis can hardly get through a cutlet. Peter is a mason, whose labour sharpens his appetite, and who would even digest stones if it were necessary; Dorlis is a young fop, who is never hungry, and who thinks even exercise a labor. The former earns 20 sous a day; the latter has 20,000 francs a year. Which of the two is the most happy?

'Happy is he who digests!' said the Epicurean, on seeing a table loaded with dainties. Digestion is the pivot on which all the affairs of life turn. I would say to a person who solicited an audience from an excellency, 'Ascertain, beforehand, from the valet de chambre, if his excellency has had a good digestion.' A man who does not digest well, is always ill-tempered. There is a re-action of the stomach on the brain. I am sorry, for the honor of human nature, that it is so; but when Pride says 'no,' Hippocrates and Galen says 'yes.'

The digestive art may be applied to the social system; it is not sufficient for an ambitious man, or a parasite, to do honor to the table to which he is admitted; he must know how to digest the folly and impertinence which are too often placed between a hare and a macaroni. Admire the meat and praise the cook of your Amphitryon, but applaud also his words and his nonsense; say that they are seasoned with the true Attic salt; in short, swallow and digest the whole Amphitryon, however gross he may be, and you will be all the better for it.

Descartes said, 'I think, therefore I exist.' 'Descartes was a fool,' says the financier, (who has been twenty times a bankrupt with profit, and who has the appetite of the devil, with half a million of revenue,) 'I digest, and therefore I exist.' Ask an Englishman why he is so soon disgusted with life! he replies, because he so soon loses his appetite. There would be few suicides in England if appetite and digestion were more constant companions. The doctrine of Harpagon would not succeed in that country.

FAMILY MUSIC.

Hark! Italy's music
 Melts over the sea,
 Falling light from some lattice
 Where cavaliers be.

Amongst other improvements of this improving age, is that which has been made amongst us in the way of music. 'Twenty years ago,' sighs our old grandfather, 'who would have thought of second-hand pianos being as numerous in the market as old coats!' And yet so it is. All our young ladies, now-a-days, are decidedly musical, and so many hours of the day are set apart for the dear creatures to practise their pieces. We are not going to enter into the question of policy, or even to repeat what rather elderly and old-fashioned mothers say about 'things that may be useful'—'learning to make a pie, or mend a hole in a stocking'—'very well if they have fortunes'—'teach them to be good wives,' &c. &c. Times have certainly changed, and nothing more can be said about this side of the question; that is, provided we wish to be on good terms with all sorts of readers.

We profess ourselves to be devotedly fond of music, properly so called; and therefore the more readily complain of an evil connected with it. Being in the state of 'single-blessedness,' it is often our good fortune to receive the friendly and social summons to the table of a friend; that is, or rather used to be, a matter of high delight to us, because we are really never so happy as when we make one in a pleasant party. Nor do we complain of a regular, set, musical meeting; somewhat dull at times, to be sure, but then there are generally a few fair performers, whose skill redeems the discordant sins of their companions: on these occasions we have certainly a plentiful sprinkling of musical affection, but altogether it is tolerable. We come, then to the evil.

So great is the increase of pianos, that we literally cannot visit a friend without finding some of his family at the instrument; and as the little ones are so interesting, of course you hear all their best pieces, and have to pass judgment on their advancement. It was only the other night we thought to pass a quiet hour or two, and we were fairly stunned with the strumming treat served up for us. There were five young ladies, all in regular gradation of height, except one, who was very tall for her age; the papa and mama, an uncle, two cousins, Mr. Treacle the grocer, and ourselves. Scarcely had we done with the cups which 'cheer, but not inebriate,' when the festival commenced. Miss began, and really gave us a very fair specimen of her taste and execution during about half an hour. Nobody felt tired, and Mr. Treacle was awake. Poor man! they did not suffer him to remain so long, for Miss Julia began to play, and added a little of her own vocal music. This was too much; an hour had passed away since the treat began, and not twenty words had been uttered, save such sentences as these—'thank you, ladies'—'very much improved'—and 'quite scientific,' from one of the cousins, who blows the flute. Mr. Treacle's opinion was required; not five minutes before he whispered us that he was fatigued; he heard not the mother's question on her daughter's play, for he was sleeping. We really envied him the quiet of his nap, and trod on his toe with great reluctance. 'Mr. Treacle is not fond of music, I fear,' quoth my lady. Our charity prompted a feeling reply—'Perhaps, madam, he is indisposed to' and then the two younger girls played their lessons together. 'Angels ever bright and fair' followed; and when the dear vocalists repeated 'Take, O take me to your care,' Mr. Treacle drew up his right leg and snored. Happy man, thought we, thus to escape so much harmonious misery! It was evident, however, that this snore was not exactly relished, so we trod again on Mr. Treacle's toe, when, gathering together his left leg, he rubbed his eyes and looked about him. He ought not to have apologised; the fault was on the other side, in sending a man to sleep against his will, before his proper bed-time. From that moment our respect increased for the grocer, who has doubtless been accustomed to express his feelings plainly, or he would have possessed more self-command than to sleep at such a luckless hour. We felt obliged to him, likewise, on another score—his nasal accompaniment finished the treat, and this was a great relief to most of us.

Nor is the musical evil confined to the metropolis; a man must travel a long time to be free from the domestic influence of piano fortes. The old woman was very right when she said, 'There's reason in roasting eggs'; and mothers, though they may be allowed a good share of fondness and vanity for their children's acquisitions, should remember that strangers judge by other rules and hear with other ears. Custom, we know, familiarizes us even to discord; and, as is observed by an old favorite of ours—

Smiths, millers, pewterers, forgers, and armorers, could never be able to live in the perpetual noise of their own trades, did it strike their ears with the same violence that it does ours.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE ABBÉ M'QUIN.

On Thursday, the 17th instant, died the Rev. the Abbé A. Dennis M'Quin, aged 67 years.

This gentleman, of Scotch ancestry, was born in France, and at the time of the revolution resided at Metz, where he edited a Journal in which he supported the royal cause, and thereby so much incensed the opposite party against himself and relatives, that he was compelled to seek safety by flight; which he only effected through a favour of a disguise. On his way through the town of Meaux, and for some miles on the road, he had the horror of seeing his name written on the walls with human blood; so much were that defamed party infuriated against him for the side he had taken in the Metz Journal. He was fortunate enough, however, to arrive in safety in this country; but the whole of his property fell a prey to the wretched faction of the times; and he who so lately enjoyed all the happiness of life, now found himself a wandering mendicant in a strange land;—an Abbé and a man of property, compelled literally to beg for an existence. What an epoch in the history of human life—what an instance of the mutability of fortune! The heart revels at the idea, and is amazed how any race calling themselves a civilized people, could so far outrage justice and humanity, as to commit such barbarities as would disgrace the most savage tribes of the earth. But these days are past; let us hope never more to return.

To add to the sufferings of the unfortunate Abbé, he had the horror to learn that every relative he possessed had fallen sacrifices to the inhuman butchers who deluged France with so much of her own blood. On his arrival at Hastings, penniless and friendless, he had recourse to his pencil for a subsistence, and obtained a miserable one by selling slight drawings, in the execution of which he was peculiarly happy; so much so, indeed, that they attracted the notice of a gentleman who, wishing to encourage the talent displayed in them, obtained for him a situation as drawing master at a school in that town; here he remained until the order from government arrived for the removal of all French refugees from the coast to a distance of thirty miles. The short time of his residence at Hastings had not been neglected, and having much improved himself in the English language, he was soon enabled to become a French teacher. Being a man of much learning and goodness of heart, he was not long in finding friends who were willing to assist him, and in course of time he obtained a situation in the Herald's College, where he afterwards remained.

The Abbé lived a very retired life, and his leisure hours were devoted to literary pursuits. He was one of the editors of the Encyclopædia Londinensis; and among the many articles furnished by him to that work, is the one on London, in which he has displayed a thorough acquaintance with the metropolis. He was also author of a very humorous and learned Latin poem, which attracted much attention at the time, among various critics and scholars, entitled Tabella Ciberia, or the Bill of Fare. He also contributed many articles to the Sporting Magazine, on the games of the ancients, the fine arts, and other subjects worthy the pen of a scholar. He has also finished a work consisting of corrections and additions to Todd's edition of Johnson's Dictionary, in which he has displayed a surprising degree of learning and research: several portions of the work appeared in the Literary Gazette some time since as specimens, and created much curiosity to ascertain the author, but, excepting to a few, this was never known. The same feelings were created by his Latin poem, but his friends could never persuade him to unveil himself. He was the author of more than is here enumerated, and had several works in hand at the time of his decease.

Whatever rank this learned and good man may hold in literature, he is also entitled to some merit as a draughtsman, and numerous relics of his ingenuity in this line will be found in the Herald's College for many years to come. He had a number of pictures in his possession of his own execution, and had completed a series of drawings, delineating the passions in all their variety. The heads are drawn with a pen and ink, and amount to upwards of one hundred; to these he had proceeded some way in writing descriptions, but the hand of death prevented his finishing this part of his design. Several of the frontispieces in the Encyclopædia Londinensis are from his designs. One test of his ingenuity, however, is before the public, in His Majesty's Throne, erected at the time of the coronation, the design of which he furnished, and which gave such satisfaction to the board, that they ordered it to be executed entirely under his own directions.

The Abbé M'Quin, though a staunch royalist, was a man of the most liberal opinions; cheerful and full of anecdote, had he sought company he might have found it in abundance; but he preferred retirement, and was seldom from home excepting the hours of attendance at the Herald's College. By all who knew him he was much beloved and respected, not only as a scholar, but for the estimable qualities of his heart.

On the 22d instant, his remains were deposited in the vault of St. John's, Horselydown, in the church of which a marble tablet is to be placed to his memory.

NATURAL HISTORY.

A kind of grass, called Polygonum minus, abounds in the deserts of the Ukraine. Towards the end of the month of June, this grass is torn up by the roots, which are covered with maggots, of an oval shape, that become indurated as soon as they are exposed to the air. These maggots are sold by the spoonful to merchants. They are then pounded, and the water, in which they are steeped, with a little alum, assumes the colour of the most beautiful crimson. The wives of the Cossacks dye their thread with them; and the Russian merchants buy them for their wives to paint their faces with. The Polish Jews and the Armenians sell large quantities of them to the Turks, who employ them in dyeing their silks, their moroccoos, the tails and manes of their horses, and their own hair, beards, and nails. The name of Coccus Polonorum has been given to these maggots. Dampier, in his "Voyage round the World," speaks of them at the same time as of cochineal. From an experiment made at Moscow, it appears that a pound of these maggots, which costs only one ruble, yields as much rouge as half a pound of cochineal.

EXPEDITION FOR EXPLORING THE COAST OF THE NIGER.

(From the Gold Coast Gazette.)

The mission, consisting of Dr. Oodway, Major Denham, and Lieut. Clapperton, had on their first journey arrived at Moarouk, the capital of the Kingdom Fazzan, in the month of April last, in the best health and spirits, having performed the journey in 42 days, a distance of 600 miles. On their arriving at Moarouk, the same house was prepared for them that had been inhabited by Mr. Ritohie and friends in the year 1819, and where he fell a victim to the arduous enterprise he had undertaken.

All those who have read Captain Lyon's interesting narrative of his journey will recollect the delays and difficulties that presented themselves to the further prosecution of their object, and the privations they had to encounter and endure, which paralysed their exertions by exhausting at once their health and resources. Major Denham, fearing lest his hopes might be defeated by similar means, and all his endeavours to advance to Bourno prove inefficient, decided on the hazardous alternative of returning to Tripoli—and he describes his journey in these words:—"In pursuance of arrangements which you were made acquainted with by my letter from Moarouk, I left that place on the 10th of May, and after 23 days of great fatigue arrived here (Tripoli) on the 31st of last month. One Arab Sheik and two camels comprised, with myself, the caravan. Our usual time was from 14 to 16 hours in the 24 on the march; and in passing the deserts (three and four days in length) always 18 hours—the camels I scarcely ever allowed to rest. The halt we always made in the middle of the day to allow the camels to come up, was by far the most trying part of the journey—exposed to the burning heat of the mid-day sun, where nature had not provided shades sufficient for a grass-hopper, lying on scorching sand, and nothing to allay our parabolic thirst but wretched water, which had been for several days in beastly stink, was a misery I had no conception of before. At night we generally got a little Kouscous, with some fat and salt—no bad supper—but a cup of tea was luxury supreme, as it satisfied our thirst and took off the edge of the putrid state of the bad water. Our fire, which was always made by scraping together the camel's dung which we found, was consequently uncertain, and even sometimes we could not find more than was necessary for boiling a little water. I had a tent with me, but seldom pitched it, we were all too tired, and my Arab thought it quite useless. We slipped off our horses, when nearly sleeping with fatigue and heat, the nose bag was put over the poor animal's head, and a cord round his fore legs. The loose stones were soon cleared for a space large enough to receive our carcasses, and rolled up in a bournous, in two moments our troubles were forgotten."

Fresh arrangements have now been made by which it is hoped all the difficulties, except those of climate may be avoided. Major Denham has again set forward to rejoin his associates.—A subsequent letter says, "I shall certainly make the attempt of returning home by way of Egypt."

BONAPARTE'S LIBRARY.—The Library which Napoleon had with him at St. Helena, having been brought to England, by order of the British Government, was sold by auction, on Wednesday, by Mr. Sotheby. The books were nearly all in the French language, consisting chiefly of national or military histories, geography, natural history, and works of a similar class, the whole in plain or unostentatious bindings. On the leaves of several of the volumes were manuscript observations in pencil, by Napoleon, and these excited considerable curiosity; where they occurred they were copied on an adjoining leaf with ink. There were also several letters, void of interest, save only that they had his autograph. Another object of attraction was a walking stick, formed of tortoise-shell, mounted in gold, with a musical head.—It had been presented by the ambassador of the United States to the Emperor Napoleon, by whom it was given to Ishmael Gibraltier, the Egyptian ambassador, who gave it to Mons. Odile, of Paris, brother to the celebrated physician of that name.—It sold for £38 17s.

The following are the books which contained notes by Napoleon, with the prices they produced:
Benoit's Cours de Mathématique, two vols. containing one word written by Napoleon, £1 13s.

Correspondance l'addite Officielle et Confidentielle de Napoleon Bonaparte, avec les Cours étrangères, les Princes, les Ministres, et les Généraux Français et Étrangers; seven vols. 1819. The volume containing the Italian campaign has corrections and references to the MSS. of his Memoirs. Some of the latter have been marked out by Napoleon as not authentic; at p. 141, are three lines written by him.—£9

Hume, Histoire d'Angleterre; 18 vols. 12mo. 1788.—£1 11s. 6d.

La Croix's Cour de Mathématiques à l'Usage de l'Ecole centrale des quatre Nations, 2 vols. 1805. At the end of the volume which contains the Algebra, are three pages of calculations by Napoleon.—£5 10s.

Rapports Généraux du Théâtre Français, 50 vols. 1818; those which contain Voltaire, Racine, Molière, Corneille, and other French Dramatic authors, had evidently been much used by him, but had no manuscript notes.—£8 10s. 6d.

Servan's Histoire des Guerres des Gaulois et des Français en Italie, 7 vols. 1805; this was the only book (except an odd vol. of the Encyclopædia Britannica) which Napoleon had on board the Bellerophon, during his voyage: the many notes and errors in the work, which are corrected by himself, render it curious.—£10 10s.

Volney's Voyage en Syrie et en Egypte pendant les Années 1783, 4, 5, maps, 2 vols. 1799; this work, intrinsically, not worth a guinea, sold for £53 11s. The Egyptian Campaign, which forms a part of his Memoirs, was dictated from these volumes: Napoleon has taken notice of the most trifling error in the book; hence there are many corrections by him. The plate at page 229, vol. 1, is entirely covered with his hand writing.

Bruce (Capitaine), ses Voyages aux Sources du Nil, trad. par Casters, 5 vols. and atlas; there are tracings and notes on the map by Napoleon.—£11 0s. 6d.

Denon's Voyage en Egypte, plates, 2 vols. russia; some of the plates torn out. It contains corrections by Napoleon, and the plan of the battle of Aboukir is traced by him.—£9 10s. 6d.

Denon's Voyage en Egypte, planches, 2 vols. much used by Napoleon when travelling.—£17.

The letters, ten in number, signed by Napoleon, sold from £1 1s. to £1 10s. each.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

Eggs.—An excellent method to preserve eggs is, to dip them in salad-oil, and pack them in salt.

Brewing.—The art of brewing is very easy to be understood, for it is exactly similar to the process of making tea. Put a handful of malt into a tea-pot; then fill it up with water, the first time rather under boiling heat. After it has stood some time, pour off the liquor, just as you would tea, and fill up the pot again with boiling water; in a similar manner pour that off, and so go on filling up and pouring off till the malt in the pot is tasteless, which will be the case when all the virtue is extracted. The liquor, or malt tea thus extracted, must then be boiled with a few hops in it, and when it becomes cool enough, that is, about blood heat, add a little yeast to ferment it, and the thing is done. This is the whole art and process of brewing, and to brew a larger quantity requires just the same mode of proceeding as it would to make a tea breakfast for a regiment of soldiers. A peck of malt and four ounces of hops will produce ten quarts of ale, better than any that can be purchased in London, and for which purpose a tea-kettle and two pannings are sufficient apparatus. A bushel of malt to 1lb of hops is the most general proportion; and 18 gallons of good light ale, or table ale, may be produced from one bushel of malt and 1lb of hops, which will not cost above 9s. that is 6d. a gallon, or 1½d. per quart. Brewing utensils consisting of a mashing tub and oar, a sieve, two coolers, and wicker hose, a spigot and faucet, together with a couple of nine-gallon barrels, new from the coopers, cost no more than 36s. and with these utensils any person can brew, at one time, 4 bushels of malt. The plan to be adopted is, from one bushel of malt to extract nine gallons of liquor, for ale, and afterwards nine gallons more for table beer, both of which will be excellent.

VARIETIES.

The Chinese have a method of hatching the spawn of fish, and thus protecting it from those accidents which ordinarily destroy so large a portion of it. The fishermen collect with care on the margin and surface of waters all those gelatinous masses which contain the spawn of fish. After they have found a sufficient quantity, they fill with it the shell of a fresh hen egg, which they have previously emptied, stop up the hole, and put it under a sitting fowl. At the expiration of a certain number of days they break the shell in water warmed by the sun. The young fry are presently hatched, and are kept in pure fresh water till they are large enough to be thrown into the pond with the old fish. The sale of spawn for this purpose forms an important branch of the trade in China. In this, as in some other matters, we may perhaps take some useful lessons from the Chinese. The destruction of the spawn of fish by troll-nets, threatens the existence of the fishery on many parts of our southern coasts. While so much care is taken for the preservation of game, some care ought to be bestowed on the preservation of fish.

THINGS BY THEIR RIGHT NAMES.—On Saturday, the 19th instant, the Duke of Devonshire gave a sumptuous breakfast at his delightful villa at Chiswick. About three o'clock the visitants began to arrive; at five in the evening they entered the house, and sat down to table!

HEN KILLING A RAT.—A rat having attacked some chickens in Mr. Bindlos's yard, in Kendal, a few days ago, the old hen forgot its usual timidity, and proceeded to punish the intruder in good style. The rat made only a poor defence, and the hen was finally triumphant, leaving its antagonist dead upon the field—we mean minding.

WARTS AND CORNS.—The bark of the willow tree, burnt to ashes and mixed with strong vinegar, forms a liniment which effectually eradicates, by repeated applications, warts, corns, and all outrageous excrescences.

A TRAVELLER STOPPED IN TIME.—A conceited fellow, who had just returned from the grand tour, was giving too faithful a detail of the miseries he had endured from sea-sickness in crossing over from England to France, when he was interrupted by a nauseated old gentleman in a corner box, who could not eat his mutton with a relish: 'I wonder,' said he, 'that the sea is not more sick than you were, of being spewed over by every puppy who mounts its back.'

FOLLIES.—The Follies of the young man, which may be considered the wild flowers of youth, are the vices of the old man, or the removeless roots of old age.

PROVERBS.—Old proverbs are generally received and respected as old and undeniable truths, yet they are sometimes to be contradicted. 'You cannot have more of a cat than her skin,' says an ancient saw. 'Yes you can,' denied a musician: you may have her gut for fiddle strings.'

A GOORMAND.—I have heard Reynolds relate an anecdote of a venison feast, at which were assembled many who much enjoyed the repast. On this occasion, he addressed his conversation to one of the company who sat next to him, but to his great surprise hardly got a single word in answer, until, at length, his silent neighbour, turning to him, said,—"Mr. Reynolds, whenever you are at a venison-feast, I wish you not to speak during dinner-time, as in endeavouring to answer your questions, I have just swallowed a fine piece of the fat, entire, without tasting its flavour."—Mémoires of Sir J. Reynolds, by Northcote.

ENORMOUS HOG.—There is at the present time at Westbrook, Margate, an enormous hog, bred on Hartsdown estate. Its weight is 150 stone, or 60 score, and it is only 20 months old. It is upwards of ten feet long, eight feet in girth, and nearly four feet high.

YORK MINSTER ORGAN.—The organ in York Minster is now completed. It is the largest and most complete instrument in Great Britain. The total number of stops is 52. Pipes, 3254. There are three sets of keys, namely one for the great nave organs, one for the choir organ, and one for the swell, exclusive of pedals. There are movements for enabling the performer to play two or three sets of keys at once; or to detach the great and nave organs; also to play the keys of the great and choir organs, with the pedals in addition to the pedal pipes. The Haarlem organ, which is the largest in Europe, contains sixty stops, being eight more than that of York Minster.

DISAGREEABLE BEDFELLOW.—That the snake has the power, to a certain degree, of fascinating human beings—in other words, electrifying them with terror, so as to deprive them of presence of mind (which is the only fascination to which any credit seems due), may be easily conceived. One of the largest size having got, during the night, through a jealousy, into a gentleman's bed-room, it crawled up into the bed, and coiled itself on his body, fell soundly asleep. The gentleman soon after awakened, and feeling something press heavily upon him, raised his head, and was electrified at the sight of the huge snake that lay upon him. He was so completely subdued by terror as to be utterly incapable of helping himself; he lay motionless, in a cold perspiration, not daring even to call for assistance. At length his aegro servant, finding he did not come out at his accustomed time, suspected something was the matter, and went in to call him: on seeing the cause of detention, he speedily relieved him by killing the animal.

ECHO IN THE LANDES OF FRANCE.—There is nothing more remarkable in this country than the echo, which is capable of being awakened in several parts of it. The crack of the postillion's whip was heard repeated in twenty vibrations, each lessening as they resounded along the interminable waste. The tick of a cloth mill, which we passed, was heard distinctly for at least three miles of the road. A peculiar stillness pervaded the atmosphere—not a leaf on the trees trembled; now and then a prolonged call was heard from some cottage buried in a distant part of the forest, which died away in the air with a melancholy cadence. The echo is rationally accounted for, by the peculiar solidity of the sandy soil, which rather reflects than absorbs the sounds that pass over it. But the stillness which it produces is almost supernatural.—Quin's Visit to Spain.

DISADVANTAGES OF A WOODEN LEG.—Mr. Lee, the barrister, was famous for studying effect when he pleaded. On the circuit at Norwich, a brief was brought to him by the relatives of a woman who had been deceived into a breach of promise of marriage. Lee enquired, among other particulars, whether the woman was handsome? "A most beautiful face," was the answer. Satisfied with this, he desired she should be placed at the bar, immediately in front of the jury. When he rose, he began a most pathetic and eloquent address, directing the attention of the jury to the charms which were placed in their view, and painting in glowing colors the guilt of the wretch who could injure so much beauty. When he perceived their feelings worked up to a proper pitch, he sat down under the perfect conviction that he should obtain a verdict. What then must have been his surprise, when the counsel retained by the opposite party rose and observed, that it was impossible not to assent to the encomiums which his learned friend had lavished on the face of the plaintiff; but he had forgot to say, that she had a wooden leg! This fact, of which Lee was by no means aware, was established to his utter confusion. His eloquence was thrown away; and the jury, who felt ashamed of the effects it produced upon them, instantly gave a verdict against him.

JAMAICA RAT.—In no country is there a creature so destructive of property as the rat in Jamaica; their ravages are inconceivable. One year with another, it is supposed that they destroy at least about a twentieth part of the sugar-canes throughout the island, amounting to little short of 200,000*l.* currency per annum. The sugar-cane is their favourite food; but they also prey upon the Indian corn, on all the fruits that are accessible to them, and on many of the fruits. Some idea will be formed of the immense swarms of those destructive animals that infest this island from the fact, that on a single plantation thirty thousand were destroyed in one year. Traps of various kinds are set to catch them, poison is resorted to, and terriers, and sometimes ferrets, are employed to explore their haunts and root them out; still, however, their numbers remain undiminished, as far at least as can be judged by the ravages they commit. They are of a much larger size than the European rat, especially that kind of them called by the negroes racons. On the experiment being tried of putting one of these and a cat together, the latter declined attacking it.

MAHAW INDIAN FEAST.—I was kindly received, and invited to four feasts within an hour. The first was the flesh of an elk, boiled without salt. It was placed in a large bowl or trough, around which four or five guests assembled, each taking his knife, and using his fingers instead of a fork. If any remains, you are invited to carry it with you. You may, if you please, give it to the master of the house, and he gives it to others, who surround the bowl to eat. The second feast was corn, which was also boiled without salt. In eating the boiled corn, spoons made of buffalo horn or wood are used. The other two feasts consisted of corn and dried pumpkin boiled together. I have been the more particular, as the customs, and the manner of treating strangers, among all these tribes, is similar. These children of nature know not the use of bread; and have but one kind of food cooked at the same feast. The man, who gives the feast, never eats till the guests have finished. These feasts are considered as the highest honour that can be conferred on a stranger.—Giddings' Visit to the Mahaw Islands.

CORILLA.—Corilla was the Arcadian name given to the celebrated improvisatrice, Maria Maddalena Morelli Fernandez, of Pistoia, who was honoured at Rome with the laurel crown, 16th February, 1776, in the same manner as Petrarbo and Tasso had been of old. The fertility and readiness with which this accomplished female produced, when required, the most elegant verses on whatever subject, and in whatever measure, was altogether marvellous. In the examination which she underwent before the Arcadian Academy of Rome, and which continued for three successive days, there was scarcely a subject, in philosophy or literature, on which she did not display her poetical powers to the satisfaction and astonishment of all present. The audience comprehended all the principal personages, clergy, literati, and foreigners, then resident at Rome; among the latter was the late Duke of Gloucester.

This renowned lady was a musician as well as a poetess. She sang her own verses to simple tunes, with a sweet voice and good taste.

LIBERILITY OF THE LIVING AND TOILS OF THE DEAD.—In the prefatory address of a society for the relief of sick members, is the following paragraph.—“to relieve our sick friends, and enable them, when dead, decently to inter them.”

CONTRASTED ORATORY.

(From a London Journal.)

Ask any one who lounges and listens in the gallery of St. Stephen's, who are the prominent men in the two great parties which contend for the honour and advantage of their country—or for pudding and praise to themselves—and the answer is sure to be, “Brougham and Canning.” Now Brougham and Canning are men whose wealth or ancestry stand them in small stead, and who are, moreover, not embued with any very transcendent portion of political virtue or consistency. They have, in short, no pedestal upon which to raise themselves when they show off: and yet each, in his particular party, and after his particular fashion, is not only without peer, but almost without follower.

But, though these two orators thus resemble each other in standing foremost and alone, each in his party and his species of eloquence, they are in every other respect the antipodes of each other; and perhaps no two men could be chosen who, in their appearance, the structure of their minds, the style and management of their eloquence, or in the expression and manner by which they set it forth, form a more perfect contrast. Canning's appearance is soft and prepossessing: Brougham's is hard and stern, if not absolutely repulsive. The air of Canning's head is elegant; that of Brougham is exactly the reverse; but still, view it on which side you will, it indicates terrible power. Canning's features are handsome, and his eye, though well set, and sheltered under his eyebrows, is lively and sparkling, and his complexion is fine: Brougham's features are harsh in the extreme; his forehead is immense, his chin square, and his nose, mouth, and eyes huddled together in the centre of his face, and his eyes absolutely retire amid folds and corrugations, and while he sits listening they seem visited by a filmy curtain, which not only conceals their appalling glare, but renders the mind of their possessor inscrutable to the keenest observer. Canning's passion sits upon his face in ready array, and its hues come and go with every point of his own speech, and every return by his antagonist: Brougham's mantle within, and while every ear is tingling at what he says, and the immediate object of his invective writhing in helpless agony, his visage retains its cold brassy hue, and he triumphs over the passions of other men, by appearing to be wholly without passion himself. Canning's whole form is plump, sleek, and graceful: Brougham's is thin, harsh, and incurved. When Canning rises, he stands erect, elevates his face, and looks around for applause: Brougham stands as if coiled and concentrated. From Canning you look for something showy and brilliant: Brougham presents you with a thing whose powers and whose intentions are all a mystery. You bend forward to catch the first sentence of the one, and feel human nature elevated by the specimen before you: you crouch and shrink back from the other, and, whether you will or not, thoughts of ruin and annihilation dart across your mind. The one seems as if he were to strive merely for the eclat of the visitors: the glory of the other appears to be wholly in the fight. The one seems as if he had always lived among men, entered into their sports and festivities and fed upon their praise: the other looks a son of the desert, and seems to come among men only to make them tremble at his strength.

Their appearance does not differ more than the structure and furnishing of their minds. Canning is a scholar—an elegant and an exquisite scholar, we allow; but still merely a scholar: Brougham, on the other hand, is a philosopher, in the most comprehensive meaning of the term. Canning's illustrations are, accordingly, all classical; while Brougham presses all the elements into his service. The one comes upon his audience displaying all the flowery volumes of literature: the other hurls at them the whole mass of the Encyclopædia. Canning goes forth as a lapidary, picking up gems of a great value, giving them an exquisite polish, and fitting them for the diadems of Kings: Brougham goes forth like a giant with an iron mace, dashing the rocks in pieces, and preparing a pathway for the people over the most stubborn and untoward parts of the earth. You are delighted with the sparkle of the one; you admire the power of the other, but at the same time you tremble at it.

The style of their eloquence and the structure of their speeches are just as different. Canning selects his words, on account of the smoothness of their flow, and the music of their sound; with Brougham, the longer, the more crooked, and the more unmouthable the better. Canning forms his sentences like a master of language and of sound: Brougham like a master of ideas and concatenation. Those of the one are of moderate length, and always quadrable by the classical formula; those of the other can be squared only by the higher analysis of the mind: and they rise, and run, and swell, on and on, till each is often a whole oration within itself; but still, the hearer can see that it carries the weight of all that went before, and prepares the way for what is to come after. The style of Canning is like a convex mirror; it scatters every ray which falls upon it, and sparkles in whatever position it is viewed: the style of Brougham is like a concave mirror,—it sheds no general brilliance, but its light is concentrated into one focus, and the heart which that focus cannot soften must be pure clay. Canning marches on in a clear and bold track; every individual paragraph is perfect in itself, and every corroboration of wit and of genius neither needs nor receives any aid from the others—the antithesis is sure to be pointed, the quotation most happy, or the joke exquisite; you feel it all, and you feel it at once: Brougham, on the other hand, twines round and round in a spiral,—sweeping all the contents of a large circumference before him, and pouring them toward the main point of his attack. When he commences, you wonder at the width and obliquity of his course, and you can hardly comprehend how he is to dispose of such a mass of heterogeneous matter as he fishes up in his way; but as the curve lessens, and the pole is in view, you find out that the whole is to be efficient there.

The fine, frank, candid, and gentleman-like form and expression of Canning, as he stands poised and balancing his glittering and pointed arms, sits before the eye of the mind. He comes to us as a thing of light, and sheds radiance and sunbeams wherever he passes. But the brightness and the beauty are soon gone, and we dwell with a darker tone of feeling upon Brougham. He stands dark and sallow—and as he plays the accusing angel to Courtiers and Kings, his lip curls and starts with a derision that is matchless, his voice sinks to a whisper, which, however, is more distinctly audible than the roaring of any other man in the house, and his words fall heavy and slow.

THE DRAMA, ETC.

THEATRE-ROYAL.—The Musical Play of The Aquary, was produced on Saturday Evening last; the principal characters were personated, and but very indifferently, by metropolitan performers.—In Mr. Meadows' performance of Jonathan O'Jibuck, we had buffoonery substituted for passion, and mere mimicry for confirmed prejudice; Mr. Blanchard's Caron was only passable; and Mr. Melrose as Love, and Miss Halliday as Isabella Wardour, sustained their respective parts with but little, if any perceptible effect. Mrs. McGibbon's representation of the aged Elspeth, was one of the most finished performances we ever witnessed; indeed we always see her repeat this character with increased interest. The farce of Honest Thieves followed, in which Mr. Webb, as Teague, displayed much talent and ability as a singer and actor.

ON PARENTAL DUTIES.

I HAVE frequently had occasion to remark the perfect justice of that often-repeated adage, "the looker-on sees more of the game than he who is playing it;"—and I have often thought, that it cannot be applied more forcibly to any circumstance of life, than to the management and education of children. I am one of those solitary beings whom the world has chosen to denominate Old Bachelors; my opinions on this subject, therefore, are not the result of experience in my own proper person, but of observation in my assumed character as a looker-on. Whether this will add much to their weight or not, I cannot determine. I merely mention the circumstance, en passant.

There seems to me to be something in the nature of the parental feeling, judging from its effects, which has a tendency to prevent a parent from following, in the management of his children, the calm dictates of sober reason. We may often see those, who, in the common occurrences of life, are distinguished by their superior intelligence and sound sense, exhibiting in this most important point, the most culpable negligence, alike disgraceful to themselves and injurious to their offspring. This does not arise from any want of affection, as that word is generally understood, on their parts, but is more frequently the result of a mistaken feeling of tenderness, which gives rise to the idea, that to occasion a child the least uneasiness, is incompatible with the exercise of true affection, of which unbounded indulgence is considered the only test. Now the experience of every man must be sufficient to convince even the most thoughtless, that a state of continued indulgence is what no one can expect in his passage through life:—on the contrary, the most fortunate amongst us must acknowledge, that we are encompassed on every side by sorrows, and difficulties, which call for the continual exercise of every principle of religion and philosophy which we may possess.

The object of every system of education, then, ought to be, the implanting and cultivation of such principles in the human mind, as may enable it to bear, with patience and resignation, those trials and disappointments which are the inevitable lot of every human being. And this can never be accomplished by a system of indulgence. If we would have the flower attain its natural perfection and beauty, we must not only watch over it with tenderness, and supply it with that nourishment which is necessary for its support, but we must also carefully root out all those noxious weeds which vegetate spontaneously, impoverishing the soil in which they flourish, and if not checked in their growth, ultimately baffling all our anxiety and solicitude. Just so with the human mind. It is not sufficient that we strenuously endeavour to impress upon it, principles of moral rectitude; we must be careful to guard against the least appearance of evil, and let no mistaken notions of tenderness prevent our immediate and determined efforts to eradicate it. And this precautionary system cannot be too early adopted: for there is a knowledge of good and evil implanted in our natures which is coeval with the first appearance of consciousness; and from the moment this is perceptible, our task ought to commence.

Nor would I be deemed an advocate for a system of unbending severity. This may be attended with consequences equally dangerous to the tender mind of youth. The weeds which, with a little moderation and forbearance, might have been totally eradicated, may, when too rudely handled, be only broken off by the stem, and the root may be still left in the soil, to re-vegetate at some future period with tenfold luxuriance. One of the certain consequences of undue severity, is a habit of deceit, than which, perhaps none is more easily acquired by children. When they discover that the most trivial fault is followed by an unmerited degree of punishment, they will not so much endeavour to prevent a repetition of it, as they will try to screen it from discovery, and thus avoid its consequent correction. When this habit has once obtained possession of the mind, all our future attempts at improvement will be of no avail:—under its baleful influence we may in vain look for the springing up and flourishing of that good seed, which, in the tenderness of our love, we have scattered over the rich soil—it will never flourish—and with bitterness of soul may we anticipate for our offspring, a life unblessed by the cheering influence of virtue, and marked only in its progress, by the transition from crime to crime, deeper and more deadly at each advancing step, until at length we behold them stretched on the bed of death, a prey to remorse and despair, and without one hope of mercy from the hands of their justly offended Creator.

If parents would but rightly consider the great responsibility which attaches to them in their parental capacity, and endeavour conscientiously to discharge the duty they owe to their offspring, much, very much, of that misery which exists in the world, would be annihilated, and the sum of human happiness would be proportionately increased. Let them for a moment consider what are the motives which actuate their conduct, and they will too often find, that what they call affection for their children—that feeling by which they are induced to gratify their every desire, however unreasonable it may be, is, in reality, nothing more than a selfish regard for their own feelings, or a careless indifference equally reprehensible. The parent cannot bear to hear the cries of her darling, from whatever cause they may proceed, and immediately every species of gratification is devised as a bribe to restore it to silence, in order that her delicate nerves may be no longer offended. Thus is the child offered up as a sacrifice to the sensibility of the mother; and thus for the want of a little firmness, will that parent soon become the slave of the child, and then too late, alas! will she lament her folly. Neither will true affection ever induce undue severity. When it does exist in parents, we must look for some other feeling as its cause. The natural love of power which is inherent in our nature, may perhaps, be the most frequent source from which it arises; but where true affection is, this motive cannot operate.

Those, then, can only be called truly affectionate parents, who, whilst they tenderly watch over, and encourage the growth of those natural feelings in the minds of their children, which have a tendency to promote their happiness amidst the chequered scenes of life, are, at the same time, careful to mark every appearance of an opposite nature, and, with firmness and moderation, use their utmost endeavours to check it while it is yet in the bud, and by degrees totally eradicate it from the soil. These are they who "train up their children in the way they should go;" and they only have the assurance, that "their labour will not be in vain."

THE FRIEND.—No. 3.

Si quid loquar audientum. Hor. lib. 4. od. 2.

BEFORE age had wrinkled my brow and silvered my head, there was not a source of greater pleasure and enjoyment to me than a ramble in the fields on a fine summer's morn. The chirping of the feathered tribe, pouring forth, as it were their matin praises to the Almighty, in song; the trees covered with rich foliage, and offering to the pedestrian an umbrageous shelter from the warmth of the sun; the beautiful appearance of nature, clad in one universal robe of green; the fragrance of the breezes; the harmony that reigned around: every thing tended to inspire my soul with mingled sensations of delight, gratitude, and thankfulness.

It was my usual custom, during summer, to stroll forth from my dwelling, which, by the bye, was situated in the most unpleasant and unhealthy part of the town, early in the morning (not 'tis true with the lark, but yet when many of my neighbours were quietly reposing in the arms of Morpheus), and hasten to a favourite spot, where in beholding the prospect before me, or with a book in my hand, I could while away an hour undisturbed by passing stranger, or interrupted by the officiousness of faithful domestic. Of course, my readers will imagine, that a gentle rivulet meandered by the place which I had selected for my retirement; and indeed I may say, without speaking, à la nouvelle, that the most careless and luke-warm admirer of nature, would have felt an inward pleasure in gazing on the extensive and charming landscape which my retreat commanded. Reclined on a seat beneath some overhanging tree, I have for hours, gazed on the valley before me of the most delightful fertility and in a state of the highest cultivation; studded with pleasant cottages, which I admired as being peaceful and secluded habitations, far from "the busy hum of men," it presented an appearance to the eye, which must have interested the most indifferent spectator. Even now, old as I am, my heart swells with rapture, dilates with joy, at the mere picturing of the happy spot, "in my mind's eye," and I almost sigh for a return of those youthful days, when the cares, the troubles, and the anxieties, which I have since experienced, which have since clouded the horizon of my hopes and expectations, were unthought of and unexpected. But when I call to mind that such a desire were both sinful and vain, I am able to smother the half-formed wish in my bosom, and console myself with the reflection that the recollection of past happiness is still left me, and that whilst I am pursuing "the even tenor of my way," and passing quietly to my grave, others may be partaking in the spring of their life, of the joys which were once my own.

I remember when I was once proceeding with rapid pace to "the accustomed spot," I was accosted by an old man whose tattered dress betokened poverty, but whose air induced the belief in my mind that he had seen better days. The unfortunate (for so the individual was by whom I was addressed), entreated relief, in the most melancholy and at the same time in the most earnest and respectful manner. I was struck with the man, and desired him to accompany me to my favourite retreat. He willingly obeyed; and we arrived there without the interchange of many words. We were seated, and I expressed a wish that the aged suppliant would relate his history; or rather I should say, I begged him to inform me of the cause of his present unhappy situation.

"Sir," said the old man, "few words will suffice to convince you that I am such in reality as you behold me, and that the wretched and impoverished state in which I am now placed is very different to the station I formerly occupied in society. I was once comfortably situated in the world, and little expected to be buffeted about, as I have been, by the waves of adversity, which have well nigh overwhelmed me. My trade which was that of a grocer, afforded handsome profits, and in a short time, I accumulated a fortune which though not large, was sufficient to enable me to retire from the turmoils of business, and reside in a small cottage which I had purchased, surrounded only by those who were most dear to me, my wife and only child. I had lived three years in retirement, and thought myself happy; little was I then aware of the awful change that awaited me! Before I retired from trade, I had signed a bond for £6000; this act, which is the source of all the misfortunes and calamities I have ever since endured, was performed to save as I thought, a beloved brother from the horrors of a gaol. But alas, I was cruelly deceived! my brother, who was really possessed of considerable property, collected together, shortly after I became security for him, the whole of his fortune, and without discharging the debts he owed to those, who, like myself, too openly confided in a villain, fled to America. The man who held the bond, hearing of my brother's precipitate departure for the continent, came upon me for the payment of the money, and it was but with the whole of my fortune that I was enabled to satisfy his lawful demands. Friends I had none, when poverty overtook me; to none could I apply for relief, and I must have sunk inevitably into the yawning gulf of ruin, if I had not aroused myself from the apathy into which my brother's treachery had thrown me, and availed myself of the only means that remained to procure a scanty subsistence for myself and family—I mean the soliciting of alms from the humane and charitable. This, Sir, is the truth, and I sincerely hope you and yours may never experience my unhappy fate." "Amen," responded I, as the unfortunate concluded his simple narrative, and I placed in his hand—no matter how much—but sufficient I hope to have relieved the immediate wants of himself—his wife and family.

Should the above story, founded in fact, benefit my readers, I shall not regret the time I spent in penning the same. We may all learn from the mendicant's history, that friendships are oft, as the poet says—"confederacies in vice—and leagues of pleasure, that riches are too oft the only link that bind professing friends together, and that when they are dissipated, the indigent is left to enjoy his poverty without condolence, without assistance, and without pity."

THE FLOWER-SPIRIT.

A Fairy Tale.

I've heard it said that flowers had music in them,
With which they tell their transient tale to sleep,
And so preserve their sweets. anon.

The Day had closed his languid eyes,
And Evening set her lucid star
To herald through the skies
The coming of her roscate car.
The winds were resting in their caves,
The birds reposed on every tree:
And sea fowl on the glassy waves
Were slumbering in security:
And golden hues o'erspread the rills,
And tinged the valley's robe of green;
While, far above the giant hills,
The moon sat gazing o'er the scene.
And Night, that ever-changeling maid,
Seem'd lingering in her own dark bower,
With all her storms, as if afraid
To mar the beauty of that hour:—
When Florestine roam'd sadly on,
And thought of one, with speechless pain,
Who to the distant wars had gone,
And never might return again.

She thought of him, and, in a vale,
Where nature in her beauty smiled,
The maid reclined—serene, but pale
As Sorrow's gentlest, saddest child.
She turn'd her eyes, with mourning dim,
Towards the moon that shone above,
As if her light could tell of him
For whom she felt both grief and love.
Then bending to the earth her gaze,
And weeping o'er her hapless lot,
She saw, illumed by Evening's rays,
A simple, sweet "Forget-me-not."
At other times—in other mood—
The little flower perhaps were slighted,
But in the dreary solitude
Of parted love, and pleasures blighted,
Her mind on that alone could muse—
Her eye on that alone could rest.—
Was it that pearl'd and shining dew
Lay glittering on its azure breast?
Was it that other flowers, adorn'd
With hues the brightest heaven could print,
Rose proudly round, as if they scorn'd
Its faint and unobtrusive tint?
Or was't the same that so enthral'd,
And bound her, as with magic spell;
And, without voice or language, call'd
The hermit, Thought, from Memory's cell?

"Poor flower! (she said) that liv'st apart
And shrink'st before the noon-day sun,
No tongue could whisper to my heart
More feelingly than thou hast done.
For though, to share thy humble state,
No flower, akin to thee, appears,
Thou droop'st not o'er thy lonely fate,
But smilest through twilight's crystal tears.
Oh! thou, in hours of grief and care,
My voiceless monitor shalt be,
And I will shun the feud, Despair,
And resignation learn—from thee."

She sigh'd no more—and ceased to weep—
And bow'd her head in meekness lowly:
The floweret seem'd to wake from sleep,
And ope its little blue eyes slowly:
The leaves expanded, and a sound
Came breathing from them, like a sigh
That mingles with the air around,
And as it mingles seems to die.
And these the accents that were heard
To issue from that azure cave,
In tones as sweet as ever bird
Gave to the woods or listening wave.

"Thou hast come to me—thou hast come to me,
In thy gloom of heart and thy misery;

And never yet, or in spring-time's bloom,
Or summer months laden with rich perfume,
Or Autumn's sun-shine, or Winter's rain,
Did the wretched-one hasten to me in vain.

"I am the spirit that loves to dwell
Within the "Forget-me-not's" fairy cell:
But when brother spirits to me resort,
In the roomy tulip I hold my court:
And when bells of the lily ring loud in the air,
The sylphs from each floweret are revelling there.

"Thou hast come to me—thou hast come to me—
In thy gloom of heart and thy misery:
And thou shalt find that the dew I meet,
In my world of flowers, are choice and sweet
As bee ever rided, or summer-winds stole
From the violet's cup or the rose's bowl.

"Linger here 'till the eve has faded,
And the sky's dark hair with stars is braided;
Linger here 'till the night is o'er thee,
And the hills and the valleys lie dark before thee;
And when three bright stars shall fall from above,
Turn to the west and thou'lt see thy love.

"Thou wilt hear a voice through the stillness creeping,
Thou wilt mark an eye through the green leaves peeping;
By a gentle step shall the earth be press'd,
And thy head shall lie on thy Reginald's breast:
Then thou'lt think of the spirit that loves to dwell
Within the "Forget-me-not's" fairy cell.

"Maiden, farewell!—Maiden, farewell!
Think of the spirit that loves to dwell
Within the "Forget-me-not's" fairy cell."

The voice's gentle murmur pass'd,
The floweret's leaves in silence closed,
And Night and all her stars at last
In the blue fields of heaven reposed.

The maiden watch'd till midnight came,
Still gazing on the spangled sky,
And saw three brilliant stars of flame
Shoot from their radiant spheres on high.

She heard a voice through the stillness creeping,
She mark'd an eye through the green leaves peeping,
The earth by a gentle step was press'd,
Her head reclined on her Reginald's breast:
And she thought of the spirit that loves to dwell
Within the "Forget-me-not's" fairy cell.

ON HUMAN CAMELEONS.

(From the Lit. Museum.)

"Do you know me?
"Excellently well; you are a fishmonger."

There are some men in the world who appear in a different light to almost every one of their different acquaintances, and are, perchance, not seen in their true colours by any body. It is curious enough to listen to the conflicting opinions on the characters of such persons. The other night I was at the Shakespeare with a party of about half a dozen. "I saw Jack Adams this morning," said one. "Did you?" said another; then you saw a very pleasant fellow.—"Indeed," cried a third, "how can you say so? I was in his company last night for half an hour, and he never opened his lips."—"Jack is certainly a very serious young man," resumed the first speaker, "though a little touched with Methodism."—"Methodism!" exclaimed a fourth, "oh! no; Jack is no Methodist; but in fact he is a very bashful fellow, and his diffidence gives him an air of formality."—"Well," said a fifth, "for a bashful man, I think he has about as much assurance as ever fell to the lot of a human being; and so far from being formal, he is even culpably disregarding of the common deencies of life, but I think him a very well tempered fellow."—"And I," said the sixth, "think him the most passionate of men."—"At all events, he is generous," rejoined the fourth. "The greatest miser alive," retorted the fifth. "I think him a true Christian," said the third speaker. "And I," cried the sixth, "know him to be a rank Atheist."

I got up then and left the room, and have no doubt that my own character was discussed by those gentlemen in as satisfactory a manner as that of the worthy and inexplicable John Adams had been. For you may know, gentle reader, that I am one of those human cameleons who change the colour of their minds according to the situations in which they are placed, and the persons with whom they converse. When St. Paul and Alcibiades, I am "all things to all men." Not for good purposes like the one, nor for bad ones like the other; but for no purpose at all. In fact, I cannot help these changes; they are as involuntary as the transmutations of my brother reptile. I am a thing of shadows, a compound of mutations, a personification of the rainbow, an intellectual prism, an "unreal mockery;" in short, I am any thing, every thing, and nothing;—a breathing puzzle, and a perambulatory enigma. The pleasantest fellow alive, the dullest of beasts, the most profound philosopher, the most absolute ass, a dainty wit, a gross buffoon, a fine gentleman of the old school, a finished blackguard of the new: at one time not a word to throw to a dog; at another, would confound a rookery. Not that you are to suppose that I have no real fixed character; I have, and a most excellent one it is, though nobody knows it save myself.

At home, in my early years, I was thought a steady, quiet boy. My father was himself of a serious turn, and determined to think that I was very like him in every thing. He would often say, "there is certainly something in that boy's head;" a proposition to which my mother always cordially assented, and truly I myself felt no inclination to controvert it. I am not of a disputatious turn, and was never sceptical touching my own good qualities. My father would continue, "Tom talks little, but he thinks the more; just like me when a boy. He is fit for a bishop, or a lord chancellor. I ought to have been Lord Chancellor myself (my father was a hedge-attorney), but merit is overlooked." To this conclusion my mother also assented, and my silence was of course significant of approbation.

I am whatever people please to think me. At home, therefore, I was steady because I was thought so. At school the case was far otherwise. There, by some accident, I gained the reputation of a wild fellow, and of course kept it up. I was foremost in every mischief, the ringleader of all riots; I planned and executed the robbing of multifarious orchards; shot innumerable cats with cross bows; routed whole armies of pigs with prodigious slaughter; and tied kettles to the tails of dogs without compunction. I had the honour at last of heading a barring-out: the issue of this affair was disastrous; though the school-room had been fortified with considerable skill, the outworks gave way to an impetuous assault of the enemy. I behaved with the most heroic courage, and had the good fortune to set the doctor's wig on fire. But I was deserted by my dastardly comrades in the moment of victory, and taken prisoner. A complaint was sent to my father, but he would not believe a word of it, and withdrew me from the school immediately.

At another school I bore the character of cowardice and sheepishness. This was owing to a pugilistic defeat I sustained, soon after my arrival, from a boy much bigger than myself; but the boys were determined to believe that I lost it through cowardice. This was enough for me: I became the unresisting butt of the whole school; and my life was rendered so miserable, that I ran away in less than two months.

If I have a particular turn for any thing it is for sociability. When I went to Oxford I was invited one evening to a College-party: I happened to feel rather unwell, could not drink, and was obliged to retire early; this gained me the reputation of a milkop, and accordingly I drank nothing but water during the remainder of my residence at College.

On leaving the University I entered the army. The first day I dined at the mess I happened to outsit most of the young hands: with the others who remained I found myself quite at home, and we drank till morning. This successful debut established my character; I was pronounced to be a very promising aspirant after convivial eminence, and accordingly I did not go to bed sober for twelve months together.

Encouragement with me is every thing. If people think favourably of me I am sure to do well. Being once in a particular company I chanced to make a few successful sallies. Next morning I met one of our party. "Why," said he, "you were monstrously facetious last night: Sir Toby thinks you an absolute wit." I never could meet Sir Toby afterwards without coming out with a prime "bon mot," though in general I am as guileless of every thing of the sort as the honourable Baronet himself.

On the other hand I am easily damped. If I see, or imagine that a person thinks meanly of me, I can make no effort to alter his opinion; in his presence I actually become what he thinks me; my mind undergoes a complete paralysis; the current of my thoughts is checked, I lose the mastery of my own resources, and if I attempt to speak commit the most ridiculous solecisms.

No man can take a friendly joke with better temper, and few reply to it with more readiness. But if the joke be accompanied with a sneer, if its evident object be to humble me, or the jester give himself airs of conscious superiority; I am instantly struck dumb, I retire under the tormenting conviction of having left behind me the character of a blockhead, and to heighten my pain, a thousand pertinent replies suggest themselves to my mind when too late.

I have naturally some vivacity, though no great share of what is understood by "animal spirits." At an evening party lately, where many ladies were present, I was sitting alone in a corner of the room, and the unpleasant feeling of being a stranger to most of the company made me, as I suppose, look somewhat serious. There were two ladies near me, and I was about to approach and attempt a conversation, when I overheard one say to the other, as she pointed me out to her notice, "look, I beseech you, at young Mr. Sobersides there." This completely blighted my vivacity in the bud. I was as silent and as grave for the rest of the evening, as if I had just made my sortie from the cave of Trophonius; and were I to meet that lady again, "even in the hour when my heart is most gay," her appearance would petrify me as effectually as the head of Medusa.

When not subjected to such discouragements as the foregoing, I fall as naturally as possible into the tone and manner of my associates for the time being; I adopt their accent, their dialect, their style of thinking, their sentiments. Thus by turns I am an Irishman, a Scotoman, a Yorkshireman, or a Cockney. A Tory in the morning, a Whig in the afternoon, a Radical at night. Now, a staunch upholder of monarchy, an inflexible maintainer of the integrity of the Constitution; now, a rigid republican, a daring innovator, and inextinguishable champion of universal suffrage. My opinions sit as loosely on me as my old coat, and I never argue except where I meet with persons fond of disputation for its own sake. In religion my toleration is unbounded, yet every man deems me a bigot to his own peculiar sect. All codes of doctrine, all forms of worship come alike to me; I assent to all, I join in all. In the church, the conventicle, the mosque or the synagogue, the ceremonies of religious reverence are various; but the feeling which inspires them, and the being to whom they are addressed, are always the same. This flexibility, however, is sometimes productive of inconvenience. In a tête-à-tête, it is all very well, and in company where there is a general coincidence of character and opinion: but people will sometimes differ, and you cannot seem to agree with all. I often meet two persons whose sentiments and taste are as opposite as the poles, and with each of whom, singulatum, I have repeatedly manifested a perfect accordance. This is a very awkward predicament, and in spite of all my ingenuity, I am ready to exclaim in the words of Macheath, a little varied:

"How happy could I be with either,"
"Were t'other d—d—d wrangler away."

Sometimes too I am caught by an acquaintance in a situation revolting to his peculiar prejudices. Thus I was met the other evening by a Corinthian as I was coming out of a Methodist chapel; and surprised a few nights ago in a Tom and Jerry row, by an Evangelical preacher, who is my bosom friend. But with the first I saved my reputation by pretending a lark, and with the last by the convenient plea of accident.

Notwithstanding these and a few other drawbacks, I would not willingly part with the Protean facility of my character. If it has made me some few enemies, it has also gained me not a few friends: it has saved me a world of unpleasant altercation, and enabled me hitherto to slip down the rugged path of life with ease to myself, and edification to the beholders.

THE TEMPEST.

(From the French.)

Hark Eulalie!—along the shore
Hear'st thou the angry tempest roar!—
See'st thou flit against the gale
The feather'd tenant of the vale?—
The lightning darts—loud thunders roll—
Convulsions heaves the troubled sea—
Yet soft delights thrill through my soul—
And these delights I owe to thee.

Perchance while thus proceeds my strain,
Far on yon dismal billowy main,
Some little bark contends to brave,
In vain the overpowering wave;—
The mariner—distracting scene!
Bent at the labouring oar I see,
My bosom yet remains serene—
And this sweet calm I owe to thee.

When on those burning lips of thine—
When gazing on those orbs divine—
Say what to me, entrancing maid!
Are roaring storms, or tempests dread!—
Wrapt in a soft delicious dream,
Far, far those scenes appalling flee—
Nor knows my breast but bliss supreme—
A rapturous bliss I owe to thee.

ANDREW LAURIE'S RETURN.

(From the London Magazine.)

I went on a tryste to Dalgarnock.—Burns.

The ship which bore me to my native shore, after an absence of many years, seemed the fairest of all ships;—the wind which filled our sail, and moved the waters, breathed delight and youth around me, and the rude sailor smoothed his locks, and spoke without cursing, as the hills of Scotland rose on our view. It is true, that the hills and glens of Nithsdale, on which I gazed as the ship glided along the shore, seemed rough and barren, compared to the hills of spice and the groves of cinnamon, among which I had lived in the east; but early remembrance sanctified and shed beauty o'er the landscape; and as my foot touched the shore, enthusiasm and imagination were busy within me, expanding the vales, and increasing the hills, and giving me back my native place, in all the romantic loveliness with which the memory of age invests the scenes of its youth. But I had not gone far, till enthusiasm began to fail, and imagination to subside;—I saw no fair and well-known faces,—I heard not the greeting of friendly lips,—new generations inherited the land,—I had returned to a strange people. I walked on, and all the vale seemed changed;—the Solway rolled on with diminished waters,—the Nith was dried into a petty brook,—the houses seemed small, and the ways narrow. I had seen nature on her grandest scale,—had walked on loftier hills, and passed deeper rivers, and seen more populous cities,—and the glory of my native hills, and kirk, and castles, was eclipsed.

But other changes than those of the imagination had taken place;—the farmer's plough,—the navigator's spade,—and the architect's hammer, had been working wonders in the land. The hills where I had shot the heathcock waved green with grain,—the houses, low, and reeky, and uncomfortable, with floors of clay, and coverings of straw, now showed roofs of slate glittering in the sun, and floors of smooth stone or of shaven deal; while the streams which wandered at will, flooding the cottages and sweeping away the hopes of the farmer, now windied between long and sinuous lines of green embankments. I passed through Dumfries, and thought on its ancient gothic bridge of thirteen arches, with its defensive gate in the centre,—its massy walls,—its church, where Bruce spilt the blood of Comyn, and its old castle, which tradition still loves to connect by a subterranean way with the beautiful old abbey of Lincluden, where the vision of Liberty descended to Burns. And though many of these things which gave it fame and note have passed away, and live but in the memory of the angel, or in the romantic description of a modern geographer, I thought their absence was far more than compensated by the enchantments which the magic wand of plenty, and the enterprise of its merchants and tradesmen had wrought. The river which I had seen in my youth impeded by rocks, and navigation shut out by impassable sands, now moved wide and deep along, bearing many a going and coming sail,—the houses rose more lofty and regal,—the streets were purer and broader, and the hum of business and industry was heard far and wide. "My native town," I said, "thy ancient name of 'Bonnie Dumfries,'—which I have heard pronounced by one of the fairest and noblest of Scotland's daughters, becomes thee more than ever." I hurried through the good old town, which, overflowing the ancient limits of its walls, had pushed its streets far among the green fields and gardens, and hastened northward; for my heart lay with a little nook of undistinguished earth some miles up the river.

The sun was nigh to setting when I entered the upper vale of Nith, among the ancient strong holds of the Douglasses and Kirkpatriks. Here the hand of improvement had a heavier darke to do than even in the lower valley;—heath had been exchanged for corn,—wild hindberries and brambles, for the apple and the plum; and the rough-footed fowls of the moss and the ling had flown away before the flocks of innumerable sheep and cattle which covered all the higher pasture lands. The memorial stones of the martyrs, which I left among heather, I found among wheat,—their dwelling place sacred, and their legends renewed; the men who rode past me as I went, sat formerly in saddles of plaited straw, on shaggy and uncombed horses,—they were now in shining leather with silver mountings, and on steeds worthy of bearing the burthen of knighthood. The women who walked to the kirk on Sunday, went formerly in gowns of homely gray, spun by their own frugal hands,—they now flaunted in silks and in scarlets, and the youths fluttered in ruffles, and walked on the very limit of fashion. Here and there a broad blue bonnet, with tresses white and thin flowing from beneath it, might be seen,—here and there a dame in the antique and simple dress of the district, moved on stiff and stately,—and here and there a car without wheels dragged heavily along the ground,—and here and there a farmer persisted in old modes of cultivation, and rode proudly on sons of straw, with a halter of hair, rejoicing that in his person the simple patriarchal times were yet preserved. All else was changed! Though I could not help owning the increased wealth and beauty of the country, I looked upon it with something of sorrow:—the change seemed to me so violent and so sudden, that I shut my eyes and opened them again, to see that imagination was playing me none of her pranks. But the scene stood before me in invariable beauty,—the hills were there with their well remembered outline, and there was the hall of Drumlanrig,—once a palace in a desert, but now looking over a vast extent of orchards and inclosed fields. All this was proof that the place which I sought, and the dwelling of my kindred, was nigh.

At length, I reached the rising ground, from which Dalgarnock kirk, with its ranks of grave-stones, and its little village, are first visible to one travelling up the river bank. I stood on the very spot on which I stood in the morning of life, and gazed back on the vale with a full heart, when departing for a far country; I stood and gazed now, and my heart was scarcely less full when I observed that kirk and village were both gone, and that the plough had passed over the hearth of many a house dear to my heart, and that corn was waving where fifteen chimneys had smoked. I missed the kirk and the village, and I looked around for the signs by which I distinguished the abode of my fathers. There stood an ancient pillar of stone, with rude figures and uncouth symbols carved on its sides, at the foot of which, in old times, people met and transacted bargains, sold cattle, and disposed of land,—there grew the three oaks, so similar in shape, in stem, and in height, as to countenance the belief of the peasantry that not a bough or a leaf was on one but what had its companion on the others; and which, growing but a short step asunder, shoot up in a beautiful cone of green, and make them known by the name of the three brethren, wherever a Scotchman wanders. And beyond all these flowed the Nith, its clear stream scarce visible between its green banks, so much had it felt the influence of summer's heat. I singled out all these well-known memorials, but kirk and village were no longer visible. I was not prepared for this. I had heard, at times, of the visitations which death had made among the hearths of those I loved;—some had dropt away in the fulness of years,—some had sunk in their prime,—and some had found a grave in the raging sea, and other in the battle trench. One by one, therefore, had passed away of all I loved or esteemed, till one alone was left; but I had not heard that the village was desolate, and the kirk cast down,—they had still been present to my imagination; and when far distant, and after hot and perilous battle, when I seated myself on the ground, and washed my hands, and removed the stains of battle from my dress, my thoughts flew home, and Dalgarnock village and kirk rose before me, full of venerable and friendly faces.

With a slow step and an agitated heart I made my way towards the old burial ground,—for there I knew, whatever became of the kirk, the old sages of the parish would be buried; we are ever unwilling to mingle with other dust than that of our kindred. On the very brink of the river,—the walls of which the stream moistens when in flood, stood an old cottage, with a spot of garden in which a few coleworts grew,—the residence, when I went abroad, of a person so old that she was suspected of witchcraft, and withal so shrewd and adroit, that she contrived to levy a tax equal to her subsistence on the superstitious terrors and credulity of her fellow parishioners. I remembered her wandering from house to house collecting meal, barley, and cheese, clad in a white mutch, a gray gown, and a black mantle, carrying a long staff in her hand. Age, I reckoned, had long ago consigned her to a quiet grave; and if I had actually seen her rising in a winding sheet, I could not have been more startled than I was now on beholding her in the same dress, and with the self-same looks, seated upon a stone by the river side, enjoying the warmth of the descending sun. She had strewn her door-step with brackens and rushes, and there she sat spreading her withered hands in the summer heat, and looking towards the west, and muttering snatches of old superstitious prayers, half rhyme and prose, which were imagined in the darker days to contain spells against unhappy chances and the approach of evil spirits.

I stood and listened. When she concluded her prayers, she began to question their influence in her favour. "Hout, tout, why should I hang up these sapless shoots from the rotten tree of popery aboon my door head?—they cannot hinder old age and poverty to become ben, and these are the fiends which vex and scare me. What imp or saint, it matters not which, can put strength into my limbs, and marrow into my bones, and light into my een, that I might move about as I was wont, and get the plack and the penny, and the currie meal, and the ewe milk cheese, and an ell or two of the new web, as in reason I should. But auld age has worried up my skill, and the last time I tottered out there came after me many of the wicked youngsters, chips of the tree of perdition,—who shouted out 'witch,' and 'beldame,' and though I wished them ill enough, the fiend o' ane o' them was a plack the worse. But had it been Satan's will that they had treated my auld mistress of Scaur Water as, who learned me all that I ken of the craft, she wad have wagged her thumb, and some fool fowk would have moaned the death of their brats. Aye, she was the wife for the warld,—she could find siller where other fowk could see nought thicker than moonshine; and wi' dog's-plack, and herring bone, and hollow hemlock, could make a salve that would redeem ane frae the grips of death. I have seen her do't. But the spell o't's lost. I made some of the salve myself, and feigh! it was fit to poison a pool of toads; it took all the honey-comb of a wild bees' byke to seek the taste o't out of my mouth;" and she distorted her face, puckered her mouth in abhorrence, and coughed vehemently, and thus she continued her curious complaint:—

"Aye, aye, unsensie looks? nobody cares for unsensie looks now. I have seen on a day when they brought baked bread, and new cheese, and lapfuls of dainties. I mind the time when a glance of an uncanny ee was reckoned ruinous to any undertaking. The cow on whilk ane looked askance, shuddered, and refused to yield milk,—the horse ane frowned on threw its rider,—the bride who forgot to bid ane to her bridal, made her husband lord of a barren bed,—the lass who forgot to cast ane plack as she went to the tryste of her lover, never came maiden hame, and the proud-st hopes of men, and the wisest wishes of women, mis-gave and miscarried. But now, the fiend have Ginnie Gunson, if the weakest head of the parish heads whether she smile or frown. I think the spiritual kindom over on earth,—the reign of spell and pantraps gone. The only thing whilk has happened to my wish of late, was when Hachie Hetherton's cow burstud o'er a crib of dewy clover,—I ken whase four quarters he may thank for that,—he might have given me a pound of yellow butter as his dounce mother did afore him,—let him take that for making mouths at me. Od, I'm so sae auld and feckless as some folk trow;—there was proud Pennie Purdie, that used to cry after me, 'Witch, witch, score thy brow and burn thee.' I trow I gave her a dainty downcome with the wild lad of Moffat water. What wad ye think?—a gliff after gloaming fa, who should drop down by our gate and but Pennie Pennie. I ken o' your coming cummer, and I, ye are come for a cannie oast of my skill. See I gied her something that gaurd her skirl, and shriep—the locken browed limmer,—I ken'd weel how to do't;—I had done the samen wi' myself ere seventeen sinners were o'er my head,—she deserved it, she deserved it; what had she to do wi' my wee auld world ways!" And she arose and drew her mantle proudly about her, teased her head till all the remainder hairs danced for joy, and seemed to dilate herself with the thought that much of her old might remained unimpaired.

AFFECTING TALE.

[The following statement is extracted from the Nashville Gazette, not as a tale originating in a poetical fancy and embellished by the touches of a wild and wanton intellect, but as a relation of incidents which have actually occurred, and which, therefore, possess a more powerful claim on our attention and sympathy. The Gazette states, that the names are known, but from a wish to prevent any painful reflections to some that perhaps knew the parties, they are concealed.—Washington paper.]

"JANE ——— was the only daughter of a man, who, in the early part of his life emigrated to the United States from the North of Ireland. Accustomed to a life of industry, by application to business, and suffering from poverty in his youth, he regarded money as the only object worth a reasonable man's attention. By his diligence, he had amassed a large fortune, which it was known in the country his daughter would inherit. It is now more than forty years since I have seen her. She was then in the bloom of youth—hope and expectation gave to her a more interesting appearance than I ever yet witnessed.—She was about eighteen; possessing natural good sense, and accomplishments that rendered her the pride and admiration of her friends. Many were the suitors for her hand, but she refused them with such a grace and respect for their feelings that they loved her the more.—Among her admirers there was a young man, a native of Massachusetts, respectable by his talents and genius. He was a member of the bar, and though young, maintained a respectable standing among his brethren. He was loved by all classes, for his gentleman-like and manly deportment, and nature had given him a striking and interesting appearance. But as yet he was poor, and he owed to fortune nothing. Chance threw him in the company of JANE—an intimacy was formed, and he frequently visited her father's house, where he received not only that attention and marked politeness which he deserved by his standing in society, but also experienced that open hearted cordiality which marks the character of Irishmen.

"There is a secret attachment formed between congenial minds of which even the persons themselves are not aware, and often they are surprised at the hold they have got of each other's affections. This was the case with these two young persons. It was not until these circumstances took place that either of them ever suspected that they had loved each other. Among the suitors for the hand of JANE, was a man of about forty years of age, a widower, who was devoid of every principle that makes man noble, and whose riches were his only support in society. It is but justice to remark that his private character was unknown to the father of JANE.—He solicited a permission to wait on JANE, and received it, with hearty wishes from the father, for his success. He there met Mr. H. and his sagacity soon discovered that, which, though unknown to themselves, would prevent him from obtaining the object of his wishes. Fearful of meeting his rival openly, he took occasion of injuring the growing reputation of Mr. H. both as a man and a lawyer, and he too well succeeded.—His influence in society was great, and people could not disbelieve his insinuations—it was not possible, said they, that ever the dark hints of the rich Mr. T. could be without foundation—no, there must be something in them. As it was to be expected, his little practice declined every day and the cold looks of the people, were to his noble spirit worse than the loss of life. He determined on leaving the country, and waited on Jane for the purpose of taking leave of her, but unfortunately for both, notwithstanding all his prudence and determinations, he revealed his attachment, and they parted with the assurances of mutual love and fidelity.

“After the departure of Mr. H. the rich Mr. T. pressed his suit, and from some expressions of his, together with hints of his conduct to her lover, she was induced to believe that the misfortune and disappointment of both, might be attributed to his conduct. She refused him with contempt. He waited on her father, exposed to him the state of his property, and offered to settle a large estate upon her could the latter prevail upon Jane to become the wife of the former. The father dazzled with the offer, promised to use his influence, and if that would not be sufficient, his authority. He did both—but they were as yet useless. Mr. T. finding all his schemes prove abortive, and knowing well the cause of his failure, raised a report that Mr. H. died of a fever at —, to which place he had removed. This report was carefully conveyed to the ears of Jane, and which was further confirmed by the silence of her lover. She believed it—and to pacify, or rather to gratify her father, she became miserable by being the wife of Mr. F. From that hour she never knew peace. In following improperly the opinions of her father, and forgetting what was due to herself, her future life became wretched; and in performing what she conceived to be a duty she owed her father, she neglected the prior one, her own happiness.

“Some short time after her marriage, H. returned from where he had settled himself, and where he had gained a degree of eminence worthy of him—He came to claim her as his bride; but she was now another’s—not her heart, but her person. She saw him once, and but for a few minutes, when all was explained. He loved Jane too well to demand an explanation with her despicable husband, well aware what would be the consequences of such a proceeding—he returned to his place of abode unhappy. From that time Jane declined fast. A slow consuming grief seized fast hold on her—her husband became a gambler, and lost his only support in society—and Jane died in giving birth to a son, whom its grandfather took home. Too late he found that it was not money that could make his daughter happy, and soon after, he followed her to the grave. The unfortunate child, neglected by his father and deprived by death of his protector, was an outcast upon the world, until

Mr. H took him home as his adopted child. Years had rolled away since then, and he enjoys a comparative degree of peace; yet he looks forward with anxiety to that state of existence when the troubles of this life are lost in undisturbed felicity—where men can be happy without gold, and where the envenomed tongue of detraction can never be heard.”

POPULAR PREJUDICES AND SUPERSTITIOUS IDEAS PECULIAR TO THE ESTHONIANS.

Birth, Death, Baptism, &c.

Pregnant women, when they lay wood in the stove, take care not to put it in contrary to the branches; this would influence the manner in which the child will present itself at the birth. --- When two pregnant women sneeze at the same time, it is a sign they will have girls; if the two husbands sneeze, it announces that they will have boys. --- Great care is taken not to tread on the feet of pregnant women, otherwise their children would have deformed feet and crooked legs. --- As soon as a woman after her lying in can sit at table, she is placed at the upper end, to procure the infant good treatment and distinction during its life. --- Nothing heavy must be placed on a child's head, which would impede its growth. --- The first thing a child lays hold of indicates his future inclinations; the parents therefore place within his reach such things as they wish their children to be engaged with in future. --- When a child is born at the latter end of the week, it is a sign that he will marry late, or not at all. --- When the clergyman comes to visit a sick person, they remark whether his horse holds his head up, or the contrary; in the latter case they despair of the recovery of the patient. --- A funeral must never pass through a field, even if it is fallow. --- Many of the peasantry place near the deceased a brush, money, needle and thread, and so many necessary instruments to employ him in his long journey from this world to the other. --- On returning from a funeral, the hearse is not immediately brought under cover, but left for a time in the open air, that other members of the same family may not soon die. --- In some places food is put on the floor in a separate room, that the deceased may help himself. --- Others, holding a broom in their hands, evoke the souls of their deceased friends, and invite them to a feast; and when they suppose the defunct to have eaten sufficiently, the broom is broken in token of their dismissal, at the same time desiring them not to tread upon the rye as they go away.

They have very particular ideas respecting the resurrection of the dead; some do not believe in it at all. --- As they think on the day of judgment the churches will fall towards the north, they have great dislike to be buried on that side.

At the christening of a child, they observe whether it holds its head up or hangs it down. The former indicates robust health and long life; the last makes them fear an early death. --- During the christening the father of the child runs as fast as he can round the church, in order to secure to the infant the gift of agility and nimbleness. This custom is particularly in vogue among the inhabitants of the sea-coast, where this quality is most essentially necessary. --- They take great care not to have a christening soon after a funeral. --- The godfathers and godmothers do not look at each other during the ceremony; without this precaution, the infant baptized would be subject to troublesome diseases, and would have the alarming privilege of seeing spirits. --- Several parents fasten a ring to the child's linen, that he or she may marry early; others conceal money, bread, and garlic, in the child's garments, on the day of his christening. The two first ensure to him riches, and the last secures him from the power of witchcraft. --- They despair of the life of the child if he goes to sleep during the christening. --- The sponsors take care not to eat meat directly before the christening, that their godchild may not have the tooth-ache, which otherwise would be perpetual. --- Parents who have had the misfortune to lose their children in their infancy, often give to an infant the name of Adam or Eve, in the hope that the supernatural influence of these names will secure to the infant a long life. --- They avoid having their children christened on a Friday; Thursday, on the contrary, is a fortunate day. Many of them firmly believe that a child christened on a Friday will become good for nothing, and will perhaps even perish under the hands of the executioner.

They have also a thousand strange and superstitious ideas relative to the Communion:—There are some who, after having taken the consecrated wafer, endeavour, without being perceived, to take a part of it out of their mouth to use it for conjuring certain sorceries, and producing certain supernatural effects. --- On the day of the Communion it is almost a general custom to drink to excess, under the persuasion that it will add to the efficacy of the sacrament which they have received. --- On the night after they have taken the Communion they sleep with a part of the clothes they had on, generally their stockings. On the same day they carefully avoid the use of tobacco, and do not go into the bath for many days after.

When it thunders, many country people believe that it is God pursuing the devil, and they shut their doors and windows with the greatest care, lest the evil spirit should take refuge in their houses. --- Others place two knives in the window with the points upwards, to keep off the lightning. These latter do not suspect that they are such good natural philosophers. --- They regard with religious awe places and things struck by lightning; above all, stones which it has broken to pieces. Where such fragments are found, they believe that it was there the evil spirit took refuge when the hand of God struck him. --- Many believe the rainbow to be the scythe which the thunder makes use of to pursue the evil genii. --- Some fancy they can attract the wind by holding up a serpent or a hatchet; and in the latter case, by hissing towards the quarter of the horizon from which they desire the wind to come. --- On New Year's Eve, if any noise be heard in the house which they cannot easily account for, they are firmly persuaded that one of the family will die in the course of the year.

ST. ÆLIAN'S WELL.

(From the Album.)

Sometime within the last two years, there still existed in Denbighshire a well, called St. Ælian's, and supernamed, the Cursing Well. This well affords, perhaps, as strong an example as can be adduced of the force and inveteracy with which a popular superstition is capable of influencing the human mind, even in our enlightened and incredulous age. It was, together with a few fields, the property of a woman who held it by inheritance, and who, thanks to man's weakness and wickedness, found her patrimony, so small in appearance, an estate of no inconsiderable value. “The well of St. Ælian lies in a dingle, near the high road, leading from Llan Ælian to Groes in Irias: it was surrounded by a wall six feet high, and embosomed in a grove; the trees have been felled, and the wall thrown down.”—“The ceremony was performed by an old woman, in the following manner: After having received her fee, the name of the victim was marked on a piece of lead, this she dropped into the water, and muttered her imprecations, whilst taking from, and returning into, the well a certain portion of the water.” Mr. Pennant says, that he was threatened by a person whom he had offended, with a journey to this well, to curse him with effect. It seems, the patron of this fatal fount was one Ælian Gelmiad, who lived about the close of the fifth century, to whom there is a church dedicated in Arvon, and another in Mona.

Time out of mind has this well been celebrated for its very baneful and malignant property of securing the effect of a curse; that it possessed such a power, is not only as implicitly credited among the vulgar of our days as it would have been by all ranks in more barbarous ages, but what is far more to be lamented, and scarcely to be believed, hundreds of pilgrims annually visited it for the horrible purpose of fixing its withering influence on some neighbour who had excited their revengeful feelings. The man whose heart is set on cursing his fellow-creature, thinks a walk of twenty, thirty, or even forty miles, a trifling exertion, compared to the gratification of seeing a hated neighbour pine gradually away, till he expires under the effect of his deliberate malediction. It is difficult to believe that so fiend-like a spirit can inhabit a human bosom, or pollute a Christian land; but it is a fact, that numbers of ill-tempered, implacable Welshmen walk many miles every year, for the purpose of cursing him-whom Christ commanded us to forgive, though he should offend us, not seven times only, but seventy times seven. Let the following recent and well-authenticated instances, serve as illustration:—

There were two farmers living in Flintshire, whom we will call, if you please, Jones and Lloyd. Jones was a surly, gloomy, envious fellow, who spent his time in grumbling, and contrasting his lot with that of his more prosperous neighbour, instead of emulating his active, industrious habits; envy soon becomes hatred, and Lloyd happening to be the fortunate competitor in some little purchase of cattle or land, which each was desirous to make, the wicked and malignant spirit of Jones was exasperated to the height, and he vowed revenge on his unconscious neighbour, who was employing his hours in cheerful labour, and had no time to waste in brooding over schemes of hatred, or even for caring, or perceiving, what was going on in the unquiet mind of Jones. The latter, meanwhile, felt his own wretchedness, in some degree, appeased, by the soothing thought that he might, by a few words, bring death and ruin into the family of his neighbour, nor was he slow in executing his project. He set off one morning, with as much secrecy as his exultation would permit, to St. Ælian's well, a journey of thirty-four miles, but the anticipation of his beloved revenge shortened the way, and put fatigue out of the question. He made his application to the proprietress, or "Cursing Hag of the well," a denomination which her perseverance in this abominable traffic well merited. Having received the customary offering, without which the curse would have been powerless, she led him to the well, where he uttered his malediction in the terms she prescribed; wishing, with some accompanying imprecations, that his neighbour Lloyd, might be seized by a consuming malady, which should, ere long, terminate in death, and that he might die standing. Having lightened himself of this curse, which had been, for some time, sticking at his heart, he returned home: I never heard how he slept that night. He had now one subject of anxiety remaining, which was, that Lloyd might not discover what had happened, till he was within grasp of the charm; because, if a man discovered that some adversary had "put him into the well," within a given period, he might, by means of a counter offering, buy himself out. Jones, however, was too full of diabolical exultation, always to restrain it: especially when any one remarked the thriving fortunes of Lloyd, he could not forbear muttering some hint, that it would not last long, till a suspicion of the fact became prevalent, and some good-natured, foolish friend, thought he could not do better than warn the victim of his situation. Poor Lloyd shared, in common with his neighbours, an implicit faith in the baneful properties of the well; and, extremely terrified, he made all possible despatch to counteract the curse; but, on arriving at St. Ælian's fountain, he found the period was expired; his offering was positively rejected, and he must needs summon whatever of fortitude and resignation he could command, and wait the slow operation of the curse. He returned dejectedly home, convinced that his doom was irreversibly sealed; and so potently did this superstitious belief work on his imagination, that his spirits sank totally beneath the shock, hope entirely forsook him, his appetite and rest were gone, and he wasted rapidly and visibly. Towards the close of this melancholy scene, he became subject to long fits of delirium; during his last short interval, he inquired earnestly after his revengeful neighbour, expressed a hope that his wrath against him was appeased, and declared that he forgave, from his heart, the man who had persecuted him unto death. Having thus, by the last effort of his reason, proved himself a Christian, he relapsed into derangement, and shortly after died, leaving a wife and family to deplore the loss of so good a man.

How fared it, meanwhile, with the human fiend who wrought this mischief? Every creature regarded him with mistrust and abhorrence; and, in proportion as his victim had been beloved and pitied, he was execrated. There is something intolerable, even to the most unsocial being, in the consciousness of being universally odious, and Jones walked about among men with Cain's mark on his forehead; he was looked on as a visible demon; and if any one ministered to him, it was the effect of fear, and not of good will; these manifestations of dislike, combining with the whispers of his own dark conscience, were, as the first murderer expresses himself with regard to his own punishment, more than he could bear. He, in his turn, drooped and sickened, and was left to his feverish, miserable bed, and to his own embittered, remorseful feelings, for no man had any pity for him—no one prayed for his recovery. Were I inventing a tale, its catastrophe would probably be the death of Jones; but as I am relating a fact which has positively happened, I must not warp or modify, according to my own fancy, the circumstances attending it. Jones recovered his health, and is, I believe, now living. This story is true: the names of Jones and Lloyd are fictitious. This example is selected, in preference to many others, from my own knowledge of its authenticity, and that I am well acquainted with the minute particulars attending it.

From Brand, and other writers on popular superstitions, we gather that wells and fountains were objects of dread or reverence in the times of paganism, according as the nature of the nymph or demon who inhabited them was benign or malignant. It is well known that many of these absurdities were adopted and avowed in the darker ages of Christianity; nay, St. Winifred's fountain at Holy-well is, at this hour, an existing proof that this superstition is yet alive, even amongst enlightened, or at least well educated, Catholics, and maintained and encouraged by their bishops and ecclesiastics. Happily St. Winifred's influence is as benevolent as that of St. Ælian, (who must surely belong to the calendar of his infernal majesty,) is perverse and malicious. In consequence of a trial, of which Fynnon Ælian, or the Well of Ælian, was the subject, the justices of the peace for the county of Denbigh met to consult on the means of ridding the country of this disgraceful evil; according to their sentence, the well was choked up with rubbish, and its ancient proprietress prosecuted: so we may hope that the practice of "cursing with effect" is effectually abolished.

ON ANCIENT HOUSE SIGNS.

(From the Gentleman's Magazine.)

The origin of House Signs may be referred back to a very remote period. The distinguishing characteristic of any object, amongst a barbarous and uncivilised people who paid but little regard to the proper title of things, has sometimes supplied a name indicative of some peculiar trait in its character, which, by universal adaptation, has superseded its more correct denomination; these titles have been embodied and rendered in a palpable form, as the still-existing hieroglyphics and emblems of this description attest.

The Phonetic characters of the Egyptians represented natural objects; the names of which, in their language, began with the sound of that letter they wished to express. The names therefore, of persons or things in this character, would bear a striking affinity to the heraldic rebuses now in use; and as it is not improbable that these names were affixed to the houses of this people, or to acquaint the reader with the description of wares to be had there, suspended before their shops, there is reason to suppose that the custom of thus distinguishing man from man, which we are told did not obtain until the "days of chivalry," has been resorted to time immemorial.

Johnson imagined armorial bearings to be as old as the siege of Thebes; and in support of this idea, instanced a passage in the "Phœnician Virgins" of Euripides.

That the use of signs is of considerable antiquity, we have the testimony of St. Luke, who tells us, that St. Paul, after his shipwreck at Malta, "departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered there, whose sign was Castor and Pollux."

It was deemed advisable among our grandfathers, to prefix the affirmative, "this is," before naming the sign, as may be seen in the old names of streets still existing.

It is justly observed in the "Adventurer," that "it cannot be doubted but that signs were intended originally to express the several occupations of their owners, and to bear some affinity in their external designations to the wares to be disposed of. Hence the Hand and shears is justly appropriated to Tailors, as the Hand and pen is to Writing-masters. The Woolpack plainly points to us the Woollen Draper; the Naked Boy, elegantly reminds us of the necessity of clothing; and the Golden Fleece, figuratively denotes the riches of our staple commodity."

The majority of signs are common charges in heraldry; such are the Boar's Head, and the Golden Lion. Three is a heraldic number; and we find it in frequent use, as the 3 Compasses, the 3 Pigeons; and I have by me a book published "at the 3 Daggers in Fleet-street, near Inner Temple Gate, 1654."

And this offers an apology for the varied and unnatural adaptation to some animals, of colours to which they cannot otherwise lay claim, such as—Blue Bears, Golden Lions, Green Dragons, and that "rara avis in terris" the Black Swan.

The Bunch of Grapes is, I think, never appended elsewhere than over the door of a Publican; and if we find the Three Tuns, which I think had its rise in the Vintners' Company, prefixed their arms on boards rented of them, in any other station, we may impute it to the cause here noted. Our modest ancestors were contented with a plain Bough stuck up before their doors, whence arose the wise proverb, "Good wine needs no bush;" and the custom is still continued in many parts of the Continent. Might not the Fox and Goose, now so universally adopted by publicans, intimate that the game bearing this title was to be played there, in the same manner as a representation of a Skittle and Jack now invite to "a good day skil-ground."

The Gun was doubtless a symbol of the Gunsmith, though we find it assumed by a Bookseller, "Nathan Ekins, in Paul's Church Yard."

The Bell was the prerogative of the Look-smith, though we find it in use among all trades: by some of whom it has been claimed as a rebus on their name.

The enormities practised by the connexion of objects so widely different from each other, as the Fox and Seven Stars, the Goose and Gridiron, the Bell and Neat's Tongue, the Lamb and Dolphin, and the Leg and Star, "over against the Royal Exchange, in Cornhill, London, 1658,"—may be reconciled by the following illustration:—"It is usual for a young tradesman, at his first setting up, to add to his own sign that of the master whom he served, as the husband after marriage gives a place to his mistress's arms in his own coat."

These whimsicalities have been rendered still more ridiculous by the perversion of names from their original import: thus we have the Swan with Two Necks—q. d. the swan with two necks—or marks.

We are told by an inscription over the Talbot Inn-Yard, in the Borough, that Geoffrey Chaucer and twenty-nine pilgrims rested there on their journey to Canterbury, in 1489. Its present title is a corruption of Tabard, the name given "to a jacket, or sleeveless coat, whole before, open on both sides, with a square collar, winged at the shoulder," somewhat similar to that worn by our heralds in pageants and processions, and when worn "in the wars," like it having "their arms embroidered or otherwise depicted thereon."

The witty poet of "olden time" notices at length the accommodation afforded in "Southwerk, at the Tabard," to him and his fellow travellers.—

"We nine-and-twenty in a campaign
Of sundry folk."—Lines 24, 25.

He informs us—

"The chambers and the stables weren wide
And wel we weren esed atte beste."—L. 24, 25.

And proceeds to acquaint us with

"The estate, the arraile, the nombre and eke the cause
Why that assembled was the compaignie
In Southwerke at this gentill hostellerie
That highte the Tabard."—L. 718, 721.

We have the Bell-Savage—represented in the Spectator's time by the figure of a wild man standing beside a bell—for the Belle Sauvage; and the Bull and Mouth or the Boulogne Mouth; i. e. harbour. Stow, speaking of Gisor's Hall, has these remarks, so peculiarly applicable to our present purpose:

"It appears (says he) that this Gisor's Hall of late time, by usurpation, hath been called Gerrard's Hall for Gisor's Hall; Bevis Marks for Bury's Marks; Mark-lane for Martine; Bulliter-lane for Bell Setter's-lane; Gutter-lane for Wetherston's-lane; Cry or Cree Church for Christ's Church; St. Michael's in the Quern for St. Michael's at Corn, and so others."

In Pannier-alley, Newgate-street, is the figure of a kyd boy, sitting on what has been generally represented as a pannier, but which resembles more a coil rope.

It bears the following inscription:

WHEN YV HAVE SOUGHT
THE CITY ROYND
YET STILL THIS IS THE HIGHEST GROUND
AVGVST THE 27
1688.

By some, this figure has been considered as emblematic of plenty, and once held in its hand a bunch of peas; but Hagson supposes it the sign of one Eury Præmell, citizen and vintner. Pennant imagines it to have been originally a sepulchral monument, moved from some adjoining church, but, from the singular appropriateness of the inscription to its present situation, I am inclined to think it still retains its original position.

The privilege of distinguishing swans by marks or nicks, is a privilege of sufficient consequence to deserve a place in our and incorporation charters, for we find "the privilege of marking and preserving swans and cygnets, and a swan-mark or swan," with liberty "to change and alter that swan-mark or plumage," frequently vouchsafed in deeds of this description.

A THOUGHT.

Written on the first day of the New Year.

(FROM THE FRENCH)

Waking from my sleep, I said,
Another year prepares for flight,
Which soon will vanish—soon have fled
Like airy visions of the night.
Reflection vain! but fancy frail!—
Imagination's protean mould!—
A year one day my eyes will hail—
A year whose close I ne'er behold.

GROG AND SEA-BISCUITS.

An Old Story versified.

Two maiden dames of sixty-two Together long had dwelt,
Neither, alas! of Love so true
The bitter pangs had felt.

But age comes on they say, apace,
To warn us of our death,
And wrinkles mar the fairest face,
At last it stops our breath.

One of these dames tormented sore
With that curst pang, tooth-ache,
Was at a loss for such a bore
What remedy to take,

"I've heard," thought she, "this ill to cure
A pipe is good, they say;
Well then, tobacco I'll endure,
And smoke the pain away."

The pipe was lit, the tooth soon well,
And she retir'd to rest—
When thus the other ancient belle
Her spinster mate address'd.

"Let me request a favour, pray I—"
"I'll do it if I can—"

"Oh! well then, love, smoke every day
You smell so like a man!"

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOUTHPORT.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Paul Pry writes well. He gives us a romantic description of this "sandy" village. Could he not have amused himself and others by presenting an animated picture of scenes equally interesting to those which he has so beautifully enlarged upon? Could he not have told us how pleasant a thing it was to see ladies walking on the shore, whilst men in a state of nudity approached the bathing machines with water scarcely up to their knees? How very agreeable it must be to behold one's wife, daughters, and sisters bathing at one and the same time "cheek by jowl" with all descriptions of men, both high and low! "What a source of delight" it must be to the ladies to have "handsome John," or some other handsome fellow to bathe them! Such "sublime and beautiful sights are daily to be seen at this neat and elegant watering place," and it really requires the "eyes of Argus to pay attention to them all." But to be serious. I hesitate not to say, that at no watering place in Great Britain is decency so openly violated as at Southport. It is complained of by every one—yet opposed, apparently, by none. Those who have witnessed the various disgusting scenes, I have alluded to, will not, cannot, easily forget them. At the same time it must be admitted as a lamentable fact (and I am sorry to state it) that at Southport, ladies appear to have no great objection to be spectators of those unseemly sights, of which, at home, they would blush at even the bare thought. If Paul Pry can offer any thing in "extenuation of such deeds," I hope the columns of the Iris will be open to him.

VARIETIES.

A SHAVER.—In one of the large towns of England, a traveller passing a barber's shop, saw on the window, "What do you think, I'll shave you for nothing; and give you some drink." He immediately concluded, "He's a droll fellow, I'll go in." He did so; and sat down to be shaved. Under the operation he inquired into the state of trade, and was answered, that it was flat. He then adverted to the address on the window, and if he really acted upon it, and shaved for nothing, observing that he said so. "O no!" replied the barber; "people do not read right;" and then read it for him: "What! do you think I'll shave you for nothing, and give you some drink."

MARBLE PONDS OF PERSIA.—This natural curiosity consists of certain pools, or plashe, whose indolent waters, by a slow and regular process, stagnate, concreate, and petrify, producing that beautiful transparent stone commonly called Tahrir marble, much used in the burial places of Persia, and in their best edifices. These ponds are contained within the circumference of half a mile, and their position is distinguished by heaps of stone, which have accumulated as the excavations have increased. The petrificative process may be traced from its commencement to its termination; in one part the water is clear; in a second, it appears thicker and stagnant; in a third, quite black; and in its last stage it is white like a heavy frost. When the operation is complete, a stone throws on its surface makes no impression, and a man may walk over it without wetting his shoes. Such is the constant tendency of this water to become stone, that when it exudes from the ground in bubbles, the petrification assumes a globular shape, as if the bubbles of a spring, by a stroke of magic, had been arrested in their play, and metamorphosed into stone. The substance thus produced is brittle, transparent, and sometimes richly streaked with green, red, and copper coloured veins. It admits of being cut into very large slabs, and takes a good polish. So much is this stone looked on as an article of luxury, that none but the King, his sons, and persons privileged by special firms, are permitted to take it.

IMMENSE SWARM OF LOCUSTS.—Soon after an earthquake, or seaguake, that occurred at Cabenda, and which extended to some distance to the southward and northward of that port, a sight of locusts took place, that continued three days and three nights, so that the sea was literally covered with their drowned carcasses; and the ship's decks, masts, yards, and rigging swarmed with them, to such excess, as to require the constant attention of the crews, to sweep them overboard. The earthquake, which had preceded their flight only a few hours, drove in upon the shore from the westward several tremendous seas, so as to cause some of the vessels, when in the trough of them, to strike the ground in five and a half fathoms of water. Many of the natives, both here and at Malemba, were drowned upon the beach, in consequence of it being so very narrow, and the cliffs which bound it so extremely precipitous, that they could not escape the overwhelming waves which came suddenly upon them. To this calamity was added, the destruction of many canoes, by this sudden inundation of the sea; and the locusts destroyed every blade of grass and all the vegetable productions of the soil, for many miles round.—Adams.

PRONE SAVAGE.—It is stated in a letter from a traveller in Batavia, that a savage has been found in the woods of the island, who must, it is thought, have lost himself in the earlier part of his youth. He now seems to be about 30 years of age, yet speaks no articulate language, but bellows like a brute; or rather barks, as his voice is like a dog. He runs on all-fours, and as soon as he perceives any human being, he climbs up a tree like a monkey, and springs from one branch to another. When he sees either a bird or game, he catches at it, and very seldom misses his prey. As yet he has not been able to accustom to the usual mode of living and food of the human species.

ENGLISH OPIUM.—Messrs. Cowley and Staines, of Wimslow, Bucks, have cultivated poppies for opium, with such success, as to induce the belief that this branch of agriculture is of national importance and worthy of support. In 1821 they produced 60 pounds of solid opium, equal to the best Turkey, from rather less than four acres and a half. The seed was sown in February, came up in March, and the gathering commenced in the latter end of July, when the poppies had lost their petals and were covered with a bluish white bloom. By horizontal incisions, opium was procured from them daily, until the produce would no longer bear the expense; 97 pounds 1 ounce were obtained for £31. 11s. 2½d. which, when properly evaporated, yielded 60 pounds of dried opium. The poppies stood till they became yellow, about the middle of August; they were then pulled and laid in rows on the land, and when dry, seeds were got from them amounting to 13 cwt. which was expected to yield 71½ gallons of oil. The oil-cake was used with great advantage in feeding cattle. From the capsule from which the seed is obtained, an extract may be got by cold water, eight grains of which are equal to one of opium, an acre producing 80 pounds, and the poppy straw, when laid in the yard in a compact heap makes excellent manure. The quantity of opium consumed in this country is about 50,000 pounds, which could be easily raised in many parts where there is dry land and a superfluous population. On the moderate calculation of 10 pounds per acre, 5000 acres would be sufficient, which would employ about 50,000 people, such as are not calculated for common agricultural labour, and at a time when there is scarcely other labour for them, viz. between hay time and harvest.

SINGULAR INSTANCE OF DEXTERITY IN THE ART OF THIEVING.—The village of Seringapettah, near Tanjore, in Southern India, has long been noted for the dexterity of its thieves. The following anecdote is related by Major Mackworth, on the authority of Col. Blackburne, in his Diary of a Tour through Southern India, Egypt, and Palestine, in the years 1821 and 1822. Some years ago, a detachment of the King's artillery, intending to halt there for the night, were advised of this propensity of the natives, and recommended to be well on their guard against it. The two officers in charge of the detachment, as well as the men, ridiculed and scorned the idea of these poor wretches being able to rob the King's artillery; but they nevertheless took the precaution of placing sentries over all the tents, and a double one at that of the quarter guard, with strict orders to be more than usually watchful and vigilant. The inhabitants of Seringapettah, through the means of the native servants, heard that their skill in thieving was set at naught, and their vanity was proportionably piqued. Next morning the officers rising early, missed nothing, and began to exult in their security, when one of the sergeants arrived, with shame and dismay pictured on his countenance, and informed them, that the whole of the arms belonging to the main guard were missing, and that all the natives had abandoned the village. Every search, though undertaken instantly, was in vain, and the detachment was compelled to march unarmed! The manner in which this dexterous theft was achieved, long remained unknown; but many years afterwards, when the circumstance was almost forgotten, the villagers themselves voluntarily surrendered the same arms to the authorities of the country, and declared they had taken them, merely because their skill in thieving had been called in question. Being asked how they had contrived to steal them from the centre of a tent, the guard sleeping around them, and two sentries outside, they gave the following account:—several of them stripped themselves naked, and oiled their bodies over, that, if caught, they might not easily be held. They then approached that part of the tent where the sentry in the rear was posted, who, as usual, was walking about twenty paces, backwards and forwards. The night was dark, and the boldest and most dexterous among them advanced obliquely towards the tent, creeping on his belly, lying still while the sentry was pacing towards him, and only moving on, slowly and cautiously, when his back was turned. In this way he arrived at the tent, and his black body was, in the darkness of the night, invisible to the sentry. He now, without much difficulty, lifted up a part of the tent, having carefully removed one of the pegs, and soon discovered that all the guard were asleep, relying on their double sentries. By this time, the other villagers had followed their leader, and were all lying on the ground in the same posture, with the head of each touching the feet of the one next before him. In this way, the arms, being slowly and individually removed, without the slightest noise, were passed along, with equal caution, from one to another, until the whole were secured, and the thieves retired as they came unseen and unsuspected, proving the truth of the old adage, though in a different sense, that they who live will steal.

PHEASANTS.—It is not generally known, that pheasants are beneficial to the farmers. This was lately fully proved at Whitney-Court, in Hertfordshire, where a hen pheasant was shot, which excited the notice of the sportsmen, from the immense size of the craw, which, on being opened, was found to contain more than half a pint of that destructive insect, the wire-worm.

THE TREASURES OF THE DEEP.

(From the New Monthly Magazine.)

What hid'st thou in thy treasure-caves and cells?
Thou hollow-sounding and mysterious Main!
—Pale glistening pearls, and rainbow-colour'd shells,
Bright things which gleam unreck'd of, and in vain.
—Keep, keep thy riches, melancholy sea?
We ask not such from thee.

Yet more, the Depths have more!—What wealth untold
Far down, and shining through their stillness lies!
Thou hast the starry gems, the burning gold,
Won from ten thousand royal Argosies.
—Sweep o'er thy spoils, thou wild and wrathful Main!
Earth claims not these again!

Yet more, the Depths have more!—Thy waves have roll'd
Above the cities of a world gone by!
Sand hath fill'd up the palaces of old,
Sea-weed o'ergrown the halls of revelry!
—Dash o'er them, Ocean! in thy scornful play,
Man yields them to decay!

Yet more! the Billows and the depths have more
High hearts and brave are gather'd to thy breast!
They hear not now the booming waters roar,
The battle-thunders will not break their rest,
—Keep thy red gold and gems, thou stormy grave—
Give back the true and brave!

Give back the lost and lovely!—those for whom
The place was kept at board and hearth so long;
The prayer went up through midnight's breathless gloom,
And the vain yearning woke 'midst festal song!
Hold fast thy buried isles, thy towers o'erthrown,
—But all is not thine own!

To thee the love of woman hath gone down,
Dark flow thy tides o'er manhood's noble head,
O'er youth's bright locks and beauty's flowery crown;
—Yet must thou hear a voice—Restore the dead!
Earth shall reclaim her precious things from thee,
—Restore the Dead, thou sea!

"Despise not the value of things that are small."

ENIGMA.

There is a certain natural production, neither animal, vegetable, nor mineral; it exists from two, to six feet, from the surface of the ground;—neither male nor female, but generally between both; has neither height, length, breadth, nor thickness; is often mentioned in the Old Testament, and strongly recommended in the New.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. Tamper's outline is quite enough: the ladies should be allowed to cater for themselves.—We have lately had so many communications upon female stays, waists, forms, and fashions, and all from the masculine gender, that we are under the necessity of consigning them, indiscriminately, to the tomb of all the Capulets.

Leonora shall have no further cause of complaint.

R. Y. is mistaken, or misinformed; he should apply personally, at least direct.—Not that we altogether admire his arrangement, or coincide with his particular views; we think several amendments necessary.

Elizabeth excites our compassion.—We admire the intensity of affection, but think extremes should be avoided.

A Constant Reader; Neclius Juvenis; Paul Pry; Love's Labour Lost; and a number of Sonnets—are received.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE PAST!

HOW sweet,—how dear to the heart, are the recollections of the past—the scenes of youth and hope, the dreaming days of pleasure; they bring with them their own sweet odour, like the soft breathing of a summer morn over a bed of flowers; there is an hallowed light continually around them. Hours and hours have I spent, seated in my easy chair, before a fading fire, the candle drooping in the socket, rising and falling, struggling like poor man for a moment more of existence, my book in one hand and my head reposing on the other, lost in the charming reverie of days gone by. I was always fond of quiet and solitude, from the first moment I could distinguish the gradations of pleasure. When at school and absent, my tutor always knew where I should be found, my own bed-chamber, or a park adjoining the village. Here the moments flew fast; I wandered by the side of the rippling stream, and watched the golden trout, I followed the nimble squirrel, and put to flight the bounding deer; perhaps sketched some distant view that took my fancy, or read the pages of some interesting volume,—books and nature were my great delight. Yet even in those days care will haunt us. It is a wrong conception to suppose childhood the peculiar period of happiness; if our troubles are not then of so great magnitude, our minds are equally incapable of bearing them. What can be a greater source of fear and dismay, than to behold the rod hanging in terrorem over us; or when do we now experience greater anxiety, than that which formerly sprang from our not being able to place a correct exercise, before the penetrating glance of Master Thwackum. To the best of my recollection, this, in years past, was as great a source of trouble, as the loss of a customer, or a bad debt, is at this period. Time magnifies the mind as our troubles are increased, and it is the wisdom of Providence which bids them spring together. Our delights, too, are the same; the more we become capable of supporting care, the less susceptible are we of smaller pleasures; what was once happiness, is now deemed folly. The thoughts of seeing home, were formerly anticipated many weeks before the day arrived, and every moment was filled with some pleasing speculation who would be ready to meet us, where we should first behold father and mother, how the time was to be spent, and a thousand pleasing fancies, filled up the interval with joys of imagination, day dreams of delight. Would it be so now?—no, we have learnt by experience that pleasure is as a bubble on the face of the water; the moment we seize it the shadow is gone. We now feel more delight in recounting our numerous follies, in musing and reflecting upon scenes that have faded away, than in merely anticipating the future. When children, there was pleasure even in the expectation of a sunny day, in watching every variation of cloud that passed along, for fear it should amass itself in gloom and darkness. Now we arise, thank heaven it was a fine day yesterday, and look for a shower before evening! Really I should have no wish, (might I be allowed) to spend those hours again, if they were to be accompanied with the same feelings of anxiety and fear; though looking at them through the telescope of time,—considering them as days gone by, they give to the mind the sweetest of sensations. The dear delights of an expected holiday, the pleasure arising from a trick played upon the patient usher, the ecstasy of an unlooked for visit or present from home, were all overwhelmed by their respective troubles. But there are other days, other scenes I love most to dwell upon, when leaving school and school-boy thoughts behind, I soared to higher paths, higher enjoyments. When ambition fired my breast, when I longed to follow in the steps of those great characters whom my country had been proud to claim, whom others envied, to whose deeds all nations paid the tribute of respect—over whose tomb none ceased to mourn. At one time how I revelled in the delightful witcheries of Shakespeare, meeting my friends at every turn, “the action suited to the word,” with exclamations of love, or raging bursts of passion, sighing with Romeo, storming with Othello, declaiming with Brutus, and weeping with Hamlet. I fancied myself already a Kean, I heard the shouts of bravo, the thunders of applause, and already saw my name in scarlet characters that they might be the better read, announcing me positively for one night only. I remember once suddenly turning upon a Yorkshire servant of my father’s, with the tremendous exclamation of “Wretch I’ll tear thee piece meal,” “Yees sir, yees sir,” cried the undaunted tyke, “but dunna tear ma inexpressibles.”—At another time I became in my own conceit a second Curran, and was continually addressing myself to “my Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury.” Again, mounting upon a chair or sofa, I fancied myself a Chalmers, and put forth my orations as a great divine; at length, however, the scene vanished, and another in the shape of a moonlight night, a garden and a delightful girl, bound me in a spell that never changed.—And this is youth, the morning of life, the dream of happiness; how sweet the recollection—I could muse on such scenes for ever; but my taper grows dim, the stars are glittering on high, the mists are rolling over the dark blue mountains, nature seems to set me the example, and I retire to rest.—There will a time come, when that rest shall never be broken.

PAUL PRY.

PRIDE AND IGNORANCE.

(From the French.)

Panphile, a respectable citizen of Salerno, a virtuous enlightened man, not opulent, but possessing a competency, lived happily at home. His motto was that of Horace—aurum mediocritas.—Left a widower in the prime of life, with an only son,—this image of his beloved wife, this interesting pledge of their love, became the object of all his thoughts and affections. The young Theotime was twelve years of age, and fond of study; consequently, the pains which his father took to form his heart and adorn his mind were not ill-bestowed. The tutor’s zeal and the scholar’s progress kept pace with each other, and joy and happiness were the result. Panphile had so much confidence in his son’s discretion, that he left him at full liberty in his choice of books, both ancient and modern.

One day, Theotime entered his father’s apartment, his countenance beaming with joy, and exclaimed,—“Ah! papa, what a beautiful thing I have been reading! what a happy idea! what a useful discovery!”—“Well, my son, what is it?”—“Oh! how delightful!—but I dare not—”—“Speak.”—“I fear you will ridicule me.”—“No, no; speak, go on.”—“You will say it is a folly, but really I think it a desirable folly.”—“A desirable folly! I cannot understand you; explain yourself.”—“Well, I obey.”—He then related the story of Momus, who, chosen as umpire between Neptune, Minerva, and Vulcan, the first of whom had produced a bull, the second a house, and the third a man, gave the palm to the latter: at the same time remarking to Vulcan, that he ought to have opened a little window in the man’s heart, in order that hatred or friendship, truth or falsehood, might be easily discerned there.—“Well, papa, is not Momus’s idea both ridiculous and brilliant?”—“Ridiculous, indeed;—but far from brilliant.”—“What! papa, the little window?”—“Is quite useless, and might do harm.”—“Do harm?”—“Yes, my child, it would destroy all friendship.”—“Oh! papa, you would always be my friend!”—“Very true,” said Panphile, embracing him, “but you must agree that the window is at least not necessary: as a testimony of this is the following line of some poet:

“With the eye of the mind the heart is seen.”

You are at present too young to feel the force of this truth, but you will one day acknowledge, with me, that study, experience, and observation, enable us to discover, in the eyes and countenance of a man, the thoughts and feelings he would conceal in his heart.”—“Do you really think so?”—“I hope to be able to prove the truth of my assertion in the course of our walk: let us therefore set out.”

Panphile and his son proceeded towards the great square of the city; here the attention of Theotime was quickly arrested by a man magnificently dressed, whose countenance was proud, his gait grave, and, though bowed to by every one, he either did not return their salutations, or did so disdainfully. “What do you think of that man,” said Panphile to his son. “I think he must be some great personage renowned for his birth, talents, and virtues.”—“For his birth, perhaps; but not for his virtues nor his talents.—Observe the homage that is offered to him, and to which he vouchsafes no attention; he is either a coxcomb or a fool!”—“Papa, what are you venturing to say?”—“The truth.” Whilst uttering these words, Panphile saw one of his friends, a banker, named Cratillo, who, approaching the proud noble, whispered familiarly in his ear, and received from him a bow of protection, upon which he retired with a profound obeisance. Panphile accosted his friend, and questioned him concerning this stranger: Cratillo informed him that he was a Sicilian prince, and that he was going to his house in the afternoon to pay him a bill of exchange. Upon this Panphile begged that he would contrive some means of enabling him and his son to observe more nearly this prodigy of pride and vanity, which Cratillo promised to do. Accordingly, Theotime and Panphile, disguised as stock-brokers, accompanied Cratillo to the hotel of the Sicilian prince. He had just risen from table when the banker and his two agents were announced; impatient to receive his money, he ordered them to be introduced immediately. They entered, and found the coxcomb extended on a sofa covered with an elegant robe-de-chambre, his pipe in his mouth, and he raving and swearing at his valet, but without turning his head or making the least movement. Cratillo, Panphile, and Theotime advanced, and placed themselves in front of him, bowing profoundly; he noticed them with a gruff 'good day,' but did not move.—In the room, which was very small, were six straw chairs; three of them were covered with the coats, boots, and arms of the Sicilian prince; the other three, which were close to the sofa, were occupied by a great dog, a comedian, and a little monkey, three of his highness's favourites; 'You have brought my money,' said he to Cratillo, without looking at him: 'Yes, your highness.' Whilst Cratillo was counting the money into the Sicilian's lap, Panphile and Theotime presented him a book, to put his signature at the bottom of a receipt, which was ready written. The coxcomb appeared embarrassed, pretended not to see them, and did not sign the receipt. Just then a booky entered in great haste and announced a bookseller; 'Shew the rascal in,' said his master. The bookseller made his appearance, and presented him with a new work in four volumes. 'What a horrible binding!' cried the prince; he then opened the book and read,—The Works of Demosthenes translated into Italian. 'What nonsense have we here? I want no French authors: I like none but ancient writers! what say you my dear Pascal?' (the name of the comedian). 'Your highness is quite right.'—'Sarely your highness must be mistaken, or else you are joking,' said the bookseller. 'What! I mistaken,—I joking, with a wretch like you: holla, there, drive this fellow out of the house immediately.' The bookseller attempted a reply, but his voice was drowned by the cries of the prince and the clamour of his valets, who drove the poor man away with the greatest violence. Cratillo, Panphile, and Theotime stifled their laughter, and stood waiting for the signature. At length the prince seemed disposed to write his name, and, for that purpose, he endeavoured to place himself on the sofa in a convenient posture; this, however, he was not able to do; he therefore rose, walked to the table, pretended to write, stopped, called his secretary, but he did not appear. The prince flew into a violent passion and was getting outrageous, when a footman came running with a note of great importance, to which an immediate answer was required.—'Zounds! where is my secretary? My dear Pascal, write an answer in my name.' The comedian bowed, pleaded great haste, begged to be excused, and left the apartment. Neither of them knew how to write!

Cratillo, Panphile, and Theotime, seeing it was impossible to get the signature, retired without waiting to get the surly 'Good day' of the enraged nobleman. As soon as they were in the street they all three exclaimed, 'Demosthenes a Frenchman and a modern!' 'Not know how to write! Not able to sign his name!'—'Well, my son,' said Panphile, 'I think that you have been able, without the aid of the little window, to read in the heart of this great personage, "Pride and Ignorance." You perceive that he is every way fit to pass his life with dogs, buffoons, and monkeys.—Lit. Chron.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

"Good bye, Dick!" said an elderly lady—one foot on the step of her carriage, her left hand hold of the body, and turning half round, her right extended to a bold, handsome-looking gentleman in a radical hat. I am no physiognomist; but I love to trace the goodness of the heart when 'tis pictured in the countenance. I know a man may "smile, and smile, and be a villain;" but I'd rather have a feeling of benevolence and harmony for all human nature, than one grain of splenetic animosity. However here there could be no deception; 'twas plain matter-of-fact—an index, and no errata. There was something, too, so very expressive in the lady's countenance—it was a look that cannot be described; like the sun bursting through a shower—mingling pleasure and grief. The remains of beauty were visible in her face; or rather it was beauty still, though differing from her youthful day of frolic mirth, resembling a calm evening after a lovely noon. "Good bye, Dick!" said she; "I shall take an airing this way again before long. 'Good bye!' The hands were disjoined, she entered the carriage, and the parties disappeared. "Who is that gentleman?" said I to one of the old dolphin-strikers that stood century at the door. "That gentleman, Sir," replied the veteran, "is Sir R——K——, our Commander-in-Chief, and a worthier fellow never stepp'd 'twixt stem and stern. This is his cabin—his house I mean. He is a sailor, Sir, and that's saying every thing. But I'm on duty, and mustn't stand up speechifying; yet if you want to know any thing about him, I often sees you here—Ax for Tim Bobstay, and I'll—yes, I'll give you a spell."—"Thank ye, Tim, thank ye, my worthy soul, I'll take you at your word." So he shoulder'd his thing-hum-be (all-but I think they call it,) and stood as erect as a fathom of smoke.

A group of old blades were assembled on the terrace, cutting their jokes and gabbling like wild-geese on a common. I stole among them, sat down, and pulling out a book, appeared to be reading with profound attention. "Then you know nothing about it," roared an old rough knot in a laced coat and cocked-up hat. He had left his left arm in the Mediterranean when he lent a fist to thrash the French out of Acre, under Sir Sidney Smith. But that was nothing; he never could be persuaded that it was placed upon the right shoulder, and this did away with the argument. One of his legs too had danced itself off while leading up the middle at Lord Cochrane's attack upon the French fleet in Basque Roads; moreover his starboard eye had sunk into his head, as he used to say, to search for his brains, but it threw no light upon the subject.—"Then you know nothing about it; Sir Sidney had both a head and a heart, and when alongside of the enemy, would hammer away like a coppersmith. Bless his honest face and his curly wig!—he was none of your fantazzy-magoria sort of fellows; and now you've put me up, I'll e'en sit down and give you a curious antidote about him. D'ye see he had his flag flying in the Foudroyant, at the time the Portygeese nutmeg-grated to the Brazils—homo-grated I mean—and took French-leave of their country. We brought up in Port Praya at St. Jago's, one of the Cape Verds, and after the usual salutes and bon bows the Admiral went ashore to dine with the Governor. Well, he was ushered into the saloon, and introduced to a stranger dress'd in deep black, who had been landed some days before from a Yankee schooner, to collect plants for bottom-me I think they calls it. After introduction, Sir Sidney whispered his Head-to-come, and the officer immediately withdrew. So, d'ye see, they sat down to dinner. Well, just as the disheart was set upon the table, in comes the Officer again, bringing with him the Captain of Marines. The Admiral rose from his seat, turned round, and pointing to the gentleman in black, said, 'Captain H——, you'll consider this person under your charge.' Then changing his position, he slued round:—"General," said he, "see lay fortune dig here; I was your prisoner once, now you are mine." It was an Officer of the French army, who had guarded Sir Sidney when in prison in France, and was now acting as a spy. Well, d'ye see, the Admiral brought him aboard, and they mess'd together like good friends till we arrived at Rio Janeiro, when he was delivered up to the Portygeese government, and then—it makes my old heart thump against my rickety timbers to think of it. He was a fine fellow; and though our brave Admiral tried every means to save him, yet he was condemn'd to labour in the mines for life. I'd rather be flogg'd at any time than have my grog stop; and I think death must have been preferable to that constant sickness of heart arising from hope deferred, as our poet the loblolly-boy used to say. The whole ship's company pitied him; he was our enemy, to be sure, but then he was in our power. Howsom-ever I arn't much skill'd in the knowledge of that ere idol that so many people worships, called Polly-ticks. My old girl Bet can wash a shirt or sow on a button with any she-goddess in the world, and so can I for matter o' that; and I'll make a sea-pie or cut out a pair of trowsers with the Queen She-bear any day in the week—and Solomon says she was no fool either. Once more, and then I'll belay. The boats were all ashore at Port Praya watering. Some of you have seen the militia of the island—they as parades the beach with a bag-a-knit stuck on a mopstick, and a cutlash without a scabbard hung by a strip of green hide: and there's a whole troop of Light Dragoons mounted on Jerusalem ponies. Well, d'ye see, one of these fellows drew his sword and made a cut at the cook-son of the lanch;—it fell on his head; but Lord bless you, he might just as well have tried to cut into this stone! Flint and steel always strike fire, and he was a precious hot-headed joker; so what does he do but claps the soldier, Rastynante, accoutrements and all into the boat, and takes him alongside with the oaks. The hands were turned up, clear boats—'twas just dusk—the tackles were overhaul'd down, and the falls manned. "Mind bow you clap on the slings that the butts don't slip out," said the First Lieutenant. 'Aye, aye, Sir.'—'Hook on, and not so much noise alongside. You've been fool of the hoggy-dent' again.' But he was mistaken, for it was ass-a-fetter'd-ha. 'Silence, I say again! Haul tant!—hoist away!' Away danced the men, the fliers playing Drops of Brandy. 'Well behaved, men—this butt's not full—it comes up very light!' roared the Lieutenant, advancing to the gangway.—'What the deuce have we got here, St. David and his goat? High enough!—high enough!—and indeed it was a high rig, for what should it be but the Royal Horse-guard, regularly mounted on his donkey, swinging aloft by the main-yard tackle 'twixt heaven and ocean, in an awful state of suspense. Hungrygh—Hungrygh—(there's no vowel in the bray of an ass)—roared Jack, while the trooper joined chorus most melodiously till he was safely landed on the deck. The Cockoon laid his complaint; and the Officer, thinking the fellow had been sufficiently punished, set him ashore again, advising him for the future to have nothing to do with sharps, for it was a comical thing to fall into the hands of

AN OLD SAILOR.

THE PUPIL OF MERLIN.

(Imitated from the German of Goethe.)

Great Merlin of old had a magical trick
For putting in motion a tallman-a-stick,
That would do at his pleasure whatever he wanted;
He had only to speak and the stick was enchanted;
Off it set in a twinkling and came in a crack,
He ordered it out and he whistled it back.
A youthful disciple of Merlin's own school,
A would-be magician, half knave and half fool,
Once peeping through cranny, the secret found out,
Heard the 'conjuro te,' saw the stick fly about;
'Twas enough, having seen, he must try the experiment:
So he scamper'd off home in the height of his merriment,
With a substitute broomstick to ape the magician,
Repeated the charm and enjoind his commission.
'Stick! conjuro te! I command thee to bring
A bucket of water just fresh from the spring.
In order to wash the place tidy and clean,
And render my cottage the pride of the green!'
So soon as he uttered this eloquent spell,
It vanished instantly, he mimick'd so well;
Then as quickly return'd to his great satisfaction,
Conducting the bucket with secret attraction.
Then again sallied out and return'd with a second;
A third, fourth, fifth, sixth,—full a dozen he reckon'd.
Again and again comes the troublesome evil;
He heartily wishes the stick at the devil,
And endeavours to stop this strange baten constabulary
By repeating by heart all his magic vocabulary.
In vain; the said stick is as deaf as a post,
And frightens him ready to give up the ghost.
'What, holloa! neighbors mine! oh the shocking disaster!
The louder he bellows the stick goes the faster.
In this wretched dilemma he loses his wits,
He rages, he swears, and he whimpers, by fits;
Beats his breast, pulls his hair, and defaces his face.
Still the stick and the bucket continued the chase;
The comical scene would have killed you with laughter,
The stick led the way and the bucket sped after.
Provoked at the sight; he endeavor'd to catch it,
Gets a rap on the knuckles—he seizes a hatchet—
In a violent passion he chokes it asunder;
This stratagem proves a most exquisite blunder;
It produces a double stick, i. e. another,
That follows the steps of its heart-beated brother.
Both together they fly, both their buckets they bring,
And around him a deluge of water they fling.
In brief, had not fortune the urchin befriended,
There is no telling where might the mischief have ended;
When, as good luck would have it, old Merlin appear'd,
In full magical robes, with his grim looking beard,
Who deliver'd him straight, stopp'd the sticks in a trice,
And dismiss'd the young chap with a word of advice:
'Only see what a pickle your rashness has cost,
And thank your good genius that all was not lost:
Remember, in future, my parting command,
That you never attempt what you don't understand;
And whatever you do, that success may attend,
Ere you think of beginning consider the end.

ANDREW LAURIE'S RETURN.

I had seen much of the world, and often smiled at the singular superstitions and wild beliefs which influence mankind in distant parts of the earth. I was now my turn to be under such influence. I had returned to the latitude of superstitions, which had a seat in my own bosom, and I could not help feeling something of a mingled curiosity and alarm, as I gazed on the beldame before me. I had often molested her when a boy, and mimicked the lowering of her brows, and the hanging and trembling of her under lip. I had chased her gray cat into the cauldrons of Creaboe linn, and placed snares for her black cat, which half of the dames of the district believed was inhabited by an evil spirit. I had stolen her crutch of broomstick, and watched it while it flamed in the fire for the flight of the spirit which she was supposed to have conjured into it. I had dug pitfalls in her path,—turned the course of a flooded rivulet into her door,—and, to sum up all my delinquencies in one deed, I had, according to ancient prescription, boiled pins and nails among milk at midnight to cure a cow which was suffering from her witchcraft.

In spite of all these deeds, I was something of a favourite with old Grizel. I had done her many little acts of kindness, carried her many little presents during the stormy seasons, and protected her and her whole establishment from the boys of the village, who like myself sought amusement in such mischief. Even when she sometimes detected me in working her annoyance, she confined her resentment to the lowering of her brows, and the shaking of her staff, and an exclamation of "Ah, Andrew Laurie, thou art an evil one." But she never forgave me for the experiment I made in expelling witchcraft from the cow; it was observed that her eyes darkened and her brows contracted whenever this feat was mentioned; and it was rumoured about the parish that on the night when I sought to dissolve the spell, Grizel was seen with dishevelled hair, eyes on fire, and feet which seemed touched with unnatural swiftness, running round the house where the charm was working with many a sob and shriek. It is true that I saw no such sight, and heard neither sob nor shriek; but the people around me were certain I had both heard and seen something, and the fame of my exploit flew far and wide, with many a strange addition, and many a marvellous comment. All this, Grizel, with the unsensie foot, as she was called in the parish, heard from many lips, and every one expected to see me withered down by a sudden spell,—or pining slowly away,—or carried bodily off by evil spirits,—or drowned in the deepest pool in the river,—and though none of all these things came to pass, people shook their heads, and muttered old saws and broken adages, all of which went to show that sudden death, or slow, would overtake me sometime. I had not seen her for some months, though I heard she was moving about more dreaded than ever, and I had begun to think, as I stood on a rising ground, and looked back on my native place as I left it for a far land, that I should never see her more. At that moment she stood before me,—looked me full in the face, and, laughing till the river bank rang again, cried, "bonnie Andrew Laurie, he'll never see kith, nor kin, nor Dalgarrook Kirk mair."

All this, and much more than this, was present to my mind, now as I stood and hearkened her curious complaint. I thought she was alone, but on stealing nearer a step or two, under screen of a large bush of holly, I observed she had a companion,—a slim girl some sixteen years old or so, who was squatted among the grass at her feet. She had restless and piercing black eyes, and short curly hair. A sort of bodice enclosed her waist, a kirtle reached under her knee, leaving her small active limbs entirely bare, and her whole person was tanned with the influence of the sun, her brows as a berry. A string of brass and silver tinkets was round her neck,—a pair of massy gold rings depended from her ears, and something of a woollen and stained embroidery ran round the neck of her bodice. Of all these articles of gipsy finery, as well as of a very handsome form, the young girl seemed sufficiently conscious; and as she looked from time to time on her image, reflected so truly in the quiet water, it was not without a secret swelling of pride at her conquests over Geordie Gordon, and Willie Marshall, and Wattie Kennedy, and all other young heroes of the clouted cauldron and the mended spoon, from Coancon to Carrlaverock. A small basket, filled with the rude minstrelsy of the district, stood beside her; and while she arranged her ballads, and concealed some pieces of coin, which her knowledge in palmistry had conjured from the reluctant hands of the thrifty maidens of Closeburn, her eyes were continually peering in the face of the old dame, and wandering hastily over her residence, like one taking note of an enemy's country.

On the other hand, ancient Grizel brought down her lowering brows, and lowered her nether lip into close scrutiny of the gipsy's person, and her whole face seemed to say,—"Nay, to spy out the land are ye come."

Such suspicious glances appeared to strike awe into the bosom of the bold young gipsy,—she selected a ballad from her basket, and holding it up to her of the unsensie foot, said, "Shall I sing ye a song about the auld house of Laurie?—they're a' dead and gane now; but it is weel my part to sing a song i' their praise:—many a time have they sheltered the houseless head of a Kennedy frae the winter blast: five women and fifteen bairns—my ain mother, who was drowned in Dryfe, was one of them—have sat at their hearth when Drumlanrig gardens were a desert, and the bonnie corn lands of Closeburn were a' in the Lord's ain hand."—And with a voice of great natural sweetness, she sang, much to my surprise, a song about myself, which she said was as true as that crooked horns made handsome spoons, and that the cunning hand clouted the kettle.

RONNIE ANDREW LAURIE.

Adown the barley's golden beard
The silver dew was dropping,
As with the lad I loved, I met,
When a' the town was sleeping—
"The heaven above my Nannie's bright,
The earth beneath her flow'rie,
Her sweet een aid the moon's pure light"—
Quo' bonnie Andrew Laurie.

I tried to scorn him, but my looks
Grew kinder ay and kinder,
With such a lovesome liddle near,
How could I be but tender?
"O had I all yon moon shines on,
I'd give thee't for a dowrie,
So wed me when I come frae sea"—
Quo' bonnie Andrew Laurie.

"And maun I sit on yon green hill,
When midnight stars are burning,
And look my youthful bloom away,
In hopes of thy returning;
While lik a dame who passes by,
Shall say right sharp and sourlie,
'Yere waiting till the blue snow comes,
And bonnie Andrew Laurie."

"See yon twin stars bright as thy e'en,
Aboon Dalgarrook roaming,—
Hear yon fair stream, between its banks,
Sing sweet in silent gloaming:—
Yon stars shall fall from heaven,—yon stream
Shall change its channel hourly,
And cease to run when I prove false"—
Quo' bonnie Andrew Laurie.

"I've seen the stars fall, and the stream
Wild from its channel ranging,
And man's best faith is like yon moon,
Even while we gaze 'tis changing"—
"Oh ever fair, and ever false,
As April sun-shine's show'rie,
We part—and never more to meet"—
Quo' bonnie Andrew Laurie.

We parted on a summer night,
We parted high and proudly,
The wind awaken'd with the sun,
The ocean answered loudly:
The white sail fill'd, and fast the ship
Shot past far-seen Barnhaurie;
He sail'd,—but never more return'd,— Alas! for Andrew Laurie.

"Ah! Andrew Laurie," exclaimed she of the unsensie foot, "I kenned the bairn weel,—he burnt my crutch,—sodded up my lamshad,—built up my window, and turned the burn at Belton into my door. I kenned the bairn weel,—a giddy and a carried callant, but wi' a free hand and a frank heart,—he did me mair gude with the right hand than harm wi' the left.—I have a gude right as well as thee, lass, to sing a song anent the auld house of Laurie,—the name's gone frae the land,—dead as the timmer at yule,—as sapless as my crutch,—and there's nae can lift it again but this giddy callant,—and the wee bird says he'll soon be here,—I wonder gin he'll ken auld Grizel with the unsensie foot,—her who gaur the kye gang yell,—can milk the cows in Cumberland,—can turn the moor-fowl on Drumlanrig brae into swans and turkeys, and the silver salmon of Nith into puddocks and toads.—I wonder gif he'll ken auld Grizel with the unsensie foot. But hearken, binnie, till I chaunt ye a crumb of an old world sang—it may do ye good, and the thoughts on't may cheer ye on your way frae a witch's dwelling.—It has a charm in't, lassie, it has a charm in't,—no such a charm as can make Geordie Gordon honest, or keep Willie Marshall frae herrying folk o' their hens, nor keep Tam Macgrab frae men's pouches at Midsummer,—but sic a charm as shall send bonnie blythe Susie Kennedy away frae my door—stone wi' nae wi' to come back in the lone hour of night, to steal my staff, and my hollow stane, and my hemlock pulled at midnight, and my teat of black wool, won from the black mouth of the fox, and my milking peg, and all my curious gear, with which I work pranks, and win myself a name in this perverse world."

This catalogue of witching loons and tinkets had a visible influence upon the demeanour of the young gipsy; and it was evident that the wish of the old woman was to inspire her unwelcome visitor with a salutary terror, which might ensure respect to her property during a midnight excursion, when half the houses in Nithsdale pay tribute to her tribe. The old woman commenced on her promised lyric—the spell might lie in the way in which she contrived with a voice, croaking and uncouth, to render audible this rude production:—in the matter it could hardly lie, and even the credulous author of Satan's Invisible World Discovered, would have been unable to question the perfect innocence of the song, unless he had heard it from the lips of the author of all evil himself.

ALAS FOR THE LAURIE!

Alas for the Laurie,
Alas for the brave,
The ruler on land,
And the lord of the wave!
Oh! bright waved his banner,
And bright shone his sword,
Wherever he roamed,
He was ruler and lord.

Oh! brave and undaunted
Through battle he rode,
O'er the strength of the mighty
He march'd like a god;
The proud sea obey'd him,
And smooth'd at his call,
As he swept down the Spianard
With powder and ball.

Oh, clap thy hands, Bourbon,
Exult in thy pride;
Unscath'd thy glad lilies
May dance on the tide;
Go sing on the deep sea,
And laugh on the shore,
The right hand of Laurie
Shall daunt thee no more.

On the sad day he sail'd
The fair sun would not shine,
His broad pennon hung
Like a pall o'er the brine;
The wave pass'd his ship,
And came shuddering to shore,
And I thought a voice said,
"Ye shall see him no more."

O'er the waves he career'd,
All their breadth and their length;
All exulting he sail'd,
And rejoiced in his strength;
But a flash fell from heaven,
And a shriek went ashore,
With the babbling of waves—
And his victories are o'er.

"Hale be your heart, beldame, and lang may yere voice keep in tune to charm the ravens and the hooded crows," said Susie Kennedy,—"losh me, it sounds like Willie Marshall's hand-hammer clinking on the rivets of a punch spoon. Sing ay that way, and neither jaud nor gipsy will daur to steer ye; od, I never heard sic an unmelodious croon since Jem Thingum-thrum, the Cameronian weaver, sang the merry song of 'As I came through the Sanguhar town,' to the melancholy draught of Coleshill." "A truce to thy foolery, girl," said she of the unsensie foot; "and think nae that I am the only one that hearkens thee.

There's aye whom nae but myself can see, but ye need nae start and rin, he shall not harm thee,—and there's aye, a welcome aye, whom ye shall see,—the sonie lad frae far awa,—he's in abint the holly bush,—whom we call Andrew Laurie; come hither, lad, ye shall burn my broomstaff three times ower before I say foul fa' thee." And she laughed till the river banks rang again, and cried out, "Come Andrew Laurie, my lambkin; what have swords, and bullets, and fire, and famine, and storms, and luxuries mair deadly than them all, been doing, when they loot thy fair face bame?"

I stept from my place of concealment, and went towards her:—the gipsy maiden, who believed, perhaps, that I was a production of witchcraft, conjured forth on the moment for no good to her, or wishing to be gone, uttered a shriek, and, starting off with the swiftness of a doe, was lost in the neighbouring wood. The old woman arose, and looked for a minute's space upon me, and said, "Ah! lad, but ye have left the merry eye, and the blooming cheek abroad;—ye are one of those who take away corn from cannie and Scotland, and bring her home chaff. But come, Scotland's an altered Scotland since ye sailed away, and that ye'll presently find. Death has berried the house of the Lauries, and made their hearthstones cauld. I said when ye departed,—and wha ever heard me tell an untruth?—that ye would never see kith, nor kin, nor Dalgarnock kirk mair. Aye, ye may look, but see if it be not true. And there was your ain love, Nancie Greerson, kirked the ae Sunday, and kirkyarded the next;—they never prosper who break true love vows,—and ye were vowed to aye anither, that my ain ears heard. It's all true, Andrew Laurie,—was I no at her dredgie, think ye, an unbidden guest, and gat my brow crossed, and blood drawn, by the drunken laird of Cahoolie? In ae short week he was found drowned in as little water as would have christened him,—and I was mair than avenged. But away,—away,—question me not of kith or kin,—I like ill to speak of the dead, and some maun speak of me soon. Can I raise people from the dowie grave,—charm the last of a race out of a winding sheet, and bring youth back, and merry aughteen, and laughing twenty again? Welcome hame, Andrew Laurie,—a cauld hearth and a deserted hall, a fremit face and a gaping grave,—can wit and wealth mend that, think ye?" And, laughing more in anguish than in joy, she closed the door in my face; and the last words I could distinguish were, "Sorrow, and dool, and cauld blood, and dread of the grave, come to others as well as to Grizel with the unsonie foot."

To speak with this woman, and learn tidings of my family, was much my wish, but old age had made her more wayward than ever; and when I knocked at the door, and told her who I was, she cried out, "Awa, honestlike man, awa,—I am a poor body in a lone house, with three bawbees and a pickle barley meal, and I'm in bed, and my door's barred,—Awa, honestlike man, awa." After another fruitless attempt to draw her to a conference, I hastened on my way, and in a little while came within sight of a small promontory, three parts encircled by the river surrounded by a rude wall, and crested with innumerable grave stones—the kirkyard of Dalgarnock.

(To be concluded in our next.)

APOTHECARIES' BOYS.

"It is indeed an excellent child; one that physics the subject."

That the peculiar habits and pursuits of individuals produce corresponding peculiarities of character, manner, and appearance, is so trite a remark that I am almost ashamed to repeat it. It is matter of the commonest observation. We can generally detect a lawyer, a doctor, or a bailiff at first sight; nor is a black coat always necessary to the development of a parson, nor a red one to that of a soldier (unless he belong to the local militia), nor (least of all) a blue coat that of a sailor. A skilful operator can always detach the man from his dress. You may cut a tailor out of his new black suit, as easily as he cut it out of the broad-cloth: shake a harber out of his own brutus; or smoke a seller of hams at any distance, under his recent layer of pepper and salt.

A better illustration of this position is not to be found than in the subject of this article. Has any one of my readers ever considered with attention that variety of Esculapian species called apothecaries' boys? If he has, he must confess that no animal exists more worthy of the attention of the naturalist, or more strikingly illustrative of the powerful and rapid effect of habit in modelling the human system.

The first thing to be observed about an apothecary's boy is his peculiar look. He is never young, i. e. morally; and this sort of age in the expression of his countenance contrasts oddly enough with the physical attributes of youth about him. There is a staid gravity in his manner far beyond his years; he seems perpetually impressed with the consciousness of his high destiny. Regard him well; you are looking on no ordinary being. You behold the embryo pharmacopoliast, the germ of druggery, the future dispenser of disease, the arbiter of health and sickness, the page of the presence in the palace of death! His complexion marks him as not of this world; it is of a murky paleness: he looks as if he fed on assafoetida, and as though his drink was the decoction of stuffed alligators. When I am at all unwell, I see an apothecary's boy with a horror I can't dissemble. He seems to me the herald of the grave; his touch is a diaphoretic, the glance of his eye is a calomel pill, his talk is bitterer than aloes, his smile is a dose of ipecacuana,—

Salts are in all his steps, manna in his eye,
In every gesture colocynth and rhubarb.

His dialect is no less remarkable than his appearance. It too smells of the shop. It is an extract of the Pharmacopœia, the concentrated essence of the Materia Medica. He does not express himself with great facility; his eloquence is a species of filtration assisted by mechanical force, the result of gentle pressure gradually increased. In its other qualities it resembles the off-cast resulting from the process of despumation; his flowers of rhetoric smell of the flower of sulphur, his wit is a sort of muriatic acid, his sarcasms the nitrate of silver, and his ordinary prose like the residuum of distilled vinegar. In one respect he is like Shakespeare, he has 'small Latin and less Greek;' but then he compensates for the scantiness of his stock by the frequent use he makes of it. The weakness of each individual blow is atoned for by the constancy of its reiteration. He is perpetually humiliating and consoling his hearers by 'humanum est errare,' throwing us into despair by 'ars longa, vita brevis,' knocking us down at every corner with 'venienti occurrere morbo,' and outraging our sympathies by 'experimentum fiat in corpore vili.' To hear him speak, you would suppose him the most cautious personage alive. He tells you, with a profound shake of the head, and with true pharmaceutical pomp of enunciation of the rashness of some practitioners; for his part, 'he always likes to feel his way.' He condemns Cooper for the indiscreet use of the knife, and Abernethy for the indiscriminate administration of the blue pill; at the same time he slyly insinuates that when 'a certain person' gets into full practice, matters will be managed better.

But alas, give him an opportunity of trying his skill, and see how he will fling discretion to the winds of heaven! Let an unlucky patient of the poorer sort enter the shop during his master's absence. Mark how he feels his pulse, makes him thrust out his tongue, and minutely describe all his symptoms. Observe the avidity with which he seizes the pestle, the spatula, or the lancet; the undissembled ecstasy with which he prepares to extract a sound tooth, or bleed an emaciated patient. The success of this last operation refutes the old adage, and proves by analogy the possibility of getting blood out of a turnip. Look at the glee with which he spreads the scarifying blister, thickly sprinkled with unrelenting cantharides; the eagerness with which he mingles the desperate draught, destined to work wild havoc in the intestinal region. Gods! with what demoniac joy he bends over the Circean cauldron and sees 'the hell-broth boil and bubble.'

The character of an apothecary's boy is so legibly imprinted on his front, that all his efforts to conceal it are fruitless. 'The Ethiopian cannot change his skin, nor the leopard his spots.' Some of this tribe affect to be dandies and men of the town; but it won't do. Their awkward dandyism, formal gayety, and methodical style of dissipation, are sure to betray them. In spite of the gilt spurs and ominous bunches of seals, we soon find out that 'all is not gold that glitters.' An apothecary's boy laces his stays as if he were fixing a tourniquet, and puts on his cravat as if he were applying a cataplasm. He drinks a glass of wine as though it were hippo, and swallows a bon-bon as he would a bolus. He enters into amusement with an air of apprehension, touches a lady's hand as if he were afraid of catching a typhus, and promenades in the saloon with the same air with which he walks the hospitals. You see him in the street with his pockets stuffed out with packets redolent of nausea. His skin bids defiance to the 'cosmetic powers,' and all the perfumes of Araby cannot sweeten him.

In fine, an apothecary's boy is a nuisance, 'a bore, a charlatan,' a sort of 'noli me tangere,' a perpetual 'memento mori,' a scion of the nether world, an off-set of the grave, a basilisk whose eye fascinates you to destruction, a torpedo whose touch benumbs into a palsy. You have a feeling of unhealthiness in his presence; you dare not say your life is your own; you fancy yourself inhaling the atmosphere of the Upas, or the steams of a charnel-house. He is a walking abstraction, a living epitome of all morbid phenomena, a virtual representative of 'all the natural shocks that flesh is heir to.'—Museum.

ON UMBRELLAS.

"Tu modo lætus spatiares sub umbra."

All classes of men have reason to bless the invention of umbrellas, except hatters and hackney-coachmen. To them indeed, an umbrella is caviare: it is an enormous cloud interposing between them and the sun of fortune: it is worse than the deadly night-shade, or the funeral cypress. But to all others what a delicious refuge, whether for shade or shelter! Nay, even to the aforesaid ingrates, it generously offers both; but with a cynical pride worthy of Diogenes, with a self-denying selfishness, they refuse to avail themselves of this inestimable advantage, merely because it imposes a salutary restraint on their own abominable acquisitiveness. A hatter rarely carries an umbrella, a hackney-coachman never. To the first, it is true, the damage of a hat is of small consequence, as it can be so easily repaired: and the cranium of the other is usually surmounted by a covering which defies deterioration. Wet within, he cares little for the wet without. Like Cain, he mounts his coach-box, cracks his whip, and smiles at "The war of elements, the wreck of matter,

And the crush of worlds."

Umbrellas are the constant companions of every man of sense and taste. Like literature, "adulescentium agunt, senectutem oblectant, secundas res ornant, adversis perfugium ac solatium præbent, delectant domi, non impediunt foris, pernoctant nobiscum, peregrinantur, rusticantur." Which, for the benefit of my unlearned readers I thus translate:

"Umbrellas teach the young to walk elegantly, and support the tottering steps of age; to the rich they are a becoming ornament, to the poor a shelter and a consolation; a handsome piece of furniture at home, abroad no impediment; a most convenient appendage by night, in travel, or in the country."

As for myself, I have never gone without an umbrella from my earliest years. My cotton umbrella has accompanied me through all the chances and changes of this mortal pilgrimage. It has travelled with me over all countries. Under its protecting wings I have traversed the plains of Egypt and the sands of Araby; propped upon its ferule, I have clambered up the Alps and the Appennines, Taurus, Caucasus, and Imaus, and the giant brotherhood of "the western star." Canopied in its maternal folds, I have floundered through the bog of Allen, mizzled through the Hebrides, and braved all the waterspouts of the Atlantic. I might well address my umbrella in the glowing language of one of the greatest of our living dramatic poets:

"Have I not on the sky-roofed mountain slept,
Rock'd by the whirlwind? and when lo! and dark
The midnight march of the careering storm
How'd o'er th' uprooting pine; when nature quak'd,
As with the mighty throb of dissolution,
Amid the various tumult of my soul,
Have I not felt the sweetness of thy presence?"

After this account, my readers will not be surprised to learn, that I am a connoisseur of the first water in every thing regarding umbrellas. I know to a nicety the precise kind of umbrella that each individual should carry; the points of keeping that ought to exist between it and his rank in life, profession, age, and general costume. For a long time it was deemed unfashionable to carry an umbrella: I hail with joy the favourable revolution which has so generally taken place in public opinion on this subject. At present, thanks to the genius of true taste, an umbrella is considered an indispensable appendage to the outside of a fine gentleman. But on the first introduction of any improvement a certain want of taste will be discoverable in its application. Thus, we sometimes meet in Bond Street, a doughty hero, with well-blacked mustachios and prodigious spurs, and carrying an umbrella, withal! Now, friend as I am to umbrellas, I must enter my most serious protest against this incongruity. A soldier, or one who affects to be a soldier, should be above the weather: but these knights of the carpet too clearly exhibit a painful consciousness that the weather is above them. To be sure, I have heard this practice defended by Dr. Dryasdust, the friend of "the great unknown," on the principle that the idea of an umbrella was originally taken from the testudo of the Roman soldiers, under which they sustained the "iron sleet and arrow shower" of the enemy. But I suspect that the learned antiquarian stands alone in this opinion. As to riding with an umbrella, a practice for which we are ridiculed by our French neighbours, I am somewhat dubious. I am afraid it is not quite the thing in the street; on the road, indeed, it has its advantages: you may goad your courser on with the ferule, or by unsfurling the umbrella, considerably expedite your progress on a windy day. A poet mounted on a smart hack with a parapluie extended thus, may make a very tolerable representation of Pegasus. I cannot venture, however, to recommend this custom to every one: a loose-seated rider might, in a high wind, be raised by his umbrella to an inconvenient elevation from the saddle.

Consistency is the soul of taste, and the glory of a rational being. To promote this valuable quality in umbrella-carriers, I shall briefly notice the corresponding relation which ought to exist between every man and his umbrella.

A small man should not carry a machine of this kind so large; he will appear to be extinguished in its overwhelming amplitude. A large person, on the other hand, looks unspeakably ridiculous with a very small umbrella. Every gentleman should have this article of silk; I would as soon see a two-penny postman with a good hat, a general post without his gaiters, or a post-boy in Hessian boots, as a gentleman with a cotton umbrella. A clergyman should wear a handsome one of dark blue silk; green is the colour for a lawyer; brown for a doctor (the proper hue of a bolus); purple for a nobleman; crimson for a dancing-master, and black for an undertaker. Cotton is the proper general material for the umbrellas of the "tiers état." An oilskin may be allowed to postmen, pedlars, and mercantile travellers. Very large umbrellas are proper for apple-women and field-preachers; a tailor should never be permitted to carry one, except it be second-hand, and well patched in many places. Soldiers, sailors, and ladies, I interdict from the use of umbrellas altogether; a small cotton parapluie for a milliner's apprentice or haberdasher's clerk; a neat silk one, one size larger than a parasol, for a governess, or a lady's maid.

Umbrellas may be carried in various ways. Some use them as a walking-stick; others carry them under the arm, as a horse-soldier does his sword; others under the arm also, but reversed, as the infantry carry their muskets at a funeral. This is good, as it keeps the persons behind you at a civil distance. But the method which I prefer is to grasp the umbrella nearly in the centre, and swing it violently backwards and forwards as you walk; thus you may contrive to keep your line of march tolerably unobstructed both in front and rear. When it rains, keep your umbrella, generally speaking, about the level of the foreheads of the passers-by, by this means you will knock off their hats with astonishing facility. If you meet a person considerably taller than yourself, attempt to raise your umbrella above his: reverse this strike with a short man, by a dexterous twist you may strike your adversary's umbrella into the mud, or at all events damage it and his face considerably. Should you break a shop-window with your parapluie (no unlikely thing), always walk on quietly as if nothing had happened; if the street be crowded, you are almost certain to escape.

Of all affectations, the most detestable in my eyes is an umbrella enclosed in a walking-stick. When the fashionable prejudices ran against umbrellas, it was a dastardly piece of insincerity, a base desertion of the cause of truth, a cowardly deference to triumphant error. Now it is an absurd and unmeaning piece of mystification, a proof of equal deficiency in sense and taste. As if, forsooth, a walking-stick was superior in beauty to that beautiful combination of whalebone, wood, brass, iron, silk, buckhorn, and bamboo, which constitutes an umbrella, or as if such a gross and clumsy artifice could impose on any one!

I entertain a most profound respect for an old umbrella, and I think that in no case is the ingratitude of man more flagrantly exhibited, than in the neglect and contempt with which those faithful guardians from the storm are treated in their declining age. After protecting our heads for years from the pelting rain, the rattling hail, the driving sleet, or the drizzling mist, they are at last thrown into some dirty corner to moulder into unmerited oblivion. This is a severe reproach to human nature, a blot on the escutcheon of manhood. For my part, I have a neat cabinet, where I keep all my umbrellas ranged in proper order; I consider it as an asylum for the faithful servants and companions of my former years; I keep it superstitiously clean, and I often have those old umbrellas sprinkled with rain water, for the purpose of refreshing them with what I must in some sort consider as their native element. On each of them is a label expressive of the date of their manufacture and term of service. To visit this cabinet is my constant and favorite recreation; it is a copious source of tender and delicious recollections, a well-spring of sweet imaginings; a mournful and pleasant music of the past; a sentimental panorama of departed joys; a history of the heart in beautiful hieroglyphics. One umbrella reminds me of scenes where "— My careless childhood strayed"

"A stranger yet to pain."

How often have I shared another with the friend of my youth! This was the means of my introduction to the loveliest of women, that was the constant companion of our stolen interviews on many a dark and dreary night of winter; this accompanied me on my pilgrimage to the tomb of Virgil; that was with me when I visited the scenery of Rousseau's Eloise, and with the old blue cotton one have I poked in the ruins of Pompeii.

To this I owe my life, to that my liberty: the one turned aside the dagger of an assassin in Naples; the other by its successful mediation with a wealthy relative saved me from the jaws of a prison. But my heart bleeds at this last recollection, and I must conclude.—Lit. Museum.

INDIAN MANNERS.

(From the Franklin (Missouri) Intelligencer.)

On the 6th instant (April) our river presented the extraordinary spectacle of about forty canoes, gliding rapidly upon its bosom, and conveying nearly three hundred Indians, being principally whole families. The sight was more interesting and the show much greater than might be supposed, as they covered the surface of the water for a considerable distance. As they were passing the town with astonishing rapidity, an Indian, who had arrived the day previous, communicated something from the bank, when, by a precise and simultaneous movement, the whole flotilla turned, quartering up the stream, and approached the shore. They maintained a perfect silence, which was only interrupted by a single voice, which pronounced with emphasis, the word "whiskey."—Curiosity led us, the next morning, to visit their camp, where they had pitched very commodious tents or wigwams, exactly equal in number to that of their canoes. These are made with flags or bullrushes, about four feet long, and so ingeniously sewed together as to be a complete protection against wind and rain. One long piece placed vertically, and supported by poles, forms the wall of the building, and two separate pieces the roof. These when they move, are rolled together, and are very light and portable. The floors are formed with bark, temporarily used for the purpose, and overspread with bearskins. Their persons and countenance are disgustingly dirty, but many of them, on special occasions, appear in brilliant colours and clean garments. The instances are few where we have witnessed at any family fireside more harmony, peace, and freedom, from the ills of this world, than prevailed with these sons of nature. They were at this time perfectly sober, and contentment rested on every countenance. Not an angry look was seen, or a tone of voice heard which indicated the least dissatisfaction. Some of the men were cleaning their guns and putting in preparation their fanciful decorations for a war dance, while others walked with a stately and measured step through the camp, combining the sternness of the warrior with the gravity of a statesman. The squaws were making moccasins, providing their simple repast, or kindly aiding the employments of their husbands, while the children were sportively shooting their arrows, or playfully jumping and frolicking on the bank. Some of the women have a mildness, harmony of voice, and softness of manner beyond what the lower orders of civilization exhibit. None of them, however, have florid complexions, handsome forms, or beautiful features; probably in consequence of the laborious nature of their domestic duties. For custom, among these as among all other uncivilized people, ungenerously compels the females to transport burthens, carry the children, dress the skins, paddle the canoes, and perform almost every fatigue duty except that of the chase. Some of the men have fine persons, being tall, erect, and symmetrically formed. Their manners, when sober, are reserved and unaffected; their walk more deliberate, stately and graceful than ours; and their carriage perfectly easy and natural. They possess great equan-imity and nonchalance with respect to passing events, and never, unless intoxicated, indulge in petulance, curiosity or surprise. They apparently took no notice of the numerous visitors at their camp, except sometimes to throw on them a natural and independent look, indicating neither hauteur or a consciousness of inferiority.

During the day they gave an exhibition of their war-dance, at several places in town.—This exercise is one of peculiar joy and festivity, as it celebrates their triumph over enemies, and gratifies the passion of revenge, which is probably the strongest that actuates their ferocious bosoms. On this occasion they use their gayest attire, calling to their aid the diversified plumage of the feathered race, fancifully arranged and variously ornamented. Their faces exhibit a most grotesque and terrific appearance, by being painted in every variety of colour and manner: thus prepared they collect in a group; a musician beats upon a hoarse sounding drum, and two or three shake gourds filled with pebbles, while the others shout loud and hoarsely; jump up and down, and use every ludicrous gesture and uncouth attitude, and make every horrid grimace which can add to their frightful appearance, or heighten the exhibition of their savage joy.

Their desires are few and easily satisfied, and they show no disposition to hoard up the goods and chattels of this world for purposes of ostentation, or the gratification of looking at them.

If they have not the artificial luxury of civilized society, and the complicated machinery which its ingenuity devises, they neither know nor feel the want of them, and suffer no more by the destitution than we do by being deprived of the nectar and ambrosia of the Gods. The temptations of money, our anxieties with respect to our calculations, and the frauds, competitions and vexations which avarice puts in operation among us, are to them unknown. The weary traveller gratuitously experiences their hospitality without being molested by inquisitive interrogatories or disturbed by an impertinent curiosity. Their passions, however, are unrestrained, and they are cruel to enemies; but custom, which every where tolerates absurdities, not only justifies this, but renders it a glory. Their sensations, both of pleasure and pain, are probably much less acute than ours. Their moral faculties are unimproved, but they are just and obliging to each other, although they are treacherous to strangers.

Some instances of dishonesty occurred among them while they were here. Some of the boys sold their bows and arrows to those of the town, and after having received payment, managed to get their articles into their hands again and run off with both. One of them went into a store and wanted to "swap" for whiskey. It was measured and delivered, and when he found that he had safe possession of the delicious draught, he observed, "me big chief, but got no money." So the store-keeper was compensated for his liquor by the honor of treating a sovereign.

These Indians were the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, on their way home.

POPULAR PREJUDICES AND SUPERSTITIOUS IDEAS PECULIAR TO THE ESTHONIANS.

Of Unlucky Days, &c.

The fishermen who dwell on the coasts of the Baltic never use their nets between All Saint's and St. Martin's; they would then be certain of not taking any fish through the whole year: they never fish on Saint Blaise's day. On Ash Wednesday the women neither sew nor knit, for fear of bringing misfortune upon the cattle. They contrive so as not to use fire on St. Lawrence's day; by taking this precaution, they think themselves secure against fire for the rest of the year.

This prejudice of lucky and unlucky days has existed at all times and in all nations; but if knowledge and civilization have not removed it, they have at least diminished its influence. In Livonia, however, the people are more than ever addicted to the most superstitious ideas on this subject. In a Riga Journal (Rigaische Stadtblätter, No. 3657, anno 1822, edited by M. Sonntag,) there are several passages relative to a letter written from heaven, which is no other than a catalogue of lucky and unlucky days. This letter is in general circulation; every body carries it about him, and, though strictly forbidden by the police, the copies are multiplied so profusely as to increase an evil, all attempts to destroy which have hitherto failed. Among the country people this idea is equivalent to the doctrine of fatality; and if they commit faults, or even crimes, on the days which are marked as unlucky, they do not consider themselves as guilty, because they were predestined. --- The flight of certain birds, or the meeting of certain animals on their first going out in the morning, are in their minds good or bad omens. --- They do not hunt on St. Mark's or St. Catherine's day, on penalty of being unsuccessful all the rest of the year. --- It is a good sign to sneeze on Christmas day. --- Most of them are so prepossessed against Friday, that they never settle any important business, or conclude a bargain on that day; in some places they do not even dress their children. --- They do not like visits on Thursdays, for it is a sign that they shall have the troublesome guests the whole week.

The care and preservation of their flocks are also a fruitful source of superstitious ideas. --- In some districts, when the shepherd brings back his flock from the pasture, in spring, for the first time, he is sprinkled with water from head to foot, in the persuasion that this makes the cattle thrive. --- The malignity of beasts of prey is believed to be prevented by designating them not by their proper names, but by some of their attributes. For example, they call the fox halkuhl (grey coat); the bear, kajatyk (broadfoot,) &c. &c. --- They also fancy that they can oblige the wolf to take another direction by strewing salt in his way. The howling of wolves, especially at day-break, is considered a very bad omen, predicting famine or disease. In more ancient times it was imagined that these animals asked their god to give them food, which he threw to them out of the clouds. --- When a wolf seizes any of their cattle, they fancy they can oblige him to quit his prey by dropping a piece of money, their pipe hat, &c. They do not permit the hare to be often mentioned, for fear of drawing it into their corn fields. --- To make hens lay eggs, they beat them with an old broom. --- In families where the wife is the eldest child of her parents, it has been observed that they always sell the first calves, being convinced that if kept they would not thrive. --- To speak of insects or mischievous animals at meat-time is a sure way to make them more voracious.

If a fire breaks out, they think to stop its fury by throwing a black hen into the flames. This idea, of an expiatory sacrifice offered to a malevolent or tutelary power, is a remnant of paganism. Various other traces of it are found among the Esthoniens; for instance, at the beginning of their meals they purposely let fall a piece of new bread, or some drops of liquor from a bottle not yet begun, as an offering to the divinity.

It is very offensive to the peasants for any one to look long into their wells; they think that it will cause the wells to dry up.

When manure is carted into the fields, that which falls from the cart is not gathered up, lest mischievous insects and blights come upon the corn.

When an old house is quitted for a new one, they are attentive in noting the first animal that dies. If it be an animal with hairy feet, the sign is good; but if with naked feet, some fowl, for instance, there is mourning in the house; it is a sign of misery and bad success in all their undertakings.

These are the prevailing popular prejudices in the three Duchies: a great number of them, especially among the Esthoniens, are connected with their ancient Mythology; others originate in that general weakness in the untought mind, which seeks in strange practices a remedy for fancied future or actual present evils.

The most enlightened nations are nevertheless full of prejudices. There are as many in the Rue St. Denis and the Marais, as there are on the banks of the Duna and Lake Peypus.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

DIVING-BELL.

The diving-bell, or rather the improved instrument now in use at Port Patrick, is a square cast-metal frame, about 8 feet high, 22 feet in circumference, and weighing upwards of four tons. This frame is, of course, open below, and at the top are 12 small circular windows, made of very thick glass, such as are sometimes seen used on board of ships. These windows are cemented or puttied in, that not a bubble of water can penetrate; and when the sea is clear, and particularly when the sun is shining, the workmen are enabled to carry on their submarine operations without the aid of candles, which would consume nearly as much air as any equal number of human bellows. In the inside of the bell are seats for the workmen, with nets to hang their tools on; and attached to it is a strong double air-pump, which is a great improvement on the old-fashioned plan of sinking barrels with air. From this pump issues a thick leathern tube, which is closely fitted into the bell, and the length of which can easily be proportioned to the depth of the water. As may be supposed, the bell is suspended from a very long crane, the shaft of which is sunk to the very keel of a vessel, purchased and fitted up for the purpose, and which is, in fact, a necessary part of the diving apparatus. On the deck of this vessel is placed the air pump, worked by four men, with an additional hand to watch the signals. When about to commence operations, the ship is moved to the outside of the breakwater, the air-pump put in motion, the crane worked, and then go down the aquatic quarrymen. From its weight and shape, the machine must dip perpendicularly; while the volume of air within enables the workmen to breathe, and keeps out the water. On arriving at the bottom, the divers are obliquely annoyed with large beds of sea-weed, although from the inequalities of the channel at Port Patrick, and the partially uneven manner in which the ledges of the bell occasionally rest on the rocks, it is impossible to expel the water altogether; and this, it is presumed, is the reason why it is dangerous to descend in rough or squally weather, when the heaving and agitated deep would be apt to dash in the smallest cranny. To guard against the effects of several hours' partial immersion in water, the men are provided with large jack-boots, caps of wool, and coarse woollen jackets. They also observe the precaution of stuffing their ears with cotton, as the constant stream of air which descends from above, occasions, at first, an uneasy sensation, and is even apt to produce deafness. The chief sub-marine artist came from Holyhead; and out of 180 masons, carpenters, and labourers, only one man, it is said, volunteered to assist him. A respectable and ingenious gentleman, who had been down in the bell, stated that he felt no inconvenience whatever; but the air-pump workmen, among whom were made some minute inquiries, shook their heads at this piece of information, and hinted that the volunteer diver had often felt a little queerish, and, for one thing, "had taken his victuals very badly." Here then, we have two or three men working with perfect ease and safety, 20, 25, and sometimes 30 feet below water. In carrying out the new pier, it is necessary to make a bed for the foundation stones, which would otherwise be left at the mercy of the waves—and this, in a word, is the duty of the divers. With picks, hammers, jumpers, and gaspawder, the most rugged surface is made even, and not only a bed prepared for the huge masses of stone which are afterwards let down, but the blocks themselves strongly bound together with iron and cement. The divers, like other quarrymen, when they wish "to blast," take good care to be put out of harm's way. By means of a tin tube the powder is kept quite dry, and a branch from the larger cavity, hollow, and filled with an osten straw, is lengthened to the very surface of the water before the fuse is lighted. In one or two cases the powder has failed to explode, and it is very teasing for the men, after three or four hours' hard work below water, to be compelled to descend again, for the sole purpose of repeating the blasting process.

THE CABINET.

PRAISE OF LITTLE WOMEN.

FROM THE SPANISH.

I wish to make my preaching short, as all good things should be,
For I was always fond, I own, of a short homily;
Of little women, and in courts of law a most brief plea;
Little well said makes wise, as sap most fructifies the tree.

His head who laughs and chatters much, the moon I'm sure must stay,

There's in a little woman love—nor little, let me say;
Some very tall there are, but I prefer the little—nay, Change them, they'd both repeat the change, and quarrel night and day.

Love prayed me to speak well of the little ones—the rest
They give, their noble qualities and charms:—I'll do my best;
I will speak of the little ones, but don't think I'm in jest;
That they are cold as snow, and warm as fire, is manifest.

They're cold abroad, yet warm in love; shy creatures in the street;

Good natured, laughing, witty, gay, and in the house discreet—
Well-doing, graceful, gentle, kind, and many things more sweet
You'll find where you direct your thoughts—yes many, I repeat.

Within a little compass oft great splendour strikes the eyes,
In a small piece of sugar cane a deal of sweetness lies;
So to a little woman's face a thousand graces rise,
And large and sweet's her love; a word's sufficient for the wise.

The pepper-corn is small, but yet, the more the grain you grind,
The more it warms and comforts; so, were I to speak my mind,
A little woman, if (all love) she studies to be kind,
There's not in all the world a bliss you'll fail in her to find.

As in a little rose resides great colour, as the bell
Of the small lily yields a great and most delightful smell,
As in a very little gold exists a precious spell,
Within a little woman so exceeding flavours dwell.

As the small ruby is a gem that clearly does outshine
For lustre, colour, virtues, price, most children of the mine,
In little women so worth, grace, bloom, radiance divine,
Wit, beauty, loyalty, and love, transcendently combine.

Little's the lark, the nightingale is little, yet they sing
Sweeter than birds of greater size and more resplendent wing;
So little women better are, by the same rule,—they bring
A love more sweet than sugar-plums or primroses of spring.

The goldfinch and Canary-bird, all finches and all pice, Sing, scream, or chatter passing well—there's quaintness in their cries;

The brilliant little parrot says things extremely wise;
Just such a little woman is, when she sweet love outlives.

There's nothing that with her should be compared—'tis profanation:—

She is a walking Paradise, a smiling consolation,
A blessing, pleasure, of all joys a sparkling constellation,
In fact—she's better in the proof than in the salutation!

Small women do no harm, kind things, though they may sometimes call

Us angry names, hard to digest; men wise as was Saint Paul
Say, of two evils choose the least; by this rule it must fall,
The least dear woman you can find will be the best of all!

WIGS.—Who would think that the elegant and interesting Mary Queen of Scots wore a periwig? yet so it would certainly appear from the following letter of Knollys to Cecil, published in Chalmers's Life of that ill-fated and ill-treated Princess. "So that now here are six waiting women, although none of reputation, but Mrs. Mary Seaton, who is praised by this Queen to be the finest buckler, that is to say, the finest dresser of a woman's head of hair, that is to be seen in any country: whereof we have seen divers experiences, since her coming hither: and, among other prettie devices, yesterday, and this day, she did set such a curled hair upon the Queen, that was said to be a PEREWYKE, that showed very delicately, and, every other day, she hath a new device of head dressing, without any cost, and yet setteth forth a woman gaylie well.

This Perewyke of Mary's I conceive to have been mere ringlets of false hair, for we know that it was the fashion of those days to wear borrowed locks, and of different colours. Mary's own hair was black.

Hentzner, describing Queen Elizabeth, as he saw her going to chapel, says, "she wore false hair, and that and." The ladies in those days absolutely caused the graves to be violated to obtain the hair of the dead, and inveigled children, who had fine hair, to secret places, to rob them of their locks. They also dyed their hair of various colours, but particularly of a sandy colour, in compliment to the Queen, whose natural locks were of that tint.

We are told by St. Gregory, that women in his time raised their heads extremely high; environing them with many tresses of false hair, disposed in knots and circles, so as to resemble a regular fortification. Indeed, before his time, Juvenal, describing the dress of a Roman Lady, tells us that

"With curls on curls, like different stories, rise
Her towering locks, a structure to the skies."

Josephus reports, that the Jewish ladies powdered their hair with gold dust; a fashion that was carried from Asia to Rome, and from the adoption of which the hair of the Emperor Commodus is said to have become so bright, that when the sun shone upon it, his head appeared as if on fire.

THE POLITICAL SHOEMAKER.—The following account of a visit to an eccentric character, known at the Cape of Good Hope by the name of the political shoemaker, might furnish a scene for a farce, not unamusing. This Dutchman (for such we suppose him to be) is one of those busy, meddling, inquisitive persons who know every body, and every thing, past, present, and to come. After a long story about the fall of Napoleon, the restoration of the Bourbons, the marriage of the Duc de Berry, all of which the shoemaker predicted, M. Arago, in his Voyage Round the World, proceeds:

"Tired enough already of the political pretensions of the shoemaker, I was going to acquaint him with the motive of my visit, and to ask for some shoes, when he suddenly resumed, 'Apropos, sir,' said he, with a doleful look: 'Europe has lately been the theatre of a very dreadful event. The battle of Waterloo has deprived France of many of her brave fellows! I foretold, sir, that those guards would die rather than surrender.' 'That was no difficult matter.' 'Certainly not: but it was Columbus's egg—say before-hand what will happen; and don't wait for events before you pronounce: but let us wave that subject, and proceed to an affair almost as terrible, and much more glorious for you, the battle of Toulouse! Long live Soult, sir! Long live Soult! There's a general for you! O that I had been there!' 'I was there, sir!' 'Why did you not tell him to exterminate that odious race of islanders?' 'He did.' 'Some of them, however, escaped.... But then, with so small a force it was impossible to effect more. So! you were at the battle of Toulouse; (N.B. I was not.) As a draftsman, probably? I know that country well.' 'I dare say you do.' 'I have been all over it.' 'That is very clear.' 'And at this distance I have detailed the action, and drawn an accurate plan of the battle. You shall judge, sir, whether I have misconceived the thing.' He immediately fell to work, and in a trice the two armies were drawn up on the parlour floor. Some stout lads are the French; a new shoe is a substitute for Soult. Wellington is represented by a boot-strap, and his soldiers by scraps of leather. A chair is the hill where the carnage takes place; a calf-skin the Garonne; a pail the canal: nothing is forgotten. The shoemaker gives the word, every thing moves and acts. With one touch the rapid historian overthrows columns, causes our troops to advance, puts to flight the descendants of Lusus, (who was he?) tumbles them into the river, and leathers the English. The fire flashes from his eyes; he rolls about with enthusiasm; and, when the action is over, he claps Soult under his arm; slings the French upon a sofa; throws the English aside among the rubbish; puts a general in his pocket; gives Wellington a kick; and rises breathless, and proud of his triumph. 'Excellent, sir, excellent! one would swear you had been at that battle, your representation of it is so correct!' 'I was there, sir; yes, I was there: and from this place I directed all the movements; for I foresaw the engagement. Stop a moment: look at this map of the conquests of the French; observe all these dots; they are so many cities taken by them! (So saying, he showed me a paper quite black with dots.) It is rather the worse for wear; but I keep it, for I made my first campaigns with it, and we ought not to be ungrateful to our friends.... Will you do me the honour to take a glass of wine?' 'No, I thank you, sir; I came to....' 'To-morrow, sir, I will measure you: and we will resume the conversation.'"

CHICKEN MANUFACTORY.—That there now exists, at Damietta, in Egypt, a sort of Chicken Manufactory, is most true: and the fact is thus stated by a Traveller of unquestionable veracity, Major Mackintosh, in his "Diary of a Tour through Egypt and Palestine."—"On the 28th of January, 1822, we went, accompanied by the Vice-Consular Janissary, to a large half-reined Arab house, in the out-skirts of the town, where we found an old blind Arab, who is at the head of the establishment. For some time he objected to our admission, particularly lest we should have any gold about us, which, he said, would certainly addle the eggs. Nevertheless we were at last graciously allowed to pass through two small apertures, one about three feet square, and the other, two feet square; from whence we emerged into a dirty narrow passage, on each side of which were several small holes, stuffed with straw. On opening one of these holes, we looked into a circular room, resembling a very large oven, on the floor of which were several thousand eggs, laid on tow, and ranged in single row, round a small circular hole, not unlike the funnel of a furnace, and through which, in fact, the necessary heat was conveyed from a fire beneath. The heat of the place did not exceed that of water moderately warmed, and was certainly under the degree which marks blood heat. We stood for some time in the passage, without finding that the temperature incommoded us in the least. The old Arab told us, that it required 22 days to hatch the eggs: and we saw some, the shells of which had been recently broken, and all the chickens, except one, appeared lively and healthy.—This very singular mode of hatching eggs is totally unconnected with any influence of the climate, and the same or a similar process, aided by a steam apparatus, might be practised any where else, were it thought desirable, with every prospect of success. The young chickens, when hatched, should not be exposed too soon to the influence of the external air."

HANNIBAL'S PASSAGE OVER THE ALPS.—Nothing but an actual inspection of the route, can give an adequate idea of the difficulties he must have had to encounter when he entered this defile, which is forty miles in length, and defended by many formidable passes, where a few men, placed on the heights above, might have successfully resisted the most powerful armies.

The account given by some historians, of Hannibal's dissolving the rocks by vinegar, in his passage over the Alps, appears so improbable, that it has generally been treated, in modern times, as a fable, undeserving attention. An inspection of the route, however, inclined me to believe that this story, like many ancient fables, was founded on facts that have been perverted by the ignorance of historians. In many of the passes in the valley of the Isere, where the rocks overhang the river on each side, a path carried midway along the side of the precipice might be obstructed by a projecting mass of stone, as to deny access to oxen or elephants. Now, in such situations, it will be readily admitted that a small quantity of gunpowder would effect more in a few hours than the labour of men for several days, especially as, from the narrowness of the pass, not more than one or two men could work at the same time. We are unacquainted with the means which the ancients employed in breaking and removing large masses of stone; it is possible that the expansive power of vapour might be one of them. Thus by boring hard calcareous rocks, and filling the cavity with concentrated vinegar, and plugging up the aperture, they might, by the evolution of gas, obtain a similar effect to the explosion of gunpowder, or the expansion of steam; this effect might be farther increased by making a large fire against the rock. Count Rumford ascertained that a drachm of water, inclosed in a mass of iron the size of a solid twenty-four-pounder cannon, was sufficient to burst it, with a tremendous explosion, on the application of heat: even the expansion of water by freezing will rend the hardest rocks. It also deserves attention, that most of the calcareous strata in the Alps are intersected by cross seams, evidently the result of crystallization in the mass, and these seams are often so close as to be nearly imperceptible, and quite impervious to air or water. By taking advantage of such seams, and making the borings in them, a small degree of expansive force would rend large masses of rock, as they split with great facility along the cross seams, which are the natural cleavages, and are nearly as regular as those of a rhomboidal crystal of calcaspar.

I am inclined to believe that Hannibal, whose mind was so fertile in resources, might be acquainted with the power of compressed vapour, or gas, in bursting masses of stone, and that he employed vinegar, not as a chemical agent to dissolve the projecting masses of rock that obstructed his progress, but to act mechanically in rending them, either by the evolution of gas, by the expansion of vapour, or by the force of both these agents conjointly. It is indeed difficult to conceive how such a story as that of dissolving the Alps with vinegar, could have originated without some foundation in fact: but facts, imperfectly understood, have not unfrequently been transformed by historians into prodigies, which have maintained credit for ages, and at length are rejected as fabulous, until circumstances are discovered which elucidate the obscurity of history, and enable us to separate truth from error.—Bakewell's Travels.

PARIS.—A circumstance happened about a week ago to one of our poets, M. Denne-Baron—certainly not very favourable to midnight or moonlight inspiration. Our poet, of a very contemplative turn, and of very soft and gentle manners, stopped, on his way from a visit to a friend, in the middle of the Place of Notre Dame. It was midnight, and he watched with admiration the effect of the waning moon on the gothic towers and buttresses of the venerable cathedral. All at once he was roused from his reverie by the sensation of being vigorously seized by each arm by two individuals. His first impression naturally placed him in the robust grasp of two robbers; and in order to extricate himself from their unwelcome pressure, he offered them all the money his purse contained. The gentlemen, refused his offer with a tone and air of dignity, and proved that they could not be thieves, by announcing themselves as agens de police. On this a little dialogue took place: "What do you here?"—"You see, I admire that ancient monument."—"The hour is well chosen, certainly; but where are your papers?"—"I did not know that it was necessary to have papers to look at Notre Dame."—"Without bad intentions, nobody would stop at this time of the night before the church."—"You do not suppose, I hope, I had the design of putting the towers in my pockets?"—"Insolent! follow us."—"But, gentlemen, I am well known; I am a member of several learned Societies, in which I have for colleagues several members of his Majesty's Government. I have translated the Elegies of Propertius into French verse, and published various poems, which you must have seen mentioned and applauded in the Journals."—"Marchon." The poet made no further opposition; he had no carnal weapons, and he followed his assailants to the Corps-de-Garde. There, in spite of his word of honour that he would not escape, he was put into the cage. The next morning four soldiers marched him before the Commissary of Police of the Quarter, who being assured by the prisoner that he was perfectly known to several estimable notables, they were sent for. They explained who and what was the unfortunate détenu. M. Denne-Baron was released; had a good breakfast with friends; and his only revenge is announced as a Poem entitled "The Cathedral Stealer, or the Holy Police."

REPOSITORY OF GENIUS.

"And justly the Wise-man thus preach'd to us all,
"Despise not the value of things that are small."
Old Ballad.

CHARADE.

BY A LADY.

(Never before printed.)

My First is a strange set of mortals you'll own,
A comical compound as ever was known;
The air that they breathe is compos'd all of sighs,
And the language they utter is that of the eyes;
Though 'tis very well known they can both swear and lie,
So ladies beware when you see them draw nigh.

My Next is a feat by the youthful adm'd,
Where strength and agility both are required.

My Whole is well known as a remedy sure,
And deem'd for the heart-ache a permanent cure;
But th' experiment's desperate, and if you would make it,
Proceed not too rashly, but look ere you take it.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

PRESERVATION OF FISH, &c.—For ensuring the sweetness of fish conveyed by land-carriage, the belly of the fish should be opened, and the internal parts sprinkled with powdered charcoal.—The same material will restore impure or even putrescent water to a state of perfect freshness. The inhabitants of Cadiz, who are necessitated to keep in tanks the water for culinary uses, were first indebted to our informant, during the late Peninsular war, for the foregoing simple yet efficacious remedy of an evil which they had long endured.

VARIETIES.

PRESENTATION OF A GOLD VASE.—An elegant Antique gold Vase, richly chased, and of a perfectly unique design, was lately presented to MR. TURNER, of this town, Lecturer on Anatomy, Physiology, and Pathology.—The handles are composed of serpents entwined.—On the top of the cover which is bordered with a wreath of roses, shamrocks and thistles, is a beautiful figure of Apollo, reclining on a lyre, and holding a shield emblazoned with the sun.—On one side Mr. Turner's arms are engraved: on the reverse, is a tablet, surrounded with laurel, and supported by Esculapius and Hygieia, with their respective emblems.—It bears the following inscription:—

THIS VASE is presented to THOMAS TURNER, Esq. MEMBER OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS, LONDON, &c. &c. by the members who attended his first course of Lectures on the Anatomy, Physiology, and Pathology of the Human body, as a sincere though inadequate token of the respect they entertain for his TALENTS AND INDUSTRY AS A PUBLIC LECTURER, and of their regard for him as a MAN.

THE WEATHER.—The weather seems to have been equally unseasonable, during the whole summer, nearly all over the Continent. In France it has been as wet as in our own moist climate; and in various parts of Germany and Italy there have been extraordinary falls of snow up to the eve of the dog days.

PEACE AND PLENTY.—A person writes—"During a recent visit to the beautifully situated town of Totness in Devonshire, I was so much struck with the low prices of provisions there, that the following may become a curious though not quite a literary record:—

"A young roasting pig and a handsome dish of fish just caught, enough for a party of eight persons, 3s. 2d.; a leg of mutton sufficient for seven persons, 1s. 6d.; a roasting pig weighing 14lb. 2s. 6d.; a turbot weighing 22lb. 1s. 10d.; two pair of soles, 18 inches long, three large whittings and fourteen smaller ones, 1s. 6d.—For several weeks, 10s. 6d. per week was sufficient for the liberal supply of meat from the butcher for a most respectable family consisting of fourteen persons."

M. BELZONI.—We are concerned to state the failure of M. Belzoni's intended journey across Mount Atlas to Tombuctoo. By a letter from that traveller, dated Gibraltar, 10th June, he states his having met with an unexpected stop to his progress from the Emperor of Morocco, through whose country he wished to pass Mr. B. attributes his failure to some intrigues, but adds, "they are woefully mistaken who think that they can turn me back with one blow. The only consequence of this reverse is, that owing to what I have gathered of information, I shall be able to proceed with better prospects in another quarter; and by the time you will receive this, I shall probably be one-third of my journey further south than I have been in my last route."

THE MOCKING BIRD.—In my solitary but amusing rambles over these delightful prairies, I now, for the first time in my life, notwithstanding my long residence and peregrinations in North America, harkened to the inimitable notes of the mocking bird, (Turdus polyglottus.) After amusing itself in ludicrous imitations of the other birds, perched on the topmost bough of a spreading elm, it at length broke into a strain of melody the most wild, varied, and pathetic that ever I had heard from any thing less than human. In the midst of these enchanting strains, which gradually increased in loudness, it oftentimes flew upwards from the topmost twig, continuing its notes as if overpowered by the sublimest ecstasy.—Nuttall's Travels.

SUMMARY CONVERSION.—Maclean, the Laird of Coll, adopted a very summary method to bring about uniformity of sentiment in one of the Hebrides, a small island called Rum. When he entered upon the possession of that sterile spot, he found all the inhabitants Roman Catholics; and being himself a zealous protestant, it was not without considerable vexation that he saw all his dependants having recourse to a mode of worship so little in unison with his own views as a churchman. To effect a reform in this important concern, he placed himself one Sunday, during mass, at the entry of the chapel, and having ordered the congregation to be dismissed, he locked the door, and put the keys in his pocket, threatening the people, as they passed him in going out, that he would catch every individual who should venture to return to take part in those superstitious ceremonies. From this moment all the inhabitants of Rum embraced the Protestant faith, and went to the kirk with the Laird. It happened that Maclean, whilst thus exercising his zeal as a reformer, had seconded his menaces by shaking, in the faces of his converts, a golden-headed cane, which he gave them to understand would prove the instrument of their punishment in case of a relapse to Popery. A circumstance which led the other Hebrideans, whenever they had occasion to speak of the conversion of the people of Rum, to call them the Protestants of the golden-headed cane.

A PURITAN'S DESCRIPTION OF THE FAIR SEX.—Extracted from a pamphlet entitled 'A Brief Anatomie of Women.' London, 1653.—'The golden tresses of their hair (which being curiously kept suitable to their outward apparel, and according to the newest fashion) doth manifestly expresse the true performance of their duty to their lord and master Lucifer in observing so well his livery: and that they may more really appear to be his, and their beauty seeme more ingenuously light to other, they patch up their visages with pieces of darknesse, which are as so many seals of Satan to binde to his pleasure and will. Their rolling eyes like shining pearles seeme to be the baits that ensnare men in their love, whose fruit is destruction. Their eares delight to entertain frivolous discourses, especially if it relate to their praise and commendation, which is to them a thing not plausible. Their tongue (that stirring and active member both offensive and defensive) defensive in upholdinge their own supposed credit though ever so bad; offensive in scolding, abusing, and detracting from their neighbors though ever so good. Their lippes are the posterns whence ismelling, lying, deceit, and all manner of dissimulation. From the crowne of their head to the sole of the foote there is no good member, no, not one. That they are a help unto a man is indisputable, but in what sense? To exhaust his estate, divulge his secrets, and bee a continual trouble and vexation to his spirit all the daies of his life. They are fickle, changeable, and various as the weathercocke, constants in nothing but inconsistency, and humane creatures meerly metamorphosed seemings to bee that which truly and really they are not, and in a word, it is most apparent that they only are the greatest and most powerful temptations to evil of all others; the very gulphes where man's reason, governance, and discretion is often swallowed up, and the admittance rocks whereon many have been shipwrecked.'

THE DRAMA, ETC.

THEATRE-ROYAL.—On Saturday evening, Twelfth Night, as altered from Shakespeare, was performed; and received by a brilliant and crowded audience with the greatest approbation. The principal attraction of the evening was Miss M. TREE, in the part of Viola, in which character she evinced the nicest discrimination, and considerable pathos. Of Miss GRADY, (the lady who is expected to succeed Miss Hamersley) it gives us much pleasure to speak most favourably. Her performance was, throughout, very creditable, the only defect being a degree of embarrassment which will naturally yield to increased confidence. MR. BROWNE'S Malvolio was excellent; nor can we omit noticing MR. PORTEUS, in Sir Toby Belch; we think it decidedly one of his best performances.

ON THE SCOTCH NOVELS.

THE most prolific writer of modern times is, certainly, the author of the Waverley Novels. These interesting publications, which far surpass any others of the same kind, will not only have much influence upon society, during the present period, but are destined, doubtless, by their great and peculiar merits, (which are alike acknowledged by the critic and the mere general reader,) to produce effects upon the people of a distant age, when the contemporary works of a similar description will leave behind them no traces of their existence.

I have often thought that it would, to a cultivated mind, whose foresight had been sharpened by the retrospective views of history, be an interesting subject of speculation, to try to discover the nature and extent of the influence which these singular productions are likely to produce upon society.

It is something like a national peculiarity in English authors that some of the best of them should publish anonymously the most elaborate works, which they had no intention to claim, and which have been traced to the writers only by accidental circumstances. Thus Addison's papers in the Spectator were "Fairy favors which should last no longer than while the author was concealed." The Tale of a Tub was never directly acknowledged by Swift, and has been ascribed to him upon nothing better than circumstantial evidence. Of the admirable letters of Junius, the most studied composition in any language, the author declared that he was "the sole depository of his own secret and it should perish with him." To the long list of writers to whom my remark will apply we must add the Author of the Scotch Novels.

These publications have been ascribed to several persons well known in the literary world; but I have never, though I have sought them, discovered any plausible reasons for their being attributed to any other person than Sir Walter Scott. It is true that this opinion is not so prevalent as it was some time ago, and that it has been especially affected by the apparent contradiction of the Author in the introduction to the last Novel; but after an attentive examination of the denial to which I refer, some readers will probably agree with me in thinking, that it is either an equivocation, or at least, one of those harmless forfeitures of veracity in which, under such circumstances, an Author may be excused for indulging, when he does so to check the intrusion of unauthorized curiosity.

I shall briefly and hastily state some of the reasons which have induced me to suspect Sir Walter Scott of being the Author of the Waverley Novels.

1. Prior to the appearance of these works Sir Walter was the most industrious Author of his time, and not inferior to the great unknown in merit as well as in dispatch.

2. Since the publication of the Novels Sir Walter has written hardly any thing; though it is known in the circle of his acquaintance that his studies have been prosecuted with as much vigour as ever.

3. Several of his poems, as the Lady of the Lake, and the Lord of the Isles, in particular, require only to be converted into prose to make parts of the series of Novels. The form of the stories is the same; the characters are similar; and the peculiar nature of the reflections which are made in these works after the recital of an affecting occurrence, is quite characteristic. The similarity between some of the poems of Sir Walter Scott, and the Novels, in almost every point of view in which they can be compared, has always appeared to me to be very strong evidence. The more a person reads of these works with the object of making out the identity of the author, the more, I am sure, he will be convinced of it.

4. Previous to the appearance of a new Novel, Sir Walter has been known to visit the scene to which it referred.

5. The small pieces of poetry thinly scattered over the Novels must alone awaken a strong suspicion in those who have been accustomed to the poems of Sir Walter Scott.

6. The Novels are printed at the same press, and issued by the same publishers, as the acknowledged works of Sir Walter Scott. This reason would be of little importance if it stood alone, but it deserves to be mentioned as it supports the general evidence.

7. The Novels contain many legal phrases, seldom known to persons not in the profession of the law, and allusions, which prove the author to be a profound antiquarian.

8. Sir Walter Scott has been used to write anonymously. A number of Reviews, Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk, and I know not how many more things, have been publicly ascribed to him without contradiction.

9. The acquaintance of Sir Walter, who visit at his house, and have the best opportunities of observing his proceedings, and estimating his powers, are among the foremost to ascribe to him the anonymous Novels; and, on the contrary, the claim has, as far as I know, only been opposed by persons who are least likely, except from their presumption, to form an opinion upon the subject.

The reasons which I have stated for suspecting Sir Walter Scott of having written the Waverley Novels appear to me to be very strong; their strength is increased by the weakness of the objections which have been raised by those who have opposed the conclusion; and still more, by the paltry evidence, by which the claims, made for other persons, have been supported.

Q.

ALPIN.

IN THE STYLE OF OSSIAN.

(Translated from the Dutch.)

LUMINARY of the stately Night! how mournfully risest thou in the East!—Hark!—the storms shriek yet from afar—roaring waves approach with devastation—dark clouds, with pallid borders edged, fly through the troubled sky. The birds have departed at the voice of the tempest—the night-owl has repaired to his ruined dwelling—horribly he howls from yonder shaking rock, and his screams are on the field.

By intervals, O Moon, shewest thou thy countenance, pale as death, through broken clouds.—New clouds raise their grey heads above the glimmering hills—thy unsteady rays fly yet over the bending grass—but slowly descends the darkness of the grave around me, and the spirits of the dead arise before mine eyes. Like meteors are their glittering forms on the hill of winds. Descend to your mansions, ye souls of pleasing Bards! until the dawn break into your darkness, and your voice be heard again over the sea, as the voice of breezes, whistling along the mossy rocks.—Sink softly on your low pillows of dust, ye ghosts of departed maidens! until the rose again bloom on your cheeks, and the evening-gales, sighing from the rocks, play with your waving locks.—Why should ye recall to me the years that are past, the days of our meeting on Lora?—When my strength was like a beam of fire, when gladness dwelled in my bosom. Salgar! I see thee in thy strength; but my powers are broken. Thou art pleasant as ever, grey-haired Ullin! but my voice is become hoarse; it vanishes, as the son of the rock*, on the expanse of the ocean.—Solitary I remain, deserted by my friends; and no Bard comforts me with his soothing lay.—

SALGAR.

Sorrowful, treadest thou over the heath: disconsolate, watchest thou on the mountain of winds. The storm of autumn precedes thy steps; he carries thy plaints along with him. Spring finds thee lamenting on the hill, and thy voice of woe drowns his soft-whispering breath.—Why is thy joy departed, O Alpin! why is thy glory like that of the dead?—Grief has whitened thy looks; thy voice is worn by lamentation.

ALPIN.

My fame rests in the grave—the narrow house incloses my joy. The howling of winter increases not my sorrow; spring refreshes me not with his dew. Listen to my distress, O Salgar! not small is the cause of my tears. Return, ye dark-brown years, which I have lost; restore to me the remembrance, of which ye have bereft me!—

Salgar! thine eyes have seen Minona, the favoured maiden of Nossá.—I loved her in my youth: thou heardest, in other times, my song of her in the wood.—Her eye was softer than the moon in a summer's night—on her cheek blossomed my happiness among roses. Her heart was as pure as the snow of the hill; her breast calm as the sea, after the departed storm. When the morning-sun rose in the sky, we left our huts, and the shades of the wood heard our tender conferences,

Once, the morn was lovely, as the countenance of Minona, as the rose after a dewy night.

* The Echo.

The howling storms had fled away, on the rolling waves of the sea; the torrents had returned to their gloomy chambers. Like a triumphant warrior, steep forth the sun from the horizon, and his splendor shone on the mountain-tops. My soul was at peace like the meandering stream in the vale; mine eyes were brighter than the star of the descending night. Joy attended my steps at the side of my Minona over the field; with bounding hearts walked we towards the dark wood. On the way, I touched the harp of music. My hand, enraptured, struck not the lay of devastation, not the bloody tones of Fingal. From my chords thrilled love, and the softly-blushing Minona accompanied me with her voice. Our song resounded in the tent of the hunter; in the midst of his panting hounds, he heard it roll, from afar, along the declivity of the hills.

On a sudden, dark clouds gathered from the west; on dusky wings returned the tempests. The sun hid his lovely head in a cloud—the whirlwinds roared over the rock—the storms screamed over the dark heath. From distant hills rolled the thunder on: awfully rumbled his voice through the clouds: ghastful flew the unsteady lightning over the green hills, and his glittering was over the expanse of the field.—With sullenness approached the sea; her dashing billows climbed the rock. When the lightning had expelled the gloom, we saw, at a distance, the white sails heaved up by the foaming surge: the blue light yielded, and the shaking thunder rumbled through the darkness of midnight with redoubled force. Distant, over the heath were the sound of the returning hunter, and the howling of the terrified hounds.—Death descended on a thunderbolt; his violence was against the loveliest of maidens. At my side fell Minona; in the rocky glen died my beloved.—My hope fled with the blast; my joy, with the roaring waves. Lonely I stood on earth, deserted on the hill of storms. I had no friend to console me—no maid to sooth me—no heart to return my love. Mine eyes could shed no tears, my breast was as the parched field after a short shower.—Sorrowfully I gathered four glittering stones, and under a fir, reddened by the blast, their moss-grown heads marked the narrow-house of the beloved maiden.

SALGAR.

My tears are for the dead; my sorrows for the inhabitant of the tomb. Great is thy woe, O Alpin! irreparable the loss of thy love. No more hast thou a beloved maiden to rest on thy bosom, no companion in the feast of Selma. Thine eyes will remain red with tears, incurable is the wound of thy heart.—But the storm approaches anew. My spirit is borne on it, towards the silent dwelling of Colma. Our graves are apart. She slumbers far away, on the heath. Darkly I fly over the hills to my Colma, and the night finds our spirits hovering in sweet communion.

ALPIN.

I am alone, O Minona! alone on the rock of the hill. Arise, spirit of my beloved! arise on this silent eminence.—Fairest of daughters!—thou still tarriest—Ah! why tormentest thou thine Alpin? Knowest thou not again his voice?—Minona, my Minona!—

MINONA.

How is the voice of my love over the field—the melodious voice of my beloved over the long grass of the graves?—In the depth of my dark dwelling I heard it—in the motionless stillness of the dead.

Night hovers over the mountains—the tempest rages—my spirit arises from the earth—he ascends like a column of mist, on the glimmering of the main—on the wind he rushes on—on the wings of the storm he speeds to meet thee!

ALPIN.

I see thee, O my love, as a darting ray of the moon on the top of the snowy hill. From afar, I heard thy voice on the blast—thy call, half-drowned in the storms of the rock. Fear thrilled not through my limbs—no alarm struck paleness on my countenance. I exclaimed: be silent, ye winds! ye storms of the mountains, cease your roaring—descend on the brown moss among the rocks, or hide yourselves in the broad summits of the wood.—Pleasant is your rustling among the broken clouds, but sweeter is the voice of my beloved. It is as the sighing evening-breeze on the field, as the murmuring of the rivulet in the valley.—Thou drewest near, daughter of loveliness! Thy voice, unmingled, came to me. The fragrance of spring breathes around thee; the dew of thy breath bathes my looks.—

My years are fled away in sorrow, joy left me with the fire of youth. When the storm screamed from the rock, when the North-wind swelled the billows, I sat on the lonely shore deserted by the glory of maidens. My bow lay unbent at my side—the white-plumed arrow slept on the sand. Over the main, mine eyes wandered, like a hind on the rock; they sped with the rolling waves, till where the clouds rest on the expanse of the sea. With the flood they returned—empty, with the foaming billow. Minona was departed from earth; she was gone to rest in the stillness of the tomb.—Vainly I charged the wind with my lamentation. My glory was withered as the rose in autumn; my soul was fallen as dust before the approaching flood. When the storms are at rest, my song rolls no more along the winding shore, my harp resounds no more on the field, when the moon rises in the stillness of night.—O Minona, who will dry up my tears? who will, compassionately, bend the bow at my breast, or plunge the sword into my heart?—Return, O my beloved, with the spring, with the gales in the wood of songs.—When shall I hear again thy voice, as in my youth? When wilt thou awake from thy long slumber?—

MINONA.

Thy Minona is torn from thee; the conqueror of Heroes seized her with his mighty hands. Her face is grown pale as the moon on the hill of Fura, her breast, cold as clay. Mine arms embrace the dust, worms slumber on my bosom. Gone is my beauty; but my love remains: he is stronger than the destroyers of Morar.—The foot of the hunter was on my grave, the steps of the running hounds. I heard not their noise—the stillness of my dwelling was not broken:—but Alpin approached from afar, and feeling re-animated my mouldering bones.—When the wind, at night, came forth from the west, my spirit hovered, with the waning moon, among the departed maidens—half glimmering, wandered we, in dreary union, along the declivity of the stony hills. I heard thy wailing on the distant shore, like the howling of the wind between the cleft rocks. I then left the mournful circle, and my shade hovered on thy looks.—Sweetly resounded thy complaint in the wood—with pleasure heard I thy lamentation of love. Thy remembrance rivetted Minona—thou caldest her the lovely maiden of Torman. Sadly I saw the dawn glimmering in the east. Unmindful of the orient sun, I left thee and went down to my dark dwelling. How long shall yet be our separation, O my beloved?—

ALPIN.

The time of my fading is near—near is the hand which shall scatter my leaves. Age is on my tongue; my strength has vanished as the evening-breeze in the top of the oak.—Open thy narrow dwelling for me, O Minona! share thy cool pillow with thy love.—Behold! spring approaches—he shall hover on our united dust, the drops of heaven shall bedew our grave. The hero shall shed a tear on each stone; loving youths shall exchange embraces on our dust.—From afar sees the mariner the shaking summit of the fir, that withers on our tomb. Deeply moved he sings of our love, and mournfully gazing, he passes along.

Manchester, 18th August, 1823.

FROM "SMILES FOR ALL SEASONS."

The clever Idiot.

A Boy, as Nursery records tell,
Had dropp'd his drum-stick in the well;
He had good sense enough to know
He would be beaten for't, and so
Silly (tho' silly from his cradle)
Took from the shelf a silver ladle,
And in the water down it goes,
After the drum-stick, I suppose.
The thing was mis'd, the servants blamed,
But in a week, no longer named:
Now this not suiting his design,
A silver cup he next purloins,
(To aid his plan, he never stopp'd)
And in the water down it dropp'd.
This caused some words, and much inquiry,
And made his parents rather try;
Both for a week were vex'd and cross,
And then—submitted to the loss.
At length, to follow up his plan,
Our little, clever, idiot man
His father's favourite silver waiter
Next cast into the wat'ry crater.
Now this, indeed, was what the cook
And butler could not overlook;
And all the servants of the place
Were search'd, and held in much disgrace.
The boy now call'd out, "Cook, here—Nell;
What's this so shining in the well?"
This was enough to give a hint
That the lost treasures might be in't;
So for a man with speed they sent,
Who down the well directly went.
They listen with expectant ear,
At last these joyful words they hear,
"O, here's the Ladle, and the Cup,
And Waiter too—so draw me up."
"Hold," quoth the boy, "a moment stay,
Bring something else that's in your way."
Adding (with self approving grin)
"My Drum-stick, now your hand is in."

A flattering Opinion.

An Artist who rated his skill rather high,
Was thus to a brother revealing
His future intentions respecting the sky
Which embellish'd his Drawing-room ceiling.
"This plan I have thought of, and now mean to try,
This is far the best method now on't it?
To whitewash it first, let it carefully dry,
And then at my leisure to paint it."
"Why, Sir," said the other (and nearly had burst
In his face in a loud fit of laughter.)
"I think I should set about painting it first,
And then, you know, whitewash it after."

Irish Advice.

"O, dear mamma;" said little Ann,
"The ice I was induced to take
By that kind Irish gentleman,
Has really made my stomach ache."
"My dearest love, then, take advice,"
Her mother said; "I'm sure you will;
Don't eat another glass of ice
Without first taking off the chill."

The Importance of Ten Minutes.

A Buffoon once complaining to Francis the First,
That a Lord he had held up to laughter
Had threaten'd to kill him; said he, "If he dost, I'll hang him in five minutes after."
"That will do me no good," said the courtly Buffoon,
"So your Majesty's Grace I implore
To grant me in mercy this one little boon,
Just hang him five minutes before."

ANDREW LAURIE'S RETURN.

(Concluded from our last.)

Before I came in sight, the ancient kirk, with its sharp peaked gables and narrow windows, floated in a shadowy vision before me on the summit of the knoll;—row succeeding row of bared and venerable heads, seemed to fill the extent of the walls from end to end,—and I almost thought I heard the voice of the pastor, and the ascending of the psalm. But when I emerged from the little woody glen, I found that a few corner stones, and a heap of dust, was all that remained of the kirk of Dalgarnock. It had been cast to the ground many years, and the roads which came from four different parts to its door, were ploughed and sown, except one rugged and abrupt way which led from a ford in the river, and on this I could observe that sometimes the feet of man had lately travelled. The gate was unfastened, and with a slow and faltering step I went among the memorials of the dead, and wended my way reverently among their graves,—the foot of the living should respect the dwelling of the departed. I heard something like the murmuring of a human voice, and looking around saw a new dug grave, deep and long, a spade and a hoe stuck in the loose black earth; I saw nothing else,—yet still the sound increased; and, at last, I saw, not without surprise, the figure of a man laid at full length on the grass, like one measuring ground with his person for a grave. At a small distance a clean white cloth was spread over a flat gravestone, and wine and other refreshments stood in a basket upon it.

I stood gazing on the grave, and on the living person who lay stretched beside it. He wore a coat of coarse, homespun gray cloth,—with gun-mouthed trousers reaching midleg down; his feet were bare, and a grizzled lock or two escaping noombed from beneath a broad and tattered bonnet, spoke something to me of age and weakness of brain. He lay holding a fresh dug-up skull between his hands, to which he was speaking with the familiarity of old acquaintance. "Aha, Johnnie Wumble," said he, "ye are a quiet child now, and a' since ye got on a timber coat, and witch Girzie laid ye in yere last linen. My certie, but ye lay quietly among the mools, wi' the red dewy gowans wagging bonnie aboon ye. Ye had nae business to cut the tree where the wood-dove biggit, in the foot of my mother's yard,—and ye had nae right to dig down the auld kirk of Dalgarnock, and let in the wind and rain among the sparrows and bats, poor sackless things. Had ye behaved yeresel, the bedral wad nae hae daddit the mools out atween yere teeth with his ain spade, and bade ye lie still for a fool, and no rise till the Lord lifted ye. But ye raise for a' that. Ye think I did nae see ye sitting on the kirkyard dyke in the howe of hallowmas eve, wi' the deil's Rab of Rorie, and Jock Thuneram of Thrapplem, and a full score of uncuffed companions at your elbow. Ye had een like burning coals, teeth like harrows, and ye were singing a highland sang. Ah! loon to think to fright daft Symie Crosstree, that unlovesome gate. I'll throw thy skull into the Nith, and let the eels and the water adders have a new place of abode." And the water flashed as the skull descended into a neighbouring pool.

Daft Symie Crosstree—a kind hearted and quiet fool, who used to wander from house to house in the parish, and seek his food and clothes among those who were willing to befriend one of the most helpless and harmless of mankind,—daft Symie having disposed of the skull of ill Jock Wumble, proceeded to stretch himself beside a low grassy grave, marked with no stone of remembrance, and laying his arms over it, began to fondle and caress it as a mother caresses a baby. "Bonnie Lillie Lesley," he said, "seventeen summers have ye lain in a maiden grave, and seventeen summers since have I wandered the earth, and this is the first time I have had the grace to lie down aside ye. Ye were a blythe and a bonnie lass when I first began to roam, a poor demented lad, about the parish,—but I'm wiser now, lass, and can mind,—when ane hunted the dogs on me,—another drave me frae the door, and another laid me in wet straw and damp sacks, saying 'naught was gude enough for a gowk,—what did my Bonnie Lillie Lesley do? She gied me a warm supper and a cosie bed,—gentle words, and pitying looks, and took the garters frae her ain white lady-like legs, and tied up Ringwood and Whitefoot, and kept in all the dogs of Dalgarnock gate and frae her ain poor Symie. It has been a wae'ful world for me since bonnie Lillie Lesley died." And wiping his eyes with the sleeve of his coat, he bubbled out and wept. On turning his head, and observing a new grave-stone fresh painted and filled with letters, he broke away into another mood. "Od, but Lillie lass, I would have ye to lie farther frae auld Lannie Luckpennie,—he'll pick the siller nails out of your brow black kist, and a' for love of the metal. Mickle need has he to gather gain aneath the earth, his nephew is scattering it fu' gloriously aboon. I'll tell ye what, auld Luckpennie, take a fool bodie's counsel, and ease up the edge of your painted stone awae, and get ae glance at the way in which the gowd is getting the air, which ye sinned your soul in saving. A snow flight at yule is nought compared wi' the flight of yer hoarded gear; ye may hear the clink on't in every change house; horse-raiding, dicing, and drabbing, and play-going, give wings to the wealth of auld Lannie Luckpennie." And leaping to his feet he shouted,

"Auld Lannie Luckpennie,
Auld Lannie Luckpennie,
Ika Jockie has his Jannie,
And the deil has Lannie Luckpennie."

Roused, no doubt, by a noise which would have roused all that was less than dead, an old man, slowly, and with many a groan, raised himself up from the side of a fresh ridged grave, and rubbing his eyes, and yawning like a death's head on a sepulchre,—the simile was at hand as all similes should be,—exclaimed, scandalized beyond endurance at the irreverent song of Symie—"Deil dabble yere daft book in an ebb grave, that a clocken ben may scratch it out, wherefore make ye that unsanctified din? Away wi' your carcass I say. I'll never earn a groat out of thee:—I bury all the wise fowk at aughten pence the head, and the daft fowk into the bargain, and providence has been sae bountiful of intellect to the district, that I'll no make aboon saxpence a piece; hand owre head,—I counted them a' by the register book yestreen,—it's a sad bargain, and gin there was mickle wisdom in the parish I would have it broken."

To the grave digger of the old kirkyard of Dalgarnock, Symie advanced with a look of vacant stupidity. All the arch and somewhat mischievous alertness of his glance was gone, and his face seemed changed into a mere lump of unquickened clay. "Gude day, gude day, Ichabod School," said Symie, "ye hae dug a brow hole,—ye make the house, and leave death to find a tenant;—this sair cough that's gone raging among us wise fowk of Dalgarnock will send monie a siller aughten-pennie, and dredgie drink thy road." Siller pennies, said ye, gowk," quoth Ichabod School, "siller seldom comes my road;—none but daft fowk die, and wise fowk live for ever. Save when a Laurie or a Menteth, grace be wi' them, take it into their head to oblige ane wi' a wise person's funeral, I never can clap a creditable body wi' my spade, and bid the gowans wag o'er a sark-ful of sensible clay. This wearyfoul marriage of the gude maiden parish of Dalgarnock wi' the captions carle Closeburn, vexes ane sair,—sorrow be wi' them that laid the twa together. Then there's the dinging down of the bonnie auld kirk, where monie a fair face sat, and monie a lang psalm was sung; and casting out the ancient name of Dalgarnock frae 'mong the parishes of Nithdale, just as if it had nae as sweet a sound as Closeburn, or Kirk-maboe,—or worse than a Wamphray,—a name fit to make a dead dog bark. But let the name gang,—a name's but a sough and a sound,—and let the kirk tumble, it was but timmer and stanes,—but wha can endure, think ye, to see the auld world worthies of the land haurled awa feet foremost, and a' to grace the new burial ground of Closeburn, an' a plague till't,—can it no be content wi' devouring the name of the green and gladsome nook of Dalgarnock, but it maun wile away the bonks of douce and sposable fowk; as if our auld sunny knowe were nae like a slip of the garden o' paradise compared with the new calf-wad of Closeburn,—a barren top and a sour bottom."

"And then," said Symie, "what is the parish gardener of Closeburn compared to our Ichabod School?"

can he make a deep and a narrow dwelling according to the word? Can he make sin a bonnie piece of subterranean architecture as thou? Ye should never make a grave for a piece of cauld common clay,—ye should keep yere spade for the use of gentles and dukes, and the like of Tam o' Campel an' me."

"Truly," said Ichabod, "a wise word frae a witless pow. Ye are right, Symie; my last hames are just sey pieces of human skill, sae straight, sae deep, and sae tempting. There was the young portioner of Cairncross slipped a bit of gowd in my loof, when he saw what a bonnie subterranean edifice I had out for his father, and tauld me it was a pleasure to look upon. The lad's an honest lad, though a thought given to drink and the lasses, and can judge of the merit of my wark as it made him laird of three gude mailens. But all go to Closeburn kirkyard now,—the young and auld, the rotten and ripe,—vanity lays them down, and may the fiend gie them a lifting."

"Hout, Ichabod School," said Symie, "your alip of paradise is no deserted yet. Ye have Douglasses, Kirkpatrickes, and Hallidays, mony a aye,—a kind Menteth or twa,—and in the fulness of time ye'll have mae be praised for't,—and a lang line of Lauries."

"A lang line of Lauries," said the grave-digger of Dalgarnock—"but the longest day will draw to night, and the lang line of Lauries maun have an end. And the mair's the pity, the mair's the pity; but wilfu' fowk, wilfu' fowk, ane gade east, and another went west,—ane gade to the north,—I wonder what he found there,—and ane to the south, and left a fair patrimony, and the hope of having a pleasant naddin cut wi' my spade in the gowan knowe of Dalgarnock. They were a frank-handed race,—but their race is run;—they were a liberal people, and good to beast and body, and they never forgot me at either bridal or burial,—a silver crown piece afore ever I wet a spade,—and on the marriage day a drop of drink, and the roast and the boiled, made it little waur than a dredgie. They were a liberal race. I would count ye some sixteen of them all side by side, ready to rise when heaven's will is,—but they are sae covered wi' memorial stones, Symie, my lad, that the rising will be a kittle ceapter;—the Dargavels, and all the names that nae body cares for, will be up and through Enterkin afore a Laurie can rise." And the ancient man of Dalgarnock kirk-yard stept upon a gravestone, looked round, and began to count with his finger the graves of my ancestors. "Sixteen beds all in a row," he said, "wi' the green grass waving aboon them, and one gaping there for the coming morsel,—a bonnie sight." I stept upon another gravestone, and surveyed the line of graves; Ichabod saw me for the first time, and said in a tone more of surprise than pleasure, "Grace guide us, here's ae Laurie risen afore another's well ready to lay i' the grave."

"A Laurie risen!" said Symie, coming to my side, and examining me with a look of vacant consideration,—"Trowth, he's arisen, that I can avouch,—for he was twice killed in battle, thrice drowned in the sea, and sax times dead wi' fair straw death,—or else there's nae truth in country clatter. But risen or not, it's my ain bonnie Andrew Laurie. Ah, Andrew, my man, what have ye made of Whitefoot, and Whaupie, and the pet hawk?—and how did ye live without me?—ye would not find a daft lad in every country to do ye a good turn,—there's no the like of me at every dyke back. Wherefore d'ye no speak? have ye been deaf, as well as dead? and that's say likely, for there was my ain grandame, when she went to the kirk-hole, and ill Bauldy Beattie basted me wi' his strap, I ran and tauld her on't, and she ne'er minded her poor bairn, but lay as quiet as the mools aboon her."

"Whisht, ye born fool," said Ichabod, "this is aye of the queer gentlemen who never love a house till the riggings off't,—a tree, till its dead i' the top and rotten i' the heart,—nor a kirk, till the howlets forboe it for fear it falls. I ken them bravely. Give them three or four rusty coffin nails, and an auld bane, and the tram of a wheelbarrow, and a worm-eaten quag, and the snout of a steel bonnet, and an auld parritch spurtle, and a lang stane, wi' twa or three scratches upon it, and they'll make a book as big as Boston's Fourfold State, wi' a hundred pictures o' a' the straps, and straes, and knocking stanes in the parish. This is aye of them."

"Ah! Andrew Laurie, man," said Symie, "d'ye mind how ye hunted me to the top of the Hazelbrae, and made me lie all night among the heather, for fear of your dog Whitefoot? But then ye gied me two apples and a saxepee at Thornhill fair,—sae lay that and that together,—kindness clears a' scores wi' daft Symie. And then, man, d'ye mind how ye put a living burchin in the ae meal powk, and a howlet i' the fether, and sent me crying round the parish, 'fidum, fadum, our cat has kittled two magpies and a moudie?' Nae act of kindness cleared that score,—sae take ye that, Andrew Laurie, for what ye did to me lang syne." And stooping suddenly to the ground, and snatching up the remains of a skull, he hurled it at my head—and this unexpected missile narrowly missed the mark. I thought if Symie visited every little deed of early mischief upon me, I was in a fair way of being stoned to death, so I threw him a crown-piece; which he caught as it flew. When he saw it was silver he gave a leap, then ran round like a pair of yarn widdles, and shouted out, "Goodsooth, Symie Crosstree, it's a crown-piece,—it shall work while I sleep,—It came frae the hand of a Laurie,—a frank free hand,—the same hand that chased me wi' stones from the top of Topstarvet down to the mains of Closeburn, and made me climb into the top of Monteth's oak, where I sat till it took six men and three ladders to bring me down again. Nae kindness ever saved that sair,—sae take ye that, Andrew Laurie, ye ken what ye did to me lang syne;" and he threw a shank-bone, with a bitterness which my late present gave me no reason to expect, and I found some trouble in eluding it.

"I'd brain ye wi' my spade, gowk," said the gravedigger, "if it werena I would have your grave to howk gratis, and that for misusing a man wi' a frank hand, and siller in his pouch. And you, sir, wha throw away mair coin on a coof than I would dig ye three full size graves for, d'ye no see that he's half knave and fu' fool, wi' as much cunning as will cause him to throw dead men's bane at you, while ye throw siller at him. But take ane's counsel, who never saw a penny of your coin, and gang and sit down aside the burial bread and wine, there where they stand. Daft Symie respects burial drink, when he respects nothing else." I seated myself as Ichabod advised, and Symie came quietly and sat down beside me.

The spot where I sat was full of summer beauty and sanctity, but the desolation of the kirk, and the home of my youth, pressed upon my heart. I thought on the sabbath mornings when I had stood by the gate, and seen all the way to the house of God moving with the grave, the beautiful, and the young,—when I beheld the seats thronged, and many fair eyes glancing modestly to and fro, and that interchange of silent and holy greeting which passes among friends before worship begins. I thought too on those who bore my name, and shared kindred blood with me; and I saw the graves of many I loved growing green beside me, each headed by a memorial stone. And I said in my heart, of the seven Lauries whom I left, lo! six are sleeping there,—and as I looked I thought on the new dug grave, and I saw it was for a tall person; and as my eyes dwelt upon it they filled with tears, and my heart throbbed, and I would fain have gone away but I had not the power.

Ichabod now came to my side, "Deil mend their speed," said he, "here am I standing as stiff wi' cauld as a crutch, and as hungry as the grave at a green yule,—but they're near now,—I hear the neighing of their horses." Symie started to his feet, and laying down his ear to the earth, and listening for a moment, he clapped his hands and shouted out, "Oh! the burial bits,—the burial bits,—dads of bread and touts of wine. I wish other sax would die. Men are far kinder to poor demented Symie when they have their timmer top coats on, than when they sit at the board head. A piece of sour bread, and a drop of wynted milk, from the living,—but waughts of red wine, and wamefuls of white cake, from the dead. I can gang fustling and sorrowfu hame frae a reeking house, but frae the kirkyard I have to grope my way,—and the wine has whoomeled me owre a grave, and left me to cool, and come to myself among the morning dew. Oh! the burial bits,—the burial bits,—dads of bread, and touts of wine. Yonder he comes, yonder he comes, in his braw black ohest, with siller whirries on the sides, and the parish cloak trailing o'er him. Well may he bruik the new."

I stood up and saw a long train of horsemen descending the western bank of the river, and approaching to Dalgarnock kirkyard, by a narrow, and woody, and unfrequented way. They were all dressed in black, and riding slowly and mournfully along. In the middle of the line of horsemen two rode abreast, bearing a coffin across the shoulders of their horses, over which a mort-cloth was thrown, which reached nigh the ground. They passed the river, and halting at the little gate, bore the coffin to the brink of the grave beside where I stood, and all gathering around gazed mournfully on it for a minute's space or more, in silence so intense, that I thought the very throbbings of my heart were audible. At length a very old man removed his hat, smoothed down a few white hairs which time had left about his temples, and looked in the grave, and in the faces of his companions, till the tears started in his eyes. As he looked round he saw me, he eyed me for a little space, and said, "His dying words are come to pass,—one has come from a far land, who will lay his head in the grave,—never, he said, would the head of one of his blood be laid low in Dalgarnock, but the hand of one of his name would lay it,—and his words are come to pass."—And he came and took me by the hand, and leading me to the head of the grave, said, "Mine old eyes deceive me much if thou art not Andrew Laurie,—stand there,"—and he placed the silken cords of the coffin in my hands, which the love of some antique mind had wreathed with flowers. All eyes were turned on me,—my eyes wandered from face to face,—I dreaded to speak, and the same dread seemed visible in every one.

The old man came forward, and said,—"Let us not lay in the grave, with superstitious rites and observances, one of the kindest, and gentlest, and simplest spirits which ever breathed among us. Devout himself, and one who walked in the austere meekness of the pure Scottish kirk, we should insult him were we with uplifted hands, with beads held down, and with smooth words, and studied sentences, to offer up supplication for him. Shall we pour a prayer less than inspired over him who so often poured over others the warm and unsolicited overflowings of a tender heart and a gifted mind? Afar from me be all the vanity of such devotion, and in a homely way will I speak of a homely heart. There he lies, who for seventy years never gave a pious heart pain, nor denied an honest man's request,—he thatched the roof of the widow's house,—he put food between the lips of the orphan,—his door stood ever to the wall, that the needy might enter,—and at his hearth was found the soldier's wife and her helpless children. He was not vain of his influence among men, nor was he proud of his wisdom,—his wit was kind and pleasant,—his humour was chaste and free,—and he read a song sweeter than others could sing it. His sayings became proverbs, and his proverbs are laws in the land. He was proud of his descent,—and he said none of his blood or his name ever begged bread. The beggar will bless his house as he passes, though the hearth shall be cold and the table unfurnished. He goes where all shall go,—but he goes blessed,—for him the grey headed and the wise weep, and the fool sheds tears."

The old man had elevated his hands in fervour,—his voice was waxing melodious,—a flush was coming over his brow,—matter bold and figurative was flowing in, and he was about to pour out one of those simple and affecting characteristic prayers which I have heard uneducated men utter over the dead, when he was suddenly interrupted. Poor demented Symie, with tears streaming down his cheeks, burst through the band of mourners, leaped into the grave, and cried out with a voice of unsurpassable agony, "Oh! Luke Laurie,—Luke Laurie,—I will be buried for thee." The old man looked on him for a moment, dropped his hands, and said, "Thus men may 'know when the righteous and the kind-hearted die. Andrew Laurie, there lies thine uncle,—long he looked for thy return; the last look he gave was with the hope of seeing thee,—the last wish he uttered was that thou mightest lay his old white head in the grave,—and he died in the belief that all this would come to pass. Now let us lay him in the dust. All has been said that Christians ought to say over the clay mansion, out of which the immortal spirit has passed; and the wisest man's words are but folly compared to those of this poor simple fool."

THE WANDERER'S RETURN.

Land of my Fathers, dearer to my soul
Than all the teeming fruitfulness of climes
Or wealth of nations, when stern death shall take Me to himself, may I in slumber rest
Within thy firm embrace.

ANON.

I do not know any thing which takes hold of the powers of man with a stronger grasp than reflection, when he visits the scenes of his childhood endeared by fond recollection, and tender hope. They recall the days of other years, when the wanderer was wont to traverse over every brake, and pry into every secret inclosure; when the old mansion resounded with the voices of parents and friends; and when the hum of the school boy alone disturbed their morning's repose.

I have now, after an absence of ten years, returned to my native village; but, alas! where are those scenes which were once so familiar to me? where is my father's house, the pleasure grounds, and the little garden in which the first years of my infancy were spent?—they are no where to be found! My parents are both dead—the old sexton has pointed out their graves;—and my brother—the same sod which covers my parents rests upon him! My sister has long since left the old hamlet; and I, the only one of our family remaining, wander, as it were, a stranger, and an outcast from the place of my birth!

During the month which has now elapsed since my arrival, I have found but one of my old friends, the grey-headed sexton of our parish church. Poor old man, he is not a whit changed since the days when he used to occupy his accustomed seat in the corner of our kitchen, when placed in the high arm-chair he drank the nut-brown ale and puffed his frequently replenished pipe, excepting that his hairs are grown whiter, and his face seems reduced into a smaller compass! My school companions are all dead, saving one, and he, after being buffeted for years, a mere football for Fortune to vent her spleen upon, has left his birth place, and, like myself, tired of the world, sought out a remote corner of the globe in which to pass a few years in ease and tranquillity.

My first visit was to the house of one with whom I once lived in the dearest ties of friendship.—Those indeed were happy days, oh years of my youth, could ye but return, how differently would I spend ye! how—but hold, time, time bears us down its stream, let me look forward, and smooth the rough path through which I am gliding fast into Eternity, and not waste the precious moments in bubbles, which must surely burst and sink me under their weak support. Leoline was my friend, and his sister Mary, on her had I fixed my affections, and well do I remember when we parted exchanging our mutual vows; but Fate prevented their completion! When I visited the cottage an old domestic who had often nursed me opened the door, and to my enquiries for my friend told me—and a tear, in spite of her endeavours to prevent it, shored itself,—that he was dead—and that only a few weeks before! The old nurse knew me not, time had wrought such a change that even she who had so often tended me, had forgotten my features.

How the tears ran down her furrowed cheeks when I announced myself, and she beheld him on whom her late master had so often called in his illness. The poor creature led me as it were instinctively to the room in which the once lovely Mary was reclining. But how changed! the glow of health was flown—that figure which had a few years before attracted the general gaze was reduced beneath anxiety and sorrow—and her features were care-worn and emaciated.

She was seated, or rather reclining on a couch, which stood opposite to a window commanding an extensive view over a delightful lawn, at the extremity of which rambled the babbling brook which was shaded by the broad-leaved sycamore and spreading elm—the flowering branches of a luxuriant woodbine, which covered the front of the cottage, had found their way into the room through the half-opened window, and mingled sweet perfume in the breeze of evening.

As I advanced to behold those features which were so altered since I last gazed upon them, she cast a glance upon me which I first interpreted as a recognition, but was soon undeceived by her gently enquiring my name.

Vain would be any attempt to picture our feelings, or to pourtray the scene which took place when my name was announced. I shall pass it over; but the struggles of nature against the pain which tortured my beloved were too strong for her, and she fainted in my arms. The old servant soon removed her to her chamber, and I reluctantly bade “Good night,” with a promise to return early in the morning.

Need I say that scarcely had Aurora tinged the mountains, nor had the lark arose to offer its orisons, when I was hastening towards the habitation of sickness, nay of loveliness—of perfection—of every thing dear in this world. The lamp was not yet extinguished, and I could discover by its beams several forms passing to and fro in the chamber of the invalid. With a tremulous and unsteady hand I lifted the knocker, which was soon answered by the old domestic, who welcomed me with a heavy countenance. I could but too well perceive the news that was detained, I anticipated, she was indeed alive, but her spirit seemed to waver betwixt heaven and earth, though still clinging to its frail tenement. After taking a little refreshment I was admitted into her chamber, and there found the lovely Mary even more beautiful than I had fancied her before. I began to hope, to feel that nature might sustain itself a little longer, but as I urged the idea she only more forcibly represented the impossibility of recovery.

The room in which we then were looked towards the village church, and she kept her eyes intently fixed upon this prominent object. Ere I had sat long, the passing bell reverberated along the lawn and brought its sound to our ears. The knell seemed to ring ominously at such a period, and it had its effect. Finding conversation tedious, when the physician made his appearance I retired, and bade a temporary farewell, promising the next morning to revisit the gentle Mary. I took a circuitous route for my road home, and lingered among the ruins of my Father's house; never was devastation more complete. With some difficulty I discovered the spot on which the small library once stood, and in which I took a last farewell of my aged parent. Well do I remember the affectionate distress of the old man, as the tears ran down his wrinkled face, and he in vain endeavoured to say “Farewell.” I left him before the parting word escaped his lips. As I sat upon the wall which then in part fenced our garden, I allowed my thoughts to wander to past time, and to events, which though they took place some years since, appeared to my memory as vivid as when I actually engaged in them.

Shortly the sweet warblings of a flute sounded on my ear, and as the tones grew louder, I exclaimed with the Poet:

“If music be the food of love play on.”

But the transport into which this melody had carried me, broke the spell, and the cause of these delightful feelings was removed. As I gazed upon the spot whence the notes arose, I observed the figure of a youth reflected upon a small stream, along which he wandered; but ere I could reach the spot where he stood, he had vanished, and was lost to my sight in the shadow of the trees which surrounded the wall where I had taken my seat.

The shades of evening had now deeply set in, and the cold breeze warned me that the time to seek repose was at hand. I obeyed, and returned to the house where I had fixed a temporary abode. My sleep was heavy, and a deep oppression hung upon me during the night; frequently did I awake with a difficulty of breathing, and frightful dreams hurried my fancy into the most painful excess. The break of day was to me an hour of relief, and I then looked to the approaching time when I should again behold the suffering Mary. There was a heaviness in the atmosphere, and I endured a considerable depression of spirits during my walk; the mist still hung upon the valley, and the blades of grass shone luxuriantly as they lay tipped with dew beneath the rays of a rising sun.

I found the door open, and heard a noise unusual in the dwelling of the sick; but little did I anticipate the fatal news. The curtain of life was drawn for ever—the short scene of her pilgrimage was terminated! Painful were my feelings as I gazed upon the remains of all that was once lovely and happy: happier far was she then, but her features were insensible to joy, and those eyes which were once wont to flash so brightly were closed for ever! The old and faithful domestic gave me a paper in Mary's hand-writing: she had penned it immediately after my departure the preceding evening, and scarcely was the task completed when she fell into a deep sleep; it was her last—long and untroubled! The paper contained the following lines:—

Another pilgrim is gone home
To his lone dwelling-house, the tomb;
Another soul has wing'd its way
From the small tenement of clay;
For, hark! the sound o'er yonder dell,—
It is the awful passing bell!

A few short hours, and I shall be
Wrapt in a like Eternity;
A few short hours and I must fall
Beneath the common lot of all;
And you mayhap shall hear my knell
Toll'd by yon awful passing bell!

Then let me 'neath yon tree be laid,
My grave be covered by its shade,
But let no tomb or stone proclaim
The resting wanderer's style or name;
The last, the parting sad farewell,
Mayhap you'll sigh with yonder bell!

She now rests beneath the weeping willow in the corner of our church-yard;—the yew shall grow over her grave, and the white rose shall blow upon her ashes, but she excels it in purity, In heaven is her resting place!

IGNOTO.

THE FLORENTINE MOTHER.—A TALE.

Theresa Balducca, a lady of a noble Florentine family, had not been long a widow, before she beheld her two sons, the inheritors of an ample patrimony, independent of her. To a mother, endued with every virtue, and awake to the nicest touches of maternal sensibility, the independence of her sons, exposed by their very opulence to all the variety of temptation, must have been extremely alarming; even if their dispositions had appeared, at their outset, to be the most happy and promising. But what must have been her anxiety, what her terrors, when all Florence soon distinguished them as foremost among the profligate and abandoned. In vain did she repeat the most earnest expostulations; in vain have recourse to entreaties, or give vent to her agony in tears. Her voice was no longer heard; nor did the affecting effusions of maternal grief make the slightest impression. Her eldest son continued at Florence, while the younger left that city, in order to make the tour of Italy.

One evening, this disconsolate mother being alone, now lost in thought, and now weeping at the recollection of the licentiousness of her sons, she was surprised on a sudden, with the appearance of a stranger, with a bloody sword, with looks of horror and distraction in his countenance. Terrified at this unexpected and frightful object, she uttered a loud scream and rushed out of the room. The stranger hastily followed her and threw himself at her feet; “Oh! madam” said he “pity an unfortunate man.” “Who are you,” exclaimed the affrighted Theresa. “I am the most wretched of human beings. But deign to listen to my unhappy story. I am a Roman. I have been in this city two days, and having finished the business which brought me hither, I was going to my inn, in order to prepare for my departure, when a person passing by me, kicked me with great brutality. On remonstrating with him against this incivility, he added insult to outrage. On resenting this treatment he grew more abusive than before, and threatened me with such insolence that I could no longer contain myself. I drew my sword: he drew his, and in an instant fell, pierced by my first thrust. Heaven can witness my grief at this involuntary murder. Distracted, scarce sensible of what I did, not knowing whither to fly, I have ventured to seek an asylum in your house; the door of which I found accidentally open. Oh! madam, pity an unfortunate man. Permit me to take refuge here till the pursuit is over, and the darkness of the night may allow me to retire with safety. At this recital the Lady trembled with horror. An unaccountable presentiment filled her mind with a thousand cruel apprehensions. Nevertheless, attentive only to the impulse of compassion, she conducted the stranger to a closet, in which she carefully concealed him. The forebodings of this unfortunate mother were, alas! but too well founded. In a little time, she was again struck by a sudden bustle and noise. Pale and trembling, she hastened to the hall, and there beheld (what a sight for a mother!) her eldest son brought before her, pierced by a deep wound in his breast, and weltering in his blood. She uttered a wild and dreadful shriek. Her son, almost lifeless, perceiving himself just expiring, made a last effort and turning to his mother, “Alas! said he, “you behold in me an example of the justice of heaven. I have deserved my fate. Let my death serve at least as a warning to my brother. If the person who killed me is apprehended, I entreat you to undertake his defence. O my mother! he is innocent, I alone am the aggressor. O my mother! I am dying, can you forgive me?” “Heaven knows I forgive thee my child,” sobbed his unhappy parent. A ray of joy for a moment beamed upon the countenance of the wretched youth, but was immediately succeeded by the pallid hue of despair. Large drops of sweat rolled down his cheeks; he tried to speak but could not; his lips quivered, a deep groan burst from him, and he breathed his last. The unhappy mother sunk senseless on the body. Her attendants at last forced her from the bloody corpse; uncertain, however, for a long time, whether she were yet living. It was with the greatest difficulty she was recovered. When she was brought to herself, her grief must have been fatal, had not nature found relief in a flood of tears. She kept calling every moment for her son; she repeatedly insisted upon seeing him again; and it was not without violence that she was removed from the mournful scene.

What in the mean time must have been the grief and consternation of the young stranger, who, from the place of his concealment, heard the whole tragical;

scene of which he had been the cause! In the distracting idea that he was the author of the calamity of this respectable mother, he regretted that he had not fallen by the sword of his adversary. On the other hand, the fear of being discovered chilled his blood at the least motion, or at the slightest noise.

He remained in this perplexity till about midnight. All being silent and still, and the first emotions of maternal grief having given place to reflection, Theresa went to the closet: she opened it: the young man prostrated himself at her feet: "I call heaven to witness," said he, "that I would give"—"Rise!" said Theresa; "you have made me the most wretched of mothers; but I know your innocence. My son has charged me to protect you, and it is my duty to do it. A carriage will be here presently, and one of my servants shall conduct you to the frontiers. This purse will supply your wants. May Heaven grant you that peace of which you have deprived me." The young Roman, inexpressibly affected by this exalted instance of generosity, felt a deeper impression of grief: "Alas," said he, "I can never forgive myself for having involved in misery such a mother, such an excellent woman." He poured forth a thousand wishes for her welfare; he kissed again and again her beneficent hand: and he left her all in tears, resolved to seize every opportunity which fortune might offer to prove his regret and gratitude.

Nor did he long wait for this opportunity. When he had passed Viterbo, he beheld a young man attacked by two robbers, against whom he defended himself with difficulty. He leaped from the carriage, and flew to his assistance. The robbers fled, but the young man was wounded. He took him into his carriage, and returned with him to Viterbo. Fortunately, the wound was not dangerous; it was soon healed; and a thousand times he thanked his deliverer. But who can describe the joy which the young Roman felt, when he found he had saved the brother of the man whom he had killed at Florence! He embraced him affectionately. "What thanks," said he, "do I owe to Heaven, which has thus graciously afforded me the means of acknowledging in some degree, the goodness of your adorable mother! It will be impressed for ever on my heart. Hasten to see her once more; your presence is necessary: she impatiently expects you. Tell her that the man whose life she preserved, has had the happiness of exposing it for you; and that it is still his ardent wish to employ the remainder of it in the service of both."

Arrived at Florence, it was a painful surprise to young Balducci to hear from his mother an account of all that had happened. He could not recollect, in the same person, the destroyer of his brother, and his own deliverer, without feeling the most contradictory emotions. But the proofs which he had of his innocence lessened the horror with which he at first regarded him; and the gratitude he had felt for his own preservation resumed all its force. While he lamented the death of his brother, he was not less assiduous to procure the acquittal of the young Roman.

In the mean time, the death of his brother, and his own imminent danger, made a deep impression on young Balducci. He perceived all the perils to which youth is exposed from a rash and inconsiderate conduct. He entirely changed the course of his life; and by a virtuous and exemplary conduct, from that moment he consoled his excellent mother, at last, for the great loss she had sustained.

GO DIG YE A TOMB!

Go dig ye a tomb! For the joys of the earth are More frail than the vanity fore-doomed of yore;
Youth has nought but wild passion, and middle-age care,
And the ripeness of years is a fate to deplore:—
Hot, hot and vanishing all our first pleasures,
Which yield to the struggle of life and its gloom,
And then, to complete what the earth counts its treasures,
Come the pains of decline—oh! Go dig ye a tomb!

Go dig ye a tomb! Though the magic of loving Gives to earth its sole gleam of a transient bliss, Though a moment may pass, perfect happiness proving—
'Tis the moment the kiss lasts—it dies with the kiss.
What though heaven swells in the bosom you cherish;
Though no Persian rose like that sigh's fond perfume;
That bosom so beauteous is formed but to perish,
And that sigh to a groan changes—Dig ye a tomb!

Go dig ye a tomb! But be honoured in story,
Let the trumpet and laurel illustrate your fame;
On the blood streams of battle establish your glory,
And bid dying gasps your high triumphs proclaim,—
With the hurrahs of victory mingling proudly—
Oh how the soul beats in its poor mortal room!
But the hour is at hand: let it rise e'er so loudly,
The applause is unheard; and ye sleep in the tomb!

Go dig ye a tomb! Yet for wealth are ye pining!
Have ye bound the dull power in your chains as a slave,
Till luxury pants to invent what is wanting—
Death strikes,—can ye carry your gold to the grave?
No! youth, age, love, glory and wealth, are the dreaming
Of idiot schemes that our short span consume;
Existence is only a flash hardly gleaming
On thy dark edge, eternity! Dig ye a tomb!

SONNETS.

I.

Ah let me if I can forget
The light that leads my soul astray. MOORE.
Tis vain! Love seeks and finds me every where!—
In vain I've pierced the shade of this deep wood,
Sacred to everlasting solitude,
Where sun beams come like strangers, and the deer
Find safest refuge from the hunter's spear!
In vain I strive to gain the lofty mood,
Musing on what is glorious great or good!
One trembling influence hovers even here,
That takes my heart a captive!—gleaming eyes,
Looking thro' parted locks of raven hair,
Flash on me from the shade, and these old trees
Bat half conceal white arms and bosom fair,
Twining and heaving to long amorous sighs.—
And trembling tones float to me on the breeze!

II.

Here let us sit! what lovely openings break
To beauteous prospects round us! what a sky
Spreads its wide arch in glorious majesty,
Above our heads! And see yon moveless lake,
Scarce murmuring through its slumber, seems to take,
(Like some deep dream descending from on high),
That heaven into its bosom, and to lye
In a still smile, as fearful it may wake!
Perhaps on this same spot at such an hour,
Hath Wordsworth sat, and gazed upon this scene,
Wrapt in his heart's most bright imaginings:—
For Oh! upon that spirit of high power,
How kindling must its influence have been,
Which draws such beautiful thought from "random things."

SINGULAR BIOGRAPHY.

SHORT ACCOUNT OF JEDEDIAH BUXTON.

This prodigy was born at Elmton, near Chesterfield, in Derbyshire, in the year 1704. His grandfather was vicar of Elmton, and his father was school-master in the same village. Notwithstanding this, Jedediah's education was so much neglected, that he was never taught to write; and, in respect to any other knowledge but that of numbers, he seemed almost as ignorant as a boy of ten years of age. How he became acquainted with the relative proportions of numbers, and their progressive powers, he did not remember; but to these he applied the whole force of his mind, and upon these his attention was so intensely fixed, that he seldom took any notice of external objects, except with regard to their numbers. If any space of time was mentioned, he would soon after say it was so many minutes, without any question being asked, or any calculation expected by the company. A variety of questions, too numerous to be inserted here, he solved in a very short time, by the mere force of memory; for when he once understood a question, he began to work, with amazing facility, after his own method, without the use of pen, pencil, or chalk, and without understanding the rules of arithmetic, as taught in the schools. He would stride over a piece of land, and tell the contents of it, almost as exactly as if it had been measured by the chain. In this manner he measured the whole lordship of Elmton, of some thousands of acres, belonging to Sir John Rhodes, and brought him the contents, not only in acres, roods and perches, but even in square inches. His power of abstraction was so great, that no noise whatever could disturb him; and when asked a question, he would immediately reply, and return to his calculation, without any confusion. A person who had heard of his astonishing performances, proposed to him the following question. In a body whose three sides are 23,145, 789 yards, 5,642,782 yards, and 54,965 yards, how many cubical inches are there? After once repeating the several figures distinctly, this self-taught calculator fell to work, amidst his fellow labourers; and the proposer, after leaving him a few hours, returned, and found Jedediah ready with his answer, which was exactly right. His memory was so great, that, while solving a question, he could leave off, and resume the operation, at the end of a week, a month, or several months, and then finish the business. His mind would perhaps have been equally retentive of other objects, if he had attended to them with equal diligence; but his intense application to figures prevented the acquisition of any other knowledge. He was sometimes asked, on his return from church, whether he remembered the text, or any part of the sermon; but it never appeared that he brought away a single sentence, his mind having been busied, even during divine service, in his favourite operation, dividing either some time, or some space, into the smallest known parts, or resolving some question that had been given to him, as a test of his abilities.

The life of this extraordinary man was obscure, and nearly uniform. Time, with respect to him, changed nothing but his age; nor did the seasons vary his employment, except that in winter he used a flail, and in summer a ling-hook. In the year 1754 he went to London, where he was introduced to the Royal Society, who asked him several questions in arithmetic; and he gave them such satisfaction, that they dismissed him with a handsome gratuity. In this walk to the metropolis, the only object of his curiosity, was his desire to see the King and royal family; but they having just removed to Kensington, he was disappointed. During his residence in London he was taken to Drury Lane theatre, to see Richard III. when it was expected that the novelty and splendour of the show would have fixed him in astonishment, or that his passions would in some degree, have been touched by the power of action, if he had not perfectly understood the dialogue. But Jedediah's mind was employed in the theatre, just as it was in every other place; during the dance he was counting the steps; and he declared, after a fine piece of music, that the innumerable sounds produced by the instruments, had perplexed him beyond measure: and he attended even to Mr. Garrick, only to count the words that he uttered, in which he said he perfectly succeeded. Jedediah returned to the place of his birth, where, if his enjoyments were few, his wishes did not seem more. He applied to the labours by which he subsisted, with cheerfulness, and regretted nothing that he had left in London; for, to him, a slice of good bacon afforded the most delicious repast.

He lived to about 70 years of age, but the exact time of his death is unknown. He was married, and had several children.

SUMMER.

Through the scenery echo sounds,
Bats and beetles fly their rounds,—
Summer! praise to thee redounds.
In season.
Hay and corn are ripening fast,
Skies are fine and cold is past,
Farmers' hearts are light and last
With plenty.
Days are long and nights are short,
Thousands meet and kiss and sport,—
O how dear is love's resort,
So happy!
He who rules earth, sky, and air,
Deigns to hear the fervent prayer,
And rewards hope's constant care
In summer.

THOMAS CORIATE.

It was not until the year 1608 that the use of a fork at table was introduced into England. That singular character, Thomas Coriate, of Oldcombe, thus speaks upon the subject. "I observed a custom is all the Italian cities and towns through which I passed, that is not used in any other country that I saw in my travels; neither do I think that any other nation in Christendom doth use it, but only Italy. The Italians, and also most strangers that are commorant in Italy, do always, at their meals, use a little fork, when they eat their meat. For while with their knife, which they hold in one hand, they cut their meat out of the dish, they fasten their fork, which they held in their other hand, upon the same dish. So that whatsoever be that, sitting in the company of others at meal, should unadvisedly touch the dish of meat with his fingers, from which all at table does eat, he will give occasion of offence to the company, as having transgressed the laws of good manners, inasmuch that for his error he shall be at least brow-beaten, if not reprehended in words. This form of feeding is generally used in all places in Italy. Their forks, for the most part, being made of iron or steel, and some of silver, but the latter are only used by gentlemen. The reason of this, their curiosity, is because the Italian cannot by any means endure to have his dish touched with fingers—seeing all men's fingers are not alike clean. Hereupon I myself thought good to imitate the Italian fashion, by this forked cutting of meat, not only whilst I was in Italy, but in Germany, and oftentimes in England, since I came home. It were to be wished that this 'curiosity,' or rather delicacy, had spread more rapidly, and been universally adopted: for it is not yet common for those who mix in various companies, at what are called elegant repasts, to be shocked and disgusted by the use of fingers, instead of forks—particularly by fish eaters. The pun of Joseph Miller might be well applied to such persons—"You have been a great traveller, I see, all over grease." Dr. Johnson says of Coriarte, "He was an humourist about the court of James the First. He had a mixture of learning, wit, and buffoonery: he travelled through Europe, and published his travels; he afterwards travelled on foot through Asia, and had made many remarks, but he died at Wandoa and his remarks were lost." The length of his journey on foot was one thousand nine hundred and seventy-five miles, more than half of which he performed with one pair of shoes!!! These memorable shoes were only once mended; and on his return to Oldcombe, were hung up in the church there. He was of a respectable family, and lived in the house of, and received a pension from, Henry Prince of Wales. The quaint, but sensible Fuller, says of him, "Sweetmeats and Coriarte made up the last course of all entertainments. Indeed he was the courtiers' anvil to try their wits upon. And sometimes this anvil returned the hammers as hard knocks as he received, his bluntness repaying their abuse. Such as conceived him a fool ad alio, and something else, ad decem, were utterly mistaken: for he drove on no design, caring for coin and counters alike. So contented with what was present, that he accounted those men guilty of superfluity who had more shirts than bodies."

ROYAL CLEMENCY OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

Margaret Lambrun, a native of Scotland, had, together with her husband, a foreigner, been several years in the service of Mary, Queen of Scots. On the tragical end of that unfortunate princess, the husband, penetrated with a sense of her many favours, did not long survive the loss of such a bountiful mistress; and Margaret as an affectionate wife and servant, determined to revenge the untimely death of two persons so dear to her. Disguising herself in men's clothes, by the name of Anthony Sparkes, she repaired to Queen Elizabeth's court, with two pistols about her, one to dispatch the royal victim, and the other designed for herself, as an escape from the hands of justice. Making her way through the crowd to get within reach of the queen, one of the pistols happened to drop; on which the guards seized her, and were for dragging her away to prison; but the queen, taking her for a man, would question her, and asked her name, country, and condition; to which the assassin composedly answered, "Madam, though in this dress, I am a woman, my name Margaret Lambrun; I was several years in the service of Mary, Queen of Scotland, my honoured mistress, who was so unjustly executed; and by her death you farther caused that of my dear husband, who pined away with grief and abhorrence at so worthy a lady being executed like a malefactor: and I, bearing inexpressible veneration for both, resolved, at the risk of my own life, to avenge their death by yours. I have, indeed, gone through unpeppable conflicts, and endeavoured, as much as possible, to divert myself from a purpose, which, though inevitably fatal to myself, could be of no benefit to my mistress or husband; but my rancor was insurmountable, and I am an instance that no reason nor danger can stop a woman's revenge, when stimulated by love." Irritating and malignant as such a speech was, the queen, without any emotion, made the following answer:—"So you thought killing me a point of honour, and my death a retaliation, which regard to your mistress and husband called for from your hands; but how think you it now behoves me to deal with you?" Margaret replied, "I will freely declare my mind, if your Majesty will first let me know whether you put that question as a queen or as a judge?" "As a queen." "Then your majesty should pardon me." "What security can you give me that you will not abuse my goodness by a second attempt?" "Madam, a favour granted with such precaution, ceases to be a favour, so your majesty may proceed against me as a judge." Here the queen, turning towards some of her council who were present, said, "Thirty years have I been a queen, but do not remember ever to have met with a person who gave me such a lesson; and, in return, she has my full and free pardon, without any precaution." The lords of the council strongly urged the punishment of such premeditated guilt; but the queen stood to her word. The pardoned delinquent then desired that she might be conveyed out of the kingdom, and landed in some foreign country. This request was looked upon as a stroke of singular prudence, which farther recommended her to royal clemency.

RUSSIAN CUSTOMS.—At dinner in Russia, soup is universally the first dish, and without it they never dine; but it is often made sour, and in that case not much relished at first by an English palate. Fish, if to be had, comes next, and then from six to eight or ten dishes follow. It is impossible to tell of what many of these are composed. A joint of meat is never sent to table whole, but cut into slices, and handed round to each person, beginning with the ladies who are visitors. Poultry and game are also served in the same way; pastry is scarcely seen except in patties, which are sent up to eat with the soup, or a tartlet at the conclusion of the dinner.

Previous to the dinner, olives, caviarre, or some sort of pickled fish, with common and bitter brandy, are sent in on a tray, to whet the appetite for that which is to follow. The Russians sit long at dinner, and wine of different sorts is placed on the table, each person helping himself: the dessert, which finishes the dinner, is eaten without the cloth being removed; and the whole party then adjourn to the drawing-room, where coffee is immediately served.

The Russian salutation is very contrary to our etiquette. The ladies in meeting, kiss each other on the lips and cheeks; and a lady and gentleman meeting, the latter kisses the hand of the lady, and inclines his cheek towards her, which she kisses: and omitting to do this, is a proof of great distance of manner, arising from either superiority of rank, slight acquaintance, or offence.

The following article appears in a recent number of the Pandora, a literary work in ridicule of the Anglo-mania, which is so prevalent in Paris.—

THE FASHIONABLE.

The name of Benoit-Dennis, which was given to him by his godfather, has been changed for that of William Gregory. He calls his valet de chambre, groom, and the driver of his tilbury a jockey.

He enters a café, and calls the gargon, boy; but he no longer visits the French Restaurateur's, since the quarter of the Rue Vivienne possesses its little Garra-way's.* There you will see the fashionable getting drunk with porter, Jamaica rum, and Cape wine.

He does not know a word of the English language; but, wishing to pass for learned, he attempts to pronounce words sentences, and is daily subject to some qui pro quo—thus, when he wanted soup, he asked for soap, and the latter article is brought to him. When he leaves the table, he pays in shillings, guineas, and pence, which he has purchased in the Palais Royal. He drinks tea, though it makes him ill, because it is an English fashion; and overloads his stomach with plumb-pudding, thinking his digestion as strong as that of an Englishman. He has English horses, and talks of races: though he never saw any, except in the Champ de Mars, where he backs Drake's mares against the field. Palmer and Legros supply him with articles of the toilet; and he has an English riding coat with steel buttons.

* An English coffee-house, kept by a person named Ashby.

At the Louvre, he notices the pictures only to remark that they are not equal to those of West and Reynolds; and he has the works of Byron, Scott, Moore, and Shakespeare, in English, without knowing how to read them, and yet he tells you they are worth reading only in the original.

There has been recently published in Paris, a Russian Anthology, in imitation of that of Mr. Bowring. The author is M. Dupré de Saint Maure; and whatever his other qualifications may be, no one can doubt his fitness for the office of rendering Russian poetry into the French language, since he professes to be wholly ignorant of the Russian language. It is a great thing, however, to know half of one's business.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

A VARNISH FOR WOOD THAT WILL RESIST THE ACTION OF BOILING WATER.—Take a pound and a half of linseed oil, and boil it in a copper vessel, not tinned, suspending in the oil a small linen bag, containing five ounces of litharge and three ounces of minium, both pulverized, taking care that the bag does not touch the bottom of the vessel. Continue the ebullition till the oil acquires a deep brown colour; then take out the bag, and substitute another bag containing a clove of garlic. Continue the ebullition, and renew the garlic seven or eight times, or else put the whole in at once. Then throw into the vessel a pound of yellow amber, after having melted it in the following manner. To a pound of well-pulverized amber add two ounces of linseed oil, and place the whole on a strong fire. When the fusion is complete, pour it boiling hot into the prepared linseed oil, and let it continue to boil two or three minutes, stirring it well. Let it rest, decant the composition, and preserve it, when cold, in well-stopped bottles. After having polished the wood on which this varnish is to be applied, the wood is to have the desired colour given to it; for example, for walnut tree, a slight coat of a mixture of soot with oil of turpentine. When this colour is perfectly dry, lay on a coat of varnish with a fine sponge, in order to distribute it equally. Repeat these coats four times, always taking care to let one coat dry before the next is applied.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GRASS PLAIT FOR BONNETS.

A friend of ours has favoured us with a letter from which we make the following extract:—

"Londonderry, 16th August, 1823.

"The papers you gave me (Manchester Iris, No. 75) have been of use, several young women being now engaged in this neighbourhood in the Manufacture of plait for bonnets; our Agricultural Society has offered premiums for the Manufacture of Grass in place of Straw, and it promises to be very beautiful."

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I have this day seen a copy of the Death Warrant of King Charles, from Mr. James' lithographic press, and should be glad if any of your readers could explain why the erasures which appear upon the face of it were made.—I have compared Mr. James copy with the engravings in both Rapin's and Smollett's history, and a manuscript copy, and find it very correctly written: but should respectfully suggest to Mr. J. to be more particular for the future in heading his works, as from the specimen of the Roman printing, any one who is a judge would naturally suppose, that if the title be badly executed, what follows must be the same, of course, which in this instance is not the case.

"And justly the Wise-man thus preach'd to us all,—
"Despise not the value of things that are small."

RIDDLE.

BY A LADY.

I'm often heard, but seldom seen,
For so repulsive is my mien,
I seldom choose to shew my face,
At any time, in any place;
But still in close seclusion dwell,
Like some lone hermit in his cell.
Yet not like him condemned to fast,
Since many a delicate repast
Under my roof each day appears,
Provided by my caterers.

My taste and judgment are so nice,
You mostly follow my advice;
And whenever you snip or dine,
Ask my opinion of the wine,
And whatsoever I refuse,
'Tis ten to one you do not choose.
But these are vulgar qualities—
I've talents far surpassing these:
Sometimes I counsel and advise,
And then appear exceedingly wise,
And men of learning and of sense
Will listen to my eloquence.
I am of use throughout the nation,
In every trade and occupation;
Sometimes I'm sharp, sometimes I'm blunt,
Witness the patriot, Mister Hunt,
With him I quaff the flowing bowl,
And neither feel nor fear controul;
Though some, who do not pass for fools,
Would tie me down to forms and rules;
But all such vile restraint I hate,—
I love the freedom of debate;
And, ladies, I appeal to you,
Who know that what I say is true,
And will, I'm sure, with hand and heart,
Stand by me still, and take my part.
Then let the lords of the creation
Settle the business of the nation,
I know you never will agree,
They should abridge my liberty;
But spite of all their rules and laws,
Will still maintain my righteous cause.
Nor need you any counsel ask,
You're all-sufficient for the task;
And should it come to litigation,
You'll carry it by acclamation.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

NEW METHOD OF MAKING JELLY.—Press the juice from the fruit: add the proper proportion of sugar, and stir the juice and sugar until the sugar is completely melted; put it into jars, and, in twenty-four hours, it will become of a proper consistence. By this means, the trouble of boiling is avoided, and the jelly retains more completely the flavour of the fruit. Care should be taken to stir the mixture until the sugar is completely melted, and fine sugar should be used.

RAW COTTON A REMEDY FOR BURNS AND SCALDS.—The Baltimore Medical and Philosophical Lincum contains an account of an accidental discovery of this virtue in cotton by the wife of Captain R—, who in a fright, caught up a large bundle of cotton, and applied it over the whole of the scalded parts of a beloved child, upon whom a large kettle of boiling water had fallen while she was standing before a kitchen fire. Soon after this, the tortured and screaming infant became perfectly quiet, and fell into a gentle and easy slumber. The cotton was suffered to remain on several hours, and when it was removed, there was not the least appearance of inflammation remaining. Several other persons, who at first had no faith in this remedy, have also tried it in similar cases; it is likewise supposed to have some efficacy in removing rheumatic pains.

VARIETIES.

THE MULLET.—When the mullet is dying, it changes its colours in a very singular manner till it is entirely lifeless. This spectacle was so gratifying to the Romans, that they used to show the fish dying in a glass vessel to their guests before dinner.

JEW'S WEDDING SHIRTS.—A curious custom is related of the New Russian Jews, by a Polish gentleman. The Jews, when first married, wear a shirt of finer texture than ordinary, which, after the wedding-day, is carefully put by unworn till the time of their deaths, when they are uniformly buried in it. So valuable is this shirt in their estimation, and so indispensable a part of their possessions, that in money transactions, when they require to borrow, and have no pledge in gold or pearls to give, they frequently deposit this shirt, which is always a satisfactory security to the lender, as the Jew could not die happy without redeeming it.

NEW INVENTION.—Thomas Hesmonhalgh, of Fonnay, near Ribchester, has constructed a saw which is calculated to work by water or by machinery. The liberality of the inventor is equal to his ingenuity. We understand he exhibits it freely to the curious, and harbours no intention of deriving from it any exclusive benefit. An instrument of this nature is made use of in America, and also in Italy, in the vicinity of marble quarries.

DENTIFRICE.—It is a fact, not generally known, that the common strawberry is a natural dentifrice; and that its juice, without any preparation whatever, dissolves the tartarous incrustations on the teeth, and makes the breath sweet and agreeably.

MATRIMONY.—Mr. Thomas Moore compares a man going to be married to one that puts his hand into a sack, in the hope of drawing out a single eel from among a hundred vipers. "It is a hundred to one," adds he, "but he will pick out a viper." Lord Bacon maintains a direct contrary opinion, and asserts, "that in this marriage sack the eel would be in a ratio of a hundred to one of the vipers."

COMPLIMENT.—A more elegant compliment was perhaps never paid, even in the peculiar land of politeness, than that involved in the reply of the celebrated Mercier to the modest author of a very affecting Tragedy, who begged he would tell him what faults he observed in the work. "How could I see any faults? My spectacles were always too wet to allow me to discern them."

SINGULAR WAGER.—A young woman had laid a wager that she would descend into a vault, in the middle of the night, and bring from thence a skull. The person who took the wager had previously hid himself in the vault, and, as the girl seized a skull, cried in a hollow voice, "Leave my head!" "There it is," said the girl, throwing it down, and catching up another. "Leave my head!" said the same voice. "Nay, nay," said the heroic lass, "you cannot have two heads," so brought away the skull, and won the wager.

HAND-BILLS.—The classical ancients had white walls on purpose for inscriptions in red chalk, like our hand-bills, of which the gates of Pompeii show instances. Plutarch mentions expedients similar to our hand-bills used by tradesmen for custom. Houses were let by a writing over the door; the inscriptio illico odes of Terence. Auctioneering bills ran thus: "Villa bona beneque edificata—to be sold, a good and well-built house; and—Julius Proculus will have an auction of his superfluous goods to pay his debts." But then, as afterwards, the crier was chiefly advertiser; and we hear of mayors keeping criers and a common horn or trumpet used. Ben Jonson somewhere says, he will not have the titles of his works affixed to the walls or stuck upon a cleft stick.

A HERMIT.—About 13 miles above the junction of Spoon and Illinois rivers, immediately on the banks of the former, there has been living, for three years past, a man who had entirely secluded himself from the world, and dwells in the midst of the wilderness alone, and upwards of 60 miles from the residence of any human being. His name is Davidson, is a physician, was formerly a surgeon in the United States' army, and was pupil to the celebrated Dr. Rush. He has a number of medical books, two guns, and a dog, and a quantity of clothing. He has erected himself a small hut and has about an acre of ground in cultivation—at the back of his garden runs Spoon River, in which he has a fish trap. His food is wild turkeys and other game, fish, and the produce of his garden. He appears displeased at the sight of a human being. My informant saw him at his residence, being impelled by curiosity to visit him, and enquired of him particularly of his strange seclusion. He said he had done so, and would do so ever, to keep clear of the wretched white people. His father lives in Pennsylvania, and he has received many solicitous letters from him and other friends, to return, but he has never answered one, and declares it to be his determination to remove from his present situation as soon as the whites approach too near him. As soon as his present stock of clothing wears out, he says he will dress himself in skins.—American paper.

THE DRAMA, ETC.

THEATRE-ROYAL.—In the representation of the School for Scandal on Saturday evening, Mr. W. Farren as Sir Peter, and Mrs. Faucit as Lady Teaze, gave proofs of their talents in the higher walks of the Drama.—The whole performance was received with the most flattering applause.—A new farce, entitled—"The Duel," followed, in which Mr. Farren very effectively supported the principal character. However, the piece went off rather indifferently, and is not likely to become very popular.

MINOR THEATRE.—Mr. Wilson's performances on the Tight-Rope have proved very attractive during the week; the agility and daring exemplified in his different evolutions, are equally extraordinary and interesting.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Horatio will find the division of the Iris to which he alludes open to such articles as agree with the introductory Paper.—He had better retain his present signature.

C. T.'s Translation is inserted.—Further favours will be esteemed.

Risph, the daughter of Alah, is in our possession.

Geoffrey's new version of the hint from the Bristol Mercury, is not very complimentary to the ladies.—We think the point in the third article not felicitously developed.

Microm's communication in the "Friend, No. IV." shall appear in our next; nevertheless, being led to consider it as containing more fact than fiction, we cannot but remark that the Guardian is much too severely animadverted upon.—This hint we consider sufficient at present.

Paul Fry; Beta; I. L.; and Harmonious;—are received.

MUSIC.—In consequence of the demand for the QUADRILLE, which appeared in last Saturday's Iris, entitled "THE ROSE-BUD OF CHEETHAM," a second impression has been struck off, and it may not be bad with any number preceding that in which it appeared.

POETS!

IN a commercial town, like this, how frequently do we find the exalted character of a Poet derided and scorned. He is generally looked upon as an idle drone in the hive; one, who would willingly live upon the fruits of others; one who is to be treated to dinner in remuneration for his company and his wit. Poverty is attached to him, as his shadow,—the rich merchant cannot picture him in any other garb; in his eyes poetry and poverty go hand in hand. If he observes his favourite son indulging his giddy muse in telling the world that he rebukes him severely, bids him attend to warp and weft, instead of prose and verse, to look over the pages of the ledger instead of Byron and Scott; and like Mrs. Malaprop, is convinced "this all comes of his reading and writing." I do not here wish to advocate the cause of every young sprig who thinks proper to neglect the business he is intended for, and launch forth his divine strains in the Iris, or our chronicles of news,—it is of the true Poet, the Poet of nature, I would speak—the soul of genius and of song! I remember once passing along the busy streets of London in company with a friend whose long residence in the city caused him to be acquainted with several of these little stars. We had rambled much, it was still very sultry although afternoon, and being fatigued, we turned from the bustle and overwhelming noise of Fleet-street into a snug office-house to quietly enjoy a cup of real focha. How soon were we in the midst of serenity. There was not a single gaze as we entered, all intent upon their respective feasts, devouring the news, or still more eagerly devouring hot rolls and butter. We sat down in retired box, and both commenced with equal alidity. I had scarce swallowed my second cup, when a neatly dressed old gentleman brushed quickly past, without observing or casting a single glance upon any one present; with a newspaper in one hand, and occasionally a cup of coffee in the other, he sat him down, and seemed wrapped in himself alone. My friend then remarked him: "that" said he, "is C—— the Poet, I am acquainted with him, and you all have an introduction." I soon found him aided by me, in as free and affable conversation though we had known each other from childhood. He was respectably habited in black, an and neat, and his manners those of a perfect gentleman. He ordered another cup of tea, and then dashed into the ocean of literature. How his eyes sparkled; with what enthusiasm, with what warmth he expressed his thoughts, which were as an eternal fountain, for ever springing, new and brilliant. He praised, he demurred;—pointed out the beauties of several publications; particularly his last new Poem, ready in the press, and which he hoped soon to usher into the world a perfect rara avis. On Moore, Rogers, and the rest, upon whom I had been accustomed to look as upon beings of a superior order, were, in his eyes, but as other men.—I felt delighted in his presence—I could have asked him a thousand questions, and yet durst not break in upon his continual flow of entertainment and information, for fear of losing a single idea. In the evening we retired to my friend's house; he was a widower, but still blest with the recollection of his endeared partner by the presence of two lovely daughters. The harp and piano-forte were in turns accompanied by two of the sweetest voices, and the purest taste. My little poet was now if possible still more at home. "Music hath charms to wake the soul!" he cried, "play o'er, play o'er, that rapturous strain again;" the soft tones of the harp wound him to the highest pitch of romantic imagination—he sung, he listened, sung again, sighed, applauded:—wit and eloquence burst from his lips:—there is no idleness here, thought I; a soul like this can never sleep. The imagination still lives and dreams of hours and scenes unknown to the dull plodding worm, that grovels in the dust for a few grains of gold, then sinks into the grave—the ocean of time rolls over him, and how soon he is forgot! But the Poet still lives in the melody of his impassioned soul, and rears a memorial that time makes still more dear; he rises from decay, as the Phoenix from ashes! What a pride, what a light of glory to our present generation, when we contrast the lives of our ancient to our modern writers. They are now men, esteemed and respected, and in some instances—of wealth. They now bear their heads like men. A cause may easily be assigned for the poverty of those who have sunk into the tomb; they were poor because neglected; they were generally men of a liberal education—it was the only fortune they possessed, and launching upon the world with this gift, they deemed themselves proof against the frowns and buffets they should have to contend with; not however being able to cringe and bend or fill the rich man with obsequious flattery, they became neglected, and soon overwhelmed with poverty. Their minds were of too exalted a nature, and gave the world a too romantic colouring. They looked upon it as we look upon an extensive landscape where all is fair and beautiful. We see not the many dangers with which it abounds.

A tender kiss
Is Heaven's own bliss!

What is there that so much amends the heart, as true genuine Poetry?—to muse over the inspired ideas of a man who sets up the image of virtue as the subject of his adoration! who adorns her with the ever blooming flowers of his imagination; who tears the subtle mask from hypocrisy—blunts the dart of slander,—rears a temple to honour,—and breathes the soft voice of love. I do not know a happier man than my friend Wilmot. He has retired from the town to the delightful scenes of Cumberland; there, at the base of the towering Skiddaw he has fixed his residence, a neat and humble white cottage—before him is the glassy silver-boomed Lake or Water of Derwent, at the extremity of which a large fall dashes down its foamy waters, whilst mountains upon mountains rise gradually above each other far as the eye can trace, until lost amidst the ever-varying, ever-rolling clouds. He has a good taste for poetry, and writes well. He rambles into the dark wood, or fertile vale,—he mounts the highest hill, and casts his eager gaze over the extended prospect before him, whilst his thoughts wander also, to the many joys, hopes, cares or fears that may be hovering over the bounding hearts within that varied scene. There is not a star shoots, a leaf that falls, a sky that changes, but gives his mind some pleasing and melancholy imagining. His heart is open, free, and generous, the companion of inspiration. His home is more welcome than the palaces of kings; his wife, his children, his cottage, and his dog, are to him so many sources of enjoyment. I have spent many happy hours in his company, and never left the cottage in Cumberland without envying the feelings of—a Poet. PAUL PRY.

THE FRIEND.—(No. IV.)

THE following letter, which, I think, is calculated to be of some utility, I received, a day or two ago, from a channel which it is needless to explain, as the observations and reflections it contains, would neither acquire any additional importance nor lose any of their present interest by such an explanation. I shall, therefore, without any further remarks, give it to my readers, as it came to my hands.

To the Friend.

Sir,—As you have solicited contributions from the readers of the Iris, I shall not waste time by apologizing for the liberty I take, in addressing this letter to you. Indeed, though I am convinced that friends are too often insincere—that 'tis only when the sun of prosperity shines upon you, that you can rely on the attention of others, to you, Sir, I think I may pour forth my sorrows, secure of your sympathy, your commiseration, and perhaps in a future paper of your advice.

It will be confessed by all mankind, that happiness is the "end and aim" of human endeavour, and that the sum of our wishes, is to obtain it as the "one thing needful." But the ways in which they who seek after that phantom (for after all, who will deny that happiness is fleeting and unsubstantial?) hope to obtain its possession are so various, that it is a difficult task to many, to discover which road is the most likely to satisfy their wishes. Yet it must be evident to every reflecting mind that there can be but one path to true happiness, and that thousands live and die ignorant of it, their whole lives being spent in delusion and error.

I write this for the purpose of pointing out to the young, to those who are entering on the world (confidently expecting to meet, evermore, with its smiles, its favour, and its protection), one road that leads not to peace. And I sincerely hope, the virtue of the intention will be a sufficient apology for the inadequate and imperfect manner of the execution.

There cannot, Sir, be a more powerful argument against the indulgence of vicious passions than the fact, that the more you yield to them, the more strongly and deeply do they seize and fasten on the soul, encreasing "by what they feed upon."

It is because I opposed not the impulses of passion and withstood not the inordinate desire of self-gratification, that I am now a miserable outcast from society, tormented with the stings of a guilty conscience, and agonized with reflections which are of themselves sufficient to embitter life almost beyond endurance. My father, who was possessed of considerable property, died, when I was too young to be left to my own guidance, and on his death-bed he nominated one whom he had long regarded as a faithful friend for my guardian and protector. But alas, the trust which from honest conviction, my father unhesitatingly reposed in his acquaintance was, unfortunately for myself, betrayed by the person who, of all others, ought to have evinced paternal care and kindness towards me—for he was under manifold obligations to my parent.

I would not that my readers should surmise from what I have said, that Mr. W—robbed me of my fortune, or that he in any way encouraged me to dissipation by extravagance or prodigality. No. What I complain of, was the utter unconcern he manifested about the principles of virtue and moral rectitude, which it was his duty to have inculcated on my youthful mind. He suffered me to live without any regard for religion, in open disobedience to the rules of conduct it prescribes. Every evil inclination of my heart was gratified, merely, I believe, to prevent any complaints which a denial of my wishes might have momentarily called forth. And rather than endeavour to point out to me the danger of the indulgence, which I constantly expected, he strove to procure me every bauble for which I clamoured. When I had attained my 21st year, I was, of course, no longer the protégé of Mr. W. Then, it was that finding myself free from all restraint, and in the possession of about £2000 per annum, I gave full scope to my passions and studied only their gratification. I soon became acquainted with a company of gamblers, and I began to feel a fondness for play, which in a very short time, predominated over every other feeling. O ye who wish to avoid destruction and misery, guard, I entreat you, against this vice. Remember, that the passion for gaming, when indulged, is like a foaming torrent, which nothing can resist or turn aside. It bears you to inevitable ruin, and too often entails on others with whom you are connected the woe and distress which should be your own. How many virtuous wives—how many helpless infants, have been whelmed with want and wretchedness by the fatal propensity of husbands and fathers!—The tears of unprotected innocence—the cries of injured love and abused fidelity—avail nothing when a passion for gaming has taken deep root in the heart—its victim stands unmoved amidst the desolation he has spread around; nor sheds a tear of penitence or remorse though his dearest friends perish by his side!

Such was my case.—Whole nights have I passed with my guilty companions, and I have not unfrequently lost, before I separated from my brother gamesters, more than a year's income. This conduct, which may in a great degree be attributed to the neglect of my guardian, could not, my readers must be aware, be continued without affecting my fortune, and making destructive inroads upon my constitution; it indeed plunged me into debt, and that torment of mind, which those who are under the dominion of like passions must ever experience.

It were, perhaps, an useless, and I am convinced it would be an unpleasant task, to trace my career of dissipation and infamy, from my first entrance into the world, as the master of a large fortune, to the hour when by the treachery and villainy of others, I was stripped of nearly all my possessions, and left to roam, followed, wheresoever I go, with "compunctious visitings of conscience," rendering every moment of life loathsome, and more terrible than death itself. But need I inform my readers, that my inordinate love of play overcame every good resolution which in moments of reflection I formed. I swore a thousand times to forsake my companions, the authors of my wretchedness, but, alas! I had too long pursued the path of folly and destruction, to be able to retrace my steps, and I continued my ruinous course until I became unconscious of enjoyment—deprived of all rest on earth—driven almost to madness by reflection on my fallen and lost condition, and supported only by the hope that my wretched fate might prove a warning to others, and shew them the necessity of checking unlawful desire and of curbing vicious passion. To sum up all in a few words: by gaming I have lost a very ample fortune, which should have been devoted to the relief of my poor fellow-creatures; I have been precipitated from the summit of expectation into the depths of despair and misery—my only hope is in the grave—and instead of being a useful member of society, I am now wandering from place to place, "seeking but finding no peace," no solace. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

MISERUS.

EPISTLE TO A FRIEND.

Liverpool, August 9th, 1833.

DEAR SIR, Again—as erst, I take the pen,
To write my cogitations—to my friend,
Hoping your patience, and your praise to gain,
As nought but your amusement I intend;
If I assume the Mentor in my strain
I hope I shall not, by that means offend;
This much premis'd my Muse shall take her wing
(My pipes are tuned—here followeth the spring).

Don't think that I can write you sense for ever,
I can't afford it—I've too small a stock
To finish every verse—with something clever,
Whatever you may think on't—is no joke
So ill as I am too—of a brain fever,
You must expect some firing at half-cock—
In any book you know—you'll own there scarce is Nonsense more genuine than the following verses.

"Great actions may be done by Mr. Petty—
"And weakness may be felt by Adam Strong—"Losses may happen ev'n to Mr. Get-ay—
"Shortness of breath may stop short Mr. Long.
"Who better temper'd is than Mrs. Fret-ay—
"Home to a T. you'll always find Sue-Sheng;
"Gas lights black night—which brightness let me say
"Is rivalled by the blacking made by Day.

"Of candour it is known I am not lacking,
"So I expect to be allowed to say—
"Those who would undervalue Turner's Blacking
"They don't deserve, to have the light of Day.
"Oh! 'tis a wicked falsehood, huge and whacking,
"That 'when 'tis kept a week, it turns quite grey.'
"But if on trial, this should grow your creed,
"You may have some—that can be Warren-ted."

I've really lost the thread of my discourse—
Where left I off, last time I wrote to you?
After I told you, I had stole a horse—
It matters little—any place will do:
My Epic thread is not a bit the worse
Of being for a short time snapt in two.
I'll just plunge in—slap-dash—and make no doubt
In a short time—the murder will be out.

To Gall, and eke to Spurzheim—my apology—
For not believing—is—my seal's so thick—
I cannot comprehend their cran-i-o-lo-gy
How bumps can rise on heads—without a stick

* Hereby hangs a tale.—See Mysteries of the Abbey: Liverpool, published by Johnson.

Yet (more than once) with care I've read the whole of G.
But can't discover—if they mean a trick.
My great objection to their scheme—in full—
Is placing all the organs—on the scull.

I purchased one, and had it nicely marked—
By Gall himself, (the Golgothetic chief)
My faith was lively, when I first embark'd
I gave the science, my most firm belief.
I first was stagger'd, when a friend remark'd—
His observation gave me great relief—
"If bumps upon the head—be signs of knowledge,
"Then Donybrook's the place to build a College."

I do not say, that there is no such thing
As craniology, I say they're wrong
And I am right, I do not wish to bring
My system against theirs—however strong
Their arguments, before mine they'd take wing;
I'll give the world my Okey, ere long,
At length—and then they'll have a means to judge
If mine or Gall and Spurzheim's—most is—judge.

I'll state to you the outlines of my plan,
Not thoroughly digested but the rough—
(And ask of any reasonable man—
If Organ-building is not wretched stuff Compar'd with mine—deny the same you can)
"I call the nose, of spectacles, and snuff—
"The organ—now you ask me what says Gall—
"He never mentions you've a nose at all.

"The teeth are organs—by whose means we chew—
"I call the tongue—the organ of our speech—
"The mouth—the aperture, to let it through,
"By means of which we threaten and beseech,
"Kiss, spit, yawn, laugh—(how strange a rhyme) and cough,
"Swear rudely sometimes—sometimes pray and preach;
"All these in front—the organs placed behind
"I need not handle, as they go—by wind.

The feet, of dancing, and of walking, are
The organs—and rank lowest, in their station;
Or if high sounding names you would prefer,
Call them the organs of pedestriation:
The bumps upon the ——— argue fair
A predisposition for flagellation—
The lips, the eyes, the elbows, and the toes,
Are organs—and their use each owner knows.

Fingers as general organs—we may view,
(This will hold good—from Cork to Cornamuel)
Of fencing, fighting, slicing, music too—
Ay and the best of music—that by Handel.

Then A—y—never let me once suppose
(If all the other vowels their faith should fix)
That U or I should be led by the nose
By any German Doustersweils tricks;
No! let us rise at once—'twill take few blows
To crush the system of these empirics—
And if for bumps upon the scull they're pining,
A rung a-piece—and these shall not be wasting.

Thus all Gall's blether is knock'd on the head—
Spilt—by its total insignificance
It speaks its founder's brains to be of lead,
Gravely such arguments to dare advance
As they who bolt the athanasian creed
Alone, could think convincing—at one glance
With half an eye—the great superiority
Of mine is evident—so Gall good-morrow t'ye.

"May plenty pour her cornucopia
"Into thy lap, thy basket and thy store—
"And peace dwell with thee in personae propria,
"Now that she's banish'd from the Spanish shore;
"Health—and whatever would realize Utopia—
"Be thine, and may you reach hale eighty-four,
"And dance thy children's children on thy knee,
"Nor grudge my wish—that I be there to see!"

You'll say—I am a "fishmonger" in this,
That is a self-fish fellow—let me see Mandeville says (I think the saying's his)
"No act of man from selfishness is free."
I can't define exactly how this is,
But it appears quite evident to me
That if I cannot trace it and be can
He sure must be the devil of a man.

And so farewell—I prithee give a hint
To Chalmers when you see him, I expect
That tale of his yclep'd "the tangle is tight,"
The which he promised—and that his neglect
Will grieve me—I do wish it was in print,
By this time he'll have made it quite correct:
Some lines too, when from horseback he was thrown
"And broke a button's neck—and sav'd his own."

The shocking weather during winter time
Has crush'd me—never more to raise my head,
And cleave through I be at finding rhyme;
I can't make beef—at all to rhyme with bread;
Thus hamper'd can I soar to the sublime
Small heart have I to sing a song—indeed

* A cudgel.

It takes my care—a moment from my eyes
For my poor woes—but that way madness lies.

I wish again that summer days were prime
And I within a gunshot of your place,
I'd have a crack in very little time—
I'd soon go off—and flashing in your face,
Report—what's not so fit to put in rhyme,
And all my wayfarings—and wand'ring trace:
But should I never more thy visage see,
Still let me hope—thou wilt remember me.

E. GERARD, P. P.

ANIMAL INSTINCT.

Addison considered nothing as more mysterious than the natural instinct of animals, which sometimes rises far above reason, and at others falls infinitely short of it. He could not venture to pronounce it a property of matter, neither could he, on account of its extraordinary effects, regard it as an attribute of an intelligence. He therefore looked upon it, like gravity in bodies, as an impression of the First Mover, and as the Divine Power operating in its creatures.

There cannot be a more judicious comparison than this. As gravity imparts to a body the skill to pursue, invariably, the shortest way to the centre of the earth, without having the least consciousness of this action; so instinct directs animal bodies to their natural destinations, as though nature herself had thoroughly instructed them in the secrets of her views; and thus they perform actions which are consonant with the laws of wisdom, without knowing any thing of the matter. As nature has endued physical bodies with peculiar properties, such as gravity, attraction, and the like, so she has bestowed others on animal bodies; and, if I may be allowed the expression, incorporated the most essential maxims of her wisdom into living machines, just as an artist makes an automaton that performs certain human actions, but, in other respects, can do no more than any other machine. The whole animal kingdom is full of instances of this sort. It is not out of respect, as every reader will easily believe, that a certain beetle, described by naturalists, buries the dead moles and toads which it finds, but the instinct which teaches it to subside upon those animals, and to deposit its eggs in them, impels it to this action. The pigeons which are trained to carry letters to distant places are not more sensible than other pigeons: nothing but the blind instinct to return to their young governs them in this proceeding. It is requisite that they should have left young at the place to which they are to fly; and lest they should take a fancy to stop by the way to drink or to wash themselves, their feet are dipped, at their departure, in vinegar. The Soland geese in St. Kilda steal, as Martin informs us, the grass out of one another's nests, not for the sake of stealing, but they pick up grass wherever they find it, to form a soft depository for their eggs: and as the geese live together in flocks of many thousands, they find it every where in the nests of their companions. Highly intelligent manifested by the mules in America descending the lofty mountains, yet a closer examination will show that it is nothing but the fear of falling at the sight of the precipices, which occasions all their caution, without any other consideration. If, at Lima, they stand with their legs wide apart when they hear a subterranean rumbling, this proves nothing more than an habitual mechanical action acquired by frequent repetition; because when the earth shakes, they are obliged to assume a firmer position with their burdens, and they take the noise of the earthquake for one and the same thing, since one invariably accompanies the other. Such is the real history of the supposed intelligence and cunning of animals. Nature must have known how far it was necessary for the skill which she conferred on animal bodies to extend, in order to the attainment of the purposes of self-preservation, self-defence, and the propagation of their kind. So much is certain, that all these instincts have their appointed limits, beyond which no animal can go; and hence it is, that the animals, so long as they follow their instincts, perform actions of apparently astonishing intelligence, but, in other respects, are so stupid as not to manifest the slightest trace of cunning in their operations. A hen, whose providence and perseverance we admire, when she lays her eggs in some sequestered spot, where she sits on and turns them, and almost sacrifices herself in her attention to them, bestows the same pains upon a lump of chalk which is put under her. She leads her chickens about that they may learn to scratch up the ground and to seek worms and insects. At the same time she will tread upon one of them, and, affrighted at the cries which the pain extorts from it, she chucks to warn and to soothe it; but yet has not the sense to raise her foot and set it at liberty. A lobster will, with inconceivable dexterity, snap off his leg when one of his fellows seizes it with his claw; but if you put one of his legs between his own claw, he will not have the sense to open his claw and to remove his leg, but break it off, as if there was no other method of releasing himself. The ostrich hatches her eggs, as it would appear, for the purpose of having young ostriches; she, nevertheless, quits them for every trifle, and leaves them to perish; nay, she will even break most of them herself, for the purpose of feeding with them the young ones which she already has. This bird has, moreover, the silly instinct to swallow every thing that comes in its way, without discriminating, like other animals, whether it is hurtful to it or not. An ostrich swallowed, in Shaw's presence, several leaden bullets hot from the mould. It will greedily devour its own excrements, and those of other birds, and, of course, manifests not the least choice in obeying the instinct of appetite. The crocodile would multiply with dangerous rapidity, were it not so stupid as to devour its own young, according to the testimony of Ulloa. Thus, too, the male tiger destroys his own species in its young; and it is observed of one of the bug family, that the female is obliged to use the greatest precaution to defend their eggs and her young from the male. The ascent and descent of larks are the result of an instinct implanted in those birds, which they follow without any consideration; for they do the very same over the sea as upon land, and hence frequently perish in the water. A thousand other examples of this kind might be adduced. They prove that these actions, which seem to manifest so much intelligence, are but the actions of a machine, adapted to certain particular purposes, and that to those purposes alone this apparent intelligence extends.

FEMALE ECONOMY.

'You have no reason to complain of my expensiveness,' said la belle Eugénie to her fond and confounded husband; 'no lady in Paris goes so simply dressed as myself; no cachemires of a thousand or two thousand crowns value (her husband looked affrighted!) no ball dresses to last but one night; no lace veils, the price of which would pay a year's rent; nor do I even, like the Countess of Clarion, require a pair of silk shoes and two pair of gloves daily; shoes once per week suffice for my unambitious dress, and I can make a pair of gloves

do twice; besides I do not ruin you either by the jeweller's bill, or the change of the furniture of our house yearly, or oftener; four times a week satisfies me of public places; I never gamble, and my ordinary attire is a gown of coloured cotton or muslin à l'Anglaise, and a white one when more dressed; one hat or bonnet lasts me eight or ten days; in short, Auguste, you know not how to appreciate a good and saving wife (here she panted, and looked fond); and it is a pity that you have not Madame Grandpré for your wife, who would spend your small fortune in fans and feathers only, and would—(a pause)—do something worse to you besides.' He rubbed his forehead.

'Dear Eugénie!' cried her contrite partner, 'never more will I reproach you, I am convinced that you are right'—(here he sighed); 'I only regret my small means, and see that a young man should not venture upon matrimony without an ample fortune; a pretty woman (Eugénie smiled) must be dressed at least neatly, and it is not a trifle which can afford even that style in these extravagant times; they, not thou, sweet one, are to blame, nor should I have uttered a word of complaint did I not find myself terribly in arrear this last half year, and could I account for the deficit in any way but by the numerous bills of dress-makers, marchandes de modes, shoemakers, laundresses, etcetera, etcetera, etcetera (Eugénie smiled contemptuously). 'Twenty-one gowns in one year!!!' continued he.—'Aye,' replied Eugénie, 'at a paltry twelve or twenty francs each.'—'The making, Eugénie, perhaps two Napoleons each, (Auguste's colour increased;) the getting up, or washing,' added he, 'five or six francs each (he elevated his eyebrows,) to be worn'—'Only once, you simpleton.'—'And,' observed he, 'then you scarcely dare sit down for fear of discomposing fluttans, volans, falls, flounces, and falbalas.'—'What of that?'—'Why nothing; then again, twenty four francs for a pocket-handkerchief, and the cart-loads of fichus and linen which go to your blanchisseuse, with whom you quarrel every week, as also with your ironing woman, who alleges that one of those cheap dresses takes her a whole day to get up.'—'To be sure'—'and a whole day for you to wear,' ironically cried the suffering husband. 'Why surely you would have me go clean!' tauntingly added madame. 'Well, love,' concluded Auguste, 'I have no objection, but it certainly cleans out my coffers.'—'Why did you marry then?'—'True, darling, I was wrong, but we will go on quietly as long as we can.'—'How seldom do I require silks and crapes!' observed the lady, 'or new jewels, or costly entertainments at home, or—' Here he tried to stop her, but the female tongue is not thus suddenly controlled.—'do I, like your neighbour, break your rest by late hours?'—'No, dove.'—'Or break your heart by flirting with the men?'—'No, dear.'—'Or—' Kiss me, my dear Eugénie, you shall have it all your own way, try to be as economical as you can.'—'Nobody can be more saving,' answered she. Her husband resumed, 'Don't be out of temper, I will go out and try to borrow a thousand crowns upon my country-house, and (he looked fondly) I only regret that I am not richer.'—'Staff,' exclaimed his wife; 'and (saluting him tenderly) if thou dost borrow the money, thou wilt buy me an amazons (or riding habit,) and let me get that great bargain of lace, recollect it is only second hand, and will be sold at a third of its value.'—'Comme tu voudras,' meekly replied the fortunate husband. They embraced, exchanged the adieux of the eyes, and parted. The husband proceeded to a Jew's, and his fond spouse went out to purchase an embroidered trimming cheap and simple, as she styled it. How different from lace or artificial flowers. Happy Auguste, to have such a moderate wife!

With this scene in my view (for I happened to be present at it,) I began to reflect upon the subject deliberately. Eugénie's style of dress was truly 'simples munitus;' she had not a dozen of costly ornamental combs worn in turn in her glossy hair; her fingers moved gracefully with only two rings on each hand, instead of being in the unbending armour of sixteen circles composed of all the gems, and set in the most expansive style; she preferred flowers to jewelled tiaras and to birds of paradise, to ostrich and other proud and nodding plumes; she was not ruinous in perfwmes, baths, waiting-women, boudoir furniture, and boxes at the theatre, and yet—she cost poor Auguste a pretty round sum annually; the very simple gown lasted a very short time, and was soon worn and washed out; it might have been said of these dresses, for these light articles of humble price were corded and festooned, trimmed and ornamented up to such a pitch, that the matter was the least of the affair, and the manner all. To purchase such a piece for a gown was a trifle, but before it was fitted to the elastic form which was to grace it, the bill swelled to a most imperceptible expense. Suppose, for instance, a printed cotton or muslin of fifteen francs, what a bagatelle; but then, to trimming twenty-five, making ditto, ditto; three washings eighteen francs, and it then was only fit for the femme de chambre. These little articles too, so often repeated, must have a little effect on the revenue of the happy man who has to pay for them. For cheapness and simplicity, a man might as well purchase a bed of straw, and, when bought, adorn it with a cambric covering, and overhang it daily with a chintz pattern curtain.

"Materiem superabat opus;"

But far be it from me to deprive the fair sex of their neat and humble toilet! my intention is merely to convince the marrying swain that the provisions necessary for a wife are many. When a man has got his bride to support, he must not forget the milliner, the mantua-maker, the florist, the jeweller, the attendant, nor even the clear-staroher and blanchisseuse, who will aid madam in making head against him (no pun or improper allusion is made to the front, and much less an affront;) and whilst the splendid, high-born dame's claims comes en gros, he must not forget that an humbler partner has her detail expenses, which are like the numerous items of an attorney's or an apothecary's bill. Happy, thrice happy, the wedded he who can answer all these demands; and who, being previously aware of them, has nothing to suffer from surprise, inability, or female upbraiding; whose well-stocked purse dreads not these ambush attacks, and whose even mind and temper can meet the lengthy weekly, or monthly account (annuale suit the great alone;) for a man of retired habits, and long accustomed to order, regularity and calm, would be completely overturned by such surprises: as to the unworthy writer, they would be death to him. A FRAGMENT.

"Vires acquiritur etasdo,"

CHANGE.

And this is what is left of youth! - -
There were two Boys, who were bred up together,
Shared the same bed, and fed at the same board;
Each tried the other's sport, from their first chase,
Young hunters of the butterfly and bee,
To when they followed the fleet hare, and tried
The swiftness of the bird. They lay beside
Two silver trout stream, watching as the sun
Played on the bubbles; shared each in the store
Of either's garden; and together read
Of him, the master of the desert isle,
Till a low but, a gun, and a canoe,
Bounded their wishes. Or if ever came
A thought of future days, 'twas but to say
That they would share each other's lot, and do Wonders, no doubt. But this was vain: they parted
With promises of long remembrance, words
Whose kindness was the heart's, and those warm tears,
Hidden like shame by the young eyes which shed them,
As what was would give worlds to shed once more.
They met again,—but different from themselves,
At least what each remembered of themselves:
The one proud as a soldier of his rank,
And of his many battles; and the other
Proud of his Indian wealth, and of the skill
And toil which gathered it; each with a brow
And heart alike darkened by years and care.
They met with cold words, and yet colder looks:
Each was changed in himself, and yet each thought
The other only changed, himself the same.
And coldness bred dislike, and rivalry
Came like the pestilence o'er some sweet thoughts
That lingered yet, healthy and beautiful,
Amid dark and unkindly ones. And they,
Whose boyhood had not known one jarring word,
Were strangers in their age: if their eyes met,
'Twas but to look contempt; and when they spoke,
Their speech was wormwood! - - -
- - - And this, this is life!

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

--- "Coast of Africa, Sir? Why aye I've been there too, and once knew a little about it—but 'tis many years since. Poverty is no disgrace, Sir, and so I'll tell you what took me there. My father was a dissenting minister—a worthy, pious man—had his peculiarities, to be sure; but there's few warm hearts that have cool heads. He taught me bits of Greek and Latin, and them there sort of things, and he used to praise me for my progress; but, bless you, I knows nothing about it now. I've been nearly all over the world, so I mingles Dutch, Italian, German, Spanish, Hindostanee, French, Portuguese, all together, and makes a confusion of tongues. 'Tis true I can remember Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, and something about Tupto, but there I sticks fast. Then there was hio, hæc, hoc, and Amo Amas, but I knows nothing about 'em now. I was left an orphan at eleven years of age, and mother's brother—that's my uncle—was Captain of a Guinea-man, and so be offered to take me with him to sea; though says he, 'I suppose his larning has spoiled him. However he'll have plenty of opportunity to practise his humanity in a slave ship; and as for his grammar, he'll meet with some rum articles, and no doubt often decline his duty, take up a preposition in the cook's caboose, make an interjection in his hammock, form a conjunction between his mouth and a dough-boy; and for pronouns, aye, aye, he'll soon get hold of them, for our service is the worst in the world for swearing;' and so I found it. I parted with my mother, and never saw her afterward—but we shall meet again. I shall forbear telling about my first entry on board—the many privations and cruelties I suffered, as often getting thrash'd for not doing wrong, as for committing a fault; but there's little compassion in a slave-ship. I should have sunk under it but for the conviction that there was a Power aloft that kept watch for poor Jack; and my good father used often to tell me, 'Boy, bear this always in mind: he who eyes a providence will never want a providence to eye.' Well, Sir, we arrived on the coast, and all my troubles were awhile forgot. Oh what a scene for a young enthusiastic mind! It was all enchantment to me. Well, we brought up at —, near Congo, and alongside came several canoes full of natives; the decks were soon cover'd with 'em. 'Haugh, Captain, how he do, eh? Look dere, you see my King—King Tom—he tan upon de beach. Haugh, Captain, fire one salute for my King.' The salute was fired, and fresh demands made. 'Haugh, Captain, what he got for my King?'—'I've got some fine chintz,' replied the Skipper. 'Ha, chintz, eh!'—'Some cotton and other articles.'—'Ha, good dat! What hab got a brandy?'—'No.'—'Rum?'—'No.'—'Rack?'—'No.'—'What for dat, eh? Haugh! hear him—Captain bring chintz, bring cotton—no bring brandy, no bring rum. What for bring tuff for de back and no bring tuff for de belly!' Well, Sir, we began to trade, and the poor creatures were brought aboard in droves. Oh it would have melted a heart of stone to have seen them stowed away below—many of them in irons! and then I thought of their father's curse, and pitied the poor descendants of Ham. And so I crept out on the bowsprit into the fore-stay-sail netting, and pretended to lie asleep, that I might ease the anguish of my heart in secret; but when I came in again they found me out, and so I got a rope's-ending for being a lubberly sniveller—but indeed I couldn't help it. In about three weeks our cargo was complete—two hundred and forty, and we left the coast in a hurry. I fancy my uncle had cheated some of the traders, and was glad to be off. A limited number of slaves were permitted to be on deck at a time, and there was one, a youth of interesting countenance, rather sickly. Ah! I shall never forget his looks, as his native land receded from his view! At first it was calm dejection, mingled with a melanoholy idea that he should always keep it in sight; but still it sunk lower and lower. He could not account for it, though his sudden starts express'd his anger and astonishment; but when it lessened to a dim speck just darkening in the horizon, he burst out in all the agony of despair, raised his clenched hands above his head, shook them at his oppressors, and utter'd a yell that fill'd me with horror. He was answered by the lash across his bare back, to keep him quiet. I see you shudder, Sir, and well you may—'tis all as true as gospel. There was a young mother, too, with her infant at the breast: she look'd at the shore, and then at her babe, and then at the shore again, but she shed no tear. Her forehead was wrinkled up, and her eyes red and swollen, and every now and then she press'd her hand to her head as if it was scorch'd and the burning anguish had dried up the source of tears; but she sigh'd—no, 'twas not a sigh, but a groan, as if her heart was bursting. What she was, or who she was, I couldn't learn; but on the passage her baby died. Well, she conceal'd it for some time, but it was discover'd at last, taken from her, a shot tied round its middle, and thrown overboard before her face. I got another taste of the tarr'd gingerbread for snivelling; but I'm sure, Sir, you couldn't have help'd it yourself if you had seen the poor unfriended mother. After she lost her child she refused her allowance, and would sit huddled together in one spot, nor could my persuasion move her; so the lash was applied, and in a day or two she grew more calm, and would look over the side, for the hour together, on the dark waters that entomb'd her babe. One morning, on mustering, she was missing, and couldn't be found. There was no doubt but she had gone overboard in the dark, though no one could give any account of the matter. I didn't cry this time, for I began to get insensible, and now can readily account for the hardness and depravity of heart evinced by the crew,—they had been brought up to it from childhood. But this was not all: both officers and men were so rejoiced on hearing Barbadoes, that they indulged too freely in soaking their biscuits, and got completely groggy, excepting the second mate, the carpenter, the two apprentices, and myself. The negroes discover'd it by some means, seiz'd and kill'd the sentry over the hatchway without noise, and got possession of the arm-chest. They rush'd on the deck, some descending to the cabin; my poor uncle fell first, but not till he had laid two at his feet to rise no more. The chief mate, after a hard struggle, was thrown overboard: he was a good swimmer, and though severely wounded, got hold of the mizen channels; here he clung some time, but was seen at last, when a Black made a blow at him with a cutlass, which separated his hand from his wrist, and he dropp'd again, shriek'd, and sunk! A sudden shock will sometimes rouse a man from drunkenness: this was the case now: several of the crew conceal'd themselves, and were saved; the others were easily destroyed. On the first alarm the second mate and myself got into the main-top, and the carpenter and two apprentices into the fore-top. Here we remained for some time undiscovered, while the negroes, who had broken open the steward's room and got at the liquor, were tearing about the decks with all the fury of wild beasts seeking their prey. At last they caught sight of us, and several mounted the shrouds. The mate kept encouraging me to persevere to the last struggle. There was an old case of empty bottles stowed away in the top, and, armed with one in each hand, we waited their attack. The first whose head appear'd above the top-brim was instantly knock'd overboard by the mate; the second grappled him, but as quickly followed his companion, on a blow from a quart bottle which I gave him on his head with all my might. God forgive me, Sir; but life's precious! In the same manner five, one after the other, follow'd their leader; and the two apprentices joining us by the top-mast-stay, they gave over the attack. The last knew nothing of the carpenter, and so we concluded he was massacred. The slaves now ransack'd every place for powder and ball; and though there were several cases of cartridges in the arm-chest which they must have handled, yet providentially their contents were passed over. All at once we heard the most dismal yells, and saw the carpenter and two of the men, each with a bayonet in one hand and a cutlass in the other, driving the howling slaves along the deck, and cutting all down before 'em. We joined as quick as possible, and had the satisfaction of seeing our numbers increase, so that we soon retook the ship. The carpenter had watch'd an opportunity—got down the fore-stay on to the bowsprit. Here he found the two men stow'd away under the stay-sail; they descended the bobstay, and got along outside of the ship to the gangway, without being noticed. Cutlasses and bayonets were lying on all parts of the deck, so they were arm'd in an instant. But what most contributed to our success was a box of—of—I forget now what they call 'em, but they resemble a ball; only instead of being smooth, are cover'd all over with spikes like a hedge-hog, or like the ball one of the giants holds in Guildhall." On such occasions as these they are strew'd over the decks, and the poor wretches, with their bare feet, unable to step without treading on them, are easily overcome. A box full was in the stern sheets of the long-boat; the carpenter knew it, got 'em out, and spread them around; and oh how the slaves shriek'd as they pierced their feet. After securing them all below, we found the Captain, chief mate, seven whites, and about twenty blacks, killed, and a great many wounded. Among the latter was the youth, who died shortly after; indeed few of the hurt survived. We were now reduced to the second mate, who took command, and fourteen hands; and after a toilsome passage, in which we were obliged to be on deck night and day, armed, and burying upwards of sixty slaves, we arrived at the West Indies. Here, Sir, I could give you such a horrid picture of misery as would harrow up your soul; but I forbear, Sir, I forbear—I can see your heart is suffering severely already at the recital. But to witness it! God bless Mr. Will-be-forsoe! he made a noble stand in the cause of Humanity, and deserves her thanks, aye, and the thanks of every lover of freedom. But why can't the trade be abolished altogether? only because in other countries, as Corporal Trim says, 'they have nobody to stand up for them.' But oh, Sir, could the nobles of the land see the poor African as I have seen him—pinioned on his back without sufficient room to turn—little food to eat—brought on deck, and, though weak and exhausted, compell'd by the whip to run, and dance, and submit to the caprice of his cruel masters—could they see this, every nerve would be strain'd to prevent the inhuman traffic. Arn't they flesh and blood, Sir, and sha'n't we all have to appear together at the last great day before the same unerring tribunal? God is no respecter of persons; and so the heart be right, no matter if the skin be black, white, or copper colour. I have been telling you a long story, Sir, but bless you it isn't half what I could tell you; and some other time, if you please, I'll give you another about it. I am sure you'll not value it the less for coming from

THE SLAVE TRADE.

The Vigilante, sailed from Nantes on a slave voyage, and was captured by Lieut. Mildmay in the river Bonny, on the coast of Africa, on the 15th of April, 1822.

Her burden was 240 tons, and she had on board, at the time of her capture, 345 slaves. She was manned by thirty men, armed with four twelve-pounders, all of which were brought over to one side of the ship for the attack.

The circumstances of the case are thus stated: Sir Robert Mends was commander of a squadron on the coast of Africa, stationed there by the British Government to prevent the infraction of the laws for the Abolition of the Slave Trade. He sent out Lieut. Mildmay, with the boats belonging to his vessel, to reconnoitre the river Bonny, a place notorious for carrying on this traffic. The boats having crossed the bar soon after day-light, about seven o'clock, six sail, two schooners, and four brigs were observed lying at anchor off the town of Bonny. When the boats were about four miles off, they displayed their colours; and, as they advanced, the slave-vessels were soon moored across the stream, with springs on their cables, all armed, with apparently about 400 slaves on board, and the crews fully prepared to resist any attack that might be made upon them. The two schooners and three of the brigs opened a heavy fire of canister and grape-shot and musketry upon the English boats as they advanced.

When the latter were near enough for their shots to take effect, the firing was returned. They advanced, and in a short time took possession of all the vessels.

The other ships proved to be, the Yeanam, a Spanish schooner from the Havannah, of 360 tons, and 380 slaves on board; the Vicna, a Spanish schooner from the Havannah, 180 tons, and 325 slaves on board; the Petite Betsey, a French brig from Nantes, 184 tons, with 218 slaves on board; the Ursule, a French brigantine from St. Pierre; Martinique, 100 tons, and 347 slaves on board; all manned and armed in such a way, as that they might fight desperately if attacked. The Theodore, a French brig, had no slaves on board; but a cargo was on shore, in readiness for embarkation.

Many of the slaves jumped overboard, during the engagement, and were devoured by the sharks. On board the Yeanam, which made the most determined resistance, the slaves suffered much: four were killed, and ten wounded.

Of the wounded, three were females; one girl about ten years of age, lost both her legs, another her right arm, and a third was shot in the side. Even after the vessel had been surrendered, a number of the Spanish sailors skulked below, and, arming the slaves with muskets, made them fire upwards upon the British. On board this ship, Lieutenant Mildmay observed a slave girl, about twelve or thirteen years of age, in irons, to which was fastened a thick iron chain, ten feet in length, that was dragged along as she moved. He ordered the girl to be instantly released from this fetter; and, that the captain who had treated her so cruelly might not be ignorant of the pain inflicted upon an unprotected and innocent child, the irons were ordered to be put upon him.

The Spanish schooner Vicna, when taken possession of, had a lighted match hanging over the open magazine hatch. The match was placed there by the crew, before they leaped overboard and swam for the shore: it was seen by one of the British seamen, who boldly put his hat under the burning wick and removed it. The magazine contained a large quantity of powder. One spark from the flaming match would have blown up 325 unfortunate victims lying in irons in the hold. These monsters in iniquity expressed their deep regret after the action, that their diabolical plan had failed.

The slaves, at the time of the capture of the vessel, were found in the most wretched condition. Some lying on their backs, others sitting on the bottom of the ships. They were chained to each other by the arms and legs: iron collars were placed round their necks. In addition to these provisions for confinement, they were fastened together by a long chain, which connected several of the collars for their greater security in that dismal prison.

Thumb-screws, to be used as instruments of torture, were also found in the vessel. From their confinement and sufferings the slaves often injured themselves by beating, and vented their grief upon such as were next them, by biting and tearing their flesh. Some of them were bound with cords, and many had their arms grievously lacerated. Upwards of 150 of the slaves died on their passage to Sierra Leone. The Spanish schooner from the Havannah was separated from the other vessels in a dreadful storm, as they were proceeding to that colony, and sank with 380 slaves on board. The other vessels reached their destination.—Report of the African Instit.

INDIAN PROWESS.

In the intervals of the dances, a warrior would step forward and strike a flag-staff they had erected with a stick, whip, or other weapon, and recount his martial deeds. This ceremony is called striking the post, and whatever is then said may be relied upon as rigid truth, being delivered in the presence of many a jealous warrior and witness, who could easily detect and would immediately disgrace the striker for exaggeration or falsehood. This is called the beggars' dance, during which some presents are always expected by the performers, as tobacco, whiskey, or trinkets. But on this occasion, as none of those articles were immediately offered, the amusement was not at first distinguished by such activity. The master of the ceremonies continually called aloud to them to exert themselves; but still they were somewhat dull and backward. Ietan now stepped forward and lashed a post with his whip, declaring that he would thus punish those who did not dance; this threat from one whom they had vested with authority for this occasion, had a manifest effect upon his auditors, who were presently highly wrought up by the sight of two or three little mounds of tobacco twist which were now laid before them, and appeared to infuse new life.

After lashing the post and making his threat, Ietan went on to narrate his martial exploits. He had stolen horses seven or eight times from the Konzas; he had first struck the bodies of three of that nation slain in battle. He had stolen horses from the Ietan nation, and had struck one of their dead. He had stolen horses from the Pawnees, and struck the body of one Pawnee Loup. He had stolen horses several times from the Omawhaws, and once from the Poncas. He had struck the bodies of two Sioux. On a war party, in company with the Pawnees, he had attacked the Spaniards and penetrated into one of their camps; the Spaniards, excepting a man and boy, fled; himself being at a distance before his party, he was shot at and missed by the man, whom he immediately shot down and struck. "This, my father," said he, "is the only martial act of my life that I am ashamed of." After several rounds of dancing, and of striking at the post by the warriors, Mi-a-ke-la, or the Little Soldier, a war-worn veteran, took his turn to strike the post. He leaped actively about, and strained his voice to its utmost pitch, whilst he portrayed some of the scenes of blood in which he had acted. He had struck dead bodies of individuals of all the red nations around Osages, Konzas, Pawnee, Poncas, Omawhaws, and Sioux, Padoucas, La Plais or Bald Heads, Ietans, Sanks, Foxes, and Ioways; he had struck eight of one nation, seven of another, &c. He was proceeding with his account when Ietan ran up to him, put his hand to his mouth, and respectfully led him to his seat. This act was no trifling compliment paid to the well-known brave. It indicated that he had still so many glorious acts to speak of, that he would occupy so much time as to prevent others from speaking, and put to shame the other warriors by the contrast of his actions with theirs.—Expedition to the Rocky Mountains.

STANZAS

In memory of Robert Bloomfield, who died at Sheffield, Bedfordshire, Aug. 19, 1823, aged 57 years

His breath the last long gasp expired,
His friends knelt round his death-bed weeping;
That form, which once bright genius fired,
Is now a corpse and in silence sleeping.
The bell in his parish tower was toll'd,
The village peasants the tidings spread;
They praised the man that is stiff and cold,
And sigh'd, when they whisper'd, "BLOOMFIELD'S DEAD!"

A chaucer minstrel,—a sweeter lyre,
Never wakened joy, or melted sorrow;
He raised Britannia's virtues higher,
Gave night-sad hearts, Hope's lighter morrow.

The 'Milk Maid's' song, at an early age,
For a merry May morn he garlanded;
Then his 'Farmer's Boy,'—that youthful sage,
O'er the rural lands, he so blithely led.

His 'wild Flowers,' cull'd from their pastoral beds,
Surpassed the exotics by learning shaded;
For NATURE had painted their beautiful heads,
What Nature paints can never be faded.

His 'broken crutch,' was a ballad of truth;
His 'hourglass' quietly warned the living;
The 'Fakenham Ghost,' a sweet tale for youth;
And 'The Widow Jones,' instruction giving.

The 'Banks of the Wye,' descriptive and lone,
Telling legends of barons and castles grey;
When CAMILLA was girl in her feudal zone,
And maidens by knights were stolen away.

'May-day with the Muses,' lovelily beamed,
The tenants met their landlord smiling;
'Andrew Hall,' to his wife repentant seemed;
The 'Soldier,' returned, past scenes beguiling.

'Blind Helen' could sing, she could play and chat,
And her gentle heart with love was beating;
She felt the quick pulse of her Lover's pat,
When they kissed at parting, or meeting.

'Hazelwood Hall' invited the guests;
In turn we smiled, and in turn we grieved;
So pure were the poet's domestic nests!
Like him they contented loved and lived.

At the name of BURNS in Scotia's clime
Is dear to her sons, by poetry's ties,
BLOOMFIELD, so dearly, shall flourish through time,
And bloom in the fields of his native climes.

AN ICE-BERG.

Extract from a private Journal of a recent voyage from the United States to Liverpool.

'It is unnecessary to dwell at length on those singular appearances, which accompany or distinguish the Gulf Current throughout its turbulent career;—the next incident of any interest which occurred on the voyage, was the prospect of one of those polar phenomena, which are commonly denominated ice-bergs. At the moment at which this exile from the north was discovered, we were either upon or skirting the Great Bank of Newfoundland. When first observed, it was somewhat obscured by a fog, and resembled a huge rock, protruding to the elevation of fifty feet from the surface of the ocean. A little to the east of it was seen what every spectator pronounced to be a ship, which, finding herself suddenly in the immediate vicinity or in actual contact with this unwelcome intruder, had unfurled all her sails to the wind, in order to escape from so terrific an apparition. But this was altogether an illusion. The total dispersion of the fog soon exhibited this arctic formation in all its horrid reality. The western extremity of it preserved the aspect already mentioned; but what was mistaken for the ship, was, in fact, an immensely lofty column of ice resting on the same substratum or foundation. Its height, being much greater than that of the utmost limit of our vessel's mainmast, could not be less than one hundred and eighty or two hundred feet. Its shape was conical, and bore, from the distance at which we viewed it, a striking similarity to a Chinese pagoda or an Egyptian pyramid. It is probable that both points of the ice-berg were at one period connected; but, from its long exposure in comparatively southern latitudes, it had been severed into two separate flakes or eminences. It would be idle to attempt estimating, with any accuracy, the magnitude of the aggregate mass; but if it be true, as asserted by writers on the Polar regions, that only one third part of an ice-berg is apparent above water, it is not difficult, from this datum alone, to form, in the present instance, some crude idea of the stupendous character of the original dimensions. These floating mountains generally appear on the banks of Newfoundland, about the end of May or beginning of June, and continue to drift in every direction, as the wind or tide may impel them. If they descend so far to the south as the Gulf Current, they are, from the high temperature of its water, speedily dissolved. If they remain to the north of it, it is impossible to conjecture their probable durability. So prodigious, sometimes, is the proportion of them immersed, that they are known to ground on the banks; and in this situation, as indeed in every other, they constitute one of the most dreadful perils to which a vessel or mariners can be exposed. I should be sorry to repeat, on this subject, the tragic story of the loss of the ship Jupiter, which it is more agreeable to forget than to revive;—but the very knowledge of the existence of such a species of danger in latitudes the most frequented, must enchain that sentiment of esteem, or of affection, we are accustomed to entertain towards a profession which has elevated Great Britain to such a pitch of commercial prosperity and naval glory, as to render her an object of envy or of admiration to the world.'

THE THREE CROSSES.

[Lines descriptive of the Cross of our Saviour, with two supporters, spear, and dice; also two other crosses, on which the two thieves were crucified: the whole being folded of one piece of paper, and cut at one time, with a pair of scissors.]

Behold the Cross whereon the Saviour bled,
What time he suffered in the Sinner's stead;
The sacred Tree, two wondrous Stones bear up;
Cut from Salvation's Rock, the sinner's hope;
See, too, the cruel Spear which pierc'd his side,
Whence flowed a crimson and a watery tide,
Those fatal Dice the Roman soldiers threw,
When for his robe the lot foretold they drew.
Christ to fulfil all that the Scripture saith,
Was number'd with the Wicked in his death.

FLAGELLATION.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The annexed is from the French work entitled "A collection of celebrated causes." Yours, &c.
Manchester, August, 1823.

The Lady of Liancourt, the subject of the narrative, was originally born of parents of a low rank. Having had the good luck to marry a rich merchant, she had address enough to prevail upon him to leave her, at his death, the bulk of his fortune; and, being now a rich and handsome widow, she married the Sieur, or Lord, of Liancourt; a man of birth, whose fortune was somewhat impaired, by his former extravagant way of living. The lady of Liancourt used to reside, during the summer, at the castle, or estate, of her husband, near the town of Chaumont; and in the same neighbourhood was situated the estate of the Marquis of Fresnel. The manner of living of the Lady of Liancourt, together with the reputation of her wit and beauty, excited the jealousy of the Marchioness of Fresnel, who, on account of her birth, considered herself as being greatly superior to the other; and a strong competition soon took place between the two ladies, which became manifested in several places in a remarkable manner, especially at church, where the Marchioness went once so far as violently to push the other lady off her seat: the Lady of Liancourt, on the other hand, was said to have written a copy of verses against the Marchioness; and in short, matters were carried to such lengths between them, that the Marchioness resolved to damp at once the pretensions of her rival, and for that purpose applied to that effectual mode of correction a Flagellation. Having well formed her plan in that respect, and resolved that her rival should undergo the correction, not by proxy, but in her own person, the Marchioness, one day when she knew the Lady of Liancourt was going to dine at a castle a few miles distant from her own, got into her coach and six, accompanied by four men behind, and three armed servants on horseback; care having been previously taken to lay in a stock of good disciplines, which were placed on the coach box. Having arrived too late at the place on the highway, at which she proposed to meet her antagonist, the Marchioness alighted at the house of the Curate of the parish, in order to wait for her return, and staid there, under some pretence, several hours, till at last a servant, who had been on the watch, came in haste, and brought tidings that Lady Liancourt's coach was in sight; the Marchioness thereupon got into her coach with the utmost speed, and arrived just in time to throw herself across the way, and stop the other lady; when the servants, who had been properly directed beforehand, without loss of time, took the latter out of her coach, and immediately proceeded to execute the orders they had received; and, from the complaint afterwards preferred by the suffering lady, it really seems they endeavoured to discharge their duty in such a manner as might convince their mistress of their zeal to serve her.

The affair soon made a great noise, and the King, who heard of it, immediately sent express orders to the husbands of the ladies to avoid meeting. The Lady of Liancourt applied to the ordinary courts of law, and brought a criminal action against the Marchioness, before the Parliament of Paris; the consequence of which was, that the latter was condemned, both to ask her pardon in the open court upon her knees, pay £2000 damages, and was moreover banished from the whole extent of the jurisdiction of the parliament. The servants, who are generally very severely dealt with in France, when they suffer themselves to become the instruments of the violence of their masters, were condemned to the galleys; and Miss De Villamartin, who had been co-spectatrix of the flagellation, in the same coach with the Marchioness, and shared her triumph, was summoned to appear personally in court, there to be admonished, and condemned to pay a fine of 20 livres, "for the bread of the prisoners."

EXTRAORDINARY CHILD.

An account of Thomas Hills Everitt, an extraordinary large child, born at Enfield, February, 1779:—

'This child was the son of Thomas and Susannah Everitt, who resided at Scotland Green, and though not remarkably large at the time of his birth, began, when six weeks old, to grow to a very extraordinary size. At the age of nine months, he was considered a phenomenon, and the curiosity of the country, for some miles round, was so much excited, that it was with some difficulty he could be seen. His dimensions, when he was nine months and a fortnight old, were taken by Dr. Sherwen, and were as follow:

'Girth round the wrist 6½ inches; above the elbow 8½ inches; girth of the leg, near the ankle, 9½ inches; of the calf of the leg, 12 inches; girth round the thigh, 18 inches; round the small of the back, 24 inches; and the girth under the armpits and across the breast, 22½ inches.

'The mother could not be prevailed on to have the child weighed, being impressed with the vulgar prejudice against weighing children; but his weight was guessed at nine stone. His height was three feet two inches; he had eight teeth and a fine head of hair; and when his limbs were exposed to view, it was impossible to be impressed with any other idea than that of seeing a young giant. The child had a clear skin, free from pimples or blemish, was exceedingly lively, with a clear eye, the pupil not in the least dilated, and, excepting a pair of broad cheeks, his head was rather less in proportion to the other parts of his body. The extraordinary size of this child tempted his parents to carry him to London and exhibit him to the public. But the confined situation had such an effect on his health, that he was soon taken back to his native air. He was, however, soon taken to London again, and exhibited at Mr. Owen's, confectioner, No. 66, Cornhill. He subsisted entirely on the breast.

'His dimensions, given in the printed hand-bills distributed at the place of exhibition, were those taken when he was eleven months old; his height, then, three feet three inches; his girth round the breast, two feet six inches; round the loins, three feet one inch; round the thigh, one foot ten inches; round the leg, one foot two inches; round the arm, 11½ inches; round the wrist, nine inches. He died about May, 1780.—Robinson's History and Antiquities of Enfield.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—A most extraordinary Anagram, and one of those perhaps not possible to be imitated, is a verse I find in Misson's Voyage in Italy, vol. 2, part 2, p. 676, edit. 1714, 8vo.

Sacrum pinque dobo non macrum sacrificabo.

This at the old cloister of St. Maria Novella, at Florence, was applied to the sacrifices of Abel and Cain. The above is adapted to Abel, but read backward it will produce a Pentameter applicable to Cain, thus:—

Sacrificabo macrum non dobo pinque sacrum.

This, as I said, appears to me to be inimitable, and one may challenge the whole world to produce the like. In the first place it is exceedingly difficult to form a Latin Hexameter, which when read backward will give us a Pentameter.

It will be more difficult to do this and to exhibit it the same time a tolerable sense. But what makes it most wonderful is, that in the third place the sense is well adapted to the different characters of the parties that are supposed to utter, one the Hexameter, and the other the Pentameter, viz. Abel and Cain.

Few persons I believe will choose to spend their time in framing a like gimcrack upon any subject, but I am really of opinion that a man might try a whole year before he would be able to succeed as well as the monk who composed the above line.

PLATO.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—It has often been a matter of surprise to me, that the young men in Manchester who are generally considered to be eager after the arts and sciences, should be totally ignorant of the art of oratory. What can be more pleasing to the ear than to hear our own language spoken purely and fluently. The man who can communicate his views with clearness, precision, and effect, has an evident, great advantage over the person who hesitates and stumbles in discourse, and it is a generally received opinion that oratory is considered to be the second end of our academic labours, of which the first and is, to render us enlightened, useful, and virtuous. The principal means of communicating our ideas are two—speech and writing. The former is the parent of the latter—it is the more important, and its highest efforts are called—oratory. If we consider the very early period at which we began to exercise the faculty of speech, and the frequency with which we exercise it, it must be a subject of surprise that so few excel in oratory. In any enlightened community, you will find numbers who are highly skilled in some particular art or science, to the study of which they did not apply themselves, till they had almost arrived at the age of manhood. Yet with regard to the powers of speech, those powers which the very second year of our existence generally calls into action, the exercise of which goes on at our sports, our studies, our walks, our very meals; and which is never long suspended, except at the hour of refreshing sleep—with regard to those powers how few surpass their fellow creatures of common information and moderate attainments! how very few deserve distinction! how rarely does one attain to eminence!

The causes are various—but one will suffice—it is our neglecting to cultivate the art of speaking—of speaking our own language. We acquire the power of expressing our ideas, almost insensibly—we consider it as a thing that is natural to us; we do not regard it as an art—it is an art—a difficult art—an intricate art—and our ignorance of that circumstance, or our omitting to give it due consideration, is the cause of our deficiency. In the infant, just beginning to articulate, you will observe every inflection that is recognized in the most accurate treatise on elocution. You will observe further, an exact proportion in its several cadences, and a speaking expression in its tones—I say, you will observe these things in almost every infant. Select a dozen of men—men of education—erudition—ask them to read a piece of animated composition—you will be fortunate if you find one in the dozen, that can raise or depress, his voice—inflect or modulate it, as the variety of the subject requires. What has become of the inflections, the cadences, and the modulation of the infant? They have not been exercised—they have been neglected—they have never been put into the hands of the artist, that he might apply them to their proper use—they have been laid aside, spoiled, abused; and, ten to one, they will never be good for any thing.

In my opinion either composition or debating societies are the most rational, useful, and ready way for attaining a knowledge of oratory; surely it must be ascribed to the want of those or to their being improperly conducted, that the young men here fall so far below mediocrity in this polite art. Perhaps another reason is, that the recent party spirit which was so prevalent here a few years ago may have operated against debating societies; but surely there are plenty of subjects without politics or religion, the only articles that could cause dissension or alarm, and I am certain none but grovelling minds would fear the effects in the idea that the knowledge so acquired would be pressed upon the public. It must be allowed that we have all a particle of brains, and where is the man who could calmly bring himself into notoriety for his oratorical powers alone (unless in an official situation)? I cannot think any one would or could so far demean himself. Is it that the taste of this large and populous town is so much forgotten, or is it that it thinks it is not worth acquiring. With regard to composition &c. classes, besides the knowledge acquired from the subjects that come under consideration, we would be able to discriminate more nicely the truth or falsehood of statements made by others, a more noble expansion of the mind would inevitably take place, there would be less rioting and drinking, and the young men in Manchester would feel a more solid and lasting impression from either composition classes or debating societies, than from all their gay evenings spent in folly and dissipation. By your giving this a place in your amusing and instructive work, and if any of your correspondents would be kind enough to favor me with a reason, both will confer a favor on

TICKLE TOBY.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE CEDAR AT ENFIELD.

In the garden of the manor-house is a cedar of Libanus, which was considered one of the finest in the kingdom:

the contents of which, in the year 1770, were as follows:—girt, at the top, three feet seven inches; second girt, seven feet nine inches; third girt, ten feet; and the fourth girt, fourteen feet six inches. The height of the tree was forty-five feet nine inches, but the original height was fifty-three feet nine inches, eight feet of the top having been broken off by a high wind, in the year 1703. The large arm which branched out near the top was three feet nine inches in girt, and several of the boughs were three feet five inches in girt. The branches extended in length from the body of the tree from twenty-eight to forty-five feet, and the contents of the tree (exclusive of the boughs) was about two hundred and ninety-three cubic feet. It was measured in the year 1788, by the late Mr. Liley, and was found to have increased in girt and length of branches. At this time it was a very handsome tree, and continued so till the night of the 5th of November, 1794, when a strong gale from the north-west deprived it of the whole of the upper part, which fell with a tremendous crash, and, in its fall, several of the lower branches were much injured. In 1793, at three feet from the ground, it measured twelve feet in girt; and, in 1815, at one foot six inches from the ground, fifteen feet eight inches.

This fine cedar was destined to be grabbed up by the late Mr. Callaway, soon after he purchased the old palace. The saw-pit was prepared, and the trench already dug round it ready for the axe; but the admirers of the tree, particularly the late Richard Gough, Esq. and Dr. Sherwen, interfered, and, at their request, the tree was spared. This circumstance gave rise to much versification at the time; and there appeared, in the St. James's Chronicle, some high-flown compliments addressed to Mr. Gough, composed with all the irregularity of school-boy genius, which were considered to be at the expense of the other inhabitants of the parish. The lines were signed "Euterpe," to which Mr. Gough replied, under the signature of "Clio," quoting Dryden's "Polyolbion" for a panegyric on Enfield. These gave rise to the following lines, which were signed "Melpomene," and sent to Mr. Gough, but never published:—

Ye sister muses, cease your idle strains;
Oh! cease in sportive lays to sing,
To torture Enfield, or Castalia's plains,
But strike, oh! strike with me the doleful string!

Too much, too much Camdenius hath been prais'd,
Divine Euterpe, in thy glorious lines;
Enough hath Enfield's character been rais'd,
Which now in Clio's sportive numbers shines.

Far other subjects on your labours call,
Far other subjects ask your tuneful aid,—
For lo! the pride of Lebanon must fall—
The stately cedar—in the royal shade.

Not in the vulgar groves such cedars grow,
As erst in Lebanon's most holy land;
But near Eliza's royal dome they shew
The cedar planted by her milk-white hand!

Weep! weep, ye Muses, at the mournful deed,—
Ye Hama-Gedizids, join the plaintive tone;
With mighty Callaway, oh! intercede,—
The fate of lofty Lebanon bemoan.

This tree was planted by Dr. Uvedale: and tradition hands down to us that the plant was brought immediately from Mount Libanus in a portmanteau, probably by one of his scholars.—Robinson's History, &c. of Enfield.

THE SUGAR CANE.

The soils adapted to the sugar-cane are the various rich loams and moulds, and clay with a superstratum of mould. The former are turned up with the hoe, about four inches below the surface of the earth, and formed into ridges, called cane-holes—in the spaces between which (four feet in breadth) the canes are planted. The manure is conveyed by the slaves in baskets, and from twelve to fourteen pounds weight is put into every cane-hole. An easier, and perhaps, for some soils, a still more effectual mode of enriching the fields to be planted, is what is called penning them over—that is, penning or folding the cattle on successive divisions of the land, until the whole field is gone over, at the rate of about 2,000 head of cattle for one acre; the land being forthwith holed and planted on the removal of the pens. Three lengths of the top part of the cane, each having three, four, or more germs, are laid in each hole, with the germs placed sideways, and covered with a thin layer of earth. The lower and middle parts of the cane, when full grown, do not produce shoots, so that nothing is lost; the top of the cane, which alone is fit for planting, being unfit for sugar. The returns of the land are various, according to the soil, seasons, manuring, and, on exhausted lands, the standing of the cane. A plant from a good soil, well manured, will yield four tons of sugar; while what is called a third rate, on an exhausted soil, will not produce half a ton. In six or seven weeks after their being planted, the young cane plants have shot up to about the height of a foot, when they are weeded. They receive three or four subsequent weedings or cleanings, and, as the cane advances in height, the dry leaves are removed from it. Canes planted in November are fit for the mill in fourteen or fifteen months; if planted in May, they are usually cut the succeeding May. The harvest commences at different periods in different districts, the planters being mainly regulated in this by the seasons, or periods of rainy and dry weather. December, January, and February, are the usual times. The canes, when cut down, are tied up into bundles, and conveyed by carts and mules to the mill; where they are passed through iron cylinders, which press out the juice: this is conveyed to the boiling-house, where it is converted into sugar. The molasses is taken to the distilling-house, and, along with the scum from the vessels in which the sugar is boiled, made into rum. The stem of the cane, after being expressed, is dried, and used as fuel for boiling the sugar. The operations in the mill and the boiling-house go on both night and day, the negroes being formed into what are called spells, or divisions (two or three, according to their number), which relieve each other in the nocturnal part of the duty. The getting in of the crops lasts from three to four months.—Stewart's Jamaica.

VARIETIES.

FRANKING LETTERS.—This privilege was first claimed by the members of the House of Commons in the year 1660; and so paltry was the measure thought in those days, that when the question was called for, the speaker, Sir H. Grimstone, declared he was ashamed to put it.

THE BIBLE.—In the year 1274 the price of a small Bible, neatly written, was 39*l.* It is said that the building of two arches of London Bridge cost only 25*l.* being 5*l.* less than a copy of the Bible many years afterwards.

GOOD MARCHING.—A publication has recently appeared in Paris, called "Remarks on the French Infantry." The author seems to be strongly impressed with the truth of Marshal Saxe's maxim, "that the Art of War lies in the legs." Among other anecdotes, he mentions that a great General having asked a young Colonel whether his regiment marched well, and having received for answer, that all the inspecting officers declared that its manoeuvres were admirable, observed, "You misunderstand me; when I ask if a regiment marches well, I mean, can it march at the rate of three leagues an hour?"

WATER IN THE HEAD.—An extraordinary case of hydrocephalus, or water on the brain, is just now exciting the interest of the medical gentlemen of Salisbury. The head of an infant, before any operation was performed, at the age of six (now only seven) months, was of the following astonishing dimensions:—Round the forehead and back part of the head 30 inches, and from ear to ear across the vertex 21 inches; which measurement will be better understood by stating, that the largest circumference of the adult head averages but 22 inches, and from ear to ear but 12; and of a healthy child of six months old the largest circumference averages 16, and from ear to ear 9 inches. The infant, belonging to respectable parents, is under the immediate treatment of one of our surgeons, and is submitted to a novel practice, viz. the removal of the water by degrees, through the means of operation, and at the same time the employment of pressure. The infant has undergone the operation five times, and 110 ounces (nearly seven pints) of water have been removed. The present state of the infant, and the effects of the operations and treatment are such as afford well-grounded hopes that for this disease, considered hitherto hopeless, a remedy has at length been found.

BEDFORD MISSAL.—The following anecdote relates to the library of the late King, now become the property of the public. At the time the Bedford Missal was on sale, with the rest of the Duchess of Portland's collection, the late King sent for his bookseller, and expressed his intention to become the purchaser. The bookseller ventured to submit to his Majesty, that the article in question, as one highly curious, was likely to fetch a high price. "How high?" "Probably, two hundred guineas!" "Two hundred guineas, for a Missal!" exclaimed the Queen, who was present, and lifted up her hands in astonishment. "Well, well," said his Majesty, "I'll have it, still; but since the Queen thinks two hundred guineas so enormous a sum for a Missal, I'll go no further." The bidding for the Royal Library did actually stop at that point; and Mr. Evans carried off the prize by adding three pounds more. The same Missal was afterwards sold, in April 1815, and purchased by the Duke of Marlborough for £687. 15s.

ANECDOTE OF SANTEUIL, A CELEBRATED POET OF LAST CENTURY.—Returning one night to the Abbey of St. Victor, at eleven o'clock, the porter refused to open the door, saying he had orders to admit no one at that hour. After much altercation Santeuil slept a Louis d'or under the door, and he obtained immediate admittance. As soon as he had got in, he pretended he had left a book upon a stone, upon which he had been sitting while he waited for the door opening. The porter animated with the poet's generosity, ran to get the book, and Santeuil shut the door upon him.—Master Peter, who was half naked, knocked in his turn, when Santeuil started the same difficulties as he had done against admitting any one at that time of night, and that he would not disobey the prior. "Ay, but master," said the porter, "you know I let you in very civilly." "And so will I you as civilly," said Santeuil, "if you please—you know the price—is or out is the word, and I will dally no longer." The porter, finding he was like to sleep in the street, half naked, and also ran the risk of losing his place, slipped the piece of gold under the door again, saying, "I thought the poet's money would not stay long with me," and purchased his admittance.

PREMIUM FOR THE PREVENTION OF ACCIDENTS FROM STAGE-COACHES.—The society for the Encouragement of Arts and Manufactures have just offered, among their premiums, one "To any person who shall invent and discover to the Society a method for preventing accidents arising from Stage-coaches; the Gold Medal, of Thirty Guineas. Ample certificates of its efficacy, and a description of the method, with models of the machinery used, to be produced to the society on or before the last Tuesday in February, 1824. The society wish to impress strongly on the public the necessity of turning their attention to the above premium, from the number of accidents that daily occur; and suggest whether they might not, in some degree, be prevented, by an alteration in the manner of placing the luggage."

POLAR SEAS.—Accounts have been received of the progress of the Griper, on board of which Captain Sabine sailed from the Nore, in the month of May last, for the purpose of carrying on the series of observations on the pendulum, in the high latitudes of the Polar seas. They arrived at the North Cape, after a tedious passage, the beginning of June, and proposed to remain at Hammerfest about three weeks. From that place they would go to Spitzbergen, as the second station of observation; and then to the Eastern coast of Greenland, intending to make their way to the most Northern part of that unexplored coast, as far as the obstruction of permanent ice would permit the ship to pass. It is intended to land the instruments for observation at the highest point they should reach in Greenland, and afterwards to navigate down this hitherto almost unknown coast Southwards. On quitting Greenland, they would visit Iceland, and then cross to Drontheim, in Norway, where a fourth series of observations would be completed, previous to their return in the month of November.

A MASTER MANUFACTURER.—A Mr. Hatton, of Duffermline, has had two mice making thread for upwards of twelve months. Each of them twists and reels from 100 to 120 threads every day, Sunday not excepted. To complete this task, the little pedestrian has to run 10½ miles a-day. It lives five weeks upon a half-penny worth of oatmeal at 15d. a peck, and in that time it makes 3850 threads of 25 inches. At this rate the mouse earns 9d. every five weeks, which is a farthing a-day, or 7s. 6d. a-year, and taking off 6d. for board, and allowing 1s. for machinery, a profit of 6s. a-year remains. The same mechanical genius tried the experiment of making a rat perform the like office, but he turned out a mere idler, all Mr. Hatton's ingenuity could not make him attend his work, and the rat mill was necessarily relinquished.

TRANSLATIONS.—Within a short period the following translations from the English have been made into the Polish language: Rasselas, Young's Night Thoughts, Tom Jones, Paradise Regained, Pope's Essay on Man and the Rape of the Lock. Extracts from most of our Essayists, and especially the Spectator, have been published in different periodical works. The Poles already possess a translation of Ossian, which has been multiplied in several editions. Shakespeare is in great vogue; his principal pieces, nearly literally translated, are constantly performed at Warsaw, Wilna, Cracow, and Leopold. The study of the English language is very widely diffused over Poland. In some of the Universities there are professorships of English; several of our modern poets have likewise been translated, and, among others, Lord Byron.

GRAND MISCELLANEOUS CONCERT.—Miss Paton, of Covent Garden Theatre, will in the ensuing week make her debut before the Manchester public in Mr. Renney's Concert. Considering the eclat of this lady's performance and the competition which subsisted between her and Miss M. Tree, we shall be solicitous, (and thank Mr. R. for affording us an opportunity) of judging for and satisfying ourselves. Miss J. Paton and Mr. Sapio are also engaged, and upon the whole we anticipate a delightful treat.

THE DRAMA, ETC.

THEATRE-ROYAL.—On Saturday night the New Play of Nigel, or the Crown Jewels, was produced. The plot, though taken from the novel called the "Fortunes of Nigel," differs from it very considerably, and is stated as follows:—"Lord Dalgarno wishes to possess himself of Nigel's lands, and for this purpose lends him money on a mortgage, through the medium of Skourlie, and at the same time employs the influence of Buckingham to prevent the payment of a large sum due to him from King James. Herriot, however, undertakes his cause with the King; and as the needy monarch has no funds for the repayment, he desires the goldsmith to borrow the money on the crown jewels, for which purpose the latter applies to Trapbois, who gives a receipt for the diamonds, and a promise to procure the gold at an early hour the ensuing day. Nigel is now informed of the snare laid for him by the treachery of his friend, and in the very heat of his passion at this discovery, he meets Dalgarno in the park, just as he is forcibly carrying off Margaret, the niece of Herriot. A rencontre takes place between the two noblemen, and Margaret is saved from her ravisher, but Nigel is forced to seek a refuge in Whitefriars, where chance makes him an inmate of old Trapbois. In the mean time Dalgarno has learnt from his solicitor the result of Herriot's interference, and at Skourlie's suggestion resolves to rob Trapbois of the jewels, that his rival may have no means of redeeming his lands. The old man awakes during their attempt to open his strong box; a struggle ensues, which ends in Dalgarno's strangling him, and taking away the jewels which he finds about his person. The suspicion of this murder is thrown on Nigel, who is now confined in the Tower, whither he is followed by Margaret and Bridget; and in the very moment that Herriot has redeemed his lands, he stands before the King as a murderer. For a time Dalgarno triumphs; but the sudden appearance of Martha Trapbois, who had been absent only to procure the money to redeem the mortgage, proves his innocence, and he is happily wedded to Margaret, while his rival stalks off in a towering passion, but to what purpose the conclusion omits to tell us."

The Skourlie of Mr. W. Farren, and the Trapbois, of Mr. Meadows, exhibited genuine lineaments of knavery and usurious exaction; and the Martha Trapbois of Mrs. Faucit was a most spirited performance.—The other characters were generally well supported.

THE IMPERIAL MAGAZINE AND DR. GREGORY.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I have read with much interest the Memoir of Dr. Gregory, which is inserted in the last number of the Imperial Magazine. It contains, however, several passages which have given me some surprise; and upon two of these passages in particular I shall be glad to make a few remarks in the Iris.

Speaking of "those honours which posterity will award," the writer of the memoir says, that "in the metaphysical department we read the name of Dugald Stewart, in the chemical that of Sir Humphrey Davy, and in the mathematical, holding a conspicuous rank, appears the name of Dr. Olinthus Gregory." This association is really ludicrous, and must, assuredly, be very painful to the Doctor's feelings if he chance to hear of it. It has too much the appearance of burlesque. It furnishes another example of what a man sometimes suffers from the intrusive and injudicious officiousness of those who wish to be thought his friends. I willingly give the biographer full credit for the best intentions. But the Dr. has no claim to the very elevated situation in which it is proposed to place him. He has in several instances, been a useful writer in treating of what was already known; but I am not aware of more than one instance in which he has extended the bounds of science, and that is, on the relation of solid angles, a discovery certainly curious, and formerly thought to be impossible. This discovery does not, by any means, warrant us in placing him at the head of the British Mathematicians. The Doctor's warmest admirers must allow that in inventive genius, which can alone entitle a philosopher to any thing like preeminence, he is far inferior to Ivory, Herschell, Leslie, Woodhouse, and a number of others. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of Dr. Gregory. He is the author of a number of valuable elementary works, which, if they do not exhibit much genius, are of considerable utility. If he does not possess great originality of mind; he has deservedly acquired credit for his exemplary application.

It has given me some concern to see the writer of the memoir attempt to raise the reputation of Dr. Gregory at the expense of that of a superior character. The termination of the Doctor's intercourse with the illustrious Biot, in the severe and dreary recesses of Shetland, is imputed, gratuitously, to the "impetuous disposition," and "national prejudice," of the French philosopher. These are charges which I have reasons for believing are altogether without foundation. The Dr. had, doubtless, good reasons for "abstaining from giving any public exhibition of the unpleasant circumstances which then occurred." But if, from prudential motives, he did not choose to defend himself, when he must have known that strange reports were in circulation upon the subject, it is rather hard for persons, who speak as if they were in the Doctor's confidence, to come forward to traduce one of the most active and inventive philosophers of modern times. Biot is unquestionably the best writer on Philosophical Science, in Europe; and his zeal for the promotion of Science was conspicuously shewn, when the British Mathematicians left him, one after another, to brave and surmount alone, the appalling difficulties which he met with in the bleak and frozen climate of the Shetland Islands. Such a man deserves better of this country, to which in his various works, he has always seemed disposed to do justice, than to be sneakily assailed by unjust and unsupported imputations. The talent and perseverance which M. Biot displayed while, deserted by his associates, he discharged an arduous undertaking, affords an instance of decision of character, which must excite the respect of every ingenuous person. It is hoped, that, if ever he happen to see the silly invective of mortified imbecility, he will not, for a moment, mistake it for the sentiments of the British nation. Their opinion of him has been long since recorded by the eloquent pen of the celebrated Playfair.

Dr. Gregory has many admirers, and I am of the number. They will, I am sure, be glad, as I am, to receive, from a confidential source, the following communication.—"Notwithstanding such incessant labours, and although Dr. Gregory devotes much time to the improvement of apparatus for his lectures on natural philosophy, delivered at the Royal Military Academy, he still meditates other publications. Already has he made preparations for their appearance, having numerous papers which require little more than mere arrangement to prepare them for the public eye. At present we understand he is carrying through the press, an improved edition of the second volume of the Course of Mathematics regularly employed in the Woolwich institution." I am, Sir, yours, &c.

Manchester, 3rd September, 1823.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Your correspondent Tickle Toby expresses his surprise that the young men of Manchester should be totally ignorant of the art of Oratory, and concludes with a wish that some one would give him the reason. This, I think, is very easily done, by simply stating—they have no occasion for it. No attainment can be of sufficient importance for any one to bestow that application and time requisite for its perfection, but what may at the present or at some future period of his life become an object of either honour or interest to himself, or utility to that portion of public society in which he is destined to move. Oratory is a study the most difficult to obtain the mastery of. It is the rarest gift bestowed on man. Such a combination of excellence moral and physical, the adornments of both mind and body requisite to form a great and good orator, so seldom unite in one person, that while we find the pages of history give ample records of taste and genius—while the arts among the ancients, and the sciences among the moderns, produce such numerous candidates for superior fame, a truly great orator is the boast and ornament of only a favoured age. The senate, the bar, and the pulpit are the genial atmospheres where oratory can be displayed with reputation to the speaker and advantage to the hearer; and this country is the only spot where opportunity is given, in two of the three, to expand itself in the fullest charm of brilliancy and lustre; and what a rare avis a good orator is, even with these wide and open fields for the display of prowess, need not be mentioned. Who, then, in a commercial town like this can be expected, and what a waste of time and talent would that young man make who bestows his abilities in learning the art of talking, when his duty imperiously calls him, for the benefit of himself and society, to learn that of acting. In a corporation town that has its little senate, I will allow some pains may be taken to enable its members to deliver their sentiments with fluency and precision, where a topic is to be argued before an assembly of its best and wisest men sitting as a deliberate body; but as our police is constituted, what additional light can oratory produce on the subject of gas, or what flowers of rhetoric are wanted before the Commissioners of house and window duties.

If by oratory your correspondent means the power of conveying the ideas in a plain, simple, concise, and manly method, I do not see any censure this town has a right to submit to, as may be implied by recommending oratory as a study for its youth, more than any other. I have occasionally attended the public meetings here, and have listened with pleasure to the various speakers, and have heard their sentiments given in an open, sincere, and distinct manner, all that is wanted, with no little vis comica, an excellent thing in public speaking, such as would not disgrace any assembly. And the young men may take a good lesson, sufficient for all the purposes that may be required from them, without the aid of debating societies, if they, when opportunity offers, would attend such meetings. Long harangues often tend to elucidate into obscurity, and in many cases this is all they are really designed to do. Men of business learn to talk little and do much; and the wisest regulations are generally made where there is least said upon the subject. Common sense, common integrity, and common ability, form the strongest palladium, for the promotion of common welfare, common security, and common happiness. If, as your correspondent states, the young men of Manchester are considered to be eager after the arts and sciences, I sincerely congratulate both them and the town in such a prospect of future excellence. Hæc studiiæ adolescentæ alunt. The pursuits of such studies in youth adorn and elevate the human mind, they render the possessor eminently useful to his fellow men, and more virtuous, consequently more happy himself; they are valuable in public, delightful in private life, a never-ending source of amusement and enjoyment of the highest order, and confer a rich and abundant harvest of intellectual pleasure to the latest hour of existence. If you think the above worthy a place in the Iris, it is at your service.

ANCIENT WRITINGS AND INKS.

Parliament, it appears, has taken this subject under consideration, and in an examination before a committee of the House of Commons to ascertain whether the plan of engrossing bills might not be abandoned for the common hand,—

Mr. Hewlett, of the Common Pleas, gives it as his opinion that we do not now know how to make ink, as he has observed that the ink of the later records has given way; and, that though in some old records the ink has chipped off, yet there was a bluish tinge left where the ink had been, which enabled them to make it out though the ink was gone: and he thinks if an infusion of oak bark was added to the common ink, it would render it more stable than it is now; he has observed, that the records of the Court of Exchequer are certainly more black, and, consequently, more legible than the others.

Mr. Bailey also gives it as his opinion that the present ink is not half so good as that used a hundred years ago; and says that in the rolls of Chancery there are frequently whole lines in which not more than a few letters are perfect; that the ink for the last hundred years, and from the time of Henry the 8th, has been of a glutinous nature and peels off, which was not the case with respect to the earlier records; for a piece of parchment might be put into water and left for two or three days, and it would not be injured: that it has been tried: that for several years there have been attempts made to wash them with soap and water, which had not the least effect, but that the ink remained brighter and firmer than it was before: that there was more iron used in the ink in former times than there is now, which has eaten more firmly into the substance.

One of the witnesses, Mr. Wm. Tubb, gives the proportions of ingredients used in making the Exchequer ink, which is said to be highly prized.

With regard to writing on parchment, it must be allowed that the above complaints are well-founded; but with respect to writing on paper we have not fallen off, as I do not remember ever to have seen any old writing on paper, of which the ink was of a good black: possibly our forefathers had one sort of ink for parchment and another for paper. It has been observed that the parchment of ancient deeds and records is thicker and stronger than the parchment of the present day, and the ancients might, perhaps, have some other method of preparing it for writing than we have, as rubbing it over with pumice stone or some substance by which the surface should not be much abraded; as ancient deeds and records have generally a smooth and glossy appearance: at all events there cannot be a doubt that the chalk or whitening with which we now prepare the parchment for use, must in a great measure decompose the ink, particularly if it contains any quantity of acid, as may be easily proved by making a trial with the Japan ink of the shops, the menstruum of which is vinegar. Another reason for our falling off may be that we are now more apt to study expedition than durability; and a full bodied durable ink must be a great drawback on expedition, as it generally happens that perfection in one thing is destructive of perfection in another: the necessity of fine and neat writing was in a great measure suspended by the invention of printing.

In the present state of chemical science, it may be expected we can obtain an ink which shall possess the necessary requisites, viz. fluidity, blackness, and durability. One of the above-named witnesses suggests that if government would grant some encouragement, a durable ink might be invented.

Many have turned their attention to the forming a good writing ink, and others to the forming an indelible ink; amongst the former are M. Ribancourt, Van Mons, Dr. Lewis, and Mr. Desormeaux; and amongst the latter are M. Westrumb, M. Bosse, and Mr. Close.

I shall now give the results of some of their endeavours, in the hope that some of our townsmen will turn their attention to the subject; for which I have not either leisure or opportunity, and besides there are many others in whose province it more properly falls.

M. Ribancourt directs eight ounces of Aleppo galls, and four ounces of logwood, to be boiled in twelve pounds of water till the quantity is reduced to one half; when the liquor should be strained through a linen or hair sieve into a proper vessel. Four ounces of sulphate of iron, three ounces of gum-arabic, one ounce of sulphate of copper, and a similar quantity of sugar candy are now to be added: the liquid should be frequently shaken, to facilitate the solution of the salts. As soon as these ingredients are perfectly dissolved, the composition is suffered to subside for 24 hours; when the ink may be decanted from the gross sediment, and preserved for use in glass or stone bottles well corked.

This ink exhibits a purplish black colour in the bottles; but the writing performed with it is said to be of a beautiful black cast, which it retains, unaltered, for a considerable length of time.

Van Mons has observed that the sulphate of iron, when calcined to whiteness, always gives a most beautiful black precipitate. The following is his method: four ounces of galls, two ounces and a half of sulphate of iron calcined to whiteness, and two pints of water. The whole must be left to macerate cold for 24 hours; then add gum-arabic ten drams, and preserve it in a stone jar open, or covered merely with paper.

Mr. Desormeaux, of Spital-fields, who has been in the habit of making large quantities, gives the following directions. In six quarts of water, beer measure, boil four ounces of the best campeachy logwood, chipped very thin across the grain (the boiling may be continued nearly an hour); adding from time to time a little boiling water, to compensate for waste by evaporation. Strain the liquor while hot; suffer it to cool, and make up the quantity equal to five quarts, by the further addition of cold water. To this cold decoction put one pound avoirdupoise weight of blue galls, or 20 oz. of the best galls in sorts, which should be first coarsely bruised, 4 oz. of sulphate of iron calcined to whiteness, half an ounce of the acetate of copper, which should be triturated in a mortar, moistened by a little of the decoction, gradually added till it be brought to the form of a smooth paste, and then thoroughly intermixed with the whole mass. Three ounces of coarse brown sugar, and six ounces of good gum senegal, or arabic, are also to be added; as gum, however, is dear, three or four ounces will be found sufficient, with only one and a half ounce of sugar, unless for particular purposes it is wanted to bear a higher gloss than common.

The following is the recipe for preparing the Exchequer Ink above mentioned, viz.—40 lbs. of galls, 10 lbs. of gum, 9 lbs. of copperas, 45 gallons of rain water.

The following is from Mr. T. Brande's manual of chemistry; finely bruised galls 3 oz.—sulphate of iron, logwood shavings, and gum arabic; of each 1 oz.—vinegar 1 quart: put into a bottle and agitate them occasionally during 12 or 14 days; then allow the coarse parts to settle, and pour off the ink for use.

Dr. Ure of Glasgow objects to the sulphate of copper; as it is apt to injure the penknife, on account of the stronger affinity which the acid contained in it has for the iron of the penknife. He objects also to vinegar as a menstruum, as it softens the pen so much that it requires frequent mending: from both which objections Mr. Desormeaux's recipe, which I decidedly prefer, is free.

M. Westrumb's indelible ink is thus prepared: boil one ounce of brazil wood and a similar quantity of gall nuts in 46 ounces of water till the whole be reduced to 32 ounces or about two pints. This decoction is to be poured while hot upon half an ounce of copperas, or green vitriol; a quarter of an ounce of gum arabic and a similar quantity of white sugar. As soon as perfect solution of these substances has taken place, 1 ounce and a quarter of indigo finely pulverized is to be added; together with three quarters of an ounce of the purest lamp black, previously diluted in 1 ounce of the best brandy. The whole is to be well incorporated; and after it has subsided, M. Westrumb asserts that it will form an ink absolutely indestructible by acids.

M. Bosse gives the following:—1. Boil 1 ounce of brazil wood with 12 ounces of water for a quarter of an hour, add half an ounce of alum: evaporate the whole to 8 ounces, and mix with the liquor 1 ounce of exceedingly soft finely pulverized manganese, mixed up with an ounce of pulverized gum arabic; or,

2. Boil 4 ounces of brazil wood and 3 ounces of coarsely pulverized galls, with 9 ounces of vinegar and as much water, for the space of 8 minutes: in the liquor, after being strained, dissolve 1 ounce and a half of sulphate of iron, and 1 ounce of gum arabic, and then add to the whole a solution of half an ounce of indigo in 1 ounce of concentrated sulphuric acid.

Mr. Close recommends 25 grains of copal in powder dissolved in 200 grains of oil of lavender, by the assistance of gentle heat, and then mixed with 2 grains and a half of lamp black and half a grain of indigo: or, 120 grains of oil of lavender, 17 grains of copal, and 60 grains of vermilion. A little oil of lavender or of turpentine may be added if the ink be found too thick. Mr. Sheldrake suggests, that a mixture of genuine asphaltum dissolved in oil of turpentine, amber, varnish, and lamp black, would be still superior.

Not having tried any of these indelible inks, I am not prepared to give an opinion as to their merits.

LUCY.

It was the close of winter. The snow had departed from the ground, and the frosts were over; already had the grey bushes assumed their infant green, the birds warbled sweet hope, and all nature was starting into existence. It was in this spring, so gay, so promising, that Lucy died; often, my dear friend, have you requested the particulars of the last melancholy scene, but hitherto I have never had the courage to begin. But now, that the phrenzy of despair has subsided into a deep and settled grief, I am more competent to the task: nay, I even feel a kind of melancholy pleasure in brooding over my sorrows, and retracing those times, when all was love, peace, and happiness. You remember that Lucy was in a rapid decline when you left me; day after day she drooped away, her strength wasted, and she was fast waning to an early grave. Yet, in all her health and bloom, never had she looked so lovely; never had I felt myself drawn to her by such tender ties. So soon to lose such innocence and beauty—the thought is distracting.

She knew the state she was in, and she anticipated all, yet she gently soothed my sorrow, and endeavoured to assuage my grief; she did not entertain me with vain hopes of recovery, but she talked of Heaven, and our meeting there, till, in that hope, I almost thought that I could unreluctantly resign her. Too soon was my firmness put to the test.

'Twas a fine evening in the same spring, the day had been beautiful in the extreme, and the sun had just sank in the bosom of the west. The windows were thrown open, and reclining on a sofa near the balcony, lay the expiring Lucy. Little did I know she was so near to heaven as she languishingly admired the delightful scene. Suddenly the wild strain of a distant flute fell upon the ear, then it was silent—again it was distinctly heard, thrilling with the richest melody, till it receded into distance. When the last strain had died away upon the breeze, she sighed—"such," said she, "I have often thought is the music of heaven; often have I heard the touching melody of that flute, and ever has it excited the same ideas; but Francis, I distress you. Exhausted, (for her weakness was now extreme) she dropped into my arms insensible—in agony I called upon her name—again, and again; she at length recovered—but alas

I resume.—The physician and my mother were now in the room, but I could bear the suspense no longer. I stepped out on the balcony; she was not expected to live till morning, for by over-excitement she was much weakened, quiet was her only chance for life. The moon was sailing through the dark clouds, occasionally throwing her pale light on the vale below. How calm, how peaceful was the scene, as though in mockery of my grief—I re-entered the room, Lucy was no more!

The bell tolled, and the procession moved along the dark avenue—all passed as a dream, a dream from which I now awaken.

Such, my friend, is the relation of my sorrow; my decline is fast approaching—I feel I am descending to the grave, there under the same sod the same earth shall receive our bodies, but we shall meet in the regions of the blessed to separate no more. F. M.

LINES TO A LADY.

How sweet the bliss where kindred hearts,
In mutual love and peace agree;
But nought to me that bliss imparts,
Since, Alice! I'm bereft of thee.
When sleep invites my soul to rest,
Imagination bears me to thee;
And in these arms thy heaving breast,
Responsive throbs the whilst I woo thee.
But ah! the morn, and with it care,
Thy fitting form evades my view—
'Twas but a dream—and stern despair
And grief, o'erwhelm again thy

EDRED.

AFTER THE MANNER OF OSSIAN.

The blue hill rises in mist, and damp is the tomb of the hero. He fell beneath the arm of the chief from the mighty waters. The dust of the hero gives fame to the mountain whose blue head bears his bones. The grey stone of his narrow house looks proudly up to heaven, and the clouds shed their dewy tributes as they pass. The tall firs wave their green sadness round him, for ever fresh and young, yet dark and mournful. Lofty as his soul in life, is the tomb of the hero in death.

Sad is the song of woe that moans in the mountain wind. The flowers shrink from it in their loveliness, as it sighs over their drooping heads. Like a dark cloud, it moves heavily along on the tired wings of the winds. 'Tis a song of soul. As the lightning breaks from the sable cloud, it flashes with words of vengeance, when thoughts of his mighty deeds come over the hearts of the mourners.

SONG OF THE MOURNERS.

In battle he was as a rock in the day of tempest, unmoved amidst commotion. His fame was like the snow storm, spreading its whiteness afar: shall it melt away and be as soon forgotten? His love was like the summer wind, breathing freshness and beauty around. He hath fallen in his loveliness and strength, like a young oak struck by the hand of the storm. But the hand that struck shall be withered, like the brown leaves of the woods that dance to the whistling winds. Unburied shall his bones whiten in the blast. No sounds of sorrow shall make music round his narrow house; but the voice of execration shall break on the still ear of night. Peace to thee, fallen hero, peace! Erkwald hath risen in his might to seek the water-chief. He shall lie at thy feet in death, as the foes of thy father's land were wont when might was in thy arm.

Thy love weeps for thee—the fair-haired daughter of Ira weeps. She is lovely in tears, as the white lily of the waters. She moves in beauty, like the mist of the lake in the paleness of the moonlight. She mourns in solitude like the night wind of the far-off cavern. She comes with the harp you loved, to soothe your spirit with her song of sorrow.

ENNA'S LAMENT.

Hearken, oh shade of my beloved—hearken, oh Edred! to my voice. I will tell my sorrows to the harp thou lov'dst, and thy spirit shall joy in my truth. Gently, oh harp, thy strings I touch, for sad is my soul with grief. Thou tremblest at the sorrows of thy mistress. Thou hast sounded to her songs of joy, when her lover drank thy sweet notes in moonlight. Oh give, then, thy saddest strain to her lament, for he is with the sounds that have been, and the forms that have fled—now seen but in the floating mist, and heard in the passing wind; Sweetly comes thy sadness over my soul, like a cloud o'er the weeping moon, when she drops her dewy tears on the graves of the young and lovely. I can sing to thee now of my beloved. He is gone: he is cold as the breath of the northern blast; him I loved as the flower loves the dew. His death to me was like parting the willow from the stream that nourished it. 'Twas like severing twin blossoms that had grown together, and that, parted, must wither. He was dear to me as the dawn to the weary and benighted. His absence was the gloom of night—his presence the brightness of day. Still art thou beloved, even in death, oh Edred! and the woods and caves you joyed to wander in, shall often be awakened by my sighs, and the sound of the harp you loved.—Lit. Chron.

THE HERMIT OF MONGIBELLO.

(From the Battle of the Bridge, a Poem, by S. Maxwell, Esq.)

"Rhodoro call'd to bid me ride,
Where, far on Mongibello's side,
A lonely hermit did abide;
Beneath the forest's darkest shade,
In cavern 'twixt huge hills embay'd;
Forest that seem'd by nature placed
As girdle to the mountain's waist;
Huge hills that rose like hillocks round
The vast wide-based far-spreading mound.

"Near half the night I rapid rode,
When tired I reach'd his wild abode,
Told in brief terms my master's need,
He bade me come where he should lead.
So strange the scene I pass'd with him,
I soon forgot my wearied limb.
Far under ground we went, where ray
Of light was none, from fire or day;
But only such there coldly shone,
As if from rotten wood, or bone,
The moon—a glow-worm—or the spark
Struck from the keel-plough'd sea by dark;
Or rather such as if one glare
Were mix'd of all these cold lights there.

"In spacious subterranean room,
Capp'd by the lofty form of dome,
By viewless chain, hung moon-like ball,
Shedding its ghastly light o'er all.
Things stuff'd of every kind were there,
That live on earth, in sea, and air,
From hugest monsters of the deep,
To smallest tribes that fly and creep.
Of every kind a skeleton;
Each kind of plant, earth, metal, stone;
And every extract art could draw
By restless toil therefrom I saw:
In many colour'd rows, all seen
Glistening beneath the ghastly shewn;
All which, the hermit said, were store,
For works of scientific lore,
Which in these caverns refuge sought,
In times with persecution fraught.

"Then stopping short and turning round;—
—'But thou'rt on other errand bound!
Thy master deems he is betray'd,
And asks my counsel and my aid.
He asks too late, e'en now he lies
Begirt with foes;—perhaps he dies.
Nay more;—disclosing, as he said,
A prostrate form,—'perhaps he's dead!' I look'd;
before me seem'd to lay
My master, stiff and cold as clay.

"Lady, I need not tell of now,
The drops that started on my brow;
How my hair bristled, and how cold
My blood ran; nor boots now be told
What then my mind surmised of guilt.—
My hand was on my faulchion's hilt,—
Mine eye glanced round its mark to find,
When sudden, as if struck stone-blind,
A total darkness o'er me came.
Quench'd was the ball of ghastly flame;
And I did stand as in a trance;
Nor sight, nor sound, to rouse my sense;
But all so still and dark, I thought,
As if I'd been crush'd into nought;
Till sudden, through eight openings wide,
Peer'd gleaming vaults on every side,
Which, far diverging through the gloom,
Branch'd like an ancient catacomb.
Along each vault, on either hand,
A rank of spectres seem'd to stand:
Some robed; some arm'd with shield and spear
And helm; all shedding light so drear,
As 'twere a grand procession show
Assembled by the powers below.
O'er each spear-arm hung brittle-bit;
A fiercer glare was cast from it.
In long perspective all array'd,
Straight as a temple's colonnade
They seem'd to stand, ghost beyond ghost
Far lessening till the sight was lost.

"Lady, I marvel not to spy
The oreless aspect of thine eye;
For, by my faith in holy law,
Myself scarce believed what I saw.
As round my senses dizzy flew,
From avenue to avenue,
At once the branches closing round,
And all again in darkness bound,
Forth, clad in robes of ghastly light,
The hermit stood before my sight.
This more appall'd me than the host;
My tongue cleaved, and my voice was lost;
Till with Heaven's name I strove to arm
Its power against unholy charm."

THE NUNS AND ALE OF CAVERSWELL.

A SKETCH.

CAVERSWELL, ancient Caverswell, the residence of the Cradocks, renowned in romance, of Jervis, famous in maritane story, and esteemed over the east for thy delightful ale and thy beautiful women; I think of thee with reverence and awe. Can the lovers of romance forget that Cradock's lady alone, of all the dames of Arthur's court, were, without suspicion or reproach, the charmed kirtle of chastity; which, by its shrivelling and curling like a November leaf, showed the lightness of Queen Gueniver and her ladies? Can the lovers of beauty forget, that in a later day the lady of George Cradock brought him at a birth, if I read the legendary inscription in the church aright—"a pair-royal of incomparable daughters, Dorothy, Jane, and Mary;" and that, for her sake, the Castle of Caverswell "was beautified even unto beauty," as the same singular authority bears? Or can we forget, that in Caverswell church kneels the devout Countess of old brave St. Vincent—praying in the ripeness of beauty and pride of youth—stamped off in the eternal grace and perpetual loveliness of art—her hands folded over her bosom, and her head bowed down with such an expression of meekness and benevolence as would inspire a preacher—if preachers were not inspired, and keep from slumber a congregation, if the pleasant people of Caverswell ever slept at a sermon? But Caverswell, fair and ancient Caverswell, thou hast other attractions. Thy daughters are passing-fair, with nut-brown locks and hazel eyes; and thy sons love dancing, mirth, minstrelsy, and ale. If thy maidens are fair and excellent—so is thy ale, surpassing all other potations, whether dribbled through a distillery worm, or poured out free and foaming from the mysterious union of hops and barley. It is called ale by the dull and gross peasantry at festivals and bridal—but it is not ale—it is drink for the lesser divinities and mitred divines. The art of brewing it was no happy labour of man's brain—there is a mystery about the manner of its being communicated to earth; it was dropped in a receipt from the moon. It was Staffordshire ale that I once saw two bards drink out of an antique silver flagon—at each alternate quaff their eyes grew brighter, their faces became flushed with a ruddy light resembling a July morn—their forms seemed to dilate into what statues call the heroic standard—at each glut of the divine beverage they had more and more the port of the demi-gods, and there they sat superior to the sons of little men—the dabbles in the blood-royal of the grape—and seemed Posepet beyond the Muse's painting.

Such is the true Caverswell nectar, known among men by the name of Staffordshire ale. I thirst afresh at the remembrance, and long to renew my intercourse with the frothing and foaming flagons which welcomed me into happy little Caverswell. Those who would view this village aright must not go in the company of the moon, as a poet somewhere recommends—let them trust to a less capricious influence than that of a planet—let them wipe the foam of their second flagon from their lips, and then go forth and look on its ladies and on its towers. Ale, like the fairy's eye-salve, will purge the sight of its grossness—things will come in their true shape and native hue—nor will they be deceived by the magic of book or spell which can make

A cobweb on a dungeon wall
Seem tapestry in lordly hall.

Those who admire beauty will love thy maidens; and those who love themselves will drink thy glorious ale, old Staffordshire!

But besides its ale, and its native maidens, Caverswell has other attractions for which it is indebted to Spain and France; there is a refuge for ladies whom unhappy love or devotion has stung, and driven to seclusion and penance. Beneath the church-yard wall, I observed a little plat of greenward, redeeming from a wood, and bestrewn by Nature's lavish and hasty hand with violets and daisies and other flowers of summer. I saw two long narrow ridges—one green and flourishing in its grass and flowers; the other appeared with its turf newly turned, and the flowers had begun to lift afresh their heads and revive. Small crosses of wood stood at the head of the nuns' graves —for such they were—on one the hand of some unbidden but not uninterested villager had written, "alas Julia."—the other no writing had appropriated—it was a plain cross, white and pure. The old castle of Caverswell threw its shadow in the descending sun as far as these two solitary graves. I looked up and beheld many young and beautiful faces at the latticed windows—saw female forms gliding among the trees, and beheld a grave and staid lady looking on me with an eye less of benevolence than suspicion. I left the two graves; and seeking my way to a distant lawn, passed over part of the castle garden-ground. It skirted the margin of a fosse or lake, and was filled with fruit-trees and blossomed shrubs and flowers. Part of it was portioned out into small plots; and here the secluded daughters of devotion amused themselves in sowing and in planting, and sought, in the beauty of the flowers they nursed, some solace for their removal from the pleasant cares and gentle solitudes of domestic life. But the world is not so easily forgot—and a stung spirit is not so readily soothed. A shirt of hair—self-denial—rigid penance—the torture of daily confession—the presence of one who comes to teach suffering rather than pleasure—high walls and the curses of the church, all serve to bring to mind the joy and the gladness they have forsaken. To be a daughter of God—I say it with reference—is less acceptable above and praiseworthy below, than to be the mother of man. To be carried away from a convent, may be the hope of many a sister; and I believe many a homely maiden has been stolen from the sanctity of a cloister, whose charms would never have obtained a husband in the common way of courtship. To overleap a high wall, to overreach the vigilance of the godly—to ascend to a turret window, and from that giddy height bear away a more giddy lady, is altogether very romantic. She can be no common spirit whom the love of relatives consigned to religion and the protection of the saints; and she can be no ordinary beauty for whom we would risk breaking our neck in this world, and the pains of punishment in the next.

While these reflections passed over my mind, I stood on the limit of the little domain within which religious jealousy had penned up so many fair faces and ardent spirits. I leaned over a little gate, and pondered more deeply on the hopes and the passions which were smothered and spell-bound in the cloister. Something as a shadow darkened the greenward beside me. I looked up, and a young lady—tall and slender—attired in black—seated on a small mole, appeared before me. I say appeared, because I almost imagined her a creature of fancy—her air was not of the ladies of this land—she seemed from a far country—for though a dark veil descended over her whole person, it could not conceal her elegant shape, nor lessen much the brightness of two large dark eyes, which from below a white forehead beamed full upon me. We stood for half a minute's space—I with my eyes half averted—at length I thought to address her; but her looks were not on me—I am not sure she even saw me, though I could have caught her bridle. The gate commanded a fine view of groves, and lawns, and enclosures; it might resemble a place in her native land where she had loved to wander—perhaps to meet some one whose looks had influenced her youthful heart and continued to haunt her thoughts. Her mule, accustomed to bear her to this solitary place, stood motionless—she raised herself in her seat—and her mind, overleaping time and place, consecrated the homely groves and grassy lawns of old Caverswell, and made them into the scented pathway and the citron-grove of her native Spain. Her form seemed to dilate with joy; with both hands she raised her veil—and showed me such a face as Correggio saw in his inspirations—a countenance of light and beauty, beaming amid a cloud of sable drapery. The enthusiasm lightened up her face for a moment's space or more—she gave a sigh—her hands dropt gently down—the mule turned slowly, and almost compassionately round, and the fair Nun of Caverswell vanished among the groves.—*Lord. MADAME BULL.

If John Bull be a great object of misrepresentation abroad, Madame Bull has her full share, although she is regarded with less jealous and severe eyes. Every foreigner who has visited the British capital is convinced of the beauty of its women, and I heard a painter, who is an inveterate enemy to the government of England, nay even to the nation collectively, assert that "the British females excelled all those whom he had ever seen;" he even added, that "the women were goddesses, and the children angels," and could not help esteeming both sexes individually. English ladies are certainly seen to most advantage at home; there they shine transcendently as fond wives and tender mothers, as dutiful and affectionate daughters, and hospitable and graceful mistresses of a house and family; there, too, in the higher classes, a little Parisian elegance of dress has a double effect from its rarity, whilst the native simplicity of attire is not rendered unbecomingly by the comparisons of rivals in the arts of the toilette. The young Quaker pleases in her plain, modest, and retiring air and garb, and the fine complexion (as beau sang), so justly praised by strangers, seems to need no ornamenting or tricking out; no rich habits and coquettish airs. The travelled English lady will always captivate, and even she who has not that advantage, will, with beauty and youth, candour and sincerity on her side, have a hold on the traveller's heart; and her obliging efforts to express herself in his language by boarding-school French, or Italian, her extensive accomplishments and education will amuse and be grateful to him in every intercourse of society. Direct the British beauty of all the auxiliaries of trains, boucles, lace, falbalas, flowers and feathers, &c., and her native excellence will stand the test. But the eye may be misled, and the heart may balance when her powerful rival of the opposite shore enters the lists against her in all the recherche, or studied superiority of fashion; with eyes of tender, yet consuming fire, the artillery of which conquer and dazzle at the same time; whose attitudes are symmetrical, whose form often suits its proportions by a thousand allies supplied by high dress; whose silken shoe and delicately turned ankle, seem like the base of a statue which has cost much study to render perfect, or, being otherwise, still strikes and attracts from the many graces flung over it by the hand of taste, and by the manner which comes in so powerfully to the aid of matter; a foot of moderate dimensions pleases in a slipper, which reminds one of that of Cinderella; lips not putting the opening rose to shame, are yet inviting when finished by a smile, and contrasted by the lily of France which peeps from between them.

An ordinary figure gains by its motions being harmonious; youth and sportiveness banish cold calculation, and put to rout the scrutinizing cold examiner. There is method in every thing abroad, even to the management of a lady's fan, to her brushing a butterfly from her forehead, or guarding against a bee about to invade the honey of her lips; all these manoeuvres leave Madame Bull, fair though she be, in the back ground, and exercise the enchantress's wand over the astonished Briton, or other traveller. At the same time, the affectation of the French ladies leans so much towards ease and good-breeding, that it passes sometimes unperceived and almost always uncensured; whilst Madame Bull has certain stern principles, national adherence to stiff proprieties, cold looks and defensive gravity, which astonish without pleasing, and estrange without meriting blame. Madame Bull, too, when she visits the continent, comes not only in all her simplicity, but assumes something not very unlike stupidity from a singularity of appearance, often preserved with the most obstinate tenacity; she so frequently utters the word shocking! that it first terrifies, and next creates ridicule; she cannot feel that relying confidence in the gentlemen of France, so as to dance with them as if she was quite at home, or walk with them with an air of kind acquaintance; she hops very often in the quadrille, and looks like a serjeant's pike in the waltz; she has none of the bounding activity, the elastic lightness, the playful air and countenance, ce doux abandon, of the daughters of Gallia; it rarely occurs to her to clothe her countenance in a half-dress, to arrange a smile for her partner, to delineate an attitude for her vis-a-vis, there is no exquisite yet innocent flirtation allied with the feats of her agility; in a word, she does not seem born for that aimable folie which is a term unknown, or at least not understood by the sister sex of Albion's isle. Her walk is not studied, nor always in harmony with her ensemble; for instance, she may trip in courtly robes, or hobble in a light morning dress; drag a half train in the mire sooner than elevate its border well above the heel, or a little higher; and walk round-shouldered, cat-backed, and half-double, rather than move erectly on, under the apprehension of being "stared at by the men." A Frenchwoman has something of—

"Nor bashful, nor obtrusive"

in her deportment, the play of diffidence grafted on self-confidence, a withdrawing to be followed, a retiring to advance with more effect, the generalship of which beats the

"Malo me Galatea petit"

of Virgil, out of the field.

These angings with the heart are not unknown to the fair of Britain, but they are only practised on great and serious occasions; whilst all these little skirmishings with admiration and desire are brought into play in every incident of social life, by the Paris belle, at the toilet, at the breakfast table, at the banquet, and at the ball; nay even at church, there is no peace for the amateur of the soft sex in France; but in England, neutrality, or a suspension of amatory hostilities may long be observed, and even a non-intercourse bill may be obtained, which the provoking glance of a Parisian Galatea would destroy in a few seconds. The foreign beauty has another and a last advantage over her of domestic growth, it is the talent de plaire, the way to please, not only in the dance and in the other exhibitions of her fair proportions, but, in familiar chit-chat; and whilst Madame Bull is deep read and generally well informed, the light transient flowers of French conversation leave a more pleasing effect, and prepossess the hearer in favour of her who has said so many gay and agreeable things to him;—now, as men rather expect to be delighted than instructed by female converse, Madame Bull comes off second best, and all her study and quotation, her memory, wit, and understanding are wasted on the desert air.

Having said thus much in the way of comparison, it is but justice to add that when Mrs. or Miss Bull do fail to please, it is from a want of attention, not from a want of means; take off the thick black leather shoe, or cumbersome half-boot, and supply its place by the silken buskin, or thin chassure of the French, and the state of affairs is immediately changed; replace the cottage bonnet, like the sombrero of a bravo of Italy or Spain, or the flapped articles of the forts de la Halle (the strong corn-porters), by the smart trioked out hats and bonnets of the rue Vivienne, and other streets filled with milliners, and the countenances of these good ladies will be vastly cleared up; a little manner and a little sprightliness added to this will so improve the picture, that it will be difficult to recognise it; the imitation must, however, be well done, or the portrait will be entirely spoiled.

Ere we take leave of Madame Bull, it must be remembered that this article, which is made (by invidious critics) a mere caricature, is not a being of high life, but rather the inhabitant of Bishopsgate-without, or Bishopsgate-within, the prosperous tradesman's wife of East-cheap or Fleet-street; the travelling companion and partner of ambitious retailers, who must needs take a trip in the steam-packet to Calais or Ostend, or be packed with the other live luggage of a day-coach to Brighton, and there cross to Dieppe. The cheap rate of travelling has given a whet to female curiosity, and Meister Figgins is no longer allowed to view foreign parts without the accompaniment (often inharmonious) of wife and daughter, who just stay long enough in Paris to miscall every thing, and to bring back with them a number of absurdities judiciously gleaned and grafted on the homely stock. Such representations of English dress and manners have doubtless brought them down in the scale of consideration, but the estimate is falsely taken, and I have often wondered at the unfortunate exportations which have produced these ill effects, and which are always regretted by

THE WANDERING HERMIT.

* A French gentleman, viewing a Ptarmigan-like group staring at the Louvre, observed to me, "I am told that you have the most beautiful women in the world in England, but you certainly keep them at home."

SHOOTING.

"The boy thus, when his sparrow's down,
The bird in silence eyes." GAY.

Monday, Sept. 1. 9 A. M.—Took down from back attic my legacy gun, so called because mine under the will of Sir Diggory Drysalt, my maternal uncle. Used by him, with tremendous effect, when a grenadier in Colonel Birch's Loyal London, in the battles of Shad Thames and Primrose-hill. Thought it prudent to ascertain the death of this Gunpowder Percy: drew out the ramrod and thrust it down the barrel; felt a soft substance at bottom, and trembled; screwed up my courage and the soft substance, and found the latter to be a doll's pin cushion, probably pushed in by little Sally. Borrowed Bob's duster and Molly's scowering-paper, and rubbed off the rust. Looked about for a game-bag, and luckily alighted on my uncle's havresack, in which I moreover found seventeen old cartridges. Put on my shooting-dress, viz.—my white hat, my stone-blue coat and velvet collar, my white Marcella waistcoat, my India dimity under ditto, my nankeen trousers, and my ditto gaiters, not forgetting my military boots and brass spurs. Jammed down ramrod till it rang again, to the great terror of Mrs. Swandown, of whom I took leave, singing—

"Adieu, adieu, my only life,
My honour calls me from thee."

Set off, in high spirits, to meet Jack Juniper, Kit Cursitor, and Tom Tiffany, by appointment, at half-past nine, at the Cumberland Arms, opposite St. Luke's Hospital, in the City Road. Saw a poll-parrot at a window in Carpenter's Buildings: longed for a shot, but housemaid too sharp. Terrier puppy barked at a bedstead in Broker's Row: looked round, and found that she had made a point at a bulfinch—cocked and levelled, but broker kept walking to and fro. Arrived at place of appointment without seeing any more game. Found Jack Juniper and Kit Cursitor discussing a plate of biscuits and a couple of glasses of brandy and water. Waited twenty minutes for Tom Tiffany; Jack in the mean while, to pass the time, said he would play "Water parted" with his finger upon the rim of the rummer: could not catch the tune, probably because it was all in one note. Examined our pieces: Kit's wanted a flint, and Jack's look too rusty to go, though he pulled till he nearly sprained his fore-finger. Borrowed some oil, with three wasps in it, of the barmaid, and got a flint from a bald pavier in the road. Rang the bell to pay, when who should turn up but Tom Tiffany, in high dudgeon: back up, like the half-moon at Lower Holloway. Told us his brother Sam had walked off with the family fowling-pieces across Shoulder of Mutton Fields, to slaughter snipes in Hackney brook. Asked Landlord if he could lend us a gun, but he had nothing but a horse-pistol. Hobson's choice, so Tom had nothing to do but to take it. Too short to bring down the pheasants, but quite long enough to do for the little birds.

10 A. M.—Marched up the City Road singing—

"By dawn to the downs we repair"

Looked sharp to the right and left, and saw a hen and two chickens pecking under a wheelbarrow on the road side. Jack Juniper seized the three dogs by the collar that they might not run in and frighten the game. Kit and Tom stole upon tip-toe to within six yards of the barrow, when the Tally-ho Paddington coach sent hen and chickens scampering into a front garden in Pleasant Row. Swore that Tally-ho should never see another eighteen-pence of my money. Halted to rest ourselves upon the bridge on the Regent's Canal. Looked over the parapet and pointed our guns downward to nab the sea-gulls as they came through the arch. Saw something red steal out: took it for a pheasant, and cocked: proved to be a bargeman's cap: grounded arms again, and saw him steer his vessel into a sort of water pond. Asked baker's boy about it: boy said it was in the lock, and that the bank on the other side was the key. Threatened to shoot him if he gave me any more of his sance, kept an eye on barge, and saw it begin to sink. Wondered at the coolness of the Father Red-op, who walked from stern to stern, smoking his pipe as if nothing was the matter. Kit Cursitor said they had scuttled it on purpose to chouse the underwriters, and that he had known the captain of a Dutch schooner hanged for similar practices. Kit talked of advising the underwriters to defend the action, and pay the premium into court: when lo and behold the barge took a lower level and slid off through the water-gate. Strolled on to Sadler's Wells, and halted at a lamp post to read play-bills. Betted Jack Juniper a shilling that he would not hit the words "Water dead" at ten yards off:—fired, and lodged two shots in the W. Stood for ten minutes looking into the New River, and counting the straws that floated down it, and now and then a child's paper-bomb by way of a change. Tom Tiffany choked a boy's hoop-stick into the stream—black poodle jumped in after it, and brought it out, wagging his tail—shook his coat and splashed my nankeens;—thought of calling Tom to account for it, but did not like the looks of his horse pistol.

11 A. M.—Pushed our guns under an old woman's wheelbarrow, and started a Tom cat—game made for Pentonville, we following—fired my piece, and brought him down in the chapel-yard—looked about for churchwarden to borrow keys—luckily, Deputy Dewlap's funeral just entered at South gate: followed in the wake of mourners, picked up cat and popped him into Cursitor's blue bag. Trotted on to Islington, swerved to the right, and entered fields at the back of Cannon-bury-house: saw five strange-looking birds trying to hide themselves in a glass case. All four fired: Tom's pistol flashed in the pan, but the guns went off: down went the birds, and up ran a tall fellow in a blue apron, swearing that we should pay for shooting his stuffed birds. Found to our surprise that they were dead before we came near them. Man in blue apron asked for our license, but Lawyer Kit gave it as his opinion that none was legally requisite to shoot a dead bird. Subscribed for a purse of nine and sixpence, to quiet the proprietor, and resolved to be more cautious in future.

12 M.—Strolled up Highbury-place, wondering at the beauty of the gentlemen's seats on our right, which lay so thick that you could not push a brick between: charmingly contiguous to the city: nothing wanting but a speaking-trumpet to ask the news at Baston's. Heard a rumbling in our rear: looked round, and beheld the Highbury coach, which stopped alongside of us, and let loose a woman from the inside and a boy from the box. Woman with luggage enough to stock the Barnet van. Saw her give a canary-bird in charge to the housemaid: loitered about premises, and in about two minutes saw the cage stowed on the dresser of the kitchen: prepped down area: half-cocked uncle's legacy, but could not get rid of confounded cook chopping parsley in the window. Scrambled over five-barred gate to join my companions, who had made a short cut for Holloway: obstructed by a dry ditch; took a run to leap it; forgot my spurs, which caught in each other and sent me on my hands and knees on the opposite side of the gap. Piece went off in my fall, and killed a duck. Crammed the defunct into my havresack, and came up with my cronies close to the turnpike. They took the pathway, but I followed the Bedford coach through the gate. Stopped by gate-keeper, who demanded three half-pence: would not pay, and referred it to Lawyer Kit, who gave it in favour of gate-keeper, pointing to the board upon which rate of tolls was printed, viz. "For every horse, mule, or ass, three half-pence." Tossed down the coppers and walked on. Halted at corner of Duval's Lane: drove of geese: called a council of war: Jack Juniper offered the driver two shillings to let him fire among the flock: bargain made: Jack let fly, and missed: geese set up a general hiss, and Kit advised us to discontinue the action.

1 P. M.—Turned down a green lane on our left, thinking that the game on the high road might be too wild. Drove a gander before us, holding out our guns in a slanting direction, while Tom Tiffany with his horse pistol kept the dogs at bay. Looked over our shoulders, and we found ourselves out of view from the road, fired a volley. All missed: gander screamed, and was making past us back to the highway, when, with admirable presence of mind, I knocked him on the head with the butt end of my piece. Gave him a thump each to secure ourselves of his demise, and crammed him into Kit's blue bag, which he filled choke full, like a bill in Chancery.

2 P. M.—Steered on towards Pancras, wondering at the romantic beauties that met us at every turning : caught a peep at the Small-pox Hospital, and longed for a pop at a patient. Put up a couple of gipsies and a donkey : recovered arms just in time : had my fortune told, viz. that I should stand upon some boards that would slip from under me : walked back to Kit for a solution : could make neither head nor tail of it : resolved to ask the exciseman at the club : determined to make a knot in my handkerchief as a memorandum, and found gipsies had eased me of my yellow Barcelona. Walked back to shoot them for the larceny, but found, as Kit expressed it, the writ returned non est inventus. Arrived at Holywell Mount : read printed notice, "It is lawful to shoot rubbish here," took the hint, fired, and blew Jerry Bentham off a book-stall.

3 P. M.—Dinner at the Adam and Eve, Camden Town. Pigeon-pie at top, and lamb-chops at bottom. Tom Tiffany in the chair, and I deputy. Asked Tom for a piece of the pie : carving-knife slipped, and in went his fist through the top crust, penetrated the pigeon, and stuck in the beefsteak sod at the base. "Now your head's in," said Jack Juniper, "I'll thank you for some of that pie." Tom wiped the gravy from his wristband, and did not seem to relish the joke, but all the rest of us laughed ready to kill ourselves. Asked the waiter if he had any ginger beer : answered "Yes, Sir," and rushed out, retreating instantly with a stone bottle. Began to loosen wire : bottle hissed and spit like a roasting apple : all looked on in awful silence : at length out boomed the cork and hit Tom Tiffany on the bridge of his nose : Tom cocked his pistol to return his adversary's fire : but the other bawling out "Coming, Sir," bolted through the door like lightning : poured out foaming liquor into a glass, meaning to take a delicious draught, and found that I had swallowed a concern, in which vinegar, brickdust, and soapuds, were the working partners.

4 P. M.—Prowled round the brick-fields near the Newington-road, to start birds that love a warm climate. Saw a hopping raven with its left wing clipped : went up within a yard of it and brought it down : clapped the black game into my havresack, and told a milk-maid that the brood came over from Norway every autumn. Eyed Deputy Firkin's apple-tree that hung over the New River : felt very desirous of bringing down a leash of pippins, but saw a little man in black on the watch. Jack Juniper shut both his eyes and pulled his trigger : down dropt the man : all took to our heels, with our heads full of the new drop. At length says Lawyer Kit, "Let's go back and get him an apothecary ; if he dies after that, it will be only felo-de-se." Back we stole, in sad tribulation, and found to our great relief that Jack had shot a scarecrow. Tom changed trousers with the deceased, his own being a little the worse for wear : Canonbury clock began to toll, and we made the best of our way towards the Shepherd and Shepherdess, firing in the air to take the chance of whatever might be flying that way. Saw a fine turkey under a wicker enclosure : rammed down cartridge : presented and pulled trigger : no effects : remembered Gargle's prescription as to pills—

"If one won't do,
Why, then, take two :"

and rammed down another cartridge ; still no effects : ditto with four more : at last bang off went my musket : thought there was an end of the world : fell senseless upon my back, and when I opened my eyes found Tom Turpentine smacking my palms with an old shoe, taken from an adjoining dust heap, and Jack Juniper pouring water into my mouth taken from an adjoining ditch.

5 P. M.—Felt much soreness about my left shoulder, and determined to poach no more upon Finsbury Manor. Climbed up an Islington coach : took a seat on the box, and put my fire-arms between my legs and my bag in the boot. Descended at the back of the 'Change, crossed into Lombard-street, and, having arrived safe and sound in Bush-lane, gave Molly the game to dress for supper, and walked up stairs to drink a comfortable dish of tea with Mrs. Swandown.—New Month Mag.

SONNETS.

III.

How all things breathe of loneliness! the flowers,
Like timid birds, seem shrinking half afraid

From human notice, as they had displayed
Their delicate loveliness thro' summer hours,
But to their gentle sisters mid these bowers,—
In unperturbed beauty! the dim glade
Slumbering beneath the quiet air in shade,
Seems sacred to the tutelary powers
Of silent contemplation and deep peace!—
I breathe a purer air, lifting the heart
To deeper, tenderer thoughts of human kind,—
And hopes of better times, which 'mid the press
Of thronging crowds, were "combined and confined"
Mid stifling toil and dark self-seeking art!

IV.

TO — COTTAGE.

Oh! thou dear spot that com'st before my eyes,
Amidst the throng of men, like dreams of heaven
To the e'er tortured spirit, thou wast giv'n
Unto my boyish hours, to harmonize
My soul with nature's sweet serenities ;
And now with all thy winding slopes and dells,
Green coverts, sparkling streams, and sylvan cells,—
(Where eve came on me with a sweet surprise
As I have wandered conning some deep tale
Or song of elder days—) thou still pour'st forth
New freshness to my heart in thoughts of thee,
And kindest up my cheek and brow, all pale
With dreary task work, while my boyish mirth,
And youthful thoughts return with their old glee!

V.

How dainty sweet it is to lie at ease
In the deep herbage, 'neath a moving shade
Of murmuring boughs, that flutter overhead,—
Fanned by the rich breath of the languishing breeze,
And revelling in dainty fantasies,
That fit in fine accession to the eye,
Like delicate clouds across the summer sky
Tinted with rosy light, and by degrees,
To sink, half conscious, to embalm'd sleep,
That laps the spirit in voluptuous dreams,
And melts the heart to deeper tenderness,
As o'er us an entrancing vesper gleams,
Showering its thrilling glances sweet and deep,
And steeping the full soul in draughts of bliss.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

LISBON IN THE SPRING OF 1823.

Persons in general, very erroneously, suppose that the characters of the two nations inhabiting the western peninsula of Europe are essentially the same, whereas there exists a decided difference between them ; and in early times their political constitutions as little resembled each other as their character. In Spain the female sex enjoy unrestricted freedom ; in Portugal they are subjected to great restraint. The Spaniards are particularly hospitable ; the Portuguese exhibit a jealous reserve towards strangers. In Spain smoking is a universal custom ; while the Portuguese reject it as a filthy practice, and only strangers are seen to smoke in their coffee-houses. The Portuguese, on the contrary, are universally addicted to snuff-taking, a habit in which the Spaniard rarely indulges. The Spaniard is attached to foreigners ; but in Lisbon it is very difficult for a stranger to be admitted into respectable society. Notwithstanding, too, the close resemblance between the two languages, the names of all public tribunals, political offices, and of almost every article of daily life, are entirely different. Even in their cookery there is a marked difference between the two nations ; and an Englishman or German would assign the preference, in this respect, to the Portuguese. Other examples might, if necessary, be adduced to prove the striking contrariety of customs and habits between the two countries, although they are, in this respect, usually confounded together.

Society, in the best meaning of the word, can hardly be said to exist in Portugal, where it is the custom for the two sexes to keep as much asunder as possible, the ladies assembling together in one apartment, while the gentlemen occupy another ; and where a formal etiquette acts as a perpetual restraint upon all intellectual converse, and thus precludes any desire for a more liberal education. What are termed the foreigners' balls, which are supported by subscribers, who are mostly English, French, or Germans, afford the most agreeable society to be met with in this city. The apartments are excellent, and furnished with much taste. There is, besides, no invidious distinction of rank ; while there prevails an easy, polished tone, and an urbanity of manners that render this a most delightful place of rendezvous.

The Portuguese language being here universally spoken, in every circle, its acquisition, which is by no means easy, on account of its peculiar nasal sounds, becomes indispensable to a foreigner, and the want of a due knowledge of it may induce him to judge even more unfavourably of Portuguese society than it in fact deserves. Once acquired, however, the language is found to be peculiarly rich, and admirably adapted to the lighter graces of conversation. Another circumstance which tends to alienate the affections of the stranger, and which probably has arisen from the cautious reserve of the Portuguese, is, that the foreigners residing in this city form, as it were, a little republic of themselves, attached to their own habits, and caring little to adopt any of the national customs. They distinguish themselves by their hospitality, and reject that studied etiquette which the Portuguese so anxiously keep up. Their language, too, is a mixture of half a dozen different tongues. All this tends to draw a line of demarcation between the foreigner and the native, to keep them apart, and to render the access to good society among the Portuguese very difficult for a stranger.

If among the upper classes social intercourse does not appear to be conducted upon the best footing, the lower orders of the people are not better provided for, with respect to amusements, if we except the ball-fights. These have lately been attempted to be suppressed : a motion to this effect was made in the Cortes, but this national amusement found too many advocates ; and the people are still permitted to retain this their favourite, and, indeed, sole diversion. The late Fernandez Thomas spoke warmly in their defence, and began his speech by observing that he had grown up in the midst of bulls. It must be confessed that this sport is not so sanguinary and cruel as it is in Spain, the horns of the animals being tipped with rump knobs, which render a blow less dangerous. These fights are continued during the whole summer, and the profits arising from them go to defray the expenses of different hospitals ; thus the sin of them is in some respect covered by charity.

An English populace runs mad every six or seven years at a general election, or on some occasion of general political interest ; here the multitude annually get on a hobby of nearly the same breed, although of a dissimilar appellation, it being called the Carnival. The strong excitation, the pleasure of being mad, the enthusiasm, the phrensy, the mental inebriety, seen not much unlike in either instance. We should say that this last after a powerful mental and animal stimulus was natural to man, under every modification of education, of circumstances, or of political constitution. Whether it vents itself in war, or politics, or gaming, in saturnalia, elections, or carnivals, it is still the same ; and happy is it for the peace of society when it contents itself with assuming a shape so safe and undignified as the tom-foolery of the last mentioned. During the three last days of the carnival, the populace appear absolutely frantic with folly. It is dangerous to venture into the streets, for no one can pass with impunity through the showers of eggs, oranges, and other missiles, that assail the passenger on every side. Rank seems to lay aside its dignity ; female delicacy its reserve : for the balconies are filled with ladies, who eagerly sprinkle the passers-by with copious aspersions of water. This exquisite foolery is succeeded by a farce of graver description. It is now the season of periodical devotion ; and even they who have lived all the year entirely regardless of moral duties and restraints, exhibit all the external forms of repentance. It is by no means rare to see penitents of this description going barefooted, or kneeling in the streets ; and during processions (of which there is now no end) they throw themselves frantically in the dirt ; and by such acts of unseemliness and violation of decorum do these wretched bigots think to atone for their violation of morality.

After Easter, every one who can afford it, returns into the country, mostly in the immediate vicinity of the city, where there are a great number of villas. The most pleasant season is that which precedes June, for after that time the drought and the dust, which covers the fields, give to the landscape an arid and dismal appearance, very remote from the verdure which clothes our English lawns. Cintra, which is not more than a dozen miles from the capital, is a very favourite spot. It abounds in romantic scenery, and it is here that the country-houses of the most wealthy inhabitants are situated. It is the custom to make excursions thither on asses, the roads all around Lisbon being so ragged and bad, that it is unsafe to travel in any kind of vehicle.

These rural parties of pleasure are conducted in so expensive a style, that the middling class of citizens cannot indulge in them, and having no amusements within the city, they live a very retired and uniform life. Occasions, however, sometimes occur, on which the most frugal break through their usual habits of economy. About two years ago, the image of some saint was discovered in a cavern, not far from Lisbon, and it was instantly reported through the whole city, that it had the power of working miracles, as efficaciously as any miracle-working had ever been known to do before, or even as his Highness of Hohenlohe. The image shed tears and exuded sweat; doubtless to the great edification of the multitude. But as neither crying nor sweating, entertaining as it might be, was found to be of any particular benefit, it began to work miracles more to some purpose, and cured both the blind and the lame. All Lisbon flocked to it in crowds: every soul must forthwith to witness the prodigy; and there was no family, however poor, that did not make a pilgrimage to Nossa Senhora do Buraco. Greater eagerness could not have been manifested by the good people of Lisbon, had they all been setting out direct to Heaven. There was no end of journeying and pilgrimages and presents, which latter, in a short time, amounted to an immense sum. It would be an uncharitable and most heretical supposition to imagine that any of these devotees were influenced by any other motive than piety; or to hint that they were instigated by any of that feeling which, in our less devout country, drives people in crowds to races, reviews, or any of those meetings so agreeable to the gregarious nature of man. Events, however, now and then took place, not very indicative of devotion; so, in order to prevent further scandal, the government ordered Nossa Senhora to remove her quarters, and she was accordingly conducted in a solemn procession to the Cathedral of Lisbon, where she remains to this very hour an object of devout admiration to the multitude who daily visit her.

To pass from these religious amusements to others of a more—or, if our readers please, of a less profane nature, it cannot help striking us that the Portuguese have nothing which can be considered as a national theatre; for, with the exception of wretched scurrilous farces, nearly all their pieces are translations. Such being the state of their drama, it is not to be wondered at if the performers are not very excellent, or held in much esteem. These people are mostly tradesmen: the hero of the evening is probably some shoemaker, or other mechanic; it is easy, therefore, to form some notion of the dignity with which the tragic buskin is worn: as for the ladies, a glance at their faces is sufficient to convince the beholder that they are votaries of other deities besides Melpomene and Thalia. The degraded state of the Portuguese theatre is the more to be regretted, as the people are naturally lively, and are endowed with no ordinary talent for mimicry and imitation: but, in a country where the expression of public opinion is studiously repressed, whatever shape it may assume, we ought not to be greatly surprised at finding that the drama also experiences the injurious effects of this intolerant system. The theatre of San Carlos, where the Italian company performs, is that which is most fashionably attended.

CREOLE LADIES.

The white females of the West Indies are generally rather of a more slender form than the European woman. Their complexion, which they are peculiarly careful to preserve, is either a pure white or bronzette, with but little or none of the bloom of the rose, which, to a stranger, has rather a sickly appearance at first, though the impression gradually wears off. Their features are sweet and regular—their eyes rather expressive than sparkling—their voices soft and pleasing—their whole air and looks tender, gentle, and feminine. With the appearance of languor and indolence, are active and animated on occasion, particularly when dancing, an amusement of which they are particularly fond, and in which they display a natural ease, gracefulness, and agility, which surprise and delight a stranger. They are fond of music, and there are few who have not an intuitive taste for it, and fine voices. They are accused of excessive indolence; and outré examples of this are given by those whose object is to exhibit them to ridicule. These exaggerations, like all others of a national description, savour more of caricature than truth. The heat of the climate, joined to the still habits of a sedentary life, naturally beget a languor, listlessness, and disposition to self-indulgence, to which the females of more northern climates are strangers. The daily loll in bed before dinner, is so gratifying a relaxation, that it has become almost as necessary as their nightly repose.

To sum up, in few words, the character of the creole ladies,—they are so excessively fond of pleasure and amusements, that they would be glad if the whole texture of human life were formed of nothing else; balls in particular are their great delight: they are averse to whatever requires much mental or bodily exertion, dancing excepted; reading they do not care much about, except to fill up an idle hour; and diligence, industry, and economy, cannot be said to be among the number of their virtues.—Stewart's Jamaica.

"Despise not the value of things that are small."—

Old Ballad.

On Shrove-Tuesday last, I'll tell you what pass'd
In a neighbouring gentleman's kitchen,
Where pancakes were making with eggs and with bacon,
As good as e'er cut off a flitchen.
The cook-maid she makes four lusty pancakes,
For William, her fav'r ite gard'ner:
"Pray be quick with your four," cries Jack, "and make more
For William won't let me go partner."
Being sparing of lard, the pan's bottom she marr'd,
In making the last of Will's four;
So she said, "Pry'the, John, run and borrow a pan,
Or else I can't make any more."
Jack soon got a pan, but he found by his span,
That the first was more wide than the latter,
This being a foot o'er, whereas, that before
Was three inches more, and a quarter.
Jack cries, "Don't be cosen, but make half a dozen,
For the pan is much less than before."
Says Will, "For a crown, and I'll put 'he cash down,
Your six will be more than my four."
"Tis done," says brisk Jack, and his crown he did stake,
So both of them sent for a gauger:
The dimensions he takes of all their pancakes,
To determine this important wager:
He found by his stick, they were equally thick,
So one of Will's cakes he did take,
Which he straight cut in twain, twelve one fifth the chord-line,
And gave the less piece unto Jack:
"To the best of my skill," says the gauger, "this will Make both your shares equal and true."
Will swore that he ly'd; so the point to decide,
They refer themselves, Sirs, unto you.
Then pray give your answers, as soon as you can, Sirs,
For what with their quarrels and jars,
We're afraid of some murder, for no day goes over,
But they fight and are cover'd with scars.

FRENCH MANUFACTURES.

"In traversing the different apartments of the Louvre we are, it must be confessed, dazzled. Gold and silver shine at every part, and in a thousand different forms. Silk and the downy Cachemeres, captivate us with their brilliant hues. What a profusion of crystal, bronze and porcelain—what magnificence, what enchantment; it seems as if a nation of Fairies had brought its tribute to a nation of Kings. But are there only Kings in France? Does all the nation ride in carriages, or walk on carpets? Does all France drink champagne out of cut glass, and coffee out of porcelain cups, resplendent with gold?—Alas, no! These enjoyments are reserved for a few of her children, and it is for the infant of fortune that industry exerts all its powers and works all its miracles. In fact, however, the most useful miracles are the best, and we have always regarded with particular veneration him who with five loaves and a few small fishes, appeased the hunger of a famishing multitude. We are on the same principle disposed to grant our esteem to him, who reduced by 20 sous the price of a pair of shoes.

"However great may be the progress which industry has made in France since the Revolution, and that progress has been immense, it still feels the direction it received in the France of other days, when a single class possessed the whole wealth of the nation: it disposed also of all the labour, and labour was in consequence directed more to gratify whims than to supply real wants. Many whims yet remain, of which the Louvre furnishes too many proofs, but these whims do not exclusively domineer over the whole society, and a more equal distribution of wealth, without bringing with it the desire for luxury, has created a wish for increased conveniences, and to produce them has called forth an immense quantity of industry. This is, at least, a consoling truth, which no one will be disposed to contest or deny.

"The people who make chandeliers, who gild bronze, or who bake porcelain, will probably regard us as Vandals or Hotentots, but they will be in the wrong. After what is useful, we know nothing better than what is agreeable. We are not insensible to splendour, to riches, and to elegance. The eyes have wants as well as the stomach, though they are not so imperious. We would therefore do justice to these brilliant superfluities, but in their place, preserving their proper rank, and not allowing them to dazzle our reason, or make us forget the story of Mr. Fox and the knives."

BIRTH-DAY VERSES.

Translated from the Dutch of Tollens.

Restless Time! who ne'er abidest,
Driver! who life's chariot guidest
O'er dark hills and vales that smile,
Let me, let me breathe awhile:
Whither dost thou hasten? say!—
Driver, but an instant stay.

What a viewless distance thou,
Still untried, hast travell'd now;
Never tarrying—rest unheeding—
Over thorns and rocks speeding,
Through lone places unforeseen—
Cliff and vast abyss between.

Five and twenty years thou'st pass'd,
Thundering on uncheck'd and fast,
And, though tempests burst around,
Stall nor stay thy coursers found:
I am dizzy—faint—oppress'd—
Driver! for one moment rest.

Swifter than the lightning flies
All things vanish from my eyes;
All that rose so brightly o'er me
Like pale mist-wreaths fade before me;
Every spot my glance can find
Thy impatience leaves behind.

Yesterday thy wild steeds flew
O'er a spot where roses grew:
These I sought to gather blindly,
But thou hurried'st on unkindly:
Fairest buds I trampled, lo!—
And but grasp'd the naked thorn.

Driver, turn thee quickly back
On the self-same beaten track:
I, of late, so much neglected,
Lost—forgot—contemn'd—rejected—
That I still each scene would trace—
Slacken thy bewildering pace!

Dost thou thus impetuous drive,
That thou sooner may'st arrive
Safe within the hallow'd fens
Where delight—where rest commences?
Where then dost thou respite crave?
All make answer: "At the Grave."

There, alas! and only there,
Through the storms that rend the air,
Doth the rugged pathway bend;
There all palms and sorrows end;
There repose's goal is won—
Driver! ride, in God's name, on.

VARIETIES.

NORTHERN EXPEDITION.—The Plymouth Gazette states that the Lord Exmouth, Captain Barrett, on the 4th ult., in lat. 44° 2' N., long. 27° W. picked up a bottle covered with barnacles, and containing the following inclosure:—"North Polar Expedition, Jan. 7, 1822.—This bottle was sent adrift in the North Polar Sea, by the officers of the North Polar Expedition, being then frozen up five degrees West of Melville Island.—All well."

A frog was caught in the East Croft, Nottingham, on Tuesday week, having five legs. The fifth leg grew from the middle of the throat or breast.

THE DIVING-BELL.—Jerom observes, that Alexander entered into a colympia, and descended to the bottom of the ocean, in order to know the difference of the sea; upon which passage Vossius observes, that it had a window of glass or some other matter. Divers, in the time of Aristotle, used a kind of kettle, which enabled them to continue longer under water. The first diving-bell was merely a large kettle, and the experiment made by the Greeks, its pretended inventors, in 1538, was apparently only its first appearance in Europe. A diving machine, not a bell, was invented by Mr. John Dethbridge, who died 1759.

ARABIC ALLEGORY.—A French translation, with notes, by M. Garcin de Tassy, has just been published at Paris, of "The Birds and the Flowers," an Arabic moral allegory, by Azzeddin Elmocaddesi; one of the most enthusiastic members of the mystical sect of the Sofys. The object of it is to inculcate an ardent love of the Divine Being; and for that purpose, the author gives to every object of creation, in succession, a tongue; in order that it may vent its ecstasy in the language of adoration. The work abounds with poetical beauty; and the translator's notes are very interesting.

THEATRICAL EXPENSES.—The expenses of the larger theatres of London are known to be enormous. Those of Drury-lane and Covent-garden exceed 200l. per night. In 1765, those of Drury-lane were less than 70l. a night. The company consisted of about 160 performers, among whom were names of high celebrity. Garrick was at the head of the company, with a salary per night of 2l. 15s. 6d. Mr. Yates (the famous Othello) and his wife, 3l. 6s. 8d. Palmer and his wife, 2l. King (the celebrated Sir Peter Teazle and Lord Ogleby) 1l. 6s. 8d. Parsons (the famous comedian) 1l. 6s. 8d. Mrs. Cibber, 2l. 10s. Mrs. Pritchard, 2l. 6s. 8d. Mrs. Clive, 1l. 15s. Miss Pope (the first of chambermaids) 13s. 4d. Signor Gueslinelli (chief singer) 1l. 3s. 4d. Signor Grimaldi and wife (chief dancers) 1l.

MARGAT'S ASCENT AT PARIS.—This aeronaut took his departure from the Champ de Mars on Sunday the 17th inst. at a quarter before nine in the evening. The air was calm, and the coloured lamps (which formed a crown) below the balloon, permitted the spectators to follow it with their eyes for a long time. Arrived in the upper regions, M. Margat experienced an intense cold, the gas in dilating left a humidity which soon converted into ice, and which gave the aeronaut much trouble in managing the valve. He succeeded, however, in overcoming this obstacle, and proceeded without accident through a very thick fog to the Forest of Villers-Coterets, in the commune of Fleury, twenty-five leagues from Paris. At midnight he effected his descent, and found himself perched upon a tree, which served as a base for his wandering edifice. There M. Margat passed the night, notwithstanding the rain, which fell in abundance. The astonishment may be conceived of the Sieur Debary, keeper to the Duke of Orleans, when at four in the morning, on going his round, he perceived at the top of a tree our aerial voyager and his immense baggage. M. Margat praises the conduct of this keeper, from whom he received every kind of aid; he was also very well received by the Mayor of Fleury, by the Curé, and by all the inhabitants of the village, who flocked to see him.

NUMBER OF THE KNOWN SPECIES OF ORGANIZED BEINGS.—From the collections in the Paris Museums, M. Humboldt estimates (Ann. de Chimie, xvi.) the known species of plants at 56,000, and those of animals at 51,000; among which, 44,000 insects, 4,000 birds, 700 reptiles, and 500 mammalia. In Europe live about 400 species of birds, 80 mammalia, and 30 reptiles; and on the opposite southern zone on the Cape, we find likewise almost five times more birds than mammalia. Towards the equator, the proportion of birds, and particularly of reptiles, increases considerably. However, according to Cuvier's enumeration of fossil animals, it appears that in ancient periods the globe was inhabited much more by mammalia than birds.

WATERSPOUT.—Saturday the 23d ult. the town and neighbourhood of Padidam were thrown into consternation by the appearance of a very large waterspout. When first seen, it seemed to have risen from clouds which were gathering thick round Hamilton: soon after it assumed a more terrific appearance, and veered to the north-west. In this quarter it displayed every symptom of immediate explosion, but suddenly made a rapid circuit to the west. In its passage, the noise which it created represented the distant roar of the sea on a rocky shore; but as it continued to ascend, the tone was altered, and resembled more the compressed discharge of steam from a boiler. The revolutions which it made in its transit were awfully grand; and its attractive faculties of re-uniting the volumes of mist which issued from its side were beyond description beautiful. After repeated ascents and descents, it varied its form with astonishing rapidity; at one period its longitudinal extent must have been very considerable, and in the next moment, the point, which left no more than eighty yards from itself to the earth, was embosomed in the mass. It continued these transmutations for an hour, and then was buried in the clouds. Immediately on its disappearance, the atmosphere became densely dark, and the most vivid lightning and tremendous thunder that has been heard in the neighbourhood this many years ensued.—Blackburn Mail.

POWERS OF MEMORY.—John Van Muller, a native of Switzerland, and author of a history of his native country, and a posthumous work on universal history, was a man of uncommon powers of memory. "He possessed," says Madame de Stael, "a mass of erudition altogether unparalleled: his acquisitions of this kind actually inspired awe in those who witnessed their display. It is difficult to conceive how the head of one man could contain a whole world of occurrences and dates. The six thousand years of authentic history were perfectly arranged in his memory; and his studies had been so accurate that his impressions remained as vivid as though he had been a living witness of the events. Switzerland does not contain a village or noble family whose history was not perfectly familiar to him. On one occasion he was requested, in order to decide a wager, to repeat the pedigree of the Sovereign Counts of Bugey; he performed the task immediately, but was not quite certain whether one individual of the series had been a regent or a sovereign in his own right; and he seriously reproached himself for this defect of memory."

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

EVENING DRESS.

Dress of lemon-colour crepe lisse: the corsage made to fit the shape, and ornamented with five rouleaus of satin of the same colour; broad corded satin band round the waist: in front are seven corded rings or circlelets, through which rise seven leaves, each composed of several small folds of satin, and terminated with a folded satin knot; palmated corded bow behind. Short full sleeve, crossed by satin French bands confined by knots into squares, and having bouffants of folded satin round the centre of the sleeve, which is finished with a corded satin band, edged with fine blond lace, the same as the tucker. The skirt is decorated with a satin corded diamond trimming, each diamond cut across, and a plaited bouffant introduced, concealing the division, and fastening the corner of the next diamond: broad hem at the bottom of the skirt. The hair in full curls, and parted in front, confined by a wreath of anemones and convolvulus, and mixed with small white marabouts in front and on the right side. Necklace, earrings, and bracelets of turquoise and amber. Lace scarf. White kid gloves and white satin shoes.

THE DRAMA.

THEATRE-ROYAL.—On Saturday evening the musical play of Rob Roy was performed to one of the most brilliant and crowded audiences we ever witnessed in this theatre; the overflow may, in great measure, be attributed to Mr. Salter's re-appearance, although that delightful vocalist Miss M. Tree, was a chief attraction. Mr. Salter, on his entre, was most enthusiastically greeted from all parts of the house; and (notwithstanding the fatigue of travelling from Birmingham on that day) his representation of the daring outlaw, Rob Roy, was sustained with his usual spirit and discrimination. Mr. Farren, as Baillie Nichol Jarvie, excited much laughter; but being entirely destitute of the Scotch accent, he is evidently not at home in the character. We have nothing to say for either Mr. Melrose's singing or acting, he is very deficient in both.—Mr. Dildar's Rashleigh was very creditable; in his performances generally we are highly pleased with his improvements, and, by continued attention, we may venture to assure him of considerable distinction.—Mrs. Fanci is an excellent representative of Helen Macgregor; her deportment is dignified and energetic, and her voice, although not powerful, is distinct and commanding.—On Miss M. Tree's singing eulogium is superfluous—her different songs were given in her best style; particularly "Bid me Discourse," and "Rose d'Auvergne," which were loudly and deservedly enquired.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Grotius on calling shall have his request complied with.

R. T. S. has at all studied the point we esteem—criticism.—He is too austere and abstruse; and rather metaphysical.

Criticos must reconsider the subject, it may be materially improved.

TO "THE FRIEND."

SIR,—As from your own account you are advanced in years, and consequently well acquainted with men and manners, it is to be hoped that the undertaking in which you have embarked will fully succeed, and that your strictures on the vices, follies, and levities of the age, will soon work a complete and thorough reformation. It was with no small degree of pleasure that I perused your first number, in which you declare your intentions, and I waited with intenseness of anxiety for the appearance of your subsequent essays. The acute and sensible observations contained in them, have not abated the warmth of expectation, but rather given additional proof of your capability to fill the office of Censor with credit to yourself, and benefit to society.

I have much pleasure, Sir, in accepting the invitation that you hold out for assistance, and in throwing together a few reflections on a certain prevalent weakness, requesting at the same time, that you will make them the subject of your early consideration, and oblige the public with your more lengthened observations.

Among the various subjects treated upon by those who have undertaken to improve and instruct mankind,—who have imposed upon themselves the task of censuring the vices, and ridiculing the follies of the age, perhaps there is none more deserving of complaint, and against which less has been directed, than pedantry. Whether authors have been apprehensive that the laws which they lay down for the correction and conduct of others, might aptly be applied to themselves; that the keenness of satire, and the force of ridicule might be returned with redoubled power; or that it is a folly in which few only indulge, because that few aspire to an eminence of station, or strive to shine in the lettered world; whatever be the reason, it is apparent that this parade of learning has either entirely escaped animadversion, or been touched upon in an oblique and cursory manner.

It would indeed require a nicety of discrimination, and a perspicacity which few possess, to discover the exact point at which pedantry begins, and to fix its definite and precise bounds. What would by one man be considered an elegance, force, and justness of expression, might by another be condemned as an unnecessary and vain show of words. But without troubling ourselves to ascertain its precise limitations, without subjecting ourselves to the liability of error by drawing too fine a line, there remains a sufficiency of opportunity whereon to ground complaint.

Youth is the season of life in which it behoves us to keep a strict and constant guard over ourselves, to be mindful that in our transition from academic shades into the busy world, we evince not a self-sufficiency and conceit in our behaviour,—that we blazon not forth our acquirements, or make an open and ostentatious display of erudition. Considerable extent of allowance, and great mitigation of censure, are undoubtedly due to the man, who has spent his whole life in the closet, whose head has grown silvery-white with no other companions than his books, should he occasionally indulge in a display of knowledge, or should he in the quiet of the study, have contracted a peevish, dictatorial, and fastidious deportment. Whilst an excuse may, in some measure, be pleaded for those who have advanced in age, and who, by deep research and profound meditation, have rendered themselves competent to enlighten the world; nothing can be said in support and justification of that pedantic behaviour, in which too many young men of the present day, scruple not to indulge.

Bob Vain is a youth of this description, who plumes himself on the immensity of information, which, he thinks, he possesses, and who is constantly finding opportunities to exhibit it. Scarcely arrived at man's estate, and the down yet visible on his chin, he shrinks not from the herculean labour, but assumes to himself the office of instructor, and kindly obliges the community with his sage and sapient lucubrations, through the medium of the public prints. Did he confine himself to insert them privately in the publications of the day, without filling the ears of all around, with panegyrics on the beauties of his productions, it might perhaps be borne with, since all would then be at liberty either to peruse or pass them by unnoticed. But fearful that the elegance of his composition might escape unregarded among the heterogeneous mass of a newspaper; or if perused, his readers might not be qualified to appreciate the force and chasteness of his diction, and the newness and originality of thought, it is his constant employment for some time prior to publication, to pester his friends and acquaintance, by reading to them the darling effusions of his brain, and illustrating the various passages of brilliancy by occasional remarks.

An exuberance of language, and an overloading of common conversation with hard and unnecessary words—an affectedness in pronunciation, with a pomposity of manner, and a peculiarity of emphasis, are among the more prominent characteristics of this pretended philomath. Grammatical errors, however not unfrequently escape his lips, though he is amazingly quick in detecting the like in others, and equally imprudent in pointing them out.

That natural desire in man to exalt, and crown himself with the wreath of Fame, seems to have taken full possession of his breast, though perhaps the means he employs to twine the laurel round his brow—that is, of detracting from the abilities of others—is not the purest and most justifiable. Much policy is notwithstanding evinced in such conduct, since from the utter impossibility of ever rising to celebrity himself, he would soon be lost in the shade of his superiors, did he not continually prune their bays, by the language of detraction.

Hoping as a Friend to society, you will not suffer yourself to remain in idleness, but pen an essay in condemnation of such characters, and place them in a light best calculated to expose their deformity,

I am, &c.

BIOGRAPHY.

ROBERT BLOOMFIELD.

If ever there were a poet of whom it might be said (and it was said of him) 'that the fields were his study, nature was his book,' that poet was Robert Bloomfield, whose 'Farmer's Boy,' displayed the most artless manners, yet a taste which no cultivation could have improved, and exhibited genius which placed him at one single step in the first rank of living poets.

That an unlettered unpatronized rustic should thus at once burst into the full sunshine of fame, is a circumstance very rare in the annals of literature, which record so many efforts of stifled genius; we have said unpatronized, but Bloomfield had a patron, and a warm one too, though his talent had reached its maturity, or at least nearly approached it, before his patron knew him.

Robert Bloomfield was born in 1766, in the county of Suffolk. He was one of six children of a tailor in middling circumstances, who was not able to give him more than a common education, for the acquirement of which he was indebted to his mother, who kept a school, and gave him all the instruction she was enabled to bestow. He learned to read as soon as he could speak, and his mother, having lost her husband remarried when Bloomfield was not more than seven years old. At the age of eleven he was obliged to accept the menial office of a farmer's boy, to attend the workmen in the field. In the intervals of his labours that native genius which sooner or later bursts the bonds of slavery, led him to peruse such books as came within his reach, and whatever newspapers he could obtain: even at that early age he wrote a small poem, which he sent for insertion to the editor of the 'London Magazine,' and had the pleasure of seeing it in print.

When he was thirteen years old, Bloomfield was sent to an elder brother in London, a shoemaker, where he was taught the gentle craft. In the shop where his brother worked, there were several journeymen, and young Bloomfield was often employed to read the newspaper, or any literary work they had procured, (and no class of mechanics we believe, are better read than shoemakers;) the journeymen contributing something towards his wages while he thus neglected his work.

He next turned his attention to poetry during the hours of relaxation from toil, and composed many pieces, even in the midst of his occupation; he had also a taste for music, playing very decently on the violin; his imagination, however, was heated with the fine descriptions which he had read in the poets of celebrity, particularly Thomson; and, disengaged from the bustle and care of a city, he planned and executed his 'Farmer's Boy,' a work which, as a descriptive poem, possesses original genius, and a happy facility in composition.

To Capel Loft, an amiable but somewhat eccentric individual, Bloomfield was indebted for his first introduction to the public. The manuscript of the 'Farmer's Boy,' written in a common school copy-book, was forwarded to that gentleman, and he introduced the poet and his book to Messrs. Verner and Hood, who, to the honour of the profession of booksellers, behaved liberally to the young poet. As soon as his first publication appeared, that truly great and good nobleman, the late Duke of Grafton, allowed him a gratuity of a shilling a-day, and the present duke generously continued it.

About two years after his appearance as an author, the Duke of Grafton appointed him under-sealer in the Seal Office; but his health still declining, he was forced to relinquish it.

The "Farmer's Boy," was revised, and prepared for the press by Mr. Lofft, who printed it at his own expense, and wrote the preface. On its first appearance it was highly approved of, and passed through many editions in a very short time; it fully established the claim of the author to the title of poet, and stamped his name with the honour of genius.

Bloomfield afterwards worked some years at his trade (shoemaking). He also made Æolian harps, which many generous friends gave him a good price for, and this was a great assistance to him; but that cold and heartless disease, the dropsy, gained on him. The doctors say it was a liver complaint.

He removed many years ago into Bedfordshire, in hopes the country air might be beneficial. In his latter years he has been unable to work, and nearly blind from his frequent and violent head-aches. To his bodily sufferings were added embarrassments. The generosity of his friends and the public was kindly exerted in his behalf some years since; but, in his last days, his distresses accumulated upon him: he is, however, mercifully released from all his troubles.

To insure a house and home to his aged and revered mother and her husband, he kindly bought a cottage (his birth-place,) gave it a new roof which cost him 50*l.*, and gave the old folks their living in it. His mother died twenty years ago; his good old father-in-law died two years since. He then hoped to assist himself by the sale of his cottage. In this hour of greatest need, he sank into the grave, nor lived to receive one shilling!

Religion, practical religion, enabled him to bear up against the ills of life without a murmur! It was this made his life a lesson of morality to those who knew him best. This gave him that placid cheerfulness which attended him through life.

Bloomfield's constitution, naturally weak, had of late years become alarmingly impaired, every fresh attack left him still weaker, and he died on the 19th of August last, at Bedfordshire, in his 57th year.

Speaking of the comparative merits of Bloomfield and Burns, rurally estimated, the editor of the "Lyre of Love," says—"Burns was the Bloomfield of Scotland; Bloomfield is the Burns of England. Both were alike found, by the Muse, at the plough; both delighted to sing the loves and joys of their native plains; and both have obtained the reputation and dignity of poets."

Of all Bloomfield's published works no volume has alone so much interest as his "Wild Flowers," which was dedicated to his only son, Charles. "There can be no harm in telling the world," observes the poet in his dedication, "that I hope these Wild Flowers will be productive of sweets of the worldly kind; for your unfortunate lameness, should it never be removed, may preclude you from procuring comforts which might otherwise have fallen to your share. What a blessing, what an unspeakable satisfaction, would it be to know that the Ballads, the Ploughman's Stories, and the Broken Crutch of your father would eventually contribute to lighten your steps in manhood: and make your own crutch, through life, rather a memorial of affection than an object of sorrow!"

The poet's last production is entitled "Hazelwood Hall," a village drama, in three acts; and the preface is dated from the place of his dissolution, so recently as the 12th of April last.

Poor Bloomfield has left a widow and four children, in what circumstances we almost fear to ask; but they belong to the country, and ought to have national protection.

M. GARNERIN, THE AERONAUT.

M. Garnerin, the aeronaut, died a few days ago, in Paris. About a week before, he had a sudden stroke of apoplexy in the Theatre du Jardin Beaujon, in consequence of which he let go the rope of the curtain, which was in his hand, and the curtain fell on his head and severely wounded him. From the effects of this blow he never recovered.

M. Garnerin, though perhaps not the most scientific, was one of the most adventurous aeronauts that ever dared

'With wings not given to man attempt the air.'

He was the one who first made the experiment of descending in a parachute, and the British metropolis saw, with fear and astonishment, a daring individual at an immeasurable distance from the earth, separating himself from the hazardous balloon to take the chance of reaching the ground in safety by an untried experiment. This event took place on the 2d of September, 1802, from an inclosure near North Audley Street. At six o'clock the cords of the balloon were cut, and the balloon rapidly mounted to a great height. After hovering seven or eight minutes in the upper regions of the atmosphere, he meditated a descent in his parachute. Well might he be supposed to linger there in dread suspense, and to 'look a while

Pondering on his voyage; for no narrow frith
He had to cross.
He views the breadth, and without longer pause,
Downright into the world's first region throws
His flight precipitant, and wings with ease
Through the pure marble air, his oblique way'"

M. Garnerin in his account of this descent, says, 'I measured with my eye the vast space which separated me from the rest of the human race. I felt my courage confirmed by the certainty of my combinations being just. I then took out my knife, and with a hand firm, from a conscience void of reproach, and which had never been lifted against any one but in the field of victory, I cut the cord: my balloon rose, and I felt myself precipitated with a velocity which was checked by the sudden unfolding of my parachute. I saw that all my calculations were just, and my mind remained calm and serene. I endeavoured to modulate my gravitation; and the oscillation which I experienced, increased in proportion as I approached the breeze that blows in the middle regions: nearly ten minutes had elapsed, and I felt that the more time I took in descending, the safer I could reach the ground. At length I perceived thousands of persons, some on horseback and others on foot, following me. I came near the earth, and after one bound I landed, and quitted the parachute without shock or accident.'

According to M. Garnerin's calculation, he had been to the height of 4154 French feet. The balloon fell on the next day near Farnham, in Surrey.

'These wild and wailing winds can bode no good;
Their husband voices whisper in my ear
Of things unsanctified and strange.....
.....dark spirits are abroad.'

THE MAGIC RIVER.

It must, I think, have been in the November of 1783 that my occasions called me into the West of England, and, having accomplished the chief object of my journey, I was anxious to reach the little town of Bishop's Cleeve, which lay at but a few miles' distance, where my friend R—— had for some years resided, and to whom I had long promised a visit. Some little matters detained me until late in the afternoon, and I was half inclined, from my ignorance of the country, and the way lying, as I was informed, through cross-roads and some private fields (no unusual thing in those parts), to postpone it until the morrow; but the consideration of losing the intervening time, and the utter destitution of all society and entertainment, deterred me from remaining, and I accordingly started, about five o'clock, in the confident expectation of being soon comfortably seated by a good fire, and with those from whom many years had sundered me. The day had been gloomy and lowering, and promised little gratification in the ride; but my mind was too fixedly directed to the welcome reception I should receive, to be disturbed by the thought of a few hours' unpleasant travelling. The road was indeed most uninviting, and the current of my ideas continually broken by the obstacles which it interposed to my progress. Sometimes the lanes were nearly impassable, by the deep ruts formed by heavy waggon, and the soil, soft and clayey, was rendered almost liquid by the action of the late rains upon the surface, and not unfrequently terminated in quantities of muddy water, of whose depth or danger I could of course form no conjecture. At others, my course would be impeded by gates and hurdles, the rude fastenings of which might have defied all ingenuity to unravel; and the prostration of half a score of trees, now and then afforded a variety to the monotony of all around, most refreshing to the jaded spirits of both man and horse. My anxiety to get quit of this rascally route, was redoubled by the fall of large drops of rain, and the thunder, slight and distant as it was, which, at intervals, rolled above. Indeed, the constant moaning of the wind, as it passed through the tree-branches and scattered the yellow leaves that had withered upon them—the imaginable desolation of the surrounding country—the rapid increase of darkness—and the absence of every living creature, gave a savage wildness to the scene, and generated a melancholy and miserable depression to my feelings, over which all the energy of my faculties failed to obtain a mastery.

I had proceeded in this state for upwards of two hours, uncertain how far I was right in the selection of the track, and with no human-being near, to whom I could apply for guidance, when the rain began to descend with some violence; and, from the aspect of the clouds, I had little to hope in the way of a speedy cessation. I therefore thought it advisable to gain some point of shelter, until it should have, in some degree, subsided, and I fortunately gained a barn, or rather shed, the dilapidated state of which held forth, however, but slight refuge in case of elementary contention.

Oppressed and harrassed and anxious as I was to proceed, yet, with the storm increasing every moment in frightful vehemence, the pouring rain, the barking and tumultuous thunder which began to roar above me, and the lightning incessantly streaming and crackling through the heavens and the earth, it would have been madness to brave it, and it must, I am positively evident, have been three hours that I remained in this state of bodily assault and mental agitation, before the raging warfare of nature relaxed from its fearful force. It may readily enough be conceived that I availed myself of the first moment of comparative quiet, to push forward in all hazards and at all consequences, upon the desperate conviction that any change of situation must be for the better. The night was intensely dark, and my chance course was alone perceptible by the flashes of light which casually gleamed over the wretched scene; but these, at length, became more and more inconstant in their successes, and then gradually sank into long intervals of darkness, of which, from the previous sun-like extremity of light, gave to my excited mind the idea that I was enveloped in a palpable blackness. The prospect of passing such a night in such a place, made me truly heart-sick, and induced, by its bleakness, a distressing apathy, from which I was unable to arouse myself. I had strained my sight so much in the endeavours to penetrate the distance for some house or cottage, whither I might direct my course, that the slightest exertion of my eye filled it with optical illusions, and stars and meteors were continually floating and darting every where before me; this, at length, became so painful, that I was compelled to resign myself to the consequences in which chance might involve me. How long or in what direction I thus wandered I knew not; but to me it appeared that the hours—but of hours I could form no conception—that the night would have lasted for ever.

I now felt that my horse was entering upon a deep descent, and, from the caution of its paces, I experienced a good deal of alarm; my imagination figuring forth a hundred different dangers, which my reason had no possible means of dissipating. The animal would, every now and then, stand still, as if to deliberate upon the next step, and as I had thrown the bridle upon its neck, my apprehensions were fearfully augmented by its frequent stoppages; but, as my own hand was incapable of guiding it with any degree of security, I chose rather wholly to rest upon his instinct, than to trust to my own, for reasoning was out of the question. After a while, the horse again stood still, and I found, by gently pressing its sides, that it was inclined to remain so. I therefore called out with all the strength of my lungs, weakened by many a loud cry before, and was somewhat startled, after a momentary interval, by a powerful and distinct repetition of my voice, occasioned by a neighbouring echo: in the irritated mood of my mind, I could not help feeling a little agitated, but this was soon quelled, by the appearance of a low faint light, moving very slowly within the casement of a small cottage, apparently at but a few yards distance. I scarcely believed that so slight a cause could have produced so powerful an emotion, but I never before, nor have since, from any circumstances, experienced so strong and delighted an excitement of the mind as that little glimmer then effected. I eagerly dismounted, and after groping my way towards the place whence the light had issued, succeeded in finding the door; I discovered it to be unlatched, and pressed it open, but I found the interior in darkness. I again solicited assistance and shelter from its inmates, but received no answer.

(To be concluded in our next.)

TO EMMA.

A little cot beside the hill
Where slowly purls a limpid stream;
And where the lark sang loud and shrill,
Sweet Emma! was the fairest seen.

A robin to her dwelling came,
To pick the crumbs she for him laid;—
To him the lover did complain,
And gain'd the little warbler's aid.

The pretty bird before her door,
Began his doleful tale to utter;
With frantic bounds he cross'd the floor,
And round her chair began to flutter!

In tender accents then she said,
"Come! robin, to my bosom come!
No more the chilly winter dread;
No longer through the forest roam.

Enough! straight to the youth impart,
The tidings he but waits to prove,
He has possession of my heart,
My heart already his by love!

The happy lover cross'd the mead,
And o'er the dark moor bent his way:
And phmy flocks in sky and shade,
Beguid'd his steps with harmony.

Till by the bank, where gently flows
A willow brook—that turns a mill;
The favour'd lover blithely goes
And gains the cottage—near the hill.

THE CLOAKS.

The following tale is from a work by M. Loeve Veimars, entitled Les Manteaux. The scene is laid in Germany, and the story opens with the election of a magistrate of the little city of Birling. Full of his new dignity he repairs to his home, where he acquaints his patient wife, to whom he is in the habit of playing the tyrant, with the accession to his importance. His old friend, Waldau, the town-clerk, comes to ask him if he has any commands for Felsenbourg, the seat of the administration, whither he is about to repair. The new councillor requests him to deliver a letter to his younger brother, Maurice, who had quitted his home suddenly, and of whom he has heard nothing until very recently, and who has now applied to him for a share of their father's property, or some pecuniary assistance. The answer of the elder brother is at once unsatisfactory and unfeeling: he tells him that their parents died without any fortune, and concludes with a sneer at his youthful irregularities. The councillor's amiable spouse is affected by her husband's cruelty; Waldau's dress is more consistent with his scanty means than adapted to the inclemency of the weather, and she expresses a hope that his travelling costume is a warmer one.

"Alas! no," replies Waldau; "I had a cloak, but I have given it to my grandmother, who is confined to her arm-chair with the gout, and I am in truth setting off like the prodigal son."

"Dear Philip," said Marie to her husband, in a supplicating tone, "lend him your's."

"Mine!" replied the councillor; "indeed I cannot; but my late father's is somewhere up stairs, and I will look it out for you, Waldau."

Marie blushed at her husband's selfishness. "It is old, indeed," said she, "but it is large and stout. There is nothing splendid about it, Waldau; it is simple and useful, like its former possessor; and I beseech you, when you shall see our brother Maurice, give it to him in my name. It may be useful to him, notwithstanding its homely appearance; at all events, while it must recall to Maurice's recollection the memory of his father, it may also bring him wise reflections."

She bids him also tell Maurice how much she feels for him, and regrets that she is unable to offer him any assistance. Waldau wraps himself in the cloak, and proceeds to Felsenbourg, which he reaches, but not without being overturned on the road. He is rather hurt by his fall, but not so much as to prevent his repairing immediately to find Maurice.

The evening was somewhat advanced, and the streets of the city, very different from those of the obscure but peaceful town in which Waldau dwelt, were crowded still with passengers on horseback and on foot. Waldau observed directly before him a portico well lighted, over which he saw inscribed, in large characters, "The Palace of Felsenbourg." He entered with some timidity, and looked around for some one who might direct him in this vast building, when a young man, passing close by him, attracted his attention. He was clothed in a court-dress glittering with embroidery, and held in his hand the hat of a noble, adorned with large white plumes. The old town-clerk drew himself up hastily, but who can describe his surprise when he saw, in the half glance which his awe permitted him to cast upon this person, that he was the banished son, his early friend; in short, Maurice himself? Waldau was petrified with astonishment: could he believe his eyes, or did they abuse him? He wished to speak, but the words died upon his lips: all that he could do was to follow with his eyes this unexpected figure.

When he recovered the use of his faculties, the object who had deprived of them was no longer before him; but he saw him, as he withdrew beneath the shadows of the columns, by the splendour of his garments, the gems on which glittered beneath the lamps which filled the vault. A little man dressed in black now approached, and dispelled the ideas which were bewildering his brain. "Will you be so obliging," he said to this person, "as to tell me the name of the gentleman who passed just now?"

"It is Mr. Wiesel."

"It is Maurice, then! Good heavens! but tell me what part does he play here?"

"A very important part, sir; nothing less than that of the prince's confidant," replied the little man gravely, and with a low bow.

The honest old man is overjoyed, and, without pressing his inquiries any further, he writes in all haste to the councillor to inform him of his brother's good fortune. Upon the receipt of the letter the elder Wiesel sets out for Felsenbourg, frightened to death lest Waldau should have delivered the unkind epistle, which he now wishes he had never written. Poor Waldau is, in the mean time, suffering from the effects of his fall; and, on the day following his arrival, he finds himself unable to rise from his bed. To crown his misfortunes, his money is exhausted; and, relying upon the generosity of Maurice's temper, and never doubting that the prince's confidant is well able to assist him, he writes to him for a small loan, requests an introduction to the minister, and his interest in procuring the remission of a tax. Maurice hastens to him immediately, and, after the first congratulations are over, the following conversation ensues:

"To speak seriously, my dear Waldau," said Maurice, "your request for money distresses me, because I am not in a situation to comply with it; but, as to your other request, I have laughed heartily at it. That I should introduce you to the minister! that I should procure the remission of a tax! pray for whom do you take me?"

"For whom? Good Heaven!" replied the old man, cursing in his heart all courtiers and their impudence; "why for the favorite of his highness, for his Jonathan, for the elect of the tribe, the primus a rege."

"My poor friend," said Maurice, "is more ill than I thought; and the joy I feel at meeting him again is damped at this discovery. It must be the fever, dear Waldau, which has thus troubled your judgment."

"Oh, yes," said Waldau, "I suppose so: agri somnia," said Waldau, bitterly. "It was one of those delusions which a fever works upon sick brains that I beheld yesterday traversing the palace of Felsenbourg to go to the court; it was in a delirium that I beheld him shining in gold and jewels, gemmis atque auris."

"I going to the court?"

"You, or who else is the prince's favourite?"

"The prince's favourite! Dear Waldau, am I to laugh or to weep at these extravagances?"

"Auri sacra fames, the thirst of wealth will soon render you incapable of doing either the one or the other."

"How can you thus deceive yourself?"

"He deceived himself too, then—the little man in black, who followed the glittering Wiesel under the portico of the palace."

"Ha, ha, what charming simplicity!" cried Maurice, laughing heartily. "Still the same honest, excellent, innocent Waldau.—I a courtier, I a favourite! this is indeed an everlasting joke. Know, then, my poor credulous friend, that I am a member of a strolling company who are engaged to play in the hotel of the Count of Felsenbourg. I played yesterday the part of the Confidant in the new piece; and the little man in black, of whom you speak, is the head tailor, who had just been fitting me with a coat of scarlet serge, covered with tinsel and spangles, and to which habit I am indebted for the respect with which you have overwhelmed me."

"God bless me!" cried Waldau, "and are you then a player?"

"A player, it is true, but of the Prince's company; and, I swear to you, vanity apart, not one of the worst."

"Then am I ruined—totally undone," ejaculated the town clerk; the councillor will certainly kill me."

Maurice ceased to laugh when he saw the terror of Waldau. He soon saw his brother's letter, which lay upon the table, and, opening it, found not only that Pierre was the same, but that his last hope—the share of his father's fortune—was for ever gone. He was burdened with debts, the payment of which could no longer be postponed. "Ah! my Louisa—ah, my promised happiness—farewell," cried he, mournfully.

This Louisa, of whom Maurice spoke, was the preserving angel of an infirm mother and two sisters, for whom she procured, by her own exertions, the necessities of life. The obscure chamber which they occupied was near that of the player: and they frequently saw each other, and the innocence of the young girl, her simple candour, and the boyish good temper of Maurice, soon gave rise to a tender and reciprocal feeling. Poverty has at least this good effect, that it breaks down some of those obstacles which beset the more exalted ranks. Wiesel soon became the assiduous and indispensable friend of the family. Louisa, daily more attracted by his amiable character, and charmed by the frankness with which he expressed his affection, did not attempt to conceal that she loved him. The deplorable condition of their fortunes alone stood in the way of their union: they swore eternal constancy, and resolved to wait for better times; but the letter of Pierre seemed to make that time more distant than ever.

Maurice is obliged to quit the sick man to go to the theatre, and an old woman comes to take his place. The weather is excessively severe, and Waldau requests him to put on the old cloak which his brother has sent, and in which, he adds, "Your father breathed his last—" Maurice seizes it, and, kissing it respectfully, goes out.

The councillor arrives, and, finding from Waldau that his brother has had his letter, he runs, without waiting for an explanation, to the hotel Felsenbourg, where the porter, in answer to his inquiries for M. Wiesel, tells him he is in the theatre. He enters, and is first terrified by seeing an old man on the stage dressed in the grey cloak of his dead father; and no sooner has he recovered from his terror than he finds that his brother is a player. He rushes out of the theatre half mad with rage.

Maurice, in the mean time, has returned to his sick friend, where he finds his brother's wife, for whom he has a warm affection. Quitting the theatre to fetch some medicine from a neighbouring apothecary, he sees an old woman, who, after looking at him very attentively, passes her shrivelled hand several times over the collar of his coat. Maurice, not quite understanding this familiarity, draws back, and looks at her attentively. "Her thin and colourless features were strangely contrasted with the benevolent vivacity which seemed to animate them." She asks him to sell his cloak, and, on his refusal, expresses some surprise that he can be attached to such a rag.

"No matter," he replies; "rag as it is, it is dear to me."

"Not for its beauty, surely?"

"No, but, if you must know, it is my father's legacy."

"Your father's? Oh, my child, you ought to honour his memory; for no one can deny that you are his son. Every feature resembles him, excepting that you have a good-natured sort of smile in the corner of your mouth, which he never had."

"Oh, yes, he had once, but the world had deprived him of it."

"Say, rather, that years had, child; for they do every thing in this world: and even I, who now talk to you, if I had some few scores of years less, would you have let me stand here in the snow so long? Oh no; you would have whipped this precious cloak over my shoulders."

"Go along, you old gipsy—such nymphs are not to my taste."

"Well, my son, the frankness of your heart pleases me, and I will reward it."

"Oh, pray keep your rewards: I am not in want of them."

"How naturally that word want comes out of your mouth; and merely because your head is full of it."

"Who are you, infernal sybil?" said Maurice, drawing her towards the light.

"The sight of my wrinkled face will give you no great pleasure, my child, but perhaps my advice may. Listen to me, then. Go home to your own chamber, look the door, and rip up the collar of your cloak, and when you have done so you will have nothing more to do but to pray to God, as the great king Solomon did, to grant you wisdom." As she spoke thus, the old woman hobbled hastily away.

Maurice put his hand to the collar of his cloak, and thought he heard a noise like the rustling of paper. He hastened back to Marie and the town clerk, and told them of his adventure.

"Just Heaven!" cried Waldau, "it must be so. You remember your late father, Maurice, and his eternal apprehensions, which all the locks in the world could not have quieted. You know, too, that he was often obliged to come to this city for the purpose of receiving large sums of money. What would a suspicious man do in such a case? He would convert his money, not into gold, but into paper, because that might easily be concealed. I do not doubt, from the story of the old woman, who has perhaps been his hostess, his housekeeper, or some faded flower of the mysterious garland of the past, that this cloak served your father for a strong box. Better acquainted with handling ducats than a needle, he probably had recourse to this old woman. You know it was upon his return from a journey that he died. Marie, open the collar quickly; Maurice, take my scissors, they are in my bag—quick."

Marie uttered a joyful exclamation, as she felt papers through the fold of the cloth. At the same moment a loud noise was heard, and Maurice rose.

The unhappy Pierre, upon quitting the theatre in a state of distraction, had fallen into the canal, and, although he was quickly extricated, he had only time to mention the place of his abode before he died. The noise was caused by persons bringing home his corpse. In the confusion which followed, the cloak, now become so important an object, was stolen, and inquiries for its recovery were fruitless.

When the first grief for the death of Pierre is over, Maurice finds that his father's property, which he divides with his brother's widow, is enough to enable him to marry his Louisa: he returns to Berling; and on the day fixed for the wedding, on which also Waldau is married to Marie, the old woman appears at the door in the old cloak. Maurice brings her into the middle of the room.

"Who are you?" said he, "and where did you get this cloak?—What brings you here?—Quick—speak—explain yourself."

"You put a great many questions at once," said the old woman. "What brings me here?—Your good stars. As to the cloak—it is mine, for I bought it."

While she spoke Maurice looked at her distrustfully. "This old woman," said he to himself, "has duped me once, and would willingly do so again. She has found the money in the cloak, and has now come to make a merit of restoring just so much of it as she thinks fit."

The old woman seemed to comprehend what was passing in his mind. "I see what you think," said she; "but why, Mr. Giddybrain, did you thus despise my advice? why did you so easily abandon this precious cloak? Did I not find it one fine day hanging up before the shop of my neighbour, the old clothes man, who told me he bought it of a porter? and what would become of the bills for twenty thousand florins which are sewed up in it, if I had not bought them at the exorbitant price of three silver pieces? There, take your own; keep it more safely for the future, and thank Heaven for having preserved the life of your father's nurse."

Maurice embraces the old woman, who receives the praises and thanks of every body present. "Well, children," said she, "since you are all happy, you must find some little corner among you for me, where I may end my days in peace."

"O yes!" said Marie, with warmth, "you shall never quit us."

A few days afterwards you might have thought that the old woman had never quitted the ancient dwelling, so much did the two families seem to look upon her as a mother. Their happiness was such as springs from humble virtue. Piety, innocence, and gentleness, adorned their lives, and their days had passed in an uniform and peaceable manner, when, about a year after the return of the old nurse, she appeared one morning before Maurice in the same attitude as on the day of his marriage, and covered with the same old cloak. He offered to embrace her, but, repulsing him, "Gently," said she, "take care." "Do you bring me another treasure, then, my good mother?" She smiled as she opened the cloak: it was a son, which his Louisa had just given him.

ALFONZO AND ELIA.

Close by yon mountain's high and rugged steep
A castle stands, in ruins widely thrown,
O'er mouldering walls the moss and ivy creep,
And there the night-shade's poisonous leaves are shown;

Of, as I've heard, shrill thro' the ruins sweep,
The night blast's hoarse and lamented wail,
It seems some wandering fiend's loud risk of woe;
That over midnight's hour their wickered thrave.

Long ere these cloud-topp'd towers had known decay,
When splendour, rank, and power here held their seat;
And many a knight and many a lady gay
Here spoke of love and felt its balmy sweet,
As thro' d' happiness light pass'd the day,
Leaving no wish unbrought they could regret;
When ——— but I have heard a tale of other days,
While woe and war their haggard heads did raise.

These towers brave Egbert for their lord then knew,
And he'd a daughter most bewitching fair,
Upon her cheek the rose had press'd its hue,
And the bright sun had ting'd with gold her hair,
And on her lips steep'd in ambrosial dew,
A smile had left its magic influence there;
Her form in elegance so graceful shone,
In beauty's matchless grace, she stood alone.

And she was virtuous as the far fam'd Ruth;
And lov'd Alfonso of renowned name,
And tall, and handsome was the favor'd youth,
And many honors wore of knight-hood's fame,
To handsome Elia he did plight his truth,
And she believed ———

Ricardo, too, the lovely maiden woo'd,
Dark lower'd his brow, and hungry was his mind,
He swore the maiden's evidence should be read;
(For Elia had his suit of love declin'd)
And that his dagger's point should be imbrued,
Swift as the madd'ned and destructive wind,
Deep in his rival's blood; and that the brave
Alfonso, soon should mould'ring in his grave.

And now the morn, the joyous morn drew near,
When to the altar Elia must be led;
Led by the youth, to her pure heart more dear
Than the sweet light the splendid beam had shed;
But on her cheek was seen a pearly tear,
For still her bosom heav'd with anxious dread.
She thought of stern Ricardo and his hate,
Dreamt of revenge, and trembled for her fate.

Now o'er the mountain's brow bright Phoebus beams,
And clear the bells upon the breezes sound;
When Elia 'woke from love's enervating dream,
And hail'd the balmy loveliness around;
It to her gentle heart elysium seems,
All nature wears a smile, the verdant ground
A richer beauty bears; more sweet the wood-lark sing
And morn, delightful morn, enchantment bring.

Where rears yon rock, resort for birds of prey,
A dreadful chasm's seen; the waters hurl
Adown the gulf their madd'ned, headlong way,
And round the rooted trees infernal curl.
And from the rugged sides with powerful sway,
The pond'rous fragments 'mid the current whirl:
Oft would Alfonso roam upon its shore,
And thoughtful listen to the loud uproar.—

A pleasing sadness o'er my soul is cast,
Whene'er the water's bellowing rush I hear,
It speaks of days which are for ever past;
It tells me such is mankind's wild career;
And to their pleasures thus they speed as fast,
And in the vortex roll, till death draws near:
Then, while on pallets stretch'd, repentance, fear,
And retrospection steep each hour in tears.

Far different scenes Alfonso's thoughts employ,
He dreamt on all a bridegroom's rapturous bliss,
And hung upon the soul-dispelling joy,
The fond embraces, and the melting kiss,
And hope's fair prospects shone without alloy
Nor told of dire misfortune's dread abyss,
But ere he'd yet his plans of comfort made,
Three ruffians issued from the lonely glade—

Bravely he fought, as wont on armed fields,
Now falls one villain writhing in his blood;
They tremble as the sword Alfonso wields,
Till snapt his blade, and he defenceless stood,
They rushed upon him, yet he did not yield,
Till headlong hur'd amid the roaring flood.
His form, the refted rocks,
To atoms dashed—not e'en a limb remain'd.

The sun, repentant from the ethereal thrave,
His golden rays along the sylvan vale,
The lark, no more with voice mellifluous, flew,
The bell's last notes were dying on the gale,
When Elia's tender heart almost grew;
Terror's image her thoughts drew:
"Oh haste thee, love," she cried, "Alfonso sped,
Or Elia's heart with agony will bleed!"

He comes not—and her mind's still more distressed
Attendants search the woods and rocks around;
(To Elin's bosom anguish firmly pressed)
They reach the chasm:—when, lo! upon the ground,
A dying wretch the mari'rons need confess'd,
And told where vile Ricardo cruelly was found.
She hears, her trembling limbs no longer steady,
And to the earth now falls the heartbroken maid.

Not long in sad oblivion thus she slept,
She woke and madness o'er her senses came,
And thrills of horror through her bosom crept,
She gain'd the rock, call'd wildly on his name,
And down the dreadful precipice she leapt!—
The peasants' cries the fatal deed proclaim'd.
The heart-struck father heard his daughter's doom,
And his grey hairs soon found a lonely tomb.

Where howls the dark wind o'er the barren plain,
Upon a gibbet vile Ricardo hangs;
The ravens there with dismal screams complain'd,
While on the blast the fleshless body swang;
Appalling spectres on the tempest reign'd,
And horrid shrieks to the dark forest rang;
The Nightingale flash'd their high and vivid glare,
And the loud thunder shook the turbid air.

Oh, when the stars their silvery glimmerings throw,
And balmy zephyrs waft the blooming land,
Celestial sounds upon the still air flow,
And the rapt soul to ecstasy command,
The lovers' spirits then are seen to go
Along the ivied walls, and hand in hand
O'er all their favorite walks of former love,
And former scenes of happiness they rove.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

We have now all sorts of clubs and societies, composed of all sorts of odd fellows, who meet upon all sorts of occasions, and transact all sorts of business: but "Jack was a son of a gun," and accordingly I shall, without further preface, introduce to your notice an assemblage of old Blue Bottles belonging to Greenwich College under the title of the 'Quidam Association,' who meet at the "Jolly Sailor" for the purpose of recounting past adventures, and fighting their battles o'er again. It would do your heart good to hear them, and afford a fine subject for the pencil of Wilkie, could he but take a sly glance when the enthusiastic crisis is on, in the description of an engagement. I join them sometimes,—and I remember once Jack Rattlin had gone through the battle of the Nile, till the moment they were called from their quarters to board their opponent; he did it so naturally and bellowed so loudly, applying his hand to his mouth by way of speaking trumpet, "Boards on the starboard bow!" that the whole company rose spontaneously, and with visages like the grim ferryman that poets write of, seized crutches, sticks, wooden legs, &c. &c., and presented so formidable an appearance, that I began to get alarmed, but was soon relieved from apprehension by three hearty cheers,—the enemy had struck! This was a signal for the landlord to replenish,—but wait, you shall have all their pictures, from the president (for they've got a president as well as the United States) down to the last old Pigtail admitted. And first for the President. Jem Breecching was gunner's mate of the Ajax when she caught fire and blew up in the Dardanelles. The powder had got hold of his face, and never was there a better barometer in the world. You have only to look upon Jem's frontispiece to know which way the wind blows and what sort of weather is to be expected:—in easterly breezes 'tis as blue as a dying dolphin; to the southward, a cerulean hue; westerly, a greyish pink; but at north, eye at north, 'tis a beautiful mixture of every tint in the rainbow. A pair of small squinting ferret eyes, and a nose like the goomon of a dial; but there's a sort of Listonish look with him, a Jenny-sey-Quenish curl of the lip, that tells you at once he's fond of fun. Jem has one standing jest—his wooden pin.—Next on the list is old Sam Quaktoes: he was purser's steward of the Bedford when the enterprising Captain Franklin was a lieutenant in the same ship, and talks much about the plays they performed on board. Indeed he says the whole ship's company were very fond of dramas. Sam quotes himself on his larning, and has Shakespeare "con'd by rote, to cast into our teeth; and in his brain, which is as dry as the remainder biscuit after a voyage, he hath strange places cramm'd with observations, the which he vents in mangled form, with overwhelming brow gulling of simples." Sam has a huge red proboscis dangling from a face of scarlet, that appears like a joint of meat roasting before a good coal fire, or like the sign of the red lion over the door of a brandy celler; but his eye (that's his left eye, for the other's gone) is a speaking one, and if any body is disposed to quiz his forehead, it immediately flashes, "Two respect teipsum nose."—Who have we next? Oh, Hameish Megan from the Highlands, but known now as James Hogarth. He was brought up in the town of Ayr, and received all the little education he ever had from Burns the poet, of whom he speaks in raptures, and often repeats his verses, particularly his "Address to the Devil," with great precision and fluency. Hameish was bound apprentice to a tailor; but finding they'd snare him for claymores than breeks in the highlands, he listed into the 42d regiment, and was with them in Egypt when they engaged and defeated Boney's Invincibles. He has all the fire and spirit of the Gael, and when relating the account of their pinning the French up against the walls of Aboukir castle with their bayonets, he erects himself as stiff as buckram, and screws up his mouth like a button-hole. "Eh, (says he,) we measured our ground and cut out our work well that day, though there was money a gude yard of braid clath spoiled by the ugly bayonets." Poor Hameish had a seam ript in his head by a French trooper, and a musket-ball took up a seating in his hip; so he was invalided, for marching was out of the question, as he bobbed up and down like a barrow with a broken wheel. But still he would serve his King, so he entered into the navy, and was in the Victory at the battle off Trafalgar, when Nelson fought and Britain triumphed. Here he got another wound; relentless Fate displayed her shears, and nearly snipp'd the thread of life; but he stuck to his stuff, and was in the Agamemnon when she was wreck'd in the River Plate. From thence he was sent into the Mutine sloop, and was at Buenos Ayres at the first declaration of their independence. This vessel brought home the Spanish deputy to the Court of Great Britain.—Teddy O'Shaughnessy has been in almost every ship of the navy, either as master at arms or as his look'em ten-ends, i. e. a ship's corporal. Teddy is a perfect original, and when at sea acquired the name of Mittimus Oramus, the Irish attorney-at-law; and I much question whether the late Counsellor Curran could handle a cause, sport a rap-party (as Teddy calls it,) or, as a punster, make a pun stir with more beeh-la. His spectacles, which he declares will make any man see no-lens co-lens, are mounted on a huge Domine dirige nos that meets an aspiring chin, defying every joke that can be levell'd against them, and seeming to say, "Aye, aye, Quis seper-a-bit." He wears his hair close cropped, and nature has rendered it so coarse that it shows like a plantation of young broomsticks; and thereby hangs a tail, or rather stretches away from his neck in an horizontal direction like a tangent-screw, which fastens his head to his shoulders, always retaining the same situation, for Teddy's tail never varies.—Now comes my old and worthy friend Ben Marlin. You have already heard of him through the wonderful account which was real-lie, true-lie, and faithful-lie, (Ben's own account) related some time since. He prides himself upon being a bit of a cog-no-squinteye,—a sort of a critic that sees two ways at once, and has a small collection of queeriosities which he calls his muse-he-bum; for instance, his bacon-stopper is made of one of Noah's cheek teeth given him by an old Arab, who had it from the Wandering Jew. His prickler, which has been made to go into the hollow of the tooth, is the identical needle (descended to him in the thread of lineal gin-and-ale-oigie as heirloom of the Twist family) with which the first Mr. Twist raised himself to opulence, by sewing up a rent in the seat of Julius Cæsar's small-clothes. This needle has occasioned much controversy among the members, Sam Quaktoes affirming that the Romans were sans colottes, or only had 'em of cast iron or brass; but Ben insists upon the matter, and furthermore adds, "The job was so cleverly done, that Mr. Julius Cæsar preserved them as a specimen of British neatness and industry." Teddy sides with Sam, and says Julius was a highlander and were pottcoats; and Dick Wills, who knows a little of history, asserts that the ancient Britons were clad in winding-sheets stuck together with skewers; while Ben declares, from undoubted authority, that the Agricultural society—the Antiquarian I mean, but 'tis all one—are hourly expecting the identical pair of breeches to be dug from the ruins of Herodlanum. Jem Breecching gives them a knowing look, and after a few hams—"Gemmen, it's my opinion—I say, gemmen, it's my opinion that if Mrs. Julius Cæsar took such a fancy to the small-clothes, it is more than probable that they actually belonged to her in their primitive state, and that her husband had slipp'd them on by mistake, being unable to find his petticoats. I say, gemmen, he might have slipp'd them on by mistake, or in a hurry, through the uncourteous reception our forefathers gave him, and that she was compelled to adopt the coats, and so it has continued ever since. And this is no fundamental error, for I'm borne out in my argument that the inexpressibles were originally the natural privilege of the ladies, by the struggles which many gentlewomen make for them even in the present day; nay, are they not worn by the softer sex (here Jem rolls his goggle eye) in many parts of the world to this hour?" But for Ben's picture: he is a short, thick, punchy man, one leg exceeding bandy, the other perfectly straight—but that's his wooden one; a face like a dripping-pan, proving him to be of greasian extraction; a short, club, bas-relief nose, scarce a quarter of the face, and, you know, to be in due proportion it should be exactly one-third; and this may be easily ascertained by the thumb, for the thumb is equal to one-third of the face, and the nose equal to one-third of the face; ergo, the thumb is equal to the nose. Q. D. If any body doubt this, let them measure their noses; indeed I'm not joking. As a portrait-painter I must give the true standard, though by the rule of thumb. Some people's noses, to be sure, are longer than others, and that accounts for their being so easily led by them. Ben has a precious great head, increased in size by an enormous wig, from under which, spite of all his efforts to the contrary, the upper flaps of his ears thrust themselves out, and play at be-peep with each other. He was shipmate in the —, under Lord A— B—, with a learned physician who now keeps his carriage, &c. in London, but was then Captain of the sweepers. "This M. D. however, (says Ben,) was always a scheming genius, and once bought a little-thousand clock-wheels, and set 'em all in motion to find out the longitude: he is a clever fellow, and eminent in his profession, well worthy of his de-plumper." Ben lost his leg in the gallant action of the E— frigate, Captain P—, when she took the — off the Black Rocks. And now I must lay down my brush for the present, as they have just piped to grog, so I hasten to wet my whistle and clear my pallet; but you may rely on an early description of the remaining members, their rules and regulations, their debates and harangues, &c. &c.; with many a tough yarn of most disastrous chances; of moving accidents by flood and field; of hair-breadth 'scapes; of Andes vast and deserts wild, and mountain waves whose heads touch heaven; of flying fish and swimming cows; and genuine anecdote of many a brave Commander. We have our critics too: witness Ben's remarks on my reading your extracts from 'Memorable Days in America.'—"Why aye, (says he,) this is, without dis-guys, a matchless production, and will strike a light upon the subject. Well, things shouldn't be viewed with a dark lantern; I dare say it will make a pretty blow-up among the Yankees, for they all stick up for A-merry-ke, that dear, delightful star-banner'd country. 'Tis a pity they're not all constellations. But about them there dead and dying fish—I should like to know whether they were red herrings or pickled pilchards—if not, it looks very much like a whale. I've been a great while in the New World, and know a little about it. I dare say he passed through the Straits of Baffelman, where you can't square your yards for monkeys, and tells about the land crabs as big as donkeys. I've seen the black boys cat-h, mount, and ride races on 'em many a time—it beats Newmarket hollow! I'll tell you—"Grog a-buy!" Aye, aye, I'm coming, like seven bells half struck—like a cuckoo-clock maker—Good bye, Mr. Editor—like a bunch of sheep's trotters tied in granny's knots—like—like—like—

AN OLD SAILOR.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

FIDELITY AND ATTACHMENT OF SLAVES.

Soon after the breaking out of the insurrection in St. Domingo, when the unfortunate whites were every where hunted and massacred, and their dwellings given up to fire and pillage, a negro, who loved his master, hastened to him with the first intelligence of the revolt, and the imminent danger in which he stood; "but," said this faithful slave, "I will save you, or perish myself in the attempt." He immediately conveyed his master to a place of safety, where he could be concealed for a while. In the dead of night he put him into a sloop, and, placing him across a mule, conveyed him to some distance before dawn of day, and again concealed him in the cavern of a rock: at night again he renewed his journey; and in this manner did this faithful creature safely conduct his master a distance of an hundred miles, till he brought him to a navigable river, where he procured a canoe, and at night paddled it down with the stream till he came to a post occupied by the whites, to whom he delivered his master in safety and unharmed.

The other instance occurred in Jamaica during the Maroon war, and is well attested by several respectable gentlemen, who were eye-witnesses of the transaction. During the ambuscade-attack of the Maroons on Lieutenant-colonel Sandford's party of dragoons and militia, at a narrow defile leading from the New to Old Trellawny Maroon Town, a gentleman's negro servant, being close to his master, and observing a Maroon's piece levelled at him, he instantly threw himself between him and the danger, and received the shot in his body. Happily it did not prove mortal, and the faithful slave lived to enjoy the well-earned fruits of his master's gratitude.—Stewart's Jamaica.

FRENCH MISERIES.

(From the Literary Museum.)

I write for the benefit of my countrymen, and therefore make no apology to them. I am an old man, and (as they say in one of the new tragedies) "a crabbed man;" but I have, notwithstanding, some good-nature in me, as was lately proved by my consenting to come over to France, merely to gratify a whim of my daughter. I had scarcely landed at Calais, when I repented my rashness: but what could I do? I had let my house for a twelvemonth, discharged my servants, and promised Julia. We had a long and sick passage from Dover; but I will not, like a celebrated tourist whom I could mention, trespass on your sympathy with the disagreeable detail. It was dark when we anchored; the sea was rough—the packet could not approach the shore—and a crazy boat, half filled with water, ran us aground, or rather a-mud, a short distance from the pier. A host of rugged, ragged rascals, who waited our approach, waded up to us to give us welcome, and muttering some diabolical civilities (as I suppose), they darted upon us like wild beasts. Two of them lunged me over the side of the boat, hoisted me up in their arms, and landed me up to my knees in water. Half a dozen of these fellows contended for poor Julia, who, drenched and terrified, was carried screaming through the surge, (with the loss of her pelisse and bonnet torn to tatters in the struggle), and flung, more dead than alive, into my arms. I pulled out some money to pay for this service, when a dozen dirty fists extended themselves for the spoil. I threw all the loose pieces with which I was furnished to the scoundrels, and was making my way through a crowd of little grinning ruffians, who with a thousand gestures made me know that they would conduct me to where I could eat, drink, and sleep: but a fierce whiskerandos with cocked-hat and long sword, clapped me on the shoulder, calling out "passport, passport." I rummaged all my pockets, but discovered that I had left my passport (a sort of national letter of introduction) in the packet. Julia, with the utmost difficulty, made our examiner acquainted with this. I was surprised that he did not at once understand her, for she used to chatter French as fluently as a magpie, with a young lady one of her schoolfellows, both being educated at the dearest, and of course the best "female seminary" about town. Julia assured me that the fellow spoke only "patwaw," she called it, which is I fancy, Sir, (perhaps you know though) some Eastern language. Indeed, on reflection, I think this fellow must have been one of the Mamelukes, which Bony brought from the East-Indies. Nothing would satisfy the brute but taking us prisoners to a little miserable guard-room, where half a dozen of his fellow savages immediately began to touze us about, under pretence of searching for contraband goods. In vain did I struggle, and Julia scream. They laughed louder than we cried; and by alternate pinching and tickling, made me cry and laugh like a mountebank. As for poor Julia, she was brought into a little closet close by, where she underwent the same operation from the hands of a huge monster dressed in woman's clothes, but who was, I verily believe, nothing more nor less than a grenadier with his whiskers shaved off. At length a gentleman appeared who spoke English, and with the real swagger of authority interfered in our behalf. He told us he was "the Commissioner," which high-sounding title dropped like sweet music on my ears, and seemed in itself a safeguard. He asked me for the keys of our trunks, graciously assured us of protection, slurred over the formidable affair of the passport; and, in short, led us through the horrid-looking fortifications and dirty streets, into the kitchen of a hotel, where we had the comfort of being half roasted before a blazing fire: for, let them talk of the French climate as they will, it was bitter cold and wet on the 26th of July. The warmth, and the savoury smell, began to bring us to ourselves. I thought of eating: but Julia protested against such a step, fearful that they would give us only fricasseed frogs or stewed cats, disguised as chickens and rabbits. The people around, waiters, cooks, and scullions, burst out laughing, for it appeared they all understood English (a good thing to be known by such of your readers as will commit the folly of coming to this odious country), and my daughter, out of shame more than any thing else, consented to join the party just sitting down to supper, at the table-d'hôte.

We neither of us liked the look of the soup, but thought we were pretty safe in venturing on a slice of a roast leg of mutton. Being resolved to share all perils together, we each at the same moment put a piece into our mouths. Oh! How shall I describe the horrid taste? Stuffed with all kinds of abominations, in the name of a clove of garlic: this first attempt had nearly stifled us. I strove to swallow my portion, but in vain. Julia shrieked, and sputtered the nauseous morsel into the soup of her opposite neighbour; and, indeed, I believe the poor girl thought herself poisoned. Then came the torturing civilities of the by-standers, dosing her with water, wine, and vinegar (which last two, are nearly one and the same thing in this country). They soon brought on a return of the worst symptoms of sea-sickness. Sympathy worked hard within me; and as the best preventive, I swallowed a bumper of the table wine which stood before me. Never shall I forget the detestable trash! The very memory of it gives me a griping. But to pass over the subject of my "eating cares," (as Milton or Shakespeare, or some such fellow says), I must tell you, Sir, that we were at last shewn to our sleeping-rooms—large, cold, and comfortless, with four beds in each; but they assured us, as a great favour, that no stranger should intrude upon us. They placed me shaking and shivering between the sheets, and prepared to light a fire in the huge and gaping chimney. They flung in some burning wood, and heaped on that several green faggots, which looked like so many young trees freshly felled. In a moment a smoke arose, which it would have been almost impossible to out through, when the three or four shabby and noisy attendants, who were always bustling about, one in the way of the other, each threw wide open a window, that reached from the ceiling to the floor; as many streams of wind rushed in, and a furious contest arose between them and the ever-thickening smoke. I thought myself at my last gasp; and, as my only refuge, I darted my head under the bed-clothes, which brought on a violent fit of coughing, that stuck to me the whole night, and, added to the hardness of the villainous mattress, prevented me getting a wink of sleep. After some time I popped my head from out of the covering; the attendants were vanished, the windows shut, the smoke nearly dissipated, and the fire extinct. I called on Julia: who answered me from the adjoining room with sobs. She spent the night in crying. I, as I said before, in coughing: and the screaming voices of the chambermaids, the swearing of ostlers, and rumbling of carts, ushered in delightfully the dawn of day.

The first thing I thought of, was making my way to the window to see about the weather. I cautiously crept out of bed, put on my slippers, and made a stride towards the attainment of my object, when I suddenly slipped upon the waxed and polished flag which formed the floor; my heels tripped up, and I fell with my whole length, stunned, stretched, and corpse-like, in the middle of the floor! Poor Julia, who had just dropped into a dose, started from her sleep at the noise of my fall, and hurrying into my room, had nearly shared her father's fate. She came wofully, yet gracefully sliding along, holding by every piece of crazy furniture which lay in the way. The people of the house, alarmed by her screams, rushed in, and I was soon again on my legs, being, as they say of children in similar circumstances, "more frightened than hurt."

At breakfast they gave us what they called tea; a horrible potation of which sloe-leaves formed the best ingredient, and to which they added a quantity of boiled milk. The bread was sour, and the butter offensive. There were, moreover, some ragons made up, to judge from the odour, of the remnants of the last night's leg of mutton; of which an English puppy beside me ate most voraciously, declaring that "the world contained nothing like French cookery." I fully agreed with him as far as my knowledge went. Anxious to get forward on our journey, as Julia assured me all our sufferings would end at Paris, I hurried our arrangements for a carriage, a valet, and a waiting maid for my poor girl. The first of these necessities was furnished by a gentleman, who assured me (through my interpreter, one of the waiters) that it was one of the best waiters, and he himself one of the most honourable men in the world; that, in fact, he had no profit whatever in the transaction, but was always delighted to keep the wheels of his carriage from rust, and to deal with an English gentleman. The servants were recommended by one of the innkeepers of the town, who could set "on his conscience speak for any thing but their honesty, for that he would answer with his life." This being the grand point, we agreed with the valet—a sharp, but modest looking young fellow; and the maid, who was, I thought, a flaunting busybody: but Julia assured me that she was convinced the girl had quite a Parisienne air, and I was perforce content. We called for the bill, and I paid it: that's all I shall say on the subject, except just that we were charged for eight beds, on pretence of travellers being not very sufficient to occupy those which we kept vacant. After all was settled, housemaids, waiters, boot-boys, interpreters, porters, messengers, guides, lord knows how many; and just as we were stepping into the carriage, out of a little office in the court-yard popped a dirty-looking fellow, in a greasy flannel jacket and black night-cap, who I quickly recognized as our friend and patron, the Commissioner. He had previously sent me my keys; and now came to demand the return which all people I meet with here expect for their cursed hollow-hearted civilities. Who do you think he was? Why the clerk of the hotel, who takes charge of the travellers' luggage! The Commissioner! Hi! ha! ha!

Once fairly started, the first act of our miseries was over; but oh! what a crowd the curtain that rose upon our travelling unveiled! I anticipate, Sir, the heart-yearnings which this sad recital will awaken in your compassionate breast. I see the tear "all in your eye," and ready to blot out the record for ever. Keep it a little longer from falling, I pray you, dear Sir. I assure you I have wherewith to add to your good-natured unhappiness, and I am resolved not to spare you. Give me but a little time, and I promise you to fill up the remaining scenes of my tragi-comical detail. On a long dong, as we say in France, I must tell you that I am out of actual danger; I am free from the perils of the highways and the inns; and I hope I have said enough to keep the sober part of my countrymen from running the risks.

NATURAL HISTORY.

(From Juniper's Expedition to the Rocky Mountains.)

PRAIRIE-WOLVES.—They are by far the most numerous of our wolves, and often unite in packs for the purpose of chasing deer, which they very frequently succeed in running down and killing. This, however, is an achievement attended with much difficulty to them, and in which the exertion of their utmost swiftness and cunning are often so unavailing, that they are sometimes reduced to the necessity of eating wild plums, and other fruit to them almost indigestible, in order to distend the stomach, and appease, in a degree, the cravings of hunger.

Their bark is much more distinctly like that of the domestic dog, than of any other animal: in fact the first two or three notes could not be distinguished from the bark of a small terrier, but these notes are succeeded by a lengthened scream.

The wonderful intelligence of this animal is well worthy of note, and a few anecdotes respecting it may not be amiss. Mr. Peale constructed and tried various kinds of traps to take them, one of which was of the description called a "live trap," a shallow box reversed, and supported at one end, by the well known kind of trap sticks, usually called the "figure four," which elevated the front trap upwards of three feet above the slab flooring; the trap was about six feet long, and nearly the same in breadth, and was plentifully baited with offal. Notwithstanding this arrangement, a wolf actually burrowed under the flooring, and pulled down the bait through the crevices of the floor. Tracks of different sizes were observed about the trap. This procedure would seem to be the result of a faculty beyond mere instinct.

This trap proving useless, another was constructed in a different part of the country, formed like a large cage, but with a small entrance at the top, through which the animals might enter, but not return; this was equally unsuccessful; the wolves attempted in vain to get at the bait, as they would not enter by the route prepared for them.

A large double "steel trap" was next tried; this was profusely baited, and the whole, with the exception of the bait, was carefully concealed beneath the fallen leaves. This was also unsuccessful. Tracks of the anticipated victims were next day observed to be impressed in numbers on the earth near the spot, but still the trap, with its seductive charge, remained untouched. The bait was then removed from the trap, and suspended over it from the branch of a tree; several pieces of meat were also suspended in a similar manner, from trees in the vicinity; the following morning the bait over the trap alone remained. Supposing that their exquisite sense of smell warned them of the position of the trap, it was removed, and again covered with leaves, and the baits being disposed as before, the leaves to a considerable distance around were burned, and the trap remained perfectly concealed by ashes; still the bait over the trap was avoided. Once only this trap was sprung, and had fastened for a short time upon the bot of a species, which was shot the following day at a great distance; it proved to be a species distinct from the prairie-wolf.

THE COQUIMBO OWL.—In all the prairie-dog villages we had passed, small owls had been observed moving briskly about, but they had hitherto eluded all attempts to take them. One was here caught, and examination found to be the species denominated quimbo, or burrowing owl, (strix cucularia.) This slow citizen of the prairie-dog, unlike its grave and wise congener, is of a social disposition, and does not retire from the light of the sun, but endures the hottest mid-day glare of that luminary, and is in all respects a diurnal bird. It stands high upon its legs, and flies with the rapidity of the hawk. The coquimbo owl, both in Chili and St. Domingo, agreeably to the accounts of Molina and Vieillot, digs large burrows for its habitations and for the purposes of incubation; the former author gives us to understand that the burrow penetrates the earth to a considerable depth, whilst Vieillot informs us that in St. Domingo the depth is about two feet.

With as the owl never occurred but in the prairie-villages, sometimes in a small flock much scattered, and often perched on different hillocks, at a distance deceiving the eye with the appearance of the prairie-dog itself in an erect posture. They are not shy, but readily admit the hunter within gun-shot; but on his too near approach, a part of the whole of them rise upon the wing, uttering a note very like that of the prairie-dogs, and alight at a short distance, or continue their flight beyond the view.

The burrows into which we have seen the owl descend, resembled in all respects those of the prairie-dog, leading us to suppose, either that they were common, though perhaps not friendly occupants of the same burrow, or that the owl was the exclusive tenant of a burrow gained by right of conquest. But it is at the same time possible, that as in Chili, the owl may excavate his own tenement.

From the remarkable coincidence of note between these too widely distinct animals, we might take occasion to remark the probability of the prairie-dog being an unintentional tutor to the young owl, did we not know that this bird utters the same sounds in the West Indies, where the prairie-dog is not known to exist.

WOOD-TICKS.—These insects, unlike the mosquitoes, gnats, and sand-flies, are not to be turned aside by a gust of wind, or an atmosphere sparged with smoke, nor does the closest dress of leather afford any protection from their persecutions. The traveller no sooner sets his foot among them, than they commence in countless thousands their silent and unseen march; ascending along the feet and legs, they insinuate themselves into every article of dress, and fasten, unperceived, their fangs upon every part of the body. The bite is not felt until the insect has had time to bury the whole of his head, and in the case of the most minute and most troublesome species, nearly his whole body, under the skin, where he fastens himself with such tenacity, that he will sooner suffer his head and body to be dragged apart than relinquish his hold. It would perhaps be advisable, when they are once thoroughly planted, to suffer them to remain unmolested, as the head and claws left under the skin produce more irritation than the living animal; but they excite such intolerable itching, that the finger nails are sure very soon to do all finger nails can do for their destruction. The wound, which was at first almost imperceptible, swells and inflames gradually, and being enlarged by rubbing and scratching, at length discharges a serous fluid, and finally suppurates to such an extent, as to carry off the offending substance. If the insect is suffered to remain unmolested, he protracts his feast for some weeks, when he is found to have grown of enormous size, and to have assumed nearly the colour of the skin on which he has been feeding; his limbs do not enlarge but are almost buried in the mass accumulated on his back, which extending forward bears against the skin, and at last pushes the insect from his hold. Nothing is to be hoped from becoming accustomed to the bite of these wood-ticks. On the contrary, by long exposure to their venomous influence, the skin acquires a morbid irritability, which increases in proportion to the frequency and continuance of the evil, until at length the bite of a single tick is sufficient to produce a large and painful phlegmon. This may not be the case with every one; it was so with us.

The burning and smarting of the skin prompted us to bathe and wash whenever we met with water; but we had not long continued this practice, when we perceived it only to augment our sufferings by increasing the irritation it was meant to allay.

It is not on men alone that these bloody-thirsty insects fasten themselves. Horses, dogs, and many wild animals are subject to their attacks. On the necks of horses they are observed to attain a very large size. It is, nevertheless, sufficiently evident that, like mosquitoes and other blood-sucking insects, by far the greater number of wood-ticks must spend their lives without ever establishing themselves as parasites on any animal, and even without a single opportunity of gratifying their thirst for blood.

STANZAS.

'Twas morning—the first sun-beam broke
O'er the young mother, sleeping there;
From dreams of future bliss she woke,
And woke to breathe a mother's prayer.

She watch'd the cradle where he lay,
Her first-born pride, her infant boy;
With night her hope had pass'd away,
For death had crush'd her bosom's joy.

She call'd the young babe by his name,
Call'd, but she heard no flapping voice;
No little hand towards her came
To bid the mother's heart rejoice.
She gaz'd upon him dead—and prest,
While from her lips a faint shriek broke,
Her clay-cold baby to her breast—
No tear she shed, nor word she spoke.

But in that sorrow, silent, deep,
She bent o'er her departed long;
She gazed on him, yet did not weep,
But strove to wake him with a song.
And when at last they laid to rest
That blighted flower beneath the sod,
She followed him she loved the best—
O'er both the passing stranger trod.

PERSIAN MELODIES.

'Tis sweet to look out at the still hour of even,
And gaze on the almond-trees shining afar,
When the hills they adorn wear the beauty of Heaven,
And each silver blossom seems lit by a star:
Then I turn to the waves of The calm Band Amir,
And see how the stars in the water appear;

For the earth and the sky are so lovelily blended,
When the beams of Halaly first struggles to birth,
One might fancy the stars from the sky had descended,
To play with the flowers that bloom on the earth:
'Tis a moment whose glory is equalled by none,
When the lights of two heavens are mingled in one.

There's not a flower that gems the side
Of yon clear fountain murmuring by:
There's not a playful wave can glide,
Whose sun-lit beauties catch my eye;
There's naught of pure or bright I see,
But I am sure to think of thee.

When I behold the radiant blaze
Of Mihri just peeping o'er the billow;
When I behold his evening rays
Sink lightly on their gorgeous pillow;
When aught of pure or bright I see,
My love, my life, I think of thee.

There's not a bird whose varied wing
Displays a thousand glittering dyes;
There's not a beauteous cloud can fling
Its dawn of glory o'er the skies;
There's naught of pure or bright I see,
But I am sure to think of thee.

When I behold the stars of night
(A lonely hour at eve beguiling)
Pour down their stream of quivering light,
Like groups of youthful Peris smiling;
When aught of pure or bright I see,
My love, my life, I think of thee!

FINE ARTS.

ANGERSTEIN GALLERY.—A celebrated picture-dealer is at present employed in providing the Marquis of Hertford with a collection of paintings for his Lordship's new mansion in Piccadilly. It is said that the Noble Marquis includes the Angerstein Gallery. The sum he is reported to have paid for this unique selection of chef d'œuvres is differently stated, some fixing it at 40,000*l.* and others at 45,000*l.*

VARIETIES.

COFFEE A SUBSTITUTE FOR WINE.—It is said in the Almanach des Gourmands, that the celebrated amateur, Dr. Gastaldy, prevented the return of the gout by frequent libations of coffee à l'eau, particularly after dinner, as it forms a much better digestive than wine, and prevents crudities and obstructions of the bowels, often the forerunners of the gout.

SPORTING EXTRAORDINARY.—On Monday, as a young lady was travelling on horseback from Hacking to Maidstone, she was greatly alarmed by the discharge of a gun over a hedge. Several shot struck her clothes, and she was nearly thrown off by the horse, but fortunately she escaped without personal injury. It subsequently appeared that the gun was fired by a young sportsman, who, seeing the lady's feathers above the hedge, concluded that they must belong to a bird.

MUSICAL INQUIRY.—A new mad-house has been erected at Milan, near the Port de Saint Celso, which contains a musical saloon, with different sorts of musical instruments, for the practice of the inmates. The object is to ascertain whether music has a beneficial effect over mental disease.

BEN JONSON.—As the workmen were excavating a vault in the north aisle of Westminster Abbey, last week, to receive the remains of the Lady of Sir Robert Wilson, they discovered at the head of it a leaden coffin, in a perpendicular position, which they found upon examination to contain the skeleton entire of Ben Jonson, the poet.—Tradition states, that Ben Jonson, while he was seriously indisposed, was asked where he would be buried? He replied, "I will be interred in Westminster Abbey if I can get a foot of ground;" and that the Dean of Westminster gave sufficient ground, about two feet square to admit the coffin in a perpendicular position; and a square hole was dug and the corpse admitted head downwards.—At the top of the hole a stone, about eighteen inches square, was found, with the initials "B. J." upon it, in rather illegible characters.

GREEK PUNCTUALITY.—The master of a Greek vessel and his crew astonished the inhabitants of Marseilles a short time since by carrying the cargo of their small vessel, consisting of rice, to the market-place and distributing it gratis to the poor. It may easily be supposed that their customers increased hourly when the circumstances were made known; and several other cargoes might have been speedily disposed of on the same terms. These poor men, it seems, were caught in a dreadful storm in the Mediterranean; and having betaken themselves to prayers, according to the forms of the Greek Church, they made a vow to give their cargo to the poor, if Providence should be pleased to spare their vessel and their lives for the sake of their wives and families. The storm abated, and they gained Marseilles in safety, where they rigidly performed their vow. It is to be observed, that the master and crew of a Greek vessel are all joint owners, in certain proportions, of ship and cargo.

METHOD OF OBTAINING NATURAL FLOWERS IN WINTER.—Choose some of the most perfect buds of the flowers you wish to preserve, such as are latest in blooming and ready to open; cut them off with a pair of scissors, leaving to each, if possible, a piece of the stem about three inches long: cover the end of the stem immediately with Spanish wax, and when the buds are a little shrunk, wrap each of them separately in a piece of paper, perfectly clean and dry, and lock them up in a dry box or drawer, and they will keep without corrupting. In winter or any other time when you would have the flowers blow, take the buds over night, cut off the end of the stem, and put the buds into water wherein a little nitre or salt has been infused, and the next day you will see the buds open and expand themselves, and the flowers display their most lively colours, and breathe their agreeable odours.

A MASOR LONGBOW.—At a time when Matthews is making the world laugh with his Longbow stories, the following parallel may amuse:—"A friend, (says the relator,) lately returned from abroad, calling on me one morning, I enquired if he had seen any thing very particular during his travels? He replied 'No; with the exception, perhaps, of a curious mode they have in Siberia of procuring the skin of the Sable. Their fur is in the greatest perfection in the depth of winter, at which time the hunter proceeds to the forest armed with a pitcher of water, and some carrion meat; he deposits the bait at the foot, and climbs himself to the top of a high tree. As soon as the animal, attracted by the scent, arrives, the man drops some water on his tail, and it instantaneously becomes frozen to the ground! On which, descending from his elevation with incredible rapidity, his pursuer with a sharp knife cuts him transversely on the face. The Sable, from the excess of pain, taking an extraordinary spring forward, runs off, and (his tail being fast to the ground) out of his skin, of course, leaving it a prey to the hunter!!' Upon expressing a slight doubt as to the probability of this mode of skinning the animals, my friend assured me that he never could have believed it had he not frequently beheld it himself."

BONAPARTE AND ENGLISH SAILORS.—Napoleon and Maria Louisa returning from their journey in Holland, arrived at Gevet on the Meuse, where several hundreds were at that time assembled. A sudden storm arose; there was a heavy fall of rain, the river overflowed its banks, and the pontoon bridge was broken, and rendered impassable. However, the emperor, anxious to continue his journey, and not being in the habit of thinking any thing impossible, resolved to cross the river at all hazards. All the boatmen in the neighbourhood were collected together; but none would attempt to cross. "However," said Napoleon, "I am determined to be on the other side of the river before noon." He immediately ordered some of the principal English prisoners to be brought to him: "There are many of you here," said he, "are there any sailors among you?" "There are 500 of us, and we are all seamen," was the reply. "Well, I want to know whether you think it possible to cross the river, and whether you will undertake to convey me to the opposite bank." It was acknowledged to be a hazardous attempt, but some of the veterans undertook to accomplish it. Napoleon got into the boat with a degree of confidence that surprised us, and he reached the opposite bank in safety. He heartily thanked those who had rendered him this act of service, and ordered that they should be provided with new clothes. To this he added a pecuniary present, and granted them their liberty.—Las Cases.

THE PARTITION OF THE EARTH.

FROM SCHILLER.

When Jove had encircled our planet with light,
And had roll'd the pure orb on its way,
And had given the moon to illumine it by night,
And the bright sun to rule it by day;
The reign of its surface he form'd to agree
With the wisdom that govern'd its plan;
He divided the earth, and apportion'd the sea,
And he gave the dominion to man.
The hunter he sped to the forest and wood,
And the husbandman seized on the plain;
The fisherman launch'd his canoe on the flood,
And the merchant embark'd on the main.
The mighty partition was finished at last,
When a figure came listlessly on;
But fearful and wild were the looks that he cast
When he found that the labour was done.
The men of disorder, the wreath which he wore,
And the frenzy that flash'd from his eye,
And the lyre of ivory and gold which he bore,
Proclaim'd that the Poet was nigh;
And he rush'd all in tears, at the fatal decree,
To the foot of the Thunderer's throne,
And complain'd that no spot of the earth or the sea
Had been given the Bard as his own.
And the Thunderer smiled at his prayer and his mien,
Though he mourn'd the request was too late;
And he ask'd in what regions the Poet had been
When his lot was decided by fate.
Oh! pardon my error, he humbly replied,
Which sprung from a vision too bright;
My soul at that moment was close at thy side,
Entranc'd in these regions of light.
It hung on thy visage, it bask'd in thy smile,
And it rode on thy glances of fire;
And forgive, if, bewilder'd and dazzled the while
I forgot every earthly desire.
The earth, said the Godhead, is portion'd away,
And I cannot reverse the decree;
But the heavens are mine, and the regions of day,
And their portal is open to thee.

MANCHESTER.

MISS PATON.—This lady made her first appearance before the Manchester public in Mr. Renney's Concert, in the Theatre-Royal, on Friday evening the 5th instant. Of Miss M. Tree we have formerly spoken in the highest terms—Miss Paton is entitled to equal praise. Speaking generally, the smiling, undistorted countenances, the agreeable compass and fine modulations of voice, and the unaffected and finished style, of these ladies, are peculiarly attractive, and we hang upon their sweetness of tone and distinct articulation with exquisite delight and inexpressible admiration.

Miss Paton's "Elena!" from the opera of "Donna del Lago" was, to us, as pleasing as vocal sounds could possibly be when wholly destitute of signification! The same may be said of "Giovinette" by Miss Paton and Mr. Sapio; but of "Bid me discourse," "Lo! here the gentle lark," and "Mary of Castle Carey," all by Miss Paton, we must speak without restriction—our praise is unqualified, because our bosoms glowed with sensations which were sweet and undefinable,—with feelings which annihilated the scrutinizing vigilance of criticism, and placed us in the sphere of refined gratification and intense enjoyment. Mr. Sapio, who was much fatigued from long journeys, &c. acquitted himself in his usual masterly style; but we did not admire his selection.

Amongst the instrumental pieces the "Introduction and Polonoise" on the violin by Mr. Cadmore, very justly received great applause; as leader, his attention throughout the evening was incessant. Mr. Renney's performances on the flute were excellent, although not in his very happiest style; Mr. Horrab's harp, a beauty and sound, had attractions, which, in our opinion, should at least rescue it from neglect, if not render it extremely fashionable. The house was in every part well, or comfortably filled—Boxes elegant, Pit genteel, Gallery very respectable, and all appeared much pleased and highly entertained; upon the whole, as Mr. Renney received spirited and distinguished support and unequivocal approbation, we sincerely hope that confidence will grow out of his present experience, and that improved arrangements will still more clearly manifest his taste and exertions.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPUR's lucubration is rather too personal.—He might have done us the justice to remember the protest which we have made more than once, that we will never admit into the IRIS attacks on private character.—We are proud in having to say, that, notwithstanding an erroneous impression among some of our readers to the contrary, we have not, knowingly, deviated in a single instance from this principle.—If we have ever inserted in our publication any paper justly censurable in this point of view, we most discreetly lament the circumstance.—It is impossible for us to discover every little personal allusion contained in the papers which we daily receive.—The conductors of a public paper, like the IRIS, but, in this respect in particular, great claims upon the candour and liberality of its readers.

We are unable to give Publius any information respecting the short-hand publications about which he inquires.—We agree with him in thinking that, a Prayer-book, or extracts from the Poets, in short-hand, would not be an unprofitable speculation.—A trial might certainly be made on a small scale, without much expence.

Concerning the translation of "Pascal's Provincial Letters" we have only to say, that we know of no one engaged to present in the undertaking.—Our columns will always be open to any intelligent correspondent who may send us a favourable specimen.—No person can think more highly than we of those admirable compositions.—The task would have been worthy of the pen of Addison, who, perhaps, could have done it justice.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. GREGORY AND THE IMPERIAL MAGAZINE.

[We are sorry that the following letter, which confirms our opinion of the liberal and gentlemanly character of Dr. Gregory, was not received in time for our last publication.—The Iris was at press before it reached us, otherwise we should have submitted to inconvenience to effect its insertion.—Ed.]

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Your correspondent "Civis" is perfectly right in his conjecture, that the extreme commendation bestowed upon me in the "Imperial Magazine," is far from gratifying to my feelings. He would have been equally right had he assumed, as I beg to assure him he might have done with perfect safety, that I am not responsible for the biographical article to which he refers. Its statements are, with a few exceptions, tolerably correct; but it is more consistent with my disposition and habits to shrink from, than to court, the publicity into which they would seem to have thrown me. The highest reputation to which I have aspired, is that which "Civis" assigns me—the reputation of being useful; and I have simply to request that neither he nor the public will imagine that I am eagerly grasping at popularity, because some kind friend, whose memoir I did not see till it was in print, has spoken of me in a strain of panegyric which (as no person can be more conscious than myself) is far, very far, beyond my humble merits.

In reference to M. Biot's proceedings in the Shetland Isles, I may be permitted to say, that, so far as I can judge from his strictures, "Civis" is very inadequately acquainted with them, as well as with my reasons for having hitherto abstained from publishing any account of them. I have a growing repugnance to controversy, and believe, moreover, in the present case, that if I were to publish my narrative, as my friends who have read it have often urged me to do, it would not be found interesting to twenty persons in the kingdom. If "Civis," however, have any wish to be better informed upon this subject than he at present seems to be, and to learn in what manner M. Biot, by his most extraordinary conduct, defeated the main object of the expedition: should he ever visit London, and favour me with his real name and address, I shall cheerfully accede to an arrangement which will enable him to sit down quietly in my library, and read the narrative in question from my own manuscript written in 1817.

Should he ever accomplish this, and should he be, as I presume he is, a lover of truth, and a man of generous feelings, he will then, I doubt not, be eager to address to you another letter, in which he will speak both of the French philosopher and of his English associates on the Shetland expedition, in language very different from that which he has now employed.

Having thus proposed to your correspondent a way in which I shall be happy to assist him in ascertaining the truth, I beg to say that I shall attend respectfully to any communication which he may make to me in his own name; but my time is too valuable to allow of my taking any further notice of anonymous animadversions.

I have the honour to be,
Sir, your's respectfully.

OLINTHUS GREGORY.

Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, Sept. 11th, 1823.

CIVIS AND DR. GREGORY.

The Biographer* of Dr. Gregory in that very interesting work, the IMPERIAL MAGAZINE, says, "in the metaphysical department we read the name of Dugald Stewart, in the chemical that of Sir Humphrey Davy, and in the mathematical, holding a conspicuous rank, appears the name of Dr. Gregory."—Now these are INDISPUTABLE facts;—Stewart is esteemed as a lecturer on Moral Philosophy; Davy is pre-eminent as an experimental and philosophical Chemist; and Dr. Gregory's official appointment† (independently of his valuable scientific works) is a decisive proof of his knowledge and abilities as a Mathematician. However, on the above extract, Civis remarks—"This association is really ludicrous."—What association? How is Dr. G. associated with Stewart in metaphysics?—Or with Davy in chemistry? Civis must re-peruse the paragraph, when his declamation will appear to himself, as it certainly does to every other reader—purely gratuitous and unjustifiable.

Civis not only derogates from Dr. G. on account of a fancied association, which, even in reality, could add nothing to the Doctor's professional reputation in the estimation of liberal and competent judges, but, he also assumes a comparative rank for the Doctor which is equally unwarranted from the Memoir. He says, Dr. G. "has extended the bounds of science on the relation of solid angles, a discovery certainly curious, and formerly thought to be impossible. This discovery does not by any means warrant us in placing him at the head of the British Mathematicians."—Who ever thought it did? Has Dr. G. made such a claim in consequence of his discovery? Has his Biographer even implied as much? Then why fabricate objections to obtain scope to disparage and calumniate? Civis must learn that, in the English language, there are certain degrees of comparison; and when he has thus learned, he will perceive the view of the Biographer.—For, Dr. G. is named as—"holding a conspicuous (not "THE HEAD" or most conspicuous) rank in the mathematical department."—That is, he is eminent; or, to use Civis' own words, as "he has extended the bounds of science," and that too in a point "formerly thought to be impossible," he, most assuredly, is a man of DISTINGUISHED TALENT! This is consequent upon Civis' own admission; but Civis affirms that the Doctor "is in INVENTIVE GENIUS far inferior to Ivory, Herschell, Leslie, Woodhouse and a number of others."—Let "Ivory, Herschell, Woodhouse and a number of others" attempt the discharge of Dr. Gregory's OFFICIAL duties, (of which Civis, by the bye is perfectly ignorant) and I am pretty confident that they will readily confess that their "inventive genius" is much more easily attained than a competent knowledge of the less speculative and infinitely MORE USEFUL courses which are elucidated and taught by Dr. Gregory.

* To the credit of this writer I positively affirm that his account of the life of Dr. Gregory is one of the most impartial sketches I ever perused. The Dr. is (in the estimation of every unprejudiced and enlightened judge) one of the most eminent literary and scientific gentlemen in the British dominions, and they are, I presume, inferior to none in the world; in addition to this, from a knowledge very sufficient, and far superior to that possessed by Civis, I am confident that the Doctor is one of the mildest and least ostentatious men of the age.—To asperse such a man may be congenial to the views or disposition of Civis in his real character, but no conscientious, intelligent member of society would be guilty of such egregious folly.

† Professor of Mathematics, &c. in the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich.

To conclude this scientific ordeal, I shall briefly notice, that, in addition to numerous and extensive literary and scientific works, Dr. Gregory is the author of a most interesting, comprehensive, and conclusive treatise "ON THE EVIDENCES, DOCTRINES, AND DUTIES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION."—In which work, Civis and the world may learn an infinitely more pure, valuable and sublime philosophy than any hitherto found in the lectures or outlines of Dugald Stewart.—A philosophy which dignified Locke and immortalized a Newton!

Dr. Gregory is extremely popular in his official connexions, and most amiable in all the relations of social and domestic life. Nevertheless, Civis, in moral, as in scientific, character, presumes to fabricate for Dr. G. a comparative standard.—He says—"It has given me some concern to see the writer of the memoir attempt to raise the reputation of Dr. Gregory at the expense of that of a SUPERIOR character"—meaning Biot, the French philosopher, who is charged with "impetuous disposition" and "national prejudice." Taking it for granted that Civis is wholly ignorant of the "character" of these gentlemen, and assuring him that however excellent the Frenchman may be, Dr. G. is still his EQUAL.—I would recommend Civis to obtain more accurate information, and to manifest a little more discretion in his future animadversions. And, lest he should consider my remarks unwarrantably severe, I beg to introduce a character from Mrs. More's Essays with a few parallel illustrations from his strictures.

Character.

"When the malevolent intend to strike a very deep and dangerous stroke of malice, they commend the object of their envy for some trifling quality or advantage which it is scarcely worth while to possess: they proceed to make a general profession of their own good will and a regard for him, and artfully remove any suspicion of their design, and clear all obstructions for the insidious stab they are about to give; for who will suspect them

Illustrations.

"I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of Dr. Gregory. He is the author of a number of valuable elementary works." "Dr. Gregory has many admirers, and I am of the number." The declamatory "stab" arises from the extract in my first paragraph and proceeds—"This association is really ludicrous; and must, assuredly, be very painful to the Doctor's feelings if he chance to hear of it. It has too much the appear-of an intention to injure the object of their professed esteem? The hearer's belief of the fact grows in proportion to the seeming reluctance with which it is told, and to the conviction he has, that the relation is not influenced by pique or resentment, but that the confession is extorted from him against his will, and purely on account of his zeal for truth."

ance of burlesque. It furnishes another example of what a man sometimes suffers from the intrusive and injudicious officiousness of those who wish to be thought his friends. I willingly give the biographer full credit for the best intentions. But the Dr. has no claim to the very elevated situation in which it is proposed to place him." The vindication of names (which were never aspersed) is pleaded by Civis—"The Doctor's warmest admirers must allow that in inventive genius, which can alone entitle a philosopher to any thing like pre-eminence, he is far inferior to Ivory, Herschell," &c. "It is hoped, that, if ever he (Biot) happen to see the silly invective (impetuous disposition and national prejudice) of mortified imbecility (Is the Doctor or the Biographer the mortified foolish fool?) he will not, for a moment, mistake it for the sentiments of the British nation.—CIVIS."

PUBLIC LECTURES.TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—It has often been a matter of surprise and regret to me, that in a town containing so many scientific men as Manchester, there are yet no means of diffusing a general knowledge of Philosophy and the Sciences throughout the various classes of the community, and which might so well be effected through the medium of Public Lectures.

The Literary and Philosophical Society, which justly ranks high abroad as well as at home, affords its members the means of gaining information in the Arts and Sciences, and of acquiring the most perfect views of any recent improvement or discovery that has taken place in them. Comparatively speaking, however, there are few who have sufficient leisure to devote to these pursuits, in order to qualify themselves to become members of that Institution; yet many who labour under this disadvantage, would freely avail themselves of the benefit resulting from an attendance on public lectures.

Having been given to understand, that during the ensuing winter there will be lectures delivered on various branches of Science at the Philosophical Rooms, and observing a short time ago the announcement of a course on Chemistry by Mr. Davies, I hope such encouragement will be given to the different lectures, as may ultimately lead to the establishment of regular periodical courses. I am convinced, that to do good, lectures must be delivered regularly, for casual ones are more frequently attended from mere novelty, than from any real desire on the part of those who attend to be benefitted by them. Manchester, from comprising so many individuals interested in Mechanics, and every improvement which takes place in that science, affords ample scope for lectures on that subject; and this town, where machinery is so extensively employed, would derive from such lectures incalculable advantage. Were there lectures delivered regularly on Chemistry, Hydraulics, Hydrostatics, Optics, Pneumatics and the various branches of Natural Philosophy, I am sure that they would be well attended. The student who is in search of knowledge, would through these means acquire the elementary principles of the Sciences, and such general views as would lay a foundation for his private studies; and he whose chief or sole object is amusement, would have it in his power to fill up his leisure hours in a rational and interesting manner. Many, in place of spending their evenings so unprofitably as at cards, and in dissipation, would be induced to follow these more enlightened pursuits, and thus there would be diffused throughout the better educated classes of society, a higher tone of feeling, and more enlarged views than are capable of being produced by cards and such like amusements. Man surely was formed for noble and worthy objects, and to that individual every member of society is indebted, who endeavours to elevate him in the scale of being—to render his pursuits worthy of his nature—worthy of a rational, a moral, and an immortal being.

There is one class of students, the medical, who may be exempted from the preceding remarks, as we have able Lecturers on Anatomy, Physiology, and Surgery; and few towns afford such advantages to the young medical man, as are furnished by the practice and other things annexed to our public Institutions for the reception of the sick. I cannot, however, suppress my surprise, that Anatomy, and Physiology, should be so little sought after as subjects of general knowledge, seeing their intimate connexion with Geology, and other branches of Science of a very interesting nature.

The Natural History Society, which has been so well supported since its commencement, and which is gradually extending its sphere, will, it is to be hoped, in the course of time afford the public an additional gratification, by the establishment of Lectures in connexion with that Institution.

Another project, with an auspicious commencement, has broken in upon us within these few days, namely, the formation of an Institution for the promotion and encouragement of the Fine Arts. Report and the public prints inform us, that such an establishment is already placed beyond a doubt, the extensive premises at the top of King-street known by the name of the Repertory, having been purchased for that purpose. The town will remain in a state of anxious suspense, until a detailed plan of the objects of the institution be made public. I trust that the projectors will take a more extensive view of what such an institution is capable of effecting than that which they seem now to contemplate. It may be made to embrace other branches of the Arts and Sciences of general interest, and thus by concentrating men of different pursuits, may lead to results honourable to this improving town. From the enlightened spirit, and cultivated taste, which are gradually gaining ground amongst my townsmen, I do not despair of very shortly seeing this evil removed, namely, THE WANT OF REGULAR LECTURES IN MANCHESTER, ON THE DIFFERENT BRANCHES OF THE ARTS AND SCIENCES. I shall not take upon myself, however, to suggest the means of attaining this desideratum, having shewn the defect which exists, I shall leave to others the arrangements competent to its removal.

Manchester, 16th Sept. 1823.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—On perusing, in the Manchester Iris of the 13th instant, your interesting and very judicious remarks upon the several vocal and instrumental performances in Mr. Renney's Concert, I felt much disappointed on finding that this gentleman's flute accompaniment to Miss Paton's "Lo here the gentle lark" was passed over without remark; although, to me, it appeared not only exquisitely chaste, but also to display admirable taste, and very praise-worthy attention. With you I agree that Mr. Renney's pieces were all well executed, but his delicacy and solicitude throughout the accompaniment imparted an additional grace to this performance, and gave it a very superior cast. I shall feel extremely happy should your opinion confirm that of

AN AMATEUR.

Manchester, Sept. 16, 1823.

BIOGRAPHY.THOMAS HOWARD EARL OF ARUNDEL.

As a cultivator of the arts, a patron of their professors, and a collector of their finest monuments, the Earl of Arundel stands beyond all praise. His unwearied pains, and unbounded expense, in amassing the largest and choicest treasures of Greek and Roman antiquities that were ever possessed by an English subject, have perhaps procured him credit for more learning than he really had. Indeed, it is little probable that such a man, in such an age, should have been a minute scholar; but whatever was the degree of his literature, his sagacity and his taste directed it to the noblest means of national improvement. He had almost the sole merit of first diverting learned men from the wretched and unprofitable cavils of the schools to the classical elegancies of antiquity. He encouraged them by his example; supported them with his purse; placed full in their view the most splendid memorials of that ancient perfection which he wished to emulate; and founded a new æra in the studies of his countrymen. It is somewhat strange that he should not have taken all possible precautions to fix his unparalleled collection always in the possession of his male heirs; and, indeed, his apparent carelessness on that head might lead us to suppose that he rather wished it to be dispersed, as in fact it was within a few years after his decease. He divided his personal estate between his eldest and second surviving sons, Henry Frederic Lord Maltravers, and William, afterwards Viscount Stafford. Henry, second son of the former, and sixth Duke of Norfolk, about the year 1668, gave a part of his moiety, the celebrated Parian Chronicles,* as they are called, to the University of Oxford; and the remainder descended to his son, Henry, the seventh Duke, and were afterwards mostly possessed, we know not by what means, by his divorced lady. She sold the statues to the Earl of Pomfret (whose widow gave them also to that University), and left the gems to her second husband, Sir John Germaine, whose second wife, Lady Elizabeth (Berkeley), owned them in her widowhood, not many years since. Lord Stafford's portion remained with his heirs till 1720, and was in that year sold by auction, at his house, Tart Hall, just without Buckingham Gate, which was then pulled down. Some curious relics of the collection fell into the hands of the Hon. Charles Howard, ancestor to the present Duke of Norfolk.

CHARACTERS OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT, AND HANNIBAL.—BY BONAPARTE.

Alexander, when scarcely beyond the age of boyhood, with a mere handful of brave troops, conquered a quarter of the globe. But was this achievement the result of a mere accidental irruption? No; all was profoundly calculated, boldly executed, and prudently managed. Alexander proved himself at once a distinguished warrior, politician, and legislator. Unfortunately, on attaining the zenith of glory and success, his head was turned, and his heart corrupted. He commenced his career with the mind of Trajan; but he closed it with the heart of Nero, and the manners of Heliogabalus.

Hannibal is perhaps a surprising character, from the intrepidity, confidence, and grandeur, evinced in all his enterprises. At the age of twenty-six, he conceived what is scarcely conceivable, and executed what must have been looked upon as impossible. Renouncing all communication with his country, he marched through hostile or unknown nations, which he was obliged to attack and subdue. He crossed the Pyrenees and the Alps, which were presumed to be impassable, and descended upon Italy, sacrificing the half of his army for the mere acquisition of his field of battle, the mere right of fighting. He occupied and governed Italy for the space of sixteen years, being several times within a hair's breath of possessing himself of Rome, and only relinquished his prey when his enemies, profiting by the lesson he had set them, marched to attack the Carthaginian territory. Can it be supposed that Hannibal's glorious career and achievements were the mere result of chance, and fortune's favours? Certainly, Hannibal must have been endowed with great vigour of mind, and he must also have possessed a vast consciousness of his own skill in the art of war, when, being interrogated by his youthful conqueror, he hesitated not to place himself, though subdued, next in rank to Alexander and Pyrrhus, whom he esteemed as the first of warriors.—Last Cases.

CHARACTER OF ALIA BHYE.

Her first principle of government appears to have been moderate assessment, and an almost sacred respect for the native rights of village officers and proprietors of lands. She heard every complaint in person, and although she continually referred causes to courts of equity and arbitration, and to her ministers, for settlement, she was always accessible; and so strong was her sense of duty, on all points connected with the distribution of justice, that she is represented as not only patient but unwearied in the investigation of the most insignificant cases, when appeals were made to her decision.

Aware of the partiality which was to be expected from information supplied by members and adherents of the Holkar family, regarding Alia Bhye, facts were collected from other quarters to guard against the impressions, which the usual details of her administration are calculated to make. It was thought the picture had been overcharged with bright colours, to bring it more into contrast with the opposite system that has since prevailed in the countries she formerly governed; but, although enquiries have been made among all ranks and classes, nothing has been discovered to diminish the eulogiums, or rather blessings, which are poured forth when her name is mentioned. The more, indeed, enquiry is pursued, the more admiration is excited; but it appears above all extraordinary, how she had mental and bodily powers to go through with the labours she imposed upon herself, and which from the age of thirty to that of sixty, when she died, were unremitted. The hours gained from the affairs of the state were all given to acts of devotion and charity; and a deep sense of religion appears to have strengthened her mind in the performance of her worldly duties. She used to say, that she "deemed herself answerable to God for every exercise of power;" and in the full spirit of a pious and benevolent mind was wont to exclaim, when urged by her ministers to acts of extreme severity, "Let us mortals beware how we destroy the works of the Almighty."—Malcolm's Memoir of Central India.

PRESENTIMENT.

Necessity soon loses all ceremonious distinctions, and I then, yet giving due notice of approach, passed through the outer room towards another door, perceptible by a slight ray of light proceeding from behind it. Still, however, all continued silent, and I was altogether at a loss to account for this unaccountable silence. I listened, and fancied I could distinguish the sound as of two persons whispering, and, rendered valorous by distress, I was resolved to fathom the cause of this so rude a neglect of all common hospitality. I again listened, and perceiving that the same sound continued, went forward to the place whence it came, for the purpose of operating on the topic as well as on the anular nerves of those who might appear within. The door was partly open, and I discovered an old woman sitting in a sort of chair beside the hearth, which was covered with the embers of what should have been a large fire, the dusky blue smoke of which still continued to ascend the chimney in large volumes, and gave a melancholy hue to all around. My curiosity was excited, and I examined, as narrowly as I was well able, the room and its decorations, and the nature of the employment in which she was so abstractedly engaged. It appeared to be furnished with two or three old chairs, and articles of ancient furniture, the uncouth appearance of which accorded well with the personage whom they surrounded. I could discover none of the usual accompaniments or appendages to the chamber of a common cottage, but every thing exhibited an air unaccountably strange and mysterious: the spiders seemed to have unobstructedly attached their universal webs, in thick and angular drapery, to all parts of the place, and the dust of years still covered, in undisturbed quiet, the things which were fast mouldering into decomposition. The old creature was busily engaged in her work; before her was a high stool, on which lay several oddly constructed implements, of whose use and application I could form no idea; and to the centre was fixed a loop of party coloured threads, which she seemed to be slowly and cautiously plating together. After first rapping at the door, I entered, and once more renewed my solicitation for shelter, but she gave neither look, nor answer, nor token of attention. I now began to ascribe this apparent unconsciousness to one of the afflictions of old age—deafness; and, lest I should too much surprise by my abruptness, advanced very slowly, to give her time to perceive my contiguity; but her eyes were too intently fixed upon the knotted threads to regard it, and I gently and gradually placed my hand upon the stool; yet, though within a few inches of her work, I was still unnoticed. As she prosecuted her labour, she continued to mutter, in a kind of sing-song tone, the same hoarse whispering which I had at first heard, and when I moved my fingers towards her hand, for the purpose of placing them upon it, and so to dissipate her deep absence of mind; as mine approached to a near contact, she suddenly drew back her form, without leaving the threads, and made a sort of hissing rattle in her throat, which, to me, under the circumstances of the night, was inconceivably appalling. As soon as I withdrew my arm, she renewed her employment, and the horrible sounds relapsed into her former muttering, only in a more agitated distinctness. I now attentively surveyed her face and figure, which I was before unable accurately to discern, from the little light falling upon her: it seemed to be, much below the height of persons even at her advanced age, but whether from years or deformity, I could give no guess. Her features were large and bony, and the flesh of her face hung in loose foldings, as if unwilling to separate from the frame work to which it had been so long attached. The expression of her countenance was harsh, forbidding, and unnatural; and there was a pallid ashy whiteness of hue in her skin, most disgusting and unearthly. Although not much given to fearfulness or superstition, I could scarcely keep my gaze upon her without feeling an indescribable trepidation that every now and then stole along my veins in cold shudders. Her head was partly concealed by the hood of a dirty threadbare cloak, which, hanging loosely over the shoulders, exposed her lean, emaciated, and withering arms; and the thick skinny tubes over them, which had once been veins, assumed a black ugly tint, that rendered her colourless flesh still more frightful; her long horny fingers were employed in the various threads which she carefully and at intervals entwined, while her form continued in an oscillating motion, as if to keep regular time to the sentences she uttered. As she at length proceeded to the completion of her plating, her murmurs became more audibly articulated, and, when she arrived at the last knot, her body became motionless, and, with her glassy eyes directed to the stool, but yet looking at vacuity, she repeated, or, rather, sung, with a sort of lisping roughness, the words which even now seem to ring in my ear:—

'The fated thread, the binding spell,
Hath now been wrought and woven well;
And eyes shall see and hearts shall know
Deeds of sorrow, death, and woe.'

The great earnestness with which I listened to her voice, and watched the expressions of her face, for some moments prevented my observing the deep shade which was gradually spreading itself over the room. This at last increased so much, that I once more found myself enveloped in complete darkness. My mind became much troubled and alarmed at the extraordinary appearances of which I had been a witness, but my apprehensions, and the inexplicable desire which I nevertheless had to see the end of this strange scene, deterred me from retreating. I was not long, however, in this state of uncertainty, for by degrees the light returned; but it looked so unnatural and unholy that it only augmented the agitation I had striven to allay. The old beldam still remained in the same posture, excepting that her right arm was raised and her fingers pointing to some object on the opposite side of the room, and her body apparently under the influence of a violent emotion. I unconsciously directed my eye to the spot to which her hand was extended, and was greatly astonished to discover the distinct shadows of three or four persons figured upon the wall. I anxiously looked around the place, imagining that this must be produced by the intervention of other persons between it and the light, but no human creature was there except ourselves. I again turned my view to the wall, and plainly perceived the shadows to be in motion. I felt that this could be the work of no natural agency, and the cold sweat-drops started from all parts of my body. The circumstance was of itself sufficiently powerful to human the strongest nerves, but there was something in the figures which indescribably afflicted me. They had the semblance of a female reclining in a chair, and another standing beside her; a boy appeared to be kneeling before the first, and a fourth was rapidly passing to and fro, as if in much anguish. The appearances were continually changing, and I imagined that the features, as they varied in outline, were somewhat familiar to me. I now fixed my eyes upon the female before whom the boy was kneeling, and, as I looked, I perceived the head of the shadow slowly to move. But, what were my feelings and my agitation as I plainly recognised the exact profile of my own wife!—I saw no more! My spirits, so long overpowered and distressed, could no longer support this scene. I rushed out heedless and regardless of every thing, and, mounting my horse flow with all speed from a place so devilish and hateful—

A letter at my friend's address had for some hours awaited my arrival, pressing my hastiest and immediate return. My blessed Mary had been visited with sudden and dangerous illness. I instantly departed, and reached home after a lapse of comparatively a few hours—but—but I found her no longer one among the living!

[I should state that after an interval of some months, when time had in some measure abated the severity of my sorrow, and the oppressive pain with which I associated the event with the circumstances above detailed, I felt desirous to revisit the neighbourhood where the adventure had occurred; but, after the minutest search and the strictest inquiries, I was unable to discover any traces of the spot, or even learn that a person answering to my description had ever been known to reside there.]—

The following beautiful Lines are taken from the Literary Chronicle.

THE CHIEFTAIN'S FAREWELL.

The moonlight fell on hill and glen,
The silent world was wrapt in sleep,
Calm was each orb that glister'd then,
Calm was the ocean's billowy deep.
The blue-ey'd heav'n smil'd assuredly
On wood cloth'd land and gentle sea;
And it was sweet to view the scene,
It had an aspect so serene:
As if the age of woe were past
And happiness were now to last.
But hearts that feel enjoyment's sweetness,
Intensely feel its swift-wing'd fleetness;
Again grief pains,—and then we deem
All our past pleasure but a dream;
That bliss is only sent to shade
(Like the spring flowers that bloom and fade)
The hues and tints of that short span
Which guilt has circumscrib'd to man.—
Fair Ellen, in her woodland bower,
Implored cast her eyes to heaven,
For it was then the wonted hour
When her sweet prayers to God were given.
If the deep incense of a heart,
The mild appealing of an eye,
Can to orisons strength impart,
They surely reach'd the list'ning sky.
Had stranger's eye young Ellen seen,
When unto God she breath'd her prayer,
That eye charm'd by her solemn mien,
Had deem'd a seraph worshipp'd there.
But now her heart was fraught with grief,
Nor e'en devotion gave relief:
Donald, her bosom's sole delight,
Might fall in the approaching night;
(For Donald, in the dawn of life,
Had led his warriors to the strife);
And he might press the blood-stain'd field,
For he would ne'er to foemen yield.
These rending thoughts her soul oppress'd,
And chas'd away the shades of rest;
From her swollen eyes the tear drops flow'd,
And copious left their blue abode;
On her blanch'd cheek shone glistently
The anguish'd drops of agony;
At last her sorrow silence broke
And thus the pensive maiden spoke:—
‘Oh! Donald! lord of love and me!
Dearer than life blood to my heart!
No more thy form shall Ellen see—
With joy to meet, with hope to part.
Sad misery thy soul enchains,
And nought, oh, nought! but grief remains.
If I had gaz'd upon thy face—
If I had ta'en one last embrace—
If I had sigh'd a last farewell—
I would not on these sorrows dwell.
But bliss is fled and thou art gone,
And grief with Ellen reigns alone.
But who is he that yonder leaps
High o'er the crags and rocky steeps?—
My eyes deceive me!—No! 'tis he!
My Donald comes to welcome me—
My care-worn heart is now at rest—
I am, oh Heav'n, I am blest!’
A warrior's plume now met her view—
She cried, ‘My Donald! is it you?’
‘Yes, Ellen, dear!’ the chief replied—
And swift as thought was at her side.
‘Oh, Ellen! brief must be my stay,
The armies meet at blash of day;
But I have hasten'd to my dear
With wings that love hath given,
I thought perchance to find you here,
Sighing your Donald's name to Heaven.
But Ellen, tell me—tell me why
You heave that long and deep-drawn sigh?
And tears are stealing down your cheek—
Oh, Ellen, speak, I pray thee, speak!—

How pale you are! that eye's blue ray
Is curdling with your soul's dismay!
No more, my love, these vigils keep—
But cease, my Ellen, cease to weep.

‘Oh, Donald! I have pray'd for thee,
The fair-hair'd Ellen trembling said,
‘At this lone hour most ardently,
For I had deem'd that thou wert dead.

I dream'd I saw thee on the plain,
And in the mantle of thy gore
Wert wholly wrapt,—I can no more!
How oft with pleasure thou and I
Have gaz'd upon the blue-arch'd sky—
Have wish'd to soar to yon high dome,
To gain at last “a starry home!”
See Donald, see the silent deep
That in the moonlight seems to sleep:
View how the pale-fac'd rays are beaming,
And how the rippling waves are gleaming;
If winds arise these waves will roar,
And thus sweet scene will be no more;
If darkling clouds yon orb o'ercast,
This silvery beauty will not last.

‘Tis thus with me when thou art nigh,
My soul is calm'd,—I cannot sigh.
Thou art my orb! my bosom's light!
Without my Donald all is night.
Yet e'en with joy's luxuriant flow,
There still will mingle thoughts of woe;
And all the bliss thy presence brings,
Departs from me on hasty wings,
Chas'd by cold fear's empoison'd stings.
But I'll subdue each dire alarm,
I'll sooth my throbbing heart to peace,
Trust that my love will nerve thy arm,
And deem that when war's strife shall cease,
Thou wilt return in victory,
And she whose fears will then be o'er,
Shall taste with thee felicity
That may not change or alter more;
But if at length my dear hopes fly—
And all my fond dreams prove untrue,
If on the field thou'rt doom'd to die,
I'll seek thy ashes where they lie,
And there I'll perish too!’
She fell into his arms—and he Kiss'd the cold forehead tenderly
Of that lov'd and lovely one!—
Ellen is senseless—Donald gone.

NEW PLAYING CARDS.

A correspondent in the Literary Gazette says, that he has “invented what may be called a ‘National and Classical Pack of Cards,’ which will not only give a taste for the Fine Arts, but will awaken those feelings of national pride which always tend to elevate the soul.” By these cards ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, WALES, and IRELAND are to be symbolically represented; and instead of the quaint and rude conceit of clubs, diamonds, hearts, and spades, are to be distinguished by the appropriate emblems of ‘the Rose,’ ‘the Thistle,’ ‘the Shamrock,’ ‘the Harp.’ The leek might perhaps be considered as better fitted to represent Wales; but the leek conveys an idea beneath the dignity of the subject, and as being nearly related to the onion, ought not to be introduced into polite circles; I have therefore adopted the Harp, as more elegant and classical. The court-cards are to be arranged as follows: To begin with the Knaves—It is really distressing to think Knaves should so long have been tolerated in the fashionable world, though it is only at the card-table. At the time when cards were invented, it is well known that the word Knave had a very different signification from what it now bears, as it meant nothing more than Servant: thus the old writers use it—‘Where be my Knaves?’ and in France it is at this moment called ‘Valet.’ There are no Knaves there! How absurd is it that this antique phraseology should be kept up when the meaning is completely changed! Why should sound outline sense? Let the Knaves, therefore, be succeeded by Peasants, not Servants, for the Peasant will be a more picturesque object, each in the costume of his country; let the characteristic features of his native land be strikingly illustrated in a landscape, and the appropriate emblem be represented on the corner of the cards in the same manner that the Knaves of each suit now bear it. The four Queens are to yield to beautiful allegorical figures of the genius of each nation, personified in a female form—Britannia, Caledonia, Hibernia, Cambria. The four Kings shall be converted into the tutelar Knights, or Champions—St. George, St. Andrew, St. Patrick, St. David. The designs for these figures I intend to have drawn by eminent artists, and executed in a style of so much elegance that it cannot possibly fail to excite the admiration of the connoisseur, and will as infallibly encourage a taste for the Fine Arts among people who have at present so little notion of the beauty of emblems and attributes, that I am confident they scarcely know a Venus from a Bellona, or an Apollo from a Hecates. Nor is poetry to be forgotten. The single Rose, Thistle, &c. which will take place of the Aces, will leave ample room for an appropriate motto. As for the national pride that will be called forth by these cards—can it be doubted? For my part I know I shall always play with most spirit when Shamrocks are trumps! The case of these cards, instead of being disfigured by the head of the Great Mogul, or Harry the Eighth, shall be embellished with a faithful and highly-executed portrait of His Most Gracious Majesty King George the Fourth, surrounded by the united emblems of his four nations and accompanied by a motto.”

THE ADOPTED GRANDSON

Robert, the youngest son of the late Rev. Newcome Cappe, of the city of York, was nursed in the country; and soon after he was brought home, being then about four years old, he was playing in the yard, when an old lady belonging to Mr. Cappe's congregation, happened to come in, and asked the child, if he knew her? Yes, replied the child, you are my granddams; an answer which so struck her fancy, that she said to him, Well, my dear, continue to call me so, and I will indeed be your granddams. From that time she insisted upon buying all his clothes; she made him a present of about £1000, in the three per cent, when he was about twelve years of age; and left him, at her death, her own very excellent house, in which she had resided, in the city. This pleasing anecdote illustrates a very important truth; that events of continually increasing magnitude, often take their rise from comparatively trivial causes, like a large and overflowing river from an almost imperceptible streamlet.

MR. EDITOR,—The preceding anecdote is extracted from the Memoirs of Mrs. Cappe, written by herself, and will, I trust, be deemed worthy of a place in the Manchester Iris. It is usual, in modern composition, to mark those passages which are spoken, with inverted double commas. It is remarkable that this practice has never prevailed in the sacred scriptures, such passages being distinguished only by beginning the first word of each with a capital. I have observed the same rule in transcribing the present extract; Yes, replied the child, may very properly be printed without the usual quotation marks, since the words, replied the child, sufficiently point out what is supposed to be spoken, though constituting, in fact, a part of the narration. Your's truly, S. X.

VISIT TO CINTRA, IN PORTUGAL, AND THE ADJACENT CONVENT.

From “Recollections of the Peninsula.”

I was very anxious [says our Traveller] to visit Cintra, a spot celebrated by all travellers, and proverbial with the inhabitants of Lisbon, for its romantic beauty. Our party, consisting of six, set out at four o'clock one morning, in three cabriolets, and after a pleasant drive of two hours, reached Caliz, a somnolent palace of the Queen's, with a small town attached. The country through which we passed to Caliz presented nothing in its appearance remarkable, if I except some fields of Indian corn, and some edges formed by American aloes, of prodigious size and uncommon beauty. The prickly pear, a very hideous plant, was here and there scattered among them. After visiting the palace, which is not fine, and the apartments neither magnificently nor elegantly decorated, we hastened back to our coffee, and, after breakfast, resuming our seats, we arrived, in less than three hours, at Cintra. The scenery, as you approach the town, is truly enchanting. The rich and variegated wood, which clothes the side of the mountain rising above Cintra, the sunny brown, or rather the golden tinge, of the mossy sword towards the crest of it, and the bare, grey, and rude-shaped rock, which crowns its lofty summit, form a picture, such as only the pencil of a master, or the pen of a poet, could attempt to sketch with fidelity. The town itself, though considerably elevated, lies far below the mountain; and all around is beauty, shade, and repose. The white and furrowed bark, and the fantastic form of the pale cork-tree, the low dark olive, the green leaf and golden fruit of the orange, the treelined vine, and the wild geranium, all here combine to deck the face of nature with charms that have always new and interesting attractions. We soon left our inn, and mounted on asses, with two sprightly boys for our guides, set forth to visit the Convent, which is built nearly at the top of the Cintra mountain. You lounge at your ease on a large pack-saddle, covered with green cloth, and it is truly surprising to see with how much safety and activity these animals carry you up paths, rocky, uneven, and dangerously steep. A monk received us at the gate of the Convent, and conducted us all over it; it is a very perfect, complete thing; and the site of it, for singularity and boldness, is unrivalled. It is, in fact, utterly secluded from the world; and yet the eye may range over the vast Atlantic, far as mortal vision permits, or may rest on lovely vales and dark-bosomed glens beneath. The ear, too, may catch, on the one side, the hoarse voice of the rising storm; or may listen, on the other, to those pleasing and sweet sounds, which speak of rural occupations and of rural happiness.

If a man, at the age of sixty, stood alone in the world, without wife, relative, or friend, to such a spot as this, might he retire for life. When death carries off our little store of affection, by laying its cold hand on the hearts where that treasure was hoarded, whither can we go for comfort? The sad bosom, and the rayless eye, are ill calculated to inspire new loves, or to attract new friendships. Oh! I can imagine many cases, where the calm of a retired monastery would afford consolation to the wounded spirit!

On our return to the inn at Cintra, on a subsequent day, we found a comfortable dinner, cooked and served up in the plain English fashion; well-cooled wine of Cozados, very nearly resembling claret,—left the epicure nothing to desire; and somewhat fatigued, yet delighted with our journey, we retired to excellent beds in clean, well-furnished apartments.

There is another Convent, not far from Cintra, curiously built, among some wild and romantic rocks, the walls, doors, and furniture of which are all of cork. The Convent is inhabited by some poor humble Franciscans; they have a pretty garden, and a small orangery.

ENGLAND.

The increase of population which England has acquired is unequalled in any other country of Europe. It took place in a period of time exclusively devoted to war; a circumstance in general rather contrary than favourable to such an augmentation. In comparing it abstractedly with what happens on the continent, we may well be astonished; but reflection soon shows us, that what afflicts the continent like a plague, necessarily wastes its power against the barriers which nature and civilization have raised up for the defence of England. In effect, she is situated and socially constituted in such a manner, that what produces evil in others, causes good for her; that what causes others to retrograde makes her advance; that what thins the ranks of other nations, thickens those of England. War affects only the coffers of Great Britain; her cities and her fields are uninjured. Devastation, the usual companion of war, expires on her shore, and cannot mount those insulated citadels which give her the empire of the ocean. England chafes before her war and all its plagues, as we see those vessels which have rendered the rivals, or rather the conquerors of the elements, scatter, with the thunder that arms their sides, those stormy clouds which heaven has formed from the vapours of the sea. Whilst almost all the capitals of Europe were occupied by the enemy; whilst twenty Princes were fugitive and wandering, or returning in humiliation to their dilapidated dominions, England remained immovable and invincible in the midst of her waves, and attracted to her bosom all the gold and merchandise of the world. She had clothed and armed friends and enemies; the arts, excited by necessity, grew up to perfection, and created at once appetite and attraction for their productions. Being incessantly applied to the gratification of a taste now become universal, they opened doors which force had kept closed. In such a state of things it is very evident, that for one man who falls in the field of battle, industry calls forth a hundred men to co-operate in a re-prodution which without it would have been denied them. Thus it is that from the bosom of death, from the very abyss from which life is buried, life is re-produced and multiplied for England.—Abbe de Pradt.

BELIEF IN WITCHCRAFT IN CENTRAL INDIA.

The idea entertained of Dhakuns, or witches, is, that certain women (generally the old and wrinkled) are endowed with a limited supernatural power, which, though it does not enable them to see into futurity, or to obtain what they wish, empowers them, with the aid of their familiar, or Bheer, and by their incantations, to inflict pains, diseases, or death, upon human beings or animals, as they may desire to gratify their malice or resentment. The common mean to which they are believed to have resorted to accomplish their vengeance is, causing the gradual decay of the liver of the person or animal they wish to destroy. Their power of witchcraft exists on the 14th, 15th, and 29th of every month. It is also very strong during certain periods of the year, particularly nine days before Dusserah feast; but the Dewally is the time when they have most power. At other periods Dhakuns appear, dress, talk, and eat, like other women; but, when the fit is on them, they are sometimes seen with their eyes glaring red, their hair dishevelled and bristled, while their head is often tossed around in a strange convulsive manner. On the nights of these days they are believed to go abroad, and, after casting off their garments, to ride upon tigers and other wild animals; and if they desire to go upon the water, the alligators come, like the beasts of the forest at their call, and they disport in rivers and lakes upon their backs till near dawn of day, about which period they always return home, and assume their usual forms and occupations. Such absurd belief would not merit mention, did not the numerous murders (they can be called by no other name) which it annually produces force it into notice. It is calculated, and on tolerable data, that within the last thirty years, above a thousand women have been put to death as witches in this country, of whom a very large proportion have perished by the orders of Zalim Singh, regent of Kotah, who, with all his extraordinary talent, is remarkable for his weak, childish superstition upon this point. His reputation has gone far to confirm the belief of others, and in several late murders of supposed witches, his example has been brought forward, while the acknowledged superiority of his understanding has been urged as an infallible proof the existence of sorcery, and of its guilty supernatural agents. The usual mode of proving whether an accused woman is a witch, is through a religious mendicant of low tribe, who is termed a Bhophah, and is believed to have the talent of discovering those who have the latent power of sorcery; but, generally, for a woman of a village to be old and haggard, and bad-tempered, is sufficient to make suspicion fall upon her. If a man, his wife, or child, or any of his cattle, remain long in bad health, or die suddenly, and any old woman is supposed to have an ill-will against him or his family, she is seized, and red pepper is stuffed into her eyes: if this process does not produce tears, the unfortunate creature is condemned; sometimes she is flogged with the branches of the nux vomica, or with the root of the palma christi, or castor-oil plant; and if these (after other stripes have failed) make her call out, she is deemed a sorceress, for they alone can inflict pain upon such a being. On other occasions, the witch is tied in a bag and thrown into a pool, where sinking is the only proof of her innocence. If her struggles keep her afloat, she is inevitably condemned and punished, either by being obliged to drink the water used by the leather-dressers, which is a degradation from caste, or by having her nose cut off, or being put to death. The latter often occurs through the superstitious fears of princes; or among the lower classes, through the violent resentment of individuals; nor are the latter exposed to suffer for such crimes, when they can produce any ground whatever for their suspicion.—Malcolm's Memoir of Central India.

MR. EDITOR.—There is, off the northern part of the coast of Norway, a celebrated whirlpool, known by the name of the Maelstrom, which, even at the distance of eight or nine miles, is said to attract vessels, and impetuously and irresistibly hurry them to destruction. I have sometimes been tempted to compare the MANCHESTER IRIS to this noted whirlpool. Its attractive power is generally felt and acknowledged; but, unhappily, many of the articles consigned, from time to time, to its powerful influence, are seen no more again for ever! This is apparently the unhappy fate of many a rare and curious article, without regard to sterling merit, or the age and sex of the respective authors.

The beautiful little poem, on Life, written by the celebrated Mrs. B., in her eightieth year, appears to have been swallowed up in this literary gulf. And yet it had many things to recommend it to your particular notice and protection. First, its own intrinsic merit; secondly, it was written by a lady; thirdly, by a lady in her eightieth year, the author of many admired pieces,—the Three Warnings, for instance; fourthly, it contains a very just and interesting picture of human life; and fifthly, as I have every reason to suppose, it has never yet appeared in print. Some of your readers, Mr. Editor, have been anxiously looking, week after week, and Iris following Iris, for this admired poem, this literary morsel, but have hitherto been disappointed. That you may not plead the Printers' usual apology, want of copy, I now send you a duplicate copy of this poem, and I flatter myself you will avail yourself of this second opportunity of adding to the gratification of your readers, generally, and, more particularly, of obliging your sincere friend, and occasional correspondent.

LINES ON LIFE.

Written by Mrs. B., in her eightieth year.

Say ye, who through the round of foreshore years
Have known its joys and sorrows, hopes and fears;
Say, what is life, ye veterans who have trod,
Step following step, its flowery, thorny road?

Enough of good, to kindle warm desire;
Enough of ill, to damp the rising fire;
Enough of love and fancy, joy and hope,
To fan desire, and give the passions scope;
Enough of disappointment, sorrow, pain,
To seal the Wise-man's saying, All is vain,
And quench the wish to live these years again.

Science to man unfolds her various store,
And gives enough to prompt the wish for more;
Systems and suns lie open to his gaze,
Nature invites his love, and God his praise,
Yet doubt and ignorance with his feelings sport,
And Jacob's ladder is some rounds too short.

Yet still to humble hope enough is given
Of light from Reason's lamp, and light from Heaven,
To teach us what to follow, what to shun,
To bow the head, and say, Thy Will be done.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

Cure for Cancer.—Sheep sorrel, (leaf like that of clover,) express the juice on a pewter plate; expose it to the sun till it assumes the consistency of salve—apply this as a plaster to the cancer, and change it occasionally as necessity may require. It will fully and entirely extract the cancer. If the disease be really cancer, the application will cause pain; if not, no pain will ensue.

Cockroaches.—An infallible means to destroy them will be found in giving them the roots of the eratum vire, commonly called black bellebore, which grows wild in our country on marshy grounds, and may be got of our market people. Strew these roots about the floor at night, and next morning you will find all the family of cockroaches dead or dying, from having eaten it, which they will do with great avidity. They will never fail to eat it while they can get at it, and will as sure die. It causes them to froth at the mouth, and split in the back occasionally. The plant is in full growth.—Bolton Express.

Infallible Remedy against Bed Bugs.—Take one ounce of Camphor, wrap it in a linen cloth, and suspend it at the head of the bed, and as the camphor evaporates, the bugs will decamp. We are assured, by a person who has repeatedly made the experiment, that this is a never-failing remedy.—American Paper.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

"The vessel while the dread event draws nigh
Seems more impatient o'er the waves to fly—
Fate spurs her on—"
Falconer's Shipwreck.

Why, Sir, sailors that know the construction of a ship, how the timbers and knees are jointed together, and where every treenail is drove, are far more timorous in a gale of wind, than those who are ignorant of her frame-work. By the same rule, I have known some surgeons who are skill'd in anatomy, apt to be nervous upon occasions. But howsoever, a gale of wind is no playing, Sir. You have never witness'd one at sea; by mayhap you'd like a rough description from an old weather-beaten Tar, who, ever since he was the height of a quart pot, has been working against wind and tide and braved every billow, from the Bay of Biscay to the Bay of Bengal; but, bless you, what's the use on it—I went to windward like smoke. Well, Sir, I was in a Transport of 600 tons; a pretty ship, sail'd like a mermaid, and sat on the water like a duck; but no matter. Well, we sailed from St. Andero with sick and wounded troops, and women; there were some officers, too, with their families, and we were bound to our own dear native land; but before I proceed I'll just give you a sketch of our passengers: and, first, was Capt. R— of — regiment, a fine Dalgetty-looking old veteran, with flowing locks as white as a snow-ball; he had sought the bubble reputation even in the cannon's mouth, but he'd no interest, Sir, and having buried his wife in a foreign land, was now returning home with his two daughters, lovely girls, the prop and stay of his declining age; they were sweet flowers, and when they used to sit on the deck at each side of their father, administering the balm of consolation to his wounded spirit, 'twas like the picture of Mercy and Benevolence soothing the sorrows of Time. Then there was Lieut. N— and his wife, a very interesting couple, and yet they were but one in mind. He had been severely wounded, and she had quitted her country to attend the partner of her heart, but now, through grief and too close attention to his wants, droop'd like a lily withering in the storm, and seemed fast hastening to that bourn whence no travellers return: they had one little boy about eight years old, the mother's darling and the father's pride. Next there was Doctor Mac I— a native of auld Reekie: he was a staunch kirk o' Scotland man, as kind a soul as ever broke the bread of life, and treated the poor fellows under his care with the tenderness of a parent: he had national prejudices, to be sure—call'd Doctor Johnson an "ig-no-ram-ass," and used to boast of his acquaintance with Rab Burns, who was an old croney of his father's: "I ken'd him fu' well (said he,) when biggit near the Brig of Ayr; he would come to the boose and sit with my gude feyther for the hour thegither o'er the brandy-stoup, and crack of auld lang syne; but they are gan the way of aw flesh, and we must prepare to follow." But I mustn't forget Lieut. B— he was what you call an in-fid-hell, I don't know what it means, but some of the sodgers told me he'd no more religion than a pope; he had committed a fox-paw by profaning one of the Spanish churches, but he got over that, for his uncle was a nobleman: however, one day his regiment was order'd on some dangerous and honourable service, and so he throws himself into the sick-list with a gum-boil in his throat; but it wouldn't do, and he was near getting an emetic which would have made him throw up his commission, so the General, to save him, sent him home to take charge of the troops; but he was much despised, particularly by the ladies. He would often fall foul of the Doctor, and one fine clear night, when the stars were all glowing, I was at the helm, and the good old Scot was pointing 'em out by name to one of the lassies, and says he, "The heavens declare the glory of God! Wha but a gowk wad suppose that yon bright orbs were produced by blind chance, and that they have continued preceesely in the same place nearly sax thousand years, without a superintending power?" Up comes the young spark, and overhaul'd a great deal of lingo; but I couldn't understand it; I recollect the Doctor saying "Hoot hoot, wait a wee mon—wait a wee—If there is a God I'm right, and if there's nae God I'm right still." Well, Sir, these were our principal cabin passengers: there were others but I shall tire you to describe 'em all. The sodgers, poor souls, were most of 'em in a very low state, and the incessant quarrelling of the women deprived them of rest;—to be sure there were some exceptions, where the wife attended to the wants of her wounded but brave husband and sooth'd his harsh complainings with a voice of soften'd tenderness, and these were generally the youngest and prettiest amongst 'em. But to proceed: We had been out about ten days with tolerable fair weather, when just at the end of the dog-watch (that's about eight o'clock in the evening, Sir) a sudden squall hove the ship on her beam ends, and away went the main-top-sail clean out of the bolt-ropes—What a scene of confusion! The shrill howl of the wind—the shrieks of the women—the flapping of the fragments of the sail—the groans of the sufferers below, the dashing of the waters, and the yo-hoy of the sailors, with the bellowing of the captain—formed a concert which I dare say you have no desire to hear. We clued up till the squall was a little abated, and then all hands were employed in bending a new topsail: this occupied us till near midnight, and the gale continuing we furled the fore and mizen topsails, and set the reef'd foresail and trysail. By the reckoning, we were at no great distance from Ushant, and the wind being fair, we entertain'd hopes of soon getting into Plymouth: indeed by the time we had got all snug, the storm abated considerably, so, instead of turning in, we were obliged to remain on deck and set the topsails again; but scarce had we loosed the sails, when the wind took us right a-head, and blew harder than ever. Of all places in the world, the Bay of Biscay is the worst for a cross sea; you never know where it will take you. "Hold on aloft!" roared the captain, who saw it coming, and clung to the weather-shrouds; "Hold on fore and aft; mind your helm; ease her, boy, ease her." The sea struck us amidships, and a whole body of water burst upon the deck: away went bulwarks, boats, hen-coops, and every thing moveable. "A man overboard, a man overboard!" was echoed from all sides, and as soon as our eyes were clear of salt spray we saw three poor fellows buffeting with the waves; one was the helmsman, the others were invalids, who had crawl'd on deck for air. Oh, Sir, 'twas a distressing sight. At first we could hear them hallooing for assistance, and then their voices were lost in the howling of the gale; but we saw them, Sir, a long while. The helmsman had got hold of a spar, and one of the others on the boat's keel; the third had sunk! We kept sight of the first nearly all day, but couldn't save him, for another sea had carried away the bowsprit and foremast; the second, after remaining some time on the boat's bottom, let go his hold; the boat still floated on the wave, but he was gone for ever! O what must have been my poor messmate's feelings—his ship in view, though leaving him—himself devoted to destruction—the dark waters yawning on all sides to receive their prey—every billow a threatening grave—no hope. Thought he then of home? his wife, his little ones? Oh, Sir, what must have been his feelings! As night approach'd, so darker grew each scene of horror, and its deep'ning shades fell heavy on the seaman's soul. We had but little command of the ship, and were fast drifting to leeward. Night came, and sky and ocean seem'd blended together in the distance, while the sea around was one white foam. Wave after wave washed over us; the well was sounded, alarm was pictured on every countenance—she had sprung a leak. All hands muster'd at the pumps, but the water gained so fast—death stared us in the face! From the commencement of the gale, all the hatches were batten'd down, so that the poor creatures below were in total darkness, and nearly without food or air: some had fallen out of their hammocks, and, unable to rise, had been dash'd from side to side with the motion of the ship till they expired. The good Doctor exerted himself to the utmost, but to little purpose. About four in the morning the water had gained so much that every hope had fled, and the ship was sinking fast. The passengers after many struggles crowded on the deck, but scarcely were they secured when a dreadful shock told us another fatal truth. The ship had struck! Men, women, and children, rush'd from below, and every breaker carried off its victims. Oh what a scene of horror! We saw our companions washed from our side—witness'd their struggles as a prelude to our own—heard the loud yell when the last death-pang parted soul and body—and saw the children clinging round the parents as they sunk together! Every wave threw us higher on the rocks, and hope dawned with the day; but vain were our efforts to discover land, all was one raging foam. I had assisted to secure Captain R— and his daughters to the taffrail; the captain had done the same by Lieut. N— and his wife; the Doctor had shifted for himself, supporting Lieut. B— who clung round him in trembling alarm, till a sailor, observing his situation, gave him a lashing to the ring-bolt, and there he sat pale and quivering, wishing the bitterness of death had pass'd, yet dreading its approach, trying to pray, yet mingling curses with his pray'rs—shrieking as the roaring billows dash'd over us, and then laughing in all the convulsive agony of bitter despair. What a contrast to the worthy Doctor! there was no fear in his look, 'twas calm resignation, and an eye of tender compassion bent upon his fellow-sufferers: I heard him repeating to himself "I know in whom I have believed, I know that my Redeemer liveth." But oh the anguish of the grey-haired father, as each arm was thrown around those lovely plants, whose growth he'd watch'd from earliest infancy; and first he turned to the youngest—"Emma," said he—and then to the other, "Eliza," as if it was a dreadful dream whose certainty he fear'd; "Emma, Eliza, both my children—both doom'd to perish! Is there no hope? Great God, on me—on me inflict your wrath, but spare, oh spare my children." Mr. N— suffered severely from his wounds, and since the gale they had burst out afresh: his wife hung round his neck, and feebly he grasp'd his boy between his knees—his hold relax'd—grew weaker—and the poor child was wash'd away! Shrieking, the mother shook her husband in all the anguish of maddening torture—no notice was returned—his spirit had fled! And now a tremendous breaker came rolling tow'rd's us, as if mowing all its force to close the dreadful scene: it struck the ship—the rending timbers separated, carrying away that part of the stern where the sufferers were lash'd—I saw no more and recollect but little, except the horrid crash and the gurgling waters in my ears, mingled with groans and shrieks. When I recovered, I found myself laying on an old sail in a fishing vessel. They had observed me clinging to part of the floating wreck, and at imminent risk to themselves had pick'd me up. Three others were likewise saved, a soldier and two sailors—all, all the rest had perished! We had struck upon those dangerous sunken rocks on the coast of France, called the Saints, several miles from land, and where many a gallant ship and hardy Tar have mingled their timbers together—and those sweet girls, too—but they are happy, Sir, they are happy in another and a better world, where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest. AN OLD SAILOR.

PERSIAN MELODIES.

I.—TO THE KHAR-I-JARD, OR YELLOW THORN.

Sweet thorn of the desert,
Thy blossom appears
Like some lonely plant
That lightens the spheres;
The rose is less lovely,
Though fairer her flower,
Though morning has hail'd her
The queen of the bower.

She blooms where the lilies
Are blooming beside her,
She blows where no shadow
Hangs over to hide her,
But thou, where sad Nature
For ever has frown'd,
Where all things are gloomy
And desolate round.

Farewell! when thy beautiful
Blossoms I see,
Bright shrub, I shall borrow
This lesson from thee:
As thy flowers smile out
Thro' the thorns that entwine them,
So our pleasures arise
From the sorrows that shrine them.

II.

Yes, LAYLA, I had called a flower
To place it in thy virgin bower;
But then methought no flower so fair
As when thyself art blooming there.

I fain would round thy bosom twine
A string of those bright gems that shine
Where Umman's* fondling billow curls
Around the beds of sleeping pearls;

But every thoughtful eye would see
A gem of purer light in thee,
And, lost in thy more brilliant ray,
How soon those pearls would fade away!

THE VIRGIN CHIME.

There is nothing I regret more than the gradual disuse of those old customs with which my youth was so familiar, and which were preserved in my own parish when almost the remembrance of them had died away, and was forgotten even in the very neighbourhood. I well recollect the pride of the old sexton in keeping up these memorials of other years, and have frequently listened with pleasure to the simple arguments he brought forward to support his opinion, and the long harangue which used so much to delight the villagers, who gathered round to hear the venerable sage deal forth as it were his scraps of wisdom to the gaping throng.

With all the pedantry, which a village schoolmaster even though superannuated still retains, (and he had not forgotten that he once filled that honourable situation,) he would place himself under a venerable yew, which for centuries had graced the churchyard.—There would he hold forth in mystic lore, (for he still interlarded his speeches with latin and greek) to the great gratification of his rustic audience, and it was pleasing to observe with what attention the children listened to his discourses; the smiles of approbation which were visible on every countenance, and the low bow or respectful courtesy were to him ample acknowledgment. I have seen the old sexton so lost in admiration at the effect produced by his address, as to remain gazing upon himself with evident delight, yet so wrapt up and absent as only to recollect himself when heavy drops of rain began to penetrate the far-worn threads of a once black coat. Then, and not till then would he appear to remember that night was approaching; and when the owl had commenced its hootings from the ruins of a neighbouring barn, and perhaps affrighted at the melancholy noise, (for the sexton had his superstitious feelings) he would with quick pace regain his home, and there tell of the frightful visions and awful warnings that interrupted his delightful reverie.

It was on a cool but beautiful evening towards the commencement of spring, when nature arises from her bed of snow, and reanimates herb and plant, that I wandered along the fields to admire the beauties and the glories of the season. The crescent moon rode calmly along an unsullied sky, which was studded with myriads of fairest stars; the light was pale and quivering, and all was quiet below; the breeze had died away, the hum of the labourer and the whistle of the ploughboy alike had ceased, and night reigned in all her stillness. I strolled towards the churchyard,—to numbers a scene of terrors, but I had learned only to regard the many monuments of mortality which covered it, as reiterating the great truth which every work of God and man so loudly proclaims:—I felt the place congenial to my sorrows as promising a speedy relief and termination to my pains and troubles: and yet I repined nothing at my lot, but why should I thus burden the paper with my own feelings? When I gained the spot to which I generally resorted first—the grave of my parents, (and it was under the branches of the old yew) I saw the form of the sexton prostrate on the bench, gazing upon the star-lit sky; he seemed lost in meditation, and heeded not my approach; but, regardless of his reverie, I broke in upon it, and with a friendly salute soon aroused his wandering senses.

I found him in a most communicative humour, and he was already launching out on the miraculous powers worked by a comet upon an old cripple, in which he placed implicit confidence, when we were interrupted by the appearance of a poor emaciated female; she came to request that the passing bell might toll the departure of her only child, who was burnt to death. With all the alacrity of a much younger man he went to make preparations for announcing the termination of another mortal's career. I requested the poor woman to rest herself, and give me a short account of herself and the cause of this melancholy event. She had lost her husband some months before by a malignant fever, which once threatened to deprive her of her only daughter, but the pang was spared for a short while, to fall more heavily at a future period. The poor child was only reserved as a small and passing comfort, soon to leave an afflicted and broken-hearted parent, bereft of every stay and every consolation. The poor woman had that morning gone out for a few hours to the funeral of her mother, leaving her infant, as she was accustomed to do, in the house. But on her return, instead of the usual welcome, all was silent, the door was open, but her child was not there; she looked in every corner but they were vacant; her mind became confused, after the melancholy task she had just performed: little was she prepared for the disappearance of her daughter, and the necessary uneasiness and pain it occasioned her; but had hoped to find relief and consolation in the innocent prattle, with which she always endeavoured to dry the tears and dispel the gloom from her mother's countenance. The poor woman distracted with the suspense was hastening to enquire from a neighbour whether she had seen her Alice, when, awful sight, her almost consumed body was lying in her path—when she had related thus far, her emotions became so excessive that I begged she would desist, and assisted her to gain her solitary home. It was a small but neat cottage, surrounded with a creeping rose, which shed its perfumes around, and gave a sweet breath to the night. The moon was shining full upon it, and I could discern by its light the neatness with which the small garden before the house was arranged; but there was a deadly stillness about the scene which sensibly affected me on approaching this scene of death. As I entered the cottage I saw the pallet upon which lay the remains of one of the most interesting works of our Creator; her features were not touched by the fire, but agony had contracted the brow, and the beautiful blue eyes were staring from their sockets. There was a look of the deepest pain upon her countenance, and her hair hung loose upon her shoulders. Her mother burst into a frantic cry as we entered the house, and it was a painful task to appease her wounded feelings. I left her, but promised to return and see that necessary preparations were made for performing the last offices to the dead.

I walked slowly and thoughtfully towards the church, the moon was bright in the cloudless sky, the music of a babbling brook which ran at my feet, seemed to lull my soul into a peaceful quiet, and to remove those deep and heart-rending feelings which the scene I had so lately witnessed called up. There was a peaceful serenity in nature which accorded well with my disposition at that moment, and I gained the church-yard ere I was aware of having trodden half the road. The sound that reached my ear was not that which is customary as the knell to announce the departure of our brethren; but, it was a peal I remembered to have heard when very young; it was on the loss of a playmate who was burnt to death on his birth-day; glad was his little heart as the morning broke, and bustle and joy stirred him as he made the preparation to see his friends, but melancholy was the close of that day, ere that sun, which he had seen rise in all its majesty, was gone to rest, his eyes were closed for ever,—his feeling heart was insensible to pity and to love, and that pulse which so often beat for misery and wretchedness was stilled in death;—his arm was nerveless, and his tongue was for ever silenced!

Such was the peal which then rang upon my ear, and awakened all the sympathies of youth within my bosom. I found the old sexton at his post ringing two of the three bells of our parish church, and his son, who had some time since arrived at manhood, assisting with the other. As I entered the place where they sat, the old man heaved a deep sigh, and I could see, by the faint light of the lantern (which hung close to his features,) a heavy tear start from his hollow eye and fall from his wrinkled face upon the ground; another was succeeding, but as if ashamed of this expression of his finer feelings, he dashed it from his eye, ere it had fully shown itself. "Seldom," exclaimed he, "have I been called to this task, and only once since I remember has the virgin chime been rung by these bells; and may they never again sound so awful a note. True it is that the custom is dying away, but whilst I have strength to pull, the habits of our fathers shall be continued in my native place; but when death shall claim the shattered remains of an old man, his name and the customs he so long supported will alike sink into oblivion and not a trace remain of either." I tried to soothe his feelings, and when the hour had elapsed he accompanied me. We left the church, silent was the scene, and it seemed to have a like influence upon us, for not a word escaped our lips during the walk; we parted, and painful reflection occupied the night, till sweet and refreshing slumbers tranquilized my perturbed bosom.

IGNOTO.

DUNGEONS OF THE INQUISITION IN MADRID.

The soldiers, after searching the apartments, entered some cellars, where daylight had never, or but faintly, been admitted. There they found human beings, more like skeletons, who had for many years been invoking death to put an end to their sufferings. They had been accused of crimes entirely unknown to them. The soldiers found many human bones of other unhappy beings, who had been sacrificed in this Tartarean abode; and where the prerogative of the king could not extend to protect them, nor justice interfere. The officer informed me that many foreigners had suddenly disappeared, and had never been heard of afterwards. Every one was fearful of enquiring about the fate of any of his friends, who might have disappeared, lest he should meet a similar fate. Age, sex, or wealth, claimed no exemption from the effects of this infernal power. Here the officer became animated, and continued with energy: "Religion alone is not the pretext for their displeasure and persecution; private hatred, jealousy, or a thirst for revenge have furnished reasons for the exercise of their demoniacal vengeance."

I repeatedly interrupted the narrative of the speaker manifesting some doubts of the accuracy of his statement, particularly as far as regarded the accounts he had heard of the tortures which had been inflicted by this tribunal; which would draw tears from the most inveterate tyrant, and can hardly, one would suppose, be a true description of any punishment decreed in the present century.

Some of the tortures alluded to were, according to his narrative, as follow: the victim was fastened on large planks with iron hooks, and was compelled to swallow, through pipes, great quantities of water. In the mean time they placed on his stomach heavy burdens, some of them as heavy as five hundred-weight. Others had their heads shaved, were chained to the walls, and cold water dropped in drops upon their heads. "This," exclaimed the officer, "must fill every human being with horror, when he reflects that such cruelty could be tolerated in the present enlightened age, and practised, too, in the name, and under the sanction of religion!"—Bransen's Remarks on the North of Spain.

VOYAGE OF DISCOVERY.

St. Petersburg, August 1823.

On the 9th of this month the Enterprise corvette, of the Imperial navy, sailed from Cronstadt under the command of Captain Otto Von Kotzebue. This vessel was built in the course of last winter, expressly for this Expedition. It carries 24 cannon, and has a crew of 13 officers and 60 men, all of them volunteers from the royal navy. There are besides two Physicians, both well versed in natural history, an Astronomer, a Mineralogist, and a Naturalist. One of the Physicians is Dr. Eschscholz, who accompanied Captain Kotzebue in his voyage on board the Rurik. The astronomer is M. Preiss, assistant in the University of Dorpat. The mineralogist and the naturalist are Messrs. Lintz and Hoffman, both likewise from Dorpat. The ship is bound to Rio de Janeiro, then round Cape Horn to the South Sea. This will be Captain Kotzebue's third voyage round the world. The first was twenty years ago, with Captain Krusenstern; the second on board the Rurick fitted out at the expense of Count Romanzow.

OBSTRUCTION OF BLOOD IN THE LUNGS.—The Annals of Philosophy of the present month contains a valuable communication from Dr. Williams, of Liverpool, on the immediate cause and effect of the obstruction of blood in the lungs. After remarking that it has not hitherto been shown by physiologists, how or upon what principle it happens, that immediately on the cessation of life, the arteries become comparatively empty and flattened, Dr. Williams gives an account of some experiments on the canine species; from which he draws the following important inferences:—"That the blood is obstructed in its passage through the lungs, on suspension of respiration, while its circulation through the other parts of the body continues.—That the blood is obstructed in the lungs, by suspended respiration, preventing it from coming in contact with the atmospheric air.—That the obstruction of blood in the lungs, on suspension of respiration, is the chief cause of the vacuum of the system circulating arterial blood, post mortem. And, that the immediate cause of the cessation of the action of the heart, is the privation of its natural stimulus, owing to the obstruction of the blood in the lungs." To these succeed some very legitimate and sensible remarks on the effects produced on the human system by impeded respiration; or in other words, from an inadequate supply of atmospheric air, for the purpose of decarbonating or purifying the blood. It has been long suspected that the oxygenous or vital portion of our atmosphere, formed the immediate agent, through the medium of the lungs, in restoring the dark venous blood to the vivid red of the arterial vessels; but the modus operandi have never previously been demonstrated in the manner here reported by Dr. Williams.

GAS LIGHTS IN INDIA.—The Bombay Gazette, of the 26th of April, states, that Mr. Barthgate, an eminent chemist and druggist of Calcutta, had illuminated his warehouse in a brilliant manner with gas. Crowds of the better descriptions of natives flocked round the place, expressing their admiration at the beautiful contrivance. Several apparatus had been carried from England, and as coal and oil are abundant in Calcutta, there can be no difficulty in their application.

VARIETIES.

QUAINT TEXTS.—Two young persons, whose names were Adam and Lowe, were, some time since, candidates for a vacant Lectureship in the Metropolis. Being appointed to deliver their probationary Sermons on the same day, they agreed to cast lots which was to preach first, and the lot fell upon Mr. Lowe. He addressed his audience from those words, "Adam, where art thou?" In the afternoon, when it was Mr. Adam's turn to preach, he selected for the theme of his discourse, the following text, "Lo! I am here." The text seemed so very à-propos to the occasion, that he was immediately chosen to the Lectureship, to the great mortification of his competitor.

ABRAHAM AND HIS TREASURE.—The Talmudists relate that Abraham, in travelling to Egypt, brought with him a chest. At the custom house the officers exacted the duties. Abraham would have readily paid, but desired they would not open the chest. They first insisted on the duties for clothes, which Abraham consented to pay; but then they thought by his ready acquiescence that it might be gold. Abraham consents to pay for gold. They now suspect it might be silk. Abraham was willing to pay for silk, or more costly pearls—in short, he consented to pay as if the chest contained the most valuable of things. It was then they resolved to open and examine the chest; and behold, as soon as the chest was opened, that great lustre of human beauty broke out which made such a noise in the land of Egypt—it was Sarah herself! The jealous Abraham, to conceal her beauty, had locked her up in this chest.

CHANCE.—When Isaiah Thomas, the printer, of Massachusetts, was printing his almanac for the year

1780 one of the boys asked him what he should put opposite the 13th of July. Mr. T. being engaged, replied, "any thing, any thing;" the boy returned to the office and set, "rain, hail, and snow." The country was all amazement—the day arrived, when it actually rained, hailed, and snowed violently. From that time Thomas' almanacs were in great demand.

THE IRISH MIRACLES.—The Dublin Patriot, speaking of Prince Hohenlohe's Miracles, accounts for them from "the power of imagination;" and gives a curious recital of the surprising and almost ludicrous effects produced by the excitement of the imagination on a number of persons in the General Hospital at Bath, and in the Bristol Infirmary, in 1799, when the American quack, Dr. Perkins, was performing his miraculous cures by his Patent Metallic Tractors, so scientifically formed of the precious metals, that upon being drawn over the parts affected by rheumatism, gout, and other chronic diseases, they gave instantaneous relief to the afflicted patients, and caused many wonderful recoveries from the effects of these diseases. In order to expose the humbug, Dr. Haygarth and Dr. Falconer, of Bath, caused fictitious tractors to be made of wood, which were painted so as closely to imitate Perkin's Tractors, with which they experimented upon the patients in the Bath General Hospital with precisely the same effects as those produced by the Metallic Tractors. Similar experiments were also tried in the Bristol Infirmary, by Mr. Richard Smith and Dr. Moncrieffe, the results of which clearly proved, to a degree which had never before been suspected, what a powerful influence on diseases is produced by mere imagination.

HOW TO ESCAPE THE PICKPOCKETS.—A gentleman at Queen-square Police-office lately mentioned, that, in the course of one month, he had been robbed by pickpockets of not less than nine valuable silk handkerchiefs. Mr. Markland jocosely observed, "You are a slow walker, Colonel, I believe?" Colonel: "Very much so, your worship." Mr. Markland: "I thought so, and this is the cause of your losing so many handkerchiefs; thieves always attack the slowest walkers. I, said the magistrate, never walk slowly in the street, and never had my pocket picked."

MONUMENT.—A handsome monument has been recently erected in the parish church of Henley-on-Thames, to the memory of the late General Dumouriez. The following is the inscription:

A Translation of the above is requested from some of our young friends.

One of our contemporary journals states, what would almost appear incredible among the reading population of Great Britain, that in eleven counties of Ireland there is not a single bookseller's shop!

LONGEVITY.—M. Neumark, of Ratisbon, has just published a curious Treatise on the means of attaining to an advanced age. The examples which he has quoted of persons who have lived to between ninety and a hundred years of age, are from twelve to twenty of every year in that interval. Those of centenarians, and up to a hundred and fifteen years, are more numerous; but the number diminishes of those who have attained the age of a hundred and twenty-three years, being not more than four to nine. The examples of persons of a greater age than a hundred and twenty-three years, are naturally more rare. M. Neumark has quoted only one of two hundred, two of two hundred and ninety-seven, and one of three hundred and sixty. The individual who reached the last-mentioned age was called Jesu de Temporibus; he was enquirey to Charlemagne, and died in Germany in 1128. It is remarkable, that there are few people of rank and few physicians among the centenarians. Hippocrates and Dufoin (the latter of whom died at Paris, in 1805, aged a hundred and fifteen years,) are almost the only ones. Among monarchs, except Frederick the Second, who lived to the age of seventy-six years, few have passed seventy. Among three hundred Popes, only seven reached the age of eighty years. Among philosophers who have become old, may be reckoned Kelper, Bacon, Newton, Euler, Kant, Fontenelle, &c. Among poets, Sappho, Pindar, Young, Haller, Voltaire, Bodmer, Göthe, &c. The most numerous examples of longevity have been furnished by Russia, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Hungary, and Great Britain.

M. Neumark will meet with many incredulous people who will not admit, without very positive proof, that any person ever attained to so extraordinary an age as this M. Jesu de Temporibus.

THE DRAMA.

On Saturday evening we were much gratified with the representation of Dr. Hoadley's Comedy of "The Suspicious Husband," and the laughable Farce of "The Liar," both of which owed much to the exertions of Mr. ELLISTON, who was Ranger himself in the former, and an admirable Wilding in the latter. Mr. E., whose buoyancy of spirits seems still to bid defiance to the ravages of time, supported both characters with his usual excellence.

Mrs. W. West, who made her début before us this evening, was very well received, and contributed much to our entertainment. With a commanding figure this lady possesses elegance of style, and peculiar sweetness of countenance. Mr. Gattie performed Papillon in the Liar, and merited the warm reception he experienced. Miss Collins, as Mrs. Strickland, displayed considerable ability; we feel convinced that in a short time this lady will become a deserved favourite. Mr. Browne personated Jack Meggot. This gentleman, being on the eve of departure for a London engagement, was called upon at the end of the play—He took leave of the public in a short appropriate address, in the course of which he was so affected as to express his feelings and bid adieu to his old friends with considerable difficulty. The other characters were upon the whole well sustained.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. X. is extremely humorous at our expense. However, if guilty, we are not inclined to utter even a syllable on our own behalf. Mrs. B.—has ever been a favourite with us, and we can scarcely conceive how we happened to neglect an article from her pen; we know but one way of ascertaining whether it ever before reached us; and that is, by our last Correspondent saying whether any other item was enclosed with it, and which subsequently appeared? Should this not have been the case we must beg to appease our angry friends by roundly averring its non-arrival.

Ignoto will find "The Virgin Chime" in our present number. "The Rose of Lunedale" is received, and shall be inserted shortly.

"Susan" is measured prose; and, even as such, we consider it inferior to many prose articles which we have received from the same pen. The story is not well told, neither is it so interesting.—The innocent should not suffer for the guilty; nor should the departure from rectitude and innocence be so indifferently passed over.

Vindex will perceive that his communication is superseded by one which was received early in the week.

Scrutator cannot expect further particulars.

PUBLIC LECTURES.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—With your correspondent Z. I am convinced that the diffusion of Scientific knowledge in Manchester would be an incalculable blessing to its inhabitants generally. But, how is this diffusion to be effected? For, if restricted to the higher and middle classes, the benefit will be, indeed, partial; too limited to merit attention!

I am not aware that it requires any extraordinary qualifications to render individuals of either of the above classes eligible to become members of the Manchester Philosophical Society; nor do I believe this Society to comprise more than a very small proportion of our literary and scientific townsmen: neither am I of opinion that its members are, in general, particularly distinguished for extensive and accurate knowledge in the Arts and Sciences. I readily admit that several eminent characters honour it with their presence and communications; but, I presume, it will not be disputed that much of its time is occupied with futile hypotheses, and unprofitable disquisition. And hence, I do not conceive that the Manchester Philosophical Society is at all calculated to effect the object under consideration.

Scientific Lectures are in most instances equally ineffective, on account of 1. Expense, 2. The too often questionable talents of the Lecturers, and 3. The impossibility that their apparatus for experiment and illustration, should co-extend with the great design in all its necessary ramifications.

If the wish of Z. be to interest and materially benefit our town in pleasing and profitable knowledge, a commensurate plan should be adopted, and that must be,—the establishing of almost gratuitous lectures, to be delivered and illustrated by men of experience and talent, and of a select library of easy access.

Cannot the munificent spirit of ANDERSON, the diligence and liberality of URE, and the attention and intelligence of the GLASGOW PEOPLE—be equally exemplified in Manchester?

The following outline most satisfactorily shows the basis and arrangement which can alone realize to the Individuals, Families, and Community of this town, the enjoyments and advantages so justly eulogised and well introduced by Z. I am, &c.

A CALICO PRINTER.

Manchester, Sept. 22, 1823.

Outline of the ANDERSONIAN INSTITUTION, Glasgow.
DR. URE, Professor.

"The original design of the mechanic's class, was limited, as you know, to the exhibition and explanation of mechanical models. But the progress of machinery in your workshops, has now so far outrun the state of the models left by the venerable Founder of the Institution, as to render their display, with a very few exceptions, useless, except as historical documents of the rudeness of the times in which they were framed.

I have, accordingly, for ten years, employed chiefly modern apparatus, procured at my own expense, and by rendering the instructions miscellaneous, have adapted them better to the diversity of your pursuits. Besides teaching the usual elements of mechanics and their general combinations, I have made it my business to explain the properties of the atmosphere, on which the action of pumps depends; the nature of hydrostatic equilibrium, and hydraulic impulse, as subservient to the construction of Bramah's press, and water-wheels; the beautiful laws of heat so admirably applied to perfect the steam-engine, by our illustrious fellow-citizen; nor have I declined, in compliance with your wishes, to lay before you from time to time, such views of the constitution of nature, in electricity, optics, and astronomy, as might awaken the powers of your minds, and reward your attention to the less attractive branches of science. But a subject deserving particular attention, was that of the chemical arts, in which many of you are engaged; a knowledge of the scientific principles of which, as taught in the Colleges, circumstances permit few of you to acquire. You have listened to my chemical lessons with the keenest interest; and have applied your studies to conspicuous advantage. Need I adduce, among other things, the unrivalled beauty of the Adrianople madder dye, as executed on the most extensive scale,* by individuals who have been my faithful pupils, for nearly the whole course of my public career. By a steady prosecution of this expanded system of instruction, your class has progressively increased in number and importance; so that, within the last twelve years, I have delivered twenty-one courses of lectures to upwards of six thousand students in this department alone."

The whole experimental means at present employed in carrying on this POLYTECHNIC SCHOOL, have been derived from the exertions and sacrifices of the Professor, and the generous aid and contributions of his pupils. They have supplied him with much valuable practical information on their respective arts, with many curious models, and subsidiary instruments of illustration; while he, in return, has expended large sums of money, in framing popular representations of the scientific discoveries and improvements, in which the present age is so prolific.

To the mechanic's class a library is attached, consisting of the best treatises on the sciences and arts, with some valuable works on general literature, such as, history, geography, travels, &c. of which they have the exclusive management and perusal. The foundation of it was laid in the year 1807, by a voluntary subscription, amounting, I think, to about £30; and several books which I collected from my friends, with about 100 volumes from my own library. Many members of the class have contributed from time to time; and it has recently acquired considerable extension, from the receipts of lectures which I delivered for its benefit.

Besides the acknowledged and palpable effect of such a plan of tuition, on the improvement of the useful arts, it has another operation, more silent, but neither less certain, nor less important, namely, its influence in meliorating the moral condition of the operative order of society.

A taste for science elevates the character, and creates a disrelish, and disgust, at the debasement of intoxication. Philosophy dressed in an attractive garb, leads away from the temptations of the tavern. Thus, too, the transition from the drudgery or turmoil of the week, to the tranquillity of Sunday, is secured by the preceding evening's occupation. The man indeed whose Saturday night is spent in rioting or drunkenness, will make a bad Christian on the Sabbath, an indifferent workman on Monday, and an unhappy husband and father through the week. To promote this moral operation of science, I have always taken occasion to point out the beneficent design which the whole mechanism of nature displays. If the contemplation of the miseries and crimes which stain the page of history, have led some speculators to cavil at the government of a benevolent Creator; the contemplation of the harmonious laws, and benignant adjustments which the science of nature discloses, must satisfy every candid student, of the presence and providence of a wise and beneficent Lawgiver.—URE's Address, April 1816.—See the Introduction to his Dictionary of Chemistry.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I have read with much interest the frank and gentlemanly letter of Dr. Gregory, inserted in the last number of your publication. I wish it to be remembered that when I claimed superiority for M. Biot, I did so merely on account of his scientific character.

I certainly cherish no "feelings" towards Dr. Gregory, but such as are perfectly respectful; and I have no further knowledge of him (apart from the reports which I have heard on the subject of our present correspondence) than what I have derived from the perusal of his various interesting and valuable publications. My only object, in the observations which I have offered, was to defend the character of an enlightened foreigner, who, it appeared to me, had, in the Memoir of Dr. Gregory, been most illiberally and unjustly assailed. When I next visit London, which will probably be in a short time, I shall, if I have sufficient leisure for the purpose, have much pleasure in accepting the Doctor's invitation; and I beg to assure him that, convinced, by his statement, of the errors of the reports which I have heard, I shall be quite as ready to do justice to his character, as I have been to defend that of M. Biot. The Dr. will then be able to judge for himself how far a depreciation of his merits, "may be congenial to the views or disposition of Cæsar in his real character." I submit to him, in the mean time, whether this slanderous attack upon private character, which his advocate, who professes to know him well, seems to think necessary to his defence, may gratify his feelings, or suit his purposes. To the Doctor's private character I have made no allusion whatever; and it is for him to say, whether he is ready to sanction this unjustifiable attack upon mine.

I unite with the real friends of Dr. Gregory in suggesting the publication of his statement. The heavy charges which he has brought against M. Biot, whose works are much read, and whose merits are therefore well known in this country, seem to require something more for their support than even the Doctor's respectable authority. The statement might not only put an end to the misconceptions which exist at present on the subject; but, in some measure, protect the scientific character of this country, which has, I believe, suffered much on the continent, from the small share that the English Mathematicians appear to have taken in the Shetland expedition, from which M. Biot alone, seems to have gained any thing like credit.

The quibbling and petulant attack of J. M. is, in every respect, unworthy of notice.

I should, indeed, be sorry to be compelled by any person who may force his friendship on Dr. Gregory, to say more of him than I intended. I entertain in this affair no feelings of hostility; and, had I been permitted, I should have dropped the subject after the publication of my first letter. I cannot see what J. M. can hope for in his advocacy of the Doctor, whose only defence in this instance is that contained in his own library. I shall not imitate J. M. by suspecting that he may have some reasons, "in his real character," for the extravagant compliments which he so awkwardly pays to Dr. Gregory, and to the editor of the Imperial Magazine! His "real character" is a matter of as little concern to me, as mine ought to be to him.

Those who may have read your correspondent's article with attention, will perhaps be as much amused as I have been, at his criticisms upon the style of my former letter. In a case in which your readers can so easily judge for themselves it is unnecessary for me to recriminate.

I shall at present only repeat that the very improper allusions to M. Biot, in the Memoir of Dr. Gregory, induced me to take up my pen on this occasion; and I now very willingly leave the public to determine, whether the character of the latter is likely to suffer more from my observations, or from his Manchester advocate's singular defence. TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—While myself and a friend were taking a walk a short time ago, towards evening, in the vicinity of Oxford Road, we were surprised on passing one of the large factories, to feel the specking of small rain on our faces, and to observe minute globules of water on our coats, though the sun was shining, and the sky clear, with the exception of a few scattered clouds floating in the horizon. We were totally at a loss to account for so singular an occurrence; however, accidentally observing a few minutes afterwards, owing to the rushing noise, that the steam was let off at the engine house, whence it arose abundantly in voluminous white clouds of apparently great density it struck us we had discovered the cause. The phenomenon was, no doubt, owing simply to the condensation, and consequent liquid form, of the vapour, which, while in a purely æriform state, had diffused itself in the atmosphere as far as the place where we were—a distance of perhaps sixty or eighty yards.

The formation of rain, I believe, is, at present, but imperfectly understood;—the above may possibly throw some light on that important branch of meteorology.

I am, yours, &c. L. M. N.

Manchester, Sept. 1823,

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I send you for insertion the following extract from the last edition of Dr. Henry's "Elements of Chemistry."

"M. D'Arcet prepares gelatine from bones, not by boiling, but by dissolving out the earthy matter by steeping the bones in diluted muriatic acid. The gelatine remains in a solid state, preserving the form of the bone, and thus furnishing a complete proof that it existed in the bone ready formed."

"Hence bones contain gelatine as one of their ingredients. But besides this animalized substance, another is discovered by the slow action of diluted nitric or muriatic acid. Either of these acids dissolve both the earthy salts and gelatine, and a soft flexible substance remains, retaining, in a great measure, the shape of the original bone."

The substance which remains after the action of the acid, is stated by Mr. Hatchett, its discoverer, "most to resemble coagulated albumen," which differs from gelatine in its chemical composition. If the information conveyed in the last extract be correct, M. D'Arcet has not been preparing gelatine, but coagulated albumen.

Perhaps some of your scientific readers may be able to reconcile the difference between the statements, or give such information as will satisfy, those, who, like myself, are but novices in chemistry. TYRO.

BANKERS AND BOOKSELLERS.

MR. EDITOR,—Some observations have been lately made, or rather repeated, in the Kaleidoscope, respecting a practice which generally prevails in some of the most respectable banks in Manchester, of persons remaining uncovered, during their visit there, for the transaction of business. But why should this practice appear singular, or be supposed, for a moment, to arise from 'pure reverence and respect to filthy lucre?' The doors of the banks are generally closed, and the whole interior is always, and at all seasons, sufficiently warm and comfortable to induce an Englishman, unless he is a Quaker, to take off his beaver, merely for his own personal comfort, and that he may feel the advantage of it when he goes out again; and sometimes, perhaps, from respect to others who, like himself, are come on business, not to mention the principals, some of whom are generally on the spot, and highly respectable, both publicly as bankers, and privately in their individual capacities. Whatever may have been the cause of the practice referred to, it is now become a regular thing,—just as regular as it is on entering a bookseller's shop, or any other common retail shop, to keep the hat on. And here a good reason may be assigned for not uncovering the head, as the doors of all such shops are almost invariably kept open, both summer and winter. When that is the case, would it not be unnatural and inconvenient to take off the hat? And this, I apprehend, constitutes the main difference between bankers and booksellers, which it should appear, had not occurred to the writer in the Kaleidoscope,—probably a stranger in Manchester, though he dates his communication from that place.

On entering a bank, every one finds himself in a warm and comfortable apartment, with closed doors; but on going into a bookseller's shop, the doors remain constantly open. But in either case, each individual is left to consult his own feelings. That the bankers themselves do not expect or wish their friends to take off their hats, is manifest, as no hat-pegs are provided, lest it might be supposed, as a matter of course, that all who entered the bank should hang up their hats.

I am well aware that in London, the same practice does not prevail, as in Manchester, and some other provincial towns in the neighbourhood. But in London, as well as in the country, the practice is entirely optional; and the bankers, as already observed, do not prescribe any particular rule, but leave it to every individual to act as is most agreeable to himself, or to general custom, which, as in the present case, has commonly its foundation in reason and propriety. Yours, &c. S. X.

THE DUTCH MINSTREL.

Beside you oak which rears its rugged form
Above the solitary waste, (where thro' the night,
The owlets' cries are heard upon the storm,
And wizard beings flit upon the sight,
And sounds unearthly break from the dark wood.)
An aged man care-worn and feeble stood.

Grey were the hairs that flow'd on his breast,
A mantle or cloak o'er his shoulders was flung,
And from the thick folds of his ample vest,
The lyre of the ancient minstrel was hung:
Dim were his eyes that to heaven were cast,
And seem'd the high ruler of all to invoke:
His thoughts were with years that long since had past,
And his voice on the silence thus pænefully broke:—

Star of the night, now brightly shining,
Thou'lt see my hills, on thy declining,
Thou'lt beam on the blue and the rolling ocean,
Where often I lay'd mid the waves' commotion.
And perhaps one glimpse thou may'st have of the spot,
Where one may be weeping the wanderer's lot,
And the boy of my hope may look upon thee,
And think of his sire in a far country.

Oh dear to the mother's the lip of her child,—
And dear to the blind would the heaven's light fall,
Could they view the bright scenes 'neath its influence mild:
But dearer's the land of our birth-right than all!

Batavia! my country,—when shall I behold thee,
When tread thy flower'd fields I when thy breezes sigh!
Oh when shall the arms I love dearest ensfold me,
Nor longer the dart of misfortune assail!

In thy bow'rs, by thy streamlets again to recline,
While my own native skies their kind radiance shed,
To read thy sweet songs—for none sweeter than thine
'Neath the vault of the heav'n's, my country, are read.

Hail birds of Batavia! an old man's tears
And blessings be with ye, wherever ye roam;
For the joys he has felt, where you woodland appear,
And the songs of his land have again borne him home.

For who the harp can tune with thy address,
Delightful Minstrel, Zwoll's acknowledged pride,
Ah who again the pensive chords will wail,
Raise the free soul where meditation wails
Her wondrous love displays, and gently take
The thought from earth to heav'n!—who can express
The music of thy song when fraught with love,
Which falls as night dews fall from clouds above,
And soft revive some drooping flower's tear:
Such as the saints might write and angels hear!

Or who the thrilling chords can swell
Of battles fierce alarms to tell,
That at the sound,
The warrior's round,
Start, as e'en now the war's rude crash was near,
Each breast elate,
Disdaining fate,
Wildly they brandish high the treacherous spear.

Hark!—methinks the swords are clashing—
The cymbal's clang—the drum's dull beat,—
The cannon's roar—the ship's roar hoarse—
The loud hurra—the wounded's cry—
As o'er their forms the horsemen fly—
And banners high on air are dashing.

Now the babel noises rise,
Now the din ascends the skies,
And anon in murmurs dies;
O'er the plain imbued with gore,
Again the volleying cannon roars,
And victory joyous sounds from shore to shore!

In sorrow now the old man roars,
And while the lyre he touch'd again,
He breath'd a tale so full of woes,
That pity sigh'd to hear the strain:
And the lone minstrel as the chords he swept,
Thought of his home, reclin'd his head, and wept.

THE ROSE OF LUNEDALE.

Her in her helpless years depriv'd of all,
Of every stay, save Innocence and Heaven,

And poor, th'd in a cottage, far retir'd,
Among the windings of a woody vale.

THOMSON.

The morning was dark and cold, and the bleak wind howled along the moor, large and heavy flakes of snow were borne upon the blast, nature was wrapt in the heavy mantle of winter, and the most expansive scene presented to the eye nothing but a dreary waste of frozen snow. It was the Sabbath morning, and man rested from his labour; not a human figure was to be seen throughout the village, and only here and there a shepherd moved slowly along to see his flocks secured from the biting blast.

My usual visitors the pretty redbreasts had received their morning repast, and had flown to the corner of the barn to pass the remainder of the day. I have long received the greatest pleasure from these companions of my solitary hours, and derive more amusement from their innocent chirping than from the more pompous conversation of many of my acquaintance. Solitude and reflection occupy the greatest part of my time, and days elapse without any other visitors than the harmless robins.

I sat by my fire perusing a production of one of our learned divines, till the bell should summon me to attend the Morning Service;—in the mean time the sky became heavier, the clouds collected into a larger and a denser mass, the wind raged more furiously and whistled louder than before, and the elements seemed to be suddenly convulsed. The walk to the church was short, but incommoded by branches of trees which lay across the path, torn from their parent stem by the whirling tempest. Few were the attendants in the House of God, and cold looked the scene as I cast my eyes around, and saw so small a congregation: and that too at a period when, from the shock, I had expected to behold my neighbours, prostrate at the altar of our God, offering up petitions for their safety.

But there was one who attracted, nay rivetted my firmest attention; wrapt up in devotion to her maker, knelt the form of a plain and modest female, the pride and joy of the whole village and the very joy and spirit of the children. I have seen her with the greatest cheerfulness lead the young train on May morning and join in the dance around the pole, she was always foremost in assisting with the decorations, and the garden of Jane Dobson was the chief resort of the neighbourhood on that happy festival. Last May day she was crowned their Queen; but in all her joy, and with the bright countenance she then wore, how far was she from the lovely creature I beheld her in the House of God! Piety, adoration, and a modest fear, alternately were predominant as she joined in the various devotional services. She sat, with the other poor of the parish, around the altar, and I could hear her melodious voice join, with loud, yet unassuming tone, in the morning hymn, as she diffidently led the youthful choir. When the sermon commenced she sat a monument of attention, a pattern, to the old as well as young, and a model which wealthy and poor might study to equal advantage. Yet there was a melancholy depicted on her countenance, and I could discern that something beyond what met the eye, was moving within her bosom: as soon as the service was concluded I followed her home, under the idea of seeing her mother, and in her learning the cause of her daughter's melancholy. By this time the clouds were dispersed, and a faint ray of sunshine gave animation to the scene, the wind had ceased, and the sea, which was in view from the church-yard, lay calm and still, nature seemed to have felt the force of divine worship, and to have settled into quiet on this holy day. Still the air was cold, and the trees hung with myriads of icicles which burst upon the sight in ten thousand of the brightest and most varied colours under the rays of the sun.

The walk was short, and a few minutes brought me to the door of a neat but humble cottage, bereft outwardly of every appearance which could give the faintest idea of the comfort and happiness of its inmates; the twining rose tree was devoid of leaves, and the sweet jessamin hung down its brown and bare branches, the eaves were covered with snow, and winter had thrown a sad and dreary mantle over the abode of peace. I arrived before the youthful Jane, and found her venerable parent, over whose brows the white locks hung in profusion, reading her family bible, she had it open at that part where the Psalmist so energetically and so beautifully exclaims "They that go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in the great waters, these in the deep"—As I entered she drew her spectacles from her time-worn brow, and placing them carefully between the leaves to mark her place, closed the book. She wore a calm and peaceful countenance, but I fancied there was still visible a ray of resignation under some affliction, though little did it show itself. The customary salutations and enquiries over, I dropped a hint respecting her daughter, and ventured to ask the reason of her absence so long after the conclusion of the service. I could perceive a deep though half stifled sigh escape from her bosom, before she composed herself to answer me. She then began "The narrative I could tell you, and which relates to my Jane, is too long to go through at present, it would occupy me on the sabbath otherwise than I feel my duty, and I should deem myself wrong in neglecting the few hours of this blessed day by recalling scenes too worldly to admit of a communion with our Maker." It was in vain to make any further request, and indeed I should not have felt myself justified in pressing such a measure; but, had it been otherwise, the arrival of her daughter would have put a stop to the recital which I was to hear on the morrow.

From the great intimacy that had always existed between the family of my father and old dame Dobson, I felt an additional interest in the life of her daughter, towards whom I looked as a friend, the companion and playmate of my childhood, and into whose welfare I should always feel myself bound to see.

Monday arrived, it was calm and the sun threw a few partial rays upon the earth; the wind had totally ceased, and I enjoyed the walk to my old neighbours; having set off early, I found the dame and her daughter seated at breakfast, by particular request I joined them in the repast, and never was heartier meal made at the table of royalty, than I enjoyed with the happy couple. As soon as breakfast was finished, Jane, who seemed more lively than on the preceding day, prepared to walk to a neighbouring farmer's, whose daughter was to be married in the course of the week; they had been companions from their infancy, and had a sort of rivalry as to who should first enter into matrimony. And though her friend seemed to have been the more fortunate, the good tempered Jane tripped lightly along to congratulate her, and if possible, to add to her happiness.

When we were alone, Mrs. Dobson gave a recital which, to avoid her prolixity, I shall endeavour to curtail, without losing any incident. I fear it may be deemed trifling to many, but not being ambitious that this book should ever pass out of my own family, or at least from the hands of my friends, I feel a pleasure in conning over circumstances which call to mind those innocent, those happy days, when I knew no want, and when all my desires were bounded by the sphere of my acquaintance, and the village of my birth. Days that have passed like a dream, but to which I shall often look with pleasure and regret.

But to return; I soon had called to my memory a young man of considerable promise, Henry Atkins, who once entertained hopes of soon becoming the rightful protector of Jane Dobson, and with no less pleasure did Jane look forward to that time when she might rest in his bosom secure from the ills of the world, the affianced wife of her Henry.

It was on one of the finest mornings of the September previous to the time at which I sat with Mrs. Dobson, that Henry had risen earlier than usual to greet his Jane on her natal day, decked in his Sunday finery, and carrying on his arm a basket of the finest fruit and flowers of the season, as he approached the cottage he drew forth a flute and played a favourite tune which his beloved used often to warble, the door was open, and, as if visitors had been expected, the old oaken table was set in the middle of the room, on which stood a large bowl of new milk, and some fine specimens of those fruits which her garden produced and had been carefully preserved for the occasion. Delighted with the modest simplicity of her who dwelt nearest his heart, Henry likewise began to arrange the contents of his basket; but scarcely had he commenced when his arm was seized by the firm grasp of a man,—unprepared for any other company than that of Jane, and suspecting no danger, he started, but what was his amazement to see the place filled with a rude press-gang, treading down unconcernedly the trees which he had always looked upon with pleasure, because the rearing of one whom he loved. He was borne off without being allowed a parting word to any one in the village. The report soon spread; but the vessel had left the coast, and the broken-hearted Jane was left, a prey to anguish, suspense and despair.

Month succeeded month and the whole force of winter had commenced, but no tidings came to cheer the two inmates of the cottage; Jane seemed to exert herself for her parent's sake, but the canker-worm grief preyed upon her inwardly, and at the time I was favoured with this recital she was sinking fast beneath mental affliction.—Every rude blast brought to her mind the form of Henry tossed upon the billows, a sport to the heedless waves.

Spring returned, but her cheek, unlike the flowers of the season, grew daily more pale, her features fell, and I could scarcely distinguish her who had once looked so lovely; the Rose of Lunedale no longer bloomed in its beauty—it withered beneath the encreasing glories of the season! Ere summer had set in, Jane was in the grave, free from anxiety, and removed from the cares of the world. Years have now elapsed, but Henry was never more heard of, and his name is forgotten in the neighbourhood, and I myself followed old Mrs. Dobson (whose latter years passed in a second childhood) to yonder church, where with her daughter she lies in peace,—a pilgrim who had wandered for nearly a century in this sphere of being, outlived her relatives and friends, and at last insensibly closed her eyes upon a careless world.

MONTMARTRE.

(From the Literary Museum.)

It is glorious to stand on the brow of Montmartre on a summer's morning, while the sun rises over the horizon of houses far to the east. The stillness of nature, and the calm of the city, fill you with a pleasing awe; and you mark the rays falling through the pure atmosphere on the respective masses of building, proud to reflect on your advantage over the sleeping inhabitants. The wide-spread plain of St. Denis, the amphitheatrical range of hills from Montmorency to St. Cloud, and the winding Seine, possess infinite attractions for the eye; but when it again fixes, towards the south, on the mighty mass of buildings, spires, roofs, and columns of Paris, the fascination of sublimity is felt in its fullest force; and we sympathize with the Dutch poet, who thus exclaims:

And when, Montmartre, from thy lofty front
Thou mark'st the vale beneath, so thickly strewn
With towns, and palaces, and those blest homes,
Where the tired citizen in summer's shades
Seeks to forget the tumults of the world—
On Paris fixes still thy wondering gaze.

There is something awfully magnificent in the contemplation of this mighty arena, standing in silent and motionless dignity, yet filled with such splendid, such powerful, and such opposing spirits as are ever there in action. There is something unspeakably humiliating, yet at the same time elevating in the thought, that we are as but a sand-grain to the mighty whole, and yet we can grasp, as it were, that whole. With what clearness do we then single out any one given object, visible or imagined; handle, measure, or dissect it as we please, while an electrical sympathy brings us into close contact, and permits us to exercise, uncontrolled, our mental magnetism on the object we select. It is here that we fully enjoy that singleness of mind, the chief advantage of solitude. The lonely views of a boundless ocean, or a vast mountain chain, do not act upon us in so intense a degree as the one I now describe; the enthusiasm they excite has less of philosophy in it, for we are rather rapt and wildered, than excited or improved.

The hum of morning begins to be heard. The ponderous bells from a hundred steeples chime out for matin prayers, and the soul silently sends up its orisons. Noon comes on: and the busy noises of the city roll for monotonous hours round the foot of the hill. Evening approaches: the misty veil, rising from the river, is pierced by the radiance of the setting sun; you see him sinking behind the wooded hills of St. Cloud—a crimson globe canopied with burnished clouds—while his rays, passing over the lake-looking basin which the river forms beyond the Pont de Jena, seems to concentrate on the gilded cupola of the Invalides, blazing before you. The slated roof, stretching westward thence towards the Seine, shines like polished plates of silver; and hundreds of insignificant attic windows sparkle upon them with a diamond brilliancy.

A few minutes conduct us across the ridgy summit to the other side of the hill. There a teeming plain stretches far away, rich in every colour of vegetation. A home-bound sportsman is seen discharging his gun at a fluttering quail, which wings its flight across the corn. The tall spire of St. Denis is already melting from us in the dusk; and Montmorency, on the heights still further to the north, is only visible in the recollections associated with it. La Butte de Chaumont on the east, catches the eye, and the mind rushes rapidly into the recollection of the fight it was the scene of, when the undisciplined youths of the Polytechnic school, on the 30th of March 1814, frowned from its acclivities on the united legions of Germany and Russia. Two hundred thousand men, and 600 pieces of cannon, were on this occasion opposed by twelve thousand regular troops, about a thousand unofficered and ill-armed national guards, and those Polytechnic boys:—

All furnished with arms,
As full of spirit as the month of May,
And gorgeous as the sun in Midsummer,

A few field-pieces were scattered here and there on the heights; while some redoubts, hastily thrown up towards the plain, and a broken line of ragged palisades, presented a ridiculous mockery of defence. The Maire of Montmartre, whom I knew well, told me that the imbecile Joseph made his appearance on the hill about noon, and with a most ludicrous mixture of pomp and ignorance, ordered him to arm the national guard of the commune. "Perhaps your majesty does not know that I have but seven muskets in the armoury, and four of them without locks?"—"Ah! arm them with pikes then."—"There is no such weapon here, your Majesty."—"Indeed! then do what you can with them, Monsieur le Maire—Bon jour!" With these words he rode down the hill, and in a little time escaped from Paris, leaving behind them a proclamation which told the citizens "Je reste avec vous!" Balleets were sent up for the cannon (which were commanded by the Maire, and manned by the labourers from the quarries!); they were all suited for guns of double the calibre! such were the preparations for the defence! yet it continued twelve hours; and it is said that no less than 8,000 of this Allies fell before the well-directed fire of les enfans de Paris, whose gallantry is the only redeeming virtue of this humiliating day.

In little more than a year afterwards, the same plains were covered again by hostile troops, and another harvest trampled under the tread of the invader. One feature marked a difference now—the British army was seen mingled with its northern allies; and its scarlet columns, defiling along the windings of the Seine, approached Paris by the westward, and marched through the indignant city ere they planted their standards on the heights of Montmartre. These were proud days for us, no doubt, but I now contemplate the landscape under a different and more soothing aspect. Those violent excitements are gone by, and the moon is rising on the gentle scenery. My attention is fixed on the high walls of a garden, and the silvery foliage which peeps above it. I heard a wild and plaintive air sung with that thrilling expression so peculiar to the voice of the maniac. I look towards the extensive mansion to which the garden belongs—it is a madhouse! A female sits pensively in one of the grated windows, "warbling her sweet notes to the moon." How little has fancy to act in persuading me that I gaze on Madame Lavalette, that matchless heroine, to whom history will atone, for the neglect that leaves her now wildered and forgotten in the madhouse of Montmartre.—Hark!

SONG OF THE COUNTESS OF LAVALETTE.*

I gave my love my cloak and hood,
To hide his face and fly
And in his prison-place I stood,
When he was doomed to die.
They came to fetch my love away,
But only found his bride.
They made a bloody tomb for Ney,
And dug my love's beside.

I heard them dig the live-long night,
I knew their spades—and screamed;
But he was far beyond their spite
Before the morning beamed.
My love had gained the frontier land,
God bless the English name!
An 'twere not for their helping hand
I'd been a widowed dame.

But Wilson was a gallant man,
My saving angel he;
And back the baffled death-hounds ran,
They did not come for me.
And Bruce and Hutchinson are dear,
To my poor memory yet;
But the soul they cheer is dark and drear;
Weep, weep, for LAVALETTE!

I again turn my looks towards Paris. The vapours of night are spreading over its wide extent, and give it the appearance of a vast inland sea; while the scattered light glimmering through the mist look like the reflections of the stars which cover the firmament. The rolling of a thousand carriages sound like the distant murmuring of the tide; the tall spires of the churches, penetrating the haze, seem so many distant vessels on its surface, and nothing is wanting to complete the illusion of this fanciful mirage. In the midst of the deception a loud report is heard, as if from the bosom of the waters, and a rocket immediately afterwards shoots up into the sky. This is the signal for the fireworks of Tivoli. The gardens of Reggieri, Beaujon, the Montagnes Suisses, and the various other public places, quickly follow the impulsion. The heavens are soon ablaze with all the varieties of artificial fire. Explosion succeeds explosion; rockets and blazings fantastically pursue each other through clouds of smoke, in perpendicular or lateral flight, producing that magnificent disorder which Burke remarks as so truly grand; then bursting far above, descend in showers of fire, which just became extinct as they reach the tops of the lurid trees. In the succession of flame which is every where visible, the stars literally "hide their diminished heads." The vapours seem to dissolve in the brilliant atmosphere, and every individual building of Paris appears to start anew, as if from the dried-up bed of ocean. Not far from the foot of the hill a balloon mounts majestically from the bosom of the shrubberies of Tivoli, and a female gracefully waves a white flag in the midst of a blaze of light. While we gaze on the dauntless aeronauts with breathless anxiety and admiration, a huge unwieldy object is seen slowly rising far to the right, and we recollect the announcement of the artificial elephant to ascend that night from Beaujon. At these final wonders of the evening a stunning burst of artillery reverberates on all sides; and the two concluding bouquets from the rival gardens are launched into the clouds. All the preceding splendours are eclipsed by this ineffable display. The flood of brilliancy which pour down, tinges all the firmament with bright blue radiance; but the sparks are quickly one by one extinguished, and a total darkness shuts out both heaven and earth.

Convinced that all is finished, I slowly descend towards the city, and looking back a moment at the heights, distinguish nothing but the windmills standing on the crest like giant centinels waving their arms in the air. Passing rapidly down the rugged by-path leading to the Rue des Martyrs, and approaching the barrier, the sounds of music float towards me from a pleasure garden on the left. A row of coarse lamps at the entrance throws its glare upon the wine-houses at the opposite side of the street, and many straggled reel joyously in the gaudy illumination. I enter the garden, and perceive under the shade of scissos and poplars, which are gaily lighted with coloured lamps, numerous parties of dancers, moving to the admirable music of an orchestra rising in the grove. In the hours around are tables for the groups who take refreshment. Organs and lemonade are served round by dexterous and bustling waiters; and twopenny is surely well spent in learning the delightful lesson of decorum and enjoyment, furnished in this resort of the lowest class of the people.

SONNETS.

I.

On seeing my mother's Portrait.

It is my mother's picture, ev'ry line
And feature here, the pleasing glowing smile
Is there, which oft, with joyous heart, the while I've gazed upon; the placid brow—"his thing
My saluted parent, nothing there but life
Is wanting now the picture to complete
As late thou wert, the kind, the tender wife,
The anxious mother! never shall I meet
With love like thine again—thy picture draws
From my o'erflowing breast, the heavy sigh,
The startling tears bedew my weeping eyes
When I bethink me of my loss,—I pause
A while—'tis good affliction's hand to feel—
Submissive 'fore my God in adoration deep I kneel!

II.

On visiting the place of my Birth.

Scenes of my earliest youth, how chang'd since last
I view'd ye! that old sable mansion gone
Where first I breath'd, and not a single stone
Left to point out its site; and yet have pass'd
But ten short years.—Those trees, which shelter gave Unto this wearied form, when from the heat
Of a meridian sun I found a seat.
Beneath their shade, now hang upon the grave
Of my deceased parent; one small stone
Covers the consecrated spot in which she lies,
And all is darkness there, those beaming eyes
Which once would drop a tear and smile, are gone
Are now for ever closed, she hears me not,—
In death all thoughts of this world are forgot.

IGNOTO.

THE GRAVE-STONE.

A party of young men had been carousing together one evening, and, amongst many other freaks which they thought of and put into execution, they determined to have their fortunes told. After drinking up all that remained on the table, in order to strengthen their resolution, they about midnight sallied forth, arm in arm, wild with their revelry.

The woman whom they resolved to consult lived without the city gates, in a small house; and, for the purpose of her prophecies, used a mirror, in which the inquirer might behold whatever scene of his future life he desired to have revealed. Many a story was related in which it was asserted that her revelations had come to pass. She had, however, been positively interdicted from continuing her dangerous occupation, and only carried it on now very secretly.

As the noisy party approached her house, she observed, by their demeanour, that they were elevated with wine, and she steadily refused to accede to their request. No promises, no money, that they could offer, caused her to waver in her resolution; and, at length, most of the young men believed her assurances that she had finally renounced the craft, and, leaving her house, agreed to parade the streets: one only, Leopold, who had drunk the least, but in whose character there was great natural enthusiasm, separated himself privately from his companions, went back to the fortune-teller, and renewed his solicitations under the most solemn assurances that whatever he might see should be kept secret. By gold and fair promises he succeeded at length in overcoming the scruples of the old woman, who, silently motioning, lighted him up a small stair-case into a room in which there was a large mirror placed against the wall, with a curtain before it. He set the glass on the table, hid the lamp in the oven, and then asked her visitor what he wished to see.

He reflected a while, and debated in his mind whether he should ask to behold his future bride, his future residence, or whatever else curiosity dictated. Whilst he was thus pondering he heard the call of the watchman. The wine he had drunk and his midnight excursion had had a singular influence on his mind: he looked up, and asked to see his grave.

In manifest alarm, and, moreover, with a certain sort of kindness in her manner, the bold man endeavoured to divert him from this, reminding him how often foreknowledge causes accomplishment: but in vain; he persisted in his wish, and after many refusals, the curtain was withdrawn from the glass.

In the dusky twilight which seemed to be retained in the glass, and not to extend without it, there appeared a long green quadrangle, surrounded by a wall. Within it stood many oak and elm trees, above which appeared the roof of a building resembling a cloister. In the back ground there were seen many hillocks, raised above the sod, with crosses and grave-stones: on one of these, not far from the wall, he, at first with astonishment, and then with constantly increasing horror, plainly read his own name.

He sat still and in silence before the glass until the curtain was again let down, and the old woman had taken the lamp from out of the oven, to light him to the door. He went home sunk in thought; every trace of his reveling had disappeared, but the image of his grave was impressed upon his mind in indelible characters: many days and weeks passed on.

In order to divert his mind, he now determined to go himself on a journey, which, on account of some disagreeable affairs, he had previously determined to leave to another. He rightly considered that a total change of scenes, places, and sensations, would have a beneficial influence. Visiting on horseback many charming spots, to him, hitherto unknown spots, his mind not only regained its former tone, but he became even more lively than the natural gravity of his character had hitherto allowed him to be.

Whilst travelling one day he was overtaken by a storm that constantly increased. He was already many miles distant from the place he had left, and had about as far to go before he could reach the one to which he was journeying. He soon became dripping wet, and, leaving his horse, he took a by-path, in hopes of reaching some village, of which he saw that the main road afforded no prospect: but the whole neighbourhood seemed alike solitary and deserted by men.

At length, however, he came in sight of a farm-yard, partly surrounded with trees, and enclosed with a pretty high wall. He perceived that he should be forced to alight, and tie up his horse, as he could only find a narrow footpath; and this he resolved upon, though the pity he felt for his steed made him for some time debate with himself as to the propriety of seeking another road. At length, however, he advanced. He came to a church-yard. He stood still with affright. The form of the spot, the trees, the roof which appeared above them, seemed to remind him of a well-known spot; and, pondering a few moments, the recollection flashed across his mind that this was precisely the spot he had beheld portrayed in the magic glass. He looked again at the wall: the spot was empty; but close by were seen the newly-made graves.

Horror rendered him for a time speechless, and immovably rooted to the spot. Alternate fits of shivering and of burning fever succeeded. Hastening back, he sprang upon his horse; spurring without intermission, he soon regained the highway; and, disregarding the business on which he had come, he took the direct road homewards. On the third day he reached his native town, which he had left ten days before. His excellent steed died from fatigue, and he himself was seized with a violent fever, during which, to the horror of those who attended him, he dwelt continually upon the frightful images that had taken possession of his mind. It was a long time before he recovered from the debility this malady brought upon him.

At length, however, he became convalescent; but every trace of his original gaiety seemed to have been rooted out by his illness, and he appeared in the circle of his friends the shadow of his former self—his youthful manly beauty gone. His eyes no longer beamed with that innocent confidence, which, in spite of all faults and weaknesses, so long remains when neither enormous sins nor an odious narrow-mindedness impair the graces of youth.

Unable to regain his wonted cheerfulness, he gradually became more and more an object of indifference to his friends; this wounded him, and caused him to reflect with greater earnestness upon the sad images that had taken possession of his mind. He shortly afterwards realized all his fortune, for he felt that he abode too near his burying-place, and that he was attached, as it were by an invisible chain, to the green and silent spot which lay within the cloister-wall. Amply provided with money, he left the town by a road directly opposite to the one he had formerly taken; and, after several days' journey, he stopped in a small Catholic town, where an agreeable neighbourhood, pleasant companions, and, more than all, a removal from all his former connexions, seemed to promise that oblivion of the past of which he was in search. He succeeded, in fact, in repressing the appalling images which had filled his mind; and, feeling himself better, he sought to perfect his cure by habitually taking part in every sort of amusement, in balls, fetes, and drinking parties. His wealth caused him to become the centre of a circle of gay young men, who drank deeply of the cup of pleasure, and, by mockery and laughter, drove away from him and from each other every serious thought. He was now looked upon as an exaggerated specimen of a gallant, gay, and reckless man of pleasure; and the elder citizens of the town privately warned the young of the sin of such thoughtless dissipation, and against the seduction of bad examples.

Leopold often heard of these cautions, of which he made a jest: not that his heart was corrupted, but he felt within him a stern necessity for acting as he did: he could not hide from himself how impossible it was for him to revert to a life of quiet and moderation, and that he must continue his wild career in order to escape from the horrid, the maddening, ideas which he could not overcome. It was in such a mood that he was one day looking on at a procession: he discovered, by the angry looks which both men and women directed towards him how displeased they were at his presence; but for this he cared but little, and therefore continued to walk up and down with one of his friends.

Amongst the train of young maidens there appeared one, of a slender make, clad in a gray dress, her heavy bosom confined by a white handkerchief. Slowly walking along, she bent her pale face over a hymn-book, just as we see St. Cecilia or St. Elizabeth designed in old pictures. From the moment he saw her, Leopold's indifference was at an end. He gazed on the lofty, yet pious, cast of her features—her bright eyes, which indicated an ingenious and elevated faith—that faint glow, like as of the morning, which seemed to beam from out her heart through her transparent skin: he saw how compassionately she looked upon him. At that moment he felt again the peace of infancy, so long, so very long, a stranger; and, unheeding the questions of his companion, he ran from street to street before the procession, and beheld her with increasing pleasure, as, passing by, she blushed at his gaze. When the priest, by giving his blessing, had ended the ceremony, and she was in a moment lost to Leopold's view, he was amazed at finding how completely the memory of the past, like a moment of inebriation, had yielded to the sentiment, hitherto unknown, which now possessed his soul.

Man only learns the worth, the importance, and the bliss of life, when he loves; but we are incredulous until this highest miracle of the mind is no longer a stranger to us. All that had hitherto engaged Leopold's mind was now unheeded. He was at first occupied exclusively in finding out the name and residence of the fair unknown; and, having succeeded in devising measures for again and again seeing and hearing her, he by this means occupied his mind and filled his heart with the admiration of her loveliness.

The parents of the maid, already advanced in life, and whose minds had never been highly cultivated, were well known and esteemed in the town for the scrupulous exactness with which they observed the forms of their religion: they saw, with pleasure, the visits of the young man to their house, without, however, venturing to disoblige the distinguished stranger by any marked incivility, although, as they were bigotedly scrupulous, they secretly, but closely, watched his conduct.

He, on the other hand, made use of all the amiability which was natural to him, and the polished manners which he had acquired in his early intercourse with society, to inspire them with confidence. He came oftener, spoke to his beloved more, and for a longer time, now and then even without witnesses; and observing all those attentions which are agreeable to the fair, he at length saw that his assiduous courtship had caused a tender partiality to spring up in his favour.

For a few weeks only was his happiness concealed from the watchful eyes of the parents. They had already learnt much as to his religion and former conduct. The growing inclination of their beloved child to the Protestant was as apparent as it was disagreeable to them; and, their suspicions being confirmed, they resolved upon taking a decisive step. A short time afterwards Leopold paid them many visits without ever finding their daughter at home: he inquired anxiously whether she was unwell or had gone on a journey: the parents seemed dejected, and returned an evasive answer. Tormented by doubts and the loss of her society, he waited a month longer; but his good angel came back no more.

Unwearied by his disappointment, he now redoubled his researches in private, and, at length, learnt that she had been sent by her parents to a distant religious establishment, the name and situation of which no one could tell him. He offered his domestics large rewards, if they could procure more positive intelligence: but this was for a long time useless.

One evening, however, his valet came to him with a cheerful and confident look, and said that he had learnt, from an old servant of the young lady, the name of the driver of the coach in which she had been taken away. With a joyful cry Leopold sprang up, threw him a handful of money, and hastened to the house that had been pointed out.

The driver made a great many difficulties, and declared that he had been obliged to take an oath that he would keep the road to the place a secret; but, by dint of constantly increasing offers, Leopold overcame his scruples. At length he avowed all: he did not know the name of the spot; but, if the gentleman wished, he would, for the sum promised, conduct him thither, provided he would travel alone, and engage not to stop in any town of importance. Leopold promised every thing, and impatiently required that they should set off the same night. The driver got ready, and within two hours they were in a carriage, travelling rapidly along by the light of the bright harvest moon: the journey lasted several days, and at night they always slept in obscure villages.

The old man related that the young lady was accompanied by her father: that she had, throughout, been excessively dejected, had wept very much, and, at last, quite exhausted, had appeared to be very ill. The sanguine feelings of the young man inclined him to interpret this in his own favour; and, with the wild enthusiasm to which he had lately been subject, he determined to make her his in spite of parents, religion, or fate. The coachman, who had been well paid in advance, was now anxious as to the strength of his horses, and endeavoured to soothe the perturbed feelings of his companion by relating over and over the circumstances of his late journey. One day, about noon, they halted at a small village on the borders of what appeared to be a very extensive forest. The old coachman requested Leopold to alight, telling him that they had arrived at the inn where he had before stopped. He could conduct him no further: all that he knew was that the travellers he lately brought went thence into the wood, and that towards evening the father returned alone.

Leopold went into the inn in order to get further information, and to receive from the landlord a confirmation of what he had just heard. Enjoining the driver to secrecy, he permitted him, if he thought proper, to return alone; and then, without taking any refreshment, he procured a boy to be his guide, and sallied into the wood.

After walking for about a hundred and fifty yards through a very narrow path, they found the trees less thickly planted, and came in sight of a castle which appeared to have been converted either into a farmhouse or a cloister. Leopold hastened towards it, and knocked at the gate with a beating heart.

A sour old man with a shaven crown opened it to him, and asked, in a mistrustful tone of voice, what had brought him thither after sunset. He wanted to speak to the prior of the establishment. The priest remarked that the building was a cloister, and therefore under the direction of an abbess. Leopold begged more humbly for the favour of an interview. The chaplain went into the house, and, returning some time after, conducted him into the parlour, and requested him to wait there patiently until vespers were done.

Leopold's soul was so distracted by the variety of thoughts which alternately passed through his mind, that he became every minute more agitated. He now felt great exhaustion, which, however, there was nothing in the room to relieve, and he feared to leave it lest he should lose the opportunity of seeing the abbess.

She came, at last—an elderly lady, but who still retained great softness of manners. She looked at him with an inquiring eye, and asked his name and the object of his visit. He told both, and his anguish was greatly augmented as he observed how the countenance of the abbess was overcast with melancholy as he proceeded in his narrative. He had ended: he waited eagerly for her reply. "Young man," said she, deliberately speaking, "you must arm yourself with Christian fortitude: already eight days ago the novice went to her home"—meaning that she was dead. Leopold sank into a deep swoon: when he revived many others of the nuns were present assisting, as also the chief priest who had to perform the religious service of the cloister. On the return of recollection his first request was that they would conduct him to the grave of his beloved. The abbess consented, hoping that tears would assuage the convulsive anguish of his heart. At her request the priest preceded with a light: she followed, with the eldest of the sisters, both supporting Leopold's faltering steps.

The small door was opened: their way led over green graves. At length the father, having nearly approached a wall, stood still, and held the light over the newest-made grave. Leopold looked up: his face became alternately flushed and deadly pale: a mortal anguish possessed his whole frame. In the imperfect light he beheld again the still green long quadrangle, surrounded by the wall, which he so well knew. Overcome by the horror of the destiny which now burst upon him, he cried out, "Oh God! my grave!" and fell senseless on the ground, thus sinking into the lap of death and doom.

A few days afterwards his grave-stone stood on the wall. His confession was not known, and they therefore buried him on the spot where he expired.

PERSIAN MELODIES.

Oh come, you beckoning Peri cries,
And shakes her starry wings,
While evening o'er the western skies
Her purple glory flings,—
I'll lead thee where, in coral cells,
Beneath the foaming sea,
The lonely Maid of Ocean dwells,—
Then follow, follow me.

I'll lead thee to some fragrant grove,
Whose roses ever bloom,
The haunt where youthful Peri's love
To banquet on perfume;
And where the restless nightingale
Shall weave her song for thee,
Whose tones of music never fail,—
Then follow, follow me.

Oh come, and I will lead thee where Delighted Peri's play,
And bind their golden waving hair
To dance in Halal's ray;
Or where beneath a lovely sky,
Still lovelier thou shalt see
The clear blue night of Layla's eye,—
Then follow, follow me.

Ah, what is the voice of the bulbul to me,
And what are the roses that hang o'er the stream,
When the form I hold dearest no longer I see,
Nor the smile of my LAYLA the light of my dream.
Then wish me not, lady, to dream of those roses,
Nor the bulbul that warbles their branches among:
But of her in whose bosom my spirit reposes,
For whom I pour out all my soul in my song.

Yet were LAYLA and I, gentle lady, to meet
As the bulbul and rose-tree that blooms in the bower,
With its blushes so modest, its perfume so sweet,
When it breathes out its love in the scent of its flower—
Oh then let me dream, when my weary eye closes,
And sleep o'er my thoughts her enchantment has thrown,—
Oh then let me dream of the bulbul and roses,
And sing till those roses are withered and strewn.

BIOGRAPHY.

PAINTERS.

JOHN ASTLEY.

This gentleman from the peculiarity of his good fortune, rather than by his exertions as an artist, has obtained a memorial in Adams' Biographical History, which appears to have been written by one who was well acquainted with him.

He was born at Wemm, in Shropshire, and received his early education in the country. His father was in the medical line. When of age to assume a profession, he was sent to London, and placed as a pupil under the care of Mr. Hudson. It is not known how long he staid with his master, but when he left him, he visited Rome, and was there about the same time with Sir Joshua Reynolds.

After his return to England, he resided for some months at a friend's house in London, and thence went to Dublin, where he practised as a painter about three years, and in that time acquired £3,000 by his pencil.

His next adventure may be narrated in the words of the writer to whom we have alluded: "As he was painting his way back to London, in his own post-chaise, with an out rider, he loitered with a little pardonable vanity, in his native neighbourhood, and visiting Knutsford assembly, with another gentleman, Lady Daniel, a widow, then present was at once so won by his appearance, that she contrived to sit to him for her portrait, and then made him the offer of her hand," a boon which he did not think it prudent to refuse.

The lady, by marriage articles, reserved her fortune to herself, but Astley's behaviour was so satisfactory to her, that she soon gave him a portion of her property, and dying shortly after, settled the whole of the Duckenfield estate, (estimated at £5,000 per annum) upon him, after the death of her daughter by Sir Wm. Daniel.

Astley, after the death of his lady, who was his senior, lived not in the most economical manner, and, in a few years, he found his fortune diminishing, when, unexpectedly, the daughter of lady Daniel died while he was in treaty for a post obit of "the whole in succession to her life."

"The news of this event reached Astley at midnight, and he hurried instantly into Cheshire, and going thro' all forms, took possession of the estate, returned to town before his wife's relations knew what had happened, or could take the measures they proposed to counteract his alarm."

After this increase of fortune, he bought the house in Pall-Mall, of which Mr. Pennant, in his account of London speaks in the following manner:—

"In Pall-Mall, the Duke of Schomberg had his house; it was in my time possessed by Astley, the painter, who divided it into three, and most whimsically fitted up the centre for his own use."

He continued a widower for several years, until far advanced in life, when he married a third wife, a young lady, by whom he left two daughters and a son.

In the decline of his life, he appeared to be disturbed by reflections upon the dissipated conduct of his early days, and when near his end was not without apprehensions of being reduced to indigence and want. He died at his own house, Duckenfield Lodge, Cheshire, November 14, 1787, and was buried at the church of that village.

This gentleman's talents, as an artist, were by no means of an inferior class, he painted a half-length portrait of a Mr. Payne, about the year 1756, to which few of his contemporary artists could then have produced an equal; but he was not one of those who delighted in the art. Unlike Gainsborough and Sir Joshua, he estimated his possession only by his gains, and having obtained a fortune, treated all future study with contemptuous neglect. However, he gave some good proofs of architectural arrangement, both at his house in Pall-Mall, in a villa on the terrace at Barnes, in Surrey, and also at his seat, Duckenfield Lodge, all of which have been mentioned with much applause, as being excellent specimens of elegant domestic architecture.

He had a brother, a surgeon of eminence, who resided at Putney, and who was unfortunately run over by a waggon, and killed upon Putney common. His fortune, which was not inconsiderable, devolved on his brother John.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

SPANISH CUSTOMS.

BILBOA.—The houses in the Calle de Siete and other lonely streets are shut, as soon as it grows dark; and as many of them are five stories high, and contain as many families, the person who wishes to obtain admission, must give a knock for each story. The person calling on one in the second story, must give two knocks; three for the third story; and four for the fourth, and so on. This often sounded in the night like the peals of cannon, and a person of late habits easily disturbs the peace of the other inmates, as well as that of the neighbourhood.

It frequently happens that a person may stay half an hour before he obtains admission; for if the inhabitants of the upper stories are out, their servants have the conscience to allow a visitor to wait until it suits their fancy to descend. I was once tired of waiting, and gave one loud knock, in the hope that the servant of the first story would be more merciful, and give me admission, as it rained violently. It had the desired effect of bringing him down; but on opening the door, he very coolly told me, that should I ever make a similar mistake, and entice him down again to open the door, for his lazy fellow inmates, he would shut the door in my face.

In the day-time, most of the respectable houses have porters, sitting at the entrance, who are generally soldiers, and who appear to pay more attention to their craft, than to the cleanliness of the entrances, which are, on this account, totally neglected.

NATURAL HISTORY.

LILY OF THE VALLEY—

Convallaria.—Smilacina.—Hexandria Monogynia.

These flowers are so named from growing in valleys.—Of the Lily of the Valley, called also Lily Convally, and May Lily, and in some country villages, Ladder to Heaven;—in French, le muguet; lis des vallées; muguet de Mai: in the village dialect, gros muguet: in Italian, il mughetto; giglio convallio [lily convally]; giglio della convalli—there are three species: the Sweet-scented, the Grass-leaved, and the Spiked. The first is a native of Britain and many other parts of Europe. It flowers in May: whence it has been named by some the May Lily. Gerard calls it Convall Lily, and says that in some places it is called Liricenfadic. It is also called May-blossom.

The Lily of the Valley (says Mr. Martyn) claims our notice both as an ornamental and a medicinal plant. As an ornamental one, few are held in higher estimation: indeed, few flowers can boast such delicacy, with so much fragrance. When dried they have a narcotic scent, and, reduced to powder, excite sneezing. A beautiful and desirable green colour may be prepared from the leaves with lime. The distilled water is used in perfumery.

There are several varieties of this species: one with red flowers, one with double red, and one with double white blossoms. There is also a variety much larger than the common sort, and beautifully variegated with purple. It was brought from the Royal Garden at Paris, and flowered several years in the Chelsea Garden: but the roots do not increase so much as the other varieties.

The Lily of the Valley requires a loose sandy soil and a shady situation. It is increased by parting the roots in autumn, which should be done about once in three years. They may be gently watered every evening in dry summer weather. When the roots of this plant are confined in a pot, it may also be increased by its red berry; but in the woods, where the roots are allowed to spread, it seldom produces the berry.

The other species of the Lily of the Valley are natives of Japan.

—No flower could the garden fairer grow
Than the sweet lily of the lowly vale,
The queen of flowers."

—And valley-lilies whiter still Than Leda's love."

LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

Professor A. W. Schlegel, of the university of Bonn, whose Lectures on Dramatic Literature are so much admired in this country, and whose beautiful translation of Shakespeare into German has naturalized our immortal bard throughout all the North of Europe, has just arrived in London. Mr. Schlegel has been for several years engaged in philological researches, and his principal object in visiting this country, is the inspection of the Oriental Library of the East India Company, which is particularly rich in Sanscrit Literature. M. Schlegel is allowed to be one of the first Oriental scholars now in Europe, and he is understood to have been enabled, by his intimacy with Sanscrit, to throw great light on that curious subject, the Origin and Progress of Language.

William Roscoe, Esq., has presented Mr. Wiffen, the Quaker poet, with a beautiful original painting of Tasso, from which an engraving will be made for Mr. W.'s forthcoming work.

One of the newest specimens of lithography, on a small scale, we have seen, has just appeared: it is a map of the River Thames, from London to Margate, by Mr. Charles M. Wilkib, who, we understand, has rendered this art another service in obtaining a reduction in the duty on German lithographic-stones imported into this country, from 30s. to 30s. per cent. The map contains all the prominent objects and places in this little voyage, and also shows the roads, and the bearings of Canterbury and Dover.

Curiosities at Woolwich.—Among the models in the Rotunda, at Woolwich, is one of the Sea Horse frigate, formed from the mast of L'Orient, and is supposed to be the adjoining piece to that from which the coffin of the brave Lord Nelson was made. There is also a noble representation, on an extensive scale, of Quebec and the Heights of Abraham: a small stone, picked up from the spot where the gallant Wolfe fell, marks the precise situation of the place where that event took place. These, with some others, were much prized by his late majesty.

Paris, September 10, 1823.

The first volume of Johnson's Lives of the Poets, translated by MM. E. Didot and Mahon, has just appeared, to the great gratification of all the lovers of English literature. It is astonishing that a work so celebrated should now be translated for the first time in France; and this fact proves at once our past ignorance of the riches and beauties of the English press, and our improving state of inquiry and information.

VARIETIES.

SHORT SPEECHES.—"The old blunt commander at Cadix," says Selden, in his Table Talk, "showed himself a good orator, who, having to say something to his soldiers, (which he was not used to do,) made them a speech to this purport: 'What a shame will it be, you Englishmen, that feed upon good beef, to let those rascally Spaniards beat you, that eat nothing but oranges and lemons.'" With this we may class the speech, more remarkable for its spirit than its elegance, addressed, by the commandant of a local regiment in Lancashire, to a lady, on presenting the colours to his corps: "Madam, we receiv'n 'em wi' gratitude, and we'll defend 'em wi' fortitude; and if ever we are called into actual service, and t'colours are shot away, we'll bring t'p'ows (poles) back again." The noble address of La Roche-Jaquelin to his soldiers, is one of the finest specimens of the laconic: "If I advance, follow me; if I fall, avenge me; if I flinch, kill me."

INTERESTING TO THE PROPRIETORS OF STEAM-PACKETS, &c.—We understand that Sir Humphrey Davy has, within the last month, discovered that the application of a certain gas, fifteen times heavier than the atmosphere, to the mechanism of a steam-engine, will produce a power fully equal to that which now results from the application of steam. The great obstacle which stands in the way of the general and immediate introduction into use of this gas is the difficulty of confining it. The task of constructing convenient vessels, sufficiently strong for that purpose, Sir Humphrey proposes as a problem, the solution of which must be attended with inestimable benefits to this country.

CATERPILLARS.—Ammoniacal liquor produced in the manufacture of gas from coal, will prevent these pernicious insects from attacking any kind of trees or plants. If already infested, it will entirely destroy them, and so far from injuring even the tenderest plant, it seems rather to invigorate it.

THEORY OF TIDES.—By observations continued for the last seventeen years at the Port of Brest, it is stated in the French Journals that M. de la Place has succeeded in perfecting the theory of tides, and explaining every apparent anomaly agreeably to the influence of the solar and lunar bodies.

A KNOWING HORSE.—A remarkable instance of malice in a horse owned by a person near Boston, in America, is related on good authority.—A person a few years since was in the habit, whenever he wished to catch his horse, to take a quantity of corn in a measure, when, calling to him, the horse would come up and eat the corn while the bridle was put over his head. But the owner having deceived the animal several times by calling him when he had no corn in the measure, the horse at length began to suspect his design—and coming up one day as usual, on being called, looked into the measure, and seeing it empty, turned round, reared his hind legs, and killed his owner on the spot.

LOVER OF THE FINE ARTS.—They relate here (Bilboa) a remarkable instance of sangfroid, evinced by a young English traveller, who was in the stage from Irun to Madrid, when stopped by robbers. All the passengers were tied to trees. While they were plundering the stage, the English traveller requested the robbers to do him the favour to untie his hands, which they did, when he drew from his pocket a book and pencil, and began sketching the confused scene before him, to the no small astonishment of the robbers, who, observing his skill, untied him altogether, in order to afford him greater liberty for executing the ingenious undertaking.

A CERTAIN METHOD OF KILLING HORNETS.—Last week a great number of hornets having made their nests under the roof of a thatched cottage, within a few miles of Abergavenny, the cottager (not a little annoyed by this unexpected intrusion) determined on getting rid of his visitors, and accordingly thrust a red hot poker under the thatch. The hornets were certainly destroyed; but unfortunately the cottage took fire, and was burnt to the ground.

FASCINATION.—A very singular fact occurred at Manchester (U. S.) a few days since. As Mr. Cheever was at work in the field, his attention was arrested at the sight of a number of dunghill fowls, with heads erect and wings extended in a circular manner. On going near to ascertain the cause, he saw a large black snake of five feet in length, within the circle, and his squamous head elevated eight or nine inches above the surface of the earth, while his posterior parts remained in a spiral form. And so complete was the fascination, that Mr. Cheever was under the necessity of getting a pole to disperse the fowls, in order to kill the snake, in which he happily succeeded.—American paper.

CURIOS FACT.—A canary bird, in the possession of Mr. Cottell, Northampton-street, Bath, hatched a single egg, which produced two fine birds, both of which are now fledged and healthy.—American Paper.

MAIL TWELVE MILES AN HOUR.—It is said, that a Mr. Bangliss, of Birmingham, is offering, by means of a self-acting-machine, which he has lately constructed, to convey the Royal Mail through the kingdom at the rate of twelve miles per hour.

LE CHAPEAU DE PAILLE.—A coloured Engraving of this much talked of picture is a striking feature in our print-shop windows. The print is by R. Cooper, and the effect of the colouring is such as to afford a correct general idea of the original; though we are still inclined to maintain our opinion that its finest niceties are beyond, or at any rate incompatible with the art of the graver. Taken per se, however, this is a beautiful ornament for the rich portfolio, or (being framed) for the gay apartment.—Lit. Gas.

SWIMMING.—From experiments made at Portsmouth, by Lieutenant C. Morton, R. N., it appears that, by artificially augmenting the surfaces of the hands and feet, the art of swimming is susceptible of being very much facilitated. The apparatus which Lieut. Morton has employed, and which, from its use, and facility and similarity of application, he denominates "Marine propelling Gloves and Slippers," possesses considerable buoyancy, and, therefore, while it enables the wearer to exert his strength to the best advantage as long as he retains any, it would still tend to support him if totally exhausted.

BALLOONS.—The French are as deeply bitten with this mania as we ourselves. The ascent of a balloon now forms a part of the nightly exhibitions of Paris. Every Sunday one or other of the public gardens of that city sends up an aerial voyager. We have not yet heard of any accidents, but their time will come. M. Margat ascended from the Gardens-Beaujon last Sunday at half-past eight, and after hovering for some time over St. Cloud and Versailles, descended about ten leagues from Paris.

NORTHERN EXPEDITION.—A great many idle rumours have at different periods been circulated with regard to this expedition, with very little effect, except to agitate and alarm the friends and relatives of the officers and crews. Most of these reports have been proved false in regular succession. It is now stated, in a provincial paper, that "a vessel is about to be despatched to Lancaster Sound in search of Captain Parry. The North seas remain clear of ice until the winter is somewhat advanced, and it may not be too late to make the search." But of what advantage would such a search be? Capt. Parry's ships are fitted out, "as strong as wood and iron can make them," and provisioned for four years, only two of which have yet elapsed; neither idle curiosity nor idle assertions should be indulged on a subject of this sort.

SINGULAR EFFECT OF MUSICAL SOUNDS ON ANIMALS.—Sir Everard Home, V. P. R. S. has recently made some interesting inquiries by way of comparison, between the auricular organs of man and quadrupeds. The result of his researches seems to prove that shrill tones, or the upper notes of an instrument, have comparatively little effect in exciting the attention of animals, whilst the full lower tones stimulate them almost to fury. Sir Everard observes, "that the effect of the high notes upon the piano-forte upon the great lion in Exeter Change, only called his attention, which was considerable, though he remained silent and motionless. But no sooner were the flat or lower notes sounded, than he sprang up, lashed his tail, and yelled violently, and endeavoured to break loose; and became altogether so furious as to alarm the spectators present. This violent excitement ceased with the discontinuance of the music. The deep tones of the French horn also produced a similar effect with the lower tones of the piano-forte, on the elephant and other animals, on which the experiments were made.

NEGRO SLAVERY.—On this subject some instructive inferences may be drawn from the public journals of several of our West Indian Islands; but the Royal Gazette of Jamaica only shall be adverted to on the present occasion. In the Royal Gazette of July 3rd last, there are ninety-four "runaways" advertised: some of which are thus described:—"George, a Creole, 5 feet 7 inches, marked apparently WS on several parts of his shoulders, with severe flogging marks thereon, and CL on left cheek; has a scar on right leg."—"James, a Congo, 5 feet 5 inches, marked AMC on right shoulder, with other letters not plain on both shoulders, and had an iron collar on."—"John, a Mongola, 5 feet 5½ inches, mark not plain on right shoulder, and has marks of flogging on his back."—"5l. 6s. 8d. Reward—Absconded, a Creole Negro Girl, named Maria; she is supposed to have gone to Richmond Estate, in St. Mary's, where her father lives."—"John Wise, an Eboe, 5 feet 5½ inches, no brand mark, and has the scars of sores on left shin."—"Andrew, a Congo, 5 feet 5½ inches, no brand mark; has marks of flogging on his back, and a large sore on the small of his right leg."

CHINESE.—Two young Chinese have been placed at the University of Halle, by the King of Prussia, for the purpose of obtaining the means of scientifically studying the Chinese language. The following are particulars respecting these interesting individuals. One of them, As-Sing, who is thirty years of age, was born at Heong-San, a short distance from Canton. His father, who was a priest and an astrologer, died before As-Sing was five years old. He was brought up by his mother and his uncle, the latter of whom was in the custom-house at Canton. As-Sing, having received a careful education, and obtained some knowledge of the English language, he visited first Macao, then India, and lastly St. Helena; where he was for three years a cook in the house of Napoleon; after whose death he was employed for some time in English vessels, as an interpreter between the English and his countrymen. He went to London, and there met with his countryman Ha-ho, who is five and twenty years of age, and was born in the neighbourhood of Canton; being the son of a silk-merchant. These two young Chinese entered into a treaty with a Dutchman called Laethausen, by which he was authorized to exhibit them on the continent for money. It was from that abject state that they were rescued by the royal munificence. They begin to stammer out a little German, and are of great use to the young orientalists in the University, who, as well as the missionaries, attend at the lessons which the two Chinese receive, under the superintendence of the celebrated Professor Gesenius, assisted by two of his pupils.

HOW TO DIVIDE A JOURNEY.

Two Irishmen coming from Dorking,
By bad weather greatly bemired;
From morning till night had been walking,
And now both heartily tired.

To Barnet, it seems they were going,
And civilly asked for assistance;
"My friend, we would gladly be knowing
"To Barnet how great is the distance?"

"Ten miles," was the answer—one sigh'd;
Said the other, "'Tis soon in the reach of us;
"You know, Paddy Carey," he cried,
"'Tis only just five miles for each of us."

THE DRAMA.

The plot of CLARI the Maid Milan, is devoid of originality, and the most simple imaginable.—At the opening of the piece we find Clari (Miss M. Tree) the daughter of Farmer Rolamo (Mr. Andrews) in the mansion of the Duke Vivaldi (Mr. Diddear), to which it appears she was enticed by his protestations of love and promises of marriage. He still professes the former but represents the latter as being impossible from the meanness of her extraction. Clari (who retains her chastity) now resolves to return an imploring penitent to her loving and afflicted parents, and carries her determination into effect in the night whilst Vespina (Mrs.

Aldridge) who is charged by the Duke to strictly regard her mistress—is sleeping. The alarm is shortly after given, and the Duke and all his attendants set out in pursuit of the fair fugitive, who reaches her parents' residence just before them, and is on the point of being accused by her father when the Duke rushes forward, declares that virtue is with Clari unaltered, and demands her for his bride. The chief characters are all badly drawn—Females must never expect to find liberties with the integrity of Vivaldi, whose most offensive proceeding to Clari, even when in his power, is the declaration that their marriage cannot be looked for. Clari appears almost broken-hearted from a consciousness of guilt, when her greatest offence is that of listening to love-sighs and promises of marriage from a young, handsome, wealthy noble, and of remaining secluded in his domain when her escape is rendered impracticable. Rolamo is most sensitive, and unhappy, and, although an admirable reasoner, he determines without information, and remains most contemptibly implacable; We are told that this Drama was written expressly for Miss M. Tree, and we suppose the writer to be one who admires "Beauty in Tears"—but Miss M. Tree was designed to be a shrewd and fascinating, not a moping, plaintive, complaining, beauty; and (although her Clari was an exquisite performance and elicited tears in abundance, yet,) her Lydia in the Force of Love Laughs at Locksmiths (which followed) was infinitely more interesting—because to her less distressing, and to the audience much more delightful.

Mr. Diddear did not give us much satisfaction; because we are confident that his voice is susceptible of much better modulation, and more clearness; and that, as nature intended him for a fine imposing figure, it is manifestly unjust that he should reduce his altitude by a contraction of the chest and curve of the dorsal vertebrae. He possesses many excellent qualities, and all those of a good actor, are within his power. Mr. Foster's "Pleasures of a Play" and Mrs. Aldridge's "Love is a mysterious Boy" received much applause; Master Benwell is equally deserving of notice for his very creditable performance when tantalizing Vespina concerning her love for Jocoso (Mr. Foster). The house was respectable and well filled, and the entertainments of the evening gave the greatest satisfaction.

PUBLIC LECTURES.

"O'er head and ears plunge for the commonweal."

PORR.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The public of Manchester must surely feel themselves very much obliged to your sagacious correspondent who signs himself a "Calico Printer," for his very shrewd and ingenious remarks respecting public institutions in Manchester; and if his advice be followed with proper spirit, and in a sufficient number of particulars, our town, which has hitherto been derided for ignorance and brutality, will soon be a model of intelligence and civilization, far exceeding (even among its lowest orders) the Elysium which Mr. Owen, of Llanark, once had in contemplation.

I need not attempt to enforce the very powerful attack upon the Manchester Philosophical Society; which my worthy friend has found to contain a number of members who are not "particularly distinguished for extensive and accurate knowledge in the Arts and Sciences," and whom the other members condescend to "honour with their presence and communications," a circumstance which I, who am not much skilled in these matters, suppose is not common to other similar institutions, the members of which are all of them of course first rate philosophers, as implied in the argument of my excellent friend: and I, therefore, agree with him in thinking it quite abominable that the Manchester Philosophical Society, of which he speaks with becoming contempt, should not require some "extraordinary qualifications" to render highly respectable persons eligible as members..

My ingenious friend has hit upon a very good expedient to promote knowledge in the town by the delivery of Lectures "almost gratuitously;" an expedient far superior to that resorted to in any other place, since even the diligent and liberal DR. URE receives a handsome remuneration for his labours, besides having the possession of the institution for his purposes of different kinds; whilst the Manchester Lecturers, who "with an apparatus for experiment and illustration co-extensive with the great design in all its necessary ramifications," must very properly combine great "experience and talent," are to labour for the love of God, as a sufficient reward for their exertions.

Now, Sir, I like the thing very much; and I think that a lecturer possessed of the requisite qualifications, will very soon be found to undertake the task upon terms so very liberal. I only complain that my munificent friend, who I am sure will pay largely to the new institution though he does not tell us that he is a sharer; I only complain, I say, that he has not carried his scheme far enough; for while these lecturers are lugging away "almost gratuitously" I think persons of other occupations should do the same; and then, Sir, it would be quite delightful to see the Manchester Calico Printers, who have hitherto been looked upon as rather a close fisted generation, coming forwards and very liberally offering their Calicoes "almost gratuitously."

The plan might be further extended; our Shoemakers, Tailors, and others, who now tease us with their Christmas and Midsummer bills, would then furnish us "almost gratuitously" with their respective articles; and we, on our side, acting upon the sage and liberal principles of my shrewd and discriminating friend, might be as squeamish as we pleased in scrutinizing the "questionable talents," the "experience," the "intelligence," and the "diligence" of the several persons whose wares we might condescend to take "almost gratuitously"; and even you, Sir, who now charge us for every number of your publication, and for every advertisement, would be glad to supply us with both "almost gratuitously."

Such a change, is, indeed, Sir, "a consummation devoutly to be wished," and, I doubt not, the public will be rejoiced to hear by what means such a change can be effected; a piece of information which "a Calico Printer" is of course prepared to afford. We have for some time taught the elements of learning not only "almost" but altogether gratuitously in public schools; but that is not all—we have in many instances taught something more than the elements! and one of the natural consequences has been that the clerks in many, if not in most of our warehouses, are persons who, (requiring less salaries than others,) have received a "gratuitous" education; while the sons of persons in middle life, whose education was paid for, and whose parents vainly hoped that their children would maintain a respectable middle station in society, are thus jostled from their situations, and left without the means of procuring a decent livelihood; and this consideration maturely examined must make the heart of many a parent in middle life, ache for the fate of their offspring; but such feelings are altogether unworthy of the consideration of the philanthropic individual who proposes to circulate every species of knowledge "almost gratuitously." I might also add that those who are conscious of their acquirements will not be very content to submit to manual labour even though they may have received their education "almost gratuitously." But such objections as these, though there are many of them, are, no doubt, beneath the notice of the philanthropic personage whose plans and arguments I have undertaken to uphold.

Hoping to see a full developement of the golden plans by which all the desirable changes are to be effected, I am, Sir, &c.

ON THE GREAT UTILITY OF PUBLIC LECTURES.

MR. EDITOR,—There are many persons, I should think, in this populous and scientific town, who will recollect, with pleasure, the interesting course of Lectures on Natural and Experimental Philosophy, formerly delivered here, by Mr. Richard Dalton, who is now, I believe, or soon will be, at Chester, for the purpose of giving a Series of Lectures on Mechanics. The following prefatory Remarks, with which he introduced his First Lecture on Natural and Experimental Philosophy, contain some excellent observations, of a general nature, and will, doubtless, be acceptable to most of your readers. It has been very justly remarked, that Public Lectures, on scientific subjects, form the most desirable supplement to the imperfect studies of early life, and furnish much valuable instruction on many favourite objects of pursuit, which is, in general, only accessible at academical institutions.—Without trespassing on the feelings or patience of the hearer, by any troublesome examination, the Lecturer communicates, in an easy and popular form, and when the mind is totally disengaged, both the elementary rudiments and the more finished superstructure of the science, which he undertakes to elucidate: he supplies lessons to the beginner, and provides the more advanced inquirer with useful references to those standard works which contain every recent discovery of learning. An apparatus of graphic or sculptured illustrations, of models of machinery, with experimental exhibitions and visible, tangible specimens of the various objects under consideration, are, occasionally, introduced, to assist both the understanding and the memory of the pupil; and such Lectures, whatever be their subject, supply a sort of Royal Road to Knowledge, in which difficulty is smoothed, and substantial progress, greatly facilitated. Yours truly, S. X.

P. S. I regret that you did not cancel an inadvertent mistake which I had made in a former communication, inserted in your Iris of September the 20th. Every one knows that the late Mrs. Pieszl, when she was Mrs. Thrale, was the Author of that celebrated and much admired piece, The Three Warnings.

Introductory Remarks, by Mr. Richard Dalton, formerly of Liverpool, to his First Lecture on Natural and Experimental Philosophy.

TAKEN, IN SHORT-HAND, BY S. X.

"The principal characteristics which discriminate human beings from the rest of the animal creation, is the inheritance of that knowledge, which the individuals of each generation are capable of receiving from their predecessors.

"The bee, of modern times, forms the cells of its hive exactly of the same form as the bee of remotest antiquity. Each species of birds build their nest after the same unalterable pattern, and sing the same invariable melody. The sheep, of the present day, has no better defence against the wolf, nor has the fly against its natural enemy, the spider, nor the smaller birds against the eagle, than those of former times.—The same wants, similar dangers, the like defects and unchangeable customs, are the constant attendants on each tribe; nor is any individual benefited by the experience or improvements of all its predecessors. The fiat of Nature is, hitherto shall they come, but no further. Man alone has derived from his divine Creator the inestimable advantage of being benefited by the knowledge of his forefathers, and of being able to impart that knowledge, together with his own improvements, to his posterity; and they again, in like manner, to the children that are yet unborn.

"The accumulated experience of a long series of years, accurately recorded, or traditionally imparted from one generation to another, gradually exalts the state of human beings, supplies their wants, increases their security, and promotes their happiness. The plough, the loom, the forge, the press, the glass-house, and the innumerable other useful inventions of our predecessors, successively improved by constant use and experience, form the great and inestimable advantages of modern times; the combined effects of which actually elevate the individuals of a modern and civilized nation so far, so very far above the uninstructed, as might seem to render them of another and a superior species. We can constantly approximate to that which is perfect, and it is this power in man which essentially distinguishes him from all inferior natures. The elephant of to-day is not more sagacious, or more tractable, than the elephant of two-thousand years ago. Man alone is that being, who, "looking before and after," works upon the past, and calculates upon the future. There is always room for enlightened experiment, (for all improvement is experiment at first,) and the bold hand of superior skill, to enlarge, to refine, and to modify.

"Experiments, properly disposed under distinct heads, form the various subjects of knowledge: the arrangement and elucidation of each particular subject is called a science; the ultimate or practical application of it is called an art.—Arts and Sciences are too numerous and too extensive to be comprehended, in their greatest extent, by any single individual. But all these branches derive their origin from the same natural powers; they are all, in their principles, regulated by the same general laws of Nature, and almost all their applications may be subjected to calculation and demonstration. The investigation of their origin, and of their mutual dependencies on each other,—the illustration of their principles,—the methods of enlarging their limits by means of experiments and calculation,—and their application to our various wants, fall under the title of Natural or Experimental Philosophy."

MR. EDITOR,—I am really glad (pardon the egotism) that some public notice has been taken of the custom prevalent here, but I hope and verily believe in no other part of the United Kingdom, not excepting our old town of Berwick-upon-Tweed—I allude to the taking off the hat in Banking-houses. Your correspondent S. X. observes it is only optional; I aver the direct contrary, and maintain that neither in London where they do not uncover, nor here where they do, is the party attending to transact business at liberty, without the consciousness of deviating from the general and established practice, to use his own discretion at all in the matter: for while it undoubtedly here is considered disrespectful and indecorous to keep the hat on, in London (no mean example) was any one on entering a Banking-house to place his hat on the counter, he would be sure of a request to restore it to its proper station, with a look of no slight contempt for not knowing better. Did any one ever notice a Banker's counter on a market day, fronted from end to end with hats of all descriptions, and not smile at such absurdity? Did he ever when the weather was wet behold dripping hats in contact with bills and bank notes, books and blotting paper, and not grieve at such folly?

If complaisance be the motive urged for its continuance, we would almost imagine ourselves attending dancing masters, and not bankers, bowing before dress makers, and not in a place designed for transactions of such important moment as those which draw us thither. The idea of providing hat pegs to do away with the inconvenience is certainly ingenious as far as it regards the pegs—but for the hats there appears this trifling bar to its adoption, that in the hurry of business, while the attention of most present is fixed in an opposite direction, a good hat might (I only mean by accident) be mistaken for a bad one, and one party retire equipped in a new chapeau and old coat, and another vice versa in a bright blue coat and a sombre dingy brown weather-beaten caster; such cases might happen.

I cannot conceive one rational motive for persevering in a custom so inconvenient to all parties—so "much more honoured in the breach than the observance," and which meets with the surprise and censure of every stranger attending the regular banks of the great and opulent town of Manchester.

A simple notice would produce the magical charm of immediate acquiescence, and no prayer to a petition would be more generally and satisfactorily complied with than "pray keep your hats on."

Q.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—A few scientific gentlemen of this town, with whom I have the pleasure of being acquainted, have, during the last few weeks, been engaged in frequent discussions on the subject of pie-making. It appears from the experience of cooks, that when a cup, in an inverted position, is placed in a fruit-pie, its juice is less likely to boil over during the baking of the pie, than when no such expedient is adopted.—The cooks are of opinion that the juice of the fruit rises into the cup during the baking, and that it is, for this reason, prevented from boiling over. With this explanation, however, our philosophical friends are by no means inclined to concur; they affirming that it is only whilst the pie is cooling, that the juice rises into the cup, in consequence of a partial vacuum being formed therein, by the contraction of the air.

One of the persons, that I have just mentioned, proceeding upon this thought, ventured to deny altogether the beneficial influence of the cup; and gave it as his opinion that the cook always intending that to be a superior kind of pie, into which she puts the cup, will, very naturally, by her greater attention, prevent the overflow of any juice.

Another gentleman seemed to think that the principal advantage of the cup consisted in its supporting the paste, and, by this means, allowing the juice a greater play inside the pie, than it would have, were the paste permitted to sink. He agreed entirely, therefore, with a friend of his, who suggested that the cup would be of fully as much benefit, if it were placed in the pie, and were not inverted.

A third of my scientific friends was of opinion, that as the fruit is placed around, and not under, the cup, the quantity put into the pie, cannot be so great when the cup is in, as when it is out, and that the juice formed will, of course, be less, and, therefore, not so liable to boil over. He concluded that if equal quantities of fruit were placed in two similar pies, one containing the cup, and the other being without it, there would not be perceived any difference in the boiling over of the two juices.

I shall not, Mr. Editor, trouble you with any more of the many ingenious hypotheses, which were, at different times, brought forward, nor with the objections, which have been urged against them; but shall merely request your speculative readers to furnish solutions to the following queries, through the medium of your paper.

1st. Is a cup, placed in a fruit pie, instrumental in preventing the running over of the juice?

2nd. If so, does the juice ascend into the cup during the baking of the pie?

3rd. If the juice does rise into the cup during the baking of the pie, how is the fact to be explained?

4th. Or if it does not, by what means is the cup serviceable, in preventing the overflow of the juice?

5th. When the pie has no cup in it, is its juice more or less likely to flow over the dish, when a hole is left in the paste? and why is it more or less likely to flow over?

By inserting these remarks, Mr. Editor, you will confer a favour on

Yours, &c. A DESIRER OF INFORMATION.

BIOGRAPHY.

DR. MATTHEW BAILLIE.

This eminent Physician died on Tuesday last, at his seat near Cirencester, at the age of about sixty-two or sixty-three. His loss is in many ways entitled to a mourning niche in the columns of a literary record. He was the brother of Joanna Baillie; and nephew, by his mother, to the celebrated John and William Hunter. Thus connected with what is most respectable in literature and medicine, he was himself distinguished in both. His works on the Morbid Anatomy of the Human Body,* and other medical subjects, and his frequent and valuable contributions to the best scientific publication of the period, rank him high as a professional and literary character.

His practice was like his reputation, universal: it had no bounds but the inability of his physical powers to do more than he did. He was consulted by none more anxiously than by his own learned brethren; and this we take to be the true criterion of great and acknowledged skill. Indeed he may justly be said to have been at the head of his profession.

Like many of his contemporaries, and we have pleasure in stating it to his and their honour, his liberality was equal to his judgment. Often were lucrative engagements with the exalted and wealthy deferred in order to afford time for visiting the low and poor, and alleviating the sufferings of those who added not one fee to the humbly-acquired fortunes of the Physician. Of this, though unacquainted with Dr. MATTHEW BAILLIE, we have known so many instances as to confirm us in the belief that such were his general habits—shall we say sacrifices? No; for he had his reward even here, in the esteem of all good men, and in the gratitude of beings rescued from death, and the deeper gratitude of those who loved them, saved from deeper misery. Let this be his memory. His example need hardly be held up; for our experience of life teaches us to repeat, that in all the liberal professions there is none where such a lesson is less needed than amongst the most distinguished Physicians in London.

PAINTERS.—No. 2.

SAMUEL FINNEY

Descended from an ancient family long settled at Fulshaw, near Wilmslow, in Cheshire, where the artist was born.

He was of much celebrity as a miniature painter, both in enamel and water colours, and was appointed enamel painter to her late majesty. In 1765, he exhibited two miniature pictures, one of which was a portrait of that august personage painted from the life.

At that time he lived on the south side of Leicester-square; but a few years after his circumstances were much improved by the decease of some of his relations, whose fortunes fell into his possession. By this acquisition he was placed in genteel independence, and therefore quitted painting and returned to his native country, where he died at the advanced age of 86 years.

BROOKING

Had been bred to some department in the dock-yard at Deptford, but practised as a ship painter, in which he certainly excelled all his countrymen; nor has any since Valderverde equalled his productions in that part of painting: but his merits being scarcely known before his death, prevented him from acquiring the honour and profit which, by his abilities, he has a just right to expect. He died of a consumption at his lodgings in Castle-street, Leicester-square, in the spring of the year 1759, under 40 years of age. The following anecdote is given on the authority of the late Mr. D. Serres, to whom he was well-known.

Many of the artists at time worked for the shops, and Brooking, like the rest, painted much for a person in Castle-street, Leicester-square, not far from the Mews, who coloured prints, and dealt in pictures, which he exposed at his shop window.

A gentleman, who sometimes passed the shop, being struck with the merits of some sea pieces, which were by the hand of this artist, desired to know his name; but his enquiries were not answered agreeably to his wishes; he was only told, that if he pleased, they could procure any he might require from the same painter.

Brooking was accustomed to write his name upon his pictures, which mark was constantly obliterated by the shop keeper, before he placed them in his window; it however happened that the artist carried home a piece, (on which his name was inscribed, while the master was not at home; and the wife, who received it, placed it in the window, without erasing the signature. Luckily, the gentleman passed before this picture was removed, and discovered the name of the painter whose works he so justly admired.

He immediately advertised for the artist to meet him at a certain linen draper's in the city. To this invitation Brooking at first paid no regard; but seeing it repeated with assurances of benefit to the person to whom it was addressed, he prudently attended and had an interview with the gentleman, who from that time became his friend and patron; unfortunately the artist did not live long enough to gratify the wishes of his benefactor, or to receive any great benefit from his patronage.

VINCENTO RUBBIOLIARD,

A native of Italy. He came to England from Rome with Mr. Parry, in the year 1775.

He painted a portrait of Tenducci, the celebrated singer, who, not being satisfied with the performance, rejected the picture. In consequence of this behaviour, the painter surrounded the head with representations of a number of skeletons, exhibiting several ludicrous circumstances and accidents, that had befallen the poor castrato in Italy, at different periods of his life, and exposed the picture in a shop window in the Haymarket. How the dispute terminated is not known.

This artist, from disappointment, and the effect, lost his health, fell into a deep consumption, and died in London about two or three years after his arrival.

MIND AND BODY.

Veluti in Speculum.

Says Mind to Body 't'other day,

As on my chin I plied my razor,

Pray tell me—does that glass pourtray

Your real phiz, or cheat the gazer?

That youthful face, which bloom'd as sleek

As Hebe's, Ganymede's, Apollo's,

Has lost its roses, and your cheek

Is falling into fearful hollows.

The crow's fell foot hath set its sign

Beside that eye which dimly twinkles;

And look! what means this ugly line?

Gadzooks, my friend your getting wrinkles!

That form which ladies once could praise,

Would now inspire them with a panic;

Get Byron's belt, or Worcester's stays,

Or else you'll soon be Aldermanic.

At sight of that dismantled top,

My very heart, I must confess, aches:

Once famous as a Brutus crop,

You now are balder than Lord Essex.

Since Wayte's decease your teeth decline:—

Finding no beautifier near 'em,

Time's tooth has mumbled two of thine,

Well may they call him—"edax rerum."

Behold! your cheeks are quite bereft

Of their two laughter-nursing dimples,

And pretty substitutes they've left—

(Between ourselves) a brace of pimples!

The fashions which you used to lead,

So careless are you, or so thrifty,

You must neglect when most you need,

A sad mistake when nearing Fifty.—

Stop, stop, cries Body—let us pause

Before you reckon more offences,

Since you yourself may be the cause

Of all these dismal consequences.

The sword, you know, wears out the sheath,

By steam are brazen vessels scatter'd;

And when volcanos rage beneath,

The surface must be torn and shatter'd.

Have not your passions, hopes, and fears,

Their turgent of clay outwearing,

Done infinitely more than years,

To cause the ravage you're declaring?

If you yourself no symptoms show

Of age,—no wrinkles of the spirit:

If still for friends your heart can glow,

Your purse be shared with starving merit:

If yet to sordid sins unknown,

No avarice in your breast has started:

If you have not suspicious grown,

Sour, garrulous, or narrow-hearted:

You still are young, and o'er my face

(Howe'er its features may be shaded)

Shall through the sunshine of your grace,

And keep the mortal part unfaded.

Expression is the face's soul,

The head and heart's joint emanation;

Insensible to Times control,

Free from the body's devastation.

If you're still twenty, I'm no more:—

Counting by years how folks have blunder'd!

Voltaire was young at eighty-four,

And Fontenelle at near a hundred!

MY MAIDEN BRIEF.

(From Knight's Quarterly Magazine.)

"A lawyer," says an old comedy which I once read at the British Museum, "is an odd sort of fruit—first rotten, then green, and then ripe." There is too much of truth in this homely figure. The first years of a young barrister are spent, or rather worn out, in anxious leisure. His talents rust, his temper is injured, his little patrimony wastes away, and not an attorney shews a sign of remorse. He endures term after term, and circuit after circuit, that greatest of miseries,—a rank above his means of supporting it. He drives round the country in a post-chaise, and marvels what Johnson found so exhilarating in its motion—that is, if he paid for it himself. He eats venison and drinks claret; but he loses the flavour of both when he reflects that his wife (for the fool is married, and married for love, too,) has perhaps, just dined for the third time on a cold neck of mutton, and has not tasted wine since their last party—an occurrence beyond even legal memory. He leaves the festive board early, and takes a solitary walk—returns to his lodgings in the twilight, and sees on his table a large white rectangular body, which for a moment he supposes may be a brief,—alas! it is only a napkin. He is vexed and rings to have it removed, when up comes his clerk, drunk and insolent: he is about to kick him down stairs, but stays his foot, on calling to mind the arrear of the fellow's wages; and contents himself with wondering where the rascal finds the means for such extravagance.

Then in court many are the vexations of the briefless.—The attorney is a cruel animal; as cruel as a rich coxcomb in a ball-room, who delights in exciting hopes only to disappoint them. Indeed I have often thought the communications between solicitors and the bar has no slight resemblance to the flirtation between the sexes. Barristers, like ladies, must wait to be chosen. The slightest overture would be equally fatal to one gown as to the other. The gentlemen of the bar sit round the table in dignified composure, thinking just as little of briefs as a young lady of marriage. An attorney enters,—not an eye moves; but somehow or other the fact is known to all. Calmly the wretch draws from his pocket a brief: practice enables us to see at a glance that the tormentor has left a blank for the name of his counsel. He looks around the circle as if to choose his man; you cannot doubt but his eye rested on you,—he writes a name, but you are too far off to read it, though you know every name on your circuit upside down. Now the traitor counts out the fee and wraps it up with slow and provoking formality. At length all being prepared, he looks towards you to catch (as you suppose) your eye. You nod, and the brief comes flying; you pick it up, and find on it the name of a man three years your junior, who is sitting next to you; you curse the attorney's impudence and ask yourself if he meant to insult you.—Perhaps not, you say, for the dog squints.

My maiden brief was in town. How well do I recollect the minutest circumstances connected with that case! The rap at the door! I am a connoisseur in raps,—there is not a dun in London who could deceive me; I know their tricks but too well; they have no medium between the rap servile and the rap impudent. This was a cheerful touch; you felt that the operator knew he should meet with a face of welcome. My clerk, who is not much under the influence of sweet sounds, seemed absolutely inspired, and answered the knock with astonishing velocity. I could hear from my inner room the murmur of inquiry and answer; and though I could not distinguish a word, the tones confirmed my hopes;—I was not long suffered to doubt: my client entered, and the pure white paper, tied round with the brilliant red tape, met my eyes. He inquired respectfully, and with an appearance of anxiety which marked him to my mind for a perfect Chesterfield, if I was already retained in — v. —. The rogue knew well enough I never had had a retainer in my life. I took a moment to consider; and after making him repeat the name of his case, I gravely assured him I was at perfect liberty to receive his brief. He then laid the papers and my fee upon the table, asked me if the time appointed for a consultation with the two gentlemen who were 'with me' would be convenient; and, finding that the state of my engagements would allow me to attend, made his bow and departed. That fee was sacred gold, and I put it to no vulgar use.

Many years have now elapsed since that case was disposed of, and yet how fresh does it live in my memory; how perfectly do I recollect every authority to which he referred! how I read and re-read the leading cases that bore upon the question to be argued. One case I so detumbed, that the volume has opened at it ever since, as inevitably as the prayer-book of a lady's-maid proffers the service of matrimony. My brief related to an argument before the judges of the King's Bench, and the place of consultation was Ayles's Coffee-house, adjoining Westminster Hall. There was I, before the clock had finished striking the hour. My brief I knew by heart. I had raised an army of objections to the points for which we were to contend, and had logically slain every man of them. I went prepared to discuss the question thoroughly; and I generously determined to give my leaders the benefit of all my cogitations—though not without a slight struggle at the thought of how much reputation I should lose by my magnanimity. I had plenty of time to think of these things, for my leaders were engaged in court, and the attorney and I had the room to ourselves. After we had been waiting about an hour, the door flew open, and in strode one of my leaders, the second in command, less in haste (as it appeared to me) to meet his appointment than to escape from the atmosphere of clients in which he had been enveloped during his passage from the court—just as the horseman pushes his steed into a gallop, to rid himself of the flies that are buzzing around him. Having shaken off his tormentors, Mr. — walked up to the fire—said it was cold—nodded kindly to me—and had just asked what had been the last night's division in the house, when the powdered head of an usher was protruded through the half open door, to announce that "Jones and Williams was called on." Down went the poker, and away flew — with streaming robes, leaving me to meditate on the loss which the case would sustain for want of his assistance at the expected discussion. Having waited some further space, I heard a rustling of silks, and the great —, our commander in chief, sailed into the room. As he did not run foul of me, I think it possible I may not have been invisible to him; but he furnished me with no other evidence of the fact. He simply directed the attorney to provide certain additional affidavits, tacked about, and sailed away. And thus ended first consultation.

I consoled myself with the thought that I had at least all my materials for myself, and that, from having had so much more time for considering the subject than the others, I must infallibly make the best speech of the three.

At length, the fatal day came. I never shall forget the thrill with which I heard — open the case, and felt how soon it would be my turn to speak. Oh, how did I pray for a long speech! I lost all feeling of rivalry; and would have gladly given him every thing that I intended to use myself, only to defer the dreaded moment for one half hour. His speech was frightfully short, yet, short as it was, it made sad havoc with my stock of matter. The next speaker was even more concise, and yet, my little stock suffered again severely. I then found how experience will stand in the place of study; these men could not, from the multiplicity of their engagements, have spent a tithe of the time upon the case which I had done, and yet, they had seen much which had escaped all my research. At length, my turn came. I was sitting among the back benches in the old court of King's Bench. It was on the last day of Michaelmas Term and late in the evening. A sort of darkness visible had been produced by the aid of a few candles dispersed here and there. I arose, but I was not perceived by the judges who had turned together to consult, supposing the argument finished. B — was the first to see me, and I received from him a nod of kindness and encouragement, which I hope I never shall forget. The court was crowded, for it was a question of some interest; it was a dreadful moment; the ushers stilled the audience into an awful silence. I began, and at the sound of an unknown voice, every wig of the white inclined plane at the upper end of which I was standing suddenly turned round, and in an instant I had the eyes of seventy 'learned friends' looking me full in the face! It is hardly to be conceived by those who have not gone through the ordeal how terrific is this mute attention to the object of it. How grateful should I have been for any thing which would have relieved me from its oppressive weight,—a buzz, a scraping of the shoes, or a fit of coughing would have put me under infinite obligation to the kind disturber. What I said I know not; I knew not then; it is the only part of the transaction of which I am ignorant: it was a 'phantasma or hideous dream.' They told me, however, to my great surprise, that I spoke in a loud voice, used violent gesture, and as I went along seemed to shake off my trepidation. Whether I made a long speech or a short one I cannot tell, for I had no power of measuring time. All I know is, that I should have made a much longer one if I had not felt my ideas, like Bob Acres' courage, oozing out of my fingers' ends. The court decided against us, erroneously as I of course thought, for the young advocate is always on the right side.

The next morning I got up early to look at the newspapers which I expected to see full of our case. In an obscure corner and in a small type, I found a few words given as the speeches of my leaders—and I also read, that "Mr. — followed on the same side."

ACCOUNT OF AN APPARITION.

Seen at Stur-Cross, in Devonshire, the 23d July, 1823.

(From the New Monthly Magazine.)

"'Tis true, 'tis certain, man, though dead, retains
Part of himself; th' immortal mind remains:
The form subsists without the body's aid,
Aerial semblance and an empty shade."

POPE.

I am perfectly aware of the predicament in which I am placing myself, when in the present age of incredulity I venture to commit to paper, in all sincerity of spirit and fullness of conviction, a deliberate and circumstantial account of an Apparition. Impostor and visionary, knave and fool, these are the alternate horns of the dilemma on which I shall be tossed with sneers of contempt, or smiles of derision; every delusion practised by fraud or credulity, from the Cock-lane Ghost, down to the Reverend Mr. Colton, and the Stamford Spectre, will be faithfully registered against me, and I shall be finally dismissed, according to the temperament of the reader, either with a petulant rebuke for attempting to impose such exploded superstition upon an enlightened public: or with a sober and friendly recommendation to get my head shaved, and betake myself to some place of safe custody with as little delay as may be. In the arrogance of my supposed wisdom, I should myself, only a few weeks ago, have probably adopted one of these courses towards any other similar delinquent, which will secure me from any splenetic feeling, however boisterous may be the mirth, or bitter the irony, with which I may be twitted and taunted for the following narration. I have no sinister purposes to answer, no particular creed to advocate, no theory to establish; and writing with the perfect conviction of truth, and the full possession of my faculties, I am determined not to suppress what I conscientiously believe to be facts, merely because they militate against received opinions, or happen to be inconsistent with the ordinary course of human experience.

The author of the Essay on the Nature and Immutability of Truth, represents Berkeley as teaching us, "that external objects are nothing but ideas in our minds; that matter exists not but in our minds; and that, independently of us and our faculties, the earth, the sun, and the starry heavens have no existence at all; that a lighted candle is not white, nor luminous, nor round, nor divisible, nor extended; but that for any thing we know, or can ever know to the contrary, it may be an Egyptian pyramid, the King of Prussia, a mad dog, the island of Madagascar, Saturn's ring, one of the Pleiades, or nothing at all." If this be a faithful representation of Berkeley's theory, it may be adduced as a striking illustration of the perversity of human reason, that such a man shall be deemed a philosopher, and persuade bishops and divines, in spite of the evidence of their senses, to adopt his notions, and deny the existence of matter; while the poor wight, who, in conformity to the evidence of his senses, maintains the existence of disembodied spirit, is hooted and run down as a driveller and a dotard.

Dr. Johnson's argument, that the universal belief in ghosts, in all ages and among all nations, confirms the fact of their apparition, is futile and inconclusive; for the same reasoning would establish the truth of necromancy, witchcraft, idolatry, and other superstitions; but the opposers of this belief not only brand as impostors all those who relate their own experiences of its confirmation; they not only repudiate the Agatho-dæmon of Socrates, and slight the avowment of Scripture, that Saul desired the Witch of Endor to raise up the spirits of those whom he should name; but they deny even the possibility of the fact. To admit a posthumous existence in the next world, and reject the competency of nature to accomplish a similar mystery in this, is surely an unwarrantable limitation of her powers. Who shall circumscribe the metamorphoses of our being? When we start from the ante-natal void into existence, the change is certainly wonderful; but it is still more strange, startling, and incomprehensible, when we quit life in the fulness of intellect, and return into the invisible world. In the first case, we advance from nonentity to a very confined state of consciousness, to an animal existence, for an infant has no mind. That celestial portion of our system is evolved by the painful elaboration of time and of our own efforts; it requires a series of years to perfect its inscrutable development; and is this sublime image and emanation of the Deity to be suddenly, instantly, degraded into a clod of earth, an inert lump of matter, without undergoing any intermediate state of existence between death and final resurrection? Abstract theory sanctions the supposition of Ghosts; and by what authority do we gainsay those who solemnly declare that they have beheld them? They never appear, it is urged, to more than one person at a time, which is a strong presumption of individual falsehood or delusion. How so?—this may be the law of their manifestation. If I press the corners of my eyes, I see consecutive circles of light, like a rainbow; nobody else can see them—but will it be therefore maintained that I do not? It is notorious, that in dreams objects are presented to us with even a more vivid distinctness than they assume to the visual organ; but it would be idle to assert that those configurations were not presented to us, because they were invisible to others. Our waking eyes may indeed be made the “fools of our other senses, or worth all the rest;”—granted; but still you may give us credit for the sincerity of our relation, for we pretend not to describe apparitions that other men have seen, but those which we ourselves have witnessed.

It may not be unimportant to remark, that so far from my being subject to the blue devils and vapours with which hypochondriacs and invalids are haunted, I possess that happy physical organization, which ensures almost uninterrupted health of body and mind, and which in the elasticity and buoyancy of my spirit, renders the sensation of mere existence an enjoyment. Though I reside in the country, winter has for me no gloom; nature has prepared herself for its rigours; they are customary; and every thing seems to harmonize with their affliction; but for the same reason that the solitude of a town is desolating and oppressive, while the loneliness of the country is soothing and graceful, I do feel the sadness of perpetual fogs and rains in July, although they excite no melancholy feeling at the season of their natural occurrence. To see one's favourite flowers laying down their heads to die; one's plantation strewn with leaves not shaken off in the fulness of age, but beaten to earth in the bloom of youth: here a noble tree laid prostrate; and there a valuable field of corn lodged in the swampy soil (which were familiar objects in July last), is sufficient to excite melancholy associations in the most cheerful temperament. Confessing that mine was not altogether proof against their influence, and leaving to the caviller and the sceptic the full benefit of this admission, I proceed to a simple statement of the fact which has elicited these preliminary observations.

Actuated by the disheartening dulness of the scene to which I have alluded, I had written to my friend Mr. George Staples, of Exeter, requesting him to walk over some day and dine with me, as I well knew his presence was an instant antidote to mental depression, not so much from the possession of any wit or humour, as from his unaffected kindness and amiability, the exuberance of his animal spirits, the inexhaustible fund of his laughter, which was perpetually waiting for the smallest excuse to burst out at his heart, and the contagion of his hilarity, which had an instant faculty of communicating itself to others. On the day following the transmission of this letter, as I was sitting in an alcove to indulge my afternoon meditation, I found myself disturbed by what I imagined to be the ticking of my repeater; but, recollecting that I had left it in the house, I discovered the noise proceeded from that little insect of inauspicious augury, the death-watch. Despising the puerile superstitions connected with this pulsation, I gave it no farther notice, and proceeded towards the house, when, as I passed an umbrageous plantation, I was startled by a loud wailing shriek, and presently a screech-owl flew out immediately before me. It was the first time one of those ill-omened birds had ever crossed my path; I combined it with the memento-mori I had just heard, although I blushed at my own weakness in thinking them worthy of an association; and, as I walked forward, I encountered my servant, who put a letter into my hand, which I observed to be sealed with black wax. It was from the clerk of my poor friend, informing me that he had been that morning struck by an apoplectic fit, which had occasioned his almost instantaneous death! The reader may spare the sneer that is flickering upon his features: I draw no inference whatever from the omens that preceded this intelligence: I am willing to consider them as curious coincidences, totally unconnected with the startling apparition which shortly afterwards assailed me.

Indifferent as to death myself, I am little affected by it in others. The doom is so inevitable; it is so doubtful whether the parties be not generally gainers by the change; it is so certain that we enter not at all into this calculation, but bewail our deprivation, whether of society, protection, or emolument, with a grief purely selfish, that I run no risk of placing myself in the predicament of the inconsolable widow, who was reproached by Franklin for not having yet forgiven God Almighty. Still, however, there was something so awful in the manner of my friend's death, the hilarity I had anticipated from his presence formed so appalling a contrast with his actual condition, that my mind naturally sunk into a mood of deep sadness and solemnity. Reaching the house in this frame of thought, I closed the library window-shutters as I passed, and entering the room by a glass-door, seated myself in a chair that fronted the garden. Scarcely a minute had elapsed, when I was thrilled by the strange wailing howl of my favourite spaniel, who had followed me into the apartment, and came trembling and crouching to my feet, occasionally turning his eyes to the back of the chamber, and again instantly reverting them with every demonstration of terror and agony. Mine instinctively took the same direction, when, notwithstanding the dimness of the light, I plainly and indisputably recognised the apparition of my friend sitting motionless in the great arm-chair!! It is easy to be courageous in theory, not difficult to be bold in practice, when the mind has time to collect its energies; but taken as I was by surprise, I confess, that astonishment and terror so far mastered all my faculties, that, without daring to cast a second glance towards the vision, I walked rapidly back into the garden, followed by the dog, who still testified the same agitation and alarm.

Here I had leisure to recover from my first perturbation; and as my thoughts rallied, I endeavoured to persuade myself that I had been deluded by some conjuration of the mind, or some spectral deception of the visual organ. But in either case, how account for the terror of the dog? He could neither be influenced by superstition, nor could his unerring sight betray him into groundless alarm, yet it was incontrovertible that we had both been appalled by the same object. Soon recovering my natural fortitude of spirit, I resolved, whatever might be the consequences, to return and address the apparition. I even began to fear it had vanished; for Glanville, who has written largely on ghosts, expressly says—“that it is a very hard and painful thing for them to force their thin and tenuous bodies into a visible consistence; that their bodies must needs be exceedingly compressed, and that therefore they must be in haste to be delivered from their unnatural pressure.” I returned, therefore, with some rapidity towards the library; and although the dog stood immovably still at some distance, in spite of my solicitations, and kept earnestly gazing upon me, as if in apprehension of an approaching catastrophe, I proceeded onward, and turned back the shutters which I had closed, determined not to be imposed upon by any dubiousness of the light. Thus fortified against deception, I re-entered the room with a firm step, and there in the full glare of day did I clearly and vividly behold the identical apparition, sitting in the same posture as before, and having its eyes closed!!

My heart somewhat failed me under this sensible confirmation of the vision, but summoning all my courage, I walked up to the chair, exclaiming with a desperate energy—“In the name of heaven and all its angels, what dost thou seek here?”—when the figure, slowly rising up, opening its eyes, and stretching out his arms, replied—“A leg of mutton and caper-sauce, with a bottle of prime old port, for such is the dinner you promised me.” “Good God!” I ejaculated, “what can this mean? Are you not really dead?” “No more than you are,” replied the figure. “Some open-mouthed fool told my clerk that I was, and he instantly wrote to tell you of it; but it was my namesake, George Staples, of Castle-street, not me, nor even one of my relations, so let us have dinner as soon as you please, for I am as hungry as a hunter.”

The promised dinner being soon upon the table, my friend informed me, in the intervals of his ever-ready laughter, that as soon as he had undeceived his clerk, he walked over to Star Cross to do me the same favour; that he had fallen asleep in the arm-chair while waiting my return from the grounds; and as to the dog, he reminded me that he had severely punished him at his last visit for killing a chicken, which explained his terror, and his crouching to me for protection, when he recognised the chastiser.

THE OLD MAID'S SONG.

Written by a Lady, in her Fiftieth year.

On the downhill of life, though I find I'm descending,
Content shall my footsteps sustain;
For a heart that's at ease, with fair virtue befriending,
Has surely no cause to complain.
Though the loves and the graces may fly my approach,
Yet from care and from sorrow I'm free;
And many a gay wife, as she rides in her coach,
May look down with envy on me.

To be single at Fifty,—a dreadful disaster,
By many, no doubt, may be thought;
But it is not unpleasant to be one's own master,
And husbands are oft dearly bought.
Yet deem not, fair virgins, too lightly I prize
Love's pleasures, where hearts can agree;
But make a good use of your ears and your eyes,
Or you'd better live single, like me.

Should some pert empty coxcomb, the mirror of fashion,
Implore you to render him blest,
Remember, self-love is his governing passion,
And fairly absorbs all the rest.
The miser will starve you, the prodigal waste
Your fortune, whate'er it may be;
So till you can meet with a man to your taste,—
Consent to live single, like me.

The pedant, who values himself on his knowledge,
You plainly may read in his looks,
Though he offers his heart—he has left it at college,
'Tis buried alive in his books.
Yet the blockhead, for whom you each moment must blush,
A more irksome companion would be;
Whene'er his mouth open'd, you'd long to cry, hush!—
And wish yourself single, like me.

By negatives only, I seek to advise you,
Yet here are my sentiments shewn;
Still in choosing for life, all the world will despise you,
If you have not a will of your own.
But a picture I'll draw of the man to my mind,
And then, if so happy you be,
In the list of your lovers, his likeness to find,
No longer live single, like me.

And first, let his morals be pure, but not cynical,
Still steady and true to his trust;
His dress and his manners, genteel, but not finical,
His principles, loyal and just;
His temper obliging, his intellect clear,
Your tastes and your talents agree;
And then, I confess, if his love is sincere,— You've a chance to be happier than me.

* * The Author of the above composition was, in her day, for she is now no more,—one of the pleasantest and most respectable old maids that ever did, or, perhaps, ever will exist. Perfectly polite and affable to all, she indulged in the utmost freedom of conversation, and possessed, at the same time, much native elegance of mind, a remarkably playful and exuberant imagination, and a very superior poetical talent.

FATHER BLIN, THE VINE-DRESSER.

From the Hermits in Prison.

I have said before (M. Jay writes) that the world is a large prison; I now say that St. Pelagie is a little world. Different characters are developed there, the investigation of which affords considerable pleasure. There one may study the human heart at leisure. For example, I have a neighbour, an honest vine-dresser of Vanvres, who is well worth the trouble of observing. Father Blin, for that is his name, cuts vines in a masterly style, and sings psalms to perfection. His fame has spread through the whole of the department of Sceaux, and his air and manners show that he is perfectly conscious of his merit. He is the proprietor of four or five arpens of vineyard, which he cultivates himself, and which have raised him to the dignity of an elector. He is nearly sixty years of age, and he has reached those years without ever having been in any trouble. How happens it, then, that he is in prison?

In the capacity of a singer, my neighbour has a particular affection for the bottle; he does not sell the whole produce of his vintage; and he has assured me that, upon solemn occasions, he never fails to get himself "in good condition," as he calls it. He is the wit of his neighbourhood; his good things are quoted even in the pot-houses of Vaugirard. His character is jovial: the young people love him; and there can be no good fête unless he is present.

One day, one unhappy day—it was a Shrove Tuesday—Father Blin had opened his cellar, and was tipping peaceably with some vine-dressers of his acquaintance, when he was told that some quarrels had caused a disturbance, and that, to prevent a similar scandal, M. Jouanin, the Mayor of Vanvres, had suspended the village fête, had forbidden the rustic music, and had opposed his formidable veto to the immemorial law of the place, which ordered every body at Vanvres to dance on a Shrove Tuesday. Blin if he had been wise, would have obeyed the decrees of power; but his blood was warmed, and his imagination heated. The news which he received transported him with indignation. "Not dance on Shrove Tuesday!" said he, as he rose suddenly, "such a thing never was seen—never shall be seen! Follow me, my friends! I will dance—we will all dance."

Father Blin executed his bold project. He went to the place prepared for the ball. The lads, lasses, and every body, surrounded him. "What's to be done?" cried they to this Nestor of vine-dressers. "Dance, my friends," replied he, with a voice of thunder, "dance!"—"But M. Jouanin's orders!" Here Father Blin uttered an exclamation somewhat unguarded, and which was too much calculated to irritate the vanity of a country mayor. It was a word which the English call the extreme of indelicacy, and which I cannot venture to transcribe.

The musicians, who had before been dispersed, now assembled again. My friend Blin, by way of setting an example, and calling back the joy which had banished, seized a partner; his example was followed; the signal was given; all was in motion. But the vigilant M. Jouanin, whose authority was compromised, was not far off: he soon arrived with an armed force, and asked who were the authors of this seditious ball. All was discovered: Father Blin, in the midst of his triumph, was laid hold of by the gendarmes; being taken in the very fact, his procès verbal was drawn out, and Father Blin was taken before the correctional police, with two of the most vehement dancers. They were condemned to a month's imprisonment, and now they are at St. Pelagie.

What I have related is scrupulously exact: all Vanvres witnessed it. Conscientious, as an historian should be, I have made Father Blin tell me his tragic story, and he has never varied in the slightest circumstance.

My readers may, perhaps, be somewhat curious to know how my hero has conducted himself at St. Pelagie. During the first few days he was very meditative; he thought of his vines, which would suffer from his absence; he thought of his wife, a most excellent housewife, whose affecting supplications could not soften the heart of M. Jouanin; he thought of his son, whom he had a great desire to settle in the world, and who, wiser than his father, confined himself to the cultivation of the hereditary vineyard. He thought also, with emotion, of the singing gallery at Vanvres, to which he attached all his glory, and which had so often echoed with his powerful intonations.

These melancholy thoughts, however, were dissipated by degrees; frequent visits to his canteen charmed away his sadness, and he had recovered his good humour, when the Royal Court prescribed me, as a salutary discipline, a month's residence at St. Pelagie.

It is there that I have had the pleasure of studying Father Blin profoundly. I have observed that characters in prison show themselves more openly than elsewhere. Folks there seldom take the trouble to put on a mask. Every one appears in prominent relief, surrounded by all his good and bad qualities. It is, therefore, an advantage for a moralist to be in prison when he wishes to study human nature.

The foundation of Blin's character is vanity, and this failing mixes with all he does. He took great pains to inform me that he occupied a distinguished rank among the vine-dressers of his neighbourhood; and that what he was worth, to use his own phrase, amounted to forty thousand francs. He is vain, too, of his wife, who is related to the family of the Boutilliers, of Meudon. The house of Boutillier traces its origin to a rich pastry-cook, whom Fortune in one of her kindest moods, elevated from keeping a shop in the Rue St Denis to the honourable function of a churchwarden of Meudon. I cannot wonder that Father Blin plumes himself upon such an alliance. He is vain, also, of his son, who, he says, can write as well as any one when he chooses. Lastly, he is vain of his deep bass, which has been for above forty years the admiration of the parish.

Notwithstanding all this, Father Blin is one of the best men in the world. He has never had a quarrel with any one; his peaceable humour, his gaiety, his drollery, and his wife, have made him a favorite with all the inhabitants of the village. If ever you should go to Vanvres, and should happen to meet a man of a stature above the middle size, with slender legs and thighs, who walks with a strut like a school-master, his mouth a little on one side, his nose red, his face the colour of wine lees; a high forehead, covered with a black cap; puffing out his cheeks occasionally, like a man who is not on bad terms with himself; you may be quite certain that it is Father Blin, who spent a month in prison at St. Pelagie because he would dance on a Shrove Tuesday.

FINE ARTS.

A New Series of Illustrations of the Novels and Tales entitled Waverley, Guy Mannering, The Antiquary, Rob Roy, The Black Dwarf, Old Mortality, The Heart of Mid-Lothian, The Bride of Lammermoor, and A Legend of Montrose. Medium 8vo. London 1823. Hurst Robinson, & Co.; A. Constable, Edinburgh.

This series consists of twelve Plates engraved by Heath, Rolls, Romney, Portbury, and Mitchell, from original Drawings by Leslie. They are of various degrees of merit; but as a whole very honourable to the designer, and to those who have multiplied his conception on the copper. Mr. Leslie possesses two qualities rarely combined,—grace and humour: thus many of his forms are lovely, and where the subject suits, they are almost always drolly characteristic. His expression, at the same time, never degenerates into caricature, but just conveys a sense of the ludicrous, without lapsing into burlesque or exaggeration.

We shall enumerate his present Designs in their order.

1. Flora in the Glen of Glennaquoich; Waverley.—A sweet female, but rather pretty for the impassioned enthusiast. Her companion is in a fine attitude: the harp too cumbersome and heavy to be capable of transport by female strength. The scenery appropriate, though the freedom of the tree is not accompanied by equal truth in the waterfall.

2. Mac Ivor warned by the Grey Spirit; the same.—Has nothing peculiar to recommend it; but the moonlight on the Spirit, and its shadowy fading into a baseless vision at the lower extremities, are happily conceived. Mac Ivor's position is commonplace, his dumpy stiff, and his limbs out of proportion.

3. Meg Merrilies compelling Domine Simpson to eat; Guy Mannering.—The head of the Gipsy fine, and the terror of the Domine well expressed.

4. The Antiquary incensed at the Intrusion on his Sanctum Sanctorum; The Antiquary.—A good scenic effect, and the accessories, especially a Helmet with its eyes open, humorously chosen. The stick of the astute virtuoso about to descend in pointed fury, and the astonished look of the unconscious offender, convey a full use of their relative feelings according with the description of the author.

5. Dousterswivel and Eddie Ochiltree, The Antiquary; cannot be so praised; yet the old beggar is a good figure.

6. Francis Osbaldistone and Diana Vernon in the Library; Rob Roy.—Nothing can surpass the beauty and sweetness of these figures. The heroine is of a softer loveliness than as represented in the Novel, but the whole is so exquisitely graceful as to claim the highest panegyric. The armour hanging up seems to us to be too small, if we were inclined to dwell on little blemishes.

7. The Black Dwarf at the Tomb of his affianced Bride; Black Dwarf.—Another admirable conception, and replete with imagination. The frightful figure of the Dwarf is contrasted with the moral beauty of the tomb in a most affecting manner. The design of the monument itself is very pathetic, and might serve as a model for the sculptor whence to execute a work of art of the purest order.

8. King Charles II. saluting Lady Bellenden; Old Mortality.—A subject the very reverse of the foregoing. The easy gallantry of the King, the delighted dignity of the Lady, and the half-suppressed simpering of her Damsels, are admirably portrayed. The countenance of Lady B. is all that could be wished. You see it is a kiss that will never be forgotten.

9. Effie Deans and her Sister in the Tolbooth; Heart of Mid-Lothian.—In this Mr. Leslie has out-Timantised Timantbes, for he has hidden all the faces of the characters. The painter of Sicyon only covered one head, the agony of which he deemed to be beyond expression; but that the fancy of concealing every feature, and allowing us nothing but two arms, one ear, hair, and the bodily forms, to convey the sentiment of a scene of suffering, is a wise expedient, we are not quite prepared to acknowledge.

10. Effie before the Queen, (same Novel), is a very different and very superior performance. Her entreating attitude, petite figure, Scotch look, and national costume, are excellent. It is impossible not to be moved by such a pleader; and the stateliness of the Queen is gently yielding to her surprise and humanity.

11. The Ominous Incident at the Mermaid's Fountain; Bride of Lammermuir.—A thing of charming romance and interest. The figures are full of spirit and gracefulness; and the scene exquisitely painted, even to the disjointed stone of the ancient fountain.

12. Dalgetty and Randal of the Mist escaping through the Chapel; Legend of Montrose.—Another characteristic and excellent piece; finishing a series in which if we have pointed out some slight imperfections, we are nevertheless bound to say of it altogether, that it is not unworthy of the Volumes it has been invented to adorn.

As literary news, we may appropriately add here, that these Illustrations are published with a Miniature Edition of the Novels and Tales; and one of the most beautiful works that has ever issued from Ballantyne's justly-celebrated press.—Lit. Gaz.

MUSIC.

It comes—it comes upon the gale,
That pensive voice of days gone by,
With early feelings down life's vale,
On Arab airs as odours sigh.

Oh! on this far and foreign shore
How doubly blest that song appears,
Long days and distance wafting o'er
The sweetness of departed years.

The scene around me fades away,
As at the wave of magic wand—
I see the glens and mountains grey
And wild woods of my native land.

The summer bower, the silent stream,
The scenes of youth are on the strain;
And peopled is my waking dream
With forms I ne'er shall see again!

As on my wanderings when a child,
That music comes at close of day,
Along the dim and distant wild,
And wafts my spirit far away.

And o'er the heart as it distills,
Dear as the dew-drop to the leaf,—
Oh! how the rising bosom thrills
Beneath the mystic joy of grief.

So sweet—so hallow'd 'tis to feel
The gentle woe that wakes the sigh,
That e'en in Heaven, methinks, 'twill steal
Upon the spirit's dream of joy!

But hark—that soothing strain is o'er,
And broken is the lovely spell:
So fades from off our native shore
The accents of a Friend's farewell.

TO A GREAT COAT.

After travelling in the greater part of a very inclement day.

Thanks, gentle coat, whose snug grey fold
Preserv'd so warm the Poet's skin,
And kept from rains and killing cold
The Minstrel-fire that glow'd within.

Thanks, coat! and thou, blue kerchief, too—
Protectors kind gainst wind and weather,
I pay in song my debt to you,
And send you down to fame together.

In summer time, obliging pair!
I might have scorn'd your offer'd love,
When life was in the genial air,
And joyous sunshine laugh'd above.

But now, when wintry blasts prevail'd,
And snow came feathering thro' the air,
Ev'n ———'s puns perchance had fail'd
To cheer me, hadst not thou been there.

'Tis thus, in boyhood's witless hour,
We mock at love's delightful tie,
And wonder what mysterious power
Grave man can find in woman's eye.

But when our rising passions move,
When sickness smites, or cares invade us,
We feel our want of woman's love,
And know for what our nature made us.

MIRACLES.

MR. EDITOR,—As miracles are now come much into fashion, I send you an extract from Spanish History, which I think you will find fully as surprising as any thing you have lately read. It is related on the authority of Sandoval a celebrated Spanish historian; and the circumstances detailed took place in the year 718, about eight years after the introduction by Count Juli n of the Moors into Spain, and the battle of Xerez, which rendered them masters of that kingdom. It appears that Alcherman a Moorish general had been sent with an army of 30,000 men against Pelagius a Spanish prince, who after the battle of Xerez had retired into the Asturias, and on hearing of the approach of Alcherman, had concealed himself with about 4000 followers in a cave on the top of mount Auseba. The Moor on arriving within a short distance of the cave, sent a messenger to Pelagius to invite him, as the French have it, to surrender at discretion; to which the Spaniard returned an indignant answer: this introduces us to the historical extract, which follows:—

“Had Alcherman considered ever so little he might have easily judged that it was not likely Pelagius durst wait so boldly for him with the small number of followers he appeared to have: and he ought to have suspected some snare. But God, who had devoted him to destruction, had so blinded him that without perceiving the risk he ran, he briskly attacked them: but by a visible effect of divine Providence, it was seen that the arrows, darts, and stones, which were shot against the christians, respected them, and turned back upon those who had discharged them: a prodigy so extraordinary, that the infidels were in the utmost consternation; and Pelagius not doubting that the moment was arrived for the destruction of the Moors, ordered out his troops who had till then been concealed in the cavern, and they fell upon the Moors so seasonably, and with so much impetuosity, that in an instant their army was cut to pieces. Pelagius might have been compared to another Gideon, and each christian to an exterminating angel. In vain did the infidels fill up their broken ranks by fresh troops, nothing could withstand the valour of the christians, and their ardour seemed to increase at sight of the multitudes of enemies opposed to them; favoured by the advantage of the post which they occupied, and animated by the presence of their new king, they made such extraordinary efforts, that the Moors were no longer able to stand against them, abandoned the field of battle, climbed to the top of the mountain, and descended with precipitation by the paths of mount Amosa, into the country of Liebana, where they collected themselves together as well as they could on the bank of the river Deba, flattering themselves they were there in safety: but by a second miracle, more surprising than the first, it happened that that part of the mountain which overhung the river, separated from the rest, and buried them in its fall, so that a single one did not escape. Thus that powerful army, the ruin of which caused that of the Moors, and the re-establishment of the empire of the Goths, perished in one day.”

MR. EDITOR,—Inclosed I send you a translation of the Epitaph on the late Gen. Du Mouriez which appeared in the Iris of September 20th.

Manchester, Sept. 26, 1823. Your's, T. G.

Here lies

Awaiting the tardy justice of his country,

Charles Francis Du Mouriez,

Who was born at Cambray the 29th January, A. D. 1739.

Distinguished for his ability, learning, and valour:

By his bravery and skill,

He attained to the summit of military rank:

He was chief counsellor to Louis XVI;

He defended

His King and the laws, in the rostrum by his eloquence;

His country and her liberties, in the field by his sword.

In the times of terror,

He twice preserved France from deviation and slavery;

But in his endeavours to save it,

Was himself proscribed:

He first found a refuge in Germany,

And afterwards received British hospitality.

With gratitude he departed this life at Turville,

SCIENCE.

VELOCITY OF SOUND AS A MEASURE OF DISTANCES.

—The Philosophical Transactions of the present year contain an able paper from J. Goldingham, Esq. F. R. S. on the velocity with which sound travels under various circumstances. The paper is far too voluminous for our columns, and we shall merely state, that the observations were made by noticing the intervals between the flash and the report of two twenty-four pounders, at known distances from the observer, who was stationed at the Madras Observatory. The results of his numerous experiments confirm those of previous observers, that the mean velocity of sound is about 1,142 feet per second.

We have long been of opinion that the velocity of sound might be rendered available for measuring distances for a variety of purposes, such as estimating the distance between ships, or any given objects at sea; and with still greater accuracy for measuring distances on land, which might be accomplished in the following manner:—suppose it be desirable to determine the distance of a ship from a battery, or other station on shore provided with cannon. With a fort, where a morning and evening gun are fired, the object can be attained without any concert with the shore, by an observer on board the ship being provided with a tolerably good seconds watch, and noticing the interval between the flash of the gun and the report. This may be done to the fraction of a second, by counting the beats of a watch during the interval. Now as the ordinary seconds watch makes about 25 beats in 10 seconds, the distance may be very nearly estimated by allowing 466-8 or 457 feet, for every beat of the watch. Thus, 40 beats or 16 seconds, would give a distance of 6,091 yards; or about 60 yards short of 3½ miles. Although the flash of a gun is not visible at any considerable distance by daylight, yet, on a clear day, the smoke issuing from a large piece of ordnance is almost as instantaneous as that of the flash, and by attentive observation it would give almost equally accurate results.

In the department of Military Engineering, this method of determining distances would be extremely valuable; as it might be applied in many instances where actual measurement would be quite impracticable: such as across a river or ravine, or in case of the occupation of the intermediate ground by an enemy.

In Civil Engineering and land-surveying, it might also be applied with considerable advantages, in the following manner:—two persons being stationed on elevated ground within sight of each, one being provided with a strong fowling-piece (or rather a blunderbuss for greater effect), and the other with an ordinary seconds watch. The interval between the flash and the report, as before-mentioned, is to be carefully noted by the observer; who, for the sake of greater accuracy, might be assisted by a third person, in order to mark the instant of the discharge. It might also be preferable to choose the dawn of day for the operations, in order to render the flash from the fire-arms more distinctly visible. By repeating the experiment a few times, a sufficient degree of accuracy would be attainable by this method for any of the ordinary purposes of land-surveying. It is proper to remark, that, should the wind set towards the observer, at the time, from 5 to 10 feet per second should be added to the estimated distance. If, on the contrary, the wind blows from the observer, the same amount is to be subtracted from the distance, estimated at the rate of 1142 feet per second.

The distance of a thunder cloud from an observer might also be very nearly estimated, by noticing the interval between the electric discharge of the thunder. This however, would be a mere point of curiosity, while in the former cases (and others which might be named) this mode of measuring distances would be at once economical, and sufficiently accurate for general purposes.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

Means of preserving Eggs.—In 1820, a tradesman of Paris asked permission of the Prefect of the Police to sell, in the market, eggs that had been preserved a year in a composition of which he kept the secret. More than 30,000 of these eggs were sold in the open market, without any complaint being made, or any notice taken of them, when the Board of Health thought proper to examine them. They were found to be perfectly fresh, and could only be distinguished from others by a pulverous stratum of carbonate of lime, remarked by M. Cadet to be on the egg-shell. This induced him to make a series of experiments, which ended in his discovering that they were preserved in lime water highly saturated. M. Cadet recommends the addition of a small quantity of muriate of lime but gives no reason. They may also be preserved by immersing them twenty seconds in boiling water, and then keeping them well dried in fine sifted ashes; but this will give them a greyish green colour. The method of preserving them in lime-water has been long the practice of Italy; they may be kept thus for two years. This useful mode is well known in many parts of England, and cannot be too much recommended.

VARIETIES.

A POPE.—The Cardinals at Rome appear from the Newspapers to be sadly puzzled about the election of a Pope: it may therefore be of service to them that we publish a hint from one of our Correspondents, who suggests, by way of smoothing their difficulties, that they should depart from old usages, and elect Prince Hohenlohe to the Purple. His Highness's power of performing miracles, he maintains, pre-eminently qualifies him for the station, and merits this singular mark of reverence.—Lit. Gas.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.—We have the following description of this popular character in "The Three Perils of Woman":—"Dear Father will I ever see this Walter Scott in Edinburgh?" "How can I tell ye that, daughter? If ever ye come near where he is you will see him. He is as well to be seen as other folk, though, perhaps not just as often. You can see him every day from the gallery of the Parliament-House; and I tell you how ye will ken him:—look into the round pew close in before the lords, and you will see three or four black-gowns sitting round a table; and among them if ye see a carl that sits always wi' his right shoulder to you, with hair of a pale silver-grey, a head like a tower, braid shoulders, and long shaggy o' broos—the very picture of an auld, gruff, Border baron—that's Wattie Snott. When I saw him first at his Grandfather's ba', he was a bit hempy callant, wi' bare legs, and the breeks a' torn off him, wi' climbing the linnas and the trees for the nests o' oorbie-craws and hunting hawks. And then he was so sanguine, that he was finding them every day: but there was ane o' his hunting hawks turned out a howlet, and another o' them a cush-at-doo. And as for his ravens, his Grandfather told auld Wauchope out of his own mouth, that 'as for his Wat's grand ravens, there was never ane o' them got aboon the rank of a decent respectable hoodie-craw.' But these sanguine, keen-edged chaps are the lads for making some figure in life, for they set out determined to make a spoon or spill a horn. And ye see, though Wat, when he was young, clamb many a tree in vain, and rave a' his breeks into the bargain, he continued climbing on, till he found a nest wi' gouden eggs at the last. Weel, weel! He's turned out an honour to Scotland."

ALOE.—They are showing a big aloe somewhere about Town at a shilling a-head for admission. A gentleman walked in the other day with his rather numerous family, and counting his change out of a sovereign while he looked at the plant, he exclaimed, "Faith, this is the bitterest aloe I ever saw!"

IMPROVEMENTS.—One of the London Journals advertises itself as "the only Sporting Sunday Newspaper!"

A NOVEL INSURRECTION.—The Missionary Reports from the African Islands, of last year, detail a singular insurrection in Madagascar. The women rose, to the number of 4000, and threatened to chastise the king, unless he would grant them some of their wishes, and consult them as to the manner of cutting his hair. He, however, collected his soldiers around him, and boldly sent them word that he was king, and would do as he pleased.

PHYSIOGNOMY.—The Governors of several of the principal prisons in this part of the country have remarked that, in almost every case of murder, and particularly in those which have been attended with circumstances of cruelty, the perpetrators have invariably had light blue eyes and light hair. We believe that Robespierre, the most atrocious monster on record, was of this complexion, as well as Williamson, the cruel murderer of the Marrs.

Elizabeth, on visiting Chancellor Bacon in a country-house that he had built previous to his elevation, said to him, "How came you to make so small a house?" "It is not I," replied he, "who have made my house too little; it is your Majesty who has made me too great for my house."

MINERALIZED TREE.—A tree converted into a fossil or mineral state has been discovered in Sullivan County, New York. The tree appears to have been blown down and broken off; there are eight or ten feet of the stump remaining, with some part of the large end near the root. The stump is about three feet in diameter. The bark, as well as the fibrous texture of the wood, including two or three knots, are distinctly visible. There is also a substance very much resembling veins disseminated entirely through what appears to have been the sap vessels of the tree, and appears to have belonged to the pine genus. The lower part of the root is imbedded in the soil, where it probably grew. Vast quantities of mineralized wood, both in large and small masses, are scattered in all directions around the stump; and from the loose, porous texture of these fragments, they seem to have been petrified after the wood had begun to decay.

FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

MORNING DRESS.—High dress of mesereon green gras de Naples; made plain, and fastened behind; ornamented on each side of the bust with a corded satin trimming of double points, through the centre of which a plaited stem is interwoven; it nearly meets at the waist, but extends as it advances to the shoulders. Long sleeve, nearly tight, edged with satin, and ornamented at the wrist with a triplet of satin triangles crossed by folded circles in the centre: full epaulettes, separated into bouffants by satin ornaments: broad band, edged with satin, round the waist; and a rosette of corded leaves behind. Satin rouleau at the bottom of the skirt, and two rows of twisted satin corded above at equal distances: richly worked wandie muslin ruff, and narrow worked ruffles.

Cap of white tulle or Paris net, bound with pink satin, having four borders of double crepe lisse, either twisted one within the other, or else laid on in waves of alternate pink and white; straight in front, and full at the sides; the crown has a white satin corded ornament divided into five points; between the upper part of each is a puffing of net, and a white satin star, whose radii are composed of small folds, spread over the top: clusters of roses and major convolvines are placed in the front and side. Jouquille-colour kid shoes.

BALL DRESS.—Dress of pink lama goss, the corsege plain, bound with pink satin, and ornamented at equal distances with large pearls and a festoon of silver lace, supported in front with a diamond brooch. Bouffants of Sicilian flowers are tastefully disposed on the bust and sleeves, which are short and very full, festooned with silver lace, and set in a satin band round the arm: sash of the same material as the dress. The petticoat has a very deep border of plaited tulle, confined at the top and bottom with a double rouleau of pink net, divided in the centre by a narrower: a branch of satin crows, forming half diamonds: at the points are satin bows, and sometimes flowers are added.

Head dress, a pearl band and tiara, fastened by bows of pearl on the left side: very little hair on the forehead; and the hind hair is drawn high, and confined in a bunch by a cord of twisted pearl. Ear rings, necklace, and bracelets, of pearl, with pink toes snaps, white kid gloves and white satin shoes.

Fashionable colours are, Pomona green, lavender, rose colour, dark grey, straw colour, and blue.

PROPOSED INSTITUTION FOR THE PROMOTION OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND THE FINE ARTS.

THE intention of establishing an Institution for the Fine Arts in Manchester, cannot fail of being highly gratifying to every one interested in its welfare and respectability.

The oft contested problem whether the encouragement of the Fine Arts in any country does or does not give increased energy as well as cultivation to its people, whether by introducing into the mind and manners a soft delicacy of refinement which may or may not tend to depress that vigour and energetic manliness a warlike and enterprising nation must retain or it sinks into oblivion; has been tried by the best test of truth, experience; and our own country bears ample testimony that they may "grow with its growth and strengthen with its strength." The nursery of Art and Science has long held an uncontested station within the verge of the metropolis; there cradled and schooled, fostered in their progress, and honoured in their completion, they have been enabled to reach that height of excellence which qualifies us to exhibit a Lawrence to a David, a Chantrey to a Canova, and a Davy to a Tenard.

The rapid and extensive progress of general knowledge has at length opened a field for a more diffusive range of cultivation, and nothing but encouragement has for a long time been wanting, to introduce a refinement of taste, and give it "a local habitation and a name" among the hitherto estranged residents of more distant districts. For it is a true, though degrading fact, that while Music and Dancing Masters have met with the most liberal patronage in the largest and most opulent provincial towns in the empire, an Artist has scarcely been able to gain the bread of daily subsistence.

The progress of establishments of this nature in other towns, hold forth the fairest prospect of eventual success in this. Rome was not built in a day, neither did it flourish in Art or Science in a day. Years after years toiled on with a slow but unceasing progress, before the Augustan age arose to give immortality to that æra by the admiration of all succeeding ones. Why we have lain so long dormant can be explained only by "'tis true 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true." There could not, however, have been, during the progress to its present state of consequence and prosperity, any period more favourable than this, to lay the foundation and erect the superstructure of an Academy and Museum which cannot fail to prove highly honourable to its promoters and beneficial to the town in general.

If we might presume to give an opinion, and it is an honest and cordial one—we would suggest that the first object of the institution should be the establishing a museum, open during the whole year, if not to general visitors and patrons, at least to artists and strangers. The number of really valuable pictures of the Italian, Flemish, and Dutch schools, which are now almost buried in the private collections of individuals, would we doubt not be brought forward not only for an annual exhibition, but for the study of young artists, and which would by its continual change of subjects form a perpetual, yet varying school for their improvement. A good picture is itself, alone; it cannot be copied; the beauties of that divine art, the delicate touches of the pencil, must be learned from originals only. Not so with sculpture, the study of this art has infinitely the advantage over its sister, by casts and models, which are easily procured, the accuracy of which come so near their prototypes, that symmetry, proportion, and relief, may be caught with the same or very nearly the same effect, as from the chissel of the sculptor himself. And we deem it not presumption to anticipate that the Elgin casts will ere long grace our museum from the hand of royal munificence. Without a plan formed on such an extensive basis we may have exotic annual exhibitions of merit, but never native ones.

To particularize the general benefits arising from institutions like this, would be waste of time; but one, and not, we are confident, the least agreeable part of the prospect, is the source of pleasure and improvement, it cannot fail to afford to our fair and amiable townswomen. Females by their secluded habits, and by the strong yet delightful ties of domestic duty, cannot enjoy those opportunities, that travel affords, of expanding the intellect and cultivating the mind, by the view of collections and museums that are in more distant parts—they are obliged to be content with what home affords, and therefore any plan which enlarges their sphere of understanding, and heightens their standard of taste, must prove a source of delight to them and eventual benefit to future generations, when it is considered the influence that women possess in forming the first principles of taste and virtue in the minds of early youth and innocence.

MANCHESTER FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

Tuesday, Oct. 7th, 1823.

"The Speaking," as it is called, was on Tuesday last, superior, we think, to any similar exhibition which we can remember. In the observations upon the performances last year, we admitted into the Iris a complaint of certain particulars of which there has not, we are happy to say, been any recurrence on the present occasion. The selection of the pieces was in our opinion judicious. While we make this acknowledgement, however, we must be permitted to lament the existence of some reason, which we cannot divine, for the regular omission of the splendid specimens of oratory which have occasionally been displayed in the British Senate. Could not some highly appropriate pieces be extracted from the admirable speeches of Chatham, of Sheridan, of Fox, of Burke, or of Canning?

"Whose words are sparks of immortality."

We are sure that such extracts as those which we beg to recommend, would be of greater benefit to the boys, and afford more interest to the audience, than a number of the selections upon the last or any preceding card. The scholars spoke on Tuesday with more ease and freedom than they did in former instances. They were allowed to move something more than their tongues; and their action, which, of course, added greatly to the effect of what they said, was, upon the whole, well managed. It was obvious in most cases, that the performers entered into the feelings of the authors, whose productions they recited.

We are sorry that we cannot, with propriety, point out what we considered to be the excellencies and defects of the individual speakers. We therefore give them collectively the tribute of our sincere and disinterested approbation.

But, while we applaud the performers, we think ourselves justified in complaining of some of the audience; certain of whom, though they had the dress, the appearance, and the profession of gentlemen, kept their seats during the whole performance, without exhibiting any creditable sense of shame, while a number of highly respectable ladies were standing and otherwise inconvenienced!

CORRESPONDENCE.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Your Correspondent "Calico Printer," in alluding to the remarks in my letter on the subject of public lectures, has fortunately referred to an institution at Glasgow, in connexion with which there are regular courses of lectures delivered on scientific subjects; and which might well be taken as a model, were a similar institution projected in the town to remedy the evil so much complained of, namely, the want of public lectures on the various branches of the arts and sciences. "Calico Printer" does not however appear to be aware that the Mechanic's Class, (to which the extract from Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Chemistry alone refers) is only one branch of the Andersonian Institution, and that independent of it there are popular courses of lectures regularly delivered, on Chemistry, natural Philosophy, &c. Those therefore who have a taste for such interesting pursuits, are enabled to follow them as objects of amusement as well as useful knowledge, and surely no subjects are more deserving our attention, or more amply repay the investigation by the pleasure and satisfaction which they afford. Nor does the above institution restrict its sphere to one class alone of the community, for in furtherance of the views of the benevolent founder, the "Mechanics Class," so justly celebrated, enables the Artisan and Mechanic to acquire at a cheap rate the principles of their respective arts. A few other particulars regarding the formation and progress of that class may not be uninteresting to your readers, more particularly so, as I am sure the numerous body of mechanics in this town, would hail with enthusiasm the establishment of a similar course of lectures amongst them.

"In the year 1800, Dr. Birbeck, in furtherance of the views expressed in the will of the founder, relative to the instruction of Artisans, first laid open in the building, (Andersonian Institution) the doors of science to the operative orders of society. As the success of the measure was uncertain, no fee was exacted in the first course. An inconsiderable number of mechanics came forward to the lectures, and, circulating among their fellow citizens the interesting novelties revealed to them by experimental philosophy, soon excited a more general desire to participate in the benefits of the lectures. Next season, (1801,) accordingly a more numerous class assembled, when a fee of one shilling was exacted from each student. In the third session, 1802, the fee for Dr. Birbeck's course was raised to FIVE SHILLINGS; but, as only a few individuals applied for tickets of admission, it was thought prudent to lower the fee to two and sixpence in the next session, 1803. Dr. Birbeck received the whole income of these courses.

On Dr. Birbeck's resignation in September, 1804, Dr. Ure was appointed his successor. He continued the mechanic's course, at a fee of three shillings, but each of the lectures was considerably longer than formerly, so that in fact the extent of tuition was greatly increased, at nearly the same charge to the pupil. The class was so well satisfied with his exertions, that at the termination of that and of many succeeding courses, they made him handsome acknowledgements of their esteem. By the year 1807, the application for tickets of admission to the mechanic's class, had become so numerous, that many meritorious artisans were inevitably excluded, and the lecture-room was crowded to excess. Next summer the professor, in conjunction with the trustees, raised a considerable sum of money, and received many donations of books, for the establishment of a library of scientific and practical works, appropriated to this class. In the ensuing winter (that of 1808, 9) it was resolved, in consequence of the increased application for admission, in the preceding session, to deliver two successive courses of lectures, beginning the first course in November. Dr. Ure had by this time collected, at his own expense, a very considerable apparatus, whereby, in addition to new illustrations of many of the old departments of science, the recent discoveries were exhibited and explained. Under these circumstances, the fee of Dr. Ure's course was, FOR THE FIRST TIME, brought back to five shillings, which was Dr. Birbeck's fee in 1802.

The class, so far from complaining of this new arrangement, continued to express their satisfaction with the professor, and his plan of tuition. The attendance on the courses continued generally progressive, though it necessarily fluctuated with the fluctuations of the times; and the second course of each session was usually better attended than the first. The average number of students of late years was upwards of 300 in each course. The managers have recently fitted up a large apartment for the arrangement and display of the apparatus, the whole of which, in its improved and extended condition, will, at stated hours, be accessible to the mechanic's class. The library, consisting of upwards of 1300 volumes of valuable works, on science, literature, and the arts, will continue under the management of their own committee as heretofore. New instruments and models of considerable value have been added this season, and many more are in preparation by a skilful artist, recommended by the mechanic's committee, and employed and paid by the managers, since last November, in fulfilment of the 5th article of the supplementary arrangement of the 12th October, 1822.

Although the Managers appear desirous of furthering as much as in their power the interests of the Mechanics' department, I am sorry to perceive that some misunderstanding has lately arisen between them and the Mechanics' Committee, which may perhaps ultimately lead to the establishment of a separate Institution, supported by the body of Mechanics. The principles upon which the Andersonian Institution was founded, and the liberality of the present Professor in procuring at his OWN EXPENSE, so many new models and apparatus adapted to the practical illustration of the modern improvements in science, renders it well calculated to attain the end desired, viz. the general diffusion of Philosophy and the Sciences through the various classes of the community. The Courses of Lectures delivered at the Andersonian Institution by Dr. Ure are, as follows,—

1st. Natural Philosophy.—Fee, One Guinea; to Ladies, and Youths under 14, Half-a-Guinea.

2nd. Chemistry, with its application to Medicine and the Arts.—Fee, Two Guineas.

3rd. Materia Medica, Dietetics, and Pharmacy.—Fee, Two Guineas.

4th. Popular Chemistry, in reference to the Phænomena of Nature and Manufactures.—Fee, One Guinea. To Operative Artisans, Half-a-Guinea.

5th. Mechanics' Class.—Wednesday and Saturday Evenings at 8 o'clock, the former on the Chemical Arts; the latter on Mechanics, &c. &c. This course contains 50 lectures. Fee for the whole Session, 8s. and 2s. to the Library, &c. For the first half of it, 4s. and 1s. as above.

The necessity of the foregoing observations is in some measure superseded, by the development of the objects of the "Manchester Institution for the promotion of Literature, Science, and the Arts." I am happy to observe that it rests on a broader basis than that which appears at first to have been contemplated by the projectors, and by encouraging literary and scientific pursuits, as well as a taste for the Fine Arts, will it is to be hoped, increase and enliven the relish for such studies in this important town. The want of public lectures so much felt, appears not to have been overlooked by the promoters of the Institution, and the facilities to be afforded for the delivery of Popular Courses of Lectures on the Sciences, promise fair that the evil will be shortly removed. Perhaps some of your readers can inform me, whether it is intended that the Institution should pay for public lecturers on various branches of the Arts and Sciences, if not, the purport of the first resolution declared at the public meeting so far as regards lectures, appears in a great measure paralyzed by the 13th, 14th, and 15th resolutions. In the former, if the "FACILITATING the delivery of Popular Courses of Public Lectures," be only meant to afford encouragement to skilful scientific men, by allowing them the free use of the Lecture rooms, and the benefit of any apparatus which belongs to the institution, even under such circumstances few Lecturers would accept of the use of the rooms, while they laboured under the disadvantages, of being obliged to admit GRATUITOUSLY, (agreeably to the 13th, 14th, and 15th resolutions,) the whole of the Governors with their families. It will afford me pleasure to hear that a sufficient sum is raised, to enable the Governors to carry into effect upon an extended scale, all the objects which they at present contemplate. The public spirit of the inhabitants has been evinced on the present, as well as on several late occasions, and I hope sufficient funds will be raised to enable the Governors of the Manchester Institution, in conjunction with the other objects which it combines, to establish efficient Courses of Lectures, on the Arts and Sciences. I am well aware, that the great expense of models and apparatus requisite to illustrate satisfactorily a Course of Lectures on any branch of the Sciences, must in many cases render them very incomplete, except when the lectures are delivered in connexion with some well supported institution. A prevailing spirit for improvement seems to pervade every class of the community, and the recently formed Public Institutions and alterations which have been made in the town, will ever redound to the credit of the inhabitants. May we not indulge the hope, that Manchester will one day rank as high in the literary and scientific world, as it now does in a commercial point of view—we may at least aver, that a general taste for knowledge and useful information will raise its inhabitants high in the scale of public estimation, and to the names of industrious, and skilful, that of well informed, and enlightened, will be added to the Manufacturer, and Merchant. I mean not in these remarks, to detract from the merits of the many ornaments to the town, as well amongst the literary and scientific part of the community, as amongst many of our merchants and manufacturers; all I wish for, is, to see a taste generally imbibed for those pursuits which add so much to the rational enjoyment and happiness of man. Your readers must all feel indebted to S. X. for his interesting communication in reference to the Lectures on Natural and Experimental Philosophy, formerly delivered in this town by Mr. Richard Dalton.

Yours, Z.

BARROWS SERMONS.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR.—I shall be obliged to any of your correspondents for informing me whether any other than the folio edition of Dr. Barrow's Sermons has ever been published; and if not, whether there is any publication in which copious extracts from those most eloquent and masterly sermons, may be met with. It is surprising that works which Lord Chatham valued so highly; which he nearly committed to memory; and which he made the model of his oratory, should be so little known to the English student of the present day.

PUBLIUS.

THE MISERIES OF ENFORCED MARRIAGE.

By the Author of "December Tales."

To R. S. F. Esq. B—Y HALL.

MY DEAR F.—You complain so grievously of the brevity and infrequency of my "ever desirable letters" (so you are pleased to speak) that I have at last devoted an afternoon to indulging you and myself by an unlimited destruction of thick post—in other words, I have sat down to indite you a tedious epistle. For what is there that can make my letters interesting to you?—what topics have I, a recluse and abstracted book-worm, to dilate upon, which can be other than ennui-ing to a fashionable, gay, busy, man-of-the-world-man like yourself? My abstruse reveries and metaphysical estrangements you would not listen to (or if you did it would be the effect of sad civility only) even were I myself present to you; how then would it be possible for my paper messenger, if filled with such lucubrations, to escape perdition immediately!—No; it would never do. Something more attractive must be found for your squeamish palate, or you will cease to be, or to seem, anxious for my correspondence, and at once set me down for an incorrigible dusty, musty, prosing old Bore.

Well,—I have hit upon a subject, one upon which you have, more than once, requested me to give you some information;—namely: an account of poor L. the pale "lenc clerk" as you called him, whom you once met at my habitation, when you delighted and gratified me with a visit as you journeyed with ephemeral wing (or wheel) over half England—that melancholy personification of an abstract idea (another of your soubriquets) whose appearance so much puzzled and interested you. He was indeed one whom to see was to wish to know; even at the period when you saw him, when sorrow and grief were repressed, or at least secluded, from open notice, by strong mental exertion which assisted to destroy him, even then, though the slight bloom which once overspread his cheek had faded, and the beautiful expanse of his clear and intellectual brow was marked with deep dejection, in spite of his struggles to appear undisturbed and happy; though the pride of his youth and the strength of his manhood were gone, and the brightness of the day of his existence had passed away; still the light of that sun, which though setting and clouded, was not—could not be, totally obscured, blazed from his eye and lit up his features with a glow, which stood like an index to tell of the mightiness within.

I had wished to have brought you together; it would have gratified, I am sure, both of you. But with your extended circle of relatives and intimates, who severally had, or conceived themselves to have, a pre-eminent claim upon your time and society, the moments that you could dedicate to each were of necessity few, and I was compelled to share the general lot, and thus no opportunity presented itself of bringing about my object; for L. had left a country where the hopes and prospects of his heart had been cruelly blighted, ere you again illumined the dwelling which had for some time been the place of his residence, and which the occasional smile of a dear friend like yourself renders brighter to its present solitary, but contented, occupant.

Since then, it was not permitted you to enjoy his friendship when living, I may well introduce you to his memory when dead; and trace a sort of sketch—but how faint and unsatisfactory—from the recollection of his short and hapless life.

I am now sitting in the reading room of the public library at M—; fit spot for my present occupation, for here I have lingered away hour after hour with my departed friend, and listened with a delight which no pleasure that may hereafter be allotted me, can ever equal or even approach, to his deep and glowing remarks upon our old and favourite authors—a commentary often far superior to the text; and here, since he is lost to me, I have spent some happy moments in reminiscence of the hours which his converse beguiled, when his imagination dazzled, his information astonished, or his judgment enlightened me. But I am delaying too long the main object of my communication.

L. and I as you know were schoolfellows, that great link of youth and framer of friendships. Even at school, the time which we are continually taught to consider the happiest of life, (positively, perhaps it is, relatively, that is, considering our capacities of enjoyment with the actual degree of each experienced, perhaps not) even that happy time, was to him not happy, more correctly it was actually unhappy. He was unfitted for the community of a public school, he had no sympathies or idiosyncrasies with the modes of thinking, speaking, or acting prevalent there;—he partook, it is true, of their amusements, but he did not enter into them; his spirit was not with them, and it was a relief to him to quit them. This was perceived, of course it was resented. The spirit of persecution does not flourish in its least violence among school boys. Whoever ventures to differ from the body of the society either in studies, recreations, opinions, or any other particular, must lay his account on being hunted down as a kind of wild beast, a monster, or mad dog. A public school is a great extinguisher of individuality, whoever becomes an inmate of it must conform, must subscribe to the Shibboleth of the place, must fall in with the general current if he wishes to enjoy any thing like peace or sociability. Neutrality is impossible. But I am wearying your patience on subjects with which you are as familiar as I am.

It is no wonder then that L. who was addicted to contemplation, and a perpetual student, was unpopular, and consequently in some measure unhappy. But the friendship of a few of the community who entered into his feelings and pleasures, and of whom I had the good fortune to be one, compensated to him for much of the unkindness with which he was treated by others. Of course his affections being contracted into a narrower channel, acquired additional force from their confinement, and his friendship for us, who were the partakers of his company and his studies, (there were but four of us) was uncontrolled. An anecdote which I am about to relate to you will demonstrate this. Some piece of mischief, I forget what, had been committed in the school, which was discovered some time after its commission as it appeared, and from peculiar circumstances attending it, I was supposed (wrongly however) to be the culprit; and was sentenced to receive the punishment. I had an old female relation with whom I lived, my parents residing at a considerable distance from —, and it was her pride that her nephew had never been guilty of any dereliction, nor been found deficient in any particular, so as to incur punishment. This certainly was a proud distinction which I had contrived to maintain, along with two or three others, and now a close was to be put to my superiority. L. was at this time absent from school, having obtained leave to visit a friend near Oxford. The day before that on which I was to undergo my punishment, or rather my flogging, (for punishment implies previous guilt) I wrote to him, among other things, lamenting the pain which this affair would occasion my relation, and protesting my entire innocence. The next day came and brought with it the hour of my chastisement. Accordingly every thing was arranged, the boys called up as spectators, the rod laid on the table for immediate use, and the Archdidascalus of the school about to give me an exhortation admonitory on the heinousness of my supposed fault, when to my astonishment—to the astonishment of the whole school—the door opened, and L. entered panting and covered with dust. He advanced instantly to the Master “Sir, it was I who committed the offence for which you are about to punish Villiers.” “You! Sir, impossible.” He stuck to his assertion. I could say nothing, for I had before denied (as was the case) all knowledge of the business. Accordingly the blame was transferred to him, but in consideration of his acknowledgement, the chastisement was remitted. He had received my letter a few hours before, and to spare the feelings of my relative, and to save me, had set off, immediately, unknown to the family, and travelled from his friends to the school, a distance of more than thirty miles, to accuse himself of a crime which he had not committed. You may judge of my sensations at this noble exercise of friendship. Damon and Pythias was nothing to it. This was the only time I ever knew L. to violate truth in the slightest instance.

I do not know that any thing took place which the compass of a letter will allow me to relate till long after both L. and I had left the school. He lived at some distance from my abode, but we frequently saw each other, and filled up the intervals with letters. In one of these he informed me of an attachment which had been lately formed between him and a young lady in his neighbourhood, and he wished that I should become acquainted with her previous to his entering into any matrimonial connection. I read his communication with pleasure, for a soul like L.’s, so full of sympathy, could not fail to gather abundant happiness from a well placed affection. He had been a most affectionate son, and a devoted friend, and I had no doubt that his conduct as a husband would be equally exemplary. According to his invitation I went to see him, and was introduced to the lady at her father’s house. Alice Clifton was about nineteen—beautiful, cheerful, and accomplished. This was of course all that on a first interview I could gather of her character, but afterwards, when at the repeated desire of her parents, I made frequent visits there, along with L. the riches of her mind opened gradually upon me, and convinced me that although the lady was without fortune, (for Mr. Clifton was not rich and his family was numerous) he had nevertheless found a treasure in the object of his choice.

At last a day not very distant was fixed upon for the ceremony which was to put L. in possession of his loved and loving Alice. Who would have thought that so bright a sky could have been so shortly covered with the tempest clouds of sorrow and disappointment!

I have mentioned that Alice’s father was not rich, and lately his circumstances had been growing more and more embarrassed, till ruin and bankruptcy stared him in the face. In the midst of his distresses a letter arrived from a relation, who had advanced him considerable sums of money, requesting immediate payment. To comply with the request was impossible. One means of escaping the evil was pointed out. The writer of the letter offered to remit the debt and further to assist Mr. Clifton, on condition that Alice should espouse his son. This son was an ignorant, fox-hunting, brainless fool, whose only recommendation was his good nature, and his father, who knew the superior qualities of his fair relative, thought that her good sense might, if not reclaim, at least correct and restrain him in the pursuit of his absurd propensities. He wished to sacrifice one who was far above the level of her species for the benefit of another as far below that of his.

This letter was shewn to me; of course I protested vehemently against the proposed measure, and was listened to with patience, though I could perceive with any thing rather than pleasure. Alice was not present at this meeting. I was dreadfully alarmed for L. I well knew that, with his sensibility, such an event as the one thought of, would infallibly make wretched, if it did not put an end to his life. I argued, as well as I was able, on the injustice of destroying the hopes and affections of one member of a family, for the sake of the rest; I spoke, though sparingly, of the misery which would be occasioned to my friend. The only answer which I could get was that they would mention it to Alice, and I left them filled with sorrow for my friend, not altogether unmixed with some feelings of indignation at the selfishness of human nature.

L. perceived the alteration in my spirits and manner, and anxiously enquired into the cause. I was unable to conceal it, though I revealed it with trembling, so fearful was I of the consequences. When I had concluded he rose from his seat, and desiring me to excuse him a few minutes, left the room, leaving me filled with apprehension and misery. He returned shortly, to my surprise, calm and composed. My dear Taunton, said he, I have thought of the unhappy circumstances which you have related; I will not attempt to influence Alice: whatever she judges fit, will, I am sure, be right. If her determination should voluntarily be in my favour, I shall be more happy than if she had been persuaded by my entreaties;—if she conceives that her filial duty requires her to abandon me, a vain effort to subdue her sense of propriety would only be productive of uneasiness to both. I endeavoured to bend him from this strange resolution—so unlover-like—so unaccountable—as I thought it. But he had got some foolish notions of delicacy in leaving Alice entirely to the sway of her own feelings, and would not be persuaded that it was right for him to let considerations of his own happiness or misery interfere with her conduct towards her family. Strange, but honourable and highly minded being!

To make a short story of it—Alice consented to marry her relation—to ameliorate the condition of her family—and to be broken hearted. Whether the old people interfered strongly—what excuses they made to persuade her to break her engagements with L. I know not. It was announced to him by letter, through the medium of the lady's maiden aunt. The day before the marriage, he received another letter, it was from Alice. It was worthy of her. It spoke tenderness with dignity—sorrow without indulging in useless complaints, and a vindication of her conduct which completely subdued the irritability which I had conceived against her on my friend's account. Yet it was easy to see that L. was not the only, if even the greatest sufferer. But his philosophy—his affected calmness was entirely vanquished by it. The force of his grief—the hitherto repressed violence of his passion, could be restrained no longer. He perceived that she whom he loved was miserable, and that he was the cause, and hence, however unjustly, he chose to blame himself for her woe. It was in vain to represent to him that the exciting of this wretchedness belonged not to him, but to those who had compelled her, or at least occasioned her to marry another. "Had she not known me," he exclaimed, "she would have been happy."

He had not intended to see her again, for he mistrusted his own firmness, but accident threw her in his way. About a month after her marriage, as he and I walked together, we were startled by screams in a woman's voice, and looking around perceived a female on horseback and in the greatest danger. The animal had taken fright, and his course lay directly towards a steep precipice. We rushed towards her, though despairing of reaching her in time to be of service. On coming nearer we perceived it was Alice Clifton. L. sprang forward with a rapidity which I believed him incapable of, and which I am sure nothing but the sight of Alice's imminent danger could have enabled him to do. He was far before me, and owing to some inequality in the ground I lost sight both of him and the object of our apprehensions. I know not what he did, but on coming up I found the horse lying on the ground, and Alice fainting in the arms of her lover, whom his exertion had almost thrown into the same state. I ran for some water from an adjoining rivulet, and she revived, but almost relapsed into insensibility on beholding her preserver. But I can never forget L.'s look. The struggle of passion—the cold chilliness of disappointed hopes—the glow of affection, were all painted in his countenance. Raising his eyes they met her's—one glance passed between them, but it was a glance of intelligence—of feeling—which revealed all their love—all their misfortunes. He caught her hand—pressed it to his lips—one of her beautiful locks played upon his cheek—if you have ever loved, my dear F., you must feel that moment far better than I can describe it.

But it was only for a moment. He faltered out—"Forgive me, Alice." "Farewel" was the reply. He repeated the word; it seemed to come from both their hearts. I offered to see Alice home, and my offer being accepted I accompanied her.

On returning to my own dwelling I found L. already there. He was more melancholy and looked more wretched than ever, and I feared much for his health. It was not without reason that I was apprehensive. He was taken ill; for some time he lingered between life and death, but the violence of his disease abated, and his physicians advised him to travel. I could not think of letting him go alone, and he listened with pleasure to my proposition of accompanying him.

You have travelled over the continent, and, therefore, even if my limits would admit of it, it would be needless for me to give you any account of our journey, as nothing happened which bears any particular relation to the subject I am upon. L.'s bodily health seemed to improve, but his mental disease hung upon him amid all changes of scene, and all varieties of amusement or pleasure.

Were you ever in Sicily?—We went there, and visited all those monuments of natural grandeur and human magnificence with which that country is filled. I thought that here, more than any where else, L. enjoyed those intervals of forgetfulness—that oblivion of the past, and gathering up of the soul into the present, which is the heaven below of those whom misery and grief have immersed in that gloom of hopeless and heartless despondency, "for which joy has no balm and affliction no sting," which you my dear friend, in the midst of happiness, loving and beloved, and revelling in all the buoyancy of animal spirits, have never (I should suppose) felt—and which may you never feel! We visited of course the great show of the island their burning mountain—Etna—or Mon' Gibello; and for the convenience of enjoying the vicinity of the sea, which L. was fond of, we took up our residence—alas, his last residence whilst living—at a small farm, about two miles from Catania, and adjoining the shore.

Here, then, we wandered, inhaling the delightful freshness of the sea breeze, and gazing on the beauties which lay scattered around us. I could yet think of them with pleasure, were not the recollection embittered by thoughts of the calamity which deprived me of my friend. It was on a beautiful evening in June—it will be five years since next week—when along with L. I took an accustomed ramble. The sun was setting—his beams yet hung upon the mountain tops, and gilded the Sicilian sea where it seemed in the distance to meet the horizon. We looked on it with a feeling which could not be called merely pleasure—it was a kind of softened rapture—a richness and fullness of feeling which cannot be described. The expanse of waters lay before us, bounded in one point of view by the shores of Calabria, and farther off lay Greece—the land of noble deed—and of lofty song—all glowing and brilliant. Behind, on our left was the "pillar of Heaven," the mountain of snow and fire, and nearer to us our lovely farm house with its beautiful orange trees, and luxuriant olives, and the vines clustering round its door and casements. The enchantment was complete.

The evening advanced, and I looked for L. who had wandered some distance from me. I saw him standing and gazing eagerly among a grove of trees. Before I had advanced many paces he turned round, and rushing violently towards me, he exclaimed, almost breathless, "I have seen Alice—I have seen Alice"—he would have pronounced her name, but his agitation prevented him. "Impossible, my dear L.," I said to him, "how can Alice be here, this is some delusion." "Oh no," he replied, "I cannot be mistaken in her, and yet you say well, how should she be here and we not have heard of it;—yet I am sure it was she." I attempted (but vainly) to calm him, and as I spoke we advanced towards the spot where I had seen him. "There—again, look for yourself," said he. I did so, and perceived a female in white, something resembling Alice; yet it might easily be another. She was almost hidden by the trees, when we perceived some one crouching down and advancing cautiously in the same direction. L. looked alarmed—we heard a scream—he rushed forward and I followed, but stumbling over something on the ground he was before me. I perceived there was a struggle between some persons among the trees—the scream was repeated—I heard the voice of my friend calling to me, and was by his side just in time to receive him staggering and bleeding in my arms. A man in a dark cloak rushed by me, and I was left with my dying friend in my arms, and Alice Clifton—for it was she—senseless on the ground.

I exerted myself in calling for help; fortunately some one passing by to the farm house heard me, and came to my assistance. We conveyed my friend and Alice to the house. She speedily regained her self-possession, but how changed she was! L. took my hand—"I am dying—let me see her once more—let me have the two beings dearest to me to bless me"—he could say no more—he placed a ring on my finger—he took a hand of each of us—and pressed them—gave us his last look—a look that spoke every thing of affection.

I learnt from Alice that she had come on the continent with her husband; that in consequence of the continual persecution she experienced from the addresses of a nobleman at Palermo, she had prevailed on her husband to reside for the remainder of their stay in Sicily, at Catania, as being remote from Palermo; that the cowardly ferocity of the disappointed Sicilian had prompted him, as she supposed, to endeavour to procure her assassination in revenge for the insults which he considered himself as having received from her; and that L.'s sudden interference had prevented the execution of his diabolical plan at the expense of his own life. Alice was evidently wretched and ill both in body and mind. Her husband was sent for, and they returned to England, where she died soon after.

No trouble was ever taken by the Sicilian police to identify or punish the assassin. But the mal-administration, or, rather, the non-administration of justice there, is notorious. Such is the relation you requested me to give—such was the fate of one of the noblest of beings. Peace be with him.

I remain, as ever,

My dear F.
Your most affectionate Friend

TRANSLATION FROM SENECA.

BY CHEVIOT TICHEBURN.

It is not wealth, nor riches great,
Nor purple Tyrian robe of state,
Nor Palace, Diadem, nor Crown,
That mark the Monarch from the Clow.

A KING alone in truth is he
Whose mind from Vice's stain is free,
Who casts from off his nobler soul,
The bonds which meaner minds control,
Whom no ambition lures to glare,
A transient meteor in the air,
To live in shouts his little day,
By turns the People's dupe and prey;
Who envies not the gold that shines
In rich Hesperia's countless mines,
Or where the boast of other lands
The Tagus rolls her yellow sands.
Or all the fields of golden grains,
That wave in Lybia's fertile plains.

Whom e'en with lightnings gleam oblique
The Thunderer will not dare to strike;
Who fears not all the winds that rave
Along the Adriatic wave;
And sees the stormy firmament,
With cheek unblench'd, and heart unbent;
Who safely lifted up on high,
Sees earth, as if beneath him, lie;
And meets the fate he cannot shun,
With joy, as if his task was done.
Let Kings to battle hasten far,
Who drive the Daian host to war—
Who rule the realms which wide surround
The sea which strews with gems the ground—
The sea along whose redd'ning breast
Float gales from Araby the blest;
Or who the Armenian confines away
Where Caspian hills access display,
Or who the frozen waters tread
Where Danube's icy oceans spread;
Or where the Seres till the ground,
The Seres by their fleece renown'd,
Let these for kingdoms thousands kill,
'Tis VIRTUE makes the monarch still.
A kingdom can her power bestow,
Which asks not falchion, steed, or bow,
Which asks not Parthian spear, or lance,
Or engines, which like towers, advance:
Which solely asks, and but requires
A mind exempt from low desires—
Or fear, and He who thus is blest,
May find this kingdom in his breast—
Let others seek the glittering court
Where high ambition's votaries sport;
Be mine—the ease and downy rest,
Which soothe the quiet country's guest;
The humble roof, the lowly shed,
Where trees around their foliage spread,
Where no Patrician's scornful eye
May break upon my privacy.

So when my days at length are past,
Ungloomed and cloudless to the last,
I may, beneath my darling shades,
Expire, as softly day-light fades;
My only monuments the trees—
My only dirge the mountain breeze—
Such be my lot. For death will fall
On him most sharp, who—known to all—
Is found, when comes the mortal blow,
To feel—he has HIMSELF to know.

CERVANTES.

Next to the desire of instruction and entertainment, is that of an acquaintance with those to whom we are indebted for such instruction and entertainment; and every incident tending to throw light upon the pursuits, habits, or ancestry of great or remarkable men, is dwelt upon with pleasure and treasured up with care: this is so generally felt and acknowledged, that a new publication seldom makes its appearance without a life, or at least some account of the author: indeed there is at this time publishing in the metropolis, a little work which contains portraits and biography of living characters who are any way eminent for talent or virtue. I have been led into these reflections on observing our generally imperfect knowledge of the above author: most of the accounts which I have seen in English, give a wrong year for the date of his birth, and all of them, a wrong place of birth; and in a metropolitan periodical* now publishing, which contains an alphabetical arrangement of eminent persons who have been concerned in or connected with trade, the words "origin unknown" are placed opposite the name of Cervantes.

It is now some years since the Spanish academy, under the direction of their Sovereign the late King, published a magnificent edition of Don Quixote, at the head of which was the life of the author, written by a distinguished academical, from materials which were the result of a diligent and scrupulous research; and, therefore to be depended upon. This account states that Cervantes was a gentleman by birth, the son of Rodrigo de Cervantes, and Leonora de Cortinas, and was born at Alcala de Henare's in New Castille, on the 9th October, 1547. In other respects our accounts agree with the life written by the Spanish academical; but his account of the slavery of Cervantes, and his attempts to escape therefrom, may perhaps not be unacceptable—it runs thus:—

"As Cervantes was returning from Naples to Spain in a galley belonging to Philip 2d, he was taken by Arnot Mami, a most redoubtable Corsair, and carried as a slave to Algiers. But nothing could damp the courage of Cervantes; and though he was pretty sure of dying a cruel death if he made the least attempt to regain his liberty; he notwithstanding laid a plan to escape with fourteen other Spanish captives. It was agreed that one of them should be ransomed, who was to return home and come back with a bark and carry off the others in the night time. The execution of this project was not very easy: in the first place it was necessary to raise a sufficient sum to redeem one of them; then to escape from their different masters and remain together without discovery until the time when the bark should come for them.

"So many difficulties appeared insurmountable; but the love of liberty made every thing easy. A Navarrese captive who was employed to cultivate a large garden which was situated on the sea-shore, undertook to dig a cavern in a retired part of the garden, capable of containing the fifteen Spaniards. It took him two years to perform this work: in the mean time they had, by begging and working, got together a sum sufficient for the ransom of a majorcan of the name of Viana, on whom they could depend, and who was perfectly well acquainted with all the Barbary coast. The money being ready and the cavern complete, it took six months more to assemble them all together; which being done, Viana purchased his freedom, and left them, after having sworn to return in a short time.

"Cervantes was the soul of the enterprise: he went in the night time to procure provisions for his companions, and when day began to appear he returned to the cavern with the day's allowance. The gardener, who was not obliged to conceal himself, kept a constant look out for the bark which was to release them.

"Viana kept his word. On his arrival at Majorca he waited on the viceroy, whom he informed of the business; and requested assistance in his enterprise. The viceroy gave him a brigantine; and Viana, full of hope, hastened to the delivery of his brethren.

"He arrived on the coast of Algiers on the 23d September in the same year, 1577, a month after his departure from thence. Viana had taken particular notice of the spot, and knew it again though it was night: he steered his little vessel towards the garden where he was expected with so much impatience. The gardener who was on the watch perceived him, and ran and gave notice to the thirteen Spaniards. At this happy news all their hardships were forgotten, and they embraced each other with tears of joy, eagerly watching the bark of their liberator; but alas! as the prow was just close to land, several Moors who were passing by, seeing the christians, gave the alarm; and Viana in terror put his vessel about and regaining the open sea soon disappeared; and the unhappy captives thus replunged into slavery retired to their cavern to weep.

"Cervantes encouraged them: he hoped, and he instilled the same hope into his companions, that Viana would return; but no Viana appeared. Grief and the dampness of their confined and unhealthy dwelling brought on a cruel sickness amongst them, and Cervantes not being any longer able alone to provide for and attend to them, called in the assistance of one of his companions, who was to relieve him of the task of procuring provisions. But the man he chose proved false to them; for he went and informed the Dey of the whole affair, turned muselman, and conducted a guard of soldiers to the cavern, who seized and chained the thirteen Spaniards.

"Being taken before the Dey he promised them their lives if they would declare who was the author of the enterprise. It was I, said Cervantes, spare my brethren and let me die. The Dey admired his intrepidity and restored him to his master, Arnot Mami. The unfortunate gardener who dug the cavern was hung by one leg until he was suffocated with his own blood.

† No less than four places, viz. Madrid, Seville, Laceda, and Alcala, had laid claim to this honour.

"Cervantes made four other attempts to regain his liberty; but was at length ransomed by his mother, Leonora de Cortinas with the assistance of the Fathers of the Trinity: this was on the 19th September, 1580, after a slavery of five years."

Cervantes was of the same decisive character to the last. Four days before his death he asked for his romance of Persiles which he had just finished, and with a feeble hand wrote the dedication which he addressed to the "Count of Lemos, who had just arrived from Italy. It is as follows:—

"To Don Pedro Fernandez de Castro, Count de Lemos, &c.
"We have an old Spanish romance which runs but too true: that which begins with the words

"Though death urge strongly to depart,
"I write to you before I start, &c.

"Such is precisely my case at present; they gave me extreme unction yesterday; I am dying, and am very sorry I am not able to tell you how much pleasure your arrival in Spain gives me. The joy I experience ought to save my life; but the will of God be done! Your excellency will at least know that my gratitude lasted as long as my life. I regret much the not being able to finish certain works which I intended for you, as, the Garden Weeks, the Great Bernard, and the last books of Galatea; for which I know you have a kindness; but that would require a miracle of the Almighty, and I only ask him to preserve your excellency.

Michael de Cervantes."

Madrid, this 19th April, 1616.

He died the 23d of the same month aged 68 years and 6 months.

* This Count of Lemos had been a sort of patron to Cervantes, but suffered him to live in straitened circumstances.—Our Shakespeare was more fortunate in England.

EXTEMPORANEOUS ADDRESS TO DR. JOHNSON'S BUST.

"Thou bit of frowning plaster!
Thou head of the proud master
Of style the most sententious,
Of wit the most contentious,—
Thou dost not often look
Down here on crabbed book;
But rather smel' at the vapour
Of some light morning paper,—
Or hear'st the Fleet-street dandy.
Call for a glass of brandy,
(Diluted oft with water,)—
Or look'st upon the slaughter
Of beef, or lamb, or mutton,
By some blown city glutton.
Though I've no great affection
For this our host's selection,
And wish the head were placed here
Of our divines Shakespeare,
Or Rabelais; or Montaigne,
To smile on port or champagne,
(For thou art looking solidly),
I'd willingly remove
To Hamstead's leafy grove
This bust of learned gravity,
To frown me into suavity,
As skulls at Memphian banquet:
Heighten the joy. I'd flunk it
With Socrates and Plato,
With Seneca and Cato.
But where my heart reposes
In bowers of twining roses,
In those endearing hours
Of nightingales and flowers,
When Mrs. H. for me
Prepares nectareous tea;
And, when there are around us
Those charming girls, who found us
In our sweet solitude,
And spite of voices rude,
And the world's envy, came
To watch o'er genius' flame;
O then, my friends, to lull us
Into sweet thoughts, Catullus,
Anacreon, Boccace,
And each that loves a lass,
Shall smile upon our blisses
Of quips, and cranks, and kisses—
And out of these we'll cater Thoughts that shall make us greater Than he we now sit under,—
A starveling age's wonder."

THE STAFFORDSHIRE COLLIERS.

Many of my readers must recollect crossing, in the route from London to Holyhead, a miserable tract of country commencing a few miles beyond Birmingham and continuing to Wolverhampton. If the volumes of sulphurous vapour which I shall not compliment with the name of smoke, permitted them at intervals to "view the dismal situation waste and wild," they would observe the surface of the desert around them scarred and broken, as if it had just reposed from the heavings of an earthquake. Now and then they would shudder as they passed the mouth of a deserted mine left without any guard but the wariness of the passenger. Sometimes they would see a feeble and lambent flame, (called by the miners the wild fire) issue from chaps in the paroled earth. It is self-kindled by a process familiar to the chemist, and feeds on gas evolved by the refuse of the coal, that has been left in immense caverns hollowed by the labours of ages, over which the carriage of the unconscious traveller rolls for many miles. They would be struck also with the sight of houses from which the treacherous foundations have gradually shrunk, leaving them in such a state of obliquity with the horizon, as if they stood only to evince the contempt of themselves and their inhabitants for the laws of gravitation.

If the traveller, in addition to these attacks on his organs of smell and of vision, has nerve to inspect more closely the tremendous operations which are going on around him as far as the eye can reach, he must learn to endure the grating of harsh wheels, the roaring of the enormous bellows which, set in motion by the power of steam, urge the fires of the smelting furnace till they glow with almost the white brilliance of the noon-day sun. He must learn to care little for the sparks which fly from the half-molten iron, under the action of the forge in torrents of burning rain, while the earth literally trembles beneath the strokes of a mightier hammer than Thor himself ever wielded against the giants.

But my present business is with the human part of the spectacle. The miners, or, as they call themselves, the colliers, are a curious race of men, and the study of their natural history would be replete with information and entertainment. Nothing can be more uncouth than their appearance. Their figures are tall and robust in no ordinary degree, but their faces, when, by any accident, the coating of black dirt in which they are cased is partially rubbed off, show ghastly pale, and even at an early age they are ploughed in the deepest furrows. Their working dress consists of a tunic, or short frock, and trowsers of coarse flannel. Their holiday clothes are chiefly of cotton velvet, or velveteen as I believe the drapers call it, decorated with a profusion of shining metal buttons; but they seem principally to pique themselves on their garters, which are made of worsted, and very gay in colour: these they tie on, so that a great part, as if by accident, appears below the knee. Their labour is intense. They stand, sit, or crouch for hours, often in the most irksome posture, undermining rocks of coal with a pickaxe. Not unfrequently they are crushed beneath the weight of the superincumbent mass, or suffocated by a deleterious exhalation, which they call by the expressive name of the choke damp, and sometimes they are scorched by the explosion of the hydrogen which is generated in the depths of the mine—a disaster from which that beautiful invention of Sir Humphrey Davy, the safety-lamp does not always preserve them. This evil is not however attributable to any imperfection in the instrument, but to the astonishing recklessness of the men, who are with difficulty prevailed upon to observe the plainest and most simple directions even in matters of life and death.

The high cheek bones and the dialect of these people seem to argue them of Northern descent. Perhaps in some remote age they may have swarmed from the Northumbrian hive to seize on the riches of the less adventurous or intelligent Southrons. Be that as it may, they have clearly no similarity either in speech or feature with the peasantry of the neighbouring districts. They have also manners and customs peculiar to themselves. One in particular is the non-observance, or at least the very irregular observance, of the common rule for the transmission of the surname. What rule they follow I cannot say, but it often happens that a son has a surname very different from that of his father: sometimes a man will have two sets of names, as John Smith and Thomas Jones, and that without any intention of concealment—but, except on high occasions, as a marriage or a christening, they rarely use any appellative except the cognomen or nickname. The Latin word is the best, because the English implies something inconsistent with the staid and regular usage of the epithet by all persons connected with the subject of it, his wife, his children, and himself included.

I knew an apothecary in the collieries, who, as a matter of decorum, always entered the real names of his patients in his books; that is, when he could ascertain them. But they stood there only for ornament: for use he found it necessary to append the soubriquet, which he did with true medical formality, as for instance, "Thomas Williams, vulgo dict. Old Puff." Serious inconvenience not unfrequently arises on occasions where it is necessary to ascertain the true name and reduce it to writing, not only from the utter ignorance displayed by the owner of all the mysteries of spelling, but from his incapacity to pronounce the word, so as to give the slightest idea of what its orthography ought to be. Clergymen have been known to send home a wedding party in despair, after a vain essay to gain from the vocal organs of the bride or bridegroom, or their friends, a sound by way of name which any known alphabet had the power of committing to paper. The habit of using the cognomen is so common, that the miners apply the custom to strangers with an unconsciousness of offence quite classic. If a traveller should be hailed by the epithet "nosey," he should recollect that Ovid endured the same treatment in the court of Augustus without dreaming of an affront, and he may even flatter himself that he bears some outward resemblance to the great poet.

Indeed, in all communications with persons of higher rank, the miners preserve a bold simplicity of manners far different, at least in my mind, from insolence. I recollect passing through the little town of Bilston at the time of the first abdication of Buonaparte, and being accosted by one of a group of colliers, who, with black faces and folded arms, were discussing the events of the day, with an interrogation, which, imitated in print, might stand thus, "Oy say, what dost thee think o' the paice, beoots?" which being rendered into our language is, "I say, what dost thou think of the peace, boots?" My boots were, I suppose, that part of my dress by which I was most conspicuously distinguished from the natives. This I understood as a friendly invitation to a conference on the state of affairs, and my feelings were no more hurt by the designation bestowed on me, than those of Hercules ever were by the epithet Claviger.

But I had made this race of people in some sort my study. I remember once mounting rather hastily the outside of a stage coach which was passing through the coal district, and setting myself down in the first place that offered itself, without taking time to reconnoitre. When I had opportunity for inspection, I found at my right an old man with a rope coiled round him like a belt, by which my practised eye at once recognised him for a canal boatman, carrying home his towing-line. On my left was a personage whose dress was not a little equivocal, consisting of a man's hat and coat, with something like petticoats below. The mysterious effect of this epicene costume was heightened by the wearer's complexion, which reminded the spectator of dirty wash-leather. A short pipe adorned the mouth, with which it seemed well acquainted; and the tout ensemble sat in deep silence. These diagnostics, and especially the last, might have imposed on a novice the belief that the subject of my observation was of the worthiest gender, as the grammarians uncivilly term the masculine: but I knew my compagnon de voyage at a glance for one of the softer sex, and treated her with becoming attention. To all my politeness she returned little more than a nod and whiff. At length my fellow passengers began to converse, or rather, I suppose, to resume a conversation which I had interrupted. The lady I found was of the same profession as the gentleman on the other side—a conductor of boats. They appeared not to have had much, if any, previous acquaintance, but seemed drawn together by community of sentiment and pursuit. They were soon engaged in an occupation interesting alike to all ranks of society; namely, an inquiry into the characters of their common friends. As their conversation illustrates in some degree the manners of this people, I will give a short specimen of it in the original; together with a glossary for the benefit of the mere English reader.

Lady. Her is. Her uses that mon sheamful—her rag; him every neef's of her loif.

Gentleman. Her does. Oive known her come into the public, and call him all the neames her could lay her tongue tew afore all the company. Her ought to stay till her's got him i' the boat, and then hermit ay what her'd a moind. But her taks aiter her feyther.

Lady. Hew was her feyther?

Gentleman. Whoy, singing Jemmy.

Lady. Oi don't think as how Oi ever know'd singing Jemmy. Was he ode Soaker's brother?

Gentleman. Ees, he was. He lived a top o' Hell Bonk[†]. He was the wickedest, awearinst moos[‡] as ever Oi know'd. I should think as how he was the wickedest mon i' the wold, and say he had the rheumatiz so bad!

Many anecdotes might be collected to show the great difficulty of discovering a person in the Collieries without being in possession of his nickname. The following I received from a respectable attorney. During his clerkship he was sent to serve some legal process on a man whose name and address were given to him with legal accuracy. He traversed the village to which he had been directed from end to end without success; and after spending many hours in the search, was about to abandon it in despair, when a young woman, who had witnessed his labours, kindly undertook to make inquiries for him, and began to bail her friends for that purpose.

Oi say, Bullyed, does thee know a mon named Adam Green?

The Bull-head was shaken in sign of ignorance.

Loy-a-bed, dost thee?

Lie-a-bed's opportunities of making acquaintance had been rather limited, and she could not resolve the difficulty.

Stumpy, (a man with a wooden leg) Cowskin, Spidle-shanks, Cock-eye, Pig-tail, and Yellow-belly, were severally invoked, but in vain, and the querist fell into a brown study, in which she remained for some time. At length, however, her eyes suddenly brightened, and slapping one of her companions on the shoulder, she exclaimed, triumphantly, "Dash my wig! whoy he means my feyther!" and then turning to the gentleman, she added, "Yo should'n ax'd[§] for Ode Blackbird!"

Now and then, but not very frequently, groups of these children of nature may be seen wandering about the streets of Birmingham, with much the same sensations as the Indians experience at New York or Philadelphia. It was at Birmingham that the Ressie-mam, as Lord Byron calls it, first broke out, and in a few weeks indistinct rumours of Young Betty's fame caught some ears even in the coal-mines. One man, more curious or more idle than his fellows, determined to leave his work, and see the prodigy with his own eyes; and having so resolved, he proceeded, although in the middle of the week, to put on a clean shirt and a clean face, and would even have anticipated the Saturday's shaving, but he was preserved from such extravagance by the motive which prevented Mrs. Gilpin from allowing the chaise to draw up to her door on the eventful morning of the journey,

Should say that she was proud.

But notwithstanding this moderation he did not pass unobserved. The unwonted hue of the shirt and face were portents not to be disregarded: and he had so soon taken the road to Birmingham, than he was met by an astonished brother, whose amazement, when at last it found vent in words, produced the following dialogue: "Oi say, sirree, where be'st thee gwain'?"—"Oim agwain to Brummajum."—"What be'st agwain there for?"—"Oim agwain to see the Young Rocus."—"What?"—"Oi tell thee Oim agwain to see the Young Rocus."—"Is it aloive?"

I ought to thank my readers (if one by one they have not all dropped off before this time) for indulging me so long in my garulity. But I had a reason for it. I wished to preserve some sketch, while the original is yet in existence, of a race which refinement, that fell destroyer of character, has hitherto spared. Soon will these be tales of other times! The primitive simplicity even of the Collieries is threatened. Already have the eyes of Bell and Lancaster searched out even this spot of innocent seclusion; and the voice of education will ere long be heard above the wild untutored sounds which have so long charmed the ears of the traveller.—Knight's Quarterly Magazine.

THE LITERARY BEGGAR.

A PORTRAIT.

"A man of shreds and patches."

JACK SCRAP is a literary beggar: destitute of talent, and superficial in education, he is possessed of the mania of wishing to be thought a man of genius and of letters. His ambition, it is true, does not soar astonishingly high; but still it soars beyond his powers. He thinks a newspaper poet the sublimest of mortals; a two-penny theatrical critique the noblest work of human genius; and the editor of a weekly newspaper the most important of all official characters. I have designated Jack a literary beggar, but in truth the term is not sufficiently comprehensive: Jack not only begs, but also often borrows, and occasionally steals. He maintains with some of his acquaintances the reputation of a clever man, by passing off the productions of others as his own. Should he happen to be detected, he laughs of the business, with an ease and assurance more easily admired than imitated: for, after all, Jack's impudence is his great forte, and whatever his inferiority in other respects may be, in this particular he stands unrivalled. His front is of the true Corinthian brass, and his cheek is as unsusceptible of a blush as a roasted potato.

When I was first introduced to Jack, he lifted himself, in my opinion, an infinity of pegs, by reciting as his own a copy of verses that were assuredly replete with wit and humour. I could not indeed avoid remarking how much the tone of this production was elevated above the pitch of Jack's conversation: for to do him every justice, a duller rogue never prosed over a Welsh rabbit and a pot of half-and-half. This, however, I thought nothing of, as I recollected that Goldsmith did not shine in conversation. Jack, in trying this experiment on me, thought himself perfectly secure. The real author was unknown to me and "to fame," and Jack thought it unlikely that we should ever become acquainted, inasmuch as he was at that present reading confined to his bed by a raging fever, and given over by his physicians. But, alas! "for human hopes," the bard recovered, either because he was dear to Apollo, or damned by the doctors, and I became acquainted with him early in his convalescence. The first specimen I received of his abilities was the humorous stave in question. I hurried off to Jack, as I really imagined, to cover him with confusion; but he was not so easily thrown off his centre: "Well," says he with the coolest effrontery, "so you have seen B—, and of course discovered my hoax."

The masque being thus removed, Jack thought it useless to attempt any further disguise with me; knowing that I was a scribbler, he began to tease me incessantly for contributions. "Give me," he would say, "my dearest friend, your cast-offs. A man of your intellectual riches can afford to be charitable. Why will you write things and fling them into the fire, &c. when you know how much I am in want? You destroy daily as much as would support a dozen famished poets." But I was proof against the eloquence and flattery of Jack, and refused his solicitations with a stoicism worthy of an ancient Roman.

Jack takes care now to steer clear of professed literary characters; the appropriation of their productions is too liable to detection. He proceeds upon a safer system. His plan is this; he is continually on the watch for very young men of talent, who have a touch of the "cacoethes scribendi." He hunts out these literary minors with as much avidity as the Roman usurers sought for those who had just assumed the toga, under close-fisted sires. He talks them well over "en connoisseur," persuades them that he is a man of great genius, and of no small influence in the republic of letters. He gains a perfect ascendancy over them; in evil hour they intrust him with their MSS., which of course

"Part like Ajut, never to return."

Jack has other modes besides this of supplying his intellectual finances. His begging I have already noticed. As some men never meet you without making a demand on your purse, so he never sees a friend without begging a copy of verses, a critical notice, or an epistolary effusion. What he cannot obtain by solicitation, he will endeavour to procure by stealth. You must have a care, when Jack visits you, to leave no loose papers about: they will disappear in less time than you can say Jack Robinson. As he walks the streets, his eyes are eternally on the ground in search of lettered scraps, and his nose often pays the forfeit of ill-timed industry. He carefully appropriates the wrappers of his butter, cheese, &c. He is profoundly versed in the linings of trunks, and has attentively collated an infinitude of portmanteaus. You may often see him at one of the various repositories for ballads, selecting and purchasing those effusions of the Grab-street muse. Even the chalking upon the walls cannot escape him. He painfully deciphers the fading hieroglyphics traced by pencil, pen, or penknife upon trees, or seats, or windows: those transient aspirations after immortality, where "wit shoots in vain its momentary fires," and where "the universal passion," like the vital powers in the lowest class of animals, is reduced to a few feeble efforts to escape from instant oblivion. I pass over Jack's profound science in tomb-stones; his familiarity with "the names, the years spelt by th' unlettered muse," and a variety of other branches of "litteral" knowledge in which his super-eminent skill entitles him, "par excellence," to the name of a "man of letters." Jack's study is truly a cabinet of curiosities. It is a vast repository of literary plunder, and immense receptacle of literary alms. As for his library, that is principally composed of books which he has borrowed, but forgotten to return; a few old magazines, and some obsolete collections of pamphlets. "Byshe's Art of Poetry," and "The Dictionary of Quotations," complete his physic of the soul. Then he has three several portfolios, crammed with original manuscripts. The first contains what he has begged, and this is the least; the second what he has borrowed, which is much larger; and the third, what he has stolen, which is the largest of all. He has the largest collection of ballads to be found in the United Kingdom. Another book contains innumerable morceaux from the newspapers of the last thirty years, in the arrangement of which paste and scissors have been efficient agents. He has a file of play-bills from the commencement of the present century. Besides all which, he has six trunks filled with those miscellaneous scraps gleaned in his various excursions and perambulations.

Jack is monstrously fond of asking people to join him in writing some work; immensely anxious to play the Beaumont to some credulous Fletcher, who would soon discover that no insecure could result from the combination. Hitherto his efforts have been signally unsuccessful, he having been able to allure into his toils only a few inexperienced youths, who mistook the frothy effervescence of boyish enthusiasm for the genuine spirit of genius.

Jack Scrap, though he cannot be unconscious of his own utter want of powers, is yet, strange to say, possessed of a large portion of vanity. It may appear strange that any man should derive gratification from praise to which he knows he has no claim. But Jack reconciles matters thus: "Every man has some peculiar gift of nature—I know that I have no talent for original composition, but then this defect is fully atoned for by plentiful supplies of the discriminating power; I can select with judgment, and appropriate with dexterity, the productions of others. This is my pecūlia gift, and I am not ungrateful for it to the munificence of nature. Non omnia possumus omnia."—MUSEUM.

LIVERPOOL FESTIVAL.

GRAND FANCY BALL, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 3rd.

The following interesting account is abridged from the Liverpool Courier.—

"The crowning entertainment of the whole festival was the magnificent Fancy Ball, in the splendid suite of rooms in the Town-hall, on Friday evening. It was to this that all the hopes and fears of the beau monde were directed, and it was here that all their wishes centred. In all the other entertainments of the festival, except the dress ball, on Monday evening, they were merely deeply interested and delighted spectators; but here they were to be actors, to mingle in the merry and diversified throng, and to give and receive pleasure.

"The magnificent suite of rooms, in the Town-hall, was appropriately fitted up and brilliantly illuminated for the occasion. The principal drawing-room remained as usual; but the eastern and western saloons were fitted up as Turkish pavilions; the tops and sides being sprinkled with gold spangles, consisting of stars and crescents, a brilliant glass chandelier, suspended from the centre of each, illuminating the whole. A beautiful divan of purple ran round each of these pavilions, presenting a most vivid picture of Oriental luxury and magnificence. The ball-rooms were both in statu quo, most brilliantly lighted up. The great dining-room was the principal refreshment-room. A smaller one, leading from the great staircase, was devoted to the same purpose; and tea and coffee were, we believe, prepared on the ground-floor, for such of the company as preferred these exhilarating beverages. The tables of the refreshment-rooms were decorated with much elegance and taste, and were loaded with fanciful objects of confectionary, delicious grapes, and exquisite wines.

"Nothing could be more pleasing than the appearance of the company as they entered the vestibule, individually or in groups; and so numerous were they, that one almost thought the long succession would, like the phantoms in Macbeth, "stretch to the crack of doom." It literally and without exaggeration baffled all description. Let the reader imagine, for a moment, that he is in a large room crowded with the natives of all the nations of the globe, in their appropriate and various costumes. Let him transport himself back from the present day to the time of Richard Cœur de Lion, and imagine himself living, and acting, and conversing with the contemporaries of nearly all the intervening reigns, in all the freshness and vivacity of life and correctness of costume. Let him imagine Cæsar's imperial pomp contrasted with Cato's republican sternness. Let him do all this, and he will have some faint conception of the scene which presented itself in the Town-hall on Friday night.

"Here you might see the republican Cato holding amicable intercourse with the imperial Cæsar. There Richard Cœur de Lion and a Knight Templar, armed from head to foot, with lance in hand, were pacific amidst hosts of Infidels. The Virgin Queen and her beauteous but unfortunate rival, each happy in her own regal splendour, ceased to distract nations by senseless disputes about the palm of beauty; whilst Lady Jane Gray pursued her course, without the least danger of being brought to the block. There the romantic Raleigh appeared attired as richly as when the splendour of his habiliments and the beauty of his person attracted the eye of Elizabeth: here Buckingham fluttered in more than regal magnificence and splendour. The Cavalier of the time of the first Charles, with his formidable accoutrements, his sugar-loaf hat, and surprising breadth and amplitude of breech, contrasted finely with the superb and elegant Hussar of modern times; whilst the two services, the Army and the Navy, went hand in hand in support of the COMMON CAUSE of all present. The magnificent and splendid robes of the soldier of the time of the Emperor Maximilian presented a fine contrast to the simplicity of the modern military costume. Romeos and Hamlets, and all the heroes of the sock and buskin, struttéd the stage. Fops fluttered; Pomona scattered her sweets; Lord Barleigh shook his head; and Bayes was busy rehearsing. Noblemen mingled with lovely Peasants and Shepherdesses. Harlequin waved his wand, and

"Black spirits and white, Red spirits and grey;"

appeared upon the stage, and mingled with the merry crowds. Chinese and Indians, Kamshatkans and Otaheitan, Brazilians and Portuguese, shook hands with each other in amicable intercourse. Magnificent Turks were followed by crowds of beautiful Circassians. Every variety of Tartan was displayed, and multitudes of warlike Highlanders swept the rooms, conducting and guiding the fair. Bravos and Robbers, Guerillas and Bandits, appeared in all quarters, to the alarm of those ladies who were adorned with jewels and diamonds; but they left off their vicious habits—for that night only. Monks and Friars, Nuns and Abbesses, Courtiers and Senators, Syntaxes and Panglosses, Barristers and their Clients, Sheriffs, Aldermen, and Justices, Farmers and Clowns, Jockeys and Yorkshiremen, Ladies and Gentlemen, all appeared in the motley scene, contributing to its diversity and sharing in its pleasures.

The total number of persons that attended the ball was 1475; the largest number ever congregated together, in Liverpool, on any similar public occasion; and we question whether any other provincial town can boast of an edifice which would accommodate so numerous a company.

In the very extensive list of names and characters we recognise the following from this town and neighbourhood.—

T. Houldsworth, Esq., M. P., was attired in a modern court dress.

Aspinall Phillips, Esq. beautifully dressed as a Lancer.

Wm. Ainsworth, Esq. was correctly habited as a young Forester of Sherwood.

Mr. Hardman, of Windsor, dressed as a Broughton Archer.

The Messrs. Gray, were splendid Greeks.

Trafford Trafford, Esq., of Trafford, was dressed as his own crest, in alternate red and white, and had a most singular appearance.

Thomas Close, Esq. was a Highland Chieftain.

Mr. J. Fielding appeared in the dress of the Dragon Guards.

Mr. W. Garnet supported the character of the haughty Castilian with becoming dignity, and astonished a vast crowd of spectators by the brilliant display of a flaming plume!

Mr. Mobson as the Bandit Grindoff, with his follower, Mr. C. Taylor, ever ready at the whistle of his captain.

The Messrs. Gas, of Stockport, were most appropriately dressed; the one as the Knight of Snowden, the other as Robin Hood.

Mrs. Lyon, of Prestwich, wore a beautiful fancy dress. Miss Lyon and Miss M. Lyon were Persian Ladies of distinction, elegantly attired. Mr. M. Lyon was a Turk of rank. This character was remarkably well personified.

Miss H. Entwistle was beautiful as the Countess of Leicester. Miss F. Entwistle looked interesting as a Swiss Peasant.

Miss Winter, of Stocks, was dressed in a very becoming Neapolitan costume, accompanied by her charming niece, Miss Greenall, in similar attire. Mr. Winter, an Archer, in Kendal green.

Mr. Chas. Grant was an old English Baron.

Mr. Ralph Brackenbury was an excellent Turk.

Mr. Healey appeared in the full dress uniform of the Royal Company of Archers, the body guard of his Majesty on his late visit to Edinburgh; a very elegant and becoming costume. The crape worn on the arm, we presume, was in memory of Lord Hopetown, the late Captain-General of the company.

J. Booth, Esq. wore a splendid court dress. Mrs. J. Booth appeared in the interesting costume of "Sweet Ann Page," in which character she looked delightful.

Mr. Liebert made a good Turk, and was accompanied by Miss Higson, of Ormskirk, in a French promenade dress.

We could not determine whether Mr. Tomlin was an Abyssinian or a Turk; he was, however, most splendidly dressed.

Mr. T. G. Leigh and Mr. Hall were Spaniards, Mr. Wm. Grant, as a Highland Chieftain, was most superbly dressed and appropriately accoutred.

Mr. G. Haworth appeared as Buckle, the Hero of the Turf. He was the lightest jockey we ever saw, and carried in his hand, with conscious pride, the royal whip won by him at Newmarket. He was busily employed in betting upon his favourite horse, which he protested would eclipse all the others hollow. He looked as if he had been confoundedly sweated, being as thin as a whipping post. He met with several knowing ones on the turf, who curried him pretty sharply.

Mr. Scholes was a Turk.

William Crighton, Esq., was most splendidly attired as a page.

Mr. Brooks a Spanish Nobleman.

Mr. Whitworth, as a Sailor, and Mr. Whitworth Jun. as a Spaniard.

Mr. Wm. Harter appeared to advantage in a singularly splendid Spanish uniform.

Mr. Turner in a full court dress.

Mr. Wm. Hall, Jun. as a Spaniard; and Mr. Bousfield, as Dr. Pangloss.

VARIETIES.

REQUISITES FOR A FOOTMAN; BY DR. KITCHENER.—

"Were I required to portray a good domestic servant, I should say, he must have eyes like a hawk, but be as blind as a bat; ears like a cat, but be as deaf as a post; must have more sensibility than the sensitive plant, but yet be as hard as a stone; must be wise as a counsellor, yet ignorant as an ass; his movement swift as that of an eagle, but smooth as that of a swallow; in manners and politeness a Frenchman; in probity and virtue an Englishman; in dress a gentleman; in disposition a saint; in activity a harlequin; in gravity a judge; he must have a lady's hand, a maiden speech, and a light foot; in protection and defence he must be a lion; in confidence and trust like the law of the Medes and Persians, 'which altereth not'; in domestic management a Moses; in chastity a Joseph; in pious resolution a Joshua; in wisdom a serpent, in innocence a dove."—If the Dr. has not got to his me plus ultra we should like to see a description of a master worthy such a servant!

SPINNING MICE.—They laugh at every thing in France. The recent calculation as to the possibility of employing mice in spinning cotton, has produced the following facetious paragraph in one of the French provincial Papers:—"It has been announced that a mouse employed in treading a little wheel for the purpose of spinning cotton, and in doing so, making as many steps in a day as are equal to four post-leagues, would produce a profit, clear of all expenses, of eight francs a year: and it has been asked, 'What might not be accomplished by two or three thousand mice?' This new impelling power will form an epoch in the present age of industry."—"A few feet from me is a squirrel, whose size and the quickness of whose revolutions would, if I mistake not, make him worth a hundred mice, for such a purpose; putting out of the question the much larger spindle that he would turn. According to my calculation, which is founded on that respecting mice, if a hundred mice would yield an annual profit of 800 francs, a single squirrel would yield as much; and if a manufacturer were to employ a hundred of these working quadrupeds, his annual gains would be 80,000 francs; besides their wages, paid to them in food. Should that sum be thought too large, I consent to its reduction to a half, which would still be a handsome profit. It is evident, therefore, that if the labour of mice is compared with that of squirrels, the advantage is in favour of the latter. In publishing this important discovery, I may perhaps draw upon myself the animadversion of mice, but cats will do me justice."

THE DRAMA.

On the evening of Friday the 3rd instant, Mr. Macready appeared as Damon in the anomalous dramatic exhibition entitled "Damon and Pythias." How this strange composition happens to be sanctioned, not to say approved, we are at a loss to conceive.—To behold a patriot whose every nerve is strung to faithfulness and freedom, with philosophic nicety,—whose declamation puts servility to the blush and renders the efforts of ambition questionable,—whose actions manifest unmingled disinterestedness and extreme and reckless daring—in short, to behold the philosophic Damon agonize in proverbs of silent and declamatory passion, and to witness the patriot Damon accept pardons from one whom he dares, defies, and denounces a traitor and a tyrant, we say, these absurdities bewilder and confound, and induce us to ask what is there in the character of Damon worthy of a Macready?

Pythias is as high and as inconsistent in friendship as Damon in patriotism; his love for and confidence in Damon, whose life is forfeited, snatch him from the midst of the nuptial ceremony, and plunge him into the gloom of a prison, where his late ecstatic anticipations of female loveliness and conjugal felicity, are superseded by the horror of almost certain destruction. To this fate his honour rivets him with indissoluble determination, even when escape appears practicable; and if his friend's fidelity is questioned, he softens down alarm and impatience with a text from the chapter of accidents. However, the moment big with fate approaches, and Damon has not arrived; Pythias, his surety, comes forth to suffer in his stead; but, whilst he appears to reconcile himself to events, he carefully shuns the block of destiny; at length, on the approach of Damon he springs on to the scaffold, and in the moment when his redemption is certain he seems to prepare for the axe with unwonted alacrity!—This post he soon resigns to his friend, to his "more than brother" with a complacency, nay, cheerfulness, that but ill comports with his former magnanimous professions.

The characters were all admirably sustained, and the imbecility of the author was rendered in some measure endurable by the efforts of the performers. The house was well filled. Some of Macready's happy touches of expressed, as well as of internal feeling, were loudly applauded.

FRAGMENT OF A PERSIAN TALE.

To painter's gaze, to poet's eye,
There's beauty in yon liquid sky:
The painter's hand would seize upon
The wingy clouds that o'er it run;
The poet mark the bright sobah!
Begem the evening's glowing veil,
And every tinge of beauty trace
On that rich landscape's flowery face—
Explore the earth, and rifle heaven,
For fairy gifts to fancy given,
And half believe—so full of bliss
That jasmin scented garden is—
The soul would need no brighter sphere
To draw her from Elysium here.
But oh! the heart that beauty's gleams
Have met, and tyrant Love inflames,
Feels each surrounding object wear
A brighter hue when she is near;
The one whose presence lends a glow
Of heaven to things on earth below—
The sky more bright—the stream more pure
Seems to the fond enamoured wooer—
And the bright dreams that glad the heart
Their hues to outward scenes impart,
As suns, themselves too bright to view,
Gild all around with splendour too.

Such was the feeling that possessed
That evening young Abdallah's breast,
Urging his simple bark to glide
Upon the breast of that pure tide
That circles Hamet's haram towers;
And ne'er before so warm a heart,
So deeply stricken with love's smart,
Approached confinement's gilded bowers.—
Love flies from shackles, flies to share
The draught of freedom's living air;
Leaves chains, though chains of gold, behind,
The firmest bound, when least confined;
Free as the wild wind let him play,
And sweet his tone, and bright his ray;
But try to hind the wayward child,
And tears shall dim the eyes that smiled;
Like those gay insects, which all bright
Bear splendour on their wings of light—
Imprisoned, lose their beauty's power,
In dull captivity's dark hour.

By stealth impelled—with muffled oar,
The light boat grates against the shore—
One bound has placed him on the sod;
With hasty, but with secret, tread,
Abdallah on the path has sped,
That winds around that stern abode;
And speedily has reached the bower
Where oft before at that same hour,
He poured to Leila Dourah's ear
The tale she loved, yet feared, to hear;
And still the memory of that time—
Of love's first fond delighted prime,
Hangs like a spirit o'er it still,
Without a cloud, without a chill—
For ever lovely, pure, and warm,
A constant glow, a living charm.

And never sure, below, above,
Was spot more framed for tales of love,
Than Leila's flower encircled bower,
Where all of sweets that had the power
To soothe the soul—to glad the eye,
Were met in goodly company.
Flowers scattered round in such fond waste,
As if the Angel of the Spring,

Speeding from star to star in haste,
Had scattered from his glowing wing
The leaves of perfume that rejoice—
The airy forms of Paradise;
The warm, the blushing, Persian gul
Blends with the delicate sunbul—
The blossom of the young pomegranate
Scents the fond winds that gently fan it,
And lotoses their warm heads lave
In yonder pure and cooling wave,
That glows in evening's sunset ray
Almost as rich, as warm as they.
And as the west wind sank upon
That garden which the bounteous sun,
Beaming with all its power to bless,
Had ripened into loveliness,
It stole from every flower that grew,
From every rose's leaves of dew,
From every drooping violet,
Weeping, with tears of odour wet,
Some new delight, some perfumed charm,
So freshly cool or richly warm,
Uniting such a world of sweets
As never in the West's cold clime,
Even in summer's deepest prime,
The sense of him that wanders meets.

But hush—is that a footstep near,
Breaking upon the listener's ear?
It is—it is. "My Leila dear,
My only hope—my guiding light—
My fair, my young, my sole delight,
Oh ever—ever—welcome here!"

Descending to his fond embrace,
With that mild exquisite feminine grace
Which like the downy bloom that glows
Upon the yet unopened rose,
A softer, gentler beauty shed
O'er all she looked—o'er all she said;
With eyes that smiled upon her lover,
And glowing cheeks that blushed all over,
The maiden by her bower is standing,
And he—almost in worship—bending.

In fancy's mood—in fancy's hour,
When warm imagination's power
Sweeps wider range, with bolder wing,
From all she scans fresh sweets to bring—
Fond visions of ethereal kind
May meet perchance the longing mind,
That musing on the fairy form,
Ripens each trace into a charm,
And fixed on every hue and feature
Of its own self-imagined creature,
Creates a standard to compare
Whate'er it sees of good and fair.
He well remembers, who has met
A being where God's seal has set
The lineaments of beauty, living,
Pure, breathing, glowing transport giving—
Not beauty that allures the sight
Alone, but fills the soul with light,
Where every blush that fades away,
Gives room for warmer tints to play,
Condensing all his floating notions
Of love and undefined emotions
Into one rich deep current, stealing
The heaven of thought, the fount of feeling.

* * * * *
Who so has loved, may aptly deem
How beautiful, how fondly bright—
Warm as an angel's glowing dream—
Pure as that angel's look of light—

Was she that stood beside that bower,
Lending a charm to evening's hour,
That in her presence brighter is
Than Aden's scented realms of bliss.

BIOGRAPHY.

WILLIAM BECKFORD, Esq.

This celebrated Gentleman is of royal and noble descent; as appears by an order registered in the Herald's College, bearing date 20th March, 1810, which recites that his father (the celebrated patriotic Lord Mayor of London, whose statue is in the Guildhall, London,) married Maria, daughter and at length co-heir of the honourable George Hamilton, who was the second surviving son of James, the sixth Earl of Abercorn. This lady was descended, in a direct line, from James, the second Lord Hamilton, by the Princess Mary Stuart, his wife, eldest daughter of James II, King of Scotland.

Mr. Beckford married the Lady Margaret Gordon, only daughter of Charles, late Earl of Aboyne, by whom he has issue two daughters, namely, Margaret Maria Elizabeth Beckford, and Susanna Euphemia Beckford, who married the present Duke of Hamilton.

It is remarkable that individuals of three branches of the noble house of Howard are descended from the family of Beckford; viz. 1. Henry Howard, Esq. (only son of Lord Henry Molyneux-Howard and nephew to the present Duke of Norfolk), whose grandmother, Mary Ballard Long, was daughter and heir to Thomas Beckford, Esq. grandson of Peter Beckford, Esq. Lieutenant-Governor of Jamaica. 2. Charles Augustus Ellis, Lord Howard de Walden (of the Suffolk branch of Howard), whose great-grandmother Anne, the wife of George Ellis, Esq. was elder sister to the Countess of Effingham, and aunt to the present Mr. Beckford. 3. Thomas and Richard, the two last Earls of Effingham, sons of the above Countess.

Mr. Beckford, on coming possessed of his fortune, made the grand tour, and resided many years in Italy; it was here he improved that exquisite taste and love of the Fine Arts, for which he is pre-eminent. On his return to England, he resolved on building Fonthill—which he accomplished; and in August, 1822, he as hastily determined to dispose of it—and accordingly gave directions to that eminent auctioneer, Mr. Christie, of Pall-Mall, London, to dispose of it; and so great was the anxiety to view the splendid edifice, that upwards of 9000 catalogues, at one guinea each, were sold before the day of sale; on the day preceding which, to the surprise and mortification of the public, notice was given that the estate of Fonthill, with all its immense treasures, was sold to Mr. Farquhar for 300,000*l.* This gentleman has since employed Mr. Phillips to sell the whole of the effects, which will occupy thirty-nine days!

We are told the possessor of this splendid treasure left it almost without a pang. His first resolution was to build a cottage lower down in the demense, near the fine pond, and let the Abbey go to ruin. "I can live here," he said to his woodman, "in peace and retirement for four thousand a year—why should I tenant that structure with a retinue that costs me near thirty thousand?" Subsequently, however, he resolved to part with the entire, and announced his intention without a sigh. "It has cost me," said he (gazing at it), "with what it contains, near a million. Yet I must leave it, and I can do so at once. Public surprise will be created, but that I am prepared for. Beckford they will say, has squandered his large fortune: to me it is a matter of perfect indifference.

It would much exceed our limits to attempt even a description of this justly celebrated Fonthill.

On one occasion, whilst the tower was rearing its lofty crest towards Heaven, an elevated part of it caught fire, and was destroyed. The sight was sublime; it was a spectacle, it is said, which the owner of the mansion enjoyed with as much composure as if the flames had not been devouring what it would have cost a fortune to repair. This occasioned but small delay in its re-erection, as the building was carried on by Mr. Beckford with an energy and enthusiasm, of which duller minds can form but a poor conception. At one period, it is said, that every cart and waggon in the district were pressed into the service, though all the agricultural labours of the country stood still. At another, even the royal works of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, were abandoned, that 460 men might be employed, night and day, on Fonthill Abbey. These men relieved each other by regular watches, and during the longest and darkest nights of winter, the astonished traveller might see the tower rising under their hands, the trowel and torch being associated for that purpose. This must have had a very extraordinary appearance, and it is said, was another of those exhibitions which Mr. Beckford was contemplating.—He is represented as surveying the work thus expedited, the busy levy of the masons, the high and giddy dancing of the lights, and the strange effects produced on the woods and architecture below, from one of those eminences in the walks, of which there are several; and wasting the coldest hours of December's darkness, in feasting his sense with display of almost super-human power. He had, for a long time, more than four hundred persons employed at both, who were regularly paid every week. The works went constantly on; there have been instances of individuals paid for sixteen days' work during a week, including Sunday as a double day. Mr. Beckford superintended all himself. He stood amid torch-light, urging on the growth of the Abbey towers, and rode during the day among his labourers to see the plantations made. These traits of character will not surprise those who have made mankind their study: the minds most nearly allied to genius, are the most apt to plunge into extremes, and no man at present in existence, can make higher pretensions to a mind of this cast, than the founder of Fonthill Abbey.

Mr. Beckford's style of living, as described by persons who had daily opportunities of witnessing it, is calculated to excite surprise and astonishment. The gorgeous array of the banquet he provided for Lord Nelson and Lady Hamilton has long since been detailed with all its splendid attributes of pomp; but his ordinary mode of living, which regarded only himself and his solitary foreign guest, was costly and luxurious beyond what the most extravagant Englishman could possibly imagine. He allowed his cook 800*l.* a year, and appropriated 2000*l.* a month to supply provisions for his kitchen. He has been known on frequent occasions to sit down with Franchi, (for there was scarcely ever a third person at table) to a dinner consisting of twenty covers, served upon gold plate. Meanwhile the servants were all stationed in a line of communication between the dining room, the pantry, and the kitchen, so that they were in constant readiness to pass his orders from one to another. With him the words servant and slave were synonymous, and he considered it derogatory to his dignity not to have a train of menials waiting his commands at all hours. He was as despotic in this respect as an Eastern Rajah, yet at the same time never was any man more liberal to his servants. They not only enjoyed his bounty, but shared his magnificence, and while they trembled at his nod, they feasted on viands with which the first potentates of the earth might regale themselves.

Among the many anecdotes of this gentleman, the following is related:—

Mr. Beckford resolved on going to Italy, and accordingly purchased two vessels and fitted them up in the greatest magnificence: he had scarcely been at sea a day, before he encountered a stiffish breeze, which continued one night and part of the next day, during which time the vessels made but little way on their voyage, this so enraged Mr. B. that he summoned the captain to his presence, and asked him how long he imagined the breeze would continue. "Perhaps, Sir," says the captain, "it may last another day or so." "Another day!" replied Mr. B. "land me, my servants, and the carriages immediately at the first port." This order was obeyed; and Mr. B. remained on shore, making the captain a present of the vessels for his trouble.

It is not, perhaps, generally known that no man living is more fanatically superstitious than Mr. Beckford. He is said, while he lived here, to have had so great a veneration for St. Anthony, that when he once made a vow in his name he never in any instance failed to fulfil it. A ludicrous proof of this occurred while he was building the Abbey. He vowed, by all the power of his favourite Saint, that he must have his kitchen built within a certain number of days, so that his Christmas dinner should be cooked in it. The workmen knew right well that the vow was not made in vain. They plied their labours incessantly; the kitchen was actually built; but in consequence of the extreme wetness of the weather the mortar could not cement the stone and brick-work. The Christmas dinner was, however, cooked in time to save Mr. Beckford's conscience, but scarcely was it dished for dinner when the walls of the kitchen tumbled about the ears of the domestics. Fortunately nobody was injured by the crash, for it gave just notice enough for them to escape its effects. How strange that a man of Mr. Beckford's great intellectual powers and vast attainments should labour under such an influence!

Mr. Beckford, it is generally supposed, possesses little now beyond the remnant of what he acquired by the sale of Fonthill. His once magnificent income has fallen to almost nothing. He lost a large portion of his West India estates from defect of title, after a most expensive legal contest of several years, and was subjected to the heavy arrears of produce while he held them. So far from deriving any thing from the remnant of those once proud possessions, there was last year a loss on the expenditure and produce of 200*l.* Mr. Beckford possessed a fine taste, but he attached little value to any thing that was not costly, and is said to have been long the dupe of picture-dealers and collectors. His establishment, too, for years, was most lavishly expensive. "The lazy vermin of the hall, those trappings of his folly," swarmed at Fonthill. Mr. Beckford never moved but with a circle of them in attendance. They formed an appendage of his invincible pride; there was not a bell throughout the entire abbey; but he needed no summons to command attendance. His liveried retainers stood, in numerous succession, watchful sentinels at his door, and at fixed periods anticipated their proud master's wants. With all this expense few visitors were ever seen within the Abbey gates, and his own habits were most temperate. The Chevalier Franchi had been his companion for years; Mr. Beckford met him, we believe, in Portugal. The Chevalier was then a married man, and with a family, but was induced to attend his patron to England: his wife and children did not, however, accompany him, or quit Portugal during the many years the Chevalier remained in England. He acted for several years as comptroller of the household at Fonthill, is said to be a man of very cultivated mind, and is now with Mr. Beckford at Bath, who took from the Abbey 16 or 18 servants with him beside. Soon after the latter's first visit to Portugal, he became, it is generally supposed, a Catholic, and a member of the monastic order of St. Anthony. The Chevalier Franchi was also an extern associate of that order, and initiated with Mr. Beckford in its mysteries: both always wore the cross of the order, as a distinguishing character, in their breasts; and, like Louis XI. of France, Mr. Beckford always carried about him a small silver image of the saint. He had also in his chamber a picture of the Anchoress, to which he addressed his constant orisons. Mr. Beckford for years rose early, and retired as early to rest. He read constantly during the evening; half the books in the library bear marks of his studies; his days, with few exceptions, were devoted to the improvements in the building and demense.

NAVAL PORTRAITS.

.... "Ho! the Gazette a-boy! Heave to, and take a weather-beaten old Tar aboard. Zounds! would you make sail and leave me aground? Almost lost my passage; ay, and so would you, Mr. Editor, if you'd one foot in the grave, and was compell'd to bobble along sideways like a crab, as I do. Well, well; there, now I'm fairly shipp'd, let's look about and take a survey of my fellow-passengers—all worthy souls, no doubt. How are you, gemmen, how are you!—'Hearty.'—That's right; long may you float on the tide of public favour, and scud before the breeze of prosperity: and as for our foes, may they be condemned to hunt butterflies, clad in a pair of half-worn cobweb smallclothes fastened together with bachelors' buttons, mounted on the back of an Irish hunter as rough as a hedge-hog, with a hip-bone you may hang your hat on. Aye, aye, I'm no polish'd moon-seer or star-gazer, but a plain, blunt sailor. I'm proud of your company though, gemmen, indeed I am, and hope you won't despise me 'cause I shake a cloth in the wind; they are only a few Sailor's memorandums—'poor, poor dumb mouths.' Fine feathers make fine birds, they say; but a wig no more makes a lawyer, than a lawyer could make a wig, unless it be an ear-wig; and remember that an honest Tar is not to be despised—he may carry all his wealth upon his back; and as for his cash, it may be like a wild colt on a common, obliged to be driven up into a corner of his pocket to be caught;—

but 'a man's a man, for a' that.' And arn't I commenced minotaur-painter—a kind of di-ormmer—a sort of my-crow-ounce-mug-roughy? (there's a word for you.) But this is a tumble-down-and-get-up-again world, and the wheel is in constant motion. A man must either have a handle before his name, or tail like a comet after it to get into notice and expose himself—D.D., M.D., or LL.D., which Teddy O'Shaugnessy latinizes 'Leg-em Lather-em Doctor.' But avast! let's get on ship-shape—'All hands a-boy!'—tumble up there, you 'Quidams,' and show yourselves—don't lie stinking in your births when I want to display your poor-traits. None of your grinning, Jack Rattlin; you look like the head of a Dutchman's walking-stick with a face as long as you can remember, and a mouth, not from ear to ear, but from there to yonder. The flowers of the navy, eh? Ah, so Lord Melville called you; sweet nose-gays, to be sure, if we may guess by the frog blossoms on your nose! They would have made you a gunner, Jack, but they were afraid of trusting that volcano near the magazine. This, gentlemen, is the identical son of that Jack Rattlin that Smollet speaks of in his Roderick Random, and he's his father's child every inch of him. There, don't hold your sn up—I know all about it; and once get you upon Duncan's action, there'll be no clapping a stopper on your tongue. I know what you are going to say now. 'Close alongside! Close alongside!' was echoed from the lower and main-deck as you ranged up to the Dutch Heroule; and the Captain answered, 'Aye, aye, my men, I'll lay you close enough, never fear: don't fire till you hear the quarter-deck.' And so when you got at a tolerable shake-hands distance, you rattled your pepper-boxes at them, and made em sneeze a bit. Aye, aye, I understand all about it. In the language of one of our beautiful Latin poets, Horace, Homer, Cæsar, or Jupiter, I forget which—'Pill-em, Mill-em, Bourd-em, Pike-em, Strike-em, and that's a battle. Ho, Donald, my boy! how's aw wi' you, mon?'—'Brawly, brawly, thanks to ye for speering; how's aw wi' yourself?'—'There's a fine picture, gentlemen: look at Donald's wig; it resembles that one out in stone in the British Museum, and fits as well—not one hair is out of place; indeed his head seems to have been made for it. Look at his countenance! If some of our great Masters want a study from nature, here's the face. But it's of no use talking—I must get some of you into the Exhibition, and then take you to look at your pictures. Hold up your head, Donald, as you've been used to do every rope-yarn Sunday, when you muster'd by divisions, with a clean shirt and a shave. There, gentlemen, upwards of eighty, with the bloom of a child, teeth like a young colt, and as active too. This was the man that won the running-match—seven left against seven right wooden pins, in a narrow lane; the left wooden legs on the right hand, and the right wooden legs on the left hand. My eyes, what a clattering as they rattled along and struck against one another! Half a dozen Merry Andrews beating Paddy O'Rafferty on the lids of as many salt-boxes was nothing to it! Donald lost his leg at Trafalgar with the brave Lord Collingwood: indeed he has sailed with him ever since he was a midshipman.—Where's Barney?'—'Here I am, sure.'—'And so you are. This, gentlemen, is Barney Bryan, the one-eyed carpenter's mate of the Foudroyant. He is a native of Tipperary, though he tries to pass for a countryman of Sir Isaac Coffin's. He lost his eye by the accidental flash of a priming at the battle of the Nile; and has a particular aversion to a Welshman. Old Davy Jenkins, the purser's steward, and he were perpetually wrangling about ancestry, and they frequently threatened to box it out. One day, I remember, (for Barney is an old shipmate of mine,) poor Tom Miller and myself set out upon a sporting excursion on Sir Sydney's estate at Rio Janeiro. We had struggled through the woods, torn our clothes and flesh with the brambles, and were almost suffocated with the heat, without shooting so much as a rat; when my messmate, who was some paces in advance, singing

'A light heart and a thin pair of breeches
Will get through the world, my brave boys,' suddenly stopp'd, and laid his finger on his lip. We enter'd an area that had been clear'd of the trees by the Admiral's men, for the carpenters to work and sawyers to cut the timber. Look, (said Tom, in a whisper), look there! Close to the edge of the saw-pit sat old Barney fast asleep, snoring most sonorously, and, as if to beat time, his head kept respectfully bowing to the measure. A huge he-goat at a short distance, whether attracted by Barney's nasal organ, (for 'music hath charms,' &c. &c.) or expecting the repeated nods were a challenge of skill, is uncertain; but at every bend of the one-eyed carpenter's head, up sprung the goat on his hind legs, and shook his tremendous horns in a menacing manner. I wish I could spell a snort, for snoring began to get out of the question now. 'A plot! a plot!' whisper'd Tom, almost convulsed with laughter. I'll bet five pounds on the old clothesman. I say it is a good plot—a brave plot, in all its ramifications.'—'Xxhhrrt,' said old Barney. Up went the goat again; but whether the apostrophe was longer than usual, or the nod more terrific to this hero 'bearded like the pard,' away sprung Billy, and with one butt capsize'd the old man backwards into the saw-pit.

Haugh! haugh! haugh! roard Tom, 'Murder! Murder!' bellow'd old Barney. 'Haugh! haugh! haugh!' went Tom again. I ran to see if he was hurt; but there he lay half buried in dust and shavings, with his blind side uppermost. 'Halloo, Barney! what's the matter?' said Tom. 'Oh, Mr. Miller! replied the old man,) I didn't think you would have used me in this manner.'—'I! (said Tom;) No, no, I could never have done it so clean if I'd served a seven years' apprenticeship at it. But rouse up, old Barney, at him again; it was Davy Jenkins; here he stands, and says he arn't done with you yet.'—'The rascal! the backbiting, assassinating dog! But stop a minute, I'll make him skip like one of his mountain goats, the villain! I'll teach him to take advantage of me. Stop a minute, (rising, and climbing up,) I'll soon show him.' But scarcely did his head appear above the level of the ground, when the animal made another run, and happy it was for the old veteran he dipp'd out of the way. 'What! bob at a shot!' cried Tom. 'Aye aye, (said Barney, crawling out on the opposite side,) I might have guess'd as much where you're concerned, Mr. Miller.' In the evening, when the workmen came aboard, 'Lay hold of my axe there below,' cried the carpenter's mate down the hatchway. 'Baah,' was the reply. 'Ah, your baining—a fool's bolt is soon shot.'—'Baa-aa-aah,' flew along the main deck; and from that poor Barney has been almost baa'd out of his senses.—Who have we next? Oh, Dick Wills. Here, gentlemen, 's a pretty perpendicular figure, six feet four; his head resembles a purser's lantern stuck on a spare topmast. There's a visage!—a second edition of Voltaire! The barber's afraid to shave him, lest he should cut his fingers through both his cheeks. He walks on his toes, and appears as if he was always looking on a shelf. He was coxswain to Lord Hew Seymour when he commanded the Sans Pareil. Dick has read, or rather swallowed, several authors, without digesting them, and now they lie heavy on his memory. He is a bit of a poet too; but history is his forte. A pun is beneath his notice, and Teddy often gets a severe dressing for torturing words; however, 'tis all taken in good part, with an acknowledgment that a pun is the very panchinello of the vocabulary, and if wanting pungey, merits punishment; and when a punitor becomes punitive, he should not punish with a puny punctilio.—Now comes my respected and respectable friend Sam Hatchway. Age has not dimm'd the lustre of that eye; and though the winter of life has spread its snow upon thy head, yet is thy heart as warm as ever. Thus have I seen the frost of ages gather'd on the lofty mountain, while in the valley the luxuriant vine has spread its beauteous foliage, bow'd with the purple cluster, rich in dispensing joy around. Sam sailed the first two voyages round the world with the immortal Cook; and he never to this hour mentions his name without a tear, although he sneezes, coughs, blames the weather, and a hundred contrivances to conceal the real cause. Nearly ninety summers have swept down the tide of time, and he is looking forward to a peaceful mooring in the blessed haven of eternal rest. How calm, how dignified that look by care unruddied! Yes, it is the sweet smile of hope that looks beyond this cold, dull sphere that bounds us. There may we meet again, where hope is unknown, where all is certainty, for all is heaven.—Next comes Johnny Dumont, a native of Canada. He was with Wolfe at Quebec, and saw that gallant hero fall; was present at both Copenhagen affairs, the taking of the Isle of Anholt, and the storming of San Sebastian, at which latter place he lost his right arm in attempting to stop a six-pound shot fired from the citadel. He is a quiet, inoffensive man, and consequently has nothing very striking about him. But I must once more crave your indulgence for the rest, as Sam Quake-toes has just hobbled up to inform me that my presence is requested at the Jolly Sailor, to decide a dispute between Ben Marlin and Jem Breeching, whether the first invention of our ingenious ancestors was a pig's yoke or a mouse-trap,—a subject well worthy of attention in this age of mechanical speculation. Sam, who has lately been studying craniology, has an idea that the brain actually takes the particular form of any object on which the fancy or ingenuity broods. Thus one man's coils away like a patent chain-cable; and another's resembles a steam-engine with a fly-wheel; a third takes the shape of a corkscrew; a fourth of a tread-mill in constant motion; a fifth of a roasting-jack; while an author's is constantly changing from a crust of bread to a round of beef—from a sovereign to the King's Bench—from his last work, to a critical review. Good bye, gentlemen, good bye—you shall see me again before long. Keep a look-out, for perhaps I may come disguised as a gentleman; till then—Don't bother me, Sam, I'm a-coming—till then, Meum and Tauum."

AN OLD SAILOR.

THE TINKER OF SWAFFHAM.

A TALE.

Once on a time, (if you'll believe
An oral legend we receive,
From distant ages handed down)
A Tinker liv'd in Swaffham town.
Nightly a dream disturb'd his rest,
Tormenting his perturbed breast;
That if he'd go on such a day
To London bridge, and on it stay
A certain time, he'd not complain
Of having spent that time in vain.
Night after night, times without number,
This dream romantic broke his slumber,
And in his brain such puzzling raised,
As the poor Tinker almost craved.
At length he form'd the grave intent,
Of seeking truth in the event.
To London bridge resolv'd to tudge it,
He straightway buckled on his budget,
Took staff in hand, and dog at heel,
His view the better to conceal.
Then out he set, and mused did pant he,
Like Quixotte on his Rosinante.

What sights he saw, what objects met,
How fast he walk'd, how hard he sweat,
How on aerial bliss he feasted,
As to the goal of hope he hasted—
Whate'er befel him, or arose,
'Tis fancy's business to suppose.

But lo! the destin'd place is gain'd,
With many a weary step attain'd.
On London bridge he takes his station,
And waits with anxious expectation.
At length despairing of success,
And conscious of his foolishness,
His ardour credulous relented,
And of his journey he repented.
Nor welcom'd he this wisdom late,
But blam'd his stars, and curs'd his fate,
For having let a dream's impression
Of his thick skull take such possession.
Shame stings his mind, and passions vex it,—
When, just about to make his exit,
A shopman spruce advanc'd upon him,
And o'er and o'er began to con him.
Then in these words address'd him: "Friend,
Why dost thou saunt'ring here, thus spend
Thy time without apparent end?
I now inform thee, I'm suspicious,
That thy intents are somewhat vicious."
"Why," said the Tinker, "I must own
'Tis foolish loit'ring here alone;

My aim is pure, tho' you may doubt it,—
By your leave, I'll tell you all about it."
So he related him the fact,
In every circumstance exact.
" 'Twas but last night," replies the other,
" I had a dream—just such another,—
That if to Swaffham town I hasted,
My time would not be vainly wasted;
For if I there searched under ground,
In such a place, there would be found,
To my enriching and great pleasure,
A mighty mass of hidden treasure
Now to this dream if I had listened,
And in obeying it persisted,
I just now there had been delaying,
And for my silly folly paying;
A credulous, gaping, staring elf,
Looking as foolish as thyself."
On hearing this, without delay,
The Tinker homeward bends his way.
His bounding heart with joy elated,
He seeks the spot erewhile related,
In hope that Fortune he might find her,
Somewhat more prosperous, and kinder.
Upon the earth he eager laid
His massy mattock and his spade,
Off flew his hat, and eke his jacket,
The hard ground he began to back it;
Round him he threw the loosen'd earth,
And hack'd and delv'd till out of breath;
With eager hope his eye it gladden'd,
As to the stone-struck spade he listen'd.
Now having gotten pretty deep,
Off down he look'd with eager peep.
At length to his great joy he found,
An antique Vase hid under ground:
Struggling he lifts the pond'rous vessel,
As 'twere a pig unto a trestle;
And soon he with eye-sparkling pleasure,
Pour'd forth of silver coin a treasure,

Now 'stead of wand'ring up and down,
As heretofore, from town to town,
He 'gan to live somewhat more freely,
To eat and drink, and dress genteelly.
He took the world a great deal easier;—
And now, become a master brazier,
Hang pots and pans all in a row
Before his door to make a shew;
That passers by their eyes might raise up,
Among the rest he hung the Vase up.
Upon this tin and copper shop,
An Antiquarian chanc'd to pop;
Instant the virtuoso, smitten
With an inscription quaintly written
Upon the Vase, but in a hand,
That very few could understand,
Full eagerly he stepp'd in to him,
And begg'd the brasier it to shew him;
Entreated that the thing he'd sell him,
And instantly the price on't tell him.
The brasier forthwith ceas'd his hammering,
Greatly amaz'd, and somewhat stammering.—
" Why, Sir," said he, " I do not know
What use the Vase can be put to;
To sell it, Sir, I am not willing,— Nor will I whilst I'm worth a shilling."
" Pray," cried the other, " can you guess
What these old characters express?"
" No," said the brasier, " oft in vain I've sought their meaning to obtain."
" Their meaning then," replied he,
" Is, 'UNDER ME LIE OTHER THREE.'"
The brasier answer'd in a fury,
" Sir, I woult sell it, I assure you."

So out he hasted to the spot,
Where he the other Vase had got.
He dug more vigorous than before,
And quickly found a second store.
Three massy and capacious urns,
He lifted from the earth by turns;
Each fill'd as full as it could hold
With precious antique coins of gold.

Thus flush'd with riches unexpected,
The Church at Swaffham he erected;

And on the stain'd glass he commanded,
(Which has to this age down been handed)
To London bridge the act of wending,
With staff in hand, and dog attending,
To be describ'd, with legend quaint,
Of thanks unto the patron—saint,
For having to the wealth directed,
With which the Church had been erected.

MY OPINIONS ON MEALS.

The great difficulty of writing on every subject, is the management of the introduction. Authors in general are ceremonious gentlemen; they do not like to intrude themselves abruptly on the reader, but choose to give him timely notice of their approach. An introduction is a kind of intellectual bow which we of the scribbling tribe think necessary to our début in good company: but, God knows, we are often as awkward at it as we always are at the corporeal inflexion. For my part, I generally disapprove of this ceremonious custom, and think it "more honoured in the breach than in th' observance." I am quite a disciple of Montaigne in this particular, and perfectly anti-Ciceronian in matter of preamble.

I have however, as you see, smuggled a sort of introduction on this occasion. So now to my subject—which is meals. "Brethren, my text is malt." Next to a good introduction, commend me to a good quotation. Meals are threefold: breakfast, dinner, and supper; these form, as it were, the three primary orbs of the culinary system, to which we may add those satellites, tea and lunch, and those eccentric luminaries denominated snaps, whose periodic returns have hitherto baffled the calculation of gastronomers.

First, of the first breakfast. Now I am by no means an unsocial character, yet ("I own the soft impeachment")—I like my breakfast alone. I hate your family breakfasts: they are an abominable waste of time and spirits. As to your bachelors, who invite brother chips to breakfast, and accept of similar provocations, they ought one and all, hosts and guests, to be thrust out of the pale of rational society. I am proud to say, that I never breakfasted in company in my life, except when I could not help it; nor would I give a breakfast to St. Peter himself, not even if he were to allow me to take an impression of his keys in return for the compliment.

The morning hours are sacred to every man of mind. When sleep has removed the perturbations of the preceding day, and the current of your ideas flows on in free yet placid streams, ere the tide is ruffled by the oars of business, which come dashing up towards noon, or the horizon is darkened by the clouds of care, oh! beware of interrupting the even course of thought. The brightest conceptions of genius have started into existence, have grown, and have been matured in the sacred hours of morning; at the period when the body, newly bathed in the dews of sleep, is vigorous and elastic, and the absolute dominion of the mind is yet debated between retreating fancy and invading reason.

But! I am getting quite serious and affected. I find I can write finely sometimes, as well as my neighbours, but let that pass. Breakfasting alone, surrounded by books and papers—this is my notion of Paradise; I can form no better idea of heaven, than that of one eternal déjeûné, accompanied with never-ending files of some pleasant paper. Yet no: I must retract: to the solitary breakfast, as a general rule, let me make one exception. Now and then a fair tea-maker, with a handsome frilled night-cap, and a pair of fine eyes peeping from beneath it; but none of the masculine gender, for the Lord's sake! As to the matériel of breakfast, I, generally speaking, prefer tea; it is the lightest and most intellectual of all beverages. Your déjeûnés à la fourchette are bad—they banqueroute the wits. Give me, for eating, a nice crusty loaf and some good butter; confound your buttered toast and hard eggs. A slice of broiled ham is superb, if you have been up very early, or very late; so is a red-herring; a thousand pities that it should ever make you thirsty. As to the time to be employed over breakfast, I cannot presume to determine so mighty a point; but perhaps it ought not to exceed four hours.

Now, then, for dinner. As I am an advocate for solitary breakfast, so on the other hand, I am a zealot for the social dinner. Not but that I would make a few exceptions even here. A solitary dinner, now and then, is not bad. When you are much fatigued and in very low spirits, dine alone, and take a sleep after. Indeed, some people are so strangely constituted, that I think they ought always to dine alone. My good friend Tom Ogle is one of this cast: Tom, before dinner, is positively a pleasant fellow: but after—"duller than the fat weed that rots itself at ease on Lethe's wharf." I advise every man who cannot drink good wine after his dinner, to dine alone: human ingenuity could not invent a severer punishment for me, than to condemn me to dine heartily on roast pig, drink cold water, and then attempt to entertain a company of ladies. One might as well attempt to deliver a lecture on Italian literature, after being well saturated with draught porter. If you mean to write or study, in the evening, dine alone, by all manner of means. But for pleasure! dine in company; not in a large, formal, stiff company—nor with more than two or three at the utmost. I do not go so far as the adage of the ancients on this topic. The Muses are too numerous, and I conceive that we may deduct one sometimes from the Graces. A tête-à-tête dinner, with a pleasant friend and a good bottle, is the finest thing in the universe. But, like other fine things, it is seldom enjoyed in purity: for, for one man that is fit for a tête-à-tête, there are fifty-five millions that are unfit. My friend Dr. Makeweight is one of this fifty-five millions; and so conscious is he of his own incapacity for a duet at knife and fork, that he would sooner undergo the martyrdom of St. Lawrence, than dine tête-à-tête with any body. I like a duet—I like a trio—I don't dislike a quartetto—I can bear a quintetto; but if I am to go beyond this, plunge me, in God's name, into the densest crowd that ever exhausted the vital air of a banquetting-room. In a very large party there is freedom and partial conversation; in a small one there is freedom and general conversation; but in a middling-sized company, there is neither one nor the other. "In medio non tutissimus ibis."

How delightful, after dinner, is it to sit over a good bottle and some filberts, with one or two pleasant friends! but this subject has been too well handled before for me to touch upon it.

I am quite a bigot in matters of coffee; it clears the intellect, by completing the digestive process. Coffee is the mother of wit, of humour, of sound logic, and brilliant rhetoric: but let it never be forgotten that wine is the father—may they ever be united in bands of the firmest wedlock! What sound sense hath joined together, let not folly put asunder. Your strong coffee, with a proper foundation of wine (say two bottles) fits you for the society of the ladies. The wine and coffee unite by a kind of elective affinity, and dove-tail with the happiest effect; the one gives confidence, the other discretion—the one elevates the fancy, the other rectifies the judgment. Invention results from the first, taste from the second—assurance to attempt a hit, tact and skill to direct it.

Contrary to established notions, I dislike supper: I know all that has been said in its favour, and all that can be said. To me (as an unfortunate garçon), supper en famille is always a melancholy meal: it is the prelude to parting, which usually "follows hard upon." It is to me the knell of joy: it tolls us to the grave of an ungenial and solitary bed. To families it may be a pleasant meal—to bachelors it is miserable, unless they are allowed to sit up all night after it—a custom against which, the prudent heads of families very wisely set their faces. Good night! gentle reader.—Lit. Museum

GAMING HOUSES.

It is curious to see how the windows of the saloon (where the credulous assemble) are secured by bars of iron. A strong padlock is always attached to the door of the stove which warms the apartment, to prevent any attempt that the arm of vengeance might be roused to make, by drawing out the destructive element, and thus set fire to the whole fraternity at one blow! Besides these precautions, we observe below the gambling tables a screen, or strong inclosure, which renders the interior inaccessible to view, and against which the player is seated, without the liberty of extending his legs and feet. The most particular inspection is made of his person by the banker's spies, and even his dress is strictly observed. He is obliged before entering the saloon, to deposit his great coat and cane, which might, perchance, afford the introduction of some weapon; and the elegance of the covering will not save him from the humiliation of having it taken from him at the door.

The attempts, proceeding from despair, which have been made on the lives of those bankers, have established these precautions: indignities which are practised only in prisons, for the security of their unhappy inmates. It is certain, that gamblers reduced to desperation, and on the eve of committing suicide, have conveyed into those places infernal machines, with an intention of destroying the cruel plunderers and themselves in the same ruins. These acts of outrage and frenzy give an exact idea of those institutions denominated public gambling-houses. They are in harmony with those iniquitous places where hell itself exercises a paramount and anticipated authority; and we are bold to say, that (with the exception of a few of the hirelings which chance throws into the ranks of this barbarous institution) the door keepers and others charged with a system of espionage and internal security of the saloons, and the proprietors themselves carry on their countenances a singular and inauspicious aspect.

The saloons wherein Hazard is played are generally well lighted, and elegantly furnished. We perceive, on entering, an immense quantity of gold and silver placed in piles on the tables. There are always six gardiens, Croupiers, that is to say, SERVANTS whose business it is to watch the ill-gotten treasure.—Others are dressed in the first fashion, walking about, acting as spies on the conduct of the Croupiers.—Others are stationed still more out of sight, to watch the movement of the spies. There are others again (Decoy Ducks), whose duty it is to play for the purpose of exciting the unwary stranger to commence his ruin. Four of those animals (Croupiers) are destined to pay the lucky player, and draw to the bank (which they do very dexterously by the aid of a little Râteau a machine of mahogany very elegantly made in the shape of a garden rake), the money lost by those Gamblers unfavoured by the decree of fate. The number of the latter, is to the former, in the proportion of 999 to 1.

The universe put together could not elsewhere furnish so rare and curious a union of originals, more or less ridiculous, as is to be met with in those saloons for play; we perceive numberless men and women seated round those tables from morning to night, with a small card in the left hand and a pin in the right, marking, by making a hole in the card, le rouge, or la noire, la couleur, l'inverse, &c.

The Idiots, who believe that they have the power to subject games of hazard to their stupid calculations, are occupied in making MARTINGALES, which devour in an instant the most independent fortune. Those ridiculous, sottish calculators soon find out their error by being reduced to go to the workhouse. In truth, the very best of those saloons is only a rendezvous for VAGABONDS of all classes.

The Prince is often confounded there with the Barber.—The Princess with the Washerwoman.—The Swindler with the Countess.—The Highwayman with my Lady Bull and her Daughters. The Priest with the femme galante.—The Duke with the Grisette; and the Statesman with the Soubrette lisette.

Were we inclined, we could fill an entire volume, with a list not only of men ruined by play, but of self-murderers: such is the unhappy effect of the abominable passion for gaming.

Our French readers will recollect the deplorable event of that gallant Dutch officer, who, after having lost a splendid fortune not long since in one of those houses, shot himself at Aix la Chapelle.—A Russian general, also, of immense wealth, terminated his existence in the same manner, and for the same cause. More recently, a young Englishman, who lost the entire of an immense fortune at Paris, quitted this world by stabbing himself in the neck with a fork. A short time previously, another Englishman, whose birth was as high as his wealth had been considerable, blew his brains out in the Palais Royal, after having literally lost his last shilling. Finally, an unfortunate printer at Paris, who had a wife and five children, finished his earthly career for the same cause, by cruelly suffocating himself with the fumes of charcoal. He observes, in his farewell note to his unhappy wife,—“Behold the effect of gaming.”

OCTOBER, 1823.

The Summer's sun is gone, and Autumn's brown
Is ceasing fast to deck the drooping trees,
The humblest colour in Dame Nature's gown,
In chill October from its station flees,
Silently falling in each passing breeze,
And give to man, as dropping wither'd down,
A line he seldom reads but always sees,
Which to his sense would read, if blest withal,
“As we do now, oh! Man, so thou must quickly fall.”
Alas! for meditation—those things pass,
As what of course were made to come and go,
And man providing bev'rage for his glass,
Seems o'er his vat determin'd not to know,
At least not feel these monitors below,
But inward whispers “what will come to pass”
“We will be happy here before we go.”
Sad calculation, since his task when done
May be for other lips to drink to him who's gone.

For ah! what thousands, ere that Christmas come,
(Man's mind is occupied in making gay)
Will be, than Christmas, colder in the tomb,
Shot out for ever from an earthly day,
His perishes, whilst lives the earthly clay—
“Will this be mine? my own peculiar doom?”
The most robust in health and strength may say,
All serious listen—but they think with scorn:
Yet many breathe to day who've broke their latest morn.
Die when thou wilt, vain man, the merry chime
Will ring as usual, with the factory bell;
All things be smooth as in thy living time,
And beer he brew'd, aye and be drank as well,
Although thine own importance used to swell,
Thy moment's absence to an age of crime,
And scarcely one be heard thy name to tell,
Save when the Sabbath comes, he careless eyes,
As passing the churchyard, thy stone, and HERE HE LIES!

MINE OF VIRGIN IRON.

Nature every day shows us new phenomena, and, in spite of all our study and research, the most surprising are perhaps still hidden from our view. A mine of virgin iron has lately been discovered in the Missouri country, district of Washington; it forms almost an entire mountain, which is said to be large enough to supply the whole world for many years with metal of a good quality. Hitherto iron had never been met with in a pure metallic form.

MISSION TO THE INTERIOR OF AFRICA, FOR THE DISCOVERY OF THE NIGER'S COURSE.

We have the greatest satisfaction in announcing that our three enterprising countrymen, Dr. Oudeney, Major Denham and Lieutenant Clapperton, who left London on the above interesting and hazardous expedition, under the authority of government, in 1821, arrived in Bornou in February last, and were exceedingly well received by the sultan of that kingdom. It may be recollected that the Doctor, an eminent professor from one of the Scotch universities, was to remain at Bornou as British vice-consul, and that the others would thence pursue their inquiries as to the course of this long-sought river; but it is obvious that the plans and instructions laid down at home for the prosecution of objects where our local knowledge is so extremely imperfect, must be liable to many alterations, and that much, very much, must be left to the discretion of the travellers themselves, and be governed by the circumstances in which they are placed.

These gentlemen have, however, given the most convincing proofs of their undiminished ardour in the service, as well as their fitness for the undertaking, in their having performed their journey over deserts fifteen or sixteen days in length, into the very centre of the continent of Africa, almost without complaining of a single hardship, though they have all at different times suffered severely from the rigours of the climate.

We think, therefore, the most sanguine expectations may be formed of their complete success; and may we not hope that two of our greatest geographical desiderata in the northern hemispheres will, ere long, be supplied by means of the intelligence and enterprise of Englishmen?

THE EYE.—Dr. Sommering discovered the foramen centrale in the human retina; since which, the eye-balls of all animals have been carefully examined for this important structure, and several of the quadrumanous genera (especially the real apes) have been found to possess it. But Dr. Knox, in a communication to the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, now states a very important fact in the theory of vision, and perhaps in that of light, namely, that the foramen centrale and accompanying fold of the retina exist in the class of reptiles, "Lizards," though not in all. For instance, the Lacerta scutata, supercilliosa, Calotes, &c. have them; while the Mabuya, Gecko, &c. have not. The appearances are more developed than in man, and consequently may be submitted to closer scrutiny.

LITHOCROMY.—This is the name given by the French to the art of reproducing coloured pictures on stone. Hitherto it was confined to mere crayon tints, which it rivalled in fineness, lightness, and precision. A Mons. Malapeau has invented a process by which the engravings are effected at once in colours. They are very nearly equal to oil paintings, and are transferable to canvass, and susceptible of varnish, scumbling, and the other processes adopted in the case of oil paintings.

TELEGRAPHS.—The Baron de St. Haouen, has invented a telegraph to be used by night or day, on land or at sea. He proposes, to erect stations along the whole French coast, which are to serve as signals by day, and light-houses at night. They are to be numbered, and the numbers are to be marked in charts. Thus vessels on approaching the coast will be instantly aware of their position. The French army in Spain has adopted the system.

FINE ARTS.

Our countryman, Mr. John Gibson, who now ranks among the distinguished sculptors at Rome, is sought after by the great patrons of Art, both English and foreign, and has full employment for his admirable talent. This young man, who is recommended no less by his modest and unassuming manners than by his genius and enthusiasm for his Art, was originally enabled to study in Italy by the friendship of Mr. Roscoe and some gentlemen of taste at Liverpool, and of Mr. Watson Taylor—to them he owed his introduction to Canova, and he perfected his style under the eye of that great master.

Mr. Gibson thus expresses himself in a recent letter to a friend in London:—

"I continue to feel delighted in Rome, more so than I can express by words, and am on the best terms of friendship with sculptors from all parts of Europe, who are here, all contending for glory. What an advantage!—to see the productions of so many men of genius, and to have their remarks upon what I do myself!—for I always solicit their advice. Only poetical subjects are admired in Rome, and it is the fashion to purchase such. It is a taste for these that has raised the Art to its present high pitch at Rome, and to this may be attributed the dignity and beauty of Canova and Thorwaldsen. I thank God for every morning that opens my eyes in Rome.

"I am giving the last finish to the group of Mars and Cupid, for the Duke of Devonshire. My group of Payche carried off by Zephyrus, for Sir Geo. Beaumont, is in a forward state. I am making a statue of Cupid in marble for Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, and a Sleeping Shepherd for Lord George Cavendish. Lately I received an order from a German Nobleman, Count Schönbrunn, to execute a Nymph for him, in marble.

"I consider myself particularly fortunate in having this opportunity to execute Poetical subjects in marble—they are what I delight and glory in. I would much rather leave behind me a few fine works than a splendid fortune."

CORRESPONDENCE.

SALFORD CHARTER.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—Amongst the other interesting manuscripts in the Chetham library, is a copy of the Charter of Salford, which is there ascribed to Randle Gernouns. On mentioning this circumstance to a respectable and well informed friend of mine in Salford, he shewed me a nearly correct translation of the same, entitled "Copy of a Charter granted to Salford in the reign of King Henry II. supposed to be about the year 1142;" which he had reason to believe was copied from the books of the Court Leet. The palpable chronological error of fixing the reign of Henry II. in the year 1142 immediately struck me; and if the original be lost, as is said, the authenticity of this copy becoming a matter of interesting enquiry, I have taken some pains in the investigation. On comparing the copy with which my friend favoured me, with that in Whitaker's History of Manchester, the one in the College library, and the Placita de Quo Warranto Ducatus Lancastrie, lately published by order of the Commissioners of Public Records, I am quite satisfied as to the correctness of the document, although I differ both with the learned and industrious Kuerden, and with the Clerk or Recorder of the Court Leet as to its date. In 1142, during the tumultuous reign of Stephen, Ranulph Earl of Chester, called Randle Gernouns, took his weak and unhappy king prisoner, and obtained from him as the terms of his ransom, a grant of the castle and city of Lincoln, with the lands of William de Albenei, Lord of Belfoir and Grantham, and those of Roger de Pointon, from Northampton to Scotland, "till he should be restored to all his lands and castles in Normandy." This grant comprising the lands inter Ripam and Mersam which belonged to Roger, includes Salford; but the possession by Randle was only temporary and conditional, and could scarcely be sufficiently secure either to permit or induce him to grant Charters in the same year. He was poisoned by William Peverill, anno 1153, and was succeeded by his son Hugh, surnamed Cyvelooke. Hugh rebelled against Henry II. in 1173, but had his possessions restored in 1177. He died anno 1181, leaving a son, Ranulph surnamed Blundeville, then only 13 years of age. In the 13th Henry III. this Ranulph, who had married the widow of Geoffrey Earl of Richmond, fourth son of Henry II. received a grant or confirmation of all the lands between the Ribble and the Mersey, with the forests, keeps, homages, liberties, and appurtenances. I am inclined to think it was this Randle who gave the Charter to Salford, at some period between the date of this grant of the homages, &c. in the year 1229, and of his death, which took place in October, A. D. 1232. Our Salford friends are, I know, tenacious about their seniority to Manchester in chartered rights, and I am by no means desirous of undervaluing that feeling, but if I am correct, the difference in their favour is only about 70 years. I am not only open to conviction, but shall be very happy if any of your correspondents will furnish me with information that would justify the relinquishing my present opinion, and giving the Charter of Salford a date more ancient by 90 years than I am at present disposed to do. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

LITERARY MISERIES.

MR. EDITOR,—Of all the miseries in this miserable life, literary miseries are surely the keenest: here have I been writing week after week, article after article in the expectation of acquiring a portion of temporary fame in the pages of the Manchester Iris. In vain do I worry my brains to indite something new; I am never the nearer: arts and sciences; law, physic, and divinity; every thing turns to lead under my unfortunate touch: if I attack the charlatanism of physic, I am told my observations are quite common place; if I ever so gently animadvert on the selfishness or inattention of the ministers of religion, I am informed that the unlearned and inexperienced in all ages and countries, have made the same unfounded and erroneous remarks; and at length; is it to be endured! I am thrown aside without even the cold notification of "Pilgrick's communication is received" for it was but lately I sent, as I conceived, a most excellent paper on the subject of attorneys keeping travellers; which I had taken down nearly word for word as it was uttered by a witty pleader in the Manor Court of Salford: this article for brilliancy and solidity eclipsed all the former, and was redolent, if I may be allowed the expression, of wit; this redolent is a pretty word and I could not resist the temptation of making use of it here, and must therefore plead guilty to the charge of having rather forcibly pressed it into my service; but I have good authorities for it; three or four at least: well, I thought this article could not fail of obtaining a conspicuous place, perhaps too in large type; and therefore on the following Saturday I very early obtained an Iris, and anxiously referred to the notices to correspondents, and not finding any to me, concluded my paper was inserted; and with a fluttering heart and trembling hand turned over the pages, then turned them over again, and then again; but to my unspeakable chagrin and mortification I found it all a blank! a cheerless void! nothing but a sober essay from the club at the green dragon, a hop skip and a jump epistle from Watty, and part of a new—old Romaine of Llewellyn which was never concluded: by the way is Llewellyn sick or sulky that he does not finish his Romaine: I have some recollection of a Machine-Maker running foul of him, and giving him a malicious rub when under full majestic sail as I, and doubtless he, fondly thought for the port of immortality: but such a trifle ought not to have prevented him from finishing his piece, which was generally admired as far as it went: it was only one of those little jogs which people receive when in a crowd to make them more circumspect and should have been taken accordingly. I myself am possibly at this moment earning a rap on the knuckles: but no matter I am willing to appear in print almost in any shape: and in this I will venture to assert I am not singular: how many do you suppose of the fourteen hundred odd who lately graced the Liverpool fancy ball—how many I say, do you suppose on that occasion betrayed their dulness and stupidity: what then, their names appear in the public papers as having figured away in the characters of Greeks, Turks, American Savages, Shepherds and Shepherdesses; and is not that satisfaction enough, think ye.

After this digression I must be free to confess that some of my neighbours have fared little better than myself; you editors have such a free and easy way of dismissing a correspondent: A, for instance, is too stale: B, too flat: C, too sharp; and you will be glad to hear from him in a more natural key: the Red Dwarf is deficient in point as well as stature: and thus with a single trait, as it were, of your editorial plume, you unfeelingly stifle our aspirations after celebrity. "Death Sir, do you think it nothing to extinguish a genius: why you dispatch us "with as little remorse as you would drown a bitch's blind puppies 15th litter" is not to be borne; and if you don't speedily effect a reform, in your manners I mean, in this respect, I'll positively withdraw my countenance from you entirely, and leave you to the due punishment of your own perverseness.

Your's,

PILGRICK.

THE DRAMA.

On Saturday evening, the 11th instant, Mr. Mervoy appeared as Virginia, in the admired and popular tragedy of that name. This piece strongly exemplifies, how, by the contingencies of life, a transition is often experienced from one, to an opposite extreme. It was delightful to behold the noble minded Virginia mark the diffidence and delicate embarrassment of his lovely daughter Virginia, as he cautiously sounded her breast and drew forth a tacit disclosure of her tender feelings for the virtuous Icilius. In this scene, Mr. Macready was, almost in reality, a father;—his countenance was paternal in every feature,—an indescribable softness and earnestness blended in the sweetest simplicity of manner,—every passion was tranquil, and his soul seemed to enjoy an auspicious serenity.—The well-timed suggestion of the honest Dentatus, and the mutual attachment and tenderness of the lovers, perfected the felicity! When the experienced and disinterested parent heartily approves the choice of his beloved child, and looks upon her wedded alliance as a happy consummation of sixteen years intense solicitude—how rapturous, how evitable the sensations that glow within his bosom! But, a cloud gathers;—their country is invaded, and Virginia and Icilius are only betrothed, when the latter is summoned by the Centurion, Virginius, to join the Roman bands and rout the assailants.

Shortly after, the Decemvir, Appius Claudius, beholds the maid Virginia; his libidinous breast is on fire, and his sycophant client, Claudius, undertakes to pander to his villainous purposes; the absence of Virginius makes the moment favourable.—Claudius is to claim Virginia as being the daughter of his female slave, this slave is to swear that she sold the infant to Numitoria, who, when expiring, imposed it upon her husband, Virginius, as their legitimate offspring.—

Accordingly, Claudius seizes upon Virginia, and bears her to the Forum; her nurse Servia, and her uncle Numitorius, vainly protest against the claim, and in the moment when Appius decrees, that,—Virginia shall remain in the possession of Claudius until his right be invalidated—Icilius arrives,—pronounces Claudius to be the mere tool of the Decemvir Appius—and declares that, before the surrender of Virginia, the claim must be fully proved.—The citizens support him, and her reappearance is guaranteed. Meanwhile, the brother of Icilius has been despatched to inform Virginius that he is required in Rome without delay.

In the Forum the countenance and manner of Macready, rivet attention, and the force and clearness of his expression penetrate the soul, and excite within it the most intense solicitude. Even in the impassioned moment, when words pour forth with a rapidity that would seem to baffle utterance, his articulation is pure, and his voice in perfect accordance with the conflicting feelings that spring from a consciousness that villainy will be triumphant. On the soldiers being called forward,—the portentous pause,—the faltering exclamation—"there is but one way!"—the agonized countenance, now contemplating the virgin victim, and now pondering and almost shrinking from the dreadful act,—the heart-rending decision, and its instantaneous execution;—together with the prison scene,—and, on being presented with the Urn that contained the remains of Virginia, the dawn of reason, the testimony of unabated love, recognition of Icilius, and immediate extinction of vitality,—these, all these evinced the peculiar genius, as well as the extraordinary and profound acquirement of this distinguished tragedian.

In the character of Virginia, there is but little scope for Mrs. McGibbon; Mr. Andrews was the "crabbed," "honest," "brave old warrior" Dentatus, to a nicety; but it was ludicrous and absurd to view the citizen,—Mr. Porteus, in as constant attendance as a body-guard, and ever and anon wielding his shillelah like a true son of St. Patrick!

In the Entertainment, Miss Rock was a real Proteus. As Margaret Macmucklekenny, Miss Cornelius Clappergo, and Mrs. Deborah Griskin, she afforded much merriment. And as Lady Dashly and Mademoiselle Marosquien, her chief performances were chaste and pleasing. Mr. Fry was a very passable Davy;—Mr. J. Benwell an indifferent Sir Roderick.—The House was crowded.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

IMPORTANT TO HOUSEKEEPERS.—It has been successfully proved, by many experiments, that meat entirely fly-blown has been sufficiently purified to make good broth, and had not a disagreeable taste, by being previously put into a vessel containing a certain quantity of beer. The liquor will become tainted and have a putrid smell.

TO MAKE TOWN-WASHED LINEN AS PURE AND WHITE AS COUNTRY-WASHED.—In great towns, where linen cannot be exposed to the air and sun upon the grass, let it be steeped, for some time before it is washed, in a solution of oxymuriate of lime. Let it then be boiled in an alkaline ley. Linen or cotton thus treated will not become yellow by age, as is too often the case with linen in large towns.

WARTS.—Take an apple and cut it, and rub it for a few minutes on the wart; the juice of the apple will loosen the wart, which will in a few days drop off.

VARIETIES.

RENOVATION OF MANUSCRIPTS.—The following method is said to be effectual in rendering writing visible which has been effaced by an acid:—Take a hair pencil, and wash the part which has been effaced with a solution of prussiate of potash in water, and the writing will again appear, if the paper has not been destroyed.

TO MAKE AN INDELIBLE INK FOR MARKING LINEN, &c.—Pour a little nitric acid (aqua fortis) into a cup or glass, and add to it a small piece of pure silver; when the effervescence ceases, filter the solution through a piece of blotting paper, and put it in a small phial; then add to it a little gum arabic, and a little of the paint called sap green. After the whole is perfectly combined, it is then fit for use.

SERPENTS.—Careful dissections have enabled a skillful anatomist at Paris, of the name of Cloquet, to discover that serpents have a single and transparent eyelid which passes over the ball of the eye, and a lachrymal apparatus, the canal of which terminates in the nasal orifices of fanged snakes, and in the mouths of adders. Besides their ordinary uses, the tears, according to this learned anatomist, seem to assist in the deglutition of the bodies, frequently very large, which these creatures swallow.

LONGEVITY.—We learn from a Gentleman of undoubted veracity, who recently visited this city from Matanzas, that there is now living in a village near that place, a couple who are yet in health, although greatly impaired in bodily powers and mental faculties; who have lived together in a state of wedlock more than a hundred years! The husband is aged 128—the wife 126. They are whites, and natives of the island of Cuba.—New York American. The French Papers mention a living instance of remarkable longevity in the department of the Oriental Pyrenees. A woman, named Anne Benet, of the Canton of Olette, is, at the age of 109, in the full enjoyment of all her faculties.

RATS.—The brown or Norway rat, which abounds in the Hebrides, after a shower, goes down upon the rocks, while the limpets are crawling about, and, by a sudden push with its nose, detaches them from the rock for food. Should the first effort fail, another is never attempted against the same individual, now warned, and adhering closely to the rock; but the rat proceeds instantly to others still off their guard, until enough of food has been procured.

THE PIGEON POST OFFICE, established in Belgium, and which was set up to rival the telegraphic system, has experienced a severe check. Of 65 of these winged messengers, which set out on the 9th of August from Lyons, for Verviers (near Leige), one only arrived the same day at its destination. Four more have since appeared; but nothing has been seen of the remaining sixty. It is thought (says the foreign writer who tells the story), that preferring repose to the love of country, these voyager pigeons in spite of themselves, have fallen into the hands of masters who will not use them as they would horses.

EXTRAORDINARY RESEMBLANCES.—There are now living and well, in Oldham-road, Manchester, twin brothers, about six years old, whose resemblance to each other in growth, make, feature, voice, and complexion has been so exact, that it was found difficult for any one, the parents excepted, to distinguish one from the other. Their names are Joseph and James —. Some time since as James was viewing himself in a glass, he started back as if unconscious of the resemblance, and exclaimed in a tone of surprise, "See, Mummy! there is Joseph's face in the glass looking at me!" It was with difficulty he could be persuaded of his error, or that it was his own features, and not those of his brother Joseph he had been contemplating. At the present time, one of these twins is, in a very slight degree, tauter than the other, but the resemblance is such as to excite admiration, and is heightened by both being dressed alike.—Boston Express.

A STAGE COACH ANECDOTE.—Not sixty years since, there were seated in a stage coach, a clergyman, a lawyer, as the profession were formerly styled, and a respectable looking elderly gentleman. The lawyer, wishing to quiz the clergyman, began to descant pretty freely on the admission of improper and ill-qualified persons into the church. As a proof, says he, what sort of parsons we have, I myself heard one of them read, instead of "And Aaron made an atonement for the sins of the people,"—"And Aaron made an atonement for the shins of the people." "Incredible!" exclaimed the clergyman. "O!" replied the lawyer, "I dare say this gentleman will be able to relate something of the same kind that has come within his own knowledge." "That I can," said the old gentleman, while the face of the lawyer displayed a triumphant smile,—“for I was once present in a country church where the clergyman, instead of "The devil was a liar from the beginning," actually read, "The devil was a lawyer from the beginning."

M. D'AVRIGNY, one of the Commissioners of the Dramatic Censure, died recently at Paris. He was the author of Lapeyrouse, and the still more successful tragedy of Jeune d'Aro, as well as a Recueil of Poésies Nationales. The salary of censor being 6000 francs per annum, a multitude of candidates have started for the place thus made vacant. More than forty petitions (says one of the journals) have been presented to the minister; and the names of several men of letters are mentioned. M. D'AVRIGNY has been interred in the Cimetière du Pere Lachaise.

ORIGIN OF EATING GOOSE ON MICHAELMAS-DAY.—Queen Elizabeth, on her way to Tilbury-fort, on the 20th of September, 1580, dined at the ancient seat of Sir Neville Umfreville, near that place, and as British Bess had much rather dine of a high seasoned and substantial dish than a simple ragout or fricasseé, the knight thought proper to provide a pair of fine geese, to suit the palate of his Royal guest. After the Queen had dined very heartily, she asked for a half-pint bumper of Burgundy, and drank "Destruction to the Spanish Armada." She had but that moment returned the glass to the Knight who had done the honours of the table, when the news came (as if the Queen had been possessed of the spirit of prophecy) that the Spanish fleet had been destroyed by a storm. She immediately took another bumper, in order to digest the Gooses and Good News; and was so pleased with the event, that every year after, on that day, she had the above-excellent dish served up. The court made it a custom, and the people the fashion ever since.

VALUE OF LEGAL OPINIONS.—Lord Eldon observed in Chancery, that the legality of a Counsel's opinion mainly depended upon the entire case being submitted to him by the Attorney. Unless the custom, he said, had very materially changed from what it used to be when he himself sat before the bar, it was by no means an uncommon practice for these gentlemen to lay just so much of a case before Counsel as would ensure the precise opinion they wanted, in order to induce their clients to prosecute the suit. Very many years ago, when his Lordship had considerable practice in this particular branch of his profession, he determined, if possible, to put an end to this infamous system, by informing the attorneys, when he returned the briefs to them with his opinion thereon, that if the whole case had been impartially stated, he had decided according to the best of his ability and information; but if, on the other hand, it was a mere ex parte statement; a case made up to serve a particular purpose, material facts having been kept in the back-ground, then he had no hesitation whatever in pronouncing his opinion to be an erroneous one. His Lordship soon found out that his plain-dealing had the almost immediate effect of withdrawing from him the principal part of his business in this way!

BACCHANALIAN'S DRAUGHT, AFTER FEASTING AND DRINKING.—It is the lot of our poor humanity, that all our pleasures are followed sooner or later by pain or uneasiness, and in proportion, also, to the exqui-siteness of the pleasure. After a night enjoyed over the bottle, the morning is generally ushered in by qualms of stomach, and twinges of head-ache, which we shall now show how to dismiss or relieve. The grand tormentor, in these cases, is ever an acid which sickens the stomach, gripes the bowels, and tugs at every nerve in the body, till the head, where most of the nerves meet, rings again with the turmoil. Now the grand destroyer of your acid is magnesia, of which a large teaspoonful, with a pinch of powdered ginger, may be put into a small glass of good brandy or Holland, and taken on awakening in the morning. If one draught does not relieve the heart-burn and squeamishness, try half a glass more of the same composition. Have your coffee brought to you strong and hot, while in bed; and after breakfasting à la antique, take an hour's nap, and you will feel as fresh as if nothing had happened.—Oracle of Health.

HUNGER.—It shakes our faith very much as to the high pretensions to knowledge, put forth by physicians and anatomists, that none of them can explain the cause of hunger. If you ask them what causes hunger, one will tell you, that it is the sides of the stomach rubbing upon one another; a second will say, it is a pursuing or drawing together of the stomach for want of something to distend it; and a third will tell you, it is the gastric juice actually set about digesting part of the stomach for want of something else to do. The latter assertion is thought to be supported by instances of the stomach being found after death, actually digested in several parts; but nothing which is alive can be digested, and it only proves that the gastric juice retains its power of digesting after death, in the same way as the gastric juice of the calf is employed in the form of rennet to curdle milk.

We also give our own explanation of hunger, and think it is caused by want of the accustomed pressure of food on the nerves of the inner surface of the stomach; and as soon as this pressure is made by a fresh supply of food, the nerves are again stirred up into agreeable action, and secretion is thereby produced of the digestive fluid. Several circumstances render this explanation the most probable one. For instance, the sensation of hunger is increased by cold air, cold drink, by acids, and by bitters; while it is diminished by heat, by warm drinks, by opium, by tobacco, and by every thing which has a tendency to blunt the feeling of the nerves. This principle may perhaps explain why gum arabic allays hunger, not by affording nourishment, but by blunting or covering the superficial nerves of the stomach.

It has been objected to in every account of hunger hitherto given, that the circumstance of the sensation ceasing after a time, though no food be taken, remains unexplained. In this we see no difficulty, for it resolves itself in the general law of sensation, that every strong feeling diminishes in proportion to its continuance.—Oracle of Health.

The keeper of a tap-room in Tringate, known by the name of "Charlie's Stable," has a dog of the Irish bull-breed, called Prinsey, which is possessed of uncommon sagacity. The animal was so well trained when young, that it obeys its master in almost every thing he orders it, and is as useful to him as a servant. It is nearly three years since it began to carry his breakfast regularly every morning from the Townhead, by means of a tin can, the wire of which he holds suspended between his teeth. When the family flitted to Taylor-street, and then to Rottenrow-lane, the animal shifted his route from the High-street, and now takes the nearest route, by High John-street, to accomplish his errand. He has never yet gone wrong in any thing entrusted to him. It would be attended with the greatest danger were any person, even in diversion, to attempt to deprive him of his load, as he would probably sooner be killed than surrender. Nor will he accept the most favourable food when on business. He cautiously avoids any of his own species when he is on business; but if he cannot avoid it, he will disburden himself, give them battle, and then resume his load. Though what he carries be often of the most tempting description, the honest animal has never been known to make free with the smallest quantity, but faithfully delivers the articles untouched. He is frequently the bearer of letters between the family, and will carry any thing to the extent of half a stone. He brings every week from the market four or six pounds of beef as occasion requires. When he returns home with his can, if the family are not in when he taps at the door, he returns back to his master, as he will enter no neighbour's house, nor intrust them with his can. When he is desired to go for his master's hat or shoes, he will immediately do it. He will take a snuff-box, or other article, to such of the neighbours as he knows, and are named to him. He will take a bank-note to the tap-room, and bring back change in silver. He understands Gaelic as well as English, his master speaking and giving him commands in both languages. He will take a man's hat off his head, on being told to do so. He is uncommonly docile and quiet, and will, at the command of the children, leap over a stick four feet high, or dance for their amusement on his hind legs. The people are highly amused to see him skipping along with his daily load, but he will not stop to accept of any favours while he is on business.—Glasgow Chronicle.

VICISSITUDES OF FORTUNE.—The subject of presentiments is a very common one. There are few persons to whom some internal and involuntary emotion has not at times appeared to presage what has afterwards happened to them. A Madame D—, resident at Paris, although still young and handsome, had not to congratulate herself on having either a husband or a fortune. For that reason she wore in society a constrained air, very different from her natural gaiety. Twelve hundred francs was all her wealth. A short time ago, dining at a friend's house, the original vivacity of her character for a while returned to her. "Ah!" said she, as she took her leave, "I have laughed too much to day; something extraordinary will certainly happen to me." On her return home, she found a letter requiring her to go to the Foreign Office. Thither she next day went. They asked her if she was not related to a certain M. Martin, the son of an artisan at Lyons. She replied that she was of that family, and that M. Martin was her cousin. They then informed her that this young man, who had left Lyons as a conscript in the French Army, had been made prisoner in Corsica by the English, that he had afterwards enlisted in an English regiment sent to Pondicherry, that by degrees he had become a Major in the service of the English East India Company, and the chief minister of one of the native Princes, and finally that, dying, he did not forget either his native city or his family in the disposal of his property, amounting to several millions; in the various bequests of which, she Madame D— would find herself included for a legacy of 400,000 francs. The surprise of Madame D— at seeing the presentiment of the preceding evening verified, and her situation so materially and unexpectedly changed from that which, although she had endured it, was very different from the one she ought to enjoy in the world, may easily be conceived.—The decree of the supreme Court of Calcutta has, as we lately mentioned, confirmed those brilliant hopes, by ordering the payment of all the legacies to the various legatees.

LECTURES ON PHYSIOLOGY.

Mr. Turner delivered his introductory lecture last Monday evening, at the rooms of the Literary and Philosophical Society. We were glad to see, on this occasion, so large and respectable an audience. He has, in our opinion, done well by adapting his course "to the views of the general student, as well as to those of the professional pupil." This arrangement, together with Mr. Turner's skill as a lecturer, must give increased popularity to his lectures every time he repeats them.

We could not but admire the animated and eloquent manner in which Mr. T. so justly inveighed against the mistaken, the silly, the mischievous prejudice, generally entertained in Great Britain against the dissection of the recent subject. If professional men are not to be protected in pursuing their studies in the only way in which they can ever acquire skill and knowledge, it cannot be wondered at that they should be ignorant, and therefore liable to commit errors affecting the lives or welfare of their patients. Every one who seeks to deprive them of the only means of understanding their profession, deserves to be made the miserable victim of quackery, and to linger under the effects of diseases which might be removed by the skilful treatment of a well-educated practitioner.

It is pleasing to observe that medicine and the collateral sciences, are studied with much avidity in Manchester. We hear it reported that courses of lectures will, in a short time, be delivered, for the benefit of our artists, in the New Institution.

[For the above remarks we are indebted to the kindness of a professional gentleman, whose talents and long acquaintance with the subject give weight to his opinions.—Ed.]

LITERARY NOTICES.

We hear that the scene of the next Waverley Novel is laid in Scotland, and the time about forty years ago.

Mr. Maturin's forthcoming Romance is called the "Albigenses;" and founded upon historical events of the early part of the 13th century, interwoven with the fictitious part of the narrative.

A translation of Wilhelm Meister (one of Goethe's best works) has been announced by Messrs. Oliver and Boyd, Edinburgh; and from the same publishers' lists, we gather that they are also preparing, among other novelties, the Sparrow by Gail, Sweepings of my Study, Philosophy of Apparitions, Amcharis in Scotland, &c.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We had given up all thoughts of Pascal's Letters.—R. N. must perceive that none of our readers is inclined to undertake the translation of any part of them.—It would certainly have given us much pleasure to receive some well selected specimens for the Iris.—We know of no literary work in a foreign language that better deserves to be well translated.—The task is, indeed, rather difficult; and the last attempt in particular was a most complete and egregious failure.—The translator seemed to have no better conception of the peculiar graces and art of the original than the Dutchman, who, in translating the celebrated soliloquy in Addison's Cato, beginning with—"It must be so, Plato, thou reasonest well," did it into his own language as follows:—"Just so, your right Mr. Plato!"—The first translation (the language of which has become rather antiquated) was certainly from the pen of a man of taste and genius, who was capable of appreciating the unequalled and characteristic beauties of the original.—Pascal well merited the eulogium which the celebrated Locke bestowed upon him; he was, indeed, "a prodigy of parts."

EQUESTRIAN STATUE

OF HIS LATE

MAJESTY GEORGE THE THIRD,

ERECTED IN LONDON-ROAD, LIVERPOOL,

The First Day of October, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Twenty Two.

The area of the Exchange Buildings, in Liverpool, is acknowledged the finest spectacle of the kind in England, that of SOMERSET HOUSE, London, not excepted, and contains a splendid Monument of real Bronze in its centre, to the memory of the gallant NELSON: and the spirited inhabitants of that great commercial town availed themselves of that important epoch, the jubilee, to commemorate the virtues of their then beloved, and yet, revered monarch.

A subscription proposed and set on foot for the purpose, was, in a very short time, filled up to the estimated cost, and on the great day of national rejoicing, a grand procession of the Mayor, Common Council,—the various Trades, and associations of the town, with the united Lodges of Freemasons, accompanied by the Military, proceeded to GREAT GEORGE'S-SQUARE, the site chosen to lay the foundation-stone of this splendid monument; but as the situation was greatly confined, and remote from the public haunts of strangers and travellers, it was determined by the committee to remove it to the more desirable one, where it is at present placed, commanding the great entrance into town.

This magnificent work of art, is a copy of the equestrian statue of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, at Rome: the original stands in the Square in front of the modern capitol of that city, a situation, which from its contracted space, cannot exhibit the colossal dimensions and majestic appearance of the statue to the same advantage, as the open, elevated, and commanding site which has been fixed upon for its erection in Liverpool.

This statue is the production of Westmacott, to whose genius the public are indebted for most modern ornaments of a similar sort. It displays great sculptural erudition, in the drapery, and an intimate acquaintance with the exterior anatomy of the human figure. The artist has happily, and fortunately, represented the right arm extended over the town, which the eminence the monument stands upon, commands, and the hand, as if in the act of bestowing a benediction upon it.

Criticism, however, the lot of eminence in all, in this has not exempted Mr. W. It has been remarked that the plinth is rather too small, as the hoof of the horse in front, which is fixed, rests on the margin, while that which is lifted, extends beyond the extremity,—we have heard some objections also to the apparent nudity of the sovereign whom it is intended to represent, as the artist has chosen the Roman Toga, but which falling, as it does, in graceful folds upon himself and the noble animal which supports him, in other eyes, has a very opposite effect. The whole however is a noble structure, worthy the genius of the artist, the august personage whose name it commemorates, and altogether excuses the interval of thirteen years which the inhabitants of the "good old town," occupied in its completion!

This statue is also of bronze, but of a lighter colour than that of Nelson. The whole expence amounted to nearly £4000, of which the statue alone cost £3000. Its weight is about four tons and a half, and its dimensions are—

THE LONDON DANDY IN MANCHESTER.

I saw him—he lodged in obscurity—his attendant was a conceited girl in her teens—his breakfast was "sky blue milk"—his dinner a small chop—and a friend we designate, Red-breast, accompanied him to tea at six, shewed him his flute, played him "Oh dear what can the matter be," thought it very pretty, asked him to play it over again—sent scullion for a pint of sixpenny, played the Copenhagen Waltz, said he was fond of dancing, that he went to the dancing school—excellent ale comes from the King's Head, too strong to drink much of it—played him the first part of "Mc. Pherson's farewell," could not play the second, did not like it, said he would sing him a new song but did not recollect the tune, would do his best—

A little cock sparrow sat up in a tree,
As merry, as merry, as merry could he;
A little boy came with his bow and arrow,
And said he would shoot this little cock sparrow.
Says the little cock sparrow you sha'n't shoot me,
He duttereth his wings and away flew he.

thought it beautiful, asked him to sing it over again—"no—upon my soul—too tired"—Breast good night—had drank too much ale to eat any supper,—ordered scullion to call him at twenty minutes past seven, as he was going to ride Dobbin—thought he had sufficient confidence—The very appearance of the animal gave him boldness—it is what is commonly called a gal-loway. As he was putting one foot into the stirrup, it turned round and gave a look at him!—he was disconcerted at its sagacity, and on preparing again to mount, he put his foot in the wrong stirrup, upon which he abused the groom for putting the horse in such a position, as to occasion so unaccountable a blunder, at last mounted and off for a pleasant ride up Ardwick—Dobbin in a full walk—tried him at a trot—was jolted out of the saddle—pulled up—tried him at a canter, could not come it, used the whip, but to no purpose—Dobbin stupid—saw his shadow in a milk can—took fright—threw dandy—and bolted over the next hedge—Dandy terrified but not much hurt—only damage, coat torn and trowsers soiled—tried to catch Dobbin, very frisky, coaxed him with a handful of grass—attempted to mount—Dobbin turned round—gave a milk boy twopence to bring him out of the field and hold him till mounted—thought of mad Martin's motto—

Let those ride hard, who never rode before,
And those who always rode, now ride the more.

too nervous to attempt it, gave Dobbin the reins and let him walk, saw the STOCKPORT DEFIANCE coming at full speed and heavily loaded, Dobbin began to caper—held fast by the mane—took both feet out of the stirrups and put them in the leathers—attempted to pull up—stroked Dobbin, but all in vain,

The horse who never in that sort
Had handled been before,
What thing upon his back had got,
Did wonder more and more.

The coach now close at hand—Dobbin capering, wheeled round on his hind legs, and threw Dandy on his neck—Dobbin at full speed on his way home, between a trot and a canter, took fright at three boys galloping their horses loaded with milk cans, and threw Dandy—was stopped by a stone-breaker—Dandy not hurt but determined to mount no more—gave him a pint of sixpenny to lead Dobbin to the Shakespeare—hobbled home—too tired to attend to business—sent an apology to the warehouse, had got the head ache—ordered a bason of water-gruel for his dinner—threw himself on the sofa and went to sleep—waked at half past twelve o'clock rather feverish—tells the family he has had a most horrible dream—that he was playing Somno in the Sleep Walker—that his flute was broke, and that that the washerwoman had lost his necks. Enter Henry Slender, who embraces Dandy in the most affectionate and brotherly manner—Slender invites him to the play—"Can't say," said Dandy, "Mr. Red Breast and myself, went some time since to the Theatre Royal—very full house, but did not like the performance—Red Breast and I slept two in a bed at my Lodgings—read him eight pages of Ovid's Art of Love, very small print—called at half past eight o'clock—tea and toast to breakfast—Miss dressed to wait—am going to morrow night to a neighbouring village in my friend's sociable to see a set of players, where there is one who measures two yards high will play the king, and have no doubt I shall be much amused—have bought a pint of peas to shoot through a pop-gun during the performance—excellent sport—when I return will give you a full account. Pray Slender how do you manage to tie your neck cloth on so fashionably? I wear these black stocks because I cannot tie the Barrel Knot—I have got a pair of new grey trowsers but the stupid tailor has made them so genteelly tight over the stomach cannot eat my dinner without twitching, always wear my trowsers lined—cannot bear those odious drawers—There is no shoemaker here fit to be employed, have two pair of boots and neither of them fit me—always buy them ready made—expect some game soon from my brother, he went out a shooting last year with a terrier and Mrs. Janet's house dog—excellent dog for barking and putting up the game—killed two sparrows and a goldfinch—am very fond of game but think its very scarce—like pigeons better than any other sort.—What do think of my flute, Slender?" "Its very handsome—will you be kind enough to play me a tune upon it?" He played him "My lodging is in Leather Lane, in a parlour next the sky"—thought it very gloomy, could sing him a song which he had lately heard Red Breast and Tom Shallow sing as a duett—

In Manchester their was a man
Of whom the world might say,
That still a godly race he ran
Where'er he went to pray.
And in that town a youth was found,
As many youths there be,
Both mongrel, puppy, whelp, and bound,
And curs of low degree.
This youth and man at first were friends,
But when a pique began,
The youth to gain his private ends
Went mad and bit the man.

Dinner was now announced which put a stop to their conversation, and Slender retired, wishing him much amusement at his intended excursion in the country.—After eating his water-gruel he proceeds to the warehouse, from which he returns at six with Red Breast to tea—Miss dressed in her new black frock, hair curled—Red Breast in high spirits, talked about the York musical festival—tea was now over, and Miss having removed the tray, &c. Dandy read him an anecdote out of Bell's Life in London, which was very amusing—rang the bell, and ordered Scullion to fetch a pint of sixpenny the same as before, excellent ale but very strong—read two more pages—night very dark and rainy—a bad road and a many robberies upon it—Red Breast had stopped longer than he intended, very late, past seven o'clock,—did not like to return himself—was afraid—did not like sleeping two in a bed—no alternative but Dandy must see him home—rings the bell and Dandy's top coat is ordered, which when brought he offers to Red Breast, but is too small wasted—the host thought they had better take a coach, but coaches are very expensive—having wished him good night, and thanking him for his attentions, set off with a trembling step on their destined journey—their courage was a little strengthened by the quantity of people passing and repassing in Piccadilly and Oldham-street, together with the brilliancy of the lamps reflected from the different shop windows—Red Breast now began to expatiate on the utility and advantage of gas, when their attention was arrested by a ballad singer, around whom a large group of persons were assembled listening to the following stanzas—

Benighted were two dandies bold,
And fearful haste they made
To reach the hill of Collyhurst,
And hail the poplar shade.
Their footsteps knew no idle stops,
But followed faster still,
And echoed to the darksome copse
That whispered on the hill.

Dandy thought it very plaintive, but the music not well adapted to the words—the concourse of people began to decrease as they advanced up St. George's-road, and the termination of the lamps was now seen, and the dark valley through which they were to pass became visible—no sooner had they reached the valley when fear created three men, they supposed them to be Irishmen, one of them had a large horse pistol in his hand as Dandy thought, but they both ran as hard as they could from what they were sure were three foot pads, as Red Breast is confident he heard one of them cry after them "Stop"—Dandy stuck close to Red Breast, and the palpitation of their hearts was responsive to their sighs—fear had taken such possession of their senses, that every gust of wind appeared as a summons for their departure for another world—when they had arrived within about 200 yards of the plantation, and near the brick-kiln, their fears were raised to the highest pitch which imagination can picture, by the noise of something they could not account for—"Stay," says Dandy, "there's a Highwayman! let's turn back and hide ourselves"—the object neared them—

And once again amidst their fright
They tried what sight could do,
When through the cheating glooms of night
A monster stood in view.

Regardless of what'er they felt,
Came closer on the plain—
They own'd their sins, and down they knelt
And said their pray'rs again.

They remained in this perilous situation for upwards of fifteen minutes, offering up to heaven their prayers for forgiveness, supposing the Devil or some of his agents was come to fetch them, when suddenly the animal, which was an ass, awoke them from their frightful delirium by braying out pardon and absolution to their unhallowed souls—the York Mail came up at this moment, upon which they both mounted and reached Red Breast's home in safety, thanking heaven for their kind deliverance—Dandy returned to town the next morning, after having breakfasted at his friend's, and dined at his lodgings upon a sixpenny plate of cold beef and a mashed potatoe, which his hostess had provided for him, and returned the same evening—Dandy and his party now made their way to the theatre, where the play was Douglas—between one of the acts a hand-bill was delivered amongst the audience, announcing "A New Discovery!—a saving of Fifty per cent!—Gentlemen's old Hats covered with silk, rendered water-proof and equal to new at the low price of 12s.—Dandy quite delighted with the play—was never so much amused at any theatre in his life—wished he had brought his flute and played the overture to Tom Thumb—used the pop gun and shot young Norval in the eye during his best speech—could not proceed, made his eye water—was obliged to use his handkerchief—looked more tragical—Red Breast laughed and cried encore—shot again but missed him—thus passed the evening, and after refreshing themselves at the inn repaired to Red Breast's for the night—Dandy returned to town in the morning, and dined at his lodgings upon a plate of liver and bacon.—In the morning the day as before but no horse-back—at night again upon the water-gruel-couch—leaving on his toilette a tender ode to Miss—

Oh Lady, when you press'd my neck,
You sadly crumpled my cravat,
And rubbed from off my cheek the speck
Which I had pasted on so pat.

I love indeed the kiss—tho' pain
It gives my body in those sips;
And pray you when you come again,
Don't take my paint, upon your lips.

FRAGMENT.

—'Tis night,
In solemn grandeur moves the placid orb
Silv'ring the battlements of yon high tow'r
Which frowns indignant 'neath her lucid beams;
The argent stars em'azoning the heav'ns
Throw o'er the ruffled deep their image gay:
Enwapt in silence sleeps the drowsy world—
No sound, no whisper meets the list'ning ear,
Save the low, sullen murmurs of the waves,
Or the wild ravens melancholy wail
From the rude covert of th' impending cliff—
This is thine hour Reflection, this thy seat,
With thee the thought may uncontrolled soar,
Swifter than lightnings scathe, o'er kingdoms roam,
And o'ertake Time upon the breath of Æolus.

Ye waves that dash your white foam to my feet,
Ye ambient waters that with fretful roar
Oft start the sleeper on his lonely couch,
Where wander ye?
Over what scenes of beauty desolated?
What sights terrific hide ye from the view?
What forms that once the flush of beauty wore.
With'er, forgotten, in your secret caves.

Close by the rock with precious stones impearl'd,
The fairest maid the vermil morn ere view'd
Sleeps in her coral cell; the kirtled naiads
Hold her in their care, and oft their silver notes
On the light pauses of the storm are heard
Breathing a strain of sweeter minstrelsy
Than ever zephyr bore to mortal ear:

Where once the shepherd pip'd tending his charge
Gregarious, 'mid verdurous pastures,
Where purling streams sigh'd thro' the tepid day,
And simple maids sought the impervious shade
Exchanged vows of love reciprocal:—

At eventide,
Oft would they dance beneath the moonlight ray,
While age stood by and blest their innocence:
Or neath the canopied trees reclin'd,
Re-late long anecdotes of youth remember'd;
How chang'd is now the once delightful scene,
The verdant lawns, the low, but peaceful, cot,
The shady walk, the neatly wicker'd seat,
Where sat the honor'd forms of garrulous age
Eatom'd within the surge, in ruins lie;
And fancy only can review the spot,
Where late was beauty, innocence and peace!—

On Time's fleet wings how many years have flown
Since thy proud waters Cleopatra bore
Unmatch'd in beauty to her lover's arms?
Never before did thy pellucid breast,
Such greatness bear: the gorgeous panoply
Of surrounding warriors, the Eagle
Proudly pre-eminent flutt'ring on the gale,
The waving robes of beauteous nymphs attending,
While the vast concave of the ethereal vault,
Echo'd the martial strains, that thunder'd now
And now in dulcet harmony met soft
The entranced ear.—

Whence thy rich source immeasurable deep?
Remain'st thou now as when the Eternal hand
From chaos form'd thy depths unfathomable?
Unchang'd as are the ever loving skies,
Or as the moon changing perpetually:
Hath this broad earth we tread on, where smiles 'neath
The bright beams of Porsus, vales, palaces,
And all the vast phenomena of things;
Been thy wide bed?—or is it all an image
In the brain, built by the fairy Fancy
She, who can cities raise from the thin air,
She, the presiding pow'r o'er lover's dreams,
Who fills all nature with her fantasies.
Or is it true—and move we on an earth
Which from the mingled ruins of centuries
Incalculable owes its birth?—

I'll think no more,
For wheresoe'er I turn, I move in mystery.

N. W. HALCESRISA,

ON NOSES.

A SKETCH IN CHALK.

I love a good nose. I mean not, mind me, a nose of nice olfactory perceptions, but one whose dimensions are respectable, destitute of excrescence, and comely; this I take to be the beau ideal. A fine nose is worth its weight in gold (sterling), and would fetch a premium in any market. It is a universal passport, and carries a man through the world without a penny in his pocket—better than the mystic sign masonic.

A man without a nose—what is he? a man no more! nobody!—nought—nothing—nonentity! Nature abhors him more than a vacuum.

I would not take a noseless man by the hand for the best Bank-note that was ever concocted. I should consider it an eternal disgrace, a stigma, an odium,—the pillory were more glorious. The veriest vermin that grovel in the earth, the minutest insect that flies in the air, the beastliest of beasts, a pair of bellows, a tin tea-kettle, has a nose; and shall man, the lord of all vermin, the prince of brute beasts be without? Hear it not ye little caterpillars! I met such an animal the other day in the vicinage of 'Pothecaries' Hall, whither I was wending for a quarter of a pound of the best Glauber's—I was scandalized—I avoided it as a pestilence—it saved me fourpence halfpenny—I bought no salts—ugh!

I conceive a nose of large dimensions to be a great nose. I do not quibble, gentlemen; what I mean is, that its extension denotes a proportionate comprehensiveness of mind. While I lay this upon the table as a self-evident proposition, it must not be imagined that I throw aside as worthless the variation of its figure. This, though secondary, I believe, is as certainly valuable as the first. When I talk of an expansive nose, I, of course, discard excrescences; an immensity of membrane is a gift without price,—let it run mountains high it cannot be too prodigious. Look at my friend B—; what an exalted proboscis, glorious and gorgeous; mobile, fluttering, instinct with life, and redolent of good things. I have watched it while its master has been luxuriating on the splendour of oration; it absolutely seemed to feel, to its very vertex, the eloquence of the harangue; and, in the manufacture of a diatribe or the pointing of a pungent philippic, I have literally seen it quiver like the vibration of a harp-string, or the undulation of the blacksmith's hammer on the anvil. A man with such a handle must needs be great—his nose would save a nation; yet, for all that, it is far from being beautiful—as we say 'beautiful.' Now regard we that of his competitor, Mr. G—, it is totally and altogether different; it is, in shape, a perfect parallelipedon, and exhibits to every thinking eye the sound strong solidity of judgment for which he is so remarkable; but we look in vain for that acuteness of discrimination, that vehemence of feeling, that passionate appealing, the power and the plenipotence, the fury and the fire, which characterizes the other! Again, the markings of the mind are generally depicted by corresponding points in the fashion of the nose. Now sharpness of intellect is invariably prognosticated by sharpness of nose; an acute angle would save a man's life in any danger.

I was the other day at the Old Bailey, for instance, when a man was tried for forgery—both the jury and the judge were for many hours bothered with, and involved in all the jargon of a complicated, clashing, and inexplicable evidence. I regarded not the witnesses nor what they swore—I kept my eye steadily fixed on the poor devil's nose. I weighed it well—I examined it, I scrutinized it, took up my pocket-book and made my calculations—I saw that nothing could save him—three days after he was hanged! The pug or nut is my utter detestation—my most insufferable punishment. Besides other improper qualities, it is the rankest hypocrite in the world—I could not trust it were it ever so. I would give a pug-nosed man a pound with all my soul out of charity—but I would not lend him a ninepence if he'd pawn me every inch of muscle on his bones. Yet I never recollect having occasion to distrust the full-bottomed or profusion; it is an invariable index of an honest-enough disposition, not, mind me, from principle, but generally because the possessor is too lazy at heart, and does not think the exertion required to execute a piece of adroit knavery exactly worth the trouble.

There is a certain description of nose, too, whose outward appearance, though strikingly expressive, and in its structure plain, simple, and little complex, bears but slight indication of its real properties. I allude to that which few men in their proper senses would wish to meet with in a bye-lane: the hatchet or January-nose. It looks sharp and scythe-like, as though it had murderous work in contemplation, and was a-thirst after blood,—one is inclined to almost pity the very air one breathes, so piercingly does it cut its passage through it. How thin, oh! how t-h-in it is! Bleak, raw and unreal, it seems but the carcass of a nose, and makes a man shudder—but a tangible vampire!—having just enough blood (and that not visible) to keep it barely alive, and yet not sufficiently withered for total extinction—the line of nice distinction, the minute and nearly imperceptible boundary between something and nothing; so that an unwary and unsuspecting person might put forth his hand, and know nothing of its presence till it had cut his fingers. Every body dreads it, all avoid it, yet nobody dare molest it, lest—such a nose is worse than an highwayman—it bodes no good. Look to it—mark it—have no communion with it—I say no more. Somewhat allied to this in shape, but like a humble bee, without its sting, is the moist nose, or slice of sponge, scarcely animate and frittering away in drops, such a thing invariably predicates a coward to all intents and purposes. How different from this is the nose of a valourous man,—if you would find a hero seek for the noble rhombus.

The south-sea or blubber-sneut, when handsomely built is a real treasure, and presents an assemblage of all that is good, rich, and valuable. What a host of good things does not its very name call to mind—of soups and savoury dishes, venison and vintries, turtle and tippling, grease, gravy, grog, and gratulation, boiling, steaming, stewing, roasting, and rumination; frying, fruiting, and fricassee. Oh! Oh! Oh! it is a lordly equipage! all hail to thee most venerable blubber! how I do love thee!

If I am spared, I project a few columns to illustrate the ornamental appendages, which characterise 'heav'n's sweetest sweet, yet deadliest darkest curse,' the ladies!—Perhaps.—I do not pledge myself!—Lit. Chron.

THE TEAR THAT STOOD IN EMMA'S EYE.

The tear that stood in Emma's eye
Did every soft emotion give,
For, oh! the catching sympathy
Bade me to love that I might live:
And the bright drop that linger'd there
Dispell'd the darkness of despair,
While from it beam'd a ray of hope,
And made me snatch of joy the cup.

Oft in the darkness of the night
The trowler from his path does stray,
But when the sun resumes its light,
It guides him on his former way:
So if I ever prove untrue,
Or wander from thy love and reign,
That precious drop once more renew,
And it shall light me back again.

ADOLESCENS.

THE HISTORY OF FREDERICK B.—

A TRUE STORY.

Frederick B— was the son of a worthy clergyman in Shropshire, whose situation was not equal to his merit, his living being not more than sixty pounds a year; but he discharged the duties of his function in a most exemplary manner, and derived, from conscious virtue, a degree of happiness, which it is beyond the power of exalted rank or large fortune to bestow. He educated his son with great care, resolving, as he could not give him wealth, to supply that deficiency by cultivating his understanding, and training him to the love and practice of virtue; being decidedly of opinion, that it is not possible for a wise and virtuous man to be unhappy in any situation.

Frederick continued under the care of his father till he was about eighteen; when, it being necessary that he should engage in some business to procure subsistence for himself, he was sent to London, and placed in a merchant's office. Here, notwithstanding that inclination for literature which his education had inspired, he applied himself closely both to the theory and practice of commerce, and made himself eminently useful to his employer, whose confidence he soon acquired. He distinguished himself by that diligence and punctuality which are so important in the mercantile character, and was seldom seen at those fashionable places of levity and dissipation, which are but too numerous in the capital and its neighbourhood. He did not, however, entirely confine himself to the drudgery of business: he allowed himself hours of relaxation, and was not without his pleasures; but they were moderate and rational, nor attended with much expence. He often quoted the observation of a sensible writer, that, "the most exquisite, as well as the most innocent of all enjoyments, are such as cost us least; reading, fresh air, good weather, and the beauties of nature. These afford a very quick relish while they last, and leave no remorse when over."

Thus did Frederick pass his time, either diligently engaged in business, or amusing himself by such relaxations as were not unworthy of a reasonable being; when his tranquillity was disturbed by a circumstance, which, though it was not unattended with pleasing sensations, was the source of much disquiet. Mr. T., his master, had an only daughter, who, during the time Frederick had been in London, was almost always at school, or with an aunt in the country, so that he had not many opportunities of seeing her. But she now came to reside wholly with her father, who had been a widower some years. She was a most amiable and accomplished young lady, about nineteen years of age; and, though not a perfect beauty her features were extremely agreeable, and her whole figure was uncommonly engaging.

In consequence of Frederick's situation, he could not avoid seeing Miss T. frequently; and it is dangerous for young people of different sexes to be too much with each other. The young lady soon made a deep impression on his heart; and she, on her part, was not long before she entertained a passion for Frederick, who was tall and well shaped: and, to good sense and a polished understanding, added a degree of vivacity, which seldom fails to recommend a young man to the notice of the female sex, and to make him an object of their favour.

Frederick's consciousness of the state of his own heart gave him much uneasiness. He was sensible, that, from the disparity of their fortunes, there was little reason to suppose that Mr. T. would encourage his pretensions; and he had so strong a sense of honour, not to be hurt by the thought of acting ungenerously to a man who had behaved to him with so much kindness. He therefore laboured to suppress his passion; but a powerful attachment to a fine woman is not easily confined within the rules of reason. In consequence of their frequent intercourse, though both endeavoured, for a long time, to conceal their sentiments from each other, they at length came to an explanation. They acknowledged their mutual regard for each other; and Frederick declared, with all the ardour of a youthful passion, that he should prefer the mere necessities of life, in a cottage, with her, to the greatest affluence with any other woman: but professed at the same time, that it gave him extreme pain to reflect, that he could not solicit her affection, without giving just umbrage to her father, to whom he confessed he was under great obligations, and whom he therefore could not think of injuring or offending: and Miss T., on her part, avowed her attachment to Frederick, with all the warmth which the delicacy of her sex would permit; but declared her resolution of never marrying without the consent of her father.

It happened, that there was a clerk who lived with Mr. T. who professed, though insincerely, a great friendship for Frederick. His name was G—; and he had a very high opinion of his own personal accomplishments, and, therefore beheld with envy the preference which he plainly saw Miss T. gave to Frederick. As he never had been treated with the same distinction by Mr. T. that Frederick had, he never enjoyed the opportunity of freely conversing with the young lady: he had, however, seen and learnt enough from the servants of the house, (a class of people who are always inquisitive in such matters) to be assured that an intimacy actually subsisted between Miss T. and Frederick. He knew that Frederick's fortune would not entitle him to an alliance with Miss T.: and if the lady was inclined to connect herself with one who was so much her inferior in that respect, G.'s vanity suggested to him, that she would have shown more penetration if she had bestowed her affections upon him, rather than on Frederick. Envy is an uneasy and restless passion; and it now stimulated G. to lay hold of every opportunity which offered itself, of privately injuring Frederick in the opinion of Mr. T.; and soon went so far as to hint to that gentleman that Frederick entertained improper designs upon his daughter. Finding Mr. T. was alarmed at this suggestion, he proceeded farther, and related so many circumstances, some true, and some false, to prove the reality of a close intimacy between Frederick and Miss T. that Mr. T. not only gave thorough credit to it, but also believed from several particulars which G. had artfully and malignantly thrown into his account of the matter, that Frederick had used some dishonourable tricks to gain the affections of the young lady. Being thus exasperated at the supposed ungenerous behaviour of Frederick, he hastened to his daughter, and taxed her with carrying on a clandestine amour with him, without the knowledge of a father, by whom she had always been treated with the utmost kindness. The conviction which the young lady shewed at this charge confirmed all the suspicions of Mr. T., and being much enraged, he sent a note to Frederick, in which he informed him that he did not choose to have any farther connexion with him, and desired him immediately to quit the house; not could he be prevailed upon to hold any converse with him on the cause of his sudden discharge.

Frederick was grieved that a man he esteemed, and of whose former favours he retained a grateful sense, should manifest so extraordinary a displeasure; but it may easily be conceived, that he felt still more severely his unexpected separation from the object of his affections. His reason dictated to him that he should withdraw himself from an attachment wherein there were such obstacles to success; but his heart, at the same time, told him with how much pain every effort for that purpose would be attended. He had not been able to learn by what means Mr. T. had been so much exasperated against him; he imagined, indeed, that he had been informed of the intimacy between him and his daughter; but, of the arts which had been contrived to place his conduct in the worst point of view, he had no suspicion; G. having desired Mr. T. not to mention from whom he derived his intelligence, a request with which that gentleman had complied.

After a few weeks had elapsed, Frederick entered into the service of another merchant of eminence, as a principal clerk; an employment which the character he had acquired at Mr. T.'s, for integrity and dexterity in business, enabled him easily to obtain. In the mean time, he and Miss T. found means sometimes to correspond with each other; she had been extremely afflicted at his removal from her father's house; and their separation, instead of abating, seemed to increase the ardour of their mutual affection. Neither of them had any suspicion of the treachery of G., who still pretended to have a great friendship for Frederick, for which he had very good reasons: he united in his character, to all the cunning of a designing knave, the extravagance of a rake, and the profligacy of a gambler; and in the straits to which he occasionally brought himself by his vices, he sometimes found Frederick very useful to him, which was the true source from which all his pretended friendship took its rise.

(To be concluded in our next.)

TO STELLA.

Oh turn away thine eyes so bright,
And grant to me this one desire;
Or close them ever from my sight,
Nor wound me thus with darts of fire:
Is it thy aim my heart to kill,
That fly those shafts from beauty's eye?
No, 'tis against thy tender will,
'Tis spiteful fate would have me die!

Sweet is thy kiss, the honey'd sweet,
That dwells upon the ruby lip
For angels cups alone 'tis meet,—
Thou giv'st me nectar—there to sip.
Then turn those nect'rous lips away,
Thou drown'st me in ambrosial breath,
Yet would I ever ever stay
To die by thee so sweet a death.

When fetter'd in thy magic clasp
Of love, reclining on thy breast,
I own the sweet o'erpowering grasp,
And in thy arms alone am blest;
Let me no more thy love partake,
For I shall die by its excess;
Be dead to all, to thee awake,
My life, my soul, my happiness!

THE SWISS GUIDE.

By Robert Southey, Esq.

* * On Mr. Southey's Guide quitting him, he asked the Poet for a character; when Mr. Southey presented him with the following humorous verses; in consequence of which, and being in the hand-writing of so celebrated a character, John Roth, the Swiss Guide, has become very popular, being inquired for by all English travellers. S. X.

By my troth, this John Roth
Is an excellent Guide;
A joker—a smoker—
And a savant beside.

A Geolician, a Metaphysician,
Who searches how causes proceed;
A system-inventer, an experimenter,
Who raises potatoes from seed.

Each forest and dell, he knoweth full well,
The Châteaux, and dwellers therein;
The mountains, the fountains, the ices, the prices,
Every town, every village, and inn.

Take him for your guide, he has often been tried,
And will always be useful when needed;
In fair or foul weather, you'll be merry together,
And shake hands at parting as we did.

A EULOGY ON BROTH.

Being an Imitation or Parody of the above Verses.

BY A LADY.

On my troth, this same Broth
Is an excellent thing;
'Tis strength'ning—life lengthening
'Tis food for a king!

Of its merits pray think, it is meat, it is drink,
'Tis the essence of animal food;
The palate it charms, the system it warms,
And cheers without heating the blood.

Take this for your lunch, it is better than punch,
Than ale, or the juice of the vine;
For the blood of the grape turns a man to an ape,
Ale and punch, to an ass or a swine.

Then let me advise, be merry and wise,—
For that is an excellent rule;
In frost and in snow, Broth will make your heart glow,
Yet keep your head perfectly cool.

But to make this good stuff, you must have quantum suff.
Of meat—for observe, I don't jest, Sir,
If you've nothing but bones, they're no better than stones,
Though stew'd in a patent digester.

Then take a good slice, of beef that is nice,
Or mutton that's very well fed;
Though you shiver and shake, thus a cordial you'll make,
That will cause you to sing in your bed.

VOLUNTARY BURNING OF HINDOO WIDOWS.

We copy the following narrative by Mr. Cruso, who was an eye-witness to the horrid spectacle of self-immolation, from a vast number of other documents of the same shocking nature, printed by order of the House of Commons.

"Poona, the 24th July, 1786.—This evening, about five, I was hastily called to be a spectator of the shocking ceremony of self-devotion, sometimes practised amongst the Brahmin females, on the death of their husbands.

"Soon after I and my conductor had quitted the house, we were informed, the statue (for that is the name given to the person who so devotes herself) had passed, and her track was marked by the goolol and betel leaf, which she had scattered as she went along. She had reached the mootah, which runs close under town, before we arrived, and having performed her last ablutions, was sitting at the water's edge. Over her head was held a punker, an attendant fanned her with a waving handkerchief, and she was surrounded by her relations, a few friends, and some chosen Brahmins, the popalace being kept aloof by a guard from government. In this situation, I learn from good authority, she distributed among the Brahmins two thousand rupees, and the jewels with which she came decorated, reserving only as is usual on these occasions, a small ornament in her nose, called mootee (perhaps from a pearl or two on it), and a bracelet of plain gold on each wrist. From her posture I could see only her hands, which, with the palms joined, rose above her head, in an attitude of invocation; quitting, therefore, this post, I removed to an eminence, that gave me an opportunity of observing the construction of the funeral pile, and commanded the pathway by which I understood she would approach it.

"The spot, chosen for its erection, was about forty paces from the river, and directly fronting the suttee. When I came up, the frame only was fixed; it consisted of four uprights, each about ten feet asunder lengthways, and under six in breadth. Soon after, by ropes fastened near the top of the uprights, was suspended a roof of rafters, and on it, again, heaped as many billets as it would bear. Beneath, arose a pile of more substantial timbers, to the height of about four feet, which was covered over with dry straw and bushes of a fragrant and sacred shrub, called toolsee; the sides and one end being then filled up with the same materials, the other extremity was left open as an entrance. The melancholy preparations completed, the lady got up, and walked forward, unsupported, amidst her friends. She approached the door-way, and then having paid certain devotions, retired a few yards aside, and was encircled as before. The dead body was brought from the bank where it had hitherto remained, close to the place the suttee lately sat on, and laid upon the pile, and with it several sweetmeats and a paper bag, containing either flour or dust of sandal. The widow arose and walked three times slowly round the pile; then seating herself opposite the entrance, on a small square stone, constantly used in such cases, on which two feet were rudely sketched, she received and returned the endearments of her companions with great serenity. This over, she again stood up, and having stroked her right hand, in the fondest manner, over the heads of a favoured few, gently inclining her person towards them, she let her arms fall round their necks in a faint embrace, and turned from them. Now, with her hands, indeed, held up to heaven, but with her poor eyes cast, in a gaze of total abstraction, deep into the den of anguish that awaited her, she stopped awhile—a piteous statue! At length, without altering feature, or the least agitation of her frame, she ascended by the door-way, unassisted, and, lying down beside her husband's corpse, gave herself, in the meridian of life and beauty, a victim to a barbarous and cruelly consecrated error of misguided faith. As soon as she entered, she was hid from our view by bundles of straw with which the aperture was closed up, and all the actors in this tragic scene seemed to vie with each other who should be most forward in hurrying it to a conclusion. At once, some darkened the air with a cloud of goolol, some darting their hatchets at the suspending cords, felled the laden roof upon her, and others rushed eagerly forward to apply the fatal torch. Happily, in this moment of insufferable agony, when the mind must have lost her dominion, and the ear expected to be pierced by the unavailing cries of nature, the welcome din of the trumpet broke forth from every quarter.

"When the conflagration took place, and not till then, it was fed, for a time, with large quantities of ghee thrown by the nearest kin; but, except the toolsee and straw before mentioned, no combustible whatever that I either saw or could hear of, was used in preparing the pile. It is said to be the custom, that, as the suttee ascends the pile, she is furnished with a lighted taper, to set fire to it herself, and my companion, who was a Brahmin, asserted, that in this instance it was the case; but I traced the whole progress of the ceremony with so close and eager an attention, that I think I may safely contradict him.

"As curiosity may be expected to know something of the subject of this terrible, though not uncommon, immolation, I have collected the following particulars:

"The lady's name was Toolseboy, her husband's Ragaboy Tanteet. He was about thirty years old, and nephew to Junaboy Daddah, a person of distinction in this place. A little girl, about four years of age, the fruit of their union, survives them. Toolseboy was nineteen, her stature above the middle standard, her form elegant, and her features interesting and expressive; her eyes, in particular, large, bold, and commanding. At the solemn moment in which alone I saw her, these beauties were eminently conspicuous, notwithstanding her face was discoloured with turmeric, her hair dishevelled and wildly ornamented with flowers; and her looks, as they forcibly struck me throughout the ceremony, like those of one whose senses wandered; or, to come nearer the impression, whose soul was already floating and in a state of half-separation from the body."

HEROISM.

The plague raged more violently than ever in Marseilles. Every link of affection was broken, the father turned from the child, the child from the father: cowardice, ingratitude, no longer excited indignation. Misery is at its height when it thus destroys every generous feeling, thus dissolves every tie of humanity! The city became a desert, grass grew in the streets, a funeral met you at every step. The physicians assembled in a body at the Hotel de Ville, to hold a consultation on the fearful disease, for which no remedy had yet been discovered. After a long deliberation, they decided unanimously that the malady had a peculiar and mysterious character, which opening a corpse alone might develop, an operation it was impossible to attempt, since the operator must infallibly become a victim in a few hours, beyond the power of human art to save him, as the violence of the attack would preclude their administering the customary remedies. A dead pause succeeded this fatal declaration. Suddenly a surgeon named Guyon, in the prime of life, and of great celebrity in his profession, rose and said firmly, "Be it so: I devote myself to the safety of my country. Before this numerous assembly I swear, in the name of humanity and religion, that to-morrow, at the break of day, I will dissect a corpse, and write down as I proceed what I observe." He left the assembly instantly. They admire him, lament his fate, and doubt whether he will persist in his design. The intrepid and pious Guyon, animated by all the sublime energy religion can inspire, acted up to his words. He had never married, he was rich, and he immediately made a will, dictated by justice and piety; he confessed, and in the middle of the night received the sacraments. A man had died of the plague in his house within four and twenty hours: Guyon at day-break shut himself up in the same room; he took with him an inkstand, paper, and a little crucifix. Full of enthusiasm, never had he felt more firm or more collected: kneeling before the corpse, he wrote, "Mouldering remains of an immortal soul, not only can I gaze on thee without horror, but even with joy and gratitude. Thou wilt open to me the gates of a glorious eternity. In discovering to me the sacred cause of the terrible disease which destroys my native city, thou wilt enable me to point out some salutary remedy—then wilt render my sacrifice useful. Oh God! (continued he,) thou wilt bless the action thou hast thyself inspired." He began,—he finished the dreadful operation, and recorded in detail his surgical observations. He then left the room, threw the papers in a vase of vinegar, and afterwards sought the lazaretto, where he died in twelve hours—a death ten thousand times more glorious than the warrior's, who to save his country rushes on the enemy's ranks, since he advances with hope, at least, sustained, admired, and seconded by a whole army.—La Peste de Marseilles, by Madame de Genlis.

BUTLER TO HIS MISTRESS.

Do not unjustly blame
My guiltless breast,
For vent'ring to disclose a flame
It had so long suppress'd.

In its own ashes it design'd
For ever to have lain
But that my sighs, like blasts of wind,
Made it break out again.

ANTIPATHIES.

"I hate the dim and waning light of even,

For that's the hour when happy lovers stray—

I hate the moon, for she looks down from heaven

On their curst vows—I hate the month of May—

For she outtraps the preceding seven

In smiles and tears—I hate the new-mown hay,

When gather'd into cocks, for Tristram Merton

And that young mixx, Miss Roseamond, to flirt on.

"I hate the richness of Ione's tresses—

I hate the flashes of her quick bright eye—

I hate young girls, except in ancient dresses—

I hate a snowy bosom bitterly—

I hate each sigh that heaves, each smile that blesses

Fond, foolish hearts—I hate to laugh or cry—

I hate all sorts of freedom, mirth, and ease—

In short, I'm made up of antipathies."

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

CAPTAIN PARRY.

The lovers of science have to deplore the return of this enterprising navigator from the Arctic Regions without having accomplished the hopes he had so sanguinely entertained; but we may be assured that all which human skill could effect, or ingenuity could devise, has been put into action for this great end. It is more than probable now, that the question as to a passage into the Pacific is for ever put to rest. Heaven seems here to have set a limit to the ingenuity of man, leaving him no other reflection than that of the Creator's immeasurable power, and incomprehensible perfections.

H. M. Ships Griper and Hecla arrived at Whitby on Thursday the 16th inst., and Captain Parry with the astronomer of the expedition set off in a post chaise and four for London, where they arrived on Saturday night.

In 1821 the expedition explored Repulse Bay, Sir Thomas Roe's Welcome, Middleton's Frozen Strait, and that neighbourhood, and, finding no passage to the Northward and Westward, wintered in the southern bay of an island, called Winter Island, in lat. 66° 11', long. 83°.

In 1822, the expedition, guided and encouraged by the information they had received, during the winter, from a party of Esquimaux with whom they had established a friendly intercourse, pursued their attempt to the Northward, and examined all inlets towards the West, till they arrived at a strait which separates the Northern Coast of America from what Captain Parry considers to be clusters of islands, extending Northward towards the scene of his former voyage.

The great object of ascertaining the northern limit of the Continent being thus accomplished, Captain Parry penetrated two degrees to the Westward, with considerable expectation of final success; but, in a narrow part of the strait, they found the ice fixed in that peculiar manner which indicates that it is PERPETUAL, AND NOT SEPARATED IN ANY SEASON, OR UNDER ANY CIRCUMSTANCES. The expedition was, therefore, obliged to winter in latitude 69° 20', longitude 81° 56'.

In the summer of this year, finding the ice still fixed to the shores, in such a manner as precluded all hope of any further progress in the neighbourhood in which he was, Captain Parry thought it advisable to give up the attempt, and return to England.

The point to which Captain Parry penetrated, on this occasion, was not, we understand, nearly so far to the north as the spot where he formerly wintered, nor much farther, indeed, than Captain Franklin was able to reach by land. The ships, after leaving Hudson's Bay, were carried along by an immense current of drift ice for about two hundred and fifty miles, in imminent danger every moment of being crushed to pieces, and then stuck fast amid the solid waste. Here they remained immovably locked up, and almost despairing of again revisiting old England, till exactly a month ago, when the ice broke up, and they were enabled to effect their escape. No sooner, however, did the vessels again plough the deep than new dangers awaited them. A violent storm came on, in which the vessels, much injured by being so long locked up in the ice, had nearly perished; and during their whole passage home they have encountered the most tempestuous weather.

While locked up in the ice, the ships were visited by some parties of Esquimaux, who remained with them a long time, residing in snow-houses, which they constructed for themselves in the vicinity. On one occasion, these people brought to the ship two barrel staves, which, they gave Captain Parry to understand, they had procured from two vessels, which were at their beam-ends at about 150 miles distant.

Captain Parry (as we understood our informant) sent out a party in search of these wrecks, who reported that the vessels were English whalers, of the crews of which they could find no trace.

Although the expedition has proved abortive, as far as regards its main object, yet, from the intelligence of its commander and officers, and other gentlemen employed under him, we have no doubt that science will be considerably benefited by the many interesting observations which they must have made during their long stay in the Polar regions.

The expedition has lost by illness, only Mr. Fyfe, the Greenland master, and three seamen, and one man killed by an accident.

FINE ARTS.

We presume such of our readers as are admirers of the Fine Arts, will be gratified to learn that Mr. FOSTER, the ingenious Artist, whose merit as a professed were so generally admitted when he last visited Manchester, thirteen years since, is again among us: he has been in Bridge-street for some time; but has removed near the Mosley's Arms, where we have just seen specimens that convince us Mr. F.'s merit and experience, since his former visit here, have so far availed him in the way of improvement as a professed, as not merely to do infinite credit, but to render him at this time pre-eminently superior to all competitors in that pleasing art, which he has so long and so successfully practised. These observations we apply more particularly to the extremely high and delicate finishing, so conspicuous in Mr. F.'s bronzed profiles, his professional abilities we have witnessed with extreme satisfaction, and can assure our readers that the superior correctness and elegance of his performances, are such as cannot fail to please those who may inspect them, and we are confident our generous and judicious amateurs, will not withhold their liberal patronage from so much merit, as this ingenious professor of the art evidently possesses: particularly in this esteemed line of his practice, which is calculated to supercede the more costly, and less accurate modes of delineation.

Of all those arts in which the wise excel,
Nature's chief masterpiece is painting well.
No kind of work requires so nice a touch
And if well finished, nothing shines so much,
The spirit which inspires the work throughout
Is that of nature, moves the world about,
A flame that glows amidst conception fit
Even something of divine, and more than wit.
Tis hard to write on such a subject more
Without repeating things oft said before.

CRITICISM.

ORTHOPEY.

MR. EDITOR,—The excellent strictures made by your correspondent S. X. in retarding and exposing the multifarious and absurd innovations which are copiously creeping into our language, under the head "Orthography," encourage me to trouble you with a few lines regarding the orthopey of the Latin language in England and Scotland. I would beg of S. X. (or any other correspondent) having studied the various intricacies of our own language, which is getting more indissolubly connected with the Latin daily, if not hourly, to say, whether of the two forms now in use of Latin orthopey is the more consistent with the ancient Roman dialect—that of Scotland or England; taking the Augustan age as a criterion for the primitive purview of the Latin? It must be of as great importance to the learned linguist, whether in argumentation or exposition, to know the genuine pronunciation (at least the nearest to perfection of those in use) of the Latin tongue, as well as of the Greek or French languages.

It is singular to observe what difference prevails in the orthopey of the dead languages in general in the two countries: a Scotchman pronouncing Latin to an English critic would be completely condemned for his broad twang, and energetic application of the vowels, if not completely put out of countenance by the strange coxtecture of the visible organs of the hearer! An Englishman on the other hand, would, on reading Latin in Scotland, be told that he was reading his own language and not that of the Romans! or that his affection counterbalanced every acquisition in learning!—The English no doubt have modernised the Latin pronunciation to the technical rules of their own language; as indeed they do so with every language of which they can get hold; preferring fluency and contraction to primitive and systematical arrangements. It is an old, but not altogether unjust saying, that whatever word an Englishman speaks, and of what language soever, he inensibly forms it to the idiomatical phraseology of his mother tongue; thus proving that old proverb that "he is as much attached to his language as his country."

Mr. Walker, in the preface to his critical Dictionary, says, "it is highly probable that the Scotch have retained the old English pronunciation; from which the English themselves have departed;" and Dr. Hicks has observed many years ago, that the Scotch saxonized in their language much more than the English; nor can it be doubted that England received many innovations in its dialect from its situation and commercial intercourse with the continent, which could never extend to Scotland, from its remoteness and less liability to be visited by foreigners. The greatest difference prevails in the sound of the vowels a, e, i, o, particularly a and i: a few words as they are pronounced by the learned of both nations will ultimately exemplify this difference.—If we mark the English pronunciation thus—a, e, i, o, u; and that of Scotland in its vowels æ, æ, e, o, u; we shall perceive that the words amari—amatum—amare, are in English orthopey amari—amari—amatum—amare; and in Scotland, awma—awmaure—awmantum; again, arma virumque cano, in England is arma virumque kano, in Scotland armaw verumkwaw kano, &c.—There is an anecdote recorded of the celebrated Grotius, in Mr. Walker's key to classical pronunciation;—A Scotchman addressed Grotius in Latin, when the latter, instead of returning the salutation, turned round and in a different language, begged to be excused conversing with the gentleman, not having had the honour of learning the language of the natives of Scotland! Mr. Walker concludes, "how much more unintelligible would an Englishman be, when the great Grotius could not understand a Scotchman!" The Scotch contend that we positively miscall such names as Plato, Cato, &c. when we pronounce them with the slender sound of the vowel a. I heard a Scotch schoolmaster once chide a pupil abruptly for saying that Cato fell upon his own sword in Utica—"No such thing, says Domini Sampson, it was Cartho that killed himself there; and if he were to rise from the dead he should laugh at more than three-fourths of the nation, and call them no better than mere school-boys for thus miscalling him."

Being involved in frequent little disputes relative to this question, I beg you may give insertion to these few lines, that some of your more learned correspondents may throw additional light on the subject.

I am, &c.

GRAMMATICUS.

[There is a like difference between England and Ireland arising from the pronunciation of the letter t, as there is between this kingdom and Scotland in the letter a; which often makes a conversation in that language difficult, the Irish giving to the letter the Italian softness.—a.—ED.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

SEA SERPENT.

In Vol. 1, Pages 13 and 37 of the Iris we have given some details of that extraordinary marine animal, the Sea Serpent.—The following interesting extract is from the "Travels Through Sweden, Norway, and Finmark, to the North Cape, in the Summer of 1820. By A. De Capell Brooke, A. M."

"It made its appearance for the first time in the month of July, 1819, off Otersun. Previous to this he had often heard of the existence of these creatures, but never before believed it. During the whole of that month the weather was excessively sultry and calm; and the serpent was seen every day. It continued while the warm weather lasted, lying motionless, and as if dozing in the sun-beams.—This part of his account reminded me of the monster of the deep, so finely described by Milton,

"Or that sea-beast
Leviathan, which God of all his works
Created hugest that swim the ocean stream
Him, haply slumbering on the Norway foam,
The pilot of some small night-founder'd skiff
Deeming some island, oft, as seamen tell,
With fixed anchor in his scaly rind,
Moors by his side under the lee, while night
Invests the sea, and wished morn delays."

Parad. Lost. l. 138.

"The number of persons living on the island, he said, was about thirty; the whole of whom, from motives of curiosity, went to look at it while it remained. This was confirmed to me by subsequent inquiries among the inhabitants, who gave a similar account of it. The first time that he saw it, he was in a boat, at the distance of about 200 yards. The length of it he supposes to have been about 300 ells, or 600 feet. Of this he could not speak accurately; but it was of very considerable length; and longer than it appeared, as it lay in large coils above the water to the height of many feet. Its colour was grayish. At the distance at which he was, he could not ascertain whether it were covered with scales; but when it moved, it made a loud crackling noise, which he distinctly heard. Its head was shaped like that of a serpent; but he could not tell whether it had teeth or not. He said it emitted a very strong odour; and that the boatmen were afraid to approach near it, and looked on its coming as a bad sign, as the fish left the coast in consequence."

THE DRAMA.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT-GARDEN.

MISS HAMMERSLEY.—The following account of Miss Hammersley so precisely tallies with our own opinion, which we have, out of esteem to that lady, repeatedly and personally represented to her, that we do not hesitate to give it from The Examiner, without alteration or comment of our own.

"On Thursday Evening we attended the representation of The Marriage of Figaro and The Miller's Maid, supplying the only absolute novelties in the week, and those of course in the way of casts only. In the opera, we had the pleasure of hearing Miss HAMMERSLEY, for the first time, in the character of the Countess Almaviva. This lady, without approaching perfection, is a considerable musical acquisition. Her voice possesses considerable extent and capability; and some of the higher notes are peculiarly sweet and delightful. Her chief deficiency seems to be the power of articulation, and of voluntary and correct modulation; but there appears to be nothing wanting which, with a voice of such volume and flexibility, is not to be acquired. She gave the air of Voi che sapete with great taste, feeling, and judgment, and executed her part in the exquisite duet with Miss TREB, and the bravura in the third act, not only with credit, but occasionally with masterly execution and brilliancy. In short, if Miss HAMMERSLEY is progressive in mind and acquirement, much, indeed, is to be expected; if not, as a singer, she will be of qualified merit, but respectable. So much depends upon this point, we think it unnecessary to add any thing more until it be decided. This as a singer. As an actress, Miss HAMMERSLEY is provincial, which is simply saying that her deportment is stiff and conventional, like the tuition of a maiden aunt, which defect, we doubt not, will soon submit to the salutary collision of the Covent-Garden Green-Room.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SALFORD WATCHMEN.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—As a stranger, I should be sorry to censure any thing in the civil government of this ancient part of the town; and if I am in error, I hope to be corrected in your next; as however, such mistake is not connected with the conclusion I wish to arrive at, I shall proceed.—

I believe there are few, if any watchmen for the protection of persons or property in the township of Salford; at least for a period of several months residence there, I have neither heard nor seen any.

A little while ago, on a beautifully moonlight-night, the whole neighbourhood where my domicile is fixed, were roused from their beds by the shoutings and vociferations of a woman, who had from some cause or other not joined her loving husband in his humble cell. As he refused her admittance, she proceeded to demolish every pane, and having done so, passed herself through with the agility of a cat, and in an instant the man, in almost a state of nudity, made his escape from the earthly abode followed by his indignant spouse, who was allaying the fire of his indignation within, by pouring a repeatedly filled vessel of water upon him without.

A contest now took place of considerable ferocity, and not one of the many protruding spectators attempted to interfere between the enraged belligerents—nor yet any officer of the night. "And what," I called out to some brother spectators in the opposite windows, "have you no watchmen here?"

Sir, his reply ought to be recorded—it was delivered in the real Lancashire phraseology, and was, "Yoy! oy think we're aw WATCHMEN!"

Sir, Yours, PACIFICUS.

VARIETIES.

BACKWARDNESS OF PHYSIC.—An English nobleman, walking through the New Town of Edinburgh, in company with the Honourable Henry Erskine, remarked how odd it was that St. Andrew's church should so greatly project, whilst the Physicians' Hall immediately opposite, equally receded. Mr. Erskine admitted, "That George's-Street would have been, without exception, the finest street in Europe, if the forwardness of the clergy, and the backwardness of the physicians, had not married its uniformity."

INTREPIDITY.—Admiral Boscawen obtained the name of Old Dreadnought in the Spanish war, when captain of the Glory Frigate.—The captain had retired to rest early in the evening and was awoken by his first lieutenant announcing to him that two vessels of war one Spanish and one French (the smallest of superior force to the Glory) were close upon them, adding,

"What shall we do, Sir?" "Do!" cried the captain starting up, "why, Sir, fight them to be sure." He instantly came on deck in his shirt, made the necessary preparations, and in that state fought them nearly two glasses, when they sheered off under cover of the night.

A NEW CATECHISM.—The system of drilling children to a regular and set practice, by which they are made to astonish, but never left to profit, though happily now grown much into disuse by the introduction of wiser systems, is nevertheless often resorted to by the ignorant, or indolent, teacher. A Tyro of this description being anxious to redeem a declining popularity, invented a new Catechism, and by placing his pupils in a regular order to receive the monotonous round of questions, so far as to perfect them, resolved to have a field day before their friends. This catechism commenced by asking, who do you believe in first—secondly—thirdly? to which several questions the answers given were of course the persons of the Trinity; it happened, however, on the day of exhibition, that the second boy from some cause or other, was absent, and the master in the hurry of marshalling his ranks, had not observed him; just, however, as the pedagogue had asked the first question, the missing boy dropped in, and took his place at the extremity of all—the first boy questioned, audibly and correctly replied by saying—"In God the Father!" "Secondly whom do you believe in?" "In God the HOLY GHOST," said the lad. Here was an error with a vengeance—it was indeed his usual answer, but it was not his regular question. Exhausted at this early defeat, the master raised his voice to a tone of positive demand—"I say, Sir, in whom do you secondly believe?" "In God the Holy Ghost," the boy still persisted. "What, Sir," cried he with rage, "do not you believe in God the Son?" "No, Sir," cried the innocent lad pointing to the end of the ranks, "but yonder other boy does!!!"

DOMESTIC FELICITY.—A little while ago no less than seven women appeared at our New Bailey Court-house, for warrants for their husbands, and the writer of this paragraph must confess, whatever had been the provocation, they bore evident marks of the striking displeasure of their husbands. It was in vain that the sitting magistrate, the Rev. C. W. Ethelston, humanely entreated them, one by one, to "go home and make friends; but the seventh woman yielding more to his praiseworthy remonstrances, the Rev. magistrate followed up his charitable advice, and as she was retiring said to her, "Rely upon it you will not repent my counsel, and remember that in all cases of domestic turmoil, a dishonourable peace is better than an honourable war."

LONG MEMORIES.—The late Dr. Darwin was remarkable for an excellent memory, and the following instance of it has been related. Riding one day down a private lane, and having to pass through a gate to a gentleman's house, where the doctor was going to dine, it was opened by a man whom he happened to know. Thinking, perhaps, of his own dinner, he asked the man if he liked eggs—"John, are you fond of eggs?" The man answered, "Yes, Sir." But the gate, in returning to its place, happening to strike against the doctor's knee, put an end to the colloquy. About seven years afterwards, the doctor was passing through the same gate, which was opened, as before, by the same man. The doctor recollecting the circumstance which took place on his former visit, said to the man, "How, John?" To which he promptly replied, "Poached, Sir." A proof that the man's memory was at least on a par with the doctor's.

Another anecdote has been related of the Doctor, mentioned in the preceding article, which shows at least his ingenuity in the art of substituting one word, of nearly the same sound, for another which he had unguardedly used to one of his female patients.—

Calling upon a lady, one day, whom he had but recently visited, he inquired after her health. The lady answered, "Why, doctor, I don't think I am quite as well as I was the last time you were here. I believe I have taken a little cold." "Indeed, Madam; have you been out?" "Why, yes, Sir; but I have only been to church." "To church, Madam! O! that d-d church!" hastily exclaimed the doctor.—The lady was not a little shocked, and expressed some very natural surprise on the occasion; doubting, however, whether she had heard correctly the epithet which he had applied to the sacred edifice.—"I was only observing, Madam," said the doctor, "that it was probably that damp church which had been the occasion of the cold you have taken, and might have brought on the symptoms of which you now complain."

KILL MYSELF.—In this county it is usual, at Christmas, for the farmers to kill each a sheep for their own use; on which occasion, when the butchers inquire if they want any meat against Christmas, the usual reply is, "Nay, I think not, I think o' killing myself." Last Christmas, a butcher called on a farmer of his acquaintance, in the usual manner, saying, "Will ye want a bit a meat, or ye'll kill yersell, this Christmas?" "I kna not," replied the farmer, "whether Iae kill myself or take a side o' my faither."—Westmoreland Gazette.

GLASGOW NEW MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.—A secession has taken place from the Andersonian Institution, Glasgow, and a subscription been entered into for a new institution for the instruction of the mechanics. Three hundred and seventy-four individuals have subscribed from half a guinea to a guinea each, a good library has been selected, and offers have been made, from several scientific men, of lectures and apparatus for the new institution.

The following was lately proposed by a French gentleman as an inscription for a gambling house.

"Caverne à l'avarice ouverte,
Où l'on court le danger certain :
D'être ruiné par la perte,
Ou dishonoré par le gain."

A poetical translation is requested.

A COURT OF JUSTICE IN THE WESTERN STATES OF AMERICA.—(Zainsville, Ohio.)—At noon I roamed into the Supreme Court, where I saw my new friend, the Supreme Judge, Wilson, on the bench, in the midst of three rustic, dirty-looking, associate Judges, all robeless, and dressed in coarse drab, domestic, homespun coats, dark silk handkerchiefs round their necks, and otherwise not superior in outward appearance to our low pen-farmers in England. Thus they sat, presiding with ease and ability over a bar of plain talkative lawyers, all robeless, very funny and conversational in their speeches, manners, and conduct; dressed in plain box-coats, and sitting with their feet and knees higher than their noses, and pointing obliquely to the bench of Judges: thus making their speeches, and examining and cross-examining evidence, at a plain long table, with a brown earthen jug of cold water before them, for occasionally wetting their whistles, and washing their quid-stained lips: all, judges, jury, counsel, witnesses, and prisoners, seemed free, easy, and happy. The Supreme Judge is only distinguished from the rest by a shabby blue threadbare coat, dirty trowsers, and unblacked shoes. Thus sat all other Lordships, freely and frequently chewing tobacco, and appearing as uninterested as could be. Judge Wilson is, however, a smart intelligent man, rather jocular, and I think kind-hearted.—Faus's Journal.

ANECDOTE.—A cornish clergyman, having a dispute concerning several shares in different mines, found it necessary to send for a London limb of the law, to have some conversation with the witnesses, examine the title deeds, view the premises, &c. In one excursion, as the professional gentleman was descending the deep shaft, by means of a rope which he held in his hand, he called out to the parson, who stood at the top, "Doctor, as you have not confined your studies to geography, but know all things from the surface to the centre, pray how far is it from this pit to that of the infernal regions?" "I cannot exactly ascertain the distance," replied the Divine, "but let go your hold and you'll be there in a minute."

IRISHMEN IN AMERICA.—The Yankees are well known to be fond of playing off their wit at the expense of British travellers, and this was attempted upon an young Irishman in various ways, who, a stranger in the country, had occasion to make many enquiries, which always were contrived to be so answered as to end in merriment towards poor Pat. Amongst other inconveniences, the Hibernian complained to the landlord of a tavern he was in the habit of frequenting, that he had much difficulty in finding his house, as it possessed no SIGN. The landlord assured him he had had similar complaints from several British gentlemen, and that he had ordered a sign to please them, and it would be up on the following day. Accordingly, as promised, the stranger saw a large sign as he approached, and the name, which was DAWSON, reversed,—that it might puzzle those who had importuned him to procure it. The Irishman saw the drift, and stepping to the opposite side of the way, reared himself against a house-side, standing on his head. "What are you doing that for?" cried Mr. Dawson from his own door. "Trying to read your sign!" replied Pat.

An Irishman in America, once wrote to his father in Ireland on the following terms: "Dear Father—I wish you would come and settle in this place, for your business is much better here than it is where you are, and, besides, I dare say you would soon get to be a colonel, a justice of the peace, a member of the legislature, or a constable, for in this country they have mighty men to fill these offices!!!"

CROSSES.—A celebrated preacher in Paris, having exhorted his congregation, in a very pathetic discourse, to bear their Cross with patience, a married man who was present, as soon as the service was over, took his wife home on his shoulders!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall always be glad to receive any articles respecting the New Institution.—The last letter on the subject inserted in the Iris, is, in our opinion, deserving of particular attention. —We are surprised that the writer's very important objections to the privileges of hereditary governors, have not excited more notice.—The mistake which has been pointed out is of serious importance; it may, if not rectified, prove fatal to all the other arrangements.

We have laboured through "Demiseniquar's" Lectures with great patience, and are fearful of committing ourselves on the subject of a system of music, which has so many and so distinguished advocates. —Nor can we find fault with the "Shoe Makers" who make pumps till they are inspired "to dance in them," or with the motley mixture who are learning to point "the light fantastic toe," by the dulcet strains of an itinerant musician. We find still less fault because, if confined to this pursuit, they will certainly be out of worse employment, and as to the charge of twopence per night, it is the lowest we have heard of, excepting the poor schoolmistress at Leeds, who announced her terms for education at "threepence a week, and twopence more for those as larned manners!"

Our friend under the signature of "Geoffrey Gimcrack," may be assured his ingenious and valued productions are not omitted from any slight, as our succeeding numbers will prove, and we shall always be happy of the appropriation of one of his leisure hours to a continuation of those humorous ideas, which will, in part, be found in the "Stygian Lake," on Saturday next.

We cannot advise "Viator" what course to pursue relative to the impediments he meets with in his progress over the Old Bridge, unless he could prevail upon "the powers that be" to remove the payment of the "tribute money" from those of Blackfriars and Strangeways, otherwise he must be content to pay for his comfort, to pad the funeral page to the parapet, or turn into the middle of the road, which in our opinion is the best of the three, as it somewhat annihilates in walking through apple-sauce.

The Lines on Suicide, we fear, would have a bad impression on minds which have unhappily ever yielded to the idea of executing so terrible a deed, and might serve to fix a wavering purpose.

Caswin in our next.

Ignote, our Chester correspondent, Nescius Juvenis, J. W. and several others are unavoidably postponed.

We have applied the pruning knife to the Dandy as well as made a few ingratiations,—the author's good sense will be the property of the former, as his good nature must excuse the latter.

A. M. S. respecting the Executioner of King Charles the First, shall be attended to next week.

Q.'s Lines in imitation of Burns, shall appear in our next.

NORTH WEST EXPEDITION.

Our readers, we are sure, will excuse the omission of much other matter to make room for this interesting subject, which we have carefully extracted from those sources, which appeared to us to be best calculated to give correct information.

We noticed in our last number the arrival of these enterprising navigators, and we now proceed to the particulars connected with it.

The outward voyage in 1821 was fair and prosperous. Passing up Hudson's Straits, the navigators kept near the land on their south, and explored the coast towards Repulse Bay. The farthest west which they attained was 86° of longitude, and the highest latitude only 69° 48' N.; and they finally brought up for winter quarters at a small isle which they named Winter Island, in 82° 53' W. longitude, and latitude 66° 11' N. The chief part of the summer of 1821 was occupied in examining Repulse Bay, and some inlets to the eastward of it, through some one or other of which they hoped to find a passage into the Polar Sea. In this they were disappointed, for all the openings proved to be only deep inlets, which ran into the Continent of America. While thus occupied, early in October, the sea began to freeze; and on the 8th of that month the ships were laid up for the winter, in the situation noted above. Here at Winter Island, the expedition was frozen up from the 8th of October, 1821, to the 2nd of July, 1822. The vessels were within two or three hundred paces of each other; and occupations and amusements, similar to those practised in the preceding voyage, were resorted to.

One of the principal events which we have to notice in this period was the beneficial effects produced by the system of heating the ships with currents of warm air. These were directed to every requisite part by means of metallic tubes, and so well did the contrivance answer its purpose, that the lowest temperature experienced during the winter was 35 degrees below zero. In the second winter it was 10 degrees lower, namely, 45 degrees below zero; but this was not near so difficult to endure nor so inconvenient as the cold in Captain Parry's first voyage, nor indeed, if we are rightly instructed, as that felt in the northern stations of the Hudson Bay traders in the American Continent.

The provision cases, we understand, did not turn out so well; for though the meats were preserved fresh, they were found to be very insipid on constant use, and the men got as tired of them as they generally do of salt provisions.

Nothing occurred, during the first part of the winter, deserving of any particular notice; but one morning, in the beginning of February, our people were surprised by the appearance of strange forms upon the snow-plain in their vicinity, and of persons running to and fro. This was a tribe of about fifty Esquimaux, who were erecting their snow-huts, and taking up their residence at a short distance from the vessels. At first it was hoped that this might be Captain Franklin's Expedition, but the hope quickly vanished; and the settlers were found to be one of those wandering hordes which roam along the shore in search of food, and make their habitations wherever it can be obtained in sufficient quantity. The great dependance of these people upon the produce of the sea for their sustenance necessarily confines their migrations to the coasts, and, except hastily travelling across land in any journey occasionally, it may be presumed from their habits that they never establish themselves ten miles from the water's edge. The intercourse of the voyagers with their new and singular neighbours, afforded them much and much wanted amusement during the remainder of the winter; as, never having seen Europeans before, their manners and customs were quite original. The snow began to melt about the beginning of May, and put an end to their intimacy.

In the season of 1822, the vessels having steered along the coast to the North, penetrated only to the long. of 82° 50', and lat. 69° 40'; and after exploring several inlets, &c. in their brief cruise, they were finally moored for their second winter, about a mile apart, in 81° 44' W. long. and lat. 69° 21' N. Here, close to another small isle, they remained from the 24th of September 1822 to the 8th of last August. They had latterly entered a strait leading to the westward. From the accounts of the Esquimaux and their own observations, they had every reason to believe that this strait separated all the land to the northward from the continent of America. After getting about fifteen miles within the entrance of it, however, they were stopped by the ice, but from the persuasion that they were in the right channel for getting to the westward, they remained there for nearly a month, in daily expectation that the ice would break up. In this last hope they were again quite disappointed, and on the 19th of September the sea having begun to freeze, they left these straits, and laid the ships up in winter quarters near the small island alluded to, and called by the Esquimaux Igloodik.

From these data it is evident that the Expedition has failed in its leading objects. In short, any annual whale-ship might do as much as it has been able, with all its perseverance, to accomplish; and we apprehend that few or no lights can be thrown by it upon the great questions of science which were raised by the former voyages. The magnetic pole was not crossed: and it is curious to state, that all the electrical appearances, lights, halos, meteors, &c. were seen to the south. In natural history the acquisitions are very scanty. Twenty-eight botanical specimens, dwarf willow, saxifrage, grasses, mosses, &c. nearly comprehend the stunted vegetable world of these northern latitudes. One new gull has, we believe, been added to that class; but, generally speaking, hardly any novelty has been ascertained, or remarkable discovery made, in ornithology, piscology, botany, or any other branch of science.

In the second winter a more numerous tribe of the Esquimaux, about 150, and including the visitors of the preceding year, settled near the ships, and were in daily intercourse with them.

They are represented as being peaceable and good-natured: not stupid, but not eminent for feeling or intelligence. The first tribe lived together on terms of perfect liberty and equality; in the second there was an Angkok or conjuror, who exercised a certain degree of influence and authority. They are copper-coloured, of ordinary stature, and have long black hair, with black eyes. They seem to have no idea of war, they have no chiefs, nor are there any individuals among them who appear to possess authority over the rest. They observe a form of marriage. An Esquimaux bespeaks his wife while she is yet a child, and when she is of marriageable age she is brought home to him, and there is a feast on the occasion; but if any one is sufficiently expert in hunting or providing provisions to support two wives, there is no obstacle. They are in the habit of exchanging their wives for a time, and this practice, so far from being considered disreputable, is esteemed a mark of great friendship, and it is not unfrequent to make permanent exchanges. Their funerals are equally simple: if in winter, the corpse is merely covered over with snow; if in summer, a shallow trench is dug, where it is deposited, and two or three flat stones at top complete the rude sepulchre.

They are careful not to allow any stoness or weighty matter to rest on the body; and seem to think that even after death it may be sensible to the oppression. They appeared to have some crude notions of a future state; but all their ideas on these matters were so blended with superstition, that they hardly deserve to be mentioned. They possess a number of large dogs, which are covered with fine soft wool instead of hair; of these Capt. Parry has brought home 16. They have no religion, nor any conception of a Deity, but they believe in the existence of evil spirits, with which some among them, more cunning than the rest, pretend to hold intercourse. Capt. Parry and his companions resided among them for several months, and acquired some knowledge of their language, which bears a strong resemblance to the Chinese. They form huts in the snow to live in, and burn oil for the purpose of obtaining light. Their dwellings are by this process rendered at once warm and damp, and the transition occasioned by their coming out into the cold air, is apt to produce inflammation in the lungs, which is frequently fatal. Their persons are never washed, and on this account during the summer, their smell is very offensive, and they are much annoyed by vermin. They make their needles and implements for hunting of bone. They seemed to value things according to their utility; and hence articles of iron and needles of our manufacture were highly prized by them.

Their snow-houses when first seen, resemble three immense bee-hives grouped together, and are entered by one long passage by all the three families to whom these yield an abode, of which the following outline affords a tolerable idea.

They are about 9 feet in diameter, and 7 or 8 feet in height. The passage is about 20 feet in length, and so low that you must creep along nearly on all-fours, in order to reach the hut. This is ingeniously intended to exclude the cold air, which it does effectually, though widened in parts for lodging the dogs belonging to the several households, and which are stationed in the last sort of antichamber, before the entrances turn off to the right and left for the two nearest huts. The huts themselves are entirely made of square blocks of solid snow, with a large key-block at the top of the rotunda. The window is a piece of flat transparent ice. Round the interior runs a seat of the same material as the walls, upon which the skins of animals are thrown for seats and beds. Beds are also made of a plant, on the floor. The houses are without any artificial warmth, except that which is produced by a sort of oil lamp.

In the winter of 1822-23, native dwellings or huts constructed of bones were also seen. The Esquimaux often eat flesh in a raw state; but it is some times cooked, and the women almost invariably submit their food to that process. The utensils are uncommon, though simple. They consist of two vessels of stone; generally the pot-stone or lapis-ollaris, also used in parts of Germany for the same purpose. The lower vessel a good deal resembles an English kitchen ash-shovel: the upper one a trough, of a wide coffin form. In the first, which is filled with oil, a number of moss wicks float, and are lighted for the fuel. The oil is gradually supplied from strings of fat hung up above the flames, the heat of which melts them into so many reservoirs of grease. In the second utensil, placed over the fire thus made, the meat is stewed. The natives are filthy in their eating, and hardly reject any thing, from the blubber of a whale to the flesh of a wolf. When hungry, they devoured the carcasses of ten or a dozen of the latter, which were killed by our seamen. Their food, indeed, consisted chiefly of seal and wolves' flesh; but, notwithstanding this, they appeared to be perfectly contented, nay, even happy. Their dresses were made entirely of skins, chiefly those of the rein-deer.

The lapis-ollaris is originally so soft that it may be cut into form with a knife; and when it is not to be found, an extraordinary substitute is manufactured into pots and pans. This is a cement composed of dogs' hair, seals' blood, and a particular clay, which soon becomes as hard as stone, and bears the effects both of oil and fire below, and moisture and stewing above.

In the beginning of their intercourse, the Esquimaux were somewhat reserved, and shy of communicating their opinions; but as their reserve wore off, they divulged a number of interesting particulars. The women, especially, were less secret than the men, who (we may here state by the by) had no hesitation in bartering their wives and daughters with the sailors, at first for so poor a bribe as a nail or two or three beads, and at last for the price of a paltry knife.

These females are not, it is true, the most lovely objects in nature. Their features are disagreeable, and they have long and harsh, but exceedingly black hair. A map was drawn by one of them, (a remarkable instance of intelligence,) in which she represents two islands, to the north of the second winter's position of the ships, and others in different directions, giving rather onerous names to them all. Every family has a sledge, and generally five or six dogs, with which they travel with great ease, and hunt.

They say that their race originally sprung from a beneficent female spirit; and that from another wicked female spirit are descended the other three creatures who inhabit the earth, namely, the Itkali, or Indians, the Cablunæ, or Europeans; and (after long hesitation before they would express it) the Dogs which they drive! The Itkali they abhor, and speak of as murderers, who never spare their tribes. Of the Cablunæ they had only heard by report, never having seen a European till they encountered those in the Fury and Hecla; but it is clear, from their clashing them with the Indians and Dogs, that they have no very exalted idea of their virtues.

With their own appellation of Esquimaux they are not acquainted, but call themselves Eunee. The other name is understood to be a term of reproach, meaning "Eaters of raw flesh."

From the above it appears, that they entertain a belief in certain spirits or superior beings; but their notions concerning them are extremely rude and vague. This was displayed by the Angekok, or Conjuror, of whom we have spoken. This great man was, after much entreaty, prevailed upon to exhibit his supernatural powers in the Captain's cabin of one of the ships. He was accompanied by his wife, and began his operations by having every glimpse of external light carefully excluded. Still the fire emitted a glimmering, and this was covered with a thick mat; so that at length all was utter darkness. The Angekok then stripped himself naked, and lay down upon the floor, and pretended that he was going to the lower regions where the spirits dwell. His incantations consisted of hardly articulate sounds, not appearing to have any meaning attached to them, but to be the muttering and whining of strange syllables. He also practised a kind of ventriloquism; and modulated his voice so as to give it the effect of nearness and greater distance, in the depths to which he wished it to be believed he had descended. This farce had lasted about twenty minutes; and on the re-admission of light, the actor gave an account of his adventures, and of what the spirits had told him. As a proof of the truth of his facts, and the reality of his colloquies, he produced several stripes of fur which one of the spirits had fastened on the back of his skin-coat since he went down—which, indeed, his wife had been busily stitching on during the dark performance. Yet, by such fables and impostures, he maintained his sway over his ignorant countrymen, who implicitly credited his inventions and powers. The latter were consequently invoked upon all important occasions.

An immense value is set upon the testimonies of supernatural intimacy; thus the Angekok declared that he would not exchange the spirit's gifts, one of the stripes of fur, for any thing that could be offered to him; and it was with much difficulty that Captain Parry did prevail upon him to barter one for some highly coveted article, nor would he part with any more.

From the length of time during which the natives were daily with them, our people were enabled to pick up a rather copious vocabulary of their language. Some of the journals contain from five hundred to a larger number of words. Their knowledge of figures is very limited; five and ten being their most obvious enumeration. When they wish to express the former, one hand is held up; the latter, of course, requires both; but when the sum exceeds that number, the Esquimaux calls on a neighbor to help him out, by holding up one or two hands as the occasion requires. One of our friends related a whimsical anecdote connected with this sort of dumb show. He was conversing with a native alone, who wanted to make the large and unusual sign of thirty. He accordingly held up both hands, and was then sadly puzzled how to go farther. It never occurred to him to break off and repeat the signal in any way; but at length he happily struck upon ten more by getting the officer to raise his digitals. Here were twenty; but the ten to be added was the grand pons asinorum of Esquimaux numerals! The difficulty seemed insuperable, but again his genius befriended the calculator; he held up one of his feet, twenty-five! What was to be done? Like one of the wise men of Gotham, our clever native tried to hold up the other foot at the same time, and his efforts to have all his limbs simultaneously in the air were the most ludicrous that can be imagined. But it could not be managed; and it was not without an immensity of trouble that the proposed number could be expressed by the four hands and one foot of each of the conversing parties.

Other characteristic traits of these simple people may be told in this place. The wives of two of them, one with a boy suckling, (which nutriment they supply for several years,) were taken on board the vessels for medical treatment, both being in the last stage of disease. It was indeed too late to save them; and they died. The husband of the mother evinced some distress and howled a little when she expired; but very soon seemed to forget his loss. Yet he attended very sedulously to the proceedings of the Cablunæ. They enveloped the body decently, as is done with sailors, in a hammock, and dug a grave for its reception. To this it was borne accompanied by the husband, who manifested much uneasiness. At last he made himself understood that he was afflicted by the confinement of the corpse. Having obtained a knife, he was permitted to gratify his own feelings, and he cut all the stitches which held the hammock together down the front, so as to give a kind of liberty to the dead form. The covering in of the grave with earth and stones seemed also to give him pain; but asked leave to bury the living child with its dead mother. The reason assigned for this horrid proposal was, that, being a female, no woman would take the trouble to nurse it, as that was never done among them. If it had been a boy, perhaps some one might have reared it. In fact, the infant, without sustenance, did die on the ensuing day, and was placed at the disposal of its parent, who drew it away in his sledge to a short distance, and raised a small mound of snow over its lifeless corpse.

In the management of the canoe, the Esquimaux are very expert. They are amazingly light, and formed of skin over whalebone. The largest which Captain P. obtained is 26 feet in length; and another, in the Hecla, which is 19 feet long and only 19 inches in width, half of which are in the depth.

In these the Native pursues his marine chase, and spears the fish and fowl. The spear is double-pointed with bone, about six inches in length, and barbed. They kill at twenty yards distance. The bow and arrow is also employed in killing game and wild animals. The arrows are pointed with stone, smoothed into a lance-head shape by friction against other stones.

Their method of catching seals and fish through a hole in the ice, is one of the most dexterous of Esquimaux contrivances: A line is let down, at the end of which is fastened a small piece of white bone or tooth, above an inch long, cut into a rude fish-form, and having two morsels of pyrites stuck into it to resemble eyes. This bait is drawn through the water, and when seals or other prey approach to examine it, the watchful native spears them from above.

The knives used by the women are curiously constructed. With these they carve away underhand, in a very dexterous style.

Spectacles are another of their articles, which are curious and well contrived. They consist of a piece of wood scraped thin, like a bandage, and perforated with two narrow horizontal slits, something like pig's eyes, where we would have glasses; a rim about an inch broad projects in the same direction as that of a hat would; and this simple mechanical process, tied about the head, protects the eyes from the drifting snow and spicule, and improves the sharpness of the sight.

Among other curiosities is a part of the yolk of a sea-bird's egg, as prepared by the Esquimaux to keep for food. It is as hard and transparent as amber, for which it might readily be mistaken. A model of a canoe ingeniously made by a native, only fourteen inches long; it does credit to their skill, but not so much as a female's reticule (if we may call it) made of ducks' feet curiously disposed in a neat circular shape, and the toes hanging out like tags or tassels. This is a very singular piece of workmanship, and looks well. Small bottles of matting woven closely, and of an elegant form, are among their manufactures; and the stringing, on threads of fish-fibres, of the teeth of foxes, wolves, &c. for female ornaments, does not always betray a bad taste, however common the materials are. Images of bone, an inch or an inch and a half long, afford no high notion of the native talents for carving in ivory—they just so far resemble the human shape as to show they were meant to represent it.

The Inlet where the second winter was spent, presented a solid mass of everlasting ice. It is about ten miles in breadth; its length (of course, not having been traversed), uncertain. The ebb tide is from the South-west, and the flood from South-east; small channels ran through it, but not wide enough to work a ship.

The absence of the sun was experienced for about a month. In June (the 10th) the first flower was seen: a small but richly coloured blue of the Saxifraga genus.

To beguile the tedious time, our countrymen occasionally lived in tents on shore, and hunted, shot, and fished for the general consumption. Rein-deer were sometimes killed; the carcass of the largest weighed (without offal) 160 lbs. According to the report of the natives, there were rein-deer on the large island towards the north. No musk oxen were seen in any part; and from the same authority it was gathered that they only appeared to the westward of the longitude to which the Expedition penetrated.

Of birds there were prodigious numbers; but their flesh was of a fishy and unpleasant taste; it was made nevertheless to serve at times, to vary the Arctic cuisine.

Gardening was another expedient for occupying the time, and supplying the table. Mustard and cress were grown as on the preceding voyage, and served out to the men in considerable quantities, to the great benefit of their health. Indeed, the looks of the crew bear testimony to their careful treatment in this respect; for we never saw a set of more healthy and well-conditioned fellows set out on, still less return from, a long sea trip.

It does not appear that any far excursions were attempted from the ships, overland, in any direction.

In these journeys, the value of the Esquimaux dog was witnessed. These strong and hardy animals draw the country sledges at the rate of five miles, and more, an hour. Nor is this performed with a light weight attached to them. Eight in harness will draw three or four persons with ease and speed in this manner. On one occasion an anchor and stock, weighing about a ton, was dragged to its destination by fifteen or sixteen of them; and, generally speaking, they are fully equal to a load of one hundred weight per dog.

They are also bold and vigorous in the chase. With them the Esquimaux hunts the great white Polar bear; and some of those brought to England carry the scars of their prowess in this way. They seize their adversary by his long shaggy hair, and worry and detain him till their masters come up with their spears to end the conflict.

Those in the ships are large creatures of various orlours, tan, grey, but mostly black with white spots over the eyes and on the feet and tip of the tail. They are exceedingly fierce, and more like wolves than dogs. They do not bark, but snarl, growl, and howl in a savage manner. A good many died in consequence of the heat, on their way to England; and though Wednesday was a cold October day, the survivors were panting as if they had exhausted themselves with running. In the Hecla was one dog bred between the Esquimaux dog and a lurcher taken out from this country. She had six female pups, and is now a fine powerful animal, and quite tame. It gave a singular proof of its sagacity in the river: A lighter came alongside with some casks of fresh water, into which it immediately leapt over the side, and ran from cask to cask, trying to get its head into a bung-hole. This being impossible, one of the men good-humouredly drew a bowl full for it, which it dispatched with evident delight, and then begged for another draught. This it also obtained, drank it nearly all, and with signs of gratification and thankfulness made its way back into the ship.

On their native soil, however, these ferocious animals are often destroyed by the still more ferocious wolves. The latter hunt in packs, and even drag the dogs from the bats to devour them. Attracted by the scent, they were always prowling about our vessels, and daringly carried off whatever came in their way. Thirteen of them were seen in one pack; all of which were trapped and slain. It was of these the hungry Esquimaux made their dinners. At one time they bore away a dog from the Fury, in spite of the pursuit of the men.

The animals which may be enumerated besides are, bears, foxes, rein-deer, hares, lemmings, the white ermine, and the marmot.

The birds are, the swan, the beautiful king duck, the eider duck, the long-tailed duck, the silver Arctic duck, &c. &c. Gulls of every kind, the Arctic diver, the loon, the red-throat, guillemots, the snow bunting, the ptarmigan; ravens, snowy owls, and hawks; birds of song, with a short low chirping note, the Siberian lark, and the Lapland linnch.

The insect creation is very limited. There are about six species of flies; the mosquito, very troublesome, but existing only about one month; the wild bee, i. e. the large black and not our hive-bee; the spider; the butterfly, a small kind of the golden; and the white moth.

The water teems, as we have stated, with molusca, the food for the enormous whale and other species of fish. There is also another minute creature in extraordinary abundance; we mean the small shrimp, which is known by the name of the Sea-louse. These performed a very curious office to the naturalists in the Expedition, and their usefulness was very drolly discovered. An officer one day was desirous of preparing a Solan goose for cooking, and in order to reduce its saltiness he plunged it through an ice-hole into the water; but alas! next morning, when the goose was to be drawn up for spitting, nothing but the skeleton appeared. The sea-lice had picked its bones as clean as any anatomist could have scraped them, and thus foely prepared it for any collection of natural history which might want such a specimen! The hint was not lost, for, after this time, whatever skeletons or bones required polishing, were submitted to the lice operators, and so diligent were they in executing the task confided to them, they would eat a sea-horse's head clean in a couple of nights!

In the Botanical department we have already mentioned the hortia sicca. Hardly one of the plants exceeds two or three inches in height, and the flowers are all small. Yet some of them are very pretty; and they bloom in such profusion as entirely to enamel their wild and dreary locality, for a season of two or three months. All the flowers are yellow or blue.

On the voyage home, the ships touched at Winter Island, and were surprised to find their garden vegetables thriving. Whether the plants had resown themselves or sprang again from the roots, could not be ascertained, but the singular fact of salads and peas growing spontaneously on the arctic circle was exhibited to the wonder of the visitors.

On leaving the Esquimaux, some muskets of small worth were given them; and one native and his wife were willing to have come to England, but the trouble and uncertainty of restoring them to their own country prevented their voyage. An axe, and still better a saw, would console them under any disappointment.

We have now related nearly all the principal occurrences which attended this interesting Expedition; and it may be relied upon as accurately embracing nearly all the leading features of a Voyage, than which none ever excited a stronger public feeling.

MANCHESTER.

I fell asleep—and in my sleep I dreamt
As greater wits as I have done before.—

I fancied that I journey'd to the North
And took up quarters in a smoky town
Where art and industry went hand in hand:
Huge buildings were apparent to my sight,
Wherein pale thousands labour'd day and night
For filthy lucre, or for bare subsistence—
Not only men, but women I saw there,
And poor ragg'd children, stunted in their growth
By early toil, and heat, bad food and filth;
Denied the comforts of a cheerful home,
And sent thus early to these hot-beds vile
Of infamy and vice, to earn a few
Poor paltry pence—perhaps to keep in sloth
Hard-and-unfeeling parents; or still worse
To help to pay off some old drunken score.—
I sicken'd at the sight and turn'd away
To look upon some less revolting scenes,
Not daring to pursue the chain of thought
Which linked so many dread deformities.

'Twas morning yet; and onwards through the streets,
Determined to shake off the last sad vision
I pursued my way—jostled and jostling
Busy crowds, who seem'd to entertain
No thoughts but for themselves: (oh! selfish race!)
Each pliz was stamp'd with the peculiar grace,
Of plodding project, calculating care,
Means multiplied—all looking as they had
Deep studied in the book of interest;—
So much their thoughts were figur'd on their fronts
That any one most aptly might have sat
As Frontispiece to an Arithmetic!
Each disk was like a table in itself
Of measures, weights, Avoirdupoise or Troy;
On most was writ that two and two make four,
Mysterious Interest Simple and Compound;
Some most expressive of that sterling sense
Promiscuous paper, and Pounds, Shillings, Pence!

At length I got entangled in a throng,
Which after other objects seemed intent,
So with them I my willing paces bent
Into a crowded room, where I beheld
Civic authority enthron'd in state;
Commissioners they were of the Police—
And what I gathered from this sage divan
Was, that they did hebdomadary meet
(Vulgo each Friday night) to hold debate
For the best interests of the commonwealth.
But this, was call'd a "General Meeting," and Convened, they told me, only once a month.—
There in the midst the president was sat
Just like a council Major of old Rome,
Attended by two lictors' stead of twelve:

And there they sagely spoke of strangest things;—
Of soughs and sewers, alias common shores;
And scavengers;—and special constables
Were sworn:—Barracks were voted to be built,
As the authorities had much alarm:
They spoke of lighting, watching, flagging streets,
Paving, and also Poor's Rates; and Gas Pipes:—
(Wit was not wanting as they dealt Reborts)
Of "cleansing" and the conducts of their clerks;
Of Rate-collectors, Hackney Coaches, Coals,
Contracts, Smoky Chimneys cur'd,
Committees:—Common Prostitutes condemn'd
And estimate on estimate sans end!
Of more commodious rendering the roads
Of sundry passages, dark, dirty lanes,
And river crossing by a certain bridge
Blackfriar's named—beneath whose ample arch
The muddy Irwell oozed as black as Styx
In all the sable majesty of filth!

In fourteen districts wooden boxes built
For coughing Charleys of the seventy-five,*
Motions for Meetings, passing of accounts,
Advertisements, Gasometers, Gas-Lamps,
Cast-Iron Pillars, Oaken Posts, Stone Stumps—
Heard flowing eloquence and pointed wit!
On Friday-nights and Lamp-Committees treat,
The new Town-Hall and widening Market-street;
In fine, they waxed into warm debate
Upon the business of this busy town.—
But lo! as they descanted on that lane†
That narrow way where lately I'd been squeez'd
Nigh unto death—an awful stop was made
(As when 'mongst Israelites "the plague was stayed")
The chair deserted—thanks returned—(of course)
"This day's proceedings" duly advertised
In Aston's Herald, and the Guardian's page,
And Wheeler's fam'd third Book of Chronicles;
Cowdroy's Gazette, and Harrop's Volunteer,
And winged Mercuries proclaim their deeds!
The rest postponed.—But why this sudden shock:
The hungry sinners!—it struck ONE O'CLOCK!

GEOFFREY GIMCRACK.

* "The glorious forty-five." Highland Regiment.

† Now "Market-Street," anciently a lane, or both.

"The same day there were assaults made at other places of the town, especially at the Market-Street-lane end, but they were repulsed by Captain Ratcliffe and his company."

THE HISTORY OF FREDERICK B.—

A TRUE STORY.

In the course of his debaucheries, G— had at length so much involved himself in debt, that it was impossible to keep himself out of a prison, but by the assistance of Frederick, to whom he applied on this occasion, having often experienced the generosity of his temper. But the assistance which he now wanted, Frederick was unwilling to afford, not from any disinclination to serve G—, but from motives of integrity. G— wanted Frederick to be bound with him for a considerable sum of money, more indeed than he was master of. Now, though Frederick was solicitous to do G— all the service he could, he thought it not right to engage for more than he was able to pay: but G— assuring him, with so much confidence, that he should certainly receive a large sum on a particular day, which he mentioned, and which should be applied to remove the difficulties he at present laboured under, Frederick, who was naturally open and unsuspecting, and who was unacquainted with the bad parts of G—'s character, was, at length, prevailed upon to comply, and accordingly gave bond for the sum required.

A few weeks afterwards, G— by unsuccessful gaming, and other licentious practices, had involved himself in so many difficulties, that he found it expedient to decamp, without taking leave of his friends. He quitted England, and took up his residence at Dunkirk, where he met with companions of principles and practices similar to his own. In the mean while, poor Frederick soon found himself in a very disagreeable situation, being called upon to make good his engagement for G—. He collected all the cash he was master of, and, on paying the greater part of the debt, the bond was cancelled; but as he still remained a debtor, he gave his note for the balance, together with a verbal promise to pay it as soon as he could. The man to whom he gave the note, possessing neither equity nor humanity, shortly afterwards arrested him for what remained due, threw him into the King's Bench prison, and there left him to philosophize at leisure.

As Frederick's character had always entitled him to the esteem of those who knew him, he might probably have obtained considerable assistance, from his friends, in his present distress, if he had made the applications usual on such occasions. But either his pride, or his delicacy prevented him from doing this: and the worthiest men, in adversity, will not often find many ready to assist them, if they do not apply to them in a manner not very grateful to a man of spirit.

Frederick had been in prison about six weeks, and was nearly reduced to his last shilling, when he received a very unexpected visitant. This was no other than Mr. T. Having heard of Frederick's confinement, and his anger against him having somewhat abated, he was anxious to enquire by what means he had been brought into so disagreeable a situation; which the more surprised him, as he knew that Frederick was not addicted to expensive pleasures, nor to any of those disorderly courses, by which men frequently involve themselves in difficulties. But when he found that his misfortune arose from having been bound with G——, who had so dishonourably flown from his bail, he was much astonished. He recollected, that the first unfavourable impressions which he had received of Frederick, were communicated to him by G——, a man for whom, it now appeared Frederick had entertained the greatest friendship, and given the strongest evidences of it. He therefore resolved to visit him in his gloomy mansion; and when he was introduced to him, he found him reading a book very suitable to his present situation, namely, "Boetius on the Consolations of Philosophy." Frederick was much surprised to see him, and acknowledged his sense of the favour of a visit in such a place; after which they entered into a free conversation, when Mr. T. being thoroughly acquainted with the cause of Frederick's sufferings, and the state of his affairs, kindly promised to afford him effectual relief. Frederick laid hold of this opportunity of making some observations relative to the amour between him and Miss T., which he found had been the only ground of Mr. T.'s displeasure against him. He assured him, that he had never been induced by any considerations respecting the fortune of that lady, to endeavour to gain her affections: on the contrary, he had laboured to conquer in himself the passion he felt for her, which her excellencies both of mind and body, had involuntarily inspired. To this Mr. T. made little reply; but, after some expressions of friendship, he took his leave, having previously slipped into Fredrick's hand a bank note for ONE HUNDRED POUNDS! Soon after his departure, Mr. T. met an old confidential friend, to whom he related the whole affair, with this addition, that he plainly saw his daughter's health would be greatly endangered, if he continued to oppose her passion for Frederick; for a settled melancholy seemed to prey upon her spirits; and, as he tenderly loved his daughter, he was extremely perplexed how to act. "It appears," said his friend, "from your own account, that Frederick is possessed of more than common merit: he loves your daughter, and she has an equal regard for him. What then should prevent their union? You object to his want of fortune. You have, it seems, nothing else to alledge against him. But have you not enough to make both him and her happy together? You certainly have. I grant that an increase of fortune might be desirable; but in this world we cannot have every thing just as we wish. And surely a man of merit, without fortune, is preferable to a man of fortune without merit; and you will have more than ordinary luck, if you meet with both in the man whom you approve of as a husband for your daughter. There is reason to believe that she will be unhappy without Frederick, and you cannot enjoy much comfort while she is miserable. My advice therefore is, that you release the young fellow out of his present difficulties, and marry him to your daughter. As to the unfavourable circumstance of his being now in prison, that can be no disgrace to him, nor any folly indeed, unless an excess of generosity and of friendship can be termed so." The persuasions and arguments of his friend had the more effect upon Mr. T. as he entertained some thoughts of doing as he advised him, though he had not come to any positive resolution concerning it. But he now resolved to follow his friend's advice entirely; and accordingly began to put his design into execution, by instantly paying the money for which Frederick was confined; who thereupon obtained his liberty. And, as Mr. T. now permitted him to visit his daughter, she soon gained a considerable increase both of health and spirits. About three months after, their hands were joined at the altar; the marriage ceremony being performed by Frederick's father, who was sent for to London for that purpose: and it may reasonably be supposed that the worthy old clergyman felt great joy at the happy prospects of his son, who with his amiable wife are completely happy in each other, and jointly contribute to increase the felicity of Mr. T., and as Frederick to an excellent understanding joins a benevolent heart, his present affluence is not a benefit to himself only; he thinks it a pleasing employment to relieve the indigent, succour the distressed, and promote the happiness of all around him.

ODE TO MEDITATION.

IRREGULAR.

Goddess of the pensive mein,
Grief-rob'd Meditation, hail!—
Let us seek the unbragous seat,
O'er the flow'r enamell'd green;
Or the rifted rocks retreat,
Where melancholy tells her tale:—
Or o'er pathless mountains stroll;
Or where gelid torrents roll;
Or the ruin'd Abbey seek,
While 'gainst the walls the hoarse waves break;
And vesper from the ethereal bright,
Throws cross the scene his lurid light.

II.

Saw'st thou o'er the lucid wave,
Aerial forms unsinking glide,
Saw'st thou the fays on zephyrs ride,
While the stars their blue beams gave:
Mark'st thou the sighing of the gale,
Which past like some unearthly wail,
Or the sigh of the maid whose love was deceiv'd,
And who wanders the glens of her senses bereav'd:—
'Tis the moan of the spirits which haunt the still deep;
The voice of the corpses which unshrouded sleep!—

III.

Spirits of the mould'ring dead,
Shadows of the fearful night,
Victims of the hours long fled,
Pass—for ye the soul affright.
Shall Myra's cheek now richly blooming,
Bear that dark and ghastly hue,
Shall her lovely orbs of blue
Be beneath the sod consuming?
Oh shall those lips with sweetness flowing,
And her smiles each bliss bestowing,
Wither,—to the tomb be brought?—
Save, oh save me from the thought!

FIRST SPIRIT.

Heirs of sadness, list to me,
From the lonely tomb I warn ye;
Inheritors of misery,
Why the Destroyer's presence mourn ye?
Have ye liv'd till age hath grey'd,
And thinn'd the locks upon your brow;—
Life, it was for which ye pray'd,
Death, ye begg'd to be delay'd,
Aged—what avails it now?

From hoary Time the past years claim,
Them and their deeds bid him restore ye;
Of all those days which youthful came,
Can ye one hour of pleasure name?

Heirs of death, why death deplore ye?

SECOND SPIRIT.

Oh, form'd of dust, who flaunt in pride,
Who'd grasp the stars—stem the wild sea;
Or ought ambition points more wide:—
View how your apings death derides,
And Heaven turns from your mockery.

THIRD SPIRIT.

The voice of Fate hangs on mine ear,
Dark from human eye she's shrouded;
O'er her sorrow hovereth near,
Distilling tears, as skies o'erclouded:
Beings of uncertainty!
Cloth'd in doubt—doubt on—and dread;
Ye stand upon eternity—
Beware!—'tis the warning of the dead.

Slow from the starry heavens the morn awoke,
Wide o'er the plain her blushing fragrance spread,
Soft o'er the ambient air the matins broke;—
Enrob'd in brightness the fair Goddess fled:—
Hail Meditation, melancholy maid!
Oft in thy wand'rings, I'll thy steps pursue,
And in the stillness of the dusky glade,
List to thy voice,—and bid the world adieu!

GREENWICH HOSPITAL

(From the Literary Gazette.)

Poor Tom! He is gone, and the tongue that could once set the cockpit in a roar, is silent now for ever! He died bravely in the service of his country, and has left a memorial in the hearts of all who knew him, which time can but efface. The wallings of distress had only to reach his ear, when his hand, his purse, were at the disposal of the supplicant. Poor Tom! I have shed many a tear to thy memory; nor do I consider it a weakness that my eyes are at this moment moistened by the overflowings of affectionate remembrance. We had embark'd in the navy on the same day, and in the same ship,—had endured together the many tricks to which all greenhorns are exposed at their first introduction to the midshipman's berth. We were watchmates, and shared the secrets of each other's heart. Oh, how often, at the midnight hour, have we gazed at the full round moon pictured on the bosom of the azure wave, and wiled away the midwatch in painting scenes of future glory; or, looking towards our own home-shore, thinking on those we'd left behind. Fancy, delusive most where warmest wishes are, would lead us on in a romantic dream of sweet delight, known only to the young mariner! There are some feelings of the human mind so exquisitely delicate in their nature, and yet so powerful in their operations, that as soon would the pulse of existence cease to beat, as those feelings cease to actuate the heart of man. The cherish'd remembrance of "Auld lang syne" dwells in the breast, and is as dear when only illuminated by the last rays of a declining sun, as when it bask'd in its meridian beam, and exulted in the glorious splendor.—“Hullo! (you will say,) where is your Old Sailor bound to now?—surely he is getting out of his latitude.” Mayhap I may be. May be? no—I’m a child to this hour; but one word’s as good as twenty, let me go on and spin my yarn upon my own winch.

Our ship was paid off, and all hands were drafted into other men of war, consequently a separation took place, and we lost sight of each other for some years. One day I was walking the deck, when the quarter-master of the watch informed me there was a boat coming alongside with a lieutenant in her; and as our third had applied to be superseded, I made no doubt that this was the new luff-tackle coming to join us. But what was my pleasure on beholding between the white lapelles the smiling face of my old friend. A glow of inexpressible animation warm’d my heart; but perhaps, thought I, promotion has alter’d him.—I drew back,—however he had caught sight of me, and the pressure of friendship told me in an instant Tom was the same honest, generous, open hearted being I had ever found him. In a few days we sailed with the fleet for the Mediterranean, and were present at the glorious battle of the Nile. Poor Tom and I were stationed on the same deck, and never did mortal display more heroic bravery, more cold intrepidity;—yet there was an indefinable expression at times in his look, as if some thought lay struggling in his breast and could not gain an utterance. Oh, what a day was that for England!—The name of Nelson now has lost its charm; yet are there some who can remember its magic influence on the seaman’s mind—’twas emblazon’d on the standard of Fame which waved the bright banner of Victory. I look sometimes at his funeral-car, and all to remembrance the time when a grateful country paid a just tribute to his memory. Well do I recollect the countenances of the honest tars who pass’d in succession his last remains when lying in state,—part of the crew of the victory: they had fought—they had conquered together,—and what can bind the tie of kindred stronger?—All around us now was blood and flame,—the shrieks of the wounded and blood of the dying came mingled with the deafening roar of guns and hissing balls that truck us through and through. “This is glorious,” said a little youngster, who had joined us for his first trip previous to sailing,—“This will be glorious news for home.” He had got twenty-four pound shot in his left arm, and was chalking on it. “What are you about?” said I.—“I’m only writing a moving billet-doux to one of the enemy’s midshipmen, Sir. There, done, and now let’s put it in the post.” And so he claps it into the muzzle of the gun. By my faith,” said a Paddy, bowring at the winkle, “but that’s a lawyer’s letter, with a double charge,—shoot aisey, and don’t be after mischief.” “Hoot, hoot, replied an old Scotchman, “it’s canonical law, then, and whoever ops it’s execution will have death without merit of clairgy; but I rather deem’t ’tis an pistol dedicatory to some body. Weel, weel, these French are a ceevil sort o’ bodies, and nae doubt you will have une rap-artie by prime-ier report-unity.”

Just at this moment a fresh ship of the enemy’s laid us athwart the bows, and opened a most tremendous fire—the midship guns came heavily—most of their hands lay stretched on the deck. Poor Will Ransom fell close my feet,—he had raised himself up by one m, and with the other supported the little midshipman, who had been struck by a grape-shot. “Oh, my mother—my poor mother!” said the lad,—struggled for a moment—and expired. Will gazed upon the youth: “He’s gone (said he,) his cable’s parted, and my anchor’s a-trip,”—laid himself down and instantly died. I don’t know how it was,—but I felt as if something was choking me—my heart was almost bursting; but ’twas momentary—the angel Pity shuns the horrid scene of carnage and revenge,—revenge steels the heart against every feeling of humanity. Another heavy broadside shook us, and poor Tom fell into my arms,—a musket-ball had pierced his breast. I order’d some men to convey him to the cockpit, for I dared not quit my station, and from that moment I lost every softer sensation of the mind. We were victorious; and as soon as duty would permit, I hastened to my friend. The surgeon’s assistant was just quitting his cabin: “Another hour,” said he in a whisper, “and all will be over; or it may be earlier.” He was sitting up in his cot, with his desk before him, attempting to write. A languid smile beam’d on his death-stricken countenance as I entered. “See, (said he,) I am performing the last duty to my parents, and to one—” here a convulsive spasm made a pause—“to one I had fondly hoped to call my own;—’tis past—’tis over, and this heart will soon cease to beat, even with that feeling it will lose the latest.” I grasp’d his hand but could not speak. He continued writing, finish’d his letters, and directed them, with the calmness and resignation of a Christian. “And now (said he,) my friend, to your charge I commit these papers and my little property; soften the anguish of a parent’s heart, and soothe the sorrows of the tender female. Tell them I have done my duty. This miniature was designed for—Oh!—Father of mercies! spare—spare—” The surgeon enter’d. I supported his head upon my arm while a cordial was administering;—he revived for a moment—placed the locket in my hand,—utter’d the name of “Matilda,”—breath’d short, and in broken whispers, “Father, into—into thy hands I—I commit my spirit,”—bowed his head upon my breast, and—he was no more. . . .

—The tide was setting very strong out of Portsmouth Harbour, and having received urgent orders to use expedition, I directed the coxswain to land me on South Sea beach.

The day was unusually fine, the garrison troops were manœuvring on the Common, and large parties of ladies and gentlemen, attracted by the beautiful scene which ever presents itself to the view, were strolling on the shore. The boat grounded, and instantly, with my despatches under my arm, my feet press’d the dear land of my nativity. Only those who have been absent from their native country can tell the thousand delightful sensations, mingled with anxiety, which pervade the mind at once again treading upon British soil. Joy swell’d my heart, while tears started from my eyes. There is a degree of selfishness in our richest pleasures—an epicurean delight which seldom admits of a participation. At this moment I thought only of myself,—the next,—parents, brothers, sisters, all rush’d upon my memory. I should see them—hear their voices—grasp their hands—oh there was rapture in the idea! Pride, too, whispered, The despatches you carry contain certain recommendations to the higher powers for conduct in battle. “I have forgot it,” said I, feeling my pockets, “What shall I do!” For by this time I had walk’d some distance from the boat. “’Twas his last dying request—I’ll run back.” Accordingly I hastened my return, and was much surprised to find a crowd of people assembled near the spot. The coxswain ran to me: “Oh, Sir, she’s dead, she’s dead! I would willingly have given all my prize money to have saved her.” “Who’s dead? (said I,) What do you mean? Jump into the boat, and bring the parcels and letters I have left there.”—“That’s it, Sir, (replied the poor fellow;) she took it up, and before I could prevent it, burst it open.” A gentleman now approached. “I believe, Sir, I am speaking to the officer of the—!” “You are, Sir; I hope no accident has happened; but I really cannot wait. Coxswain, fetch the parcels, and follow me to the Admiral’s office directly.” Then turning to the stranger: “Will you do me the favour to walk up with me, and explain.”—“Most willingly.” We proceeded onwards, and he began. “Previous to your landing, a party of ladies and gentlemen were strolling on the beach, and admiring the many beauties of the surrounding prospect. When you quitted the boat, curiosity drew us towards it. ’Tis the ———’s, exclaimed Miss ———, springing forward, My brother, my brother!—Another young lady rush’d towards the boat at the moment the coxswain was jumping ashore with several small packages under his arm, and dropt a letter close to her feet.”—“What is the lady’s name?” said I. “E——,” he replied. Had a thunderbolt struck me at that moment, I could not have been more paralyzed. The truth rushed upon my mind with tenfold horror, from the unknown extent of mischief my negligence had occasioned; and I should have fallen to the ground but for the timely support of my companion. I look’d in his face with agony and shame. “Do not tell me, (said I,) do not tell me, but run back, if you have pity, gain what information you can, and bring me intelligence at the admiral’s office.” He shook me by the hand, and instantly returned.

With a spirit almost wrung to madness, I rushed forward, and fortunately the commander-in-chief was absent. I delivered my despatches and was ordered to wait. Oh what torture, what anguish did I undergo for upwards of an hour; and when released flew to the spot;—but all were gone, and solemn stillness reigned around. I now remembered the orders given to the boat’s crew to come for me at the sallyport. Thither I hastened, and grasping the coxswain’s arm, “Where, where are they, (said I,) how came this accident to happen? be quick and do not trifle with me.”—“Oh, Sir, (replied the man,) she snatch’d up the letter, and was going to hand it over, when her eyes caught the direction: ‘It is for me, (said she,) it is for me!’ Avast there, young woman, says I; but before I could get it away, she made sail, and then broke open the hatches. I gave chase directly; but before I could come alongside, she uttered a piercing shriek, and dropt down dead.”—“Dead!” exclaimed I, my blood curdling with horror. “Dead,” repeated the man, with an involuntary shudder. At that moment I felt some one touch my arm: ’twas the person who had promised to bring me intelligence at the office. He drew me with him, and I followed almost unconscious of what I did. “Does she yet live?” said I. A convulsive sob was the only answer. We entered a neat but elegant house in — street. Anguish was pictured on every countenance. An elderly gentleman approached, with his hand extended, but speech was denied him;—’twas my poor messmate’s father. My companion motioned me to be seated, but I continued standing; when an opposite door was thrown open—a female rush’d in, and threw her arms around my neck. “She lives' she lives!" said I; and pulling poor Tom's picture instinctively from my pocket, held it to her view. She raised her head; I saw her features—'twas his sister. 'Yes, (replied she,) Matilda still lives; come, come, you shall see her,' taking me by the arm; and before my companion could prevent it we were in the adjoining room. Oh what a scene was here! Upon a couch lay the beautiful, the accomplished, the amiable Matilda a living corpse! There is a certain stupefaction of the intellect, occasioned by a sudden depression from the height of joy to the abyss of sorrow, which can only be compared to death. My conductress, whose senses were much disordered, push'd me towards the couch. I stood—I gazed—alive to feeling, but as it were alive in marble, so fetter'd was every faculty of the body. She had shown no sign of returning animation, except her breath; her eyes were open, glaz'd, and fix'd. They were towards me, and unconsciously I raised my hand, which held the portrait, to my face. A momentary flash of recollection seem'd to return; she suddenly sprung up, grasp'd my arm, snatch'd the fatal picture, gaz'd wistfully upon it—"Hark!" said she; then reclining her head upon her bosom, murmured her lover's name, and breath'd her last.

LINES SUGGESTED ON READING THE ABOVE.

Tis gaming,
Beware the fiend, seducing are her looks,
And on her lips softest persuasion sits;—
But ah, beware! her breath's a pestilence,
And from her hideous wings she shakes destruction.
Guilt, poverty, and death attend her steps,
And hell's eternal horrors stalk behind:
Thou, who the dread contagion hast receiv'd,
Tremble!—
Thy home shall pass into the hands of strangers,
Thy offspring live upon the charitable,
Thy wife, heart-broken, meet an early grave,

Thyself an alien in thy native land;
Despair shall ope her mighty arms to crush thee;
While the arch serpent, gory suicide,
Shall hover o'er thee on the racking winds,
Goaded thee on to break the laws of God,
And sink into the gulph of dire perdition!—
Tremble, thou who art in demoulac tolls,
Tremble, thy ruin is inevitable.

ELOCUTION.

We have been perusing with much delight the third edition of the Reminiscences of Charles Butler, Esq., and from its instructive pages have culled some of the most pleasing parts; we submit them to our readers under the conviction that they will derive equal satisfaction with ourselves.

MR. PITT, AFTERWARDS LORD CHATHAM.

"Lord Holland describes in half a line the effect of Mr. Pitt's oratory, when he intended to be severe, on the object of his severities.—'In both Mr. Pitt's speeches, every word fell on Murray'; yet so managed, that neither he nor any body else could or did take public notice of it, or in any degree reprehend him. I sat near Murray, who suffered for an hour." It was, perhaps, on this occasion, that Pitt used an expression that once was in every mouth.—After Murray had suffered for some time, Pitt stopped, threw his eyes around, then, fixing their whole power on Murray, said, 'I must now address a few words to Mr. Solicitor;—they shall be few,—but shall be daggers.' Murray was agitated;—the look was continued,—the agitation increased:—'Judge Festus trembles!' exclaimed Pitt,—'he shall hear me some other day.' He sat down; Murray made no reply; and a languid debate is said to have shewn the paralysis of the house.

"The whole speech of Lord Chatham, on the repeal of the stamp act, is very fine: 'I sought for merit,' said his lordship, 'wherever it was to be found. It is my boast, that I was the first minister who looked for it; and I found it in the mountains of the north. I called it forth, and drew it into your service.—a hardy and intrepid race of men. Men, who, when left by our jealousy, became a prey to the artifices of your enemies, and had gone nigh to have overturned the state, in the war before the last. These men, in the last war, were brought to combat on your side; they served with fidelity, as they fought with valour, and conquered for you in every part of the world. Detested be the national prejudices against them! they are unjust, groundless, illiberal, unmanly.—When I ceased to serve his majesty as minister, it was not the country of the man by which I was moved:—but the man of that country wanted wisdom, and held principles incompatible with freedom.'

"His celebrated reply to Horace Walpole has been immortalized by the report given of it by Dr. Johnson.—On one occasion, Mr. Moreton, the chief justice of Chester, a gentleman of some eminence at the bar, happened to say, 'King, lords, and commons, or,'—(directing his eye towards Lord Chatham),—'as that right honourable member would call them, commons, lords and king.' The only fault of this sentence is its nonsense. Mr. Pitt arose,—as he ever did,—with great deliberation, and called to order: 'I have,' he said, 'heard frequently in this house, doctrines, which have surprised me; but now, my blood runs cold! I desire the words of the honourable member may be taken down.' The clerks of the house wrote the words. 'Bring them to me,' said Mr. Pitt, in a voice of thunder. By this time Mr. Moreton was frightened out of his senses. 'Sir,' he said, addressing himself to the Speaker, 'I am sorry to have given any offence to the right honourable member, or to the house: I meant nothing. King, lords and commons,—lords, king and commons,—commons, lords and king;—fria juncta in uno.—I meant nothing! Indeed I meant nothing.'—'I don't wish to push the matter further,' said Lord Chatham, in a voice a little above a whisper:—then, in a higher tone,—'the moment a man acknowledges his error, he ceases to be guilty.—I have a great regard for the honourable member, and, as an instance of that regard, I give him this advice:—a pause of some moments ensued,—then, assuming a look of unspeakable derision,—he said in a kind of colloquial tone,—'Whenever that member means nothing, I recommend him to say nothing.'

"Once,—while he was speaking, Sir William Young called out, 'Question, question!'—Lord Chatham paused,—then, fixing on Sir William a look of inexpressible disgust,—exclaimed,—'Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, my agitation:—when that member calls for the question, I fear I hear the knell of my country's ruin.'

"When the Prussian subsidy, an unpopular measure, was in agitation in the house of commons, Lord Chatham justified it with infinite address: insensibly he subdued all his audience, and a murmur of approbation was heard from every part of the house. Availing himself of the moment, his lordship placed himself in an attitude of stern defiance, but perfect dignity, and exclaimed in his loudest tone,—'Is there an Austrian among you? Let him stand forward, and reveal himself!'

"On another occasion, immediately after he had finished a speech, in the house of commons, he walked out of it; and, as usual, with a very slow step. A silence ensued, till the door was opened to let him into the lobby. A member then started up, saying, 'I rise to reply to the right honourable member.'—Lord Chatham turned back, and fixed his eye on the orator,—who instantly sat down dumb:—his lordship then returned to his seat, and exclaimed, 'Now let me hear what the honourable member has to say to me.' On the writer's asking the gentleman from whom he heard this anecdote,—if the house did not laugh at the ridiculous figure of the poor member?—'No sir,' he replied, 'we were all too much awed to laugh.'

"But the most extraordinary instance of his command of the house, is, the manner in which he finished indelicately on Mr. Grenville, the appellation of 'the Gentle Shepherd.' At this time, a song of Dr. Howard, which began with the words, 'Gentle shepherd tell me where,—and in which each stanza ended with that line,—was in every mouth. On some occasion, Mr. Grenville exclaimed, 'Where is our money? where are our means? I say again, where are our means? where is our money?' He then sat down,—and Lord Chatham paced slowly out of the house, humming the line, 'Gentle shepherd tell me where.'—The effect was irresistible, and settled for ever on Mr. Grenville the appellation of 'the Gentle Shepherd.'

THE VICTIM OF FIDELITY;

A TALE.

In Caledonia's unenclosed wilds,
Uncultivated, drear, and desolate,
Where Nature in her rudest garb appears;
Upon a rugged mountain bare and bleak,
Rose the lone cottage of a shepherd swain.
Here, free from life-corroding care, he spent
His days, in an uninterrupted flow
Of rural happiness. His sole employ,
His flocks and herds to tend. His slender pipe,
Whose simple notes the untaught ear could please,
And Tray, the guardian of his fleecy charge,—
(Whose fond caresses were not flattery)
By turns, beguill'd and cheer'd the vacant hours.
Whilst thus he liv'd in unmolested peace,
Urg'd by necessity, one day he went,
On traffick's errand, to a neighbouring fair,
Part of his flocks and herds there to dispose.
With signs and wonted looks, well understood
By each, the rest, until he should return,
He to the charge of faithful Tray consign'd.
Meanwhile, the dog, who with affection kind
His master lov'd with unremitting care,
Tended his little flock, both night and day.
Waiting with patience his lov'd lord's return.
Full four long days detain'd by sad mishap,
He from the fair return'd, regain'd his cot,
And eagerly enquir'd for trusty Tray.
Alas! in vain he information sought.—
With heartfelt grief he thus exclaimed: "Thy fat

"I know,—an helpless prey thou hast become
 "To thy fidelity." But eager hope,
 Still ling'ring, and unwilling to depart
 From his despondent breast, wing'd his slow feet.
 And to the mountain's top he hasted quick.
 Here, at his post, he found his faithful dog,
 Watching his flocks and herds. Him when he saw,
 He rose, and slowly struggled to approach—
 Alas! his strength soon fail'd. With silent joy,
 He feebly fawn'd, and lick'd his master's hand,
 Then at his feet he fell, look'd up, and died!

AFTER BURNS.

Is there a man who ne'er has known,
 Or sorrow or misfortune's frown,
 Felt the keen throbs of misery's moan,
 Here let him stop:
 That while he contemplates this stone,
 One tear may drop.

Who on life's gently flowing tide,
 Secure from ill can prosperous ride,
 Or smoothly down its current glide,
 In hours of peace:
 Hence let him learn, how great his pride,
 Such joys may cease.

Beneath, one Mies, while fortune smiled,
 And all passed happy, gay, and mild,
 In youth's career with spirits wild,
 Could sportive play;
 Till care and sorrow came and spoiled
 His cheerful day.

Whose heart could beat, whose eye could flow,
 At other's grief, at other's woe;
 Whose breast in sympathy could glow,
 And not in vain:
 'Twas but to hear, 'twas but to know,
 And soothe their pain.

Till poverty's relentless hand,
 Shook over him an Ebon wand,
 Till stern adversity's command,
 Repressed his power;
 Withheld his means and stopp'd his hand,
 In luckless hour.

Hence let him learn before too late,
 However wise, or good, or great,
 Howe'er with health or wealth elate,
 To be aware:
 There's hid in life's uncertain state,
 Full many a snare.

Here let him sit beside this tomb,
 This last retreat, this little home
 Of frail mortality the doom,
 And pensive strike
 His bosom, for the time will come;
 He'll share the like.

CRITICISM.

LATIN ORTHOEPEY.

There is scarcely any subject involved in greater security than the pronunciation of ancient languages. For a language has ceased to be spoken as a vernacular tongue, we can hardly expect that its former pronunciation should long be retained; but that, in every entry where some knowledge of it is preserved, the pronunciation will be modelled, in some degree, according to the rules of their own language. This, I believe, will be found to be the case, to a very considerable degree, with respect to the ancient language of Rome. In reply to the inquiry of GRAMMATICUS, in last Saturday's Iris, I beg leave to say, that the genuine pronunciation of the Latin language is undoubtedly lost, but that stronger traces of it are probably to be found in the European countries than in others. Those, for example, whose languages are obviously derived more immediately from the Latin, may be expected to retain some of the peculiarities of the ancient tongue, their vowel sounds will, in all probability, be nearly the same. If we are to judge, then, by this standard, we shall be naturally led to look to the Italian as most nearly allied of any of the continental tongues to the ancient language of their country; and we shall be prepared to expect that their men of learning will more nearly approximate than those of any other European nation to the ancient standard of Latin orthoepey. I am not sufficiently versed in Italian literature to enable me to decide whether their pronunciation of the vowel sounds of their own language has been borrowed from the Latin, or whether their modern pronunciation of Latin has not been made to coincide with their vernacular tongue. But if we shall find, that in the pronunciation of Latin, there is a striking similarity in the majority of the continental nations, however remote from each other, and however little their reciprocal intercourse may have been, we shall then be led to conclude that the pronunciation which has been most generally adopted is undoubtedly the one that is most nearly allied to the ancient standard. It is a remarkable fact, therefore, that, as far as my observation extends, there is a very striking coincidence in their pronunciation of Latin, among natives of every part of Europe. England alone deviates from the continental standard, while Scotland coincides with it as nearly as the inhabitants of some neighbouring shires do in their pronunciation of the English language. With respect to myself, the Scotch and English pronunciation of the Latin are equally familiar, and I can either employ the one, or the other as circumstances may require. But in conversing in Latin with natives of France and Italy, of Holland and Germany, of Hungary, Poland, and Sweden, I have found that I was intelligible, only when I adopted the Scottish pronunciation; and the slight differences which I noticed, were not such as to occasion us much inconvenience. It is evident, therefore, that the English pronunciation of Latin is a perfect anomaly; and seeing it is, in almost every respect, so consonant to the genius of English orthoepey, any one, however little acquainted with the subject, will naturally conclude, that we have modelled our pronunciation of Latin agreeably to the rules of our own language, rather than that the English tongue, which, through a long succession of ages, has been gradually approaching to its present standard, should have retained any of the peculiarities of the language of ancient Rome, with which it has so little immediate connexion. But I am at a loss to conceive upon what ground any one can suppose that our pronunciation of Latin is at all similar to that of antiquity, when it is so well known, that in the course of a few centuries the English itself has materially altered its pronunciation. The pronunciation of our tongue which prevailed in the age of our maiden Queen, is now to be found in greater perfection in the dialects that are spoken at a distance from the capital, and even in Scotland itself, than in our seminaries of learning and our schools of eloquence.

Much interesting information on the subject of Latin orthoepey will be found in the introduction to Walker's Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names, and also in the remarks of Ainsworth on the several letters of the alphabet in the quarto edition of his Dictionary. In some particulars, it is evident that the moderns have deviated from the true Roman pronunciation, and in nothing more notoriously than in giving a soft pronunciation to the letters c and g, when coming before e and i. We have good reason to believe that the name of the father of Roman eloquence was neither Sisero, as we denominate him, nor Tschichero, as he is called by the Italians, but Kikero. It is hardly reasonable to think that the orators of the age of Augustus made no distinction between malus and malus; and yet, in our pronunciation, and as far as I know, in the pronunciation of other Europeans also, these words are undistinguishable. Our adoption of the soft pronunciation of the letter c is confessedly at variance with ancient usage, and introduces a strange confusion and ambiguity in the language as addressed to the ear. Cædo and sedo, capi and sepi, causæ and sensu, cicer and siser, cygni and signi, cena and ecena, with many others, have with us the same identical sound.

I beg leave here to correct a slight mistake, into which GRAMMATICUS has fallen in his quotation from Mr. Walker. It is not Grotius but Scaliger, of whom he relates the anecdote; and Mr. Walker thinks the diversity between the Scotch and continental pronunciation, as illustrated by the anecdote, is greatly exaggerated.

The communications of S. X. are generally marked by so much good sense that I should be sorry that this paper should supersede any which he may furnish on this subject; and should this meet his eye before he has thought of replying to GRAMMATICUS, I would request him to favour us with his remarks, notwithstanding, on the subject here imperfectly handled.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ON THE ART OF READING.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR.—No study seems to be more neglected in this town than that of Reading. I have known inquiries to be made in vain for a teacher properly qualified to give instruction in this very interesting and valuable acquisition. I should think it would be well worth the while of any person fully capable, to offer his assistance to those who wish to study the art upon systematic principles. I have reasons for believing that such a person would experience much encouragement.

I am, Sir, Your's &c. J. L.

ON THE NEW INSTITUTION FOR SCIENCE AND THE ARTS.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—The writer who, in a recent number of the Iris, gave us some very interesting particulars respecting the Andersonian Institution of Glasgow, seemed, in his objections, to labour under some misconception when he assumed that the hereditary governors are to have free admission to every course of lectures delivered in the New Institution; an arrangement which would be palpably destructive of those objects which mainly contributed to the formation of this very promising establishment. The hereditary governors are certainly not to have access to any lectures but those which may be regularly paid for by the funds of the Institution. If a person engage the room for a course of lectures which he may deliver on his own account, he will, of course, retain the right of excluding every person who does not purchase his admittance upon the ordinary terms. By such lectures, therefore, the funds of the Institution will be enriched, but the hereditary governors will not receive, and ought not to receive, any advantage. They can have no reasonable claim upon lectures, excepting those which are paid for by the trustees.

By this latter species of lectures the Institution will certainly be impoverished, unless they take place very seldom; and if this be the case the hereditary governors will find, I suspect, that their great privileges are only nominal; by engrossing too much in appearance, they will possess too little in reality; a circumstance owing to the hasty, but certainly well-meant, measures, which were adopted at the public meeting.

I hope your ingenious correspondent will again turn his attention to the affair: we might, I venture to think, have fairly expected from authority, some explanations upon the subject after the publication of his very plausible objection; and I feel persuaded, that when his observations, which have already excited much attention, are duly weighed, they will occasion some alterations in the arrangements, which will diminish the apparent, and increase the real privileges, of the governors of the Institution.

My best wishes, Sir, are for the prosperity of this most desirable establishment. I, therefore, observe with deep concern the misconceptions which are proved to have existed by the letter above referred to, and which, I fear, are likely, if not speedily removed, to lead to still further misunderstandings.

I know that it is utterly impossible for human ingenuity to devise any plan against which an inveterate caviller cannot frame a species of objection; but this circumstance ought not to induce us to omit paying due attention to a serious defect in any of our schemes, when it has been pointed out in a plain, candid, and respectful manner.

A FRIEND TO THE INSTITUTION.

Manchester, Oct. 28th, 1823.

[The following letter, which has been handed to us by a correspondent, we willingly insert, as it will derive some interest from the circumstance of its being the production of a youth, and of local curiosity to our Manchester readers, from a knowledge that he left this town, to settle in that great colony, and though divided by the immensity of waters from old scenes, they appear feelingly to have recurred to him.—ED.]

Cape of Good Hope, March, 1823.

One Sunday morning, before church time, I strolled as far as Sea Point—the weather was remarkably fine—the sun shone in all its splendour—the sky was clear, save a few white clouds which were here and there scattered about by a gentle North West wind, which was then blowing lightly into the bay, and in some measure diminished the treat which would otherwise have been almost intolerable. Having reached the verge of the sea, I rambled about from one rock to another, till I found one whereon I thought I could sit and take a little rest. This was a part which projected a little further out into the sea than the neighbouring rocks, on the extremity of which was a smooth part, where I sat down, and fell into a state of lethargic cogitation. About ten fathoms further out into the sea, were a few rocks under water: these break a considerable part of the swell, which was then beginning to increase and become larger,—presently an immense swell broke over the invisible rocks, which roused me from my reverie, and I found it was too near for me to retire in time to escape it, so I sat still expecting to have a good wetting. It came rolling on almost level with the place on which I was seated. This caused me to sit firm and prepare for the worst; when, to my great satisfaction and surprise, instead of the spray bursting upon me, it all spread around me, and left me dry as it were on an island. Finding that I could sit in this place unmolested and undisturbed by the raging billows of the ocean, I took out my prayer book, (being the only book I then had in my pocket) and opened on the 137 Psalm, which I chanted forth in a most masterly style, to the particular and affecting tune which I had often heard applied to it when within the walls of the Collegiate church at Manchester. The ideas that now entered my mind, having just finished singing, were so numerous and confused, that were I ever to attempt to describe them, I should soon find myself completely lost and bewildered.—On rising, I discovered in the horizon a small white speck, which I immediately took for the sails of a vessel, and as the wind was then increasing rapidly, and blowing exactly fair for her coming in, my doubts on that subject were soon at an end; so after waiting half an hour musing and framing many curious notions in my heated brain, I beheld her distant form.—As time was rolling on, and would be, ere I reached town, full late for church, I made all possible speed, and arrived just as the church-bell was calling the last time for all good people to come and attend Divine service. Thus ended my morning's walk, and, as I entered the church, my pleasing melancholy musings subsided and gave way to the more delightful solace, found in the adoration of the Almighty. UNCLE TRIM.

VARIETIES.

MR. HUGHES' CONCERT, THEATRE-ROYAL.—Mr. Hughes of our Town, had his benefit Concerts, on Monday and Tuesday evenings last, which drew numerous and highly respectable audiences.—Mrs. Salmon, Mr. Broadhurst, and Mr. Philips, were the chief attractions, and Mrs. Hyde, (who was, for the first time, announced to appear in public)—Mr. Philips, who is a great favourite in London, proved that the partiality of the Metropolitan connoisseurs was not misplaced, he has a sweet and powerful voice; and his pronunciation is remarkably intelligible. No eulogy of our's can add to the well-earned praise of Mrs. Salmon, but she had not that appointed to her performance, in which (in our untutored opinion, at least) she most excels—the chaste, unvarnished native airs—she was rapturously encored, and what she had to do was done, with her wonted excellence.—The sympathy of the house accompanied Mrs. Hyde on her debut—her diffidence almost amounted to panic, and notwithstanding the sustaining power of a generous audience, she had nearly sunk under the effort. In a subsequent gle, however, she elicited much sweetness of voice. But we must not be accused of a deficiency in gallantry towards the ladies, if we say that Mr. Broadhurst's "John Anderson my Joe" distanced all competition; whether we admired the sweetness of the air, the simplicity of the song, the affection it breathes, or the touching pathos with which it was delivered—it was electric; and the audience testified the impression which that gentleman had so magically communicated, by an enthusiastic encore.

Mr. Mori astonished his hearers in his concerto by shewing what may be performed on that small but intricate instrument, the violin,—his execution, throughout, particularly on the upper notes, was great—and we congratulate Mr. Hughes on the highly distinguished countenance he has, and so deservedly, received.

ANATOMICAL STAYS.—We have perused a treatise on these stays, by MRS. LLOYD GIBBON, which seems to challenge scepticism—and from the highly respectable and illustrious testimonies annexed to it, we should have no hesitation in recommending to our fair readers, their use, as the most certain proof of their benefit.—We are not hasty in our conclusions, as we depart from our habitual customs, to insert what we deem of advantage to female comfort and voice.—See advertisement.

A Gentleman of the Newmarket connexion was one evening very officiously employed in assisting a company of Ladies to the attentions of the Tea Table.

In the plenitude of his politeness he was about to repair the deficiency of eatables, by conveying a Plate of Toast from the fire without consulting the warmth of the crockery which held it. As soon therefore as he had raised it, his fingers abandoned their hold,—the plate was demolished and the contents scattered.

He wittily, however turned the laugh of the company by saying, "I have got the Heat, but I have lost the Plate!"

INGENIOUS ANAGRAM.

Our Saviour was asked
Quid est veritas?
What is Truth?
he replied
Vir est qui adest.

The man who is present with you.

The answer comprising every letter of the question.

COOKE.—The late George Frederick Cooke was known to be guilty of great irregularities and often improprieties, when instigated by the excess of the bottle,—on one of these occasions, presuming on the freedom which his popularity, he thought, might licence him in using, when drinking with a party of gentlemen in a respectable wine vault, he applied some very coarse epithets to a spirited young man near him, who having with great patience submitted to his invective for a considerable time, at last rose to depart, and was struck by Cooke as he was retiring; this was not to be borne, and the young man in returning the blow brought the head of the performer in contact with a pane of the window, which it literally dashed to atoms.—This circumstance sobered Cooke, who was instantly collared by the same young man and turned out at the door; after a moment's deliberate reflection, and finding that he was to blame, he approached the shattered window, took off his hat and looking through the pane said "Gentlemen I crave your pardon, and find I have been to blame, but now I see through my Error!" Good humour succeeded to the joke and Cooke was readmitted.

ANATOMICAL STAYS.

By the King's Letters Patent.

MRS. LLOYD GIBBON, of London, respectfully announces to the Ladies her arrival in Manchester, where they may be immediately supplied with her ANATOMICAL STAYS, by the King's Royal Letters, Patent; which are particularly recommended as affording great support to the Back and Chest, without pressure, and giving an inclination to hold the figure erect.

At no period of time have Ladies more required good stays, than at the present, from the late injurious fashion of stooping, and that extreme expansion of the shoulders which is now considered so inelegant.

The patent stays rectify all imperfections of figure, with greater care and comfort than any thing yet offered to the public.

Mrs. Lloyd Gibbon's Stays have the sanction and recommendation of the most eminent surgeons, for those who are weak and imperfect in the spine or shoulder,—to be had only of Mrs. Lloyd Gibbon, during her residence at Mrs. Barwick's, 37 A, George Street, opposite St. James's Church, Manchester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 has been handed to us by his friend, and his observations are really as painful to us, as those would appear to have been to him which he presumes personally to allude to him.—We do assure him that the IRIS never was nor ever will, knowingly, be the vehicle of private malevolence,—but we have seen the person who acknowledges himself the author, and who disclaims in toto, the imputation.—Had it been otherwise, the general character of the gentleman, who has thus unhappily taken offence, is represented to us to be to far the reverse of what the paragraph alluded to depicts, that we are surprised he could for a moment draw so unfavorable a similitude.—It is not long ago we were charged with a similar offence, although the article was copied from the "LONDON MIRROR," and was acknowledged by us as "quoted from that work."—Too much liberality cannot be extended to those who are in an editorial capacity, nor too much censure attached to any one who, availing himself of the ignorance of a Journalist, on the real subject of his communication, should incorporate matter which has a reference to other objects beyond those of amusement.—We trust this explanation will be satisfactory, and that our correspondent will be induced to look upon the affair, with less asperity and bitterness of feeling.

Executioner of King Charles the 1st.—There has, of late been considerable discussion relative to the personage who decapitated this unfortunate monarch, under which it is inserted on the authority of Spaul, secretary to Cromwell, that the individual was Colonel Joyce; this was crowned by Liberty before the first parliament of King Charles the second.—Our Correspondent A. M. S. has forwarded to us a Tale we have before met with, ascribing the act to a nobleman, who received it from his great grandfather's own mouth on his death-bed, at the amazing age of one hundred and twenty-five years—there is, however, a great improbability in the story as he must have been quite a stripling at that period—the probability is, that it never will be known—that it was not the Common Executioner there can be no doubt—otherwise the precaution of the mask would have been unnecessary—the person who in our own day, had that duty to perform on the Cart-street conspirators, was similarly concerned from public observation—for our parts we think that the author of this tragical act is better unknown, as it would lead only to fix an odium on those who bear the same name, as Sir William Wallace's betrayer is to this day, in Scotland, despised and execrated.

We would gladly have availed ourselves of the offer made us by an esteemed friend, but we think any selections from Dr. Young's Night Thoughts would be unpardonable, and we fear it would also be insulting to the judgement of our readers.

In consequence of the great space which we have appropriated to the account of Captain Parry's Expedition, we are compelled to relinquish our intention of the insertion of several valuable articles from correspondents, received this week.

A WEEK IN LONDON.

Written for the Iris.

"There is but one LONDON in the World," said Marshal Prince Blucher as he viewed it from the Telegraph at the Admiralty,—and it was in the month of September when my business called me to the metropolis, where I had before repeatedly been, and I thought I could not better give my wife a treat than by taking her with me to this world of wonders; the suggestion was no sooner thrown out, than the journey was prepared for, and never perhaps was so much accomplished in such a limited period. Our progress was marked by nothing worthy of particular notice, but the heavy exactions on the road, which the inexperienced traveller suffers much by, and the coach stopped on the remote line of Bedfordshire, whilst the passengers were gratified by those interesting objects, of nature, the light of the glow-worm, and the strains of the nightingale.

We were a good deal wearied on our arrival, and early betook ourselves to rest, rising betimes in the morning, to avail ourselves of that part of the day which is best suited for a stranger's research.

Our business lay with two distinguished members of His Majesty's Government, and occasions were numerous which presented themselves to gratify our curiosity in a superior degree over most other travellers, and we were received with the most marked attention by the eminent individuals alluded to, who by a solemn pledge to pursue our object to a successful conclusion, released us from all anxiety, and gave us an unbounded licence to pursue our pleasures without inconvenience or restraint. From the unfortunate Marquis of L—— we received orders for admission into the House of Lords which he procured from a noble Peer purposely for us, and also to the House of Commons from the Right Honorable ——, and from both a regular supply of franks for our communications to our friends. Females are excluded the privilege of attending the debates, and I had consequently to take the day or that purpose. There is nothing remarkable in the interior of the House of Commons, and it appears to be cherished more from its antiquity than its decorations; it forms that part of Westminster Abbey which was dedicated to St. Stephen, and possesses just comfortable conveniences for the august body who assemble there. It is curious for a stranger to listen to the speeches delivered there, and to see the carelessness of many, and the indifference of all; w of the Members take off their hats, except one who is delivering his sentiments and a great majority sit or loll in most unbecoming reverence. In the House of Lords much more decorum is observed; the bench of Bishops who are in their robes, and the presence of the Lord Chancellor, and Princes of the Blood royal, tend to give a solemnity and to command a veneration, unknown in the other House. Around these walls is a valuable tapestry representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada, and at the upper part a superb Throne surmounted by the Crown, and an elegant canopy of crimson velvet, on the back is embossed most exquisitely, the Royal Arms, the whole of which was erected on his present Majesty's accession to the throne; the richness of the drapery defies description. Departing hence we descended into Westminster Hall, the largest room in the world unsupported by pillars, and man feels his own insignificance most sensibly in traversing its immense space; at the upper end are the four Courts, and here may be seen streaming through the vast void, the long robed fraternity, with their wigs and bags, or holding sapient converse on the "glorious uncertainties" of the undefined laws of England. Having admired this astonishing piece of architecture we proceeded to the Abbey, and entered at Poet's Corner, where are the monuments to the memory of the British Bards—this of itself would be a subject for some hours contemplation: it was prayer time, and the chaunting of the choir, accompanied by the noble organ, gave a deep solemnity to the contemplative mind; we walked leisurely along the sacred aisles surrounded every where by the most splendid monuments, many of which have been defaced by rude hands, and unfeeling hearts—by wretches on whose souls the ray of science has never shone, and who must be dead to all feeling of genius or patriotism. As soon as the service was over we paid the required amount of 2s. 6d. to be shewn throughout—a tribute given by most with great reluctance, as it is undoubtedly a reflection on the national dignity to extort from the natives of England a payment for the indulgence of seeing those works of art, which they themselves have been instrumental in erecting: among other splendid monuments you are shewn two exquisitely wrought brass gates, the Chapel where the Knights of the Garter are installed, each knight having his banner and helmet hanging over his stall—the fret work and mosaic marble pavement are rich specimens of art; but what would well occupy a day of minute study is Henry the Seventh's Chapel, which Cardinal Wolsey began as a mausoleum for himself, but which was finished by King Henry at an immense cost,—to a contemplative mind this superb sepulchre furnishes a melancholy picture of the instability of human greatness—the nothingness of human pride,—the princely head, which late a diadem encircled, has long been shorn of its glory, and the proud heart on which the resplendent star of royalty shone, has been made a bed for the worm; such were our reflections when the guide, who observes an indecent rapidity, hurried us on to other objects; he led us to a folding door, which suddenly opening, presents to the startled view the immortal Nelson in wax work, as large as life, habited in the very clothes in which he closed his honourable career, with the exception of the coat, which is a fac-simile, the family objecting to grant it, but the honours which are emblazoned on it are the originals—a pin at one corner of the Epaulette on the left shoulder marks the spot where the fatal ball entered; his waistcoat and breeches are of white kerseymere, his stockings raw silk, and his shoes are surmounted with gold buckles—at his feet lies his hat. Near this hangs the armour of General Monk, who brought back King Charles the Second to the Throne of his ancestors. Not the least interesting sight in this venerable fabric is the spot where those two great political opponents, Pitt and Fox, lie side by side, there being only a few feet of earth between them,—and here again philosophy might have scope for reflection—they who so often were engaged in the warmth of national argument, pouring out streams of eloquent effusion, which so often amounted to hostile collision, are now speechless, and powerless in their "narrow cell,"—the stones which cover them bear the simple letters of W. P. and C. J. F. but there is a noble monument erected to Mr. Pitt, and another to his illustrious rival is about to add to the thousand which adorn this edifice. It would be impossible for any one not actually a spectator, to conceive the awful solemnity and rich magnificence of this great structure—the attention is arrested at every step, and the eye is never wearied; this ancient building has for some years been fast falling to decay, but the Dean and Chapter have voted a large sum, and Government have lately granted £10,000 to arrest the progress of time's dilapidating hand; considerable progress has already been made in its restoration.

We "cast a longing lingering look behind" as we slowly and reluctantly withdrew, and proceeded through the cloisters, to the Treasury, an immense but inelegant building, which however, is abundantly commodious, and thence to the Horse Guards.

There is a parade in St. James' Park every forenoon which is always attended by a numerous concourse of spectators, the admirable band, playing fine military airs, and their flag, which is fetched by a detachment from the line with great ceremony, bore in its centre a wreath of laurel, embroidered, and in gold letters around it—Badajos, Vineira, Ciudad-Rodrigo, Salamanca, Talavera, Vittoria, Pyrenees, Orthes, Thoulouse,—and in the laurel wreath, Waterloo; these relieve Guard at the Royal Residences, and it is well worthy the visit of a stranger. The Horse Guards itself forms one of the entrances to the Park, and is a handsome and commodious building, adjoining which is the Admiralty, with the Telegraph on the top, by which in clear weather communications are made to, and received from, the out ports in a few minutes. Opposite the great entrance from the Horse Guards is erected the celebrated mortar cast by order of Marshal Soult to throw bombs into Cadiz, a distance of four miles, and an inscription upon it expressive of the gratitude of the Spanish nation to his Majesty, to whom it was sent as a present; the large Gun is also at one end, mounted on Egyptian sphinxes, and is remarkable for its curious workmanship. The walks are particularly fine, and are lined with trees the whole way; proceeding towards St. James' Palace you are struck with the Pagoda and Bridge over the Serpentine River, erected in honour of the visit of the allied Monarchs to this country, when it was brilliantly illuminated, and though the erection was considered temporary, it has been suffered to remain, as it has been found a great public convenience. St. James', at which you arrive at the termination of the walk, is a plain, heavy, brick building, and has no appearance whatever of being the residence of even a nobleman—it is of great antiquity, but the interior presents ample accommodations for public levees, and many of the rooms are superbly furnished.

In the Stable Yard of the palace are apartments for several of the Royal Dukes when resident in town, and a vast collection of antiquities are shown to the visitors.

(To be continued.)

ON A WISH TO RETIRE INTO THE COUNTRY.

At secura quies, et nescia fallere vita,
Dives opum variorum; at laeta otia fundis,
Speluncæ, vivique lacus; at frigida Tempe,
Magnæque boum, mollisque sub arbore somni
Non abeunt. Virg. Georg. lib. 1, v. 467, &c.

Long in vain I've sought to find
A rural mansion to my mind;
Oft I've rang'd the country o'er,
But could never yet explore
A convenient situation,
On whose lofty elevation,
I might build a handsome seat—
There to enjoy the pleasures sweet
Of a peaceful country life,
Far from the bustle and the strife
Of the town's tumultuous noise,
And all its satiating joys.

Oh! might I have my heart's desire,
To the country I'd retire;
There I'd buy a small estate,
Nor too little, nor too great,
A few acres in extent,
Unincumber'd with chief-rent;
The distance from the town should be,
A pleasant walk—miles two or three.
Then I would a spot select,
On which a house I might erect.
On some rising eminence,
There I'd fix my residence;
Modern it should be and neat,
Devoid of every strange conceit.
Taste should through the whole pervade,
Handsome, yet without parade.
The garden and the pleasure ground
Should with the fairest flowers abound,
And perfume all the air around.
And the orchard should bring forth
The choicest fruit of finest growth.—
Let the distant hills around
Be the landscape's utmost bound,
And the spacious plain between,
Blending light with darker green.
Add to this whate'er conduces
To please the fancy, or for use is.

Here in such a snug retreat,
I'd shun the follies of the great;
And from the faults of others, learn
The same myself to 'scape in turn.
From every plant or flower, derive
A useful lesson how to live.
My sole employment should be this,—
To study Nature as she is.
Oft would I seek the lonely cell,
Where Contemplation loves to dwell,
And in a sober garb array'd,
I'd gently woo the silent maid:
'Till thoughts sublime my senses close,
And lull my soul to sweet repose.

ANTIQUITIES OF FREEMASONRY.

We have read a very excellent criticism on a publication of the Rev. George Oliver, Vicar of Clee, in the county of Lincoln, who, in attempting to rescue his favourite institution from all possible imputations, by proving it to be of all other institutions the wisest, oldest, purest, and best, has laid himself open to some laughable sarcasms from a writer in the Literary Museum. Amongst other drolleries, the witty reviewer takes notice to observe, that Mr. O. labours hard to trace masonry further than the creation of Adam, assuring his reader that if any men had existed before that patriarch, they must infallibly have been masons—and remarks, that it reminds him of the Welshman, who in tracing his origin through a long volume of manuscript, was not satisfied when completed, and inserted a note at the end "About this time the World was created"!!!

To those who are masons however a notice of their Reverend Brother's zeal will not be unpleasing, and to those who are not, it may afford some satisfaction to know what the principles are they profess—we give them as we find them recorded by a dignified member of that mystical conclave, with our ardent wish that they may so teach, that their

"Good Light may be seen by all men."

He commences with what is requisite for a good mason—

Honour and probity, diligence and assiduity, truth and fidelity, years' learning and experience, are unitedly necessary to constitute "a good and virtuous Mason;" for Masonry is the perfection of all the arts and sciences. As a knowledge of medicine, astronomy, morality, and legislation, formed the great essentials of the ancient mysteries; so faith, hope, and charity, temperance, fortitude, prudence, and justice, form constituent parts of the ONE science of Masonry, which has been held in the greatest estimation in every age of the world.

Under the head of symbolical instruction, we have the following clear and satisfactory explanation of Masonic symbols:

From the chequered ground-work of a Mason's lodge to its splendid and celestial covering, it contains no point, part, or secret, which does not convey a fund of valuable information. The Mason in his full clothing is a striking emblem of integrity, and a perfect model of wisdom, strength, and beauty. The white apron, gloves, and wand, which are characteristic of his profession, have a direct reference to the innocence and purity with which he ought to be invested, by an adherence to the invaluable lessons which they contain.

The Bible, square, and compass point out the sacred source of his faith, and the rectitude of his practice; for while the former, which is always open in the lodge, is considered the rule and standard of his faith and hope, the two latter have the same reference to his life and actions.

The compass is appropriated to the Grand Master, as the supreme governor of the institution, because it is the most comprehensive and useful instrument in forming plans and designs, which belong exclusively to his province: for on the art and judgment with which he applies this instrument depend the general beauty and harmony of the whole. The square belongs to the brethren in general, because their obligations are founded upon, and they are consequently bound to square their actions by, the principles of virtue and right reason. From these visible symbols Masonry teaches, in its beautiful and expressive phraseology, to keep within compass, and act upon the square with all mankind, but more particularly with brethren.

The jewels, both moveable and immovable, have a significant reference to what is most dear and valuable to man in his mortal state; exposed, as he is, to sorrow, sickness, pain, and adversity. The square is an instrument by which truth and perfection are attained in all manner of architecture; and consequently recommends morality and justice in all our commerce with mankind. The level is an emblem of equality, and demonstrates, that as we are descended from the same stock, partake of the same nature, and share the same hope, we ought strictly to render unto others the same measure of kindness and affection which, in similar circumstances, we should require of them. The plumb is an emblem of integrity, and admonishes us to walk uprightly in our station; to hold the scale of justice in equal poise; to observe the happy medium between intemperance and rigid self-denial; and to make our passions and prejudices coincide with the straight line of duty. The tracing board refers to the correct plans and designs traced by the great Architect of the Universe in the Holy Bible, which constitute the summit and perfection of a Mason's faith and hope. We have also other emblematical jewels, to denote the mind of man, in its progress from infancy to old age, from ignorance to knowledge. In the dawn of life, uneducated nature feels its own inferiority, and is like a rough and shapeless stone newly taken from the quarry, which requires the skilful hand of patient industry to mould it into form. Manhood succeeds, and the ripening faculties, emulating perfection, press on with diligence and assiduity, to the great object of rational attainment. And when old age comes on, the placid mind, reflecting on a well spent life, devoted to acts of piety and virtue, looks forward to another and a better state of existence, where, infinitely perfect, it will be filled with the fullness of God. This state of mind may be aptly compared to a well wrought and highly polished cubical stone, accurately exact in all its lines and angles! which though minutely tried with the square and compass, will be pronounced good, perfect, and complete.

The most brilliant virtue prudence is represented in a Mason's Lodge by a blazing star, which is placed in the centre that every Mason's eye may be upon it, to expand his heart and influence his actions; that his conscience may never condemn him for exceeding the bounds which prudence prescribes, and that he may always be animated with the cheering reflection of its unqualified approbation.

The groundwork of a Lodge points out the recurrence of prosperity and adversity with which the life of man is variegated and chequered; and administers the most soothing consolation under the pressure of calamity or affliction.

The covering of a Lodge is that superb canopy spread over it by the Almighty Creator of all things. The blue, purple, and crimson covering of the first temple, erected to the exclusive worship of God by Moses in the wilderness, was a striking symbol of this splendid arch, illuminated with the rays of that great and burning luminary which conveys life, light, and motion to all earthly things. The ground and covering are connected by means of a ladder consisting of three principal steps, and resting on the Holy Bible; by which a Mason, who firmly exercises the virtues they represent, hopes to leave behind the unsatisfactory pursuits of mortality.

The history of Masonry is then traced down, with a marvellous minuteness and unquestionable accuracy, to the time of King of Solomon. The erection of the temple appears to be the greatest of all epochs in masonic annals. We will not deprive our readers of the knowledge of how much this magnificent production of Masonry cost:

If we take the valuation of the talent from Vilipandus, the expense of the building and ornaments amounted to 6,904,322,500*l.* sterling! The value of the gold vessels alone was 545,296,203*l.* sterling, and the silver ones 439,344,000*l.* Added to this were the wages, provisions, and other necessities for 150,000 workmen and 70,000 slaves, for upwards of seven years; besides 300 grand masters, and 3,300 overseers, to whom, in addition to their wages, King Solomon presented, as a free gift, 6,763,977*l.*

FARE THEE WELL.

"Ah! cruel Heaven, that made no cure for love."
DRYDEN'S VIRGIL.

Fare thee well, sweet girl, for ever,—
Farewell hopes which late were bright;
O that those our persons sever
Could th' affections disunite!
Since all earthly bliss is fleeting,
Would this heart was made of stone,
Which, though broken, yet is beating,
Beating still for thee alone!
Whilst it throbs, a lover's anguish
Deep within conceal'd most lie;
Long as life it there may languish,
But till death can never die.
Oft my soul will seek to borrow—
Rest from torment, ease from pain,
But must see each rising morrow,
Bring an aching heart again!
And at each poor weak endeavour
To repel corroding care,
Feel that dreadful thought for ever
Gnawing like a vulture there.
Much too busy recollection
Will prevent a happier day—
See, in painful retrospection,
Joys for ever pass'd away.
Now we must, like those who travel,
Diff'rent roads thro' life pursue;
May each stage to thee unravel
Some delightful scene to view!
But when time has far remov'd thee,
Wilt thou not against thy will Think of him who long has lov'd thee,—
Pity him who loves thee still?
Fancy then shall see thee trying
Inward sorrow to conceal,
Oft methinks shall hear thee sighing
O'er the wounds thou canst not heal.
Peace, my dearest—cease repining,
This prophetic eye can see
Providence is yet designing
Future happiness for thee.
Then for what I feel I care not,
Welcome, sorrow—come despair;
Grief is gladness—death I fear not—
Answer'd is my fervent pray'r.
Fare thee well! May some kind spirit,
Hovering o'er thee, guard thee still,
Make thee truest peace inherit,
Safely guide from ev'ry ill.
Solid bliss to thee discover,
Till the solemn fun'ral knell
Tells for thee this care is over—
Tells a final "Fare thee well!"

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

From the Literary Gazette.

Tic tac, tic tac, quick quack, ric rac, Jim crack, tweed! 'em de—
And sing-a-ring-a-ting, to clink the chink's the music still for me.

"Ha, ha, ha!" chuckled Sam Halliards; "Haugh, haugh, haugh!" roared Tom Pipes, on seeing an ancient Israelite with his shop, i. e. his petit bi-joux box, on his back, advancing from the College towards the Prize Pay Office. They remember'd old times, when these rats practised their arts and nibbled up the hard-earned substance of all jolly Tars, under the moderate advantage of sheat per sheat. "C'est un bon jen," said old Sam, who had pick'd up a little bad French while a prisoner at Verdun—"C'est un bon jen: and by the piper of war 'tis old Solomon Sohernbac, that used to live near the Blue Posts on Portsmouth Point! Solomon, my old buck, how are you?" "Vera vell, tank you, ma deer."—"That's right, my hart; and how does the world wag, Solomon?"—"Like de litle boys in de merry-go-round at de fair—dem as vat got de penny, ride in de coach; dem as got no more as von ha-penny, ride on de horse; and dem, to whom a far-thing is moneish, tramp troo de mud, and run round mid de rest. Oh, de varld is just like de merry-go-round!"—"Why, that puts me in mind (says Tom) of the volunteer blackguards of Yankee town, when the ivory sergeant tells 'em to fall in: Hear-a, all you hab one shoe, one tocking, tan in de front; all you hab no shoe, no tocking, tan in de centre; all you hab yam foot jiggery-toe, tan in de rear." But how is it you're crawling about here, Solomon, like a snail with your shop on your shoulders? You ought to have made your fortune, and retired to your country-house. I've known you un juif mechant ever since I first went to sea a boy."—"Yes, I have been de Jew merchant ven I was no more high dan dis shtick. I came from Hollands ven I vas litlel baby: but country-house! No, no, I am very poor man."—"Come from Hollands, eh? Well, I always thought you a spirited fellow—above proof; but take care you arn't caught in a gin at last."—"Aye, aye, (says Tom,) he'll have a country-house before long, for the county jail is fitting up for him."—"Get along mid your vaggery, I never sheated a shoni in my life."—"That's very likely, (says Sam;) but there's many a poor body has play'd a losing game through your dealings, else you wouldn't be making head-way to yon Office."—"Vat you insult me? Go as your ways; but shopt, vill you buy a good vatch?"—"Watch, Solomon? No, no, I've had watches enough in my time, without buying one now. You don't recollect me, I see. What, have you forgotten the old Triumph, and the para-shoot descent you had from the foregratings to the cockpit?—shop, watches, colifichets, and—"—"Ha! vat vas you one of de rogueshat dat s'teal ma proprietieah mid your gally-fish-hooks? Forget it? never. I losht more as von hunder pounds."—"Avast there, Solomon, avast! Didn't the ships company make it up to you?—they had their frolic and you your money."—"Upon ma consience dat shlipt ma memory; but 'tvas almost cosht ma life."—"What was it? (said Tom Pipes.) Come, Sam, let's have it, and then our honest friend here shall treat us with a glass a-piece for old acquaintance sake."—"Vat me! Blessh ma heart! blessh ma heart! Vy, I've got no more as von twopence in de varld;" but observing a handsome silver medal suspended from Tom's neck, he hastily added, "Vat vill you take for dat, ma deer?"—"Ha! ha! (says Tom,) twopence won't buy it, old Shylock; 'twas gained with my blood, and I've too much flesh about my heart to part with it."—"Vera vell, I musht go, deer."—"No, no, let's have Sam's story, and you shall stand by and correct him if his memory should fail; for to give the devil his jaw, I do not think you would willingly tell the truth."—"Not for the varld, not for the varld; but 'tish getting late, and the Oflah will be closed."—"Just as I suspected, eh?—the old song to a new tune—

'Oh that the bullets may scuttle his nob,
For I've got his will and power.'

But come, come; Faire un bon mine a mauvais jen."—"That's a jen de mot," says Sam. "Mo! vat you mean? Mo! my name is Solomonah." What your christian name?"—"Bah! give me ma box, and let me go as my ways."—"So you shall presently, but I must hear the story first."—"Blessh ma heart give me ma box, I say—I will call for help."—"Do, my old Mo-a-bite, and bring down a whole host of Philistines upon you."—"Vat are you going arter?"—"Toussien vee, and let's have the story."—"Ah! you vill teach me to death."—"Why, d'y'e see, (says Sam,) we were laying moored at Spithead: Captain L— commanded us then; and Will Scott, Jack Armstrong, and old Harry Bartlett, bought each of them a watch of Solomon here. But soon after there was a stoppage in their insides; the balance-wheel had no motion, and then they discovered best part of the bowels were wanting. The complaint at last became general, so they determined to play the rogue a trick."—"Vera vell? 'tish all vera pretta!"—"Why you know 'tis true, Solomon. Well, pay-day came, and he was permitted to be a board with all his traps; and so he spread them all out on the fore-grating, making a grand display. There was his sealing-wax of brick-dust, copper-gilt-gold rings, pencils without lead, watches without guts, lockets to pick your pocket, and a hundred other imposing articles."—"Go on, go on, 'tis all vera pretty!"—"Why you can't deny it. Well, d'y'e see, one of the snuffers, unobserved, made a rope's end fast to the grating; they gave it a bowse upon deck, and away went old Solomon."

"Oh Lord! Oh Lord! de very remembrance makesh me shweat again! Dere, let me go, let me go."—"No, no, we arn't done with you yet, you must freshen the nip. Come, it's of no manner of use to refuse; the name of Solomon Shunbock, of Portsmouth Point, would operate like a charm in our hive, and should we whisper it, you'd have a swarm of blue-bottles foul of your box again."—"Oh dear! Oh dear! Vell, vell, come along mid you." So away they set off for the Jolly Sailor. On ascending the stairs to the long room, old Donald Mac Bean was heard singing, with Stentorian lungs,

"And mair if you'd be knowin,
I've sail'd with Commodore Owen,
And with Sir Pultney Malcolm I have nobly faced the foe;
But now in Greenwich moored,
With grog and bacca stored,
I swivel like a peg-top round upon my timber toe,
I swivel like a peg-top round upon my timber tiddibb!"

shaking the last note with all the grace of a Bray-em, and swinging round like the dervises before the wonderful lamp of Aladdin. Oscar Byrne couldn't hold a candle to him. Donald was singular in his understanding, and always made it a standing rule to sing this song in character. He was still in rotary motion when they enter'd. "More like a humming-top than a peg-top," cried Jem Breeching; while Sam Quketora, catching sight of old Solomon, started up, exclaiming, "Angels and ministers of grace defend us! What, my gentle master! Oh my sweet master! Oh your memory of old Sir Rowland, what makes you here?"—"Mair like unto an Oliver than a Rowland, (said Hameish Mogan;) or you may ca' him hornie, sootie, clotie, seeing I ken fa' well 'tis auld Solomon Shinback, frae the Point at Portsmouth. How's aw wi' you? Gie's your paw, mon, you're unco welcome. Sit ye doon, sit ye doon, and dinna fash your gab about that burthen o' sins, that pedlar's hump. You're amongst honest men, Solomon, you're amongst honest men."—"Arrah be aisey, (roar'd Teddy,) he's a solo-man, and not to be play'd upon by every body; sure isn't he going to do the nate thing now? Oob, call for a pint of Jew-nipper, and after that we'll tryo to du-it in a quart-etto." Every one had something to say, for he was well known to all. The best chair was offered, but he prefer'd making a throne of his box, for cogent reasons. "Gemmen, (said Jem Breeching,) Gemmen, our old friend has consented to treat us with a bowl of punch."—"Vat me! Blessh ma heart! No, no, I can't afford it. Vy, you vill ruin me! Blessh ma heart! No, no!" Jem gave three loud raps on the floor with his wooden pin, which sounded like a paviour's rammer,—a well-known signal; and enter landlord. "A bowl of punch for Mr. Shacabac; and d'y'e hear, shipmate, let it be good, for friends don't meet every day." The punch was brought. "Fill your glasses, gemmen, (said the President, raising on his foot.) Here's the King our Royal Master—God bless him!" drank with spirit and animation; when old Ben Marlin got upon his leg—"Gemman, we have just drank to the health of our gracious Sovereign, and every true and loyal heart glows with fervour at the name; but let us not forget old friends—one whose honest, smiling, happy countenance must be well remember'd by many of us. Aye, I recollect once on board the Yacht he catch'd sight of me with the grog kit. 'Here, here, brother, here, here, (says he;) what, what, what's that?'—'Grog, an' it please your Majesty,' says I. 'Please you most—please you most; but, but, let's taste—let's taste;' and so he takes a swig, first nodding his head in a friendly way, as much as to say, Here's to you. It did my heart good to see him. 'Very, very strong, very strong—no sugar, though.' And then he used to stand and talk with old Mr. Porteous, the Master, about Duncan's action, as affable as if he'd been one of the crew. I pull'd the stroke-oar of the barge that ere day he embark'd from the College stairs for a trip down the River, and Sir Edward Trollope steer'd the boat: it must be between twenty and thirty years ago. How kindly he look'd! Every seaman loved him as a father. So now I give you, The lasting memory of the poor Tars' Friend." This was drank in solemn silence, and by some bedew'd with a tear; it awak'd old feelings and recollections, till Jack Rattlin, who has a tolerable good voice, struck up, "Should auld Acquaintance be forgot?" in which he was occasionally joined by all friends. At the conclusion of the song, Sam Quketoes got up, his eye in a fine frenzy rolling—"Brave Peers of England, pillars of the State. To you Duke Humphrey must unload his grief." "Och, hold your blarney, (says Barney Bryan,) we'll have no grief while the grog is abroach. Come, Solomon, your toast."—"Charity to de Christiansh"—"And honesty to Jews," rejoined Teddy; drank with the amendment. Song with infinite humour by Sam Halliards, "I am a gay Jew Pedlar." "We only wants Tommy Pakenham's band, (said Dick Wills,) to have as good a roary-tory-n as they have at the Uproar-house. Don't you remember it, Sam, when we were off the Western Islands? Tommy commanded the 'Le Juste,' and one day he dined aboard of us along with Lord Hew; and so the music was playing on the poop: 'What's that noise, my Lord? (says Tommy,)—we can scarcely hear one another speak.'—'Oh Captain P. (replied his Lordship, lifting up his long neck,) that is my band, and a very good one too.' 'Very likely, very likely, my Lord, but it almost stuns one, and spoils conversation.' A few days afterward the Captain of the squadron dined with Sir Thomas, and all at once there was the most dreadful howling, squeaking, grunting, snorting, as if a legion of foul fiends were bellowing in their ears. Up jumped his Lordship: 'What's the matter—what's the matter, Captain P.—what can be the matter?'—'Oh, my Lord, 'tis only my band, and a very good one too.' He had ordered the butcher and poulterer to seize all the pigs up in the mizen rigging, and arrange them according to the gammon, or gammock, I think they calls it; however there they stuck, black and white, like the keys of an hog-un, and a man play'd upon 'em with a rope's end. There was ham-ony, with your minims and crotchets, your tenors and hog-staves—a modern Pig-malion! But I don't know how it happened, they didn't keep very good time, and put one another out; yet with a good deal of swine-ging they made a shift at last to get through that beautiful composition by Friar Bacon. 'They say little Pigs make very good pork;' but all hands pronounced it a terrible bore." "Arrah, take care, Sam Quketoes, (cried Teddy,) every body knows as knows you, that if your nose gets into the punch it will make it boil, and scald your throat, so it will." "Gentlemen, I musht bid you good day; it ish almosht tea-time, and my old bonesh want resht." "Hoc mihi tecum bone est," (roared Teddy again.) You must not start a pig till we've finish'd the supernaculum; and I'd give you law for it, but that I know you are well acquainted with—Jew-dish-all proceedings." "List to the chield—list to the chield," said Hameish. "List, list, Oh list!" (continued Sam Quketoes, pointing at Teddy;) See, each particular hair now stands on end like quills upon the fretful pork-you-pin; and there is a round unvarnish'd tail disclosed, while his huge barnacles, like glass-eyers on a lofty mountain, look with a chilling aspect on the mole below that guards the entrance to his covered way." "I-ma-go noa-tri, (replied Teddy,) but I wont take it in snuff. Your nose should be tried by the thumb-ometer, but that I am afraid to burn my fingers. There's a face, latine red-ditum; it would do for a fieri facias—it puts Jem Breeching's to the blush, and all the rest out of countenance; you might cook a chop at it at any time. Then for eyes, arn't you monoculous misrret me tu-i; 'tis all my eye to talk about it. You and old Barney are a pair of spectacles, for your left eye is on the right side, and his right eye is left. See how they look at each other, like crows peeping into a pitcher! And if that sparkling eye of yours, Sam, was in Dick Will's month, there'd be a pretty transparency like a Chinese lantern." "Order, gemmen, order!" (cried the President.) You're both mirrors of fun, but don't cast reflections upon one another. Seeing what I have seen, seeing what I now see, you're a couple of the ugliest mugg'd rogues that ever I seed in my life, excepting the King of P——, who beats us all. Howsomever, you may easily settle your difference, as they do a Scotch account current: "As for you, Sam Quketoes, I owe you nothing, you owe me as much," and then sign your name—Teddy O'Shaugnessy. And so, Gemmen Quid-hums, I beg leave to make a motion for evacuating the chair." Agreed to nem. con.: and Solomon departed with the hearty thanks of all hands, who retired to their peaceful, comfortable cabins.

AN OLD SAILOR.

STANZAS

Addressed to a New Born Infant.

Sweet babe! around whose smiling brow
Peace, innocence eternal move,
As bending o'er thy beauties, now,
A mother sheds her looks of love;
Sweet babe! there's not a simple thought
Once imag'd in thy angel face,
That is not still as quickly caught,
Nor which she longs again to trace;
Whilst every love, and every joy,
Beam in the sparkle of thine eye.

Sweet stranger! let us welcome thee
As some kind spirit, sprung from night,
Around whose footsteps there shall be
One endless stream of heavenly light;
For thou as yet, know'st no despair,
No grief, no sorrow, all is joy,—
The tears of heart-corroding care
Have never wet that laughing eye;
Then welcome to the hours we find,
And leave thy infant world behind.

Sweet floweret! thou art yet, but poor
And weak,—full many days must come
Ere thou shalt raise thy head secure,
And smile in fullest, fairest bloom;
There's many a chilling frost thou'lt find
And many a danger lurking nigh;
There's many a desolating wind,
May all thy little hopes destroy—
And leave thee as the lonely flower,
That blooms and withers in an hour!

Sweet bark! thy snowy sails are set,
The breeze blows briskly, and the deep
Is calm as thy soft bosom, yet,
Where nought but hopes and blessings sleep.
Haste!—thou hast many ports to hail
Upon thy devious, trackless way,
Before thy fleeting, anxious sail,
Shall gain the land of endless day,
Yet oh! midst all, still mayst thou prove
A father's care, a mother's love!

SINGULAR BIOGRAPHY.

JOSEPH FOWKE, ESQ.

This gentleman, who died about thirty years ago, at a very advanced age, was an intimate and much esteemed friend of the celebrated Doctor Samuel Johnson's.—He entered into the service of the East India Company, at the early age of seventeen. He remained at Fort Saint George till about the year 1748, and was so high in the opinion of his employers that, when he returned to England, he was pressed by the secret committee of the East India Directors, to accept the government either of Madras or Bengal. This offer, however, he declined; and remained in England, till 1771, when he again returned to India.

Some differences of opinion unfortunately occurred between him and the provisional government, which ended in his being tried, in June 1775, in the supreme court of Bengal, under two indictments. The verdict, in the first of them, was, "Not Guilty." But in the second, which came on immediately afterwards, and in which he was implicated with Maha Rajah Nundocomar and Roy Rada Churn, the verdict was, "Joseph Fowke and Nundocomar, guilty; Churn, not guilty."

In the year 1788, Mr. Fowke finally quitted Bengal, with a recommendation from Lord Cornwallis to the Court of Directors in England, as a person entitled to receive the pension which was promised to their servants, returning from Bengal out of employment, in their General Letter, dated September 21, 1785; which letter directed, that 'such persons, (described in the letter), whose fortune was not equal to £10,000, should receive as much annually as, with the interest of his own money, should make up an income of £400 per annum.' This recommendation, however, the Directors, in the first instance, rejected; but after some time had elapsed, the claim was discussed in the House of Commons, and certain resolutions were passed in his favour, First, that the petitioner, Joseph Fowke, had proved the allegations contained in his petition; and, secondly, that he was entitled to the pension or allowance promised to be paid, by the East India Company, to their servants, as expressed in their General Letter of the 21st of September, 1785.

Mr. Fowke retained the vigour of his intellects to the close of his life; and what, perhaps, is still more remarkable, considering the usual declension in the hand-writing of most elderly persons, he continued to write, till his death, a hand of singular firmness and beauty. The activity of his mind, and liveliness of his imagination, remained to the last; as is manifest from various interesting letters which he wrote at nearly the age of "fourscore years." His conversation was always sprightly and entertaining; highly seasoned with anecdotes, some of which related to his friend, Doctor Samuel Johnson: among these, he was accustomed to relate the two following.

One morning, on Mr. Fowke's calling on Doctor Johnson, he found the venerable sage somewhat agitated. On enquiring the cause, I have just dismissed Lord Chesterfield, said the Doctor; and if you had come a few moments sooner, I could have shewn you my letter to him. Then musing a little, he added, However, I believe I can recollect it pretty well; and he immediately repeated a very long and very severe epistle; much longer than that which is given by Mr. Boswell in his Life of Johnson. Mr. Fowke further remarked that, upon this occasion, Johnson told him, Lord Chesterfield had sent him a present of £100, to induce him to dedicate the Dictionary to him; Which I returned, said he, to his Lordship, with contempt; and then added, addressing himself to Mr. Fowke,—Sir, I found I must have gilded a rotten post! Lord Chesterfield, continued the Doctor, is a wit among lords, but only a lord among wits.

The second anecdote is as follows. Mr. Fowke once observed to Dr. Johnson, that, in his opinion, the Doctor's literary strength lay in writing biography, in which line of composition, indeed, he infinitely exceeded all his contemporaries. Sir, said Johnson, I believe it is true: the dogs don't know how to write trifles with dignity.—Speaking of the difficulty he sometimes experienced of getting information for that purpose, he said, that, when he was writing the life of Dryden, he desired to be introduced to Colley Cibber, from whom he expected to derive many valuable materials concerning him.—So, Sir, said Johnson to Cibber, I find you knew Mr. Dryden? "Knew him! O Lord, I was as well acquainted with him, as if he had been my own brother." Indeed! then, observed the Doctor, you can tell me some anecdotes of him.—"O yes; a thousand! Why we used to meet continually at a club at Button's. I remember as well as if it were but yesterday, that when he came into the room, in winter time, he used to go and sit close by the fire, in one corner; and then, in summer time, he would always go and sit in the window." Thus, Sir, said Johnson, what with the corner of the fire, in winter, and the window, in summer, you see that I got much precious information, from Cibber, of the manners and habits of the poet, Dryden.

NIGHT CAP AND SLIPPERS;

Being a poetical epistle from I. H., of Sheffield Park, (labouring under the effects of a severe cold,) to his Friend, S. X.

The prisoner of the hearth-stone nook,
I sit and cough, beside the fire;
While conversation, pen, or book,
My heavy spirits seems to tire.

With night-capp'd head, and slipper'd feet,
And water-gruel at my side:
The muse of dulness seems to greet,—
All inspiration else denied.

But though no visitor I see,
To cheer me in this moody hour;
I know there are who think of me,
Inspir'd with friendship's generous power.

Perchance, e'en while this pen I dip
In ink, and trace this moody rhyme,—
My name may tremble from some lip,
Sweet as the rose in summer prime.

Bless thee, my friend! who'er thou art,
Who wish or thought of me hast sped:
May sadness ne'er depress thy heart—
Nor cold, nor coughs affect thy head!

Rat blessings still, through every state,
Attend, and mark me mercy's child;
Heaven's daily comforts on me wait;
Its chastenings,—O how tew and mild!

Of kind attentions—cordials sweet—
I feel no lack, and fear no dearth;
And pure, domestic pleasures meet,
To cheer me on the social hearth.

Then I'll rejoice, and not repine,
Midst all that Heaven allows, or sends;
Since still, I feel in mercy mine,—
Faith, hope, home, comforts, kindred, friends.

THE NORTHERN EXPEDITION.

Ample as was our account of this interesting Expedition last week, it may readily be supposed that a number of little anecdotes and curious particulars, which could not all be remembered at once, will continue to occur to the voyagers, and be communicated to their friends.

Among the wonders carried out by our ships, the two which excited the greatest astonishment and delight in the breasts of the ignorant Natives, were the loadstone and a scaramouch of six or eight inches in length. The attraction of needles, &c. by the former was an object of never-failing surprise; and the dancing of the latter, by pulling the string between its feet, was still more a matter of never-ending delight. The Esquimaux loved much to see it made to perform; but if allowed to call its evolutions with their own hands, their raptures were extravagant, and they would play the puppet for hours together.

After leaving Hudson's Bay, with the exception of one family seen by the boats, none of these people were met with till the tribe of 50 appeared in February, though traces of their dwellings, many of them recent, had been observed every where about the islands. Yet when they first came into contact with the strangers, they betrayed no fears or suspicions; but came boldly on board the vessels, one of them even carrying an aged man upon his back to show him the amazing sight. When the trifling presents, on which they set so high a value, were given to them they leaped and shouted like mad-folks, uttering the oddest noises. Of course equal confidence was displayed by our countrymen, who immediately returned the visit to the huts of their new neighbours, about a three miles' walk, and were received with similar demonstrations of joy by men and women.

With all their apparent clownishness, if we use that term in preference to stupidity, the Esquimaux are an ingenious race. We have already related several instances of this; but the chef-d'œuvre of their talents is their dresses. They are curiously made of skins, partly with the hairy side outwards and partly not. The man's dress consists of a coat, having the fur inside, with hood over his head, and coming close round the chin. In front it fits the body closely round the waist like a vest, but descends over the hips behind in a tail. The seams are down the sides under the arms, and it appears, as if to get into this garb the wearer must push his head and body up into it. Round the cuffs and all the lower parts of the garment, is a white fur trimming, of the most Exquisite fashion. Mittens cover the hands. The breeches are loose, and descend below the knee, where two rows of elegant trimming are also sewed on. The rough side of this part of the dress is outward. Boots fitting the leg complete the male equipment; and so well is this figure formed that it balances itself, and can nearly stand alone.

The female is still more grotesque. Her upper garment has the fur side out, and from the Capote, which comes round the face and leaves only a little of it exposed, descend on each side two long hairy appendages, covering two love-locks of her own black hair like queues, only not so stiff. The vest in front of this squab little personage falls into a stomacher point. But the oddest portion of her equipment is the boots, which come up much higher than any fisherman's, and are nearly as much in circumference as her body. The fur is inside, as also in her mittens and her breeches. We despair, however, of conveying a perfect idea of these droll performances, which must be seen to afford a proper notion of Esquimaux art and ingenuity. We have only to add, that their smell is not the most delicate.

The lady's boots are the most essential parts of the Esquimaux' dress: they are their pockets, their tool boxes, their provision cupboards: Hudibras' holster was nothing to them. This will be allowed when we state, that one day a lady of the tribe, enamoured of a wash-hand basin, took the liberty of appropriating it secretly to herself; but unluckily for her the theft was discovered, and she was turned over for search—proh pudor! the basin was found concealed in one of her boots!

But our sailors were compensated for all their losses of this sort by the amusement the natives afforded them. Their dog-sledges were cheerfully lent; and some of our blue-jackets became at length perfect sours-in-hand at driving eight of these animals in a team. Otherwise, the time even of the officers, who had other resources, passed uniformly and heavily enough. Their routine, day after day, was—rise at 7, breakfast at 8, muster on deck at nine; walk or visit fox-traps, &c. till noon, dine at 1; sleep, read, or play at chess, back-gammon, cards, &c. till 5, when tea made a new interruption; muster again at 6, do what they could to kill the enemy till supper at 8, drinking grog, smoking and chatting till the final hour of turning in. Such were their recreations; and no wonder the Esquimaux were welcome visitors, though some of the newspapers tell us that a native skull or two, brought to England, display portentously the organ of destructiveness, according to the phrenological school.

Among the botanical specimens brought home, are considerable quantities of the tripe-de-roche; on which Captain Franklin and his brave comrades so long sustained existence.

It is a curiosity in natural history, that of the mixed breed between the English Lurcher and the Esquimaux dog, there were one half, three, of the pups without tails, though both parents had them. One of these is the strong and fine animal between decks in the Hecla, and which apparently stood not only the climate, but the galley fire, much better than its companions.

On Monday, Admiralty orders were received at Deptford to dismantle the Fury and Hecla, and reland their stores; from which it might be anticipated that no further attempts of this kind were (for the present at least) intended. The only expectation of the contrary is founded on the non-removal of the heating fixtures.—Lit. Gaz.

MR. SADLER'S ACCOUNT OF HIS AERIAL VOYAGE, FROM DERBY, TUESDAY, OCT. 28, 1823.

"The balloon ascended in a direction to the east, and from the rapidity with which it arose soon gave myself and companion a delightful view of Derby and its vicinity, though not so extensive as in most voyages, in consequence of the clouds being very low.

"On first rising, the spectators scarcely uttered a shout, arising, I suppose, from the novelty of the scene. In addition to our several instruments, &c. we had upwards of 150lbs. of ballast. At seventeen minutes to two o'clock I sent out two pigeons, both of which fluttered about, rather astonished at their elevation and the appearance of the balloon. In two minutes more we entered a cloud, which, in a few minutes obscured the earth from our view. This was attended by a slight dampness, such as is usual upon a fog in low countries; but it was of short duration, for at thirteen minutes to two o'clock my companion observed a break in the clouds, which enabled us for the last time to observe the town of Derby, and at the same moment we heard a shout, which indicated to us that we were likewise seen by the inhabitants.

"Several instruments in the car being in rather a confused state, my first attention now was to put them in order, at the same time I set at liberty a third pigeon, but which seemed so very timid, that it would not leave the car, although I attempted repeatedly to free it from the edge; and perceiving the alarm of the poor animal I desisted, and allowed it to remain with us.

"At five minutes to two the balloon was at its greatest altitude, being little more than one mile and a quarter, and at this time we were both much delighted with the magnificent appearance of the clouds, which appeared like an immense crater beneath us, covered by eternal snows, variously tinged with the sun's rays. The balloon was now fully distended, and I allowed a considerable quantity of gas to escape, which occasioned us to descend. We again rapidly passed through the clouds, and regained a view of the earth; and from the agitation of the silk, &c. I discovered we had now changed our direction to the E. N. E. The inhabitants soon discerned the balloon, and seemed much pleased. I therefore determined to remain low to gratify them, and continued about 700 yards from the earth, and at this height was enabled, by the assistance of my speaking trumpet, to converse with the crowds who were collected. We but indistinctly saw the town of Nottingham, from the haziness of the atmosphere.

"At ten minutes past two, I threw out the third pigeon from the car, but at this height the poor bird tried to regain its situation, but was unable, and made a dart for a considerable distance towards the earth, and we were pleased to observe that it soon recovered itself.

"My companion was surprised to see the alarm of the different animals, that ran in every direction on the appearance of the balloon. The country now before us was highly favourable to effect our descent, and at twenty minutes past two I opened the valve for that purpose; and, by the aid of my trumpet, made my intention known to the people, which caused no inconsiderable sport, for the crowds commenced running in every direction towards the likely spot, over hedge and ditch, and many an unfortunate individual we observed laid low. A large piece of grass land, being in the line of direction, was the spot I chose, and at twenty-five minutes past two the grappling-iron first took hold, but the hedge being weak it gave way, and again held by the adjoining sod, and in five minutes we comfortably stepped from the car, having performed a voyage of twenty-two miles (taking the alteration of our course into calculation) in forty-five minutes. The field we alighted upon is in the parish of Kirby, near Mansfield, and called Portland Park. A number of people soon assembled to assist us, none of whom were the least alarmed, as was the case in my descent lately in the neighbourhood of Stourbridge. A young woman was the first to lay hold of the cable. Major and Mrs. Jessopp came up soon after our alighting, and kindly invited us to their house. They expressed themselves much delighted at the appearance of the balloon as it approached the earth. The whole of the apparatus was soon packed up, and removed to the Major's house, accompanied by a considerable crowd, who, I understood, had been attending a feast at Kirby. D'Ewes Coke, Esq. offered me his carriage, which I accepted, to convey the balloon to Mansfield, where I procured post horses to Nottingham, and thence proceeded to Derby, where we arrived at ten o'clock.

THE INCOMPARABLE RUSSIAN.

In the Summer of the year 1810, as a lady was walking with her child on the banks of the canal of Saint Catherine, at Petersburg, the child suddenly slipped from her hand, and fell into the canal. The mother in an agony of despair, was going to plunge in after her child, when a young man prevented her, and promised her instant assistance.

He took a fine large spaniel that followed him, and threw him into the water, calling out as loud as he could, Bring him, bring him! The sagacious animal instantly dived; and when he came up again, was seen holding the child by the shirt collar: he quickly swam to the shore, and laid his precious burthen gently down, at the feet of the mother. She, in an ecstasy of joy, took the child in her arms, and divided her caresses between him and the dog. At that instant the father of the child appeared: I return you, sir, said he to the young man, a thousand thanks; you have saved the life of my only child.—Your thanks, said the young man, are more justly due to the kind providence of the Almighty, which brought me hither.—Accept, said the father, a thousand rubles,* as a reward for your humane exertions.—Excuse, said the young man, my declining your handsome offer: you are, in fact, much more indebted to the exertions of my dog than to me.—Well, then, said the gentleman, I will give you a thousand rubles for your dog.—A quarter of an hour ago, replied the young man, I did not think him worth a thousand rubles; but now that he has saved the life of a human being, I would not take ten thousand for him.

The young man then rushed into the crowd of spectators, who had by this time assembled on the banks of the canal, and the enraptured parents of the child could not, by any inquiry, find out who he was. The Emperor Alexander was informed of the affair, and was desirous to discover the young man; but the search he ordered to be made, although diligently pursued, was altogether fruitless.

* Value, in English money, about four and sixpence.

O! admirable youth! (who does not exclaim?) What an honour art thou to the name of Russian, or rather, what an honour to human nature!

ON DOMESTIC FELICITY.

Domestic felicity cannot be equalled in the whole round of enjoyments of which men are perpetually in the pursuit. It is the greatest, because the most rational; the sweetest, because those whom we love are partakers of it; whether it be communicated to us in the conversation of the hoary and venerable grandsire, the endearments of the parent, or the reciprocal exchange of fraternal sentiments of heartfelt affection.

In vain is such satisfaction to be sought after, when encircled with strangers, or engaged in parties of pleasure from home. The playhouse cannot yield it; our walks will be solitary, and our business itself, if domestic bliss be unrelished, will prove nothing but toilsome and disagreeable.

Hence does the aspiring soldier comfort himself, under the various hardships of his profession, with the anticipation that one day there will be a period to his toil, when he shall retreat with honour from the more dangerous employment of war, to enjoy the peaceful moments of a domestic life. Neither poverty can taint its felicity when relished with content, nor affluence arrogate its situation when enjoyed with humility. The rigid looks of adversity are dared where innocence resides; and prosperity, with her alluring promises of happiness, despised, when her fickle nature is discovered by the sharp penetration of the cautious peasant.

Irus was obliged to confess that domestic happiness exceeded every other pleasure in the world, because he esteemed his poverty his greatest glory, and declared he never felt its weight because he kept it a secret. The troubles and cares of a public life are often found by experience to be the parents of many anxious hours, and to banish those peaceful moments from the breast of a prince, which the meanest beggar can enjoy.

The conduct of a people, and the management of an army, though to the outward spectator they promise the greatest pleasures, will never be blest with the innocent amusements of a quiet, serene, and tranquil life.

ELOCUTION.

MR. FOX.

Almost the whole of his political life was spent in opposition to his majesty's ministers. It may be said of him, as of lord North, that he had political adversaries, but no enemy. Good-nature, too easily carried to excess, was one of the distinctive marks of his character. In vehemence and power of argument he resembled Demosthenes; but there, the resemblance ended. He possessed a strain of ridicule and wit, which nature denied to the Athenian, and it was the more powerful as it always appeared to be blended with argument, and to result from it. To the perfect composition which so eminently distinguishes the speeches of Demosthenes, he had no pretence. He was heedless of method:—having the complete command of good words, he never sought for better:—if those, which occurred, expressed his meaning clearly and forcibly, he paid little attention to their arrangement or harmony. This detracts from the merit of his speeches, when they are read; but, when they were delivered, it perhaps added to their effect, as it tended greatly to make the hearers believe that he was above art, and spoke from conviction. Nothing more strongly recommends a speaker to his audience, or gives greater force to his oratory.

The moment of his grandeur was, when,—after he had stated the argument of his adversary, with much greater strength than his adversary had done, and with much greater than any of his hearers thought possible,—he seized it with the strength of a giant, and tore and trampled on it to destruction. If, at this moment, he had possessed the power of the Athenian over the passions or the imaginations of his hearers, he might have disposed of the house at his pleasure,—but this was denied to him; and, on this account, his speeches fell very short of the effect, which otherwise they must have produced.

It is difficult to decide on the comparative merit of him and Mr. Pitt; the latter had not the vehement reasoning, or argumentative ridicule of Mr. Fox: but he had more splendour, more imagery, and much more method and discretion. His long, lofty and reverential panegyrics of the British constitution, his eloquent vituperations of those, whom he described as advocating the democratic spirit then let loose on the inhabitants of the earth, and his solemn adjuration of the house, to defend and to assist him in defending their All against it, were, in the highest degree, both imposing and conciliating. In addition, he had the command of bitter contemptuous sarcasm, which tortured to madness. This he could dilate or compress at pleasure: even in one member of a sentence, he could inflict a wound that was never healed. Mr. Fox having made an able speech, Mr. Erskine followed him with one of the very same import. Mr. Pitt rose to answer them: he announced his intention to reply to both: "but," said he, "I shall make no mention of what was said by the honourable gentleman who spoke last; he did no more than regularly repeat what was said by the member who preceded him, and regularly repeats all he repeated."

It was prettily said by the historian of the Roman empire, that "Charles's black collier would soon sink Billy's painted galley;"—but never did horoscope prove more false;—Mr. Fox said more truly,—"Pitt will do for us, if he should not do for himself."

THE DISSIPATED HUSBAND.

[The following Lines, we presume, have been suggested to the writer by the perusal of the Translations of the French Poetry in our last, and we readily insert them, as a feeling and appropriate commentary on the odious and shameless vice of Gaming.—Ed.]

He comes not—I have watched the moon go down,
But yet he comes not—once it was not so,
He thinks not how these bitter tears do flow,
The while he holds his riot in that town.
Yet he will come, and chide, and I shall weep,
And he will wake my infant from its sleep,
To blend its feeble wailings with my tears—
Oh! how I love a mother's watch to keep
Over those sleeping eyes, that smile which cheer
Me, though sunk in sorrow fixed and deep.
I had a husband once who loved me, now
He ever wears a frown upon his brow;
And feeds his passion on a wanton's lip
As bees from laurel flowers, will poison sip.
But yet I cannot hate! Oh there were hours
When I could hang for ever on his eye!
And time who stole with silent swiftness by,
Strewed as he hurried on his path, sweet flowers—
I lov'd him then, he lov'd me too, my heart
Still finds its softness kindle if he smile.
The memory of our love will ne'er depart,
And though he often sting me with a dart
Venom'd and barb'd, and wastes upon the vile Caresses, which his babe and mine should have,
Though he should spurn me, I will calmly bow
His madness; and should sickness come and lay
His paralyzing hand upon him, then
I would with kindness, all my wrongs repay,
Until the penitent should weep and say
How injured and how faithful I had been.

CRITICISM.

LATIN ORTHOEPY.

MR. EDITOR,—Your able and ingenious correspondent GIMEL, has already said so much, and so much to the purpose, on this disputed point of Latin Orthoepy,—the true and most legitimate pronunciation of the letter a,—that there remains little to be added on a subject, upon which, it would appear, the greatest critics, and most profound scholars, are still at issue.—The truth is, (my opinion being solicited,) I am wholly incompetent to the task of deciding, on any good and satisfactory data, this abstruse point, as the pronunciation certainly differs, even among men of acknowledged talents and learning.—Now if we consider it as a matter of taste, there is no disputing about tastes; and each one will claim the right of judging for himself. For my own part, I do not think it can fairly be considered a matter of much importance. It is, in fact, only a matter of sound,—the sense is the same, be the pronunciation what it may, of the letter a, in Latin. To most classical ears, I believe, the same pronunciation of the letter, which it has in the word may, is most acceptable, and therefore to be preferred. It used to be, and I believe still is, so pronounced at Macclesfield School; and, as far as my knowledge extends, it is generally so pronounced, in both our Universities.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ON THE ADVANTAGES LIKELY TO RESULT TO THE TOWN FROM THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NEW INSTITUTION FOR SCIENCE AND THE ARTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Reading in your notices to correspondents, that remarks on the New Institution would always be acceptable, I have been induced to make the following, which I shall be glad to see inserted in your miscellany.

There is no doubt but that much important knowledge will be circulated through the medium of this Institution. To the artist it must be particularly advantageous. It will encourage his professional exertions by enabling him to exhibit the fruits of his labours, and by that means to attain, at once, the reputation to which he is entitled. A man of merit in painting or in statuary will not, therefore, be suffered to languish in obscurity. He will not only be encouraged by the praises of the persons who inspect his performances, but also benefitted by their remarks, and endeavour, another time, to avoid any errors which they may discover. The judgment of others will thus correct his own.

The benefit which the town must receive from periodical lectures upon different subjects, must be very considerable. To the mechanical part of our population, it must be very important to be instructed in the principles of their several occupations. By this means we may reasonably expect much improvement in those arts which have conferred a preeminence upon the town. This effect has been strikingly exhibited in Glasgow, the working classes are there much enlightened upon the principles of Science: and this circumstance is attended with the advantages which might have been expected; since several of the persons who have attended the mechanics' class, so ably conducted by Dr. Ure, have made improvements of considerable importance in the arts. To persons who have no advantage from knowledge but the pleasure which the profession of it affords, to females in particular, the lectures will be a source of the most pleasing and rational amusement. That the paintings of the artist, and the lectures, cannot but improve the taste of the town, and supply the inhabitants with that knowledge of which they are so much in want.

This Institution will lead the attention of the young to improper objects, and fill their minds with those ideas which will be far more beneficial to them.

Or manufacturers are most of them, at present, little skilled in the philosophy of their pursuits: They are therefore, less likely to originate improvements. Whenever they leave the usual routine they are almost entirely under the guidance of chance. Their discoveries are, consequently, accidental. But when they have acquired the knowledge which the New Institution ought to furnish, they will no longer be subject to doubt and uncertainty, but proceed with the confidence of the skilful mariner when supplied with the compass to direct his course.

Many persons doubt that this Institution will not answer; but I think that the great number of lectures, already delivered and announced this year, is a certain proof that the town will encourage the undertaking, and, consequently, it will answer.

Though this Institution may prove very beneficial to the town, yet it is much to be regretted that the regulations of it should have been formed so hastily as to cause some of them to be of questionable operation. You know, Sir, that they were scarcely any sooner thought of than settled by the meeting. There ought to have been a moment or two's reflection whether what they were doing was right or not, and then the Institution would have been placed on a firmer footing. If the managers had been content to adopt the arrangements of some tried Institution, the chance of success would, doubtless, have been greater.

Yours, &c.

TUTO.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In your paper of the 4th of this month, (October) there was published a letter on the advantage of placing a cup in a fruit pie, by a person calling himself, "A Desirer of Information." The author, after giving us the results of the experience of cooks, as well as the opinions of a few ingenious friends upon the subject, proposed to your readers the following interesting questions, relating to this important topic.

1st. Is a cup, placed in a fruit pie, instrumental in preventing the running over of the juice? 2nd. If so, does the juice ascend into the cup during the baking of the pie? 3rd. If the juice does rise into the cup during the baking of the pie, how is the fact to be explained? Or if it does not, by what means is the cup serviceable, in preventing the overflow of the juice? 4th. When the pie has no cup in it, is its juice more or less likely to flow over the dish, when a hole is left in the paste? and why is it more or less likely to flow over?

These questions, it is my object to answer in this letter. To the first, I am decidedly inclined to reply in the affirmative; for, in the first place, how unnecessary and absurd soever some practises, which are common amongst uneducated persons, may at first sight appear, yet on more mature consideration, we generally find them to be in a greater or less degree, productive of advantageous results. I look upon the habit which cooks have of putting a cup in an inverted position into a pie, previous to its being baked, as calculated, in some measure, to obtain the desired effect; but I feel pretty confident, that had the principle, upon which the success of the practise depends, been known, a much more suitable adaptation of means to the attainment of the end would have been devised. And in the second place, I believe that there is a reason which is quite sufficient to account for the supposed advantage of the cup.

The second query in the letter of your correspondent is, whether the boiling over is prevented by the rising of the juice into the cup, during the baking. It must, I should imagine, be obvious to every one, who gives the subject the slightest attention, that the juice cannot rise into the cup during the baking. For, otherwise, how is the air, which it contains, to be disposed of? It is true, that in consequence of the expansion of the air by the heat of the oven, a part will leave the cup; but yet, when the pie is at its greatest heat, that is to say, when the juice is boiling, there will be still a cup-full of the elastic fluid.

But that no doubt might remain on this subject, a pie, containing a glass cup, was submitted to experiment; and the result was, that on opening the pie immediately after it was taken from the oven, no juice was found in the cup; although afterwards, when it began to cool, the juice almost entirely filled it.

With respect to the fourth question, proposed by your correspondent, I conceive that he has himself suggested the manner, in which the cup is of service, in preventing the overflow of the juice; viz. that it supports the paste.

It is clear that when the paste is not supported, the juice being prevented by it from rising upwards, will naturally make some vent for itself out of the pie; and as the paste fits, in all probability, less closely to the edge of the dish, than in any other situation, the juice will there be forced out of the pie. But when the paste is supported, as by a cup, then the juice, meeting with no impediment to its rising upwards, will not be forced out at the bottom of the paste; that is to say, will not boil over.

This theory of the advantage of the cup is strengthened by the fact that the juice is more likely to flow over in pies, the paste of which is liable to sink; that is to say, when a paste is soft and patty, or when the pie is large; then the advantage of the cup is more particularly felt.

Your correspondent next enquires whether the making a hole in the paste of a pie be at all advantageous. I am disposed to think that it is; and am supported in this opinion by persons, who have practical experience on the subject. Besides, it is to be expected, that when no hole is left in the paste, the air contained in the pie, will, as it expands, make itself an opening at the bottom of the crust; and thus afford a passage for juice, when it rises up in boiling: whilst, on the contrary, when an opening is left in the paste, the air will escape freely, without occasioning any passage for the juice.

I have now answered, I hope satisfactorily, the questions proposed by the "desirer of information," but if the theories brought forward, and particularly the last, do not appear to any of your readers to be correct, I trust they will take an opportunity of shewing their inadequacy.

Before concluding, I would observe, that though the insertion of a cup is of undoubted advantage in preventing the overflow of juice in a fruit pie, yet that object would be attained with greater certainty, if there were substituted a vessel, having a broad surface, and supported by slender legs, somewhat like a common table. By a contrivance of this kind, not only would the overflow of syrup be less frequent, but the pies would be capable of containing more fruit than they could do when they have a cup within them. It would be advisable, too, that a hole should be left in the paste, in order that the heated air should have a free passage out of the pie.

But the most capital improvement in the making of fruit pies, would be to use deeper dishes, so that there can be no possibility of an overflow of juice.

If you think that these remarks will satisfy your correspondent, or inform your readers at large, you will, by inserting them in your paper, oblige one who is not so much as he could wish to be,

A GIVER OF INFORMATION.

Manchester, Oct. 30th. 1823.

FINE ARTS.

The great embellishments now making in the British Metropolis, united to the magnificent improvements and new erections which of late years have been erected, will distance all competition and comparison with every other capital in the world. The splendour of London, will shortly be, if it was not previously, equal to its opulence, and the Regency and Reign of his present Majesty, will form an Era in History. To begin with the city, the Royal Exchange is rapidly proceeding in the progress of renovation and repair, which will impart to that edifice, the splendour which should characterise the first commercial part of the Universe. The improvements at that astonishing building, the Bank, exhibit great classical beauty and grandeur, and the works proceed rapidly. The New Courts, adjoining Guildhall, are nearly finished; and the superb Colonnade of St. Martin's, is about to be thrown open to public view. A new post office is instantly to be commenced on a scale of magnitude hitherto unparalleled, and is destined to be a pile of the most noble aspect,—of the most picturesque effect. When to these great national undertakings, are considered the costly structures of Regent Street, and the adjacent buildings, the statue to the immortal WELLINGTON, in Hyde Park, and the projected ones to his late Majesty and the Duke of York—add to these the costly and superb bridges lately thrown over the Thames, with all that London before possessed of beauty and wonder, we shall be astonished at the mighty powers of those who projected, and those Herculean labours which have performed such miracles.

The British Museum.—The new building for the reception of the Library presented by His Majesty is proceeding with great rapidity; the foundations, which are of immense thickness, are now laid. The edifice will be 300 feet in length and seventy feet high. There will be only one story above the basement, and the rooms are to be thirty feet in height. When completed, a part of the old museum will be taken down; and as the new repositories are finished, the whole of the old building will be removed. The one now in progress is intended to form a wing of the new Museum, and it is rumoured that one or more of the porticos will be supported by antique columns, which are expected to arrive in a short time in this country. The alterations it is calculated will occupy fifteen years, when the front of the new structure will be thrown open to the street, with a spacious Court-yard guarded by an iron palisading.

SONNET.

Sleep hung upon my eyelids—and I dream'd
I saw thee Emma on thy death-bed laid;—
Pale as the dress in which thou wast array'd,
Thy lovely cheek and features to me seem'd:

This pass'd—'twas night—and darkness silent roll'd—
Again I saw thee—with the cypress wreath'd—
So calm, so beautiful; then methought thou breath'd—
But cold thy corse was—and thy death knell toll'd:

It pass'd—methought I'd gain'd the skies bright dome,
The blue vault opened—and heaven rose,
And I did gaze with love and awe on those Inheritors of that seraphic home;
Thy form in splendour o'er my vision broke,
Thou smil'd—thou blest me—and in tears I woke.

LOVES,

Being a reply to ANTIPATHIES in Iris No. 91.

I love the calm and silent hour of eve,
When the pale moon beams light on every tree—
I love the moon, she never seems to grieve,
But in the firmament burns splendidly.
And lists to faithful vows—I love to weave
The beautiful chaplet,—and I love to see
The face that beams with love,—some people try
To plague—but I've not one antipathy.
I love the flowing tresses of the air—
I love the flashing brightness of the eye,
When it is lighted 'neath the vivid glare
Of love—I love the heavy sigh
That moves the pearly bosom of the fair—
I love to see a real beauty cry—
"By the simplicity of each fair dove
Of Venus," I am made alone of love.

VARIETIES.

CATAPULT.—Josephus tell us (what, from the authority of so sacred and venerated a writer, we dare not question) that a soldier's head was struck off by a stone sent by one of these engines, and his brains carried three furlongs off. Lucan says that such was the velocity of the bullets discharged from these colossal slings, that they melted in the air.

Garrick roused the feelings more than any actor on record, and most probably suffered as much from their exertion. A gentleman once making the above remark to Tom King, the comedian, he received this reply:—"Pooh! he suffer from his feelings! Why, Sir, I was playing with him one night in Lear, when, in the middle of a most passionate and afflicting part, and when the whole house was drowned in tears, he turned his head round to me, and putting his tongue in his cheek, whispered—'D—me, Tom, it'll do!'"

DIFFERENT EFFECTS PRODUCED ON THE MIND BY A GRECIAN AND A GOTHIC EDIFICE.—When I go, said Mr. Paul Whitehead, (he was an eminent poet of the last century,) in Saint Paul's, I admire it as a very fine, grand, beautiful building; and after I have contemplated its beauty, I come out. But if I go into Westminster Abbey, — me, I'm all devotion!

INSENSIBILITY.—Frederick Morel was translating Libanius, when some one came and told him, that his wife, who had been languishing some time, was very ill, and wished to speak with him: "I have only" said he, "two periods to translate, and I will then come and see her." A second messenger informed him that she was on the point of death: "I have not more than two words to finish," said Morel, "return to her, I shall be there as soon as you." A moment after, another messenger brought an account of her death: "I am very sorry" said he, "she was a very good woman." He continued his translation.

TURKISH BOW.—Barclay, in his Icon Animorum speaking of the Turkish Bow, (but pulling we suspect at the same time, the long bow,) says it will strike an arrow through a piece of steel or brass two inches thick; and being headed only with wood, it pierces timber of eight inches.

DIVING BELLS.—The first diving-bell we read of was nothing but a very large kettle, suspended by ropes, with the mouth downwards, and planks to sit on fixed in the middle of its concavity. Two Greeks at Toledo, in 1588, made an experiment with it before the Emperor Charles V. They descended in it, with a lighted candle, to a considerable depth. In 1683, William Phipps, the son of a blacksmith, formed a project for unloading a rich Spanish ship sunk on the coast of Hispaniola. Charles II. gave him a ship with every thing for his undertaking; but being unsuccessful, he returned in great poverty. He then endeavoured to procure another vessel, but failing, he got a subscription, to which the Duke of Albemarle contributed. In 1687, Phipps set sail in a ship of 200 tons, having previously engaged, to divide the profits according to the twenty shares of which the subscription consisted. At first all his labours proved fruitless; but at last, when he seemed almost to despair, he was fortunate enough to bring up so much treasure, that he returned to England with the value of 200,000*l.* sterling. Of this sum he got about 20,000*l.*, and the Duke 90,000*l.* Phipps was knighted by the King, and laid the foundation of the fortunes of the present noble house of Mulgrave. Since that time diving-bells have been very often employed.

THE ESSEX 'SQUIRE.—Foote, the English Aristophanes, was at Stratford, during the performance of the Jubilee, which was got up by Garrick, in honour of Shakespeare. Meeting, early one morning, an Essex 'Squire, full dressed in blue and silver, whose countenance expressed a kind of vagrant curiosity,—he was asked, as if doubting the worthiness of its object, "what all this meant;"—at the same time lamenting, that he had been "brought out of Essex," by the report of the Jubilee. Foote's cutting query, with a stare that may be easily imagined, was one of those singular strokes of English humour, that has seldom perhaps been equalled;—"Out of Essex? and pray, Sir, who drove you?"

A preacher observing that several of his congregation had fallen asleep, suddenly exclaimed, with a loud voice, "A fire, a fire!" "Where, where!" cried his awakened auditors. "In the place of punishment," added the preacher, "for those who sleep under the ministry of the holy Gospel."

The celebrated Blake, while engaging a Spanish fleet, lost one of his ships, which blew up. Seeing the spirit of his crew damped by this awful event, he called out, "Well, my lads, you have seen an English ship blown up; and now let's see what figure a Spanish one will make in the same situation." This harangue raised the spirits of his men, and in less than an hour he set his antagonist on fire.

The name of the forthcoming Waverley Novel is announced to be Saint Roman's Well. It is, we hear, nearly ready for publication.

Captain Parry.—Captain Parry's Journal of his Second Voyage for the Discovery of a North-West Passage, is already in the press, with maps and numerous plates.

PATENT ANATOMICAL STAYS, AFFORDING

Comfort, Support, and Improvement of Figure.

MRS. LLOYD GIBBON, of London, the sole Inventress, begs to recommend them to the notice of the Ladies, as the most effectual preventive and remedy for inelegant figure. At no period of time have Ladies more required good Stays than at the present, from the late prejudicial fashion of stooping, which has so injured the figure, that nothing but an attention to proper Stays can render it at all elegant in the present fashion of long waists, to which the Anatomical Stays are particularly adapted, as affording great support to the back and chest, and giving an inclination to hold the spine erect; the Patent Stays are so constructed, that they afford general support without pressure in any one part.

Mrs. L. G.'s invention is honoured by the patronage and recommendation of eminent Medical Characters, for correctness; also, her Bandage for those who are large, which invariably affords the greatest comfort.

The Anatomical Stays are particularly calculated for young Ladies who are weak, or imperfect in the spine or shoulders.

Mrs. L. GIBBON solicits the early attention of Ladies, in her numerous engagements will not admit of her remaining long in Manchester; and the stays being ready, Mrs. L. G. will upon the first application at Mrs. Barwick's, 11 A. George Street, Manchester.

REMARKS ON EDUCATION.

Written for the Iris.

A KNOWLEDGE of the Latin language is by many considered essentially necessary to a right understanding of our own. It is not my present purpose either to defend or to oppose this opinion, as I am aware that much may be said on both sides of the question, and I have no peculiar predilection to descend to the arena of controversy. A classical education necessarily occupies a large proportion of a young man's time, and it may be questioned how far a youth, who is not intended for any of the learned professions, should be made to spend a most important period of his life in conning the pages of a lexicon, and studying the minutiae of Greek and Latin prosody. Much is to be acquired by a young man just entering into the world, besides a knowledge of the classics, to fit him for acting his part in society; and every parent, who wishes to give his son a liberal education, should keep in view his probable destination, and the time which is to be allotted to the acquirement of knowledge, and then endeavour to mark out for him a system of study which shall include in it as much as possible of what is calculated to be of real advantage to him in his future life. Many a parent, by grasping at too much, has been in danger of losing all;—being ambitious that his son should become a classical scholar he has allowed him to neglect what was essential to fit him for the sphere in which he was to move;—and by removing him from his studies at the precise age when he conceived he ought to be fit for business, without enquiring whether his proficiency had been great or small, or whether his mind had at all been directed to the subjects which were most important for him according to his prospects, he has in one moment demolished the still unfinished edifice which had taken years of labour to rear so far. If one enters on a course of classical study he ought by all means to pursue it, for I conceive a smattering of this kind of lore to be worse than a total destitution of it. If a knowledge of Latin is necessary to a thorough acquaintance with English, I apprehend a more efficient method than that which is practised in our grammar schools might be pursued for rendering it subservient to this particular purpose. It is a method which might be useful not only to those who never aim at being classical scholars, but to such also as aspire after distinction in this department of learning. The drudgery to which youths are subjected, during the elementary part of a classical course, and which, in the case of many who enter upon it, is never succeeded by the sweets of enjoyment which come, though late, to reward the early labours of the persevering scholar, is calculated to excite a strong disgust to every thing which is presented to them under the guise of learning, and eventually to wither the bud which at one time promised so fair.

The plan I have in view is by no means matured, as I have not had it in my power to bring it to the test of experiment.—But the following may be considered as an outline.

After making the scholar familiarly acquainted with English Grammar, which may be done at a very early age by making use of Lennie's popular work, and following the method which he details and recommends in the Introduction to his Key,—and teaching him the Latin declensions and conjugations and perhaps a few of the most useful rules of syntax, in order to give him some notion of the general structure of the language, and the most material features in which it differs from the English,—I would furnish him with a copious vocabulary of Latin words from which English ones are either directly or indirectly derived, and a corresponding vocabulary of English words with references to the Latin etymons. Such a work (which perhaps may be deemed a desideratum in our national literature) should point out the primary signification of the radical words, and some of the different shades of meaning which they may have afterwards acquired. These meanings should be traced back as far as possible to the original idea, and the most probable reasons assigned for the diversity of signification which, through a lapse of years, they may have obtained. This part of the work might be distinct from the vocabulary, and appropriated to the use of teachers, who might then exercise the ingenuity of their pupils in tracing etymologies for themselves. I am convinced that such a mode of tuition, if conducted with judgment, would prove highly interesting to the majority of scholars;—it would train them from an early period to close habits of reflection, and habituate them to the utmost precision in their use of language;—it would, in no small degree, quicken their inventive powers, and keep alive an interest in their studies which on the present plan, can hardly ever be maintained. It might be commenced at a very early stage of their education; for I have had an opportunity of witnessing the rapid progress of children in English grammar, when taught on Mr. Lennie's plan, and the intimate knowledge which they have acquired of the nicest intricacies of etymology and syntax: and the exercise which I now recommend might be conjoined with the latter part of their course of English Grammar, or follow it in immediate succession.

Various opinions will no doubt be entertained on the subject which has now been suggested, and if the Editor of the Iris give his permission, I should like to see it fully discussed by some of his able correspondents. I have no doubt but something might be devised and carried into effect, calculated to be extremely useful, not to the general student only, but also the candidate for classical distinction.

I shall conclude this paper with a few examples of etymology which may be amusing to some who have never turned their attention to this subject. It will be obvious that the signification of many compound words must be ascertained by the power of the prepositions which are used in their composition. The most common of these are a or ab, ad, con, contra, de, e or ex, in, inter, ob, per, post, pra, pro, re, sub, super, ante, &c.

Spiro signifies to breathe, whence comes spirit, from an erroneous notion of the identity of the spirit and breath. Whence also aspire, to breathe after, to desire with eagerness; conspire, to breathe together, to agree to do any thing, to plot; expire, to breathe out, to give up the ghost or spirit, to die; inspire, to breathe into, to animate; perspire, to breathe through, to perform excretion by the pores of the skin, to sweat; respire, to breathe again, to continue breathing; suspire, to breathe deep, to sigh.

From scribo, to write, we have scribe, a writer; to scribble, a diminutive, to write carelessly; scribbler, a bad writer; scripture, the writing by way of eminence, the Bible; ascribe, to write or attribute to; conscript, written together, enrolled; conscription, enrolling; describe, to write concerning; prescribe, to write beforehand, to set down authoritatively, to order; prescription, a rule authorised by long custom, also a medical receipt; proscribe, to post up in writing, to doom to destruction, as the names of those who were capitally condemned used to be posted up in a public place; proscription, as a noun, has a similar meaning; inscribe, to write upon; inscription, something written or engraved; subscribe, to write under, to consent to, by underwriting the name; so also subscription; supercribe, superscription, to write over, to inscribe on the top or outside; transcribe, to write over, from one to another, to copy; transcript, a copy; transcription, the act of copying; rescribe, to write over again; rescript, edict of an emperor, of which there must be many copies for the information of his numerous subjects.

Grex, gregis, signifies a flock or company; hence we speak of gregarious animals, meaning such as are accustomed to associate in herds; egregious, out of, or superior to the flock, differing from others, eminent, remarkable, generally used in a bad sense, as deserting the flock is not commendable; congregate and congregation, imply, a flocking together, an assembly.

From dies, a day, we have diary, diurnal, journal. The list might easily be enlarged, but "satis superque."

Having mentioned Mr. Lennie's Grammar in terms of high commendation, it may be proper to remark that I esteem it only as a useful elementary work. It ought by no means to supersede the larger Grammar of Mr. Lindley Murray, which in connexion with his Exercises and Key, is an incomparable performance, and ought to be carefully studied by advanced scholars.

GIMEL.

Query. What is the difference between, to understand, and to stand under? The corresponding Latin word intelligo is similarly compounded.

We cannot resist the pleasure we feel in extracting the following lines from a little work called (rather singularly) "forget me not"—to mature years and lengthened study they would have done much credit, but as the production of a young lady who has not yet attained the age of twenty, we can place no higher compliment upon them than to say, we shall not forget her!

ELLEN. A FRAGMENT.

Is she not beautiful, although so pale?
The first May flowers are not more colourless
Than her white cheek; yet I recal the time
When she was called the rosebud of our village.
There was a blush, half modesty, half health,
Upon her cheek, fresh as the summer morn
With which she rose. A cloud of chestnut curls,
Like twilight, darkened o'er her blue-veined brow;
And through their hazel curtains, eyes, whose light
Was like the violet's, when April skies
Have given their own pure colour to the leaves,
Shone sweet and silent, as the twilight star.
And she was happy—innocence and hope
Make the young heart a paradise for love.
And she loved, and was loved. The youth was one
That dwelled on the waters. He had been Where sweeps the blue Atlantic, a wide world—
Had seen the sun light up the flowers, like gems,
In the bright Indian isles—had breathed the air
When sweet with cinnamon, and gum, and spice.
But he said that no air brought health, or balm,
Like that on his own hills, when it had swept O'er orchards in their bloom, or hedges, where Blossomed the hawthorn and the honeysuckle;
That, but one voyage more, and he would come
To his dear Ellen and her cottage home—
Dwell there in love and peace. And then he kissed
Her tears away, talked of the pleasant years
Which they should pass together—of the pride
He would take in his constancy. Oh, hope
Is very eloquent! and as the hours
Pass'd by their fireside in calm cheerfulness,
Ellen forgot to weep.

At length the time
Of parting came; 'twas the first month of Spring.
Like a green fan spread the horse-chestnut's leaves,
A shower of yellow bloom was on the elm,
The daisies shone like silver, and the boughs
Were covered with their blossoms, and the sky
Was like an augury of hope, so clear,
So beautifully blue. Love! oh young love!
Why hast thou not security? Thou art
Like a bright river, on whose course the weeds
Are thick and heavy; briars are on its banks,
And jagged stones and rocks are mid its waves.
Conscious of its own beauty, it will rush
Over its many obstacles, and pant
For some green valley, as its quiet home.
Alas! either it rushes with a desperate leap
Over its barriers, foaming passionate,
But prisoned still; or winding languidly,
Becomes dark, like oblivion, or else wastes
Itself away.—This is love's history.

They parted one spring evening; the green sea
Had scarce a curl upon its wave: the ship
Rode like a queen of ocean. Ellen wept,
But not disconsolate, for she had hope.
She knew not then the bitterness of tears.
But night closed in; and with the night there came Tempest upon the wind, the beacon light
Glared like a funeral pile; all else was black
And terrible as death. We heard a sound
Come from the ocean—one lone signal gun,
Asking for help in vain—followed by shrieks,
Mocked by the ravening gale; then deepest silence.
Some gallant souls had perished. With the first Dim light of morn, they sought the beach; and there
Lay fragments of a ship, and human shapes,
Ghastly and gashed. But the worst sight of all—
The sight of living misery, met their gaze.
Seated upon a rock, drenched by the rain,
Her hair torn by the wind, there Ellen sat,
Pale, motionless. How could love guide her there?
A corpse lay by her; in her arms its head
Found a fond pillow, and o'er it she watched,
As the young mother watches her first child.
It was her lover—

(Written for the Iris.)

A WEEK IN LONDON.

Private business being disposed of we continued our stroll to Carleton House, the town residence of His present Majesty, our introductions were of that distinguished quality, that admitted of little delay, and we were shortly permitted to an interior view of this chosen and favourite abode of royalty,—the splendour of this place alone would extend the limits of this journal to a tolerably sized volume, and it is with regret I condense it. Over the library door, the most frequented room of the illustrious tenant, is a fine painting of his late royal consort, and whatever may have been the unhappy and fatal causes of domestic disquiet, when many other and similar works of art were displaced, this was not suffered to be removed. The armoury is a grand collection, comprising many specimens of ancient warfare highly curious and entertaining,—but the most splendid of all is the drawing room, and here imagination itself, must make a pause. The ceiling is exquisitely painted; and at each end an uncommonly large glass which reflects the whole of the room, adding, artificially, to its size; the compartments are richly gilt, and the curtains of crimson damask, surmounted with the royal arms.

It would be difficult to compress all my notes and observations made in this splendid residence—it is one tissue of oriental magnificence, and superb decoration. The exterior front, now recently laid open from Pall Mall, and greatly improved by the splendid houses and other buildings, which from Regent-Street, and Waterloo Place, has been found fault with as being obscured by a heavy colonnade, which it is in contemplation to remove. The Opera House is another immense building, passing by which, and the celebrated equestrian statue at Charing Cross, we proceeded to St. Paul's: there are many objects worthy of curiosity in passing thither, amongst these we may mention the magnificent structure called Northumberland House. An obscure room, in a very humble pot-house, Fleet-Street, where the great moralist, Dr. Johnson pursued many of his literary labours. The church of St. Dunstan, remarkable for its striking figures, and here, numberless of the light fingered gentry, take their stand, to relieve the unwary visitor of any articles of superfluous apparel, or to dive into the inviting pocket of unsuspecting credulity; not an hour in the day passes, without numbers of persons being collected to gratify an idle curiosity, and seldom one passes without affording profit to the depredators. Approaching to the Metropolitan Church, the corner of Ludgate Hill, as well as its narrowness, militates, against the view of this immense pile, and that which would otherwise fix the stranger in mute and wondering attention, gradually unfolds itself; notwithstanding, there is much to impress the mind with on your approach. As you enter the church yard, on a pedestal stands an almost obliterated figure of Queen Anne; there are three principal entrances, and you ascend to each by an elegant flight of steps. Here as at Westminster Abbey, it is most desirable to enter during the performance of divine service, which is twice a day performed with much state; the vergers in their ornamented silk gowns, bearing silver rods, precede the dignitaries of the Cathedral as they enter, and accompany them to the robing room; we passed the large front gate, as the organ was solemnly playing in the immense space; my companion paused in dumb admiration. Around on every side were exquisite works of art, mementos of the illustrious dead; above hung trophies of British valour of past and later days, the flags of conquered enemies gently waved through the great void; the immense colours of the Santissima Trinidad, which the gallant Nelson vanquished hang round the exterior of the dome, in the centre of which, and designated by a large metal covering, sleeps the hero of a hundred battles, enclosed in the relic of his triumphs,† and surrounded by the emblems of his glory. Amongst the mighty monuments, are those of Howard, Captain Falkner, and Abercrombie, the two last are exquisite works of art; many travellers, and I plead ignorance among the rest, are often decoyed into a search for the monument of the great architect, to which the classical reader is referred, by an inscription in letters of gold under the organ—concluding, "Leetor si queris monumentum—circumspice."—"Reader wouldst thou seek his monument, look around thee,"—never remembering that the structure I was in was the noble monument he had raised to himself.

Here, in traversing these holy aisles the mind is impressed with a religious awe, and the organ hursting into the chorusses in the progress of the service, gradually swells its note till it has filled the fabric, and leaves the sound of its solemnity, as it descends again to that of the choir accompaniment. As soon as the service was ended we proceeded to examine that part of the church, the fret work and rich mosaic pavement, with the rich gildings and mouldings are admirable productions; the altar piece, on which it is impossible to be minute, has been acknowledged a Chef d'œuvre of that description of sacred embellishment; but much chance is not left to the casual visitor of retaining the precise beauties of this or any other building in the metropolis; the guides no sooner form their party, and receive the stipulated mite for the privilege of seeing higher beauties than you are hurried off in the same unbecoming manner, and rapidity of description defies art, but the most retentive of memories, or a frequent recurrence to the same objects, to be gratified by a remembrance of what has been seen, or heard. That miraculous part of the dome called, the whispering gallery, is the first place you are led to, and though from the church it appears at no great elevation, few ever arrive at it without feeling a desire to recruit; the railing of this gallery which is of elegant iron work richly gilt, is at the commencement of the dome, and as soon as the disposition to fall, which is generally experienced at the elevation, has subsided, the matchless paintings. &c. on the top are seen to great advantage. The visitors being ranged opposite to the place of entrance, the guide opens the door, and hanging it to with some violence the sound is like a reverberating peal of thunder, or the discharge of a piece of artillery in a mountainous country; the ear is then applied to the wall, and the guide whispers the particulars of the erection of the church which reaches you in a loud voice: those who wish it, now proceed up a dark and cheerless stair-case, to a room where you are shewn the original model of the church as intended to have been built, a great curiosity; thence to the clock where few go, from fear or weariness, but is well worth the labour; the interior machinery is in most beautiful order, and after prayers are over, you will arrive here about the hour of twelve; it is pleasing as well as curious to watch the breathless anxiety of the visitors as the hammer slowly raises itself to thunder the solemn note of this tremendous bell on the world below; this bell which has been heard at a distance of twenty-three miles, is deafening to the auricular organs, and painful through the intimation of the hour; from hence we proceeded to the top railing—many however relinquished the task, but no sooner had we arrived there, than a tremendous conflagration of great extent was visible in the city, it was soon apparent they were salt-petre works as the casks exploded and blew up vast columns of fire and smoke; from this great elevation a most awful view was commanded, and we were far beyond the height of the highest spires, which with other steeples, we enumerated no less than seventy-three, though the increase of smoke was against us; I shortly after left the fair companions who had towered thus far and with thirteen gentlemen, began to ascend to the bell.

This requires no ordinary resolution, as the ladders are by no means inviting and the passage extremely dark; before we got half way, six of our number had abandoned the enterprize, and I must confess the shame of being outdone, alone urged me to the completion; at last we reached this eminence, and, in aerial majesty, beheld the great and important population of London, as a Lilliput below, and drinking from a midshipman's locker, who had been more considerate than his associates, a glass of wine to the prosperity of the city and the King, we descended, and it is not easy to imagine the feeling which is experienced from so rapid a transition.

To be continued in our next.

MY NATIVE BELLS.

BY MRS. WILSON.

Ye sweetly ring, my native Bells!

Your soft notes float upon the gale;
Till my sad heart responsive swells,
And echoes back your mournful tale.

Ye tell me youth's bright dreams are gone,
And all that charm'd my earlier years;
While I am left to journey on,
A pilgrim through this vale of tears.

Ye say the joys of life's young day—
The hopes that gladden'd ev'ry scene;
Like rain-bow tints have pass'd away,
And left no trace where they have been.

Ye speak of hours too lightly priz'd,
(Regretted now their hopes are fled),
Of follies, thoughtless—unadvised,—
Of friends long lost,—“the chang'd, the dead!”

As waves that kiss the pebbled shore,
Are lost within the trackless main;
Like them life's summer hours pass o'er,
And never can return again!

Still, still ring on, my native Bells!
For as your soft notes fill the gale;
My answering heart responsive swells,
And echoes back your mournful tale!

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

From the Literary Gazette.

A SAILOR'S TALE.

“They that wants pity, why I pities they.”

“Pray, Sir, bestow one ha'penny on a poor child, buy a morsel of bread; indeed I'm very hungry.”
“That was the petition of a little ragged urchin, as he ran by the side of the worthy Captain N—, of the East India service. The ‘pray sir, bestow one ha'penny,’ was so common a sound, that it passed unheeded, but ‘indeed I'm very hungry,’ uttered in a voice of plaintive sorrow, could not be resisted by the humane and generous N—. “Hungry, poor child, while I am living on luxuries: let me see, let me see,” gazing in the lad's face. The tears were trickling down, but so obscured was every feature by dirt, there was nothing to excite satisfaction. They were close to the buttock-of-beef shop, in the Old Bailey; “Aye, aye, let me see,” continued N—, and, grasping the boy's arm, with eagerness entered the house. “Here, my good woman, give this lad as much bread and meat as will make him a hearty meal, d'e hear, and I'll thank you to hear a hand.” The child looked at him with astonishment, burst into tears and caught hold of his hand, but instantly let it go again, with a look of deep humiliation and shame; there was no deception in it, it was the workings of the heart pictured on the countenance. “Look at the yongh dog! there, there, don't be anivelling, you little hypocrite,” while the dew-drop of pity trembled in his own eye. “Where's your parents?” “Parents,” repeated the boy. “Aye, your father and mother.” “I never had any, Sir.” “What's your name?” “Ned, Sir.” “Where do you belong to?” “I don't know, Sir.” “Where do you come from?” “I have been travelling about the country with old Nan, till, yesterday, she brought me here and told me to shift for myself; and indeed, Sir, I think I could work.” “Aye, aye, you've been well tutored, no doubt; there, run along, and sit on yon step and eat your meal.” Away trudg'd the lad, looking first at his victuals and then at his benefactor. “Poor fellow, what's to become of him?” said N—, as he paid the demand and walked into the street; “What's to become of him?” He stopped a moment, and looked towards the spot where the delighted boy was devouring his meal with all the savouriness of real hunger; at this instant, a gentleman tapped him on the shoulder, and together they proceeded for the Jerusalem. Can it be mere fate that regulates our actions? Is there no still small voice that whispers to the soul, soft as the balmy zephyr in the summer's eye? Ah, yes, it is the divinity that stirs within us, else why should this expression be deeply stamped in a moment on the mind of the Captain, the words of our blessed Master, ‘Forasmuch as you have done it unto one of these, you have done it unto me.’ The noise and confusion of Lloyd's, the transacting of business, rise and fall of stocks, the price of freightage, nothing could wear out the recollection of the poor little houseless child of want; and, ‘What's to become of him,’ frequently burst from his lips. As soon as ‘Change was over, away strode the Captain towards Newgate Street, with indescribable sensations of anxiety and feeling; yet without any definite intention—he reached the spot—the child was gone; in vain he inquired at the shop, the woman was ignorant of his route, but said he had come across to thank her, and pray for a blessing on his generous provider. “What, didn't you ask him where he was going, and what he meant to do?” “No, Sir, we have so much to attend to.” N— would have scolded, but conscience told him he had been equally negligent; and thus, perhaps, a useful member was lost to society, or what was worse, he might become its very pest. Quitting the house, he turned down the alley leading to the cloisters of Christ Church, where all the smiling countenances and cheerful looks of the boys, operated like a momentary charm. “And you,” said he, “poor Ned, might have been here, aye, shall be here, if I find you worthy—(till I return from my next voyage, and then you shall go to sea; I know my friend C— would do it for me—but where is he!” He made every inquiry, searched every nook, but his efforts were vain. Leaving money and directions with the woman, that should be made his appearance again, to take care of the lad, he once more pursued his way to his lodgings. What nonsense, thought he, for me to take such interest in the welfare of a little ragged dog I never saw before; perhaps the scout of some infamous wretch, who has brought him up to all manner of wickedness—But avast, no, I cannot be deceived, that look was honest truth; poor fellow, what's to become of him? He had now reached the place against the walls of Newgate, where the porters rest from their burdens, when, by the side of an apple stall, on some straw, lay the unconscious boy fast asleep. “Halloo, you young rascal!” roared the Captain, with a look between a smile and a tear, to the great terror of the lad, who sprang up instantly; “Halloo, what do you mean by giving me all this trouble, arn't I been looking for you this hour, while you lie skulking here in the lee scuppers; come, rouse out.” “God bless him!” said the owner of the stall, apparently in the last stage of a consumption, with an infant at the breast and a child about three years old by her side, “God bless him, my poor little Bess must have gone home hungry if he had not shared his dinner with her.” “Did he,” said N—, throwing down a crown, “then I say God bless him too; but come along,” catching hold of the boy's hand. Regardless of the looks of the assembled crowd, he brushed hastily through them called a hack, jumped into it, and away they drove, the Captain whistling with all his might, Dibdin's song of “The heart that can feel for another.” Arrived at an elegant house in Piccadilly, “Here, Will Junk; Will, where are you? you lazy old swab.” “Here, Sir; here, Sir.” “Take this young scamp and give him a fresh scrape and a paint, and then hand him up into the parlour upon a clean plate.” “Aye, aye, Sir,” replied Will; “come along, young six-foot.” In about half-an-hour the boy was brought up. “Well, now let me see, let me see,” gazing with astonishment on the animated and beautiful countenance of the delighted boy, whose full round eyes sparkled with pleasure;—“Well, Will, what do you make of him?” “I don't know, Sir, can't tell; it's a comical world, Sir.” “Aye, and there's comical creatures in it, Will, comical creatures in it,” giving the old man a look he well understood. “But let me see, come here.” His former questions were repeated, and many others put, but still the boy knew no more than that his name was Ned, and he had wandered about the country with old Nan. “He's got a some't hanging round his neck, Sir,” said Will, “but I wouldn't open it, to be made an Admiral; for I thinks it's a charm.” “Go along, you old blockhead: let me see, let me see.” The boy drew out a small bag closely sewed up. “Where did you get this?”—“I don't know, Sir; I've worn it ever since I can remember.” “I'll open it—no—yes—avast.” He paused a minute, raised the lid of his desk, and deposited it in safety. “Well, Ned, will you live with me?” The boy looked, but he could not speak. “What, dumb founded?” said Will; “d'e hear, will you live with his honour?”—“Yes, for ever,” sobbed the lad, “if he'll let me.” “There, take him down, Will; and to-morrow morning, let him be fresh rigg'd by the time I turn out; and now send my dinner up.”

The father of Captain N— was the son of a wealthy merchant, who, by dint of industry and taking care of the pence, rose by degrees from a very low station to one of great opulence; but his penurious habits still continued, and, though literally rolling in riches, was always haunted by the fears of poverty. At the age of forty he married a young and beautiful female, of engaging manners and amiable disposition. The bear and the lamb were yoked together. On her part it was indeed a sacrifice; for her heart had been engaged to one who was her counter-part; but her father becoming embarrassed, and Mr. N— the principal creditor, how could they reject, or she refuse? Every effort was tried to avert the evil; but ruin came on with rapid strides, and the horrors of want, of pinching poverty, of a jail, resolved the heroic girl to sacrifice herself, to save her sinking family. She sent for her lover. Oh, what an interview was that! They who had pictured future years of mutual happiness; whose hearts were bound in the silken cords of real rich affection; whose existence seemed almost dependent on each other; yes, they met to meet no more; they should live and breathe, and yet be dead to each other for ever. I cannot describe their meeting and their separation; those that can feel will do it for themselves. Her lover left his native land—the land of his fathers—of his childhood, and once his dearest boast. Yes; he left it, and was never heard of more. As the wife of Mr. N—, Amelia endeavoured to discharge her duties with scrupulous attention; but still her thoughts would sometimes wander to the scenes of departed days, and remembrance linger on him who, perhaps, had gone before her to the blessed realms of immortality. The birth of a boy now occupied her mind. None but a mother can tell a mother's delight, when gazing on her first-born; or a father the joy which a father feels, while looking on his smiling babe. But Mr. N—knew not these sensations; he was proud of his child, and loved his wife, as far as his rugged nature would permit; but he was not aware of the treasure he possessed. Immersed in speculations and amassing wealth, he was unacquainted with those little tenderesses, those endearing attentions, so precious to a sensitive mind; and his early education being very imperfect, he was unable to converse on subjects gratifying to an enlightened and liberal understanding. Amelia's chief delight was to watch and tend her blooming boy; and for a few weeks in the year to visit her place of nativity in Devonshire. There, with her parents, she could smile or weep without restraint. Eight years had now passed away since her parting with her heart's first love; and she once more arrived for a short time at the home of her parents. It was a sweet romantic spot, and at a little distance was a lonely wood, where the foot of mortal seldom trod; but it was hallowed to Amelia. There she had passed, oh! how many happy hours, in the society of Henry, as they sat in a small arbor, formed by their own hands with the twisted nut-boughs, upon a turf-raised seat, overspread with downy moss, while the wild thyme breathed its fragrance and the waving flowers their odours on the breeze. Here they would sit and watch the white sail far distant on the ocean, and picture the happy countenance of the mariner, who joyed to see his native land once more; or heave the sigh of lingering regret, as it gradually lessened to a spot just dazling on the horizon, with those who were bidding their own white cliffs adieu: here, too, they had pledged their vows in the presence of the Majesty of heaven. This spot had never been visited since Henry's departure; but the morning after her arrival, Amelia arose, and almost unconsciously advanced towards the place. She reached the opening pathway, between two old embracing oaks, who, like an aged pair passing through life's pilgrimage, had been each other's support through many a winter's storm. An indescribable impulse seemed to urge her on; and, without reflection, she separated the tangled wood, and wound up the ascent: yet did the well-remembered feeling thrill through her heart—the once-cherished hope that they might often meet together there. The umbrageous foliage wept its tears of dew as she hastily passed by the tree where her name was carved—the hazels had formed so thick a canopy above as almost to exclude the light of day—the arbor was now before her; but what were her feelings when she beheld a man kneeling at the mossy seat, in the attitude of prayer! "Henry, Henry!" she shrieked with convulsive agony, sprung to his side, and grasped his hand. Oh! horror, horror! Shriek after shriek followed; for she pressed the fleshless fingers of a dead man's hand, and her eyes rested on the blanched cheek-bones of a human skeleton! Yes, it was Henry. At a short distance was found a bottle, which had contained laudanum, enclosed in a sheet of paper, written in a wild, incoherent manner, leaving no doubt as to the manner or cause of his death, under a total deprivation of mental faculty. * * Amelia awoke once more from a state of lethargic stupefaction to sense and reason. She gave the above brief sketch, clutched her hands, closed her eyes with a shudder, laid her head back upon her pillow, and her pure spirit returned to Him who gave it.

IN PRAISE OF CRANIOLOGY.

You may fag at your school or your college,
You may pant for your ribbands and scars,
But without it you'll never get knowledge,
And never need go to the wars.
Though they dub you a doctor for ever,
Though you fight till you're nothing but stomp,
Who dares be courageous or clever,
If he is deficient in—bump?
Oh, bump, bump, bump!
Cut the nose from my face—but oh, never,
Never curtail me of bump.

Why is a virgin false hearted?
A negro for logic unfit?
A fool and his money soon parted?
And no critic at all in the pit?
Why can't a member make speeches?
An alderman play at hop-jump?
Why should a man's wife wear the breeches?
Because they're deficient in—bump.
Oh, bump, bump, bump!
Magnified, mystified bump!
I ask not love, laurels, or riches,
But give me abundance of—bump.

COMIC PAINTING.

BY THE FACETIOUS CAPT. GROSE.

Of all the different artists who have attempted this style of painting, Hogarth and Coyzel seem to have been the most successful; the works of the first seem to stand unrivalled for invention, expression and diversity of characters. The ludicrous performances of Coyzel are confined to the history of Don Quixote.

On examining divers of Hogarth's designs, we find he strongly adopted the principle here laid down. For example, let us consider the prison scene in the Rake's Progress. How incompatible is it for a man who professes wings and the art of flying, to be detained within the walls of a gaol; and equally contradictory is the idea of one suffering for the non-payment of his own debts, who has the secret of discharging those of the nation!

In the Four Times of the Day, what can be more truly consonant with the scene near Islington, where, in the sultry heat of summer, a number of fat citizens are crowded together in a small room, by the side of a dusty road smoking their pipes, in order to enjoy the refreshment of country air? In the Gate of Calais, how finely does the fat friar's person and enthusiastic admiration of the huge surloin, mark that sensuality so incompatible with his profession; the fundamental principles of which dictate abstinence and mortification? In that admirable and comic print, the Enraged Musician, the humour lies solely in the incompatible situation of the son of Apollo, whose ear, trained to melodious and harmonious sounds, is thereby rendered extremely unfit to bear the tintamarre, or confusion of discordant noises, with which the painter has so ludicrously and ingeniously surrounded him.

The picture of Grown Gentlemen learning to Dance, painted by Collet, was well conceived; and though infinitely short of Hogarth's execution, had a very pleasing effect, both on the canvass and on the stage, where it was introduced into a pantomime. In this piece, every person was, by form or age, totally unfit for the part he was acting.

Anachronisms have likewise a very laughable effect. King Solomon in all his glory, delineated in a tye or bag wig, laced cravat, long ruffles, and a full dressed suit, will always cause a smile; as would also the siege of Jerusalem, where the emperor Titus and his aid-de-camp should be represented in the fore-ground, dressed in great wigs and jack boots,—their horses decorated with laced furniture, holsters, and pistols; in the distance a view of the town, amidst the fire of cannons and mortars. Our theatrical representations afford plenty of these ridiculous absurdities,—where we frequently see the chamber of Cleopatra furnished with a table, clock, and harpsichord, or a pianoforte, or the hall of Marc Antony with a large chimney garnished with muskets, blunderbusses, fowling-pieces,

Nothing affords greater scope for ludicrous representations, than the universal rage with which particular fashions of dress are followed by persons of all ranks, ages, sizes, and makes, without the least attention to their figures or stations. Habillaments also, not ridiculous in themselves, become so by being worn by improper persons, or at improper places. Thus, though the full-bottomed wig adds dignity to a venerable judge, we should laugh at it on the head of a boyish counsel; and though a tye-wig lends gravity to a counsellor or physician, it contributes greatly to the ludicrous equipment of a mountebank, a little chimney-sweeper dancing round the May-day Garland, or one of the candidates for the borough of Garrat in the procession to that election; a high head, and a large hoop, worn in a stage coach, or a full dressed suit and a sword at a horse race, are equally objects of ridicule.

Respectable characters, unworthily employed, are objects for the ludicrous pencil. Such would be a lord mayor or an alderman in his gold chain, dancing a hornpipe, or a sergeant-at-law in his coif, band, and spectacles, standing up at a reel or cotillion. Employments accidentally improper may make a character ridiculous, and that for those very circumstances which, in another situation, render it respectable. Thus, a military or naval officer dancing a minuet with a wooden leg, exhibits a truly ludicrous appearance,—consider the same person walking or standing, and his wooden leg makes him an object of respect, as a sufferer in the cause of his country.

Besides these general subjects, there are others which, like the stage tricks, will always ensure the suffrages of the vulgar; among them are national jokes,—as, an Irishman on horse-back, carrying a heavy portmanteau on his head, to ease his horse of its weight; a Welshman with his goat, leek, hay boots, and long pedigree; a Scotchman with his scrubbing-post, and a meagre Frenchman in his laced jacket and bag, having long ruffles to his sleeves, without a shirt. Of this kind are professional allusions:—a physician and apothecary are lawful game, by prescription; a tailor by trade; and a mayor, alderman, or churchwarden, ex officio.

Inducious representations of sublime or serious subjects, have often unintentionally been productive of pictures highly ridiculous; of this a striking instance occurs in a history of the Bible, adorned with plates, in one of which the following text of the 7th chapter of St. Matthew, verse the 3d, is illustrated:—"And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?" The state of these two men is thus delineated by the artist:—one of them has in his eye a complete castle, with a moat and its appurtenances; and from the eye of the other projects a large beam, like the girder of a house.

To conclude the instances of these accidentally ludicrous pictures, I shall just mention one which a gentleman of veracity assured me he saw at the Exposition des Tableaux at Paris. The subject was the death of the late dauphin, which the painter had treated in the manner following:—on a field bed, decorated with all those fluttering ornaments of which the French are so peculiarly fond, lay the dauphin, pale and emaciated; by it stood the dauphiness weeping over him, in the affected attitude of an opera dancer. She was attended by her loving children; and in the clouds, hovering over them, was the Duke of Burgundy, their deceased son, and two embryos, the product of as many miscarriages; the angel duke was quite naked, except that the order of the Saint Esprit was thrown across his shoulders.—Somerset House Weekly Miscellany.

THE LARGE RADISH.

I like the old custom 'tween subjects and kings,
Of presents exchanging and such kindly things:

For both ruler and ro'ld it is good:
The prince thus discovers his people him love;
And subjects the justice of princes thus prove:
Read my story 'tis soon understood.

When France's 4th Henry had humbled his foes,
And the league* being tired were fain to repose;
As the king was turned catholic quite:

The priests who were influence losing each day;
Having sought to do better betook them to pray;
No pretence left to cavil or fight.

A peasant from Normandy hasten'd to court,
Where the numerous day-flies of summer resort,
Of good wishes a load to discharge;
As, "god save your majesty! long may you live!"
But nothing besides had the rustic to give,
Save a radish enormously large.

The choice of his garden, and such a rare root
Was scarcely known ever from seed forth to shoot;
And his majesty took it as meant:
The donor he knew to be honest and true,
And though Monsieur Sully † look'd rather askew;
The man returned home well content.

A Seigneur de Village, who heard the folks tell,
Of his going to court and succeeding so well;
Of his luck somewhat envious, said;
"For a present so worthless an hundred good crowns!
Astomishing! and to a bumpkin too! zounds!
Success must have turned the king's head.

Suppose something worthy a king I present,
My fortune is made, nothing can it prevent!"
So straight he repairs to his stud,
And chooses a courser of true English breed;
Perhaps a progenitor of that fam'd steed
Hight Sherwood, of mettle and blood.

This steed for rich trappings all others outvied;
In short he was fit for a king to bestride:
Then the squire while his project is warm;
Hastes with him to Paris, his sov'reign finds out,
Surrounded by nobles and knights bold and stout;
And his present he makes in due form.

The monarch was gracious, to him, as to all
Who his presence approach'd, high and low great and small;
And pleas'd with this token of duty;
The animal's port did not cease to admire,
His finely form'd figure, his strength and his fire,
His symmetry, merit, and beauty.

Then musing a moment, call'd out quick as thought;
"Hollo there! my radish!"—the radish is brought—
Says the king "I present you this root,
The most rare of its kind, from a distance it came;
I beg you will therefore, accept of this same;
And my thanks for your present to boot."

Manchester, Nov. 12, 1823.

G. G.

* This was a considerable number of priests, at the head of whom was the pope, the king of Spain, and the duc de Mayenne: their ostensible object was to hinder Henry, as a protestant, from succeeding to the crown of France.
† The duc de Sully, Henry's minister: he was very economical with regard to the public treasure.

MY FIRST FOLLY.

Abridged from Knight's Quarterly Magazine.

"Do you take trifle?" said Lady Olivia to my poor friend Halloran.

"No, Ma'am, I am reading philosophy," said Halloran, winking from a fit of abstraction, with about as much consciousness and perception as exists in a petrified oyster, or an alderman dying of a surfeit.—Halloran is a fool.

Trifles constitute my summum bonum. Sages may crush them with the heavy train of argument and syllogism: schoolboys may assail them with the light artillery of essay and of theme; members of parliament may loath, doctors of divinity may condemn:—bag wigs and big wigs, blue devils and blue stockings, sophistry and sermons, reasonings and wrinkles, Solon, Thales, Newton's Principia, Mr. Walker's Evidouranon, the King's bench, the bench of Bishops—all these are serious antagonists; very serious!—but I care not; I defy them; I dote upon trifles; and my name is Vyvyan Joyeuse, and my motto is 'Vive la Bagatelle.'

I never fell seriously in love till I was seventeen. Long before that period I had learned to talk nonsense and tell lies, and had established the important points that a delicate figure is equivalent to a thousand pounds, a pretty mouth better than the bank of England, and a pair of bright eyes worth all Mexico. But at seventeen a more intricate branch of study awaited me.

I was lounging away my June at a pretty village in Kent, with little occupation beyond my own meditations, and no company but my horse and dogs. My sisters were both in the south of France; and my uncle, at whose seat I had pitched my camp, was attending to the interests of his constituents and the wishes of his patron in Parliament. I began after the lapse of a week to be immensely bored; I felt a considerable dislike of an agricultural life, and an incipient inclination for laudanum.

My uncle had a delightful library where a reasonable man might have lived and died. But I confess I never could endure a long hour of lonely reading, so I deserted Sir Roger's Library, and left his Marmontel and his Aristotle to the slumbers from which I had unthinkingly awakened them.

At last I was roused from a state of most Persian torpor by a note from an old lady, whose hall, for so an indifferent country-house was by courtesy denominated, stood at the distance of a few miles. She was about to give a ball. Such a thing had not been seen for ten years within ten miles of us. From the sensation produced by the intimation you might have deemed the world at an end. Prayers and entreaties were offered up to all the guardians and all the milliners; and the old gentlemen rose in a passion, and the old lace rose in price. Every thing was everywhere in a flurry; kitchen, and parlour, and boudoir, and garret,—Babel all! Ackerman's Fashionable Repository, the Ladies' Magazine, the New Pocket-book, all these, and all other publications whose frontispieces presented the 'fashions for 1817,' personified in a thin lady with kid gloves and a formidable obliquity of vision, were in earnest and immediate requisition. Every occupation was laid down, every carpet was taken up; every combination of hands-a-cross and d-wn the middle was committed most laudably to memory; and nothing was talked, nothing was meditated, nothing was dreamed, but love and romance, fiddles and flirtation, warm negus and handsome partners, dyed feathers and chalked floors.

In all the pride and condescension of an inmate of Grovesnor Square, I looked upon Lady Motley's 'At Home.' "Yes," I said, flinging away the card with a tragedy twist of the fingers,—"yes: I will be there. For one evening I will encounter the tedium and the taste of a village ball.

"Come one, come all,
Come dance in Sir Roger's great Hall"

I went. The first face I encountered on my entrance was that of my old friend Villars; I was delighted to meet him.

"By Mercury," he exclaimed, "I am metamorphosed, fairly metamorphosed, my good Vyvyan; I have been detained here three months by a fall from Sir Peter. Come! I am of little service to-night, but my popularity may be of use to you: you don't know a soul!—I thought so;—read it in your face the moment you came in,—never saw such a—there, Vyvyan, look there! I will introduce you." And so saying my companion have limped, half danced with me up to Miss Amelia Mesnil, and presented me in due form.

When I look back to any particular scene of my existence, I can never keep the stage clear of second-rate characters. And thus, beautiful Margaret, it is in vain that I endeavour to separate your fascination from the group which was collected around you.

First comes Amelia the magnificent, the acknowledged belle of the county, very stiff and very dumb in her unheeded and uncontested supremacy; and next, the most black-browed of foxhunters, Augusta, enumerating the names of her father's stud, and dancing as if she imitated them; and then the most accomplished Jane, vowing that for the last month she had endured immense ennui, that she thinks Lady Olivia prodigiously fade, that her cousin Sophy is quite brillante to-night, and that Mr. Peters plays the violin à merveille.

"I am bored, my dear Villars,—positively bored! the light is bad and the music abominable; there is no spring in the boards and less in the conversation; it is a lovely moonlight night, and there is nothing worth looking at in the room."

I shook hands with my friend, bowed to three or four people, and was moving off. As I passed to the door I met two ladies in conversation; "Don't you dance any more, Margaret?" said one. "Oh no," replied the other, "I am bored, my dear Louisa,—positively bored; the light is bad and the music abominable; there is no spring in the boards and less in the conversation; it is a lovely moonlight night, and there is nothing worth looking at in the room."

I never was distanced in a jest. I put on the look of a ten years' acquaintance, and commenced parley. "Surely you are not going away yet; you have not danced with me, Margaret; it is impossible you can be so cruel!" The lady behaved with wonderful intrepidity. "She would allow me the honour,—but I was very late;—really I had not deserved it;—and so we stood up together.

"Are you not very impertinent?"

"Very; but you are very handsome. Nay: you are not to be angry; it was a fair challenge, and fairly received."

"And you will not even ask my pardon?"

"No! it is out of my way! I never do those things; it would embarrass me beyond measure. Pray let us accomplish an introduction: not altogether an usual one; but that matters little. Vyvyan Joyeuse—rather impertinent, and very fortunate—at your service."

"Margaret Orleans,—very handsome, and rather foolish,—at your service!"

Margaret danced like an angel. I knew she would. I could not conceive by what blindness I had passed four hours without being struck.

She talked well on all subjects and wittily on many. I had expected to find nothing but a romping girl, somewhat amusing, and very vain. But I was out of my latitude in the first five minutes, and out of my senses in the next. She left the room very early, and I drove home, more astonished than I had been for many years. Several weeks passed away, and I was about to leave England to join my sisters on the Continent. I determined to look once more on that enslaving smile, whose recollection had haunted me more than once. I had ascertained that she resided with an old lady who took two pupils, and taught French and Italian, and music and manners at an establishment called Vine House. Two days before I left the country, I had been till a late hour shooting at a mark with a duelling pistol, an entertainment, of which perhaps from a lurking presentiment, I was very fond. I was returning alone when I perceived, by the light of an enormous lamp, a board by the way-side bearing the welcome inscription, "Vine House." "Enough," I exclaimed, enough! one more scene before the curtain drops,—Romeo and Juliet by lamplight!"—I roamed about the dwelling-place of all I held dear, till I saw a figure at one of the windows in the back of the house, which it was quite impossible to doubt. I leaned against a tree in a sentimental position, and began to chant my own rhymes.

"Are they your own verses?" said my idol at the window.

"They are yours, Margaret! I was only the versifier; you were the muse herself."

"The muse herself is obliged to you. And now what is your errand? for it grows late, and you must be sensible—no, that you never will be—but you must be aware, that this is very indecorous."

"I am come to see you, dear Margaret;—which I cannot without candles;—to see you, and to tell you, that it is impossible I can forget—"

"Bless me! what a memory you have. But you must take another opportunity for your tale! for—"

"Alas! I leave England immediately!"

"A pleasant voyage to you! there, not a word more; I must run down to coffee."

"Now may I never laugh more," I said, "if I am baffled thus;" so I strolled back to the front of the house and proceeded to reconnoitre. A bay-window was half open, and in a small neat drawing-room I perceived a group assembled:—an old lady, with a high muslin cap and red ribbons, was pouring out the coffee;—her nephew, a tall awkward young gentleman, sitting on one chair and resting his legs on another, was occupied in the study of Sir Charles Grandison;—and my fair Margaret was leaning on a sofa, and laughing immoderately. "Indeed, Miss," said the matron, "you should learn to govern your mirth; people will think you came out of Bedlam."

I lifted the window gently, and stepped into the room. "Bedlam, madam!" quoth I, "I bring intelligence from Bedlam, I arrived last week."

The tall awkward young gentleman stared: and the aunt half said, half shrieked,—"What in the name of wonder are you?"

"Mad, madam! very particularly mad! mad as a hare in March, or a Cheapside blood on Sunday morning. Look at me! do I not foam? listen to me! do I not rave?—Coffee, my dear madam, coffee; there is no animal so thirsty as your madman in the dog-days."

"Eh! really!" said the tall awkward young gentleman.

"My good sir," I began;—but my original insanity began to fail me, and I drew forth with upon Ossian's,—"Fly! receive the wind and fly; the blasts are in the hollow of my hand, the course of the storm is mine!"

"Eh! really!" said the tall awkward young gentleman.

"I look on the nations and they vanish: my nostrils pour the blast of death: I come abroad on the winds; the tempest is before my face; but my dwelling is calm, above the clouds; the fields of my rest are pleasant."

"Do you mean to insult us?" said the old lady.

"Ay! do you mean to insult my aunt?—really!" said the tall awkward young gentleman. "I shall call in my servants," said the old lady.

"I am the humblest of them," said I, bowing. "I shall teach you a different tune," said the tall awkward young gentleman, "really!"

"Very well, my dear sir; my instrument is the barrel organ;" and I cocked my sweet little pocket companion in his face, "Vanish, little Kastril; for by Hannibal, Heliogabalus, and Holophernes, time is valuable; madness is precipitate, and hair-triggers are the word: vanish!"

"Eh! really!" said the tall awkward young gentleman, and performed an entrechat which carried him to the door: the old lady had disappeared at the first note of the barrel organ. I locked the door, and found Margaret in a paroxysm of laughter. "I wish you had shot him," she said, when she recovered, "I wish you had shot him: he is a sad fool."

"Do not talk of him; I am speaking to you, beautiful Margaret, possibly for the last time! Will you ever think of me? perhaps you will. But let me receive from you some token that I may dote upon in other years; something that may be a hope in my happiness, and a consolation in calamity. Something—nay! I never could talk romance; but give me one lock of your hair, and I will leave England with resignation."

"You have earned it like a true knight," said Margaret; and she severed from her head a long glossy ringlet. "Look," she continued, "you must to horse, the country has risen for your apprehension." I turned towards the window. The country had indeed risen. Nothing was to be seen but gossoons in the van, and gossips in the rear, red faces and white jackets, gallants in smock frocks, and gay damsels in grogram. Bludgeons were waving, and torches were flashing, as far as the gaze could reach. All the chivalry of the place was arming and charging, and loading for a valley of pebbles and oaths together.

I kneeled down and kissed her hand. It was the happiest moment of my life! "Now," said I, "au revoir, my sweet Margaret," and in a moment I was in the lane.

"Gentlemen, be pleased to fall back!—farther yet,—a few paces farther! Stalwert Kern, in buckskin, be pleased to lay down your cat-o'-nine-tails!—Old knight of the plush jerkin, ground your poker!—So, fair damsel with the pitchfork, you are too pretty for so rude an encounter!—Most miraculous Magog, with the sledge-hammer, flit!—Sooty Cupid, with the link, light me from Paphos.—Ha! tall friend of the barrel-organ, have you turned staff-officer? Etna and Vesuvius!—wild fire and wit!—blunderbusses and steam!—fly. Ha! have I not Burgundy in my brain, murder in my plot, and a whole train of artillery in my coat-pocket." Right and left the ranks opened for my egress, and in a few minutes I was alone on the road, and whistling "lillibullero."

This was my first folly. I looked at the lock of hair often, but I never saw Margaret again.

She has become the wife of a young clergyman, and resides with him on a small living in Staffordshire. I believe she is very happy, and I have forgotten the colour of her eyes.

THE NEGRO'S LAMENTATION.

The correspondent who has transmitted us the following "Extract of a letter from Demerara" we presume is acquainted with the facts it contains, for although there is a sublimity of sentiment in the soliloquy superior to what we should expect from an ignorant negro, the picture is too well, and too interestingly drawn not to claim our attention.—Ed.

"Twas night—and o'er nature's works, solemn silence and placid quiet reigned triumphant; no sound of tools or negro's wail, joined with the voice, of the iron hearted task master, now pierced the unwilling ear—all nature seemed hush'd—and sleep with her healing bands, had twined alike the senses of the arduous planter and suffering negro in sweet obliviousness.

"Twas the hour of meditation,—and held sacred to reflection—withdrawing a short distance from plantation house, there seated upon a bank free from sibilant reptiles,—thought upon the heatitude of England's happy clime, and the halcyon days I there had spent; scarcely had I enjoyed my pleasant reverie for half an hour when I was aroused from my momentary stupor, by the heart rending laments and piteous wails of some unfortunate creature in all the agonies of despair. Drawing near the spot whence these sounds proceeded, I perceived, at a short distance from me, a negro leaning against a tree with his arms now extended imploring towards heaven, now crouched submissively upon his breast, with eyes rivetted on a small tumulus before him, (seemed by his attention to it, as if it contained his better half) broke out into the lamentation, which I have written as correctly as my memory will allow, is a subsequent part of my letter.

O my dear child! solace of all my woes! hope of my old age, my darling joy! thou wast the bark upon which I launched all my earthly hopes, art thou gone to that place from which thou must never return? and what worms now career in those eyes? whose affectionate beam comforted me in all my woes and eased all my toils—horrible certainly. O my son! thou hast left thy wretched father to eke out his few remaining days in turmoil and trouble: no obeying hand now, to support his fainting frame! no pitying eye beamed with affection's tear for my unmerited sufferings! and when death (terrible thought!) shall come and lay his rigid hand upon me, no friend near me to close my eyelids, no son upon whom I could cast my last lingering look! no child to comfort me when I must render back my soul to him who gave it—how different was the course which my romantic imagination had traced out for thee, when first I took thee in my arms a smiling cherub fresh from thy maker's hands! I had thought I have gained thy manumission—but 'tis over—all my hopes had vanished.

Peace to thy shade! may it hover round me still my guardian angel! as thou wast when living—no more shall my wearied soul aspire to freedom, since it has wrecked all my hopes, in the unfathomable gulf of demerity. Boast! boast! ye tyrant Britons! still hold your glorious land of freedom, which the moment the slave's foot touches, his shackles fall from him and he is free! if it be true I know not, but feel the terrible certainty, that when his cursed foot prints Africa's happy shore, the land is contaminated and he enslaves it. Farewell! adieu my—

Here is passion choked his utterance—he fell prostrate on the grave of his unfortunate son.

I knew him well—he was a favourite slave of my friend Nevison's, who treated him kindly, and has recently manumitted him.

The son whom he so piteously laments, had been persuaded to join the rebels on the memorable 18 August, and was wounded in the first fire of the 18th November, but dragged his way home to his masters, and expired in the arms of his father.

SONNET

TO J. MONTGOMERY, ESQ.

Come, cried the pensive Muse, and I will lead
Ye, my lov'd passions, to the sylvan bow'r,
Where the lone bard—Montgomery—woos my pew'r;
And He—as we attentive list—shall read.

'Tis done—while silence lean'd to hear thy lay—
Hope gaily smil'd and whisper'd pleasures near;
While valour grasp'd with nerved arm his spear;
And virtue own'd the magic of thy sway:

Still as thou read'st the various passions rose:
Religion knelt and rais'd to hear a her eyes—
Angelic pity wept ideal woes;—
And love enchanted breath'd his rhapsodies:

The Muse delighted—heard applauses breathe—
And bound around thy brow her proudest wreath,
Manchester. CASWIN.

PARODY.

Oh! say not woman's heart is cold,
Or lost to every feeling;
Mark but that look,—that glance behold
Whilst every care revealing,
And sure 'twill prove that each fond thought,
With kind compassion's glowing;
When love and pity melt the soul,
And burning tears are flowing.

Oh! say not woman's tear is false,
Or that it flows at telling;
It is the soft perceptive glow,
Which melts without compelling;
The flush that lights up beauty's cheeks,
Whilst every care revealing,
Her warm expressive soul bespeaks,—
Bespeaks her gen'rous feeling.

AN EYE TO THE FUTURE.

A man had a horse, as of old it is said,
Which once took the freedom to toss o'er its head
His wife, when endeavoring his spirit to check,
And in doing so, broke her most beautiful neck.
For a twelvemonth he mourn'd as good husbands
should do,

Lamented her sore—(if the story be true?)
But reasons there are his affection to doubt,
As all will agree when the tale is made out.
Mr. True-love a neighbour, who, plagued with his dame
Had heard of this nag's woman-slaughtering fame,
His parts and his paces, of all had heard tell,
Had "had carried a lady" he knew "very well:"
So straight to his master he went in a trice,
Had begg'd him to fix on his horse-flesh a price;
'For, whatever it is I'm determin'd to buy,
And as for his virtues, I don't need to try;
Is he'll answer may purpose I know to a T,
'e quickly decide what the sum is to be—"
But the owner soon stopp'd him and said "'Tis not well, or though I don't ride him, I don't mean to sell.
Indeed!" said the other, "not use, and still keep?
'Why, sure to your interest you must be asleep,
and really I think you the oddest of men;"
Not so," replied he, "I may marry again!"

FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

WALKING DRESS.

A pelisse of gros de Naples, of a barbel blue, ornamented on the front with a richly embossed serpentine waving of in; the bust, which is made to wrap over on the right side, has the same kind of trimming to the skirt; between each low of which is a small silk button, of the most unrivalled finish, though apparently simple: a blue satin belt engirds the waist, fastened in front with a gold buckle. The sleeves are puffed, but not very full; and the cuff, at the wrist, is finished by indented antique squares; but they turned back, which is an improvement. The ruffles are of fine lace, vandyked. A double muff of Mechlin lace surmounts the pelisse. The bonnet is of white figured gros de Naples, crowned with a simple bouquet of double blue hyacinth, and tied with barbel blue ribbon; a lace or blond corsette is worn underneath; and a white gauze veil is thrown in careless drapery over the left side of the bonnet.

A gold chain, with a large prospective-eye-glass, is generally adopted with this dress, and a ridicule of white gros de Naples. Half boots, of corded silk, of a barbel blue, and lemon-coloured kid gloves.

EVENING DRESS.

Frock of tulle, over a slip of lavender-coloured satin, with white satin ornaments en clochettes round the border, divided by narrow puffs of an oblong form; and next, or rather terminating the hem, one narrow flounce of double tulle. The corsage is of lavender-coloured satin, ornamented round the tucker part of the bust with puffs of white net, en bouf-fants, with a bow of lavender satin in front, and one on each shoulder. The sleeves are short, and are also of lavender satin, ornamented with pearls, and finished by one row of fine broad blond. Fatina turban of lavender, or celestial blue gauze, lightly entwined with pearls, and adorned with a few wheat ears, formed of the same valuable article; the hair is ranged in beautiful ringlets over the face, which is not obscured, but embellished by this light dressing, and this is all the display of hair that is seen under this tasteful head-dress. Necklace of twisted pearls, from which depend Arabian talismanic ornaments, as low as the girdle, terminated by rich tassels of turquoise beads, headed by gold amulets, on which are engraved Arabic characters. A carved ivory fan, white satin shoes, and white kid gloves, complete this truly fascinating and elegant costume.

VARIETIES.

We have heard of the fall of Lucifer, and the fall of Cromwell, and the fall of Wolsey, but one of the pleasantest tumbles upon record was that of a Mr.
Fell, who, when he removed from one part of the metropolis to another, wrote over his door, "I Fell from Holborn-hill."

One day, during the late sale at Wanstead House, the old gate-keeper at Lea Bridge, was accosted by a gentleman on horse-back with—"Well, what's the news to day?" "Nothing in particular," replied the old man,
'only they say that Long Wellesley has shot himself;
is it true?' "True enough," replied the other. "Well, then, it's a very good job," said the old man. Immediately after, an elderly gentleman came through, and inquired of the old man if he knew the gentleman just before him. "No, sir," was the reply. "Why, that," says the other, "was Mr. L. Wellesley!" "Then I have made a sad mistake," said the old man, "but it's too late to mend it." In the evening Mr. Wellesley returned, and, on passing the gate, very good humouredly inquired of the old man, if there was any thing new afloat? "No," says he, "only it is true Mr. Wellesley has shot himself, for he told me so himself this morning."

BEARDS.—The high estimation which beards were held in of old, is proved by the history of the manners of every civilised region of the world. Indeed the disputes that occurred from time to time upon the mode of wearing the hair, has not unfrequently been as fatal to the contending parties, as those originating in matters of faith, or civil policy. Baldwin, Prince of Edessa, pawned his beard for a great sum of money, which beard was redeemed by his father Gabriel, Prince of Mitilene, with a vast treasure, to prevent the ignominy which his son must have been exposed to, by the loss of that venerable characteristic of man. The modern fops might well smile, on reading of the time which certain city beaux spent under the hands of a barber in the days of beards. One, a Mr. Richard Shute, a London merchant, in the time of Charles, says his grand-daughter, Mrs. Thomas, "was very nice in the mode of that age, his waist being some hours every morning in starching his beard, and car-ring his Whiskers: during which time, a gentleman whom he maintained as a companion, always read to him upon some useful subject."

A GOOD SHOT.—If we are to receive Shakspeare's authority for a fact, we must acknowledge that the famed Douglas, the Scot, was as good a marksman with a pistol bullet, as any of your modern gamblers.
Prince Henry, in speaking of his gallant enemy, says,
"He that rides at high speed, and with his pistol kills a sparrow flying." Our sagacious critic Johnson considers this a poetical anachronism. He says pistols were not then known.

Prince Rupert's skill in firing at a mark, we have,
however, on the evidence of eye witnesses, of whom King Charles I. was one. Prince Rupert being at Stafford, in the time of the Civil War, while standing in the garden of Captain Richard Speyde, who had taken up arms for the King, and at about sixty yards distance, made a shot at the weather-cock upon the steeple of the Collegiate Church of Saint Mary, with a screwed horseman's pistol, and single bullet, which pierced its tail; the bullet hole plainly appearing to all that were below; which the King presently judged to be a casualty only. Prince Rupert, however, immediately proved the contrary, by a second shot to the same effect. This is recorded by Dr. Plot, in his History of Staffordshire.

MISERIES OF LOVE.

"Mrs. Seymour," says the lover, "smiled at my declaration, but her smile was rather marked by incredulity than approval; I saw this, and was preceding to meet the scruples I thought the abruptness of my passion might have raised, when she asked me in a good-natured tone, if I was fully aware of Maria's situation. I precipitately answered in the affirmative, and confessed the whole of what the box-keeper had told me. Mrs. Seymour began to look serious, and requested to know if I had made a minute inquiry, or received more explicit information. Wondering at the oddness of this question, I answered, no, and was proceeding to state, that as beauty, character, and accomplishments were the only things I aspired to possess, the fortune of her daughter would neither constitute an allurements, nor force an objection. "On that point, sir," replied my projected mother-in-law, "your most sanguine hopes might be gratified; but there is one obstacle to a union with my daughter, which I fear you will find insuperable."—"I find insuperable! I, madam, who am devoured with eagerness to call her mine—and let the tenderness with which I shall meet her evince the warmth of my attachment! Impossible!" "But have you heard, sir, that Maria has had the misfortune?"—"I felt a cold perspiration creep over me as I strove in vain to quit my chair, and it was with exceeding difficulty that I could articulate, "How, madam! has Miss Seymour been so?"—"when the old lady interrupted me with fresh earnestness, "Have you never heard that my daughter has got—" "Got!—Heavens—is it possible so much loveliness can be?"—"It is too true, sir: by a trifling slip in early life she has got"—"Got what, madam?—for Heaven's sake relieve the cruel suspense," cried I, jumping up by a violent effort.—"Oh, sir," said Mrs. Seymour, with a sigh that sounded like a preface to a tale of woe—"Alas! sir, my poor dear daughter"—sobbed the deeply affected old lady, covering her face with her handkerchief, "has got—A WOODEN LEG!"

One, cut deep into the head in a foolish fray, came to a surgeon to be dressed; who, searching to see if his brains were not perished, and not easily finding them, "Oh!" quoth he, "do you think I have any brains, that so rashly entered into a brawl?"

NEGRO LOGIC.

When a slave, says Mr. Stewart, in his work on Jamaica, makes free with his master's property, he thus ingeniously argues: "What I take from my master, being for my use, who am his property, he loses nothing by its transfer."

RUSSIAN CLERGY.

Mrs. Henderson, in a letter published in the Missionary Herald, says, that at the time when a Bible Society was formed in Novgorod, Russia, there were many of the clergy who had never seen a Bible, and, on hearing of it, asked what kind of a book it was.

POLAR EXPEDITION.

It is understood, that the Admiralty have in contemplation to commission the Discovery Ships for another voyage to the Polar Seas, with this difference, that their route is now to be by Behring's Straits; whence they will sail eastward. The distance which must be traversed before they can well be said to commence proceeding to the object of their mission, and the consequent difficulty of reserving the necessary supplies, have hitherto been the obstacles to the attempt by this passage. This latter impediment it is proposed to obviate, by sending a supernumerary vessel laden with necessaries, which will probably accompany them to the neighbourhood of the Kamchatkan coast. Capt. Parry is again to take the command.

THE DRAMA.

THEATRE ROYAL.—Mr. Mathews, as he always does, drew a most respectable and crowded audience at our Theatre on Saturday night, in the character of Goldfinch, in the Road to Ruin.—He is indeed always at home, and his personification of this gay character was most happily hit off. His self-possession, and laughter looking features, forcibly reminded us of Liston, and it will by no means detract from Mr. Mathews' original cast of character, to draw the comparison.

Miss Rock in Sophia was excellent, we had almost said charming, and she met with that rapturous applause which her exertions and talents most justly entitle her to.

Monsieur Tonson followed, and if we had ever entertained a gloomy idea it would have vanished when Morbleu appeared.—The versatility of talent which Mathews elicits, gives us some hopes that we might yet expect to see him pine in Romeo, or rave in Lear.

MINOR THEATRE.—Mr. Farrell is treating the Manchester public with a display of the beautiful stud of Horses belonging to Mr. Adams.—We were much pleased as well as surprised at the splendour in which the Secret Mine has been got up, which does credit to the spirit of the Manager; we wish we could add that the house justified a supposition that his exertions would be suitably recompensed.—The processions were well arranged, and as well performed, and the scenery and dresses elegant. Mr. Grierson did justice to Ismael, and Mr. Emley made much of the simple Chinese. The quadrupeds had, however, as much of popular applause as the bipeds.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I should wish to enquire, as we are now approaching the most dreary and comfortless part of the winter, if it would not be a matter of great utility to light some of our public clocks with gas.

What a commanding situation, for instance, the Infirmary would be, and how beneficial to every one who passes that way.

Salford Chapel was proceeded in to completion; can any of your readers inform me of the reason of its discontinuance? the abandonment of such an undertaking, at such a time, seems to betray a neglect or a remissness not easily to be conjectured. Ycur's, Piccadilly, Nov. 12th, 1823.

RADIUS.

DEFENCE OF THE SYSTEM OF GRATUITOUS EDUCATION.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—You have repeatedly stated your willingness to allow general subjects to be freely and fairly discussed, in order that they may, by investigation be duly estimated, and but for this rule which you seem to have laid down for yourself, and which is very well as a general principle, I should never have expected to see in the Iris the weak and obtrusive attack upon our public establishments of education, which was published a few weeks ago in a letter signed "A Buyer of Calicos," an attack which I am surprised to find has been suffered to pass without a proper reply from some of the excellent persons who advocate and promote the reprobated charity; which consistently with the purest benevolence has for its object to circulate, "the benefit of knowledge and the blessings of religion."

The nature of these objections is such as must prevent them from producing any particular impression, they are only fit to be read and forgotten, and as they are incapable of defence, I am sure they will not find an advocate: for persons in low life have a right to do all in their power to raise themselves; and the children of persons in middle circumstances, whatever sacrifices their parents may have made to procure an education, ought not in this case to have any particular favor shown to them: the state of events ought not to be altered to prevent their degradation.—the flood gates of knowledge, which will promote a universal vegetation of intellectual excellence, should not be shut to preclude those changes in society which your correspondent anticipates and laments.

If education be a good thing it ought to have unlimited diffusion, and its influence, like the sun's, should be equally felt by all. It is asserted that religion suffers by this circulation of learning, since it leads to investigation and sorting among persons who are incompetent to judge, and who are often found to prefer ingenious paradox and error to simplicity and truth. But this objection will be of no avail with those who remember that the plan of universal instruction is patronized by some of the most pious ministers in every religious persuasion; and as for those who contend that education makes the lower orders discontented with their situation, and not so willing to labour in their proper sphere when they see that they have knowledge above it, why truly the notions of such persons are unworthy of comment, more particularly so, as the poor have a hard fate, and the sooner they can improve it the better.

I have now, Sir, clearly shewn that your correspondent's opinion upon the subject of charitable education, cannot be supported, and consequently that the system of gratuitously teaching the offspring of the indigent, is perfectly consistent with the principles of reason and the preservation of religion, and that every objection advanced against it must be as powerless as the rock which is dashed against the rock, and as fruitless as the chaff which is scattered in the wind.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We beg to call the attention of our correspondents to the letter of Investigator inserted in this page.—There seems to exist such a contrariety of opinion on this subject, that we shall be glad to see it fully and candidly discussed. We repeat however, that those who enter into the controversy will, as much as possible, confine themselves to the subject. Its system in question must produce a great revolution in the state of society, and, therefore, it merits an impartial and serious examination.

We have been applied to, but in a very obscure way, to say what difference there is between the words Belief and Religion. As the question is put, we cannot give an unqualified answer: our knowledge of the two extends to this, that the one is a pretty sure concomitant of the other.

Antiquary is informed, that we have it in contemplation at an early period to present our readers with a concise and authenticated account of the town of Manchester, from its earliest known history.

THE VILLAGE HOSTESS.

SCENE, A COUNTRY CHURCH-YARD.

TRAVELLER—VILLAGER.

TRAVELLER.

Beneath this darkling Pine's uncertain shade
Methinks unwonted verdure decks the mound,
And every simple wild flower has display'd
Its loveliest hues, and sheds its fragrance round:
And lo! a stone just peeping from the ground
Silver'd with moss its venerable head,
Denotes the neighbouring mansion of the dead.

Say, Villager! what mortal moulders here,
Beneath the heaving turf's perpetual green?
Less envied far, in humid vault and drear
Imprison'd sleep the sons of pride, I ween,
Than thus, beneath the ethereal arch serene,
Where, whispering soft, the tall Pine seems to wave
In guardian semblance, o'er the hallowed grave.

VILLAGER.

Stranger! by chance or holy purpose led
Where consecrated bounds these guests inclose
Sleeping in still seclusion, gently tread,
Nor violate thine ancient friend's repose:
For still her name the rude, brief legend shows,
Whilere to many a weary traveller known;
Read then (for thou canst read) the sculptur'd stone.

TRAVELLER.

Ah! well I mark the name to pilgrims dear
As to the withering herbage genial rain;
Of gentlest manners, and of heart sincere,
In happier times the friend of all was JANE,
Her home the haunt of every village swain,
The Exciseman gay, the Schoolmaster severe,
The Doctor spruce, the Curate frequent there.

As near her board, with foaming honours crown'd,
Engag'd in social chat or sage debate,
Passing their glass of sparkling liquor round,
The politicians of the hamlet sat,
How wisely they retriev'd the sinking state!
Held the long parley! wing'd the pointed jest!
While boisterous mirth his loud applause express'd.

There paus'd the wandering Jew: the patient Scot
Belated there unboud his cumbrous load
Farborne and painful:—each his toils forgot,
As each her hospitable threshold trod:
In sooth, 'twas meek Courtesy's abode:
Told but the woe-begone his tale of grief,
And ne'er did JANE withhold the prompt relief.

VILLAGER.

Aye—many a mortal of the vagrant train
Wilden'd by night, with weariness oppress,

When howl'd the wind, when beat the driving rain,
Found unbought shelter there, refreshment, rest.
She ever lov'd to succour the distrest,
Condemn'd by friendless penury to rove,
Or stern mishap, or ill-requested love.

And when poor Robin, herald of the year,
Proclaim'd the glad approach of festal day,
Shrovetide, or Easter, Wake, or busy Fair,
What Hostess hast thou seen like her, display
Each culinary vase in bright array?
What dainties vied with her's to allure the taste?
Who spoke so kind a welcome to the feast?

But chiefly ere the dawn when angels told
To wondering shepherds a Redeemer born,
Lustrations pure and rites ordain'd of old,
Conspir'd her simple mansion to adorn:
Then rural neatness usher'd in the morn
With bays and holly, and immortal yew,
Of Heaven's unfading bliss the emblem true.

Fail'd not to assemble there our choral throng,
With minstrelsy attun'd to holy rhyme,
Chaunting as festive joy inspir'd the song,
Each psalm and carol sacred to the time:
There maidens fair, and swains in youthful prime,
As love inspir'd, and music's thrilling sound,
Join'd the gay dance, with many a whirl and bound.

There too, in martial guise and rustic phrase,
The stripling mimic tales of terror told,
Stalking in arms grotesque and visard face,
As erst Saint George and other champions bold:
How hardy Jack the Giant's might controull'd,
How courteous knight reliev'd the Fair distrest;
Till kindred ardour fir'd each youthful breast.

Oft have I heard the pageant train rehearse
Harsh sounding names, and deeds of glory done,
And tell in many a legendary verse
Of dragons vanquish'd and of battles won.
And lo! the dire encounter is begun,
See the proud victor spurn the prostrate slain,
And see the vanquish'd rise to fight again.

Oft near her cheerful hearth the wily dame
Expert in secrets deep and Fortune's lore;
To listening maids would solve some mystic dream,
Or in the tell-tale hand their loves explore;
Such were our artless joys in days of yore,
Ere vanish'd at suspicion's dark controul
Nature's prime grace, simplicity of soul.

TRAVELLER.

Kind Swain! I mingle my regrets with thine,
But haste forbids my feet to linger here:
Thee too thy rustic labour calls,—be mine
Dropping o'er this lone grave the pitying tear,
To urge on my journey shelterless and drear:
We mortals are but pilgrims of a day,
Here we just stop and rest: then pass away:

Short is our stage; and transient is the date
To man assign'd his wilder'd race to run:
But who can tell, in this eventful state
What sorrows shall obscure his setting sun,
And dim the hours in cloudless morn begun!
Life's faithless joys what gathering ills deform!
How oft on sunshine waits the inclement storm!

VILLAGER.

Farewell! but hear: On her declining age,
Misfortune frown'd, nor merit's self could save,
Misery's keen pang neglectful to assuage,
Cold CHARITY prepar'd her scanty grave.
Not such the dole, her warm compassions gave;
Ere freezing want the generous wish repress'd;
And obeck'd the sigh that labour'd in her breast.

But yet if virtue claim the willing song;
If honest praise on rural worth await;
Aye, yet,—full oft the list'ning youths among,
Shall many a hoary swain lament her fate
And as this path he treads in pensive state,
Sigh o'er her name, and halcyon days of yore,
Till busy memory sleeps to wake no more.

A WEEK IN LONDON.

It was now a good opportunity of shewing my companion the celebrated steak and chop house called Dolly's—and it was time for refreshment; it was a short step, and as we entered, the mingled fumes of their capacious kitchen had nearly denied us ingress. No sooner ordered than done, but the repast as far fell below the report, as the Queen of Sheba's astonishment exceeded what she had heard; it was cut thin, and served on pewter , and we departed, not dissatisfied but disappointed, and hastened on to the Royal Exchange. It was founded by Sir Thomas Gresham, and was proclaimed Royal by Queen Bess, who honoured its opening with her presence: here is a place to try the nerves, if not confound the senses of any untutored traveller—the stir, noise, impatient activity—avarice in her thousand forms looking out her victims—a Babel from all the tongues of the known world uttering discordant sounds—the thousands of placards with which the walls are alike covered and defiled, convey as many sorts of communication.

If you accost any one in this area your subject must embrace money, or you are not listened to—and who can conjecture the immense wealth which every commercial day exchanges possessors; it is surmounted with a new and elegant tower, though the interior of the area is much dilapidated, and the figures of the monarchs in the niches are not only fast losing their royalty but their faces. We now passed to the Bank, and the spectator is confounded at its endless extent—at its unbounded wealth: wandering through all the public offices money is seen flying about like dirt, and yet nothing is carried on in the midst of a seeming confusion without the most scrupulous care and exactness; in changing ragged notes, which we were compelled to do, (for they will not be looked at in London) we passed through a variety of gradations—the first clerk tears off one number—the next the corresponding corner and then the signature—the last preserves the skeleton, who gives you a note elsewhere, and you procure your substitutes; I should have observed that in all these different transits the body of the note receives a private mark. In the large yard were lying bars of solid silver, with soldiers performing guard over them, and we received the tempting invitation to convey one way, without, perhaps, the power to lift one. To Guildhall, hence, was the walk of a few minutes—this is very celebrated for its antiquity more than its beauty, but modern days have done as much for splendour in the interior, as time has detracted from its exterior: without much previous introduction you come at once into the large hall where the civic dinners and other sumptuous entertainments are given—a room indeed well adapted to the purpose from its commanding extent; there are some elegant monuments erected round and upon the walls, one to a very popular lord mayor—a superb one to Nelson, and the last, remarkable for its chaste execution, to the late Mr. Pitt, who is represented in full length in his senatorial robes, standing on England surrounded by the sea, and in a posture indicating the attitude of delivering an eloquent address. The Egyptian Hall does honour to the city, and is decorated with many paintings of long esteemed and respected Aldermen—and here I cannot help mingling a little pleasantry with a descriptive narrative;—many of these pictures (but I believe the story has been published) had from extreme age so far abandoned their colours to the canvass as to render a similitude to the originals impossible, even to those who had other traces of their ancestors; in consequence, and to obviate this, a Court of Aldermen summoned a celebrated artist to say what sort of varnish would best bring out the colours—he offered various opinions, and a diversity of preparations, but a wag who was present said that those who wanted to shew an alderman in his true colours should varnish with turtle soup. The exquisite taste of the whole suit of apartments may be inferred from the high dignity the corporate body of London hold themselves in, and with some reason; their own Monarchs and Princes frequently sit down with them to the festive board—the allied Monarchs of Europe have done the same, and the place is worthy of the honour. The Mansion House, a large but heavy building, is the exclusive residence of the Lord Mayor for the time being, and the city has provided most magnificently for its chief magistrate; here we could not gain admission, but were favoured with a description by a friend. The morrow was Sunday, and it might be thought it would have interfered with our short stay, but no:—this is the day of grand military service at Whitehall, and a numerous crowd early assemble for admittance; a sort of herald proclaims to the assembled multitude that none can be admitted who have boots, or do not wear a white neck-handkerchief,—this observance I presume arises from the almost regular presence of royalty. Every Englishman's heart must beat high with exultation at entering this depository of his country's honours—not the whole grand and striking elegance of the place can keep the eye from an observance of those provious spoils, the French Eagles; there are brass entablatures underneath descriptive of the dates and fields in which they were captured—the two last from Waterloo are the only ones with flags attached to them, and were unfurled only a few days before that decisive victory; the Eagles screw off the tops to be preserved on an emergency, are of silver gilt, and attached to ebony poles: numerous other flags of Wellington's Peninsular acquirements hang about these, one a very memorable trophy, from the desperation with which the French officer defended his sacred trust, and it is literally covered with his blood. Above all these, is the famous invincible standard of Napoleon, taken in Egypt, an interesting object frequently missed by strangers. The Royal Pew is the next object of attention, comprising a whole gallery, with every superb decoration ingenuity could invent; the canopy is surmounted by the royal arms—the top is painted with scriptural devices, by West: the organ, a noble erection, is here accompanied by the royal band, a strange but highly sublime addition, and a greater attraction than the preachers.

We went to numerous of the churches which adorn the metropolis, especially to, what should never be omitted by a stranger, St. Stephen's, Walbrook; here will be seen architecture in all its beauties—lightness with true elegance combined; the altar piece has a fine representation of the martyrdom of that Saint. In the evening to the Magdalen Hospital, in the Chapel of which are to be found the choicest oratorical preachers in England; few enter here, however insensible to feeling, without the tear of pity or remorse having bedewed their eyes: the unfortunate females who have in an evil hour, by the influence of their own weakness, or the vile arts of some seductive miscreant, fallen from the path of honour into the polluted sink of shame, form the interesting part of the congregation,—rendered invisible by screens, they sit near the organ and accompany its notes to appropriate hymns, in the most touching strains; hundreds have been restored to virtue and to society—have become good wives and good mothers, and died leaving behind them memorials of their gratitude in the munificence of their bequests.

Oh Women! if by simple wile
Thy soul has stray'd from virtue's track,
'Tis Mercy only can beguile
By gentle ways the wanderer back.

The stain that on thy virtue lies,
Wash'd by thy tears, may yet decay;
As clouds that sully morning skies
May all be wept in showers away.

Thus I repeated to my fellow-traveller on leaving this interesting place, and so closed Sunday.

THE BEGGAR.

Begging in the streets of London seems nearly suppressed: amid the immense subdivision of labour and professions, this avocation is gone. There is always a great deal of nationality about the beggar, and I could almost regret that I have not had a proper specimen of the manners of the country in the exercise of its lowest calling. An Irish beggar is like no other; none but himself can be his parallel; he seems to mock his misery; is full of jests and saws; his whole life has been little removed from want, and he therefore exercises his trade with the dexterity of an experienced hand, and the good-humour of one who had been reconciled to it before it was forced on his choice: but to see him in perfection, he must be met in his own country. A Scotch beggar goes about his business in a very different style; he is more inclined to appeal to your sense of justice than your compassion, trusting that you will believe that necessity alone has forced supplication on him; and he seems, therefore, as if he was drawing on an established credit with you, rather than as one opening a new account. I have once or twice met a poor female, in a retired corner, in whose cautious, timid look, the image of a parish officer seemed to be reflected; but I fear my kindly feelings have been nipt in the bud by meeting, in High Holborn, a sturdy Amazon, who, with the screaming brat she carried, were both eating tarts. One might have been excused had they supposed that the manners and condition of beggars could not admit of much change; but here the hand of luxury has been at work, as well as in higher regions. Poor Jane Shore's situation was very different, when she was obliged to go from door to door with the heavy "clap dish," to receive the alms of broken victuals which the charitable bestowed on her. In an old poem she is represented as carrying about "a dish that claps" and gave a heavy sound." This was a curious custom, of which we have no remnant left, as far as I know. From the fear of infection, beggars were obliged to carry about a dish with a moveable cover, which they placed at the doors of houses, then returned in a short while to receive what had been deposited in it: from this circumstance they were called "clapper dudgeons." It was customary, also, for the beggars to go about with a dish of this sort soliciting charity, which practice still remains in some remote parts of Scotland, where I have seen a long ladle employed, after the service, in making a collection for the poor of the parish.

MY OWN ROOM.

"My own room."—What a variety of consolatory associations are connected with this expression!—No man who can use it with truth is completely miserable. Abroad, he may be the victim of a thousand ills. Fatigue, vexation, fruitless toil, mortifications, neglect, and disappointment, may attend him through the happy haunts of men. He may be forced to parry the assaults of knavery on every side, until he is ready to sink with exhaustion in the unequal combat. But he has a sanctuary where he knows he can take refuge, and bar out all impertinent intrusion. He can hedge himself around with solitude, recover the native tone of his mind, "commune with his own heart in his chamber, and be still."

After a day passed in uncongenial pursuits and unpleasant rencontres, it is with feelings of inexpressible satisfaction that I revisit my own room of an evening. I shut my door, seat myself in my arm-chair, and defy the world. Abroad, I may be a dependant, a secondary being: but here, I am uncontrolled and absolute. This is my kingdom—I am Emperor here. It is true my domains are neither rich nor extensive: but they are mine in undisputed right and peaceable possession, "et mihi magni satis." I say to myself with peculiar complacency,

"Here at least
I shall be free—
Here I may reign secure.

Nor do I reign over myself alone. Like Alexander Selkirk, in the island of Juan Fernandez,

I have my subjects, who are likewise my companions and friends. Obedient, loyal, dutiful to the last degree, never murmuring, never seditions, never even speaking except when permitted. They are likewise a most noble and intelligent race, being composed of the choice spirits of every age and every country. Many of them are by birth of the order of nobility, and I even reckon among my subjects some crowned heads, as Frederick of Prussia, and the Emperor Marcus Aurelius. My subjects, gentle reader, are my books.

It is not to be imagined how few persons, comparatively speaking, have rooms that they can truly call "their own." To say nothing of soldiers and sailors, and the great majority confined in prisons, from the King's Bench to the Hulks inclusive, many heads and many members of families have no rooms of their own. A married man whose wife is a shrew, seldom or ever has a room to himself; and many married men whose wives are not shrews, are similarly circumstanced. A single man who boards and lodges in a family is usually in a like predicament. But, by the way, this subject of board and lodging, boarding-houses included, well deserves a separate essay, and perhaps I may favour my public with something of that sort one of these days.

Those unfortunate persons whose circumstances will not permit them to have rooms of their own, are much to be pitied. The best advice I can give them, is to escape into solitude as often as they can. Occasional solitude is essential to the soul's health; no man, who is altogether deprived of it, can long preserve any originality of mind, or any freedom, firmness, or independence of character. A friend of mine who had no room of his own, and was so situated as to be obliged to listen every day in silence to the most revolting absurdities, and to witness the most flagrant violations of good taste, feeling, and even decorum, without daring to express dissent or disapprobation, took the following method of counteracting the deleterious effect which such a course of life must infallibly produce upon the mind. He took a solitary walk every evening, during which he employed himself in recollecting all the absurd opinions he had heard in the day, and confuting them with extraordinary ability. The rudeness and folly that he had witnessed, he exposed with uncommon power of ridicule and invective, playing by turns the parts of Horace and Juvenal. He replied to insults with becoming spirit, dealt desperately in keen retorts and overwhelming rejoinders, and sometimes proceeded even so far as to give the lie direct, and inflict personal harassment. This last operation was generally performed by kicking the posts, or belabouring the mill-stones with amazing energy and effect. By this salutary exercise my friend contrived to reserve his mental health, as well as his bodily, and to lose nothing of the original and vigorous tone of his character.

A philosophic cobbler of my acquaintance, who lived in an attic in Crown-street, Sevenials, with a wife who weighed sixteen stone, and six children, took a different method of refreshing his exhausted spirit. He used to get it on the leads of the house to meditate, like zac, "at even tide," saying that it was "better to dwell on the house-top, than with a brawlvoman in a wide house." When, however, cold weather obliged him to descend from eirie, he contrived a novel and most ingenious plan of retirement. Fortunately for his pose, though he had a great soul, he possessed but a little body, not measuring more than four feet one inch. He had a wooden box made of tolerable dimensions, with a hole in the top to let in light and air, and so contrived as to fasten inside. To this sanctum our new Gulliver used to retire after the fatigues of business, to indulge in philosophic contemplation, and read "Zimmerman on Solitude." On such occasions he always took the judicious precaution of stopping his ears with tow, that his divine cogitations might be undisturbed by the conubial storm that raged without. For the man who, uncompelled by necessity, voluntarily deprives himself of the inestimable privilege of a room that he can call his own, I confess I entertain no compassion; he has forfeited all claims to human sympathy, and is "a wretch whom it were gross flattery to call a fool."—*Lit. MANCHESTER, EIGHT O'CLOCK A. M.

'Tis now the hour of dust, and Manchester
Is in a solemn, cloudy, darkness hung;
And I, so fond a thing is dust to me,
With all the weary puffs of exhausted breath,
Can't keep it off my clothes,
The e'en my breath is gone with overpuffing.
I'll stay and house awhile—the dust is terrible,
And the rude manners of the servant girls
Give it a most alarming aspect.
How awful is this gloom! And hark!
The clank of meeting brushes loudly sounds,
That the contending maids do almost knock
Their weapons' heads from off the handles.
Broom threatens broom in high and boastful clankings.
And see,—there's one has knock'd her brush clean off,
And is most dextrously fastening on again,
With dreadful note of preparation;
While I, with horror stopp'd here sit,
And idly ruminat the morning's danger.
By my soul! my stern impatience chides this tardy-gated cloud,
That like a foul and ugly witch doth limp so tediously away.

I'll to the street, and once more try
To force my passage thro' it.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

A SAILOR'S TALE.—(In continuation.)

"Asleep and naked as an Indian lay,
An honest factor stole a gem away."

For some time previous to Amelia's death, Mr. N— had contracted an acquaintance with the family of a reputed wealthy merchant lately arrived from India. A correspondence had commenced on mercantile transactions, under mutual obligations, before he quitted the East; but now having met, a similarity of disposition produced a closer intimacy, and they became almost inseparable. This family consisted of a Mr. Perkins, a widower, and two daughters. Early in life he had been educated for the station of a lawyer's clerk, but possessing a genius above the drudgery of the quill, he left England as a bold adventurer, having nothing to lose, but every thing to gain.

India at this time presented a large field wherein to cultivate his talents; it was a rich soil, promising an abundant harvest to repay his labours. Handsome in person, gracefully polite, he had studied human nature for the worst of purposes, and could become every thing to every body. A coward in heart, yet daring in danger; and though shrinking with horror from the monitor within, he would nevertheless stand unappall'd to face the weapon uprais'd by insulted honour or outraged integrity. Arrived at Calcutta, his cheerful manners and polished ease introduced him to several respectable families, till after various vicissitudes, by cozening the unwary and flattering the great, he contrived to amass some little property, and lay the foundation of future wealth. But difficult was the task he had to perform; hourly experience told him there were many, very many, pressing forward to the same goal, and by the same dishonourable path, who would rejoice to establish their own estimation on the wreck of another's. Chance, however, introduced him to the Governor-general, who, though he in some measure penetrated into his character, yet considered him as a fit agent to employ in a doubtful embassy to one of the Princes of the interior. His shrewd penetration and polite address gained the desired end, and he returned to the seat of government universally applauded. Fame, riches, honour, now lay before him; but the baneful passions that lurk'd within the dark volcano of his breast, would at times burst forth, and render him an object of abhorrence to the truly virtuous and good. Riches, riches, were all his heart's desire, and for that he would have sacrificed his soul; yet he was the man of honour. Engaged in another embassy, his palanquin and attendants were attack'd by a party of marauders, who having conquer'd and plunder'd, left their victims apparently dead upon the plain; but Perkins, though severely wounded, was saved through the intrepidity of a Sepoy, who covered his body and fell dead upon it.

The victors were as sudden in their retreat as they had been in their attack, in consequence of the intelligence received from another party of wanderers that a troop of horsemen were rapidly advancing. The troop arrived, and proved to be a large party of Armenians, well armed and mounted, who were proceeding with their retinue in the same direction as the embassy. After examining many of the different bodies, without discovering any who yet linger'd in the vale of existence, they were about mounting their horses to pursue their route. Beneath the accumulated heap of slain lay the faint and motionless Perkins. Alive, yet unable to move; sensible, yet denied the power of speech, he witnessed their examination, heard their remarks, and knew they were going to abandon him to his fate, without the possibility of making the least exertion to inform them the lamp of life was yet glimmering in the socket.

Conscience, like an overwhelming torrent, now rush'd with fearful recollection of the past, and presented to his agonized anticipation an awful fatality. The sword of retributive Justice seem'd sheath'd in his heart; Hope spread her pinions, and Despair clutch'd his victim. He heard the tramping of the horses, and supposed the rear of the company were passing the spot—when, what was his delight to recognise a well-known voice, uttering in all the eagerness of desire, "Hoot, hoot, wait a wee, gude folk, and tak me wi' you, for 'tis nae gude to remain here and be slay'd alive by the black beetles." Yes, it was Andrew Magennis, his confidential servant, clerk, and locum tenens. Andrew had fought very bravely, till finding they were worsted, he had sought his opportunity to decamp, and throwing himself upon his face as one dead, suddenly sprung up while they were plundering the baggage, and fairly took to his heels. A neighbouring jungle afforded him shelter, and here he watch'd the proceedings of the second party, when finding they were friends, he quitted his concealment, and presented himself to their view.

The troop halted, and he was introduced to the presence of a venerable man as the leader. Andrew made his salaam with all the grace of a native, for he was not unacquainted with the benefits of boogie. "Een, Sirs, a fearfu' onslaught this! And my maister, too, puir bodie! Well, well, you're no leave me here." The leader shook his head in token that he was not understood; but poor Andrew construed it into a rejection of his suit. "Eh, Sir, you would-na leave a puir Glasgow lad to perish i' the wilds of Inge? And mair, when you ken that he's a descendant of the Mac Innis', although for reasons best interpreted by himself, my gude fether spellit it M-a-m-a-g-e."

At this moment an individual of the suite rode up, and enquired in tolerable good English the cause of the present scene. Andrew related it with as much brevity as in him lay, representing himself in no ordinary capacity, and was not a little gratified to find that his relation produced some marked tokens of respect toward himself. A horse was provided, but still he wish'd once more to see his friend. "An' wad you hauled a wee the wiles I tak one mair look before the fowls of the air prew upon the carcass?" And (thought Andrew) it may be the rogues have dinnae taken all the siller, perhaps have miss'd the pouch a'thegither, as these breckless rascals din nae ken the right way to honest men's pockets. His request was complied with. Turning over the mangled bodies, he discovered at last that of his principal. "Puir bodie? puir bodie! (stooping down and commencing his search.) Vera true is it as Solomon says, that a living dog is better than a dead lion. As I live, here's the siller! But look ye, was there ever so unceevil a corpse as to be prying into the actions of the living? See if he has na open'd aye of his eyes,—and now there's the twae glowing full in my face!" In fact, Perkins, relieved from the burthen above him, nature was resuming her functions, and after considerable exertion the wounded man was enabled to tell his own tale. The good Samaritan poured oil into his wounds, set him upon his own beast, and slowly conducted him on his journey. Arrived at the splendid residence of his benefactor, every care which humanity could dictate was manifested towards the sufferers, for Andrew too had received some marked tokens of the Indian's friendship in various parts of his mechanism. A few weeks produced a convalescence, and Perkins was able to crawl about, often attended by his generous protector.

The Armenian merchant was considered the most wealthy among his people, and beloved by all. He had two daughters, the pride, the delight of his heart. By some accident Perkins obtained an interview with the youngest, and so well improved his opportunity, that another and another succeeded. But why need I relate every circumstance attending the progress of villany? When the hour fix'd on for departure arrived, it was discovered that the Englishman was already gone, and had stole the fairest jewel from the old man's breast—his daughter. So secretly had every thing been plann'd, that they were far distant before a discovery took place; and being in the neighbourhood of the English camp, were actually married by the chaplain to one of the regiments. On her part 'twas a union of affection; she had left all for him—country, friends, religion—all for her husband; but on his 'twas avarice and ambition. Should she be pursued, the hand of the assassin would seek every where to wipe away the stain. Her father loved his child—it broke his heart! He bless'd her in his dying hour, and left her an equal portion with the rest.

Perkins, on his return to Calcutta, found himself possessed of immense wealth, and all the heart could reasonably desire. His wife was lovely, tender, and fondly attached to her husband; but he, incapable of one sentiment which springs from the softer feelings of the mind, treated her with unkindness and neglect. He had gained his point, the fortune of his wife, and now seem'd to consider that wife as an incumbrance with it—a prevention to the abandoned propensities he had hitherto indulged. Mrs. Perkins, when too late, saw her error, and short was her passage to the silent tomb: she died giving birth to her second daughter, and shared the same grave with her offended parent.

Released from that restraint which the virtuous hold over the mind of the vicious, Perkins gave loose to his unbridled appetites, and indulged in almost every criminal excess; but though an adept in dissimulation and fraud, there were others who could surpass him, as his heavy losses at the gambling-table clearly manifested. His splendid mansion was the abode of luxury and voluptuousness, and the education of his children was entrusted to persons who considered it their interest never to thwart the views or inclinations of the young ladies. . . . There some individuals who, in spite of every requisite to render their name illustrious and their society estimable—aye, it seems even in spite of themselves, continue to pursue a line of conduct that eventually must degrade them in the estimation of mankind, and destroy their own enjoyment. And are they happy? Oh no! there is no peace to the wicked. . . . Years rolled rapidly away, and the Misses Perkins attained the age of womanhood, well skill'd in superficial fashionable accomplishments, but with minds uncultivated and hearts perverted. The style in which they lived at Calcutta, united to the extravagance, and latterly an increased thirst for play in Perkins, considerably reduced that wealth which most imagined, from appearances, to be boundless; but the breeze does not always blow from the same point of the compass, and Fortune is equally variable in her smiles and favours. Loss followed loss, and the wreck of a rich ship, which through some mismanagement was uninsured, determined him to quit India with the residue of his property, and once more seek his native land.

The diminution of his riches was known only to his daughters, who inherited the baneful passions and principles of their father; though in Miss Julia, the youngest, there would at times a semblance of her mother's soften'd tenderness be displayed, like a bright flower bursting through the weeds that check'd its growth.

Arrived in the metropolis of England, they established themselves as befitting the character of those who had recently quitted the fountain of wealth in possession of its most ample stores, as by this means they entertained hopes of retrieving their shattered fortunes, either by union with some fool of quality, or as chance might direct. The interview with Mr. N—, which called forth some of his natural peculiarities, render'd him at once a desirable object on whom to practise their proposed plan; but Mr. N— was already married. No matter, many things might occur; at all events they could manage to derive some credit from the acquaintance; and this desire was increased by the unoffending and amiable Amelia, who, though gentle and affable at most times, yet always felt a chill of repulsive coldness at her heart whenever she was compell'd to associate with these females in their visits.

There is a certain instinct in virtue, which, like the sensitive plant, shrinks when touch'd,—a kind of intuitive feeling, that seems almost supernaturally to know when and where to reject the evil and choose the good. Such was Amelia's; nor did the Misses Perkins possess one quality which could recommend them to her susceptible and well-cultivated mind. She was unable to penetrate their design in ingratiating themselves with her husband, though she would sometimes mention it to him with mild remonstrances. These things were known to the unamiable trio, and operated as a strong inducement for the destruction of their hapless victim.

Nature had been very bountiful to Amelia in the beauty and symmetry of her figure, of which advantages the other ladies could not boast; they therefore determined to be revenged on Nature in the person of her whom they now literally hated. For this purpose they glean'd from every possible source, both pure and impure, all the accounts of her origin, and made themselves acquainted with most of the particulars of her early life; but all was beyond the reach of calumny; the breath of slander could not taint the polished mirror which reflected her virtues, and on this account the sting of malice received a double portion of venom. The connexion with Henry Morton afforded them some hope of carrying their diabolical intentions into effect; for from motives of delicacy to all parties, it was partly unknown to Mr. N—. He had heard of the young man, and knew there was some partiality existing, but not its extent. Self—self was his chief consideration.

Perkins, who still pass'd for a man of immense wealth, though his income was much straitened by their style of living and his ill luck at play, render'd himself necessary to Mr. N— by tampering with his passions and practising upon his peculiarities, so much so that he was seldom at home; indeed the conversation and manners of Margaret and Julia Perkins was more suitable to his taste than the mild sweetness and elegant demeanour of Amelia. The name of Morton had frequently been introduced en-passant, without exciting more than a remembrance in the mind of Mr. N—, who was ever silent on the subject. This was precisely what they wish'd, for his silence gave them opportunities of conversing and throwing out hints, which, though unnoticed, never failed in their operation. On one occasion, by a preconcerted scheme, he was ushered into a room adjoining one where the ladies were seated, and overheard them discoursing on the subject. They were speaking of Morton as one they had known in India, and represented him as a depraved and abandoned character; who previous to quitting his native land, had seduced a young female that was on the eve of marriage to another, and they understood were since actually married, without his being aware of the cruel deception.

Jealousy is a rank weed, which must either be torn by the root from the heart at one determined effort, or it spreads its poisoned influence and destroys existence. Mr. N— had doubted and trembled, yet still held firm belief in the rectitude of his wife, but he failed in banishing suspicion from his mind; and as the attachment to her society decreased, so in the same proportion the doubts of her integrity were multiplied. On this occasion he waited not to hear more, but rush'd from the house, enter'd Mrs. N—'s apartment, and demanded when and where she had last seen Morton. Surprise at his abrupt entrance, and the question that was asked in no very courteous manner, kept Amelia silent. "Tis plain, 'tis evident!" exclaimed the distracted man, and left the room. Astonishment for a while chained every faculty of Amelia's mind; but conscious innocence and a sense of duty soon recall'd her usual firmness, and she hastened after her husband—she left the house. Mrs. N— attributed this occurrence to the right authors, and the following day sought an opportunity of entering on the subject, but all her efforts were vain. The conflicts in the breast of the unhappy man were very great; but pride war'd him not to condemn without further proof, therefore he buried it in his own heart, as he hoped, in secrecy from all the world, for he imagined the Perkins were ignorant of his ever having known Morton; and he now determined to appear as if unconscious of what he had heard.

Amelia made preparations for her usual visit to her parents, but the child, on some pretext was to remain in town. About a week after her departure, Mr. N—, accompanied by James, dined at the splendid mansion of Mr. Perkins, in Portman-square. The name of Morton was again introduced, when Miss Julia remark'd, in an apparently indifferent manner, how strongly James resembled him, and inquired of Mr. N— whether he knew the person, or was in any way related? The first remark threw the wretched man entirely off his guard, and the inquiry destroyed the remains of self-possession. The scene which he saw baffles description; but how was it heightened on the announcement of a courier, who enter'd almost breathless, delivering a letter containing the information and manner of Amelia's death, written by the Curate of the neighbouring village! Over what ensued the veil must be drawn: 'twas horrid—dreadful! Humanity while it contemplates the picture, shudders at the reality, and throws down the pen?

LINES

To the Myosotis or "Forget me not," a wild flower planted by the Author in a friend's garden.

So small is thy attractive power,
So transient thy most brilliant hour,
Thou well art named, thou simple flower!
"Forget me not."

But though small homage waits on thee,
In thy frail form a charm I see,
Which seems to whisper still to me
"Forget me not."

And I have chosen thee to tell
What makes my labouring bosom swell.
And when I'm gone to say, "Farewell,"
Forget me not."

To those whose kindness many a day
Drove care and sorrow far away,
I would each opening bud to say
"Forget me not."

And when thy summer glories die,
And winter's terrors rule the sky,
Thy form, though faded, still to sigh
"Forget me not."

Sweet flower! I ask no fairer tomb
Than o'er my dust that thou may'st bloom
To whisper midst surrounding gloom
"Forget me not."

HOGARTH'S ENRAGED MUSICIAN.

There has been much enquiry as to whom the hero of this masterpiece of graphic humour was meant to personate; some affirming it to resemble one celebrated performer, and some another. The countenance plainly bespeaks him a foreigner.

Hogarth's advertisement for this print appeared in the London Daily Post, 1740:—"Shortly will be published, a new print called the Prooked Musician, designed and engraved by William Hogarth; being a companion to a print representing a Distressed Poet."

It is probable that Hogarth had no one particularly in view for his Distressed Musician; for with very few exceptions, the satire of his pencil was free from personalities.

Monsieur Roquet, the enamel painter, in his explanation of Hogarth's works, written in French for the information of the Marshal Belleisle, when prisoner in England, says of the print, "Le Musicien est un Italien que les cris de Londres font enragé."

Mr. Nichols, in his account of this print, assures us, that the musician represents Mr. John Festin, the celebrated player on the flute. Dr. Burney fixes the resemblance to Castrucci, whose instrument was the violin. Hogarth has represented his subject with that instrument.

"Mr. John Festin, the first hautboy and German flute of his time, had numerous scholars, to each of whom he devoted an hour every day. At nine in the morning he attended Mr. Spencer, grandfather to the Earl Spencer. If he happened to be out of town any day, he devoted that hour to another. One morning at that hour he waited on Mr. V. afterwards Lord V. His Lordship was not up. Mr. Festin went into his chamber, and opening the shutter of a window, sat down in it; the miserable figure represented by Hogarth, was playing under the musician's window. A man with a barrow full of onions came up to the player, and sat on the edge of his barrow, and said to the man, 'If you will play the Black Joke, I will give you this onion.' The man played it. When he had so done, the man again desired him to play some other tune, and then he would give him another onion.

"This," said Festin, "highly angered me; I cried out, Z—ds, Sir, stop here. This fellow is ridiculing my profession: he is playing on the hautboy for onions.' Being intimate with Mr. Hogarth, he mentioned the circumstance to him; which, as he said, was the origin of The Enraged Musician. The fact may be depended upon," says Mr. Nichols. "Mr. Festin was himself the enraged performer;" adding, "the story is here told just as he related it to a clergyman."

Dr. Burney, who was contemporary with Hogarth, has left us a very different account of the origin of this most humorous composition, ascribing the circumstances to a piece of the lively painter's waggery. "The violinist Castrucci, who was more than half mad," says the Doctor, "is represented in one of Hogarth's prints, as The Enraged Musician; this painter having sufficient polissonerie, previous to making the drawing, to have his house beset by all the noisy street instruments he could collect together,—whose clamorous performance brought him to the window, in all the agonies of auricular torture."

This Castrucci was a celebrated performer on the violin, and leader of the band at the Opera.

He was a pupil of the famous Corelli, and one of the best players of his master's concertos. Hickford's great room in Brewer-street, known of late years as the Westminster Forum, was originally built as a concert-room. In the year 1731, at a concert held there, by advertisement, it was announced, among other performances, that Signor Castrucci would play the first and eighth concertos of Corelli, and several of his own compositions,—particularly a solo, in which he engaged to execute "twenty-four notes with one bow."

We may suppose the musical wags were apt to play upon the feelings of this genus irritabile, for the following day the advertisement was burlesqued, and a solo promised, not by the first, but the last violin of Goodman's-fields,—a theatre of a low cast,—in which the performer would execute twenty-five notes, with one bow.

Poor Castrucci at length met a formidable rival in Clegg, and was obliged to yield the palm to his superiority. Clegg, however, practised so incessantly, that he lost his reason, and being confined in Bedlam, he there occasionally played upon his violin; where, as we may naturally suppose, the unhappy musician was said to have drawn crowds of auditors. In these days, when things so commonly tended to the outré, and Bedlam was open to all who hunted for strange sights, it cannot be doubted that thousands would flock to hear a maniac playing upon the fiddle.

ODE TO MORNING.

IRREGULAR.

Hail fairest morn, who like a bashful maid,
In youth all beauties, with enchanting mein
And graceful modest step, from heav'n art seen,
Descending with ambrosial gems array'd.
Goddess of the bosom of gold,
Maiden of the brilliant eye,
Celestial Robes thy form enfold,
None with thee in charms can vie : —
Streams meand'ring,
Zephyrs wand'ring.
Earth gives thee her grateful strains;
Flowers delighting,
Strolls inviting,
Beauty, matchless beauty, reigns! —
Coy nymph, in whom the charms of heav'n unite;
Whose balmy breath throws loveliness around,
And spreads with fragrant herbs the velvet ground,
Whose presence yields to all supreme delight : —
Care sees thee, but to her cave is gone,
In the deep rifted rock her low plaints sorrow
breathes;
Joy, with garlands of myrtle and roses trips on,
And the brows of the maidens with coronets
wreathes.
Now gently the gondoles glide on the lake,
Sweetly the tender flute pours its soft lay,
Smoothly the waves on the sanded shore break,
While to pleasure and love we are hast'ning away :
Where eglantines fondly entwine
O'er the arbour where wild-roses rove,
When the light of thy smile shall first shine,
I will haste to the arms of my love;
We will watch thy last glance,
As thou part'st from our sight;
And when noon shall advance,
And the sun the meads light
Dearest nymph, we'll then think of those charms we adore,
And sigh lovely morn that thy reign's so soon o'er.

SINGULAR BIOGRAPHY.

Mrs. Gally, the subject of the present brief Memoir, was the wife of Dr. Gally, who held the living of Saint Giles's-in-the-Fields. He wore a black satin rose in his hat, which was then in general use by clergymen of a certain rank in clerical graduation.—Mrs. Gally was a person of considerable importance, having been the heiress to her brother's property; his name was Knight, and every thing indicated his having been a man of some consideration, in the north of England, where his estates lay.—The old lady was, in truth, very singular, and seemed to be a preserved specimen of an extinct species. The house she lived in stood in Great Russell-Street, and was one amongst many others which were sacrificed to the making of new streets, round the British Museum. There she lived regularly all the winter, and sometimes more than the winter, in a style befitting rather the widow of a bishop, than of an ordinary beneficed clergyman, and with exactly the same sort of society. She never went out, excepting to church, and for one round of visits, in the early spring mornings; and these visits, though pretty extensive, were always made in a sedan-chair: for nothing could prevail on her, after the death of her husband, to use her coach, except on the greatest emergencies. For this inconvenient forbearance, she gave a reason that seemed to have little validity in it: she did not like to use it, with the Doctor's armorial bearings on it, nor would she have it painted with the usual lozenge upon it, indicative of the death of her husband, which she called an advertisement of "This house to let." "I should have thought," observes her Memorizer, Miss L. M. Hawkins, "that neither by person nor age could she be exposed to many inquiries 'for terms;' but of that, Miss Hawkins adds, she was certainly the best judge." "Certainly the best judge," though the phrase generally adopted on such occasions, is seldom correct. Mrs. Gally ought, for her own sake, to have been the best judge; but it is not every one that knows what is best for themselves; and generally, perhaps, a disinterested by-stander, in the game of life, is a more competent judge, than the person who is immediately engaged in it, and whose passions as well as understanding, are concerned in the proper management of it.

Mrs. Gally had never altered the mode of her dress, from the time of her marriage. Hating domestic trouble, but disposed, at the same time, to be very exact, her dinners were arranged by a regular rotation-bill-of-fare;—and on the same principle, she had labelled patterns and exact measures for all her household linen, of every description.

The society that met at her house, from time to time, was truly delectable; at that period, what were called, "running visits," were quite the fashion; and as the ambition for a large acquaintance increased, they were afterwards called, "flying visits;" afterwards, when that ambition had operated so far as to render "personal service" impossible, they obtained the expressive appellation of "squib visits," till the matter was wholly given up, and assemblies, routs, and "at homes," next succeeded, and, indeed, still continue to be the rage, in London, at the present time. The last, indeed, many persons had adopted, by being "at home," one evening in a week; but that was often inconvenient, and besides shewed the paucity of their connexions.—But Mrs. Gally's was an incessant "at home;" and she rarely passed an evening without visitors. On Sunday evenings, in particular, she had a formidable circle, and Sir John

Hawkins and his lady were often of the party. It was very attractive, being attended mostly by Dr. Hurd, both before and after he was a bishop—Dr. Kaye, afterwards Sir Richard Kaye and Dean of Lincoln—Dr. Warburton and his lady—Bishop and Mrs. Moss—Bishop Halifax and his lady—Dean Tucker—Dr. Gloster Ridley—and many others.—Of Dr. Hurd it may not perhaps be generally known, that, in case Buonaparte had effected a landing in this country, it was the intention of our late reverend Monarch and good old King, to have removed his family to Hartlebury, being at that time the residence of Dr. Hurd, as Bishop of Worcester. When he was afterwards translated to the See of Lichfield and Coventry, he was obliged to take his name off his door, so troublesome were the multiplicity of begging applications, and so open did it lay him to imposition.

Mrs. Gally was one of that class of reading females, who, if they did not read, did nothing.—On her reading a work, by an author of the name of Hamilton, on the subject of "an intermediate state," and conversing with a friend on the question, she was referred to what was well known to be the opinion of Dr. Gally concerning it. To this remark, she replied, "I know that; but I don't pin my faith on that of my husband." The reply itself is strongly indicative of her own independent mind, and personal character.

SIGNORA JOSEPHINE GIRARDELLI, THE FIRE EATER.

(From Smeeton's Biographia Curiosa.)

This extraordinary woman was born in the city of Venice, in the year 1780: from whence she came to London in the year 1816, to exhibit her astonishing powers of repelling heat. The novelty of her performances attracted many persons to witness her exploits, which she displayed at No. 23, New Bond-street, to the wonder and terror of her spectators. The following extract from her 'bill of fare' will convey to the reader some idea of her numerous feats:

"She will, without the least symptom of pain, put boiling melting lead into her mouth, and emit the same, with the imprint of her teeth thereon; red hot irons will be passed over various parts of her body—will walk over a bar of red-hot iron, with her naked feet—wash her hands in aqua fortis—and put boiling oil into her mouth, &c. &c."

All these operations she performed with apparent ease, and seemingly without the least pain.

Upon the great success of Girardelli, several minor salamanders started for public favour, particularly that famous really incombustible phenomenon, Ivan Ivanitz Chabert; who boasted of having been shut up in an heated oven, with a shoulder of mutton, and remained therein till the mutton was baked; this, he said, was performed before the College of Physicians at Paris. He likewise could eat burning charcoal, and a lighted torch with a fork, like a salad. He also offered his assistance to persons whose houses were on fire. This clever fellow exhibited in Pall Mall, London, 1818.

Malcolm says, in his Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London, p. 330, that in the year 1718 there was a fire-eater, of the name of De Hightreight, a native of the Valley of Annavi, in the Alps, who exhibited his juggling tricks of kindling coals on his tongue, swallowing hot oil, &c. &c. five times a day, at the Duke of Marlborough's Head in Fleet-Street, at 2s. 6d. 2s. and 1s. 6d. each person.

Shortly after appeared Robert Powel, the fire-eater: this juggler exhibited from the year 1718 to 1780.

Voltaire says, in his common-place book, 'I saw at Lyons a sort of mountebank, who professed to eat fire, drink boiling oil, and walk barefoot over red-hot plates of iron: he had a female companion as accomplished as himself. They told me that their secret for walking over red-hot iron consisted in rubbing their feet beforehand for a good while with oil beaten with iced alum; and that, to swallow fire, nothing was requisite but to keep the mouth extremely moist: as to the trick of dropping melted sealing wax on the tongue, it only required the courage to do it.'

It is more than probable the ancients were masters of the art of resisting heat; for, among many stories, one is related of Amigudi, wife of Henry II. emperor, who, being accused of adultery, proved her innocence by undergoing the trial of ordalia, viz. by going blindfold and barefooted over certain plates of fire-hot iron.

ADVENTURE OF MADAME DE SENETAIRE.

A noble-minded cultivated woman can seldom be placed in a situation where her talents and amiable qualities cannot keep pace with every exigency.

Madame de Senetaire, widow of the heroic Guy d'Exuperi, retired to the castle of Miramont, where she determined to pass the first year of mourning; but, superior to prudery, and sanctioned by the company of an aged lady, her aunt, she did not decline the visits of the neighbouring nobility and gentry. After some months were elapsed, many young cavaliers of the highest consideration for rank and martial glory paid a declared homage to her attractions. Several of them were with her in the balcony of her castle one day, when she saw Mentail, the king's lieutenant, at the head of some cavalry, dragging to prison a number of Hugonots. Madame de Senetaire shed tears, but soon recollected that shedding briny torrents would not avail the sufferers, and, turning to the preux cavaliers, said,

"You have many times complained, I give you no opportunity to prove your desire to serve me. If you are sincere, you will permit me to lead you to the deliverance of those victims. Who, 'tis true, are Catholics, and they differ from us in religious tenets, but they are our fellow-beings. It is for us to consider what they suffer—not what they believe."

The nobles, thus called upon by beauty, never thought of deliberating. They were speedily armed; and the widow, equipped as an Amazon, was the first ready to mount her milk-white charger. A gold-hilted brand gleamed in the sun, waving her followers to spur their steeds against Mentail. His troops were dispersed, and the captives set free. Enraged that a woman should compel him to abandon his prey, Mentail collected two thousand men to besiege the castle of Miramont. He was again defeated. Henry the Third, incensed at the disgrace of his officer, sent a chosen band with orders to raze the castle of Miramont to the ground. This news spread through the province, where Madame de Senetaire was revered and beloved. The noblemen, gentlemen, and peasantry, confederated to assist her. Henry reflected with more coolness upon the hazard of embroiling his subjects for an unmanly triumph over a lovely woman, whose offence originated in humanity, the greatest charm of her sex. He withdrew his squadrons, and the lady remained unmolested.

ON QUADRILLES.

I have resolved never again to dance;—and yet this is a cruel resolution at two-and-thirty.

For ten years I have been a happy member of our social assemblies in the pleasant town of M——. My subscription will be saved; but how shall I fill up the tedious winter months without the recollections of the past, and the anticipations of the coming ball? Delightful companions of the full moon—blooming evenings of defiance to hail and frost—ye are gone, and my solitary hearth must be my solace.

I shall never forget the night when the seeds of your destruction were first sown. Louisa W. had to call, and I was her delighted partner. The eager hands were clapped, the discordant strings were screwed up into tune, and we were debating with the venerable leader of our country band the relative merits of "the Honey-Moon" and "Speed the Plough." With the most correct taste, Louisa had decided for "right and left," a preference to "la poussette,"—we were ready. At that instant a handsome officer of dragoons—the coxcomb—advanced to Louisa, and in the most humble tone—the puppy—ventured to recommend a quadrille. Louisa's eyes consulted mine, and I boldly consulted the leader. I knew the range of his acquirement, and I was safe;—we went down with "the Honey Moon;" but the evil was rooted.

Within a fortnight there was a special meeting of the subscribers to our assembly-room to discuss an important question. It was concerned at the particular desire of a lady of fashion, who had become a temporary resident among us. I knew there was mischief brooding, and, as I was petulant, I staid away. Poor Kit the master of our band, and his faithful followers, were dismissed after thirty years' duteous service; and four fiddlers, from Paine's I think they said, came from London by the coach—fine-powdered fellows in silk stockings—but no more to compare with Kit's crew for strength and untiring execution than a jew's-harp to a hand organ. But they were wonderfully applauded: and Louisa, seeing that I would not sanction them, recommended me to take lessons. I would as soon have learned to speak High Dutch.

They have now gone on for two years with their Quadrilles—but I have done with them. I hate their curtsies and their bows—their skipping in and their skipping out—their endless labyrinths—their barbarous nomenclature.

Departed visions of the dear country dances of my boyhood, to what foreign land are ye fled? Even the shopkeepers of M——, who meet every Christmas at the Hoop and Griffin to "a ball and supper" have banished you. Are ye gone to thrust out waltzes from Germany, or fandangos from Spain—are ye departed to un-nationalize other feet, like the detestable quadrilles have corrupted ours? Ah no—ye have not the subtlety of your hateful rival—like your unhappy countrymen, ye must give place to the cuckoo tribe, who drive you from your nests.

It is only twenty years since I learned to dance—ay, sirs, under a pupil of the celebrated Vestris—and my knowledge has become obsolete. To outlive one's old friends is the most ainful feeling in earth's pilgrimage—and I have done this before I am grown grey. "The Jolly Young Waterman," and "Money Musk," and he "Devil among the Tailors," and "Drops of Brandy," and Off She Goes," and "Mother Lacey," and "Molly put the Kettle on," "Lady Montgomery," are with the things before the food—and "I weep for them." But I will never abandon my early faith for "La Poule," or "L'Été," or—Psha! I hate myself for knowing even these execrable names. I will practise, even with my own chairs, "up the middle and down again, swing corners, hands four, and right and left," till the gout overtakes me—but I will never prostitute myself to "doss-doss, chassée en avant, balancer, tourner les dames, or chaine-An-glaise,"—no, not if I could secure myself an exemption from crutches till my eightieth winter. I have two much patriotism in my blood.

I am satisfied that my hatred to quadrilles is not a vain caprice, but is founded upon moral and philosophical principles. There is nothing kind, genial, manly, womanly, cheerful, ebullient, in the quadrille. It is a formal and impermanent piece of personal display, from beginning to end. It is cold, repulsive, artificial;—it requires practice and skill—it is altogether an affair of the feet and not of the heart. It is unsuited to our climate and our habits;—it is for a people who would corrupt the unconstrained intercourse of our English dance into a matter of intrigue. But our country dance was made expressly for, if not by, our character. It requires no skill but what a good ear and good humour may supply; it breaks down the usual cold intercourse of the sexes into an unpresuming and regulated familiarity; it calls forth all the thousand graces of innocent hearts and unclouded spirits; it creates an interchange of individual sentiments, in the midst of the most social sociality. No maiden ever went away less innocent to her freest thoughts from a country dance, though her fingers had once or twice replied to a scarcely perceptible pressure from those of her handsome partner. But the balancing and footing of the quadrille—the display of personal advantages upon the most approved system of studied grace—it is altogether an unnatural and constrained affair—and when the implicity of the heart is fled, its innocence is mocking very hard to be let out.

A ball supplies the most exquisite pleasure to youthful and unsophisticated minds—and let us enjoy it, in the freshness and vivacity of our national dance. Quadrilles were made for rules of forty and martinets of fifty. But I say live to see a re-action—Quadrilles have ascended to the kitchen;—and so Sir Roger de Coverley may again find his true place in the swing-room.—Knight's Quar. Mag.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

NEW THEORY OF THE EARTH.

This is the age of speculations, in science as well as commerce; and he is a poor philosopher indeed who is not some new conjecture on the way the world was made, though Sir Richard Phillips believes he has titled the point long ago; but, however cogent his words are, that they are not convincing to every one evident, from their being new theories started.

At a meeting of the Hall Literary and Philosophical Society, held at their room above the Exchange, on Monday evening, Dr. Alderson read a very ingenious paper, developing a new theory of the formation of the earth. The Doctor supposes the earth to have been originally a transparent globe, containing all the materials of which it is composed in solution; that by certain operations of the sun's rays upon the globular fluid, the different affinities were gradually destroyed, the solid matter, according to its solidity, receding to the centre, stratum super stratum, whilst the lighter or gaseous particles took their position on the outside. The first appearance of organized life was in this fluid, consisting of fishes of all grades. From these was produced calcareous matter, which gradually rose above the surface of the surrounding aqueous medium, on which grew mosses, lichens, and plants of that description, originating a soil fit for a better description of plants and vegetables, a state followed by the creation of a higher race of animals and man.—Mountains, rivers, valleys, and other varieties on the face of the globe, are accounted for by a course of reasoning. After the deluge a great change is supposed to have taken place in the atmosphere, deducted from the appearance of the rainbow, of which there is no mention before the flood. This change produced disease and shortened life, the length of which, antecedent to the flood, is ascribed to the purity of the air, which will also account for the size of many antediluvian animals. His theory, the doctor maintains, is perfectly reconcilable with the Mosaic account of the creation.—At this meeting, Dr. C. Alderson was elected an honorary member.

GAS.

On the 20th ult. the town of Abergavenny was for the first time lighted with gas; upon a new and improved method, recently invented by the engineer, Mr. Simeon Broadmeadow. This discovery promises considerable advantage to gas establishments, by superseding the use of the retort and purifier, as the common coke or coal tar even answers the purpose of the retort, and the purifier is rendered altogether useless. By the method adopted by Mr. Broadmeadow, the quantity of inflammable gas is increased full one-third; and, by the action of atmospheric air, rendered perfectly pure and free from sulphur. This undoubtedly is one of the greatest discoveries hitherto made in the manufacture of gas, and may be equally applied to gas manufactured from oil, as well as that manufactured from coal; and as the advantages likely to result, from the discovery are about to be secured by a patent to the inventor, it may not at present be prudent to give any further explanation.—Gloucester Journal.

A NEW BAROMETER.

Take a common phial bottle and cut off the rim and part of the neck. This may be done by a piece of string or rather whip-cord, twisted round it and pulled strongly by two persons in a sawing position, one of whom holds the bottle firmly in his left hand. Heated in a few minutes by the friction of the string, and then dipped suddenly into cold water, the bottle will be decapitated more easily than by any other means.

Let the phial be now nearly filled with pump water, and applying the finger to its mouth, turn it quickly upside down; on removing the finger, it will be found that only a few drops escape. Without cork or stopper of any kind, the water will be retained within the bottle by the pressure of the external air; the weight of the air without the phial being so much greater than the small quantity within it.

Now let a bit of tape be tied round the middle of the bottle, to which the two ends of the string may be attached so as to form a loop to hang on a nail: let it be thus suspended in a perpendicular manner, with the mouth open downwards, and this is the barometer.

When the weather is fair, and inclined to be so, the water will be level with the section of the neck or rather elevated above it, forming a concave surface. When disposed to be wet, a drop will appear at the mouth, which will enlarge till it falls, and then another drop, while the humidity of the atmosphere continues.

To the truth of this experiment, I can give my probatum est, but shall be glad if any of your scientific correspondents will explain more particularly the ratio of it.

Why will not the water remain in the bottle unless the rim be cut off? which is the fact. Why should the water drop in moist weather, when (as I have tried) holding the bottle before the fire will produce the same effect?—Calcutta Journal.

VARIETIES.

In the Northumberland Household Book, for 1612, we are informed that a thousand pounds was the sum expended in house-keeping; this maintained 166 persons; and then the wheat was 5s. 8d. per quarter. 'The family rose at six in the morning—my lord and my lady had set on their table for breakfast—at seven o'clock in the morning—A quart of beer,—a quart of wine,—Two pieces of salt fish,—Half a dozen red herrings,—Four white ones,—and a dish of sprats!!! They dined at ten—supped at four in the afternoon. The gates were all shut at nine, and no further ingress or egress permitted.'

But now—

'The gentleman who dines the latest
Is, in our street, esteemed the greatest:
But surely greater than them all,
Is he who never dines at all.'

DANDY HATS.

Our city has been much amused with a low tripod-kind of a hat, made of fine beaver, and worn by our bang-ups. Some call them the Touch, others the Gaps and Stare; the real name is the Boltingbroke. It is about six inches in crown and four in rim; shaped like an inverted cone. It is a real tippy. We yesterday saw one of the fancy dressed quite unique, blue frock, black silk Wellington cravat, buff waistcoat, Gossak pantaloons, high-heel boots, black riband and eye-glass, bushy air frizzed, and surmounted with one of these little tippy hats. He looked like an hour-glass, and mimed his steps along Broadway in the real Jimmy Jumps style. The ladies were highly amused, and more glasses were directed towards him than would be to the Emperor Intide, had he just landed; while our blood, insensible to all this curiosity, danced up the street, humming the favourite air of, "Look, dear ma'am, I'm quite the thing; natius hay, tippity ho!"—New York Paper.

MEN WHO PLAYED FEMALE PARTS ON THE STAGE.

Curiosity would naturally lead to the enquiry of,—What sort of men, in personal appearance, were those who played the female characters before lady actors were permitted to appear on the stage? The question is easier than the answer, having neither painting nor written description to guide us in the research, unless, indeed, we are to give credit to what has been said of a well-painted youthful head, from which there is a print inscribed Richard Kynaston. But admitting this to be authentic, it does but represent a lad of about fourteen or fifteen, when we know that Kynaston personated female characters when he was a man; otherwise, Davenant the manager could not have answered King Charles II. as he did, when his Majesty was so impatient for the drawing up of the curtain,—“Sire, the scene will commence as soon as the Queen is shaved.” Kynaston played the Queen.

SHAKESPEARE'S CHARACTER OF LORD BYRON.

Shakespeare's character of Lord Byron! exclaim our readers, with surprise, what an anachronism!—Well, be it so; and yet we contend that no individual has drawn the character of the noble poet more correctly than our immortal bard: indeed, we have long been told that 'each change of many-coloured life he drew.' But what is most remarkable is, that Shakespeare has not only sketched, or rather given, a full portrait of an individual, strictly resembling Lord Byron, but the character he has drawn bears the same name. This is, perhaps, the most striking coincidence on record. In proof of our remark, we might refer to the whole character of Byron in 'Love's Labour Lost,' which is an exact counterpart of the Lord Byron of the nineteenth century. Two passages will, however, be sufficient to show the resemblance. In act IV. scene III. of the play, the Biron of Shakespeare says—"By heaven I do love; and it hath taught me to rhyme and to be melancholy; and here is part of my rhyme, and here my melancholy."

Thus are a few traits in his lordship's character developed, but it remains for Rosaline to exhibit the remainder; and no one who has observed the manner in which lord Byron has dealt his satire on friends, relatives, and all who approached him, but will acknowledge that his character could not have been better described than in the following lines, from the last scene of the play, in which Rosaline says—

"Oft have I heard of you, my Lord Biron,
Before I saw you: and the world's large tongue
Proclaims you for a man replete with mocks;
Full of comparisons and wounding flouts;
Which you on all estates will execute
That lie within the circle of your wit."

THE DRAMA.

THEATRE ROYAL.—The Marriage of Figaro, was represented here, for the first time, on Saturday evening last, and introduced Miss Stephens as Susannah:—she was all that was excellent, but we should do an injustice to her not to notice the Scottish air of "Coming thro' the Rye." It was a harvest she had three times to reap, and each time with increased effect. Our favourite Miss Rock, in Cherubino, made us regret that she sustained a character opposite to her sex, but she was excellence throughout. Mr. W. Rees in Antonio made us forget the science of Horticulture in his intemperate drollery, and it will do no discredit to his sober moments to say, that he is the most accomplished drunkard we ever saw. The house was crowded to an overflow.

MINOR THEATRE.—This elegant little place of amusement, has now passed into the managing and effective hands of Mr. Arderton, and if we may judge from the patronage that gentleman received on the night of his benefit, his exertions will be successful. Timour the Tartar, has been splendidly got up, and very respectably performed.—Mrs. Emley, as Zorilda, appeared to great advantage.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—One of your correspondents was some time since pleased to call forth the ingenuity of your poetical friends by filling up blank lines, and has, from his long silence, I presume, declined making any new propositions; thinking, therefore, that their powers will be falling dormant if not again called into action, I beg to recommend the trial of an Acrostic, as an ingenious plan of proving their skill. But, not wishing to confine them too much, I will not give one particular name, lest hitting upon one which might tune the chord of A. whilst poor unfortunate B. was sighing in vain to address his dear dulcinea of another name, would only strike flat, and thus cause an unfair competition, but leave each to his own choice.

I have myself more than once wielded my pen for this purpose, and, poor as the productions may be, I must add them to shew that I do not shrink from the task I propose; and should this merit a place in a succeeding Iris shall feel that they are treated to the extent of their deserts.

The following was written after hearing a friend very strenuously maintain that Beauty was an indispensable requisite to the marriage state, it will fully shew my opinion on the subject.

Beauty, what is it but a name?
Each eye it dazzles, nought imparts,
And burning as a lambent flame
Unties, but not unites the hearts:—
To-day it blooms, to-morrow dies,
Yon star not sooner leaves the skies.

Nor could my pen be still after visiting that little prodigy Master Hubbard, but up rises the following:—

Hubbard, thy power Promethean like indeed
Unites us to a new, unheard of creed—
But how so small a piece of Nature's art
All features true to nature can impart
Runs past idea—trees, men, dogs, complete
Drop from the scissors, and th' astounded visage meet.

Were I not sensible how very far the best attempts to give a bare idea of the powers of this youth fall short of the original, I should not have ventured on the foregoing.

And as a conclusion add another, written to a fair Lady—

Done was creation's work, art saw it close,
And chaos vanish'd as the hills arose,
Late tho' the action, nature seem'd to fail,
Each scene was ragged till she form'd a Dale.

I shall now hope to read several acrostics in your paper, doubting not but the authors of various beautiful stanzas which have appeared there, will add their powers to form such pleasing specimens.

APPRENTICES' LIBRARY.

MR. EDITOR,—With much regret I view the very slow progress of the formation of an Institution which would prove so beneficial and important to this, our highly flourishing town. I allude to the establishing a Mechanics' and Apprentices' Library.

Such an establishment would open a wide field for amusement to individuals who would eagerly embrace the opportunity of an easy access to Literature and the Arts, which the Subscription Libraries in Manchester render impossible from the high price of tickets, and annual subscriptions, and thus denying youth in certain situations of life, of procuring that knowledge so essential for them, and which would occupy time too often fatally mispent.

It would be highly creditable to those individuals who have already agitated the subject, to come forward; and I cannot believe, from the characteristic spirit of the inhabitants, that so useful and profitable an Institution will be suffered to remain any longer in abeyance.

REMINISCENCES.

MR. EDITOR,—"BUTLER'S REMINISCENCES" having appeared in your valuable pages, you will not, I apprehend, object to something ORIGINAL of that sort, and I shall from week to week furnish you with some of my own. I shall commence, therefore, with an instance of Pulpit Oratory, which I have no fear of being acceptable to your readers.

The following extracts were taken down by me, from the singularity of their application; and the sentiments of the worthy Divine who uttered them are in full consonance with his own character.

Would that every one, bearing what he does, and forbearing as he does, had an equally exalted mind. In a population, where two-thirds are of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and where there is the largest Sick Club in the kingdom, lives this venerated, this respected clergyman; he could never be prevailed upon but once to preach the Sermon given on their Anniversary Dinner, and he did that with a reluctance which indicated something more than strong objection. His Curate had recently died, and there was no alternative.

Unwilling to refuse his parishioners, and anxious as he ever was to conciliate all, he agreed to the proposal, and when the village bells had dropped their merry peal, he appeared in his canonicals to the summons of the solemn toll. It ought here to be remarked that in a spacious church-yard, is erected a genteel but small tavern,—this was devoted to the better part, or I should rather say, the more respectable and affluent part of the congregation, whilst round the church-yard, and over the mouldering and mouldered remains of thousands, was spread one vast tent for the accommodation of the others. It is a very necessary part of the story to say, that combined with much and real philanthropy of character, the good pastor possessed a noble independence of mind,—he had given his word, and he abided by his promise.

He read the prayers in his usual and dignified manner, and on mounting the pulpit, took a text, which, for my life, I could trace no connexion with the subject he was about to address himself on.

"The people of Nineveh shall rise in judgment against this generation, for they repented at the preaching of Jonah."

It was in vain, through a long and impressive harangue, to trace any, the least relation to the business he was engaged to descant upon, but he concluded thus—

"Jonah was a strange man vomited from the belly of a fish, upon a strange shore, he called out 'yet three days and Nineveh shall be overthrown'; he was disregarded—but upon a repetition of the threat, it went from the houses of the nobles, into the palace of the king, who immediately stripped off his royal robes, and put on sackcloth and ashes,—he proclaimed a fast, and prostrated himself in the House of God, imploring and interceding for his sinful subjects. His prayer was heard—Nineveh was saved, and her ruin postponed beyond that generation.

"Now I, born amongst you, known to you, and I believe respected of you, may preach a twelvemonth and be happy if I make a single convert. Do you on this day put on an attire of humiliation?—No!—you come clothed in your holiday suits. Do you proclaim a Fast?—No!—you spread your tables of revelry—where?—Why in the very parlours of the Church itself.—Learn from this first to benefit yourselves, before you pretend to extend that sympathy to your fellows."

The same excellent man speaking of Ingratitude, said—"I have preached much on this abominable sin, and I fear to little purpose, and I know not what to liken it to, except it be to a forest of trees!—the foliage of which has been produced by the kindly rays of the sun, and which as soon as that is accomplished about those very beams by which they have been brought into existence."

Can any thing speak more for the truly independent heart, or sincere affection for his flock, than such bold and generous effusions—at the time they are administering and conveying the rod of correction, are bleaded with all those charities which comprehend the essence of virtue, and every trace, as far as human imperfection can imitate, of our great Master's monitory lessons.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Village Hostess.—The author of this very beautiful poem, inserted in our first page, has our thanks.—We beg to see our work enriched by his Muse.

We announce with pleasure, that another communication from the Green Dragon, will appear in the next number of the Iris.

In reply to T. T. we have only to say, that if either he or any other person will write a temperate reply to the letter of Investigator, inserted in our last number, we shall be glad to give it to the public through the medium of the Iris.—We do not intend to take any part in the controversy ourselves, though we think that the subject is of much importance.

We thank N. W. H. for his very polite note.—We shall be happy to have the promised interview.

Peter's witty and very ingenious communication, entitled, Hy-men's Creed, if published, we fear, would have a disastrous tendency.

Excursion's note is received.—We have not yet had leisure to revise his MS.

A Constant Reader is respectfully entreated not to be a stunt-Writer, unless on some more edifying subject.

"The Pleasure of Solitude," and "Lines to Scott's," are our next.

A Friend to Justice may have his curiosity gratified by reference to a work entitled The Gleaner, published by the late Mr. Cowdroy.

An authenticated youth of sixteen is strongly recommended to the writing school; and the postage of his letters, (which we do not solicit) will be indispensable.

We have to acknowledge receipt of Q. T. M.; G. D.—a Perambulator; and several others, which shall meet our attention progressively.

Those subscribers who intend binding the present volume of the Iris, and whose sets are incomplete, are requested to make early application for the deficiency, as several of the numbers are nearly sold out.

MANCHESTER INSTITUTION, AND A NEW UNIVERSITY.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I have been highly pleased to hear of the proposed Institution in Manchester for the promotion of science and the arts; and I doubt not that when it is once established it will be found exceedingly useful to a large portion of the immense population of this flourishing town. Notwithstanding all that has already been said and written on the subject, I might also "give my opinion"; but, as I can have little hope that any suggestion of such an obscure individual as myself would have the least weight in directing the arrangements that may ultimately be made, and as I am not particularly anxious respecting the exact plan which shall be adopted, provided the leading features are preserved, I decline the office of dictator, and content myself with stating that I shall be willing to co-operate most cordially, as I may have opportunity, with the friends of an institution which promises such happy results, although they should differ with me in some points of inferior consequence. Whatever plan shall be fixed on, however, I should like it to be one that is calculated to diffuse, as extensively as possible, among the various classes of society, the advantages which are anticipated.

But I beg leave, through the medium of the Iris, to call the public attention to an object of still greater magnitude and more extensive utility.—I have long been struck with the difference in the constitution of the English and Scotch universities. The former confine their privileges to individuals within the pale of the Established church, and leave the rest of the community, for any thing they have provided to the contrary, to grovel in consummate ignorance. The latter, on the contrary, open their doors to all, without distinction of creed, and afford the opportunity of acquiring a liberal education to all who are willing to embrace it. This is surely as it ought to be; for why should genius be allowed to lurk in obscurity, and be denied the advantages it might derive at these proud seats of learning, merely because it happens to reside in a mind inflexibly conscientious,—which cannot without a sacrifice of integrity and of principle conform to a church from which it dissents? I know that the church of England is exceedingly jealous of its honour, and disdains to share any of its privileges with dissenters. It execrates the spirit of non-conformity, while at the same time, by its own overbearing spirit, it extends the cause of dissent, and furnishes innumerable recruits to strengthen the camp of the enemy. The founders of non-conformity were men of inestimable worth and of highly cultivated minds. They had been educated in the Universities of their country, and were warmly attached to the best interests both of church and state. But a bigotted and tyrannical government would not tolerate their scruples of conscience, but excluded them from the church of which they were some of the brightest ornaments and supports. Their sons were deprived the privilege of drinking at the fountains of literature, and in a few generations a race of ministers arose among dissenters not worthy to be compared with the illustrious founders of their community,—men of narrow minds and full of bigotted antipathy against every thing connected with the church, and withal of such slender literary attainments that they could hardly fail to bring their whole order into disrepute. The consequence was, the breach between the church and dissenters was every day enlarged, and a "comprehension" which many of the best friends of religion on both sides earnestly desired and hoped one day to witness, was rendered altogether impracticable. Now what might have been the consequence had dissenting ministers been still allowed to study at the Universities? It is probable that the hostility which was engendered among them against the establishment would never have been so strong; but by the mutual intercourse of the candidates for the ministry among both parties, and by the similarity of their studies and pursuits at the most susceptible period of their lives, every asperity would have been softened and both parties been inclined to merge some of their harshest peculiarities, and thus prepare the way for an amicable coalescence. By denying to the dissenting ministry of England the advantages to be derived from a liberal education, and from some other causes which need not here be enumerated, the ministerial character both in and out of the establishment has been lowered materially below the standard it held a hundred and fifty years ago. Their character being depressed, their influence is lessened, and they have less power to do good than they might otherwise have had.

Now let us mark the contrast with regard to Scotland. Dissent from the established church of that kingdom was not suffered to be a barrier to the attainment of learning at the Scottish Universities. A learned ministry was there always held in estimation, and the same literary and scientific attainments have ever been required of dissenting ministers as of clergymen of the Kirk. Nay more; they are not satisfied with their candidates for the ministry possessing these attainments, but they must have acquired them at a University, and have studied there sufficiently long to entitle them to stand candidates for a Master's degree. In this point indeed they are far more strict than the church of England; for it is well known that many have obtained ordination within her pale, who never so much as saw the far famed cities of Cambridge and Oxford.

Now what has been the consequence of this liberality on the part of the Scotch universities? Do we not find that the great body of dissenters there, are closely assimilated to the Kirk? that instead of having adopted a different creed and a different system of polity, they in fact most rigidly adhere to the recognized standards of doctrine and discipline in the establishment, which a great part of the establishment regard as little as many in the English church do the thirty-nine articles which they are bound nevertheless to subscribe? Nay more, so little are they entitled to the character of dissenters, that the name Seceders, which they assume, could not be more appropriately applied; and the light in which they are viewed by many liberal churchmen in Scotland, will appear from a motion having lately been introduced into the presbytery of Glasgow, to endeavour to effect a union between the Establishment and the United Secession church, which now contains a number of congregations equal to one third of the amount contained by the Established church.

Dissenters in England have of late begun to see the necessity of a learned ministry, and have accordingly founded a number of seminaries for their education, under the name of Academies and Colleges, at which their object is in a greater or less degree attained; and many send down their sons to study at the Universities in Scotland.

But these academies, respectable as many of them are, are far from supplying the place of a university, and being designed only for ministerial candidates, the latter are wholly unprovided for. It is surprising, therefore, that no great public establishment has been attempted in England on the plan of a University, which might be open to the youth of all denominations, and be conducted on a scale of liberality worthy of the age and country in which we live. Ireland has already done this. The University of Dublin is on the exclusive plan of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

The Catholics were allowed to establish the college of Maynooth, to prevent the necessity of their going abroad for the education which was required for their priesthood, and government has been liberal in its endowments and benefactions. The Protestant Dissenters, who are almost exclusively of the presbyterian denomination, like their brethren in Scotland, admitted none to the office of the ministry who had not studied at a University; and for this purpose they were obliged with great hardship and at much expense to migrate into Scotland for that which was denied them on their native soil. In the year 1810 however, they had the happiness to see a college erected among themselves, under the most auspicious patronage, I mean the "ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION," at Belfast. This seminary is open for all religious denominations, and has already acquired no small share of celebrity for the success with which the study of literature and science has been prosecuted. It is conducted much on the same plan as the University of Glasgow, by men well qualified to give a high tone to the education of the north of Ireland, and it is recognized by the two great presbyterian synods of that country as superseding the necessity of their students going to Scotland for their education. Although they have not the power of conferring degrees, their certificate is considered of equal value, and has hitherto been given with a more strict regard to the qualifications of candidates, than is for the most part attended to by some of the Universities. At Belfast the mathematical and physical sciences are pursued with great ardour and success; and these chairs are at present filled by gentlemen of eminent attainments, one of whom is a member of Dublin University. The Greek Professorship was lately held by the late Rev. Wm. Nelson, D. D. M. R. J. A. well known to the public as the Author of "Greek Exercises." To evince the liberality of this establishment it may be mentioned that it is patronised both by churchmen and dissenters. Among the incorporated proprietors are the Lord Primate of all Ireland, the Marquis of Donegall, the Marquis of Downshire, the Bishop of Dromore, the Bishop of Down and Connor, and many other distinguished characters. The Marquis of Donegall is President, and the Marquis of Downshire is one of the Vice-presidents; and the Visitors are the Noblemen and Prelates already mentioned, together with the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Synod of Ulster, the Representatives in Parliament of the town of Belfast, and those for the counties of Down and Antrim, and the Sovereign or Chief Magistrate of Belfast, all for the time being; to whom are added eight gentlemen periodically elected.

This Institution is highly honourable to the public spirit and generosity of the gentlemen of Belfast and its neighbourhood, with whom the scheme originated; and, as the pecuniary resources of individuals are far more extensive in England than in Ireland, it is high time that we should follow an example so worthy of imitation.

The proper site for a new College or Academical Institution in England on liberal principles, I shall not pretend to determine. It is of more consequence, in the mean time that the attention of the public should be directed to the importance of the object, and the best means for carrying it into effect. Should it be conducted on the plan of the English or Scottish Universities? Perhaps a combination of the excellencies of both should be adopted. But by all means let a scheme be pursued which shall not be attended with such expense to the student as at present is incurred at Oxford and Cambridge, and which precludes many a deserving youth who is destitute of a fortune and of friends from availing himself of the advantages there to be enjoyed. One cannot but think with pain of the difficulties and hardships which the amiable Henry Kirke White had to encounter before he was able to enter the University; and many have been the buds of genius, which have been destroyed by penury's chill blast!

I see no reason why the Institution which I recommend should not enjoy the privilege of conferring degrees. I do not exactly know whence the Universities have derived this power, but I suspect it emanated originally from the court of Rome. As the crown is now invested with some of the powers which were formerly considered inherent in the Roman see, I suppose that the king enjoys this as part of his prerogative. In this case, sufficient interest might be used to obtain this privilege for the proposed college, although I have no doubt but strong opposition would be experienced from the great monopolizers of English literature.

But as I have extended this paper already to such a length I must stop thus abruptly, by subscribing myself yours, &c.

RODRIGO.

A SPANISH LEGEND.

NEAR TOLEDO, in SPAIN, they shew the remains of an ancient CASTLE, situated between two very high rocks; which is said to have been built by enchantment. Under the Castle was (say they) a cavern, rendered formidable by this prediction, that if any one should dare to explore its recesses, all Spain would experience a dreadful calamity. This threat effectually repressed all curiosity; till RODRIGO, king of Spain, ventured to open it, in expectation of finding concealed treasure. He found there a number of STATUES of an uncommon and warlike appearance; and was at the same time informed, that Spain was ripe for destruction,—and that the MOORS—a barbarous people, whom those statues represented, would soon overrun the country. Accordingly those formidable invaders quickly appeared; and king Rodrigo lost his life in opposing them: or (as some say) in endeavouring to escape after a defeat, was drowned in the river GUADALETE, about the year 714.

WHERE old TOLEDO's gothick towers
Frown on the traveller's wary eye,
While o'er his head suspicion lowers,
And holy murders prompt the sigh;

Might he indulge the inquiring gaze,
And dare its vicinage explore,
A RUIN's mouldering site betrays
The Country's dread, in days of yore.

For there—Tradition shuddering tells,
Where sever'd rocks a space disclose,
Rear'd by a dark MAGICIAN's spells
An ivy-mantled CASTLE rose.

Black was its awful front, and deep
Its vast recesses pierc'd the ground:
And Spirits there were deem'd to keep Mysterious vigils, hovering round.

But stoniest hearts with terror quell'd
Forbore those precincts lone and wild:
Each host his stranger thence withheld,
And each fond mother ward'd her child.

'Twas said, that when the mansion rose,
The WIZARD wove this threat'ning spell:
"LET none my secret haunts unclose;
Let mystery here for ever dwell.

"WOE to the intruder,—woe to SPAIN:
Iberia's suffering sons shall weep,
When human steps have rous'd the Bane,
And burst the imprison'd Demon's sleep."

BUT see!—at length the monster Fame
On every height has ta'en her stand,
And bade her brazen trump proclaim
The tones prophetick through the land.

Full wide was heard the tell-tale blast,
It thrill'd each anxious breast with fear:
Big with his kingdom's fate, at last
The tidings reach'd RODRIGO's ear.

"Fraught is the jest with vain alarm,"
The haughty KING was heard to say;
"My prowess shall dissolve the charm,
And drag the monster forth to day.

"Some miscreant there his wealth conceals,
Too weak the treasure to defend,
And trusts, dispersing idle tales,
The fiction shall his scheme befriend."

He said: and oas'd his limbs in steel,
And grasp'd a falchion in his hand;
Then, lest his single might should fail,
Around him calls a trusty band.

Straight, to the fatal walls they wend,
Athwart the desert waste and drear;
While from the turret's height descend
Ill-boding sounds, and words of fear:

"INSATIATE KING! thy bold emprise
Shall prove the dire prediction true;
On rapid wing thy ruin hies,
And hapless Spain this hour shall rue."

On rush'd the prince.—With thundering noise
Self-loos'd, the jarring bolts rebound,
The brazen portal open flies,
And echoing murmurs roll around.

Now silence reigns! no shapes appear:
Wrapp'd is the dome in pitchy night;
Save that across the expansion drear
A flitting TAPER throws its light.

"Thou!" cried the king, "our feet befriend,
And guide us through the doubtful maze:
Haste, and your leader's steps attend,
Led by yon meteor's cheering blaze!"

THUS he:—and loud their shouts resound
Through lengthen'd aisles, and desert halls:
Now, deep-sunk in the treacherous ground,
A CHASM unclos'd the sight appals!

"WHO dares with me the gulph descend,
And brave its windings dark and drear?
Fortune the fearless shall befriend,
And he the glittering prize shall share."

Dismal the passage was to view,
And deep the vault's descending flight;
And dimly burn'd the taper blue,
And cast around a livid light.

No fears deterr'd the monarch bold;
Insatiate avarice steel'd his breast,
And through the vapour damp and cold,
His eager feet undaunted press'd.

When lo! the vault expanding wide
Gap'd on the view, a vast profound!
No end the aching sight desoried,
No limits mark'd its concave bound!

The clash of arms, the shouts of fear,
Re-echoed through its ample range,
And dying groans assail'd the ear,
With portent dire, and accent strange.

Nor longer now with feeble rays
A single taper sheds its light:
Ten thousand pour their dazzling blaze,
Disclosing far those haunts of night.

Such,—poets feign, the infernal hall
Of PANDEMONIUM seem'd of old:
For there on many a pedestal
Menn'd a WARRIOR strong and bold:

In armour all! as rang'd for fight!
So far could magic art avail!
Each hand uprais'd its weapon bright,
In act the gazer to assail!

Full in the wide den's lurid glare
The host fantastic stood confest:
Such gestures wild! so fierce an air
No sculptor ever yet express'd!

LOST is the MONARCH in surprise!
And scarce the wildering scene believes;
And scarce he trusts his wondering eyes;
And doubts the sounds his ear receives!

When from the cavern's inmost bound,
A voice in tones prophetic broke;
And pealing thunder shook the ground,
As thus the POW'ER malignant spoke:

"GREEDY MONARCH! imag'd here
See the SWARTHY FORMS appear!
Hosts of foes—a murderous band
Threaten thy devoted land!
Lo! the destin'd hour is come
Pregnant with IBERIA's doom!

"SEE! the threatening forms advance!
See! they couch the quivering lance!
Followed by a savage train,
Hark! OPPRESSION clanks his chain!
Selfish Monarch! imag'd here,
See their swarthy forms appear!"

BORNE on swift wings, the monster Fame
On every turret took her stand;
And bade her brazen trump proclaim
The tones terrific through the land.

"Lo! o'er the realm destruction lo's,
Your generous efforts all are vain—
Her swarthy legions AFRICK pours,
And ruin frowns on hapless SPAIN.

"FRAUGHT is the tale with vain alarm!"
The haughty king was heard to say;
"My prowess shall avert the harm,
And drive the invading hordes away."

FIERCE was the war:—the conquering MOOR,
Rodrigo's might in vain withstood,
When loud was heard the battle's roar
By GUADALETE's purple flood!

(Written for the Iris.)

A WEEK IN LONDON.

THE dawn of Monday had no sooner broken than we rose to put in execution our journey to Windsor, but having a few hours to spare we resolved to visit the tower. On our way thither we came in contact with Billingsgate, the chief mart for fish, in London, and most assuredly a disgrace to it. There is scarcely a provincial town in England, as a sea-port, that does not possess more convenient and respectable accommodations. Indeed, throughout the country, Billingsgate is as proverbial for coarse manners, as Jezebel of old was for renowned wickedness; and the comparison will bear ample milation, for a few minutes visit to this elegant entrepot of Fiscal variety will soon convince the traveller into a belief, that from the west end of the town he has arrived in another country, and were it the Antipodes it could not be different. From polished manners to refined brutality; from studied politeness to unreserved impoliteness; in fact, from all that learning could give an advantage to, or amiability of mind could accomplish, down to the lowest vulgarity in life, and the most shocking depravity in manners, are to be met with here: though its site is on the banks of the Thames, its waters add no sweetness to its edifice, if such it can be called; and it is some consolation that the delicate ear, or the more refined olfactory, cannot the visitor more hastily to depart, than his curiosity had invited his visit. This is no place to introduce females to, much less its society; we, therefore, had only a cursory insight and went direct to the Tower.

This building was erected, as is supposed, by Julius Cæsar, and afterwards added to, and strengthened by William the Conqueror, to overawe the city of London—for the purpose it could not have a better situation. It completely commands the Thames, and its other Fortifications, which comprise all that ancient strength could construct, or modern ingenuity could devise, render it at once a place of defence and convenience. A large mote surrounds it, and the cannon from the battlements are seen bristling on every side. The draw-bridge, over which you pass for admission, separates in an instant, the main land from the fortress. It will be necessary here to guard against extortion, for much previous ceremony introduces a visitor who expresses his wishes, and in proportion as that ignorance to specified forms is manifested, those exactions are increased. The purchase of a book sold on the Ramparts, and which includes every direction and laurel charge is the best guidance to, and protection from, official assistance and delinquency. To pass over minor objects, which are abundantly interesting of themselves, you come into the grand room, where are always ready for service ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND stand of arms. The inconceivable beauty of this place passes any powers of my description; for, added to their beautifully neat and polished condition, they are placed in such forms, as absolutely to deceive the imagination. Pillars of muskets, Stars of swords, canopies, counterpanes, pyramids, festoons, and innumerable other devices, bewilder the mind. Our guide told us that the Emperor of Russia, at his introduction, made a full pause on his entrance, and in tolerably good English said, "No wonder England is impincible!"

But we had an advantage rarely to be met with, and which arose, not as in other cases from superior privileges, but from chance. The trophies of Waterloo were just deposited, and formed the only imperfect assortment in the room—they were then in a train of arrangement—novelty—patriotism—feeling—all combined to render them objects of much curiosity. The Cuirasses, which in all Napoleon's wars, came in for the finishing stroke, when victory appeared on the side of his opponents, were viewed by us with no ordinary sensations. A musket-ball, however close, rings, or at most dinges this novel mail, if in a straight forward direction. Our brave fellows found this to their cost, but poor General Picton, wearied out with the loss of valuable life, could wait no longer, and bringing up the light artillery, poured out from their brazen mouths, a shower of grape, whilst he (a manœuvre unprecedented before his time) led the Infantry on to an attack of this formidable cavalry, and fell in the heroic attempt. The cuirasses we saw bore testimony to this bloody conflict—they were inwardly inlaid with the gore of their wearers, but on trying one on, I was sensible of the total inefficiency they must have in close combat, for neither the arm nor body has its pliancy, which is so essential at a critical moment. One observation, however, ought to be made—there are no horses equal to the English, and the French on this occasion were literally run down.

The spoils of the Spanish Armada were next shown to us, and surely imagination and invention must have been put to the rack to discover such tortures as were prepared for the English by these presuming Spaniards.

The thumb-screws are ingenious but terrible instruments, and there is also what is called the Englishman's toothpick, another weapon intended to rack those who had most nobly defended their country. A vast variety of ancient and costly weapons, inlaid with silver and richly embossed are shown amongst these; and indeed these preparations appear to have been of that studiously devised character, as to have precluded the possibility of failure.—You are next introduced to a room which makes a most imposing display—where the Kings of England, large as life, are mounted on horseback. The impression on the mind on the first entrance is, that they are living, animated creatures: many of the horses possess the trappings they wore when bestrided by their royal chieftains, and several of the royal figures are enclosed in the very mail they were accustomed to wear. Amongst these, that of Edward, the Black Prince, is the most conspicuous.—The likenesses of the different monarchs are said to be excellent—many we could trace from coins we had seen, and only a few days before, his present Majesty had been to view them, and, on casting his eyes on the figure of George the Second, said to the governor, "That would almost make me believe my grandfather was yet alive, or that he had been raised from the dead!" To the Amazonian beauties of Britain, one treat will be exquisitely dear. The guide conducts you to the end of a room, where, suddenly drawing up a curtain, Queen Beas is represented in the very armour she wore when reviewing her troops at Tilbury. The horse, remarkable for its symmetry, is close to her, attended by her page, as beautiful a specimen of wax work as ever was accomplished. Few leave this without regret, for her reign is associated with some of the most proud remembrances of England's glory. I believe the frill, also, round her neck, is an original.

The parade of the garrison was no small gratification: it was composed of a part of the royal guard, who decided the battle of Waterloo, when lying down under a small hill to shelter themselves from the enemy's shot, the Duke of Wellington called out, "Up guards and at 'em!" Their march in divisions was as a compact wall,—the band which accompanied them was superlatively fine, as in the park.

"England with all thy faults I love thee still." And so any one, not dead to patriotism, on such a review of his national honours, however absorbed in political opposition, would say.—We passed a variety of other curiosities, none indifferent, to the room where the two royal princes were smothered, as history relates, by King Richard III., and called "the bloody Tower." The bed yet remains.—From hence to the wild beasts.—These are some rare specimens of natural history; they have chiefly been presents from various potentates in different quarters of the world to our own sovereigns, and have been singularly prolific; and we saw some fine young whelps of the lioness.

A story, not without its interest as an instance of intrepid presence of mind, was related by our guide, and should not be passed over; that his predecessor having by accident left the cage of the tiger open and coming himself into the yard, found the vindictive animal loose and in an attitude to spring upon him. What was to be done?—Death seemed certain. To endeavour to escape was worse than to remain.—did heaven watch over him?—The lion was the king of beasts and he had fondled him in his den, and been a companion with him. He, however, approached, by an instinctive idea of security,—opened the cage and let the lion out. The tiger appalled, retreated to his cage, and the keeper, protected by his noble preserver fastened the door, whilst he cautiously and gratefully enticed back the generous instrument of his salvation.

LANDSCAPE PAINTING, AND EFFECT IN WATER-COLOURS, &c.

By David Cox.

"The principal art of landscape-painting," says Mr. Cox, "consists in conveying to the mind the most forcible effect which can be produced from the various classes of scenery; which possesses the power of exciting an interest superior to that resulting from any other effect; and which can only be obtained by a most judicious selection of particular tints, and a skillful arrangement and application of them to difference in time, seasons, and situation. This is the grand principle upon which pictorial excellence hinges; as many pleasing objects, the combination of which renders a piece perfect, are frequently passed over by an observer, because the whole of the composition is not under the influence of a suitable effect. Thus, a cottage or a village scene requires a soft and simple admixture of tones calculated to produce pleasure without astonishment; awakening all the delightful sensations of the bosom, without trenching on the nobler provinces of feeling. On the contrary, the structures of greatness and antiquity should be marked by a character of awful sublimity, suited to the dignity of the subject: indenting on the mind a reverential and permanent impression, and giving at once a corresponding and unequivocal grandeur to the picture. In the language of the pencil, as well as of the pen, sublime ideas are expressed by lofty and obscure images; such as in pictures, objects of fine majestic forms, lofty towers, mountains, lakes margined with stately trees, rugged rocks, and clouds rolling their shadowy forms in broad masses over the scene, much depends upon the classification of the objects, which should wear a magnificent uniformity, and much on the colouring, the tones of which should be deep and impressive.

"In the selection of a subject from nature, the student should ever keep in view the principal object which induced him to make the sketch; whether it be mountains, castles, groups of trees, corn field, river scene, or any other object, the prominence of this leading feature in the piece should be duly supported throughout; the character of the picture should be derived from it; every other object introduced should be subservient to it; and the attraction of the one should be the attraction of the whole. The union of too great a variety of parts, tends to destroy, or at least to weaken the predominance of that which ought to be the principal in the composition, and which the student, when he comes to the colouring, should be careful to characterize, by throwing upon it the strongest light. In his attention to this rule, however, the student must be particular not to fall into the opposite extreme, by suffering the leading object of his composition so fully to engross his attention, as to render him neglectful of the inferior parts. Because they are not to be exalted into principals, it does not follow that they are to be degraded into superfluities.

"All the lights in a picture should be composed of warm tints, except they fall on a glossy or reflective surface,—such as laurel leaves, glazed utensils, &c. which should be cool, and the lights small, to give them a sparkling appearance; but care must be taken not to introduce a cold colour in the principal light, which, as already mentioned, should be thrown upon the leading feature of a picture, as it conduces to destroy the breadth that should be preserved; while, on the contrary, the opposition or proximity of a cool to a warm colour, assists greatly in giving brilliancy to the lights. If the picture, for instance, should have a cool sky, the landscape ought to be principally composed of warm tints; as contrast of this description tends to the essential improvement of general effect.

"All objects which are not in character with the scenes should be most carefully avoided, as the introduction of any unnecessary object is sure to be attended with injurious consequences. This must prove the necessity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with, and obtaining a proper feeling of the subject. The picture should be complete and perfect in the mind, before it is even traced upon the canvas. Such force and expression should be displayed, as would render the effect, at the first glance, intelligible to the observer. Merely to paint, is not enough; for where no interest is felt, nothing can be more natural than that none should be conveyed.

"Finally, it may be observed, that it is only by a due attention to each distinct part, and by a skilful combination of all, that the whole can be effective and delightful."

TO SCOTIA.

Hail, Scotia, hail!—where'er I roam,
Where'er I wing my weary way,
I turn to thee, as that dear home
From whence my doom has been to stray:
Ah, fell ambition!—other lands
Have seen me toiling after fame,
As though their shores held golden sand,
As though life rested on a name!
Land of the mountain and the flood,
From whence I drew my childhood's bloom,
Where rises ancient Holyroods;—
There would I seek my lonely tomb:
Choice boon!—when we have travers'd wide
The farthest bounds of ocean deep,
Should we return, and sink beside
Those mounds in which our fathers sleep.
Long years have rolled, since pale adieu
Sighed from my lips with falt'ring breath,
Sad was the hour—to thee still true,
I'd seal thy welcome with my death;
Though as I wander'd reckless on,
'Twas mine to see earth's fairest daughters;
Yet, far more dear to me, that sun
Which gilds thy clear pellucid waters!
Thy bonnie braes, thy snow-clad hills,
The merry pibroch's blithesome sound,
Bid care and its attendant ills
Be buried in the jovial round:
These scenes to me they once were gay
When life was in its purity;
But now their joy hath fled away,
For visions of futurity!

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF BERNARD BARTON.

Extracted from Times Telescope for 1824.

We have great pleasure in presenting to our readers 'some account' of the 'QUAKER POET,' whose elegant and interesting productions have afforded so much gratification to every reader of pure taste and right feelings. Of the authenticity of the materials our readers may be perfectly satisfied, as they are furnished by one who is well acquainted with Mr. Barton.

BERNARD BARTON was born in the vicinity of London, on the 31st of January, 1784; his father was in trade in the metropolis, whither he had come from his native place, Carlisle. The subject of this memoir had the misfortune to lose his mother one month after his birth: her maiden name was Mary Done, and she was a native of Rockcliffe, Cumberland; she died at the early age of 32.

His father died before Mr. Barton was seven years old; but his second marriage, which took place a few months before his death, provided an excellent parent for his children: to her, and to his two sisters, both several years older than himself, our author owed infinite obligations. His education at one of the Quaker seminaries was, of course, plain and circumscribed, being pretty much confined to useful, indeed necessary, branches of knowledge. But his father had been a man of greater natural and more cultivated intellect than many; he had read much, and on the abolition of Slavery, in which he was one of Clarkson's earliest associates, he had, on several occasions, proved that he could write well, though, we believe, he was never avowedly an author. He had left no despicable collection of books, so that in his school vacations ample means were afforded to his son of indulging his taste for reading.

In the year 1806, Mr. Barton took up his residence in the pleasant town of Woodbridge in Suffolk, and commenced business as a merchant; but an unlooked for domestic affliction of the severest kind was about to visit him, and his worldly prospects were to receive an irrecoverable shock,—the loss of his amiable wife, before they had been married a twelvemonth, and soon after the birth of her child! This excellent woman, to whom our poet was for so short a time united, gave rise to some of his best pieces.

This mournful event, combined with discouraging prospects of a mercantile nature, induced our author to retire from commercial pursuits on his own behalf; and in 1810 he obtained a situation as a clerk in the Woodbridge Bank, which he still holds.

"Soon after Mr. Barton had entered upon his present situation, he began 'to commit the sin of rhyme,' and, a new Provincial Paper being established about this time, it became the vehicle of his effusions: by degrees he became bold enough to send a short piece now and then to a London paper, and at last, in 1812, ventured on an anonymous volume entitled 'Metrical Effusions,' 250 copies of which were printed by a bookseller of Woodbridge, and sold within the immediate circle of our author's acquaintance. In 1818, Mr. Barton printed, by subscription, a volume of 'Poems by an amateur,' of which 150 only were struck off, and none ever sold at the shops. Encouraged by the very flattering manner in which these impressions of his poems were received by his friends, he at last ventured to publish, in a small volume, 'Poems by Bernard Barton,' which was very favourably noticed by the Literary Journals, and being afterwards made still more known by an article in the Edinburgh Review, has now reached a third edition. Little more than a year ago he published 'Napoleon, and other Poems,' of which there have been numerous very flattering notices in the critical journals.

Such has been the literary career of Bernard Barton. If it have not left behind it the brilliant track of other poetical comets, it has been less erratic in his course;—and his Parnassian vespers may be said to possess all the mild and soothing beauties of the Evening Star. If his Muse have not always reached the sunward path of the soaring eagle, it is no extravagant praise to say that she has often emulated the sublimity of his aerial flight. But the great charm thrown around the effusions of the Scotch bard is that 'lucid veil' of morality and religion which 'covers but not conceals' that 'silver network' through which shine his poetic 'apples of gold.'

We must now conclude our notice of the bard of Woodbridge: it has occupied more space than we usually allot to articles of this nature, but the interest and the novelty of the theme must plead our excuse. Should this brief account excite the curiosity of our readers to become better acquainted with our friend, we refer them to the whole-length portrait painted by himself, and contained in every page of his 'Poems.'

THE CLUB.

No. XXXVI.—FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1824.

Gay hope is theirs, by fancy fed,
Less pleasing when posess'd;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast:
Their buxom health of rosy hue,
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively cheer of vigour born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly th' approach of morn. GENT.

THE President, who has been indisposed during some weeks, was at the Club this evening for the first time since his recovery. His re-appearance at the Green Dragon, was evidently very gratifying, not only to the members of the Club, but also to the landlord and his whole family. Our host would not suffer the old gentleman to go up stairs without the assistance of his arm; the mistress of the house ran after them with a candle in each hand, lest the large gas lamp in the stair-case should not give a sufficient supply of light; and the servant girl, whose adventure with the ghost is mentioned in our third number, hastened before, to have the pleasure of placing our friend's chair, and giving the cushion a few additional thumps.

When the President was seated, and had replied to the congratulations on his recovery which were addressed to him by the members, so many questions were put to him on the subject, that he was insensibly led to give a sort of history of his indisposition, and, from doing so, to enter somewhat into detail with respect to the manner in which he had endeavoured to beguile the tedious hours of a lingering disorder.

"Amongst the books," said he, "which I have looked into while I have been confined to my room, is 'Ockley's History of the Saracens,' and I mention this work in particular because I have been much struck with some of the sentences, or maxims, of Ali, the nephew of the impostor Mahomet, a translation of which Mr. Ockley has appended to his book. There is one of these sentences especially which afforded me much matter for reflection; and which I think equally remarkable for justness of thought, and elegance of expression. Perhaps," continued the President, "my friends will not be so much interested by it as I have been, for the solitude of a sick chamber has, I am aware, the power of adding very greatly to the force of an affecting sentiment; but I will venture to affirm that there is not one of them who will not admit that it contains an important, though a mournful truth.—It is this—

"The remembrance of Youth is—a Sigh!"

"This short remark," added the President, (who observed by the attentive silence of the members that they wished him to proceed) "this short remark has dwelt upon my mind during the greater part of the time I have been indisposed; and the more I have considered it, the more reason have I found to acquiesce in its correctness.

"We are all fond of looking back upon our early days. We recollect, with vivid interest, the pleasures, and the adventures of the first years of our existence, when the senses were unimpaired, and every enjoyment was heightened by the absence of anxiety and care. But the very fondness which we feel for this retrospection confirms the truth of Ali's remark; and whilst we contrast the light-hearted, and unsuspecting, gaiety of youth, with the laboured, and often affected, mirth of maturer years; we spontaneously add our testimony to its correctness, and sigh, almost unconsciously, for the days which must never return.

"If we think with this feeling of regret, of the unsophisticated pleasures of youth; it is certain, that, in reviewing the past, we find quite as much reason to lament the departure of that fairy colouring, with which the spirits, and ardour, and inexperience, of youth, always invest the prospect of life. Rousseau has admirably exemplified this regret, when he exclaims 'How is it, that having met with so many worthy people in the days of my youth, I should find none of them in my old age?' In this respect every reflecting man resembles Rousseau. How different does even successful life appear at sixteen and at forty! What a change has taken place in our estimate of human beings, and human pleasures! and how often,—satiated with the possession of real blessings,—or disgusted by the unexpected depravity of those whom we had too highly valued,—or wearied with the every-day recurrence of petty solicitudes,—how often do we recall the fairy pictures of youth,—and wish that the enchantment could still last,—and sigh that it is no longer possible!

"In the recollections of our youth, too, we unavoidably include the remembrance of those who were the associates of our early days. Of some, perhaps, whom we loved with all the sincerity and ardour of youthful feeling, and who have been torn from us by the hand of death. Ah! who that has ever felt an unfeigned attachment, and having that attachment faithfully returned, has been doomed to mourn over the grave of its object, can possibly look back upon life without feeling, that sadness darkens the pictures, and that the recollection of youth is indeed—a sigh!

"But there is yet one other view of the spring of life, in which the truth of this remark is conspicuously apparent. Scarcely any man, I think, whose education has been in any degree liberal, enters into life without some designs of distinguishing himself by moral and intellectual excellence. Noble and honourable views are natural to the mind of ingenious youth; and the enquiry which Cowley makes—

'What shall I do to be for ever known,
And make the future age my own!'

is, tacitly at least, the question, which almost every well educated and virtuous young man, frequently proposes to himself. But who, that has passed the meridian of life, and looks back upon what he intended, and what he has performed, but must deeply sigh at the contrast which he will infallibly perceive? Who, indeed, that makes such a retrospect with the seriousness which its importance deserves, will not be struck at once with sorrow and surprize when he considers that much of the knowledge which, in his youth, he intended to acquire, is still unknown to him; and feels many imperfections even yet clinging to his moral character which, at the outset of his career in life, it was his purpose speedily to overcome."

The President, who, from the interest which he felt in the subject, had spoken longer, and with more earnestness, than was quite consistent with the still delicate state of his health, paused here, and the subject was taken up by the other members. Several remarks were made; but as their insertion would extend the paper to an unusual length, we shall not, now, present them to the public. M. M.

MR. WEARE'S MURDER.

Every nerve of pity has been of late shaken by this well-known tragedy, and humanity shudders at the act, while moral rectitude blushes at the crimes which led to it. That paralyzing, demoralizing sin, Gambling, was its fatal origin. The details have been too shocking, if the atrocities connected with it had not been too long, to have met insertion in our pages. What is recorded of it in the London papers would make a tolerably sized volume, and each day adds some fresh particulars.

When will those lawless depredators cease to pursue this fatal path?—When, awed by these terrible examples, cease to participate in such enormities? In a traffic, which, as our Iris of the 1st November truly expressed in a French translation on one of those sinks of infamy, was

"Ruin in the loss, and dishonour by the gain."

The highwayman is less dangerous—a family—desperation—self-support—a thousand other reasons, all inexcusable, indeed, may operate to cause a sudden deviation from the line of virtue: but the cool, calculating, heartless murderer, not of an individual, but of whole families, who draws a blush of shame over the faces of innocents, and a curtain of disgrace over inoffensive relatives: oh! such bloodless recreants, having no pity themselves deserve none. There is an unfading honour in a man who perishes in honest pride of poverty, but none, no none, to the unfeeling, the abandoned wretch, who can cause the lone partner of another's hearth to say,

"He comes not!
I have watch'd the moon go down,
And yet he comes not," &c.

We have made this hasty preface to Emma's lines, in the plenitude of our heart-sickening detestation of this horrid vice, happy that in arresting the eye of any such, it may palsy his hand also.

It seems, however, and we thank God for it, to have been the total dissolution of this pestiferous connexion—each villain trying to involve his confederate. Thus it is always the case where a friendship is not cemented by virtue, one link of the chain broken, and the union is for ever at an end.—Ed.

Lines WRITTEN ON PERUSING AN ACCOUNT OF THE ABOVE MURDER.

How calm the scene! how tranquil is the grove!
The feather'd songsters all have bade adieu.
Save the sweet redbreast, warbling to his love,
In notes melodious, and affection true.

But hark! my friend, what means that dreadful sound?
Why flies the robin from the peaceful vale?
Why does all nature seem appalled round?
The sound was murder, and the cry was wail.

From Gill's Hill-lane the horrid groan proceeds,
In Gill's Hill-lane the fatal deed is done—
Behold the bloody knife among the weeds,—
Unhappy mortal!—now thy race is run!

Where has the sanguinary wretch retired?
Blood marks his steps—he joins the gambling set;
And in the cottage which we late admired,
The assassin trio are in council met.

Gambling the cause—and then fell hate ensues—
And blackest vengeance will the losers vow—
And man in human blood his hand embrues—
— the brand of Cain's upon thy brow.

Will heaven look on and not reveal the deed?
No! God is just, and blood for blood must flow;
To death your country's laws have ye decreed,
(The murderer's doom) yourselves have struck the blow.

Yet ye have kindred who will mourn your fate,
Though you, their hearts have lacerated deep—
Oh fallen, fallen is their happy state,
And gentle pity turns aside to weep.

EMMA.

AFFECTING NARRATIVE.

As I walked one moonlight evening, about a fortnight ago, along Piccadilly, I observed a girl meanly dressed, coming along the pavement at a slow pace. When I passed her, she turned a little towards me and made a sort of halt, but said nothing; I am ill at looking any body full in the face, so I went on a few steps before I turned my eye to observe her; she had by this time resumed her former pace. I remarked a certain elegance in her form which the poorness of her garb could not altogether conceal; her person was thin and genteel, and there was something not ungraceful in the stoop of her head, and the seeming feebleness with which she walked. I could not resist the desire which her appearance gave me of knowing somewhat of her situation and circumstances, I therefore walked back and repassed her, with such a look (for I could bring myself to nothing more) as might induce her to speak what she seemed desirous to say at first. This had the effect I wished: "Pity a poor orphan," said she, in a voice tremulous and weak. I stopped and put my hand in my pocket; I had now a better opportunity of observing her,—her face was thin and pale, part of it was shaded by her hair of a light brown colour, which was parted in a disordered manner at her forehead and hung loose upon her shoulders; round them was cast a piece of tattered cloak, which with one hand she held across her bosom, while the other was half out-stretched to receive the bounty I intended for her; her large blue eyes were cast on the ground, she was drawing back her hand as I put a trifle into it, on receiving which she turned them up to me, muttering something which I could not hear, and then letting go her cloak and pressing her hands together, burst into tears. It was not the action of an ordinary beggar, and my curiosity was strongly excited by it; I desired her to follow me to the house of a friend, close by, whose beneficence I have often had occasion to know. When she arrived there she was so fatigued and worn out, that it was not till after some means used to restore her, she was able to give us an account of her misfortunes. Her name she told us was —, the place of her birth one of the towns in the north of England. Her father, who had died several years ago, left her remaining parent with the charge of her, then a child, and one brother, a lad of seventeen. By his industry, however, joined to that of her mother, they were tolerably well supported, their father having died possessed of a small farm, with the right of pasturage on an adjoining common, from which they obtained a decent livelihood. That last summer her brother having become acquainted with a recruiting serjeant who was quartered in a neighbouring village, was by him enticed to enlist as a soldier, and soon after was marched off along with some other recruits, to join his regiment; that this she believed broke her mother's heart, for that she had never afterwards had a day's health, and at length had died about three weeks ago; that immediately after her death the steward employed by the Squire of whom the farm was held, took possession of every thing for the arrears of rent. That as she had heard her brother's regiment was in this neighbourhood, she had wandered hither in quest of him, as she had no other relation in the world to own her. But she found on arriving here that the regiment was gone to some distance, she could not tell where. "This news," said she, "laid hold of my heart, and I have had something wrong here (putting her hand to her bosom) ever since. I got a bed and some victuals in the house of a woman here in the town to whom I told my story, and who seemed to pity me; I had then a little bundle of things which I had been allowed to take with me after my mother's death; but the night before last somebody stole it from me while I slept, and so the woman said she would keep me no longer, and turned me out into the street, where I have since remained; I am almost famished for want." She was now in better hands, but our assistance had come too late; a frame naturally delicate, had yielded to the fatigues of her journey and the hardships of her situation; she declined by slow but interrupted degrees, and yesterday breathed her last. A short time before she expired she asked to see me, and taking from her bosom a little silver locket which she told me had been her mother's, and which all her distresses could not make her part with, begged I would keep it for her dear brother, and give it him if ever he should return home, as a token of her remembrance.

TO CASWIN.

In reply to his Lines on the "SPIRITS" in the Iris of the 1st of November.

Hail to thy muse, oh Caswin! if thou find
A spirit from imagination's brain,
That e'er could soothe or tranquilize a mind,
Or cleanse the foulest leprosy of pain,
To bind a heart once firm—now rent in twain,
Then shall I deem thee somewhat more than kind,
As frosts dissolve in heaven's pellucid rain,
Such would that spirit be to mine—so keen
That when a zephyr sighed, those sighs would intervene.

Raise it, my friend; but then her form must be
Aerial woman—aye and such a soul
As might escape an Eden's tempting tree,
One who ne'er mixed a dreg in sorrow's bowl
Or bruised a heart of bleeding misery—
Such as could set a captive trouble free;
And might the knell of parting anguish toll,
And if my heart she even deigned to touch,
The pressure should be light—it will not bear too much.

Canst thou do this? if not thou canst but try,
To draw an image which may bring relief;
Which I may dwell upon with pleasure's eye,
To draw a sun-beam o'er a mist of grief,
And tear from memory's book its canker'd leaf;
Then will thou wipe a tearful optic dry,
And make a lengthen'd wretchedness but brief,
That I, unknown, may profit from thy song,
And thou wilt cure a pain which I have nurs'd too long.

ANECDOTES, ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE STATE OF THE HIGHLANDS AFTER THE REBELLION OF FORTY-FIVE.*

The field of Culloden, and the scenes of cruelty which followed it, though fatal to the hopes of the Highlanders who enthusiastically espoused the cause of Charles, yet did not utterly crush their hardy and predatory disposition. The clansmen retired, it is true, to the rocky fastnesses of their highest glens,—they chewed the cud of bitter reflection,—and they mourned their cottages burned, and their wives and children massacred at dead of night, or arrested in melancholy flight by death amidst the snows of winter. But savage heroism was not altogether subdued within them by calamities such as these, calamities calculated to bend less lofty souls to the very dust of subjection. With them the effect was like that produced by attempting to curb the mountain cataract,—they were divided into smaller and less important bodies, and their power was no longer forcible in its native stream; but each individual portion seemed to gain a particular character and consequence of its own, by separation from the main body, where it had been undistinguished and unobserved. It was thus that, lurking in little parties, among pine-clad precipices, in caverns known only to themselves, they now waged a minor warfare,—that which had the plundering of cattle for its object. But let us not look upon those men, driven as it were to desperation, as we do upon the wretched cow-stealers of the present day. That which is now considered as one of the basest of crimes, was then, in the eyes of the mountaineer, rather an honourable and chivalrous profession. Nothing was then more creditable than to be the leader of a daring band, to harry the low country of its live stock: and, above all, it was conceived to be perfectly fair to drive "Moray-land, where every gentleman had a right to take his prey."

It was about this period, and (though it may surprise many (it was not much more than fifty years ago, that Mr. R—I, a gentleman of the low country of Moray, was awakened early in a morning by the unpleasant intelligence of the Highlanders having carried off the whole of his cattle from a distant hill, grazing in Brae Moray, a few miles above the junction of the rapid rivers Findhorn and Divie, and between both. He was an active man, so that, after a few questions put to the breathless messenger, he lost not a moment in summoning and arming several servants; and, instead of taking the way to his farm, he struck at once across the country, in order to get as speedily as possible to a point, where the rocks and woods, hanging over the deep bed of the Findhorn, first begin to be crowned by steep and lofty mountains, receding in long and misty perspective. This was the grand pass into the boundless wastes frequented by the robbers; and here Mr. R—I forded the river to its southern bank, and took his stand with his little party, well aware, that if he could not intercept his cattle here, he might abandon all further search for them.

The spot chosen for the ambuscade was a beautiful range of scenery known by the name of the Streens. So deep is the hollow in many places, that some of the little cottages, with which its bottom is here and there sprinkled,

* Written, we have little doubt, by Sir Walter Scott.

† A great chieftain of the vale Urquhart having had his cattle stolen by the vassals of another head of a clan to the westward, and having sent a messenger with a remonstrance, had his herds restored to him, and received a letter, which still exists, containing the apology, that the fellows had mistaken his orders, which were to go to the land of Moray alone, "where every gentleman was entitled to take his prey."

have Gaelic appellations, implying, that they never see the sun. There were no houses near them; but the party lay concealed amongst some huge fragments of a rock, shivered by the wedging ice of the previous winter, from the summit of a lofty crag, that hung half across the narrow holm where they stood. A little way further down the river the passage was contracted to a rude and scrambling foot-path, and behind them the glen was equally confined. Both extremities of the small amphitheatre were shaded by almost impenetrable thickets of birch, hazel, alder, and holly, whilst a few wild pines found a scanty subsistence for their roots, in mid-way air, on the face of the crags, and were twisted and writhed, for lack of nourishment, into a thousand fantastic and picturesque forms. The serene sun of a beautiful summer's day was declining, and half the narrow haugh was, in broad and deep shadow, beautifully contrasted by the brilliant golden light that fell on the wooded bank on the other side of the river.

Such was the scene where Mr. R—I posted his party; and they had not waited long, listening in silence of the evening, when they heard the distant lowing of the cattle, and the wild shouts of the reavers, re-echoed as they approached by the surrounding rocks. The sound came nearer and nearer; and at last the crashing of the boughs announced the appearance of the more advanced part of the drove, and the animals began to issue slowly from the tangled wood, or to rush violently forth, as the blows or shouts of the drivers were more or less impetuous. As they came out, they collected themselves into a group, and stood bellowing as if unwilling to proceed farther. In the rear of the last of the herd, Mr. R—I saw, bursting singly from different parts of the brake, a party of fourteen Highlanders, all in the full costume of the mountaineers, and armed with dirk, pistols, and claspnet, and two or three of them carrying antique fowling-pieces. Mr. R—I's party consisting of not more than ten or eleven; but telling them to be firm, he drew them forth from their ambuscade, and ranged them on the green turf. With some exclamations of surprise, the robbers, at the shrill whistle of their leader, rushed forwards, and ranged themselves in front of their spoil.—Mr. R—I and his party stood their ground with determination, whilst the robbers appeared to hold a council of war. At last their chief, a little athletic man, with long red hair curling over his shoulders, and with a pale and thin, but acute visage, advanced a little way beyond the rest. "Mr. R—I," said he, in a loud voice, and speaking good English, though in a Highland accent, "are you for peace or war? if for war, look to yourself; if for peace and treaty, order your men to stand fast, and advance to meet me."—"I will treat," replied Mr. R—I, "but can I trust to your keeping faith?"—"Trust to the honour of a gentleman!" rejoined the other, with an imperious air. The respective parties were ordered to stand their ground, and the two leaders advanced about seventy or eighty paces each towards the middle of the space, with their loaded guns cocked, and presented at each other. A certain sum was demanded for the restitution of the cattle; Mr. R—I had not so much about him, but offered to give what money he had in his pocket—being a few pounds short of what the robber had asked. The bargain was concluded—the money paid—the guns uncocked and shouldered—and the two parties advanced to meet each other in perfect harmony.—"And now, Mr. R—I," said the leader of the band, "you must look at your beasts, to see that none of them be awanting." Mr. R—I did so. "They are all here," said he, "but one small dun quey."—"Make yourself easy about her," replied the other, "she shall be in your pasture before daylight to-morrow morning." The treaty being thus concluded, the robbers proceeded up the glen, and were soon hid beneath its thick foliage; whilst Mr. R—I's people took charge of the cattle and began to drive them homewards. The reaver was as good as his word;—next morning the dun quey was seen grazing with the herd. Nobody knew how she came there; but her jaded and draggled appearance bespoke the length and the nature of the night journey she had performed.

ON DUELLING.

Suppose an high spirited but good-natured young man receives an insult. It is possible that his first or at least his second impulse may be to pass it over, and content himself with despising the brute who offered it. The brute, however, mistaking love of peace for fear of war, and glad of an opportunity of oppressing safely, repeats the aggression: the bye-standers, who, to a young man, are the representatives of all mankind past, present, and to come, begin to shew by their looks that they had not expected so much philosophy. Our hero gives or sends a challenge; "a meeting takes place," the brute is shot dead, and nobody regrets him, not even his creditors for they had lost all hopes.

But, in the meantime, what is the situation of the young man and the seconds. Divinity and law have long ago settled the question—they are murderers. A warrant is issued for their apprehension; they possess, however, good friends who have spare attics, and the warrant cannot reach them. But their mothers, sisters, mistresses, and maiden aunts, who read in the papers that the coroner's inquest has returned a verdict of "wilful murder against John Smith, Charles Jones, and William Brown," are in despair. The horrible visions of black caps, chains, and gibbets, flit before their eyes; and, in short, whole families are thrown into unaffected and very severe affliction. In the midst of all this suffering the assizes approach, and the accused surrender themselves for trial. The "unfortunate gentlemen" (to use the phraseology of the newspapers) appear at the bar, "dressed in genteel mourning and deeply affected with their awful situation." The counsel for the crown details the case, lays down the law, "under the authority of his lordship," and then concludes by telling the jury, that "if the facts are as he has stated them, he cannot see how they will avoid pronouncing the verdict of guilty:" but he fervently hopes that something may arise to relieve them from so painful a duty." In the examination of the evidence every body is aware, that the judge, the counsel on both sides, and the witnesses, are straining all their ingenuity to prevent a verdict against the prisoners; and every body sympathizes with their endeavours. His lordship, in his charge to the jury, explains to them again, that every man killed in a duel is murdered, but he at the same time shows that there are some technical defects in the evidence, which he places before them in a strong light. The jury "turn round for a few minutes," and find a verdict of "not guilty." Upon this there is considerable applause manifested among the auditory, "which meets with the marked reprehension of his lordship," who threatens to commit the offenders. The court is now cleared: all the world is pleased to find that poor Smith is acquitted, agrees that duels are horrid things, and hopes that, as they become so common, the judge will direct the very next men who fight one to be hanged.

HUMOROUS ACCOUNT OF A COMMON FIDDLER.

A poor fiddler is a man and fiddle out of case, and he in worse case than his fiddle. One that rubs two sticks together, (as the Indians strike fire) and rubs a poor living out of it; partly from this, and partly from your charity, which is more in the hearing than giving him, for he sells nothing dearer than to be gone. He is just so many strings above a beggar, though he have but two, and yet he begs too, only not in the downright for God's sake, but with a shuffling God bless you, and his face is more pin'd than the blind man's. Hunger is the greatest pain he takes, except a broken head sometimes, and the labouring John Dory. Otherwise his life is so many fits of mirth, and 'tis sometimes mirth to see him. A good feast shall draw him five miles by the nose, and you shall track him again by the scent. His other pilgrimages are fairs and good houses, where his devotion is great to the Christmas, and no man loves good times better. He is in league with the tapsters for the worshipful of the Inn, whom he torments next morning with his art, and has their names more perfect than their men. A new song is better to them than a new jacket, especially if indelicate, which he calls merry, and hates naturally the puritan, as an enemy to his mirth. A country wedding and Whitsun ale are the two main places he domineers in, where he goes for a musician, and overlooks the bag-pipe. The rest of him is drunk and in the stocks.

VARIETIES.

DR. BAILLIE.

The late lamented Dr. Baillie was allowed to be the most attentive man to his patients in the profession. Nothing annoyed the doctor so much as to be sent for to attend trifles or fancied illnesses. Upon one occasion, about two or three years since, he was called very late one evening to attend Lady H——, he immediately repaired to the house, was admitted, and found the lady in apparent good health. The doctor, however, prescribed a gentle opiate, evidently endeavouring to conceal his chagrin; he then made his retreat. He had scarcely reached the bottom of the stairs when Miss H—— called from above, 'Dr. Baillie, pray, may mamma eat oysters for supper?' 'Oh, dear, yes, miss,' was the reply, 'shells and all if she pleases!'

PATRICK HENRY.

The celebrated patriot and orator, Patrick Henry, who had so large a share in the independence of the United States, left the following testimony in favour of the Christian religion in his will:

'I have now disposed of all my property to my family; there is one thing more I wish I could give them, and that is the Christian Religion. If they had that, and I had not given them one shilling, they would be rich; and if they had not that, and I had given them all the world, they would be poor.'

ELEGANT COMPLAINT.

The veneration in which Lady Hamilton held the immortal Nelson is well known; and when his coxswain landed her ladyship at Palermo, she turned to him and said, "now my good fellow," presenting him at the same time with a moidore, "what will you have to drink?" "Nothing your ladyship," said the gallant Tar, "I am not thirsty." "Oh but Lord Nelson's coxswain," said she, "must have something, therefore say, will you have a dram, a cup of wine, or a glass of punch?" "Well," said Jack, "if I must drink, I will take the dram now, and I will be drinking the cup of wine, while your ladyship is mixing the glass of punch for me!!"

ANECDOTE OF THE LATE GENERAL BLIGH.

When Mr. Bligh was Captain in a marching Regiment, as he and his lady were travelling in Yorkshire they put up at an inn, where there happened to be only just as much in the larder as would serve them for dinner, which was immediately ordered:—in the mean time some sporting gentlemen of the country, coming in, and finding there was nothing in the house but what was getting ready for another company, asked who they were? The landlord told them he did not directly know, but he believed the gentleman was an Irish officer. "Oh, d—n him, if he is Irish (says one of the company,) a potatoes will serve him. Here, waiter, take this watch, (pulling out an elegant gold watch,) carry it up stairs and ask the gentleman what's o'clock: the waiter at first remonstrated, but the company insisting on his delivering the message, he was obliged to comply. Mr. Bligh, as may well be imagined, was surprised at such an impudent message, but recollecting himself a moment, took the watch from the waiter, and sent word to the company, that he would tell them before he departed,—this message however produced his dinner, being sent up to him in quiet; which after he had eaten, he claps a couple of large horse pistols under his arm, and going down stairs, introduced himself into the company who had sent up such a message, by telling them he was come to tell them what a clock it was; but first he begged to be informed, to which of the company the watch belonged? Here a dead silence ensued: Mr. Bligh then began to his right hand and asked them severally the question, each of whom denied knowing any thing of the circumstance. "Oh, then gentlemen (says he) I find I have mistaken the company, the waiter awhile ago brought me an impudent message from people in this house, which I am come (as you see, pointing to his pistols) properly to resent, but I find I have mistaken the room." Saying this he wished them a good evening, which they as politely returned, paid his bill, stepped into his carriage, and drove off with the watch in his pocket, which he kept to his death, and has left it by will lately, with a large fortune to his brother, the present Dean of Elphin.

ANECDOTE OF THOMAS GUY.

One winter evening, as Guy (the founder of the celebrated hospital bearing his name) was meditating over a handful of half-lighted embers, confined within the narrow precincts of a brick stove, and without any candle, a person who came to inquire for him was introduced, and, after the first compliments, were passed, and the guest requested to take a seat. Mr. Guy lighted a farthing candle which lay on the table by him, and desired to know the purport of the gentleman's visit. The visitor was the famous Vulture Hopkins, "that you, sir, are better versed in the prudent and necessary art of saving than any man now living, and I therefore wait upon you for a lesson of frugality, an art in which I used to think I excelled; but I am told by all who know you that you are greatly my superior." "And is that all you are come about?" said Guy. "Why, then, we can talk this matter over in the dark." So saying, he with the greatest deliberation extinguished his new-lighted farthing candle! Struck with this instance of economy, Hopkins acknowledged himself convinced of Guy's superior thrift, and took his leave.

CRITICISM.

When Lamothe's Fable appeared, it was the fashion not to allow them any merit. Impatient at the chorus of censure in which persons who had not even read the book joined, a witty rogue played some of these last a treacherous trick. "Do you know," said he, "that charming Fable of Fontaine's, which one of his heirs found among some old family papers?" The reply was in the negative. He then pretended to read it. The exclamations were prodigious. "How charming! That's the true fabulist. What genius!" &c. &c. After having allowed this concert of praises to be played out, "Gentlemen," said the droll, "I am sorry for your taste. The fable which I have just recited to you is one of the collection published by this poor Lamothe, who without being a genius, is not altogether a block-head."

The counterpart of this little adventure took place a few days ago in a party in which new poetical productions were undergoing discussion. Provoked at seeing some literary fanatics ranking the author of the "Meditations," above all other authors living or dead of the nineteenth century, a lady who was present maliciously meditated a little innocent trap for them. "But do you really believe," said she, "that Chénier, for instance, has not written as good verses as M. de Lam—" Every body exclaimed against such a supposition. The debate grew more animated. The lady took down a volume from the book-case. "Listen," cried she, "to some stanzas of an ode by the author of Fenelon." They listened with impatience, and soon interrupted her; "What an involved style! What a clatter of pompous words! How far all that is from ——" "Not so far, gentlemen," replied the lady, "I perceive that I have committed an error, and that is a passage from the 'Meditations' that I have been reading to you."

HOG IN ARMOUR.

The expression "hog in armour" seems to have arisen from that animal, or parts of it, having been thus distinguished in the 16th century, when served up to the table. Thus, in the best of dishes for the dinner at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth, we find, amongst others, "sheelde of browne in armour."

MASQUERADERS IN REAL LIFE.

It was a well-remembered anecdote, at the late court of France, that at a ball and masquerade given to the nobles, much attention was excited by the following laughable circumstance. During the festive scene a tall figure, in a yellow domino, was seen to approach one of the sideboards, where the choicest viands were laid out, and to eat of every delicacy in a most voracious manner. He then retired, but again returned to the attack, and in the course of the evening contrived to commit great havoc and destruction among the good things on the different tables. The quantity of wine he drank, was also a matter of astonishment to the attendants, who called the attention of the company to this phenomenon. The yellow domino, without noticing their observations, proceeded to gratify himself with delicacies in all directions, when he was more narrowly watched, and seen to retire, pass into the centre of the Swiss Guard, and then return again in a few minutes. Determined to know whether he was man or devil, one of the company seized him and insisted upon his unmasking, when lo! it appeared that the yellow domino, during the course of the evening, had served as a passport to half of the Swiss Guard, to enjoy the good things so plentifully spread before them, but which their dress and their duty had alike precluded them from partaking of.

NEW COINAGE.

The double sovereigns have been issued: but the number cast is so limited, that there is no chance of any being in general circulation, as each banker is only allowed 25, and the Bank of England clerks one.—The coin nearly resembles the single sovereigns, only upon a larger scale, and with the addition on the rim of Anno Regni IV. Decus et Tutamen: on the exergue is the year of coinage, 1823.

APPARITION OF A HUMAN HEAD.

The public mind has been as much engaged on the subject of this supernatural appearance, as on that of the late horrid murder; and to those of our readers who have not an opportunity of perusing the passing transactions of the times, we shall give it in substance. We do so with some hesitation, however—all nerves are not the same, but they ever so relaxed, it betrays an unpardonable want of confidence in that Supreme Being, who for inscrutable purposes suffers these awful monitors to present themselves to human eyes, to admit of fear. We have treated the matter thus seriously because there appears to be no doubt of its truth, from the high quarter from which it has originated, and the consequences which have ensued.

It appears that H— castle, the residence of the Earl of H—, a nobleman high in his Majesty's government, and remarkable for his strength of mind, has formerly been subject to similar visitations. A few weeks back, as Lady Georgina, his daughter, was passing through her apartment, she saw the air-drawn figure of a human head detached, from the trunk, gliding before her. After the first apprehensions of doubt had failed, she fell into strong hysterics, and remained so the whole night. No one could devise the cause. In the morning, as the noble Earl left his chamber, the figure appeared before him—preceded him down to his study, where he was about to write, and situated itself on the table opposite to him. With a firmness peculiar to his lordship, he took up his pen, after gazing at it a few seconds, and commenced his business; and on raising his eyes, it had vanished. On his lordship mentioning the circumstance, it appears Lady Georgina communicated the hidden cause of her alarm, and this united proof that they had laboured under no optical illusion, with some other circumstances comprehending the tradition of a decapitated ancestor, resolved the noble lord instantly to leave and shut up the castle, which he has done. We have connected the subject from the various reports stated of it, and it appears to be a prominent topic in the higher circles.

REMINISCENCES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In my last I gave you a specimen of original Pulpit Oratory; it was not founded on any opinion I had of its eloquence, though it is not devoid of that qualification, but full of that purity of heart most acceptable to him who made it. I now give you a few more, but from very opposite characters; the first, are from a high bred, but truly orthodox, Oxonian—he was urging with no little eloquence, the folly of men endeavouring to represent the Image of the ALMIGHTY which, however well intended, not only proved futile, but frequently ridiculous, and he brought his subject to a conclusion with what, in my humble conception, was a master piece of reasoning.

"What would be thought of that Artist who endeavoured by his pencil to pourtray the form of a sound, or what colours would he use to represent that of an echo?—how much more ridiculous then is it to attempt a figure of the Almighty."!!!

The same eloquent gentleman, when engaged to plead the cause of a charity, the establishment of which is calculated to relieve the most afflictive of all human sorrows, insanity excepted, that of blindness, had exhausted every ingenuity of heart and learning, and when his auditors had already drawn largely from their local exchequer, and had deposited the same in their gloves, or held their bounty secreted in a corner of their pockets, he closed his book—and after a moment's pause said—but in a strain of voice which acted upon every nerve, and that by an extemporaneous effusion,—"And if my humble efforts in behalf of this interesting charity should induce you to outstrip the bounds your charity had prescribed—(then with much pathos) believe me, you will never have occasion to blush at the sacrifice."

This, Sir, was, in the modern phraseology of the day, "a settler"—it came at a moment when every feeling was wound up to its highest pitch, and the individuals of a congregation, the most respectable, perhaps, of any in the country, had to smile at each other from the involuntary impulse with which the calculating hand was thrust again into the pocket, not to speak of those who providing only according to their wishes, had to draw upon their neighbours. There is a something lovely—nay pleasing, even in this reflection when dignity can forget in the House of God the character it assumes out of doors, whose temper is won over by the power of his Messenger, and when every other feeling becomes subservient to duty.

I have said by the power of a Minister, for many there are, whose heartless delivery of a tenfold eloquent appeal would have past unheeded and unnoticed, for to say with Hudibras

"What is a Sermon good or bad
If it's delivered like a Lad?"

The other, was that eccentric but amiable character, the Reverend —, of whose deviations "from the sublime to the ridiculous" I had heard so much—in this, said the departed disturber of the world, Napoleon, "there is but one step"—and I found it so. His Sermon throughout three parts, was marked not only with good sense but eloquence, and I had begun to entertain a suspicion that good nature, that universal, but invariable and undeserved stepping stone to calumny or ridicule, had spoken amiss of him, when on a sudden he made a pause of an almost unpardonable length—the interval was occupied in wiping his face, and casting a reverential and commanding look round his sanctuary—he recommenced—

"I was recently riding by a garden, the beauties of which attracted me, a bull passing at that instant pursued by some followers, broke down its fence, and every flower of nature vanished beneath the tread of its merciless hoof—it struck me, and the analogy is strong, that virtue might be compared to a choice garden, which although defended by prudence, savage and brutal violence will accomplish the devastation of, when all the unkindly blasts, or unseasonable storms of the year should have failed to have effected this object."

This discourse, delivered in Blackfriars' Road, related to an Execution which took place on the previous Monday—the relevance to which was singular, but its effect great.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Mr. Wight, Bow Street reporter to the Morning Herald, in the press a selection of 180 of the most humorous and entertaining of the Reports which have appeared in the Morning Herald in the last three years, illustrated by G. Cruikshank.

Among other new works announced are Moore's Life of Sheridan, Boaden's Life of Kemble, and Haslewood's Life of Rason, the Antiquary.

Mr. John Curtis has in the Press the first Number of his "Illustrations of English Insects," with highly finished figures of such species of Insects (with the Plants upon which they are found) as constitute the British genera, and descriptive letter-press to each Plate, giving as far as possible the habits and economy of the subjects selected.

Washington Irving, who has been on the Continent for some time, is said to be nearly prepared for showing to the public that he has not been idle. He remained some time at Versailles, and made a tour through Germany, where he has composed an ample sketch book.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are much obliged to Pyrophilus for his ingenious and scientific communication.—Nothing but the great labour and expense which we should incur by inserting it in its present form could induce us to decline giving it a place in the Iris.—We should be glad to receive at any time a scientific paper from our correspondent, if he can contrive to dispense with the introduction of tables.

We are not unused to unpaid letters, but really when a man writes to unfranked Newspapers it is too bad.—we are at any time within 1s. 2d., but we chose to relinquish the gratification rather than pay the cost.—Major Don's publication is called to this.

Nimrod is evidently a young man aspiring to that distinction in literature, to which we should be happy to let him arrive;—we have not rejected his labours from any disrespect, but discrepancies have rendered its insertion impossible.—The application, however, is good.

I. P. W.'s verse is pretty, but we cannot reconcile the hyperbolic passion which seems to have taken possession of him in the absence of his fair, and thus expressed, the two opposite imprecations may be feeling, but they are not reasonable:

"Flow, flow from my eyes ye pearly tears."
"Cease, cease ye floods to bedim my eyes."

Floods generally deluge, not dime, and there is an analogy in "Blow, blow ye whispering breezes!"

We assure our friend Peter that it is with no little regret we relinquish the insertion of his former witty production;—we cannot, in any shape, divest ourselves of the fear (which is a great latitude to religious parody might produce) of a tendency in weak minds, to avail themselves of worse publications.

T. is reserved for future appropriation.—Peter's Poetical Hymen, in our next.

The length of the original Poem in our second page, has operated to the exclusion of a number of other articles we have received this week.

Those subscribers who intend binding the present volume of the Iris, and whose sets are incomplete, are requested to make early application for the deficiency, as several of the numbers are nearly sold out.

A WEEK IN LONDON.

The Custom House was our next visit from the Tower; a building of such vast extent as to render description incredible.—This noble and national fabric was erected in place of the one destroyed by fire, and it almost obliterated the remembrance of those important losses in the estimate of its present splendour. For the interior I shall confine myself to the long room, the extent of which I can only describe by the extreme taper which one end displays when viewed from the other.

There are several massy pillars which serve alike for use and ornament, but so ingeniously constructed that they disguise their real purpose, that of warming this vast room; I am not practised enough in the principles of Sir Humphrey Davy to explain the construction, but it is worthy the attention of the traveller. Business is carried on here with much celerity, and without that personal labour required at the other maritime ports I have visited; and with a trifling expense vessels are entered, and cleared out, whilst their owners are occupied on other matters. We embarked at London Bridge Stairs, for Greenwich, with a number of other strangers, and this little voyage will suffice to urtail, and yet exemplify, the notice which I had intended to have taken of the East and West India Docks,—it is curious to observe the etiquette established amongst the boatmen at the different stairs, who dressed in a peculiar way, and with a badge upon their arms, have sort of club or united fraternity, for the purposes of general regulation, which though upheld by no Charter, is so praise-worthy in itself as to have commanded the reverence of every part of justice within the limits of their appeal,—that is—whoever offers to dispute the preference a passenger has given to the hand held (the indication to an approaching customer his willingness to serve you), or utters a catch of SLANDER against his fellow, is scouted from the water, and denied the privileges of their establishment!—Methinks this is worthy of imitation. Their boats, or rather canoes, are well adapted to the tide they are destined to float on—they are beautifully built, and many of them elegantly carved and gilded; in stepping on one of these I had nearly upset it with its keel, and said to him when recovered of his tilt, "My good fellow, this boat would not be long upon our river" (the Mersey). "Pray, what river is that?" said he. "Why," replied I, "Wigan! did you never hear of it?" "Can't say I ever did, Sir," he answered;—my fellow, how should he? when there are thousands in "that overgrown place" who have never seen a field of corn in their lives, and know not the material of which the very bread they eat is composed—I know numerous instances of this fact in Spital-fields. Our several boats were pulled swiftly along, and we passed on the bosom of old Father Thames in rapturous admiration of the views which unfolded themselves; the exterior of the Custom House here reflects itself in splendid majesty—the part facing the river, of stone, does high credit to the architect, and there is, on the centre column, a representation of the four quarters of the globe, with emblematical devices, choicely executed. We passed through numerous vessels till we arrived at one which bore on its flag "The Church for Seamen"—this was a novelty, but an agreeable one; we understood it was well frequented, and had lately been ornamented with an Organ. Some distance further we were attracted by the appearance of an elegantly gilt vessel, which the sun contributed to render more superb—it was the Royal Sovereign Yacht, waiting to convey one of the Russian Princes—our boatman informed us the admission to it was easy, and we left the rest of our little squadron to proceed to their destination for an inspection of this royal vessel; on our nearer approach we found her hull to be exquisitely carved and gilt; the bow supported the head of his Majesty, surmounted by the Imperial Crown on a cushion, the stem held the royal arms over the cabin windows—arrived at the steps, we were admitted with only a formal challenge, and the deck represented as excellent a specimen of cleanliness as I ever saw, bass matting was laid round for the visitors to walk on; she is about the size of a sloop of war, has three masts, with rigging which a lady who has spent her life in silk work might look upon with pleasure, so beautifully neat is its workmanship—she mounts 18 brass guns: we proceeded below, and were beginning to express our admiration, when we were suddenly stopped by an assurance that these were only the apartments of the inferior officers—they were panelled with polished mahogany, tastefully hung with scarlet moreen curtains, and elegantly furnished; we were led through a little lobby, at the termination of which was a door covered with red cloth, and edged with deep gold leather, on opening which we passed another of the same description which led us to his Majesty's state cabin, it was indeed worthy of so great a monarch, and filled us with admiration; a rich Turkey carpet (then protected by green baize) covered the floor; each side was panelled with thick looking glass, divided into compartments by various and richly gilt devices; over the mantle piece were the royal arms; even the mast, which necessarily comes through this part of the vessel, was made tributary to grandeur, by being made a splendid pillar with a rich corinthian capital; elegant lustres for lights were tastefully interspersed, and from the centre, one of as beautiful as well as ingenious description, suspended from a triton's head, so constructed that whatever roll the vessel may make in a heavy sea, the light continues in the same position; the tables are also of curious contrivance, being compressed for the convenience of four, or extended for the entertainment of twenty, in a minute's time. Passing through a lobby parallel to the other, we entered his Majesty's bed-chamber—it is small, but very elegant; the bed resembles a couch, and the drapery (grey moreen richly lined and bordered) is tastefully hung, and terminates, near the head, like a tent, surmounted by the imperial crown—there was a rich coverlid over the bed, and a velvet cushion bordered with gold, and on which was another ornamental crown, supplied the place of a pillow, in the absence of its illustrious possessor.

We left this beautiful specimen of naval art, and proceeded on our voyage to Greenwich, and forthwith to its celebrated building. It forms a large oblong square with right angles, having two elegant turrets at each extreme; there is a delightful area in front, and the vessels passing in constant review have a most enchanting effect. From hence as far as the eye could extend, the Docks present vast forests of masts, and the bosom of the Thames is studded with vessels from all parts of the known world—it is impossible to form a picture equal to the grandeur of this scene, which must be witnessed before it can be believed. I viewed the picture, I must own, with a swelling heart—but it was of pride; the tide was just turning to ebb, and numerous vessels, some of war, were gliding down to leave this, or it might be, depart for their own country,—the day was lovely, the sea calm—and some verses which I knew then, but which some prose I have known since has made me forget, I repeated—however I patch them, for Thames was Still as the undisturbed Lake—

The beauteous vessels onward glide
"Gently—as if they feared to wake
The slumber of the silent tide."

Could the frost of apathy withstand such a scene, and not dissolve in emotion? Yes it can—and, Mr. Editor, pardon a momentary digression, (parvis componere magnis) I think it will plead its own apology. I travelled from Liverpool one summer's afternoon to go into Merionethshire on a pedestrian journey of pleasure, with three others, one of whom had never been in Wales before,—we secretly conjured up by what means to awake his surprise at the beautiful scenery which this Eden of England possesses—the vale of Clwyd was but three miles out of our way, and we gladly put up with the inconvenience for the gratification of him seeing, in panorama, what we had previously travelled through; we knocked up a harper at a Welsh tavern, regaled ourselves, and proceeded—it was day break as we ascended the mountains which bound this lovely vale, and as we should be too soon before sunrise to have the effect we wished, we proposed a nap on the dry ground which skirts the ascent to the mountains; we lay till the sunbeams tinged their brown tops, and awoke our dormant traveller; we soon arrived at the summit which commands the view of a vale, which in a few words I will describe,—it is about eighteen miles long by seven to nine broad, varying—contrasted with the mountains on each side it is a cultivated garden, and studded with castles, towns, and villages, the silver Clwyd running through the centre,—the sea terminates the prospect;—I thought of Moses viewing the Land of Promise. I cast my eyes upon the countenance of our traveller, expecting a delirium of joy,—finding a total vacancy, "is not this Heaven?" said I. "Ye—eh! see that rabbit!" and taking up a stone to throw after it, burst into a laugh of inanition;—I looked at my other companions, who chuckled their heads, and proceeded on, muttering internally a long Chinese malediction.

It has been said of the late Lord Thurlow, that he had features of iron and nerves of steel,—what must this being's have been composed of? but it is worthy of remark, and fourteen years of experience have proved it, that he has been insensibly cruel and depraved in the nearest and dearest ties of consanguinity and friendship. The remembrance of that journey, and the tranquillity of my mind at that moment will never be effaced, for as you said in the Iris, "the days of my youth are—a sigh," so I just now draw an aspiration the precise length of that tour—but to return.

Greenwich Hospital was formerly intended for a Royal Palace, but converted to the noble purpose of providing for England's naval defenders—the Painted Hall has been acknowledged to be superior to any thing of the kind in the world, nobody can divest himself of the idea but that the pilasters round the walls are real—after the strictest scrutiny with the eye the touch is even unsatisfactory, the fluted part is so inimitably executed. The ceiling, which in the ornamental devices is in itself rich, is one grand mass of picturesque magnificence. Nelson's funeral car stands at the extreme end, is separated by a richly gilt railing of iron defended by spikes; as I had seen this before I took advantage of the guide being elsewhere occupied, and determining to say I had been in it made a hasty effort to get over, and met with an accident which had nearly put an end to my descriptive tour—my boot catching a spike, I was precipitated with violence on my face against the flags,—stunned for the moment, I got into the car, and had the good fortune to return unobserved, leaving behind me and carrying with me a bleeding testimony of my indiscretion and loyalty; I mention this as a warning to others, as the punishment for this transgression is very heavy. The car is very beautiful, covered with black silk velvet, and the pictures in the shops are an exact representation. Hence to the Chapel, which is allowed to be a master-piece of art in its construction; it would be impossible, where all is excellence, to select any particular object—one, however, should not be passed over, the Altar-piece; the subject is the escape of St. Paul from shipwreck on the Island of Melita (Malta), executed, I believe, by West. After viewing the mess rooms, dormitories, and various curiosities, we proceeded to a tavern, frequented by these interesting veterans, to refresh, and a greater or more affecting sight could not be produced.—There sat, over their heavy vet, a score of Jack Tars "fighting their battles over again," and it was impossible not to sympathize in their narratives, for they gloried in their misfortunes.

We left here on foot for Deptford to see the Nelson of 120 guns, on the stocks, and nearly finished, and had a proud gratification of inspecting this immense vessel, the largest in the navy. We took boat again, and the tide carried us rapidly to London Bridge, where landing, we proceeded forthwith to the monument. This celebrated and beautiful column, built to commemorate the Fire of London, is said to surpass Trajan's Pillar at Rome,—it is fluted, with a gallery and urn at the top, and forms a prominent figure amongst the wonders of the metropolis; we mounted by an inside circular staircase, and had a superior view of London than from St. Paul's; the base bears an inscription attributing the fire to the Papists, but Pope indignantly rebuts this in the lines—

"Where London's Column, pointing to the skies,
Like a tall bully lifts its head and lies."

Sadler's Wells closed the evening, a place which should always be visited by strangers; it is singular as having the New River running under the stage, which is moveable, and the performances generally terminate with an aquatic scene, full of ingenious performances.

THE SCHOOLMASTER.

Traveller, thou know'st where Winwick's temple stands,

And proudly lifts its spire top in air;
The lofty site a prospect wide commands,
And its gilt honours glitter from afar.

Pleas'd with the sweet seclusion of the place,
In days of yore, as mouldering records tell,*
Those rural haunts a monarch lov'd to trace,
And there apart from grandeur, deign'd to dwell.

Fast by its walls, beneath a yew-tree's shade,
Where a low stone its humble head appears,
He lies, whose nod my timid youth obey'd,
Who for the Muses form'd my earliest years.

Firm fix'd upon a rock's projecting brow,
The Village Schoolbo' defied the shock of time;
Fancy depicts its cherish'd image now,
Delighted to retrace the scenes of prime.

There, while the tardy hours their circles ran,
Impatient childhood sate, compell'd to pore
On ling'ring tasks that with the dawn began,
And cou'd the ungrateful lesson o'er and o'er.

Hard fate, when scarcely from the sullied page
The curious eye a moment dar'd to stray;
Nor from the oaken bench, embrown'd with age,
The nimble foot might prove its light essay:

When on the silence scarce a whisper broke,
A kindred thought of pleasure to exulte;
Nor, unrestrain'd by Terror, Fancy spoke,
The fond idea of appall'd delight!

Save that the unpleasing hum of sad constraint
With sameness echoed through the mansion drear;
And ever and anon, the piteous plaint
Of smarting dullness smote the list'ning ear.

For ah! a wight he was whose very frown,
With timid awe each wayward thought repress;
And when he spoke, the authoritative tone
Awoke to terror each discordant breast.

Exalted high upon imperial chair,
He rul'd the assembly with despotic sway;
His scanty praise 'twas glory's self to share,
His wrathful accents widely spread dismay.

'Twas thence his glance each lurking corner try'd,
Suspicion's self sate brooding in his eye;
Where might the self-convicted traitor hide!
How frame, to meet his ear the fraudulent lie!

In vain the stammering accent would conceal
The hurried task, by negligence prepared;
Nor suppliant looks, nor artful tears avail,
Vindictive stripes from sluggard backs to ward.

With stern, convulsive grasp his forceful hand
The culprit seiz'd, while cries his terror spoke:
Nor idly fell the unrelenting wand,
As shrinking instinct wri'd to shun the stroke.

* Alluding to the legend yet to be seen upon the walls of the church: "Hic locus Onocleae quondam placuit tibi valde Northumbriorum eras Rex nuncque Polorum regna tenes, &c."

† Newton in Mackerfield.

What anguish keen from young sensation flows,
Full well my youthful feelings could attest;
But short-lived is the grief that Nature knows,
Whose life's young tide invigorates the breast.

Hail! happy days! when sorrow soonest fades,
In swift forgetfulness a kind relief;
When quick transition soothes the vacant mind,
And liveliest joy succeeds to keenest grief!

Ah! could my ripen'd fancy still efface
From memory's brazen page each mournful scene;
With lighter hand the lines of pleasure trace,
Nor dwell on tales of woe that intervene!

Full oft again she'd join the sportive throng,
Hunt the gay mead, the fragrant breeze inhale,
Explore the mossy nest, the brakes among,
Or in the race outstrip the flying gale!

Again, with youthful eagerness, partake
The buxom joys that innocence bestows,
With morning suns to dreams of pleasure vaiz,
And sink with eve to undisturbed repose.

DANDYMANIA.

(Abridged from the New Monthly Magazine.)

The transformation of the chrysalis into the butterfly is not more complete or surprising than that of the slovenly schoolboy into the finished civil, academic, or military dandy.

Dandyism, at first, is like the small speck in the cloudless azure, which to the eye of the experienced mariner presages the gathering storm. In its birth it is scarcely noticed by common observers, or noticed only to be despised.

The late Hugh Peters was a striking instance of how far the genuine dandymania could carry a man, who in other respects was not destitute of natural good sense. In Hugh, indeed, the disease appeared to be constitutional; he exhibited evident symptoms of it at a very early age, and it continued with increasing violence to his dying day. This master-passion was not to be controlled by sickness, poverty, imprisonment, or exile. It burned with as much fervour in age as in youth, and was scarcely extinguished by that universal damper—death.

Hugh, as I have said, began dandyism at an early age. His parents were of a strict religious sect, and of course reprobated all vain ornament of the outward man; they were careful that Hugh should be arrayed with the plainness, in clothes of the coarsest texture, and the most ungainly fashion. The style of his habiliments was singularly ludicrous, and afforded infinite diversion to his young companions. Instead of being dressed in the fashion of boys of his own age and rank, he was attired like an old man. He usually wore a blue coat with covered buttons, which fitted him like a sentry-box; his waistcoat was of a sober brown with pocket-flaps "five fathom deep," overhanging a pair of scanty corduroy inexpressibles, scarce covering the cap of his knee. Old yarn stockings, shoes, or rather brogues, ten inches in the sole, and a broad-brimmed hat completed the exterior of the elegant Hugh Peters.

The system pursued by his parents produced an effect diametrically opposite to their intention. It turned the boy's regard to the subject of dress, and generated and fostered the desire of decoration. He ventured, as he grew older, though with a trembling hand, to make some slight reform in his costume. He disfranchised his enormous coat-flaps, and succeeded in concealing a few sinecure pockets. This he aged by cultivating a good understanding with his tailor.

Entertaining a high opinion of the symmetry of his person, he longed to reveal its graceful proportions in the seductive transparencies of stocking-web. His uncle, who was something of a dandy, gave him an opportunity of gratifying this penchant by the present of a pair of cast-off tights. These, though somewhat large, Hugh contrived, by his sartorial extensity, to adapt tolerably well to his own person. But on trying them on, though highly gratified by the contemplation of the femur andibia, he found that something was still wanting to the perfection of their development. Our desires increase with our possessions, and every new gratification gives birth to a fresh necessity. Hugh soon discovered that tight pantaloons without Hessian boots were as preposterous as a haunch of venison without currant-jelly, or a leg of pork without peas-pudding. But how to effect the desired union? Boots were dear, Hugh was poor; his uncle had no Hessians to spare, and his father's heart and purse were equally closed against him. He must either rear the pantaloons without boots (a thing not to be thought of) or steal a pair. Dire dilemma! diabolical alternative! But the genius of landyism descended kindly to his aid, and opportunely rescued her ardent votary from the hazard of crime and the mortification of disappointment. As Hugh cast around

"His baleful eyes,
That witness'd huge affliction and dismay,"

he suddenly espied his buff-leather gaiters, which hung upon a peg above his head. An idea flashed across his brain like lightning—one of those felicitous conceptions of genius, perfect as if matured by years of thought, sudden as inspiration! He seized the gaiters, posted to a cobbler, had them cut out into the shape of Hessian boots at top, blackened, polished, laced with tassels. What need of more words? Nothing could be more complete. The following day was Sunday. He appeared at church in complete costume,—cocked chapeau, pudding-cravat, red waistcoat, fireman's jacket, brown-coloured tights, and gaiter-boots,—the limitation of himself—the derision of many—the astonishment of all!

But the hour was at hand when Hugh was to at his slough, to unfold his glittering scales the sunbeam, to burst the dark prison of his myslis for ever, and issue forth an airy butterfly in all the colours of the rainbow. His ther undertook a voyage to Smyrna. The face of air raised a storm, and plunged the aricious merchant in the deep. Hugh was the heir of all his wealth, which was considerable, and as the trustees of the property did pretend to any control over his conduct, the hopeful youth was left at the age of seven-

"Lord of himself, that heritage of woe."

His first step was to enter the army, a measure of which he would not have dared to whisper during the lifetime of his father. He got on a dashing regiment of light-infantry, and became distinguished for the most extravagant foppery. Not contented with the costume of his corps, which was elegant and splendid, he was perpetually making such alterations and additions as his own whim suggested. His capricious taste in this way subjected him frequent reprimands and arrests for the violation of the regimental orders. His offences came at last so frequent and so flagrant, that the colonel, much of a martinet, told him that must leave the regiment unless he thought proper to conform to its regulations of dress. Hugh promised obedience, and for a while was less open in his transgressions. But his ruling passion was too strong to be controlled for any length of time. He went to a garrison-ball in a fantastic costume which bore a caricatured resemblance to the uniform of his corps. The first person he met there was the colonel, who insisted on his leaving the room immediately; and as colonels seldom experience much difficulty in the removal of an obnoxious subaltern, his exit from the regiment very speedily followed his exit from the ball. He was, in fact, advised to tender his resignation; and he had too much knowledge of the army not to feel the propriety of following this judicious counsel.

Hugh was not very seriously concerned for the loss of his commission, as it left him "fancy free" to pursue his devious courages through the fields of foppery and fashion. He repaired to London, and soon became the very mirror of fantastic coxcomby. He had his day like other dogs, and the time has been when the promenades of Bond-street and Hyde-park would have been deemed to want their most essential attraction in the absence of "the original Hugh Peters." But, alas for human eminence, and the degeneracy of present times! The "lights of the world and demi-gods of fame" have quitted the stage for ever, and the fashionable, like the political horizon, is left in a feeble twilight, the precursor, it is to be feared, of a long night of Egyptian darkness. Brummel is extinct, Van Butchell in his grave. Sir I—, like another Ovid in Pontus, is exiled to the ungenial climate of St. George's, where he pours his unavailing "tristia," and stoops indeed, but, alas, no more to conquer! Baron Geramb is gone, and the gallant gay "Lothario" is sobered down into "Benedict, the married man." We listen in vain for the rattling of his chariot-wheels, and the high-crested cock has now become an empty name. Finally, Hugh Peters himself hath passed away, and the flags of Bond-street have forgot his step!

Hugh was, at this time, more remarkable for the singularity than the taste of his costume. He delighted in glaring colours, and a close fit he considered the "summum bonum." His motions were dreadfully constrained by the tightness of his dress, and the various organic functions seriously impeded. To button his coat required an effort almost superhuman. His inexpressibles (horresco referens) were perpetually yielding to the force of pressure, and leaving him exposed in some vital part. The tarsus, metatarsus, and toes, sustained infinite damage from the compressive action of the boot, and the uncomfortable projection of a heel three inches high. His feet became pleasingly variegated with corns and bunions, and were soon reduced to a state of premature superannuation.

I shall not speedily forget the first time I had the honour of beholding Hugh Peters. He was in full dress for the pit of the Opera. His coat was of the genuine Pomona-green, with a collar reaching to the crown of his head, basket-worked buttons made of silver, and skirts lined with white silk. His waistcoat was white, richly embroidered, and studded with three rows of small yellow buttons. Inside this were two more, cushioned and quilted, the one of scarlet silk, the other of sky-blue. Canary-coloured small-clothes, with flesh-coloured silk-stockings, decorated his nether limbs; and a pump, which might emulate a vice, with a diamond buckle, showed his almost Chinese foot to exquisite advantage. His cravat, which at the least he took an hour to adjust, was fastened in the centre with a large emerald, and beneath it a waving banner of frill sported in the wanton zephyrs. A gold eye-glass with a red riband, white kid-gloves, and inordinate chapeau-bras—the portrait is finished.

Hitherto Hugh had given more attention to his person than his face; and, coxcomb as he was, he had still much to learn in the minutest details of dandyism. Critically nice in the cut and-fashion of his apparel, he was but a novice in the mysteries of the cosmetic art, his practice in this way scarcely extending beyond the more ordinary processes of ablution. He had, besides, certain prepossessions to overcome on this score. Notwithstanding the latitude of his foppery, he conceived that there was a fixed boundary beyond which it must not extend, and where manliness would say, "thus far shalt thou go and no farther." He would wear, for instance, a coat tight enough almost to check respiration, but would shudder at the thought of a pair of stays. He might employ an hour in brushing his hair, but he would turn with loathing from the idea of painting his face. But it is the character of every folly, and of every vice, to increase, unless the growth be timely and effectually prevented. The insipient gangrene must be met with the knife and the cautery. Hugh's attention was first directed to his visage by some one remarking that his eyebrows were rather light. There could be nothing unmanly in adding to the expression of the countenance, to which dark eyebrows so materially contributed. He began first by pencilling, next proceeded to painting, and lastly to staining his brows, with a variety of deleterious composts. He became the dupe of advertising impostors, and the most absurd distresses were the frequent result of his ill-judged experiments. In the course of a few months his brows had successively assumed all the colours of the rainbow, to the vast amusement of his friends, and his own ineffable inconvenience. He persevered, however, with a constancy worthy of a better cause, and at last hit upon a composition which produced the proper hue; but after a few applications utterly destroyed the hair, and left him literally browless! His only resource was a pair of artificial eyebrows, which formed, as may be supposed, but an imperfect deception, and an insecure substitute for the natural.

Hugh's next discovery was, that a smooth skin and clear complexion were essentials of beauty. His toilet was soon loaded with cold cream, milk of roses, botanic bloom, eau de Cologne, and soaps of all sonorous titles borrowed from the "rich orient," and of a variety of shades of colour and degrees of fragrance. His hands now came in for their share of attention, and he consumed immense quantities of almond paste and white wax. Not satisfied with topical applications for the purpose of improving his appearance, he used warm baths, had himself blooded and physicked regularly with the same view. He consumed three estates, which he inherited, in the expenses of the toilet. When destitute of money, he ran in debt to gratify his vanity; and for some years previous to his death he supported his elegant appearance by certain financial measures, to which, peradventure, a fastidious moralist might attach an impolite epithet. Confined in the Bench, he used to saunter about, in a rich robe de chambre, green velvet-cap, and red slippers, with an immense Turkish pipe in his mouth, from which he exhaled not "Mundungus' ill-perfuming scents," but green tea! He debilitated his frame by the use of medicine, and contracted complaints in his side and chest from continual pressure.

Dandyism is in youth only ridiculous; in age it is contemptible. We have attempted the portrait of Hugh in his early days. At fifty he was the most artificially constructed being in existence; he was made up from head to foot. He wore a wig, false eyebrows, false whiskers, and false mustachios. He had a complete set of false teeth, his cheeks and lips were painted, and the furrows beneath his eyes were filled up with a white paste. His clothes were stuffed out at the chest and shoulders, his waist was tightened in with stays, and he had false calves to his legs. He was altogether a walking deception—a complete lie from top to toe—a finished specimen of that most despicable of all animals—the superannuated dandy.

(Addressed to J— G—, of Manchester.)

Again, Apollo, at thy sacred fane
A humble vot'ry, I an offering give;—
Wild-flow'rs the pensile tenants of the plain;
Smile God of song! bid the frail blossoms live.

Ask't thou then J— G—, the efforts of my lyre,
Thy bosom's bitter anguish to dispel!—
Thou whose harmonious cadences would fire
The torch of gladness in the dreariest cell.

Ask't thou from me the magic aid,
From me the dulcet flow of song,
To woo the nymph in smiles array'd,
And draw around the sportive throng.

If—whom misfortune's hand hath crost,
Who've sorrow'd from my earliest years,
Who mourn the ties of kindred lost:—
Oh no:—my off'ring is my tears.

Hence avaunt, rebellions thought!
Let me love's soft task essay;
For him, who one neglected sought,
And cheer'd my lonely way.

All hail divine Euphrosyne,
Goddess of extatic mirth;
Come in all thy pleasing wiles
Voice which every care beguiles
Maiden of celestial birth,
Weave the roscate wreath for me:

Let the strain of the harp o'er the calm waters float,
While bright from the sapphire the blue stars are beaming;
And the shades of the Bards, as we list to each note
Mover by, as the spirits we view in our dreaming.

As those meteors of light,
The heralds of night,
Which awe and encharm the fix'd—wond'ring—gaze;
Yet serene as the moon,
In her own cloudless noon,

O'er the streamlets reflecting her silvery rays:
By Her, the fair damsel whose dimples can steal,
Woe from the heart and its torn feelings heal,
From thy brilliant fairy home,
Euphrosyne attended come!—
She with temper light and free,
Clad in robes of modesty,
Health's faint blushes grace her cheek,
Love's mild pow'r her dark eye's speak;
While the amorous zephyr nigh,
Steals the odour of her sigh,
Sighs that rise unknowingly,
Bear her redolent in charms,
To my friends enfolded arms,
As those arms the maid enclose,
The passing winds will take his woes!—

When his love is told,
On a cloud of gold,
Let thy nymphs chanant their melodies sweet;
With asphodel wreaths
Which ambrosia breaths
Strew the poet's enchanting retreat.

While as I view the orbs pale night,
Upon thy Jasper watch tow'r wave;
I'll think with unalloy'd delight,
Ere long their beams may find my grave:
Oh bliss to sleep,
While o'er me weep,
The gentle dews from yon high dome!—
No cares intrude,
Death's solitude,
Peace is the inmate of the tomb!—

EXTRACTS FROM LACON.

. The following articles are extracted, with some alterations, omissions, and additions, from the First Volume of Lacon, by the Rev. C. C. Colton, whose name has recently been brought before the public, in rather a mysterious way.—The style of Lacon is more diffuse than laconic; a fault, indeed, which seems to have increased in his Second Volume. But the propensity to write, like every other indulged inclination, not unfrequently 'grows with our growth, and strengthens with our strength.' In point of fact, in this 'Age of Writing,' a box of Ulysses is to be found in almost every town;—and

"Many write now who never wrote before;
And those who always wrote, now write the more."
S. X.

WIT HAPPILY APPLIED.

There is no quality of the mind that so instantaneously and irresistibly captivates, as Wit. An elegant writer has observed, that wit may do very well for a mistress, but that he should prefer reason for a wife. Whoever deserts reason, and gives himself up entirely to the guidance of wit, will certainly be exposed to many pitfalls and quagmires, like him who walks by flashes of lightning, rather than by the steady beams of the sun. The conquest, therefore, of wit over the mind, is not like that of the Romans over the body, which was regulated by policy, and perpetuated by prudence. The triumphs of wit may be compared to the inroads of the Parthians, splendid, indeed, but transient. Wit, however, is one of the few things which has been rewarded oftener than it has been accurately defined. A certain bishop said to his chaplain, one day, What is wit? The chaplain replied, the vicarage of Bowden is now vacant; give it to me, and that will be wit. Prove it, said his Lordship, and you shall have it. It would be a good thing well applied, rejoined the chaplain.—The dinner which was daily provided for the Royal Chaplains at Saint James's, was relieved from suspension by a fortunate and extemporaneous effusion of wit. King Charles had appointed a day for dining with his Chaplains, and it was understood that this step was adopted as a conciliating mode of putting an end to the dinners altogether. It was Dr. South's turn to say the grace; and whenever the King honoured his Chaplains with his presence, on that occasion, the prescribed formula ran thus: God save the King, and bless the dinner." Our witty divine took the liberty of transposing the words, by saying, "God bless the King, and save the dinner." "And it shall be saved," said the monarch.

A BOX TICKET.

In all societies it is advisable to associate as much as possible, with the highest; not that the highest are always the best; but, because if disappointed there, we can at any time descend; but if we begin with the lowest, it is almost impossible afterwards to ascend. In the grand theatre of human life, a box ticket takes us through the house.—The figure which Mr. Colton has here employed, is uncommonly good; but the advice he gives must be followed with some limitation. The Scripture says, we should take the lowest seat, and wait till some one says to us, "Friend, come up higher." Sterling merit will, sooner or later, generally meet with its due reward.

QUAINT COMPARISONS.

"That man alone," observes Mr. Colton, in one of his Reflections, "deserves to have any weight with posterity, who has shewn himself superior to the predominant errors of his own times; such a man," he continues, "like the peak of Teneriffe, has hailed the intellectual sun, before its beams have reached the horizon of common minds; standing like Socrates, on the apex of wisdom, he has removed from his eyes all film of earthly dross, and has foreseen a purer law, a nobler system, a brighter order of things; in short, a promised land, which like Moses on the top of Pisgah, he is permitted to survey, and anticipate for others, without being himself allowed either to enter or to enjoy."—Such a man, it seems, in Mr. Colton's quaint style of writing, is like the Peak of Teneriffe, he is like Socrates, he is, in fine, like Moses, on the top of Pisgah! We are also told, that the Peak of Teneriffe hails the intellectual sun, before its beams have reached the horizon of common minds; that's right,—first come, first served. Next, that Socrates stood on the apex of wisdom, wiping his eyes, in order that he might more clearly see a brighter system of things; in short, a promised land! And this very naturally brings the writer to Moses, who saw more than he was permitted to enjoy,—a very common event to men in general!

THE MISERY

OF RECEIVING TOO MANY PRESENTS IN ONE WEEK.

It is not well to be always lamenting and complaining on one's own account, therefore I shall this time trouble you with the complaints of a particular friend of mine, whose name is Plod, and who is a very worthy man in the main, but not fond of being put to what he considers unnecessary expense. The complaint was rather a singular one, and the subject matter of it such as most housekeepers would have esteemed fortunate rather than otherwise: it was neither more nor less than that of having had too many presents in one week.

I am in the habit of popping in at his house occasionally, without invitation, and taking pot-luck, which I did a little while back, upon my return from a short trip in the country, and was welcomed by old Plod with,—Ah! my dear Crockery, we are very glad to see you—lots of old victuals in the house—know you'll excuse it—always glad to see you, hot or cold; and as he finished in came the tray. I made an excellent meal on the remains of two or three sorts of game, and as many, or more, sorts of tarts, together with jellies, custards, and blancmets, evidently the reliques of a feast. When the table was cleared, the servant retired, and Mr. P—, too, had quitted the room, I could not help saying, 'Why, Plod, you have been living rarely of late seemingly.' 'Ah! Crockery, rarely indeed!' sighed old Plod, with a most woeful note of admiration; 'but come, fill your glass of toddy, and I will tell you all about it.' I did so; and having drawn my chair close to the fire, poor Plod began his lamentation as follows:—

'You are aware, Crockery, that, having but a small family, I generally lay in my stock of provisions for the week at one purchasing; well, last Saturday, this very day week, I had a good fair supply—a leg of mutton, a fillet of veal, and a piece of roasting beef;—one day hot, and one day cold, and hashed, that's my way you know, Crockery. Sunday we cooked the veal, and on Monday morning the first thing comes a porter with two brace of partridges, carriage 2s. portage 1s.—by the bye, some of my friends in the country have a scurry trick of not paying the carriage of their presents, and so it happened with the whole lot this week. He was scarcely gone before another fellow came banging at the door with a thumping brace—carriage 2s. portage 1s. again. "D—me," said Mrs. Plod, upon seeing this, "what is to become of all the meat?" What, indeed, thought I, the veal being the only thing cooked. 'Next day, Tuesday, came a lot of grouse—carriage, &c. 5s. for they came from among the mountains; and presently after arrived, from a friend who lives 50 miles off, and has a taste for horticulture and tame rabbits, an immense basket of beautiful vegetables certainly, and a parcel of doubie smuts, I think my friend called them rabbits in his letter, but they were poor peckish ninny things: this cost 6s. and was positively worth the money—I could have done better by half in the market. So Tuesday passed over and there was some veal left to mince on Wednesday. Mrs. Plod and I now began seriously to think what could be done with all this provision; we had no friends in town to whom we owed a present, and I have no notion of sending game to the poulterers by way of exchange. "We certainly must have a party!" suddenly exclaimed Mrs. P—. A party! thought I, and down sunk my heart; while I seemed to feel divers pounds, shillings, and pence evanishing from my lower pockets. "We certainly must have a dinner party, my love," repeated Mrs. P. in a still more explanatory tone. Now, Crockery, whenever a lady says my love to her husband, the thing, be what it may, is decided; and I saw plainly we must have a dinner. But we had not done with presents yet, for before we got down—or got up, which you please—on the Wednesday morning, a brace of pheasants arrived, costing 4s. likewise a goose, with two dozen apples for sauce, from my tenant the blacksmith, at B—, with a ticket for 2s. 6d. making a total for carriage and portage, in three days, of 11. 3s. 6d.—pretty well for the beginning of a feast; and be it remembered, that all these presents will cost me, to return them at Christmas, a barrel of oysters to each at least.

However, it was now quite certain that we must make a muster of friends and acquaintances to help us to eat all these good things, and Friday was fixed on as the day for devouring. To work Mrs. Plod and I went,—she to inspecting and preparing, and I to writing of pretty polite notes, on hot-pressed, wire-wove, gilt-edged, and all that sort of thing: lamenting the shortness of notice, &c. but hoping to have the pleasure to see, &c. &c. &c. It was soon discovered that plates, dishes, and glasses innumerable must be bought, to complete our sets of each. All this was done; a handsome dessert was provided; Mrs. Brown, our occasional cook, was sent for; and for two days, that is to say Wednesday and Thursday, we lived on gravy beef, and other odds and ends, in a most uncomfortable way.

At length the great, the eventful day arrived; and, will you believe it? after all the good things were at and on the fire—yea, even after the cloth was laid, note after note arrived, bearing excuses. Mr. and Mrs. Noakes could not come, Mr. and Mrs. Styles could not come, Mr. and Mrs. Doe, and Mr. and Mrs. Roe, were in the same predicament, and so it went on with the Whites, the Smiths, and the Jenkinsees: in short, Crockery, I expected twenty people, and only six came; we had not even you to cheer us with your accustomed songs; and the whole thing was, to me at least, stale, flat, and unprofitable; and I will ask you, before Mrs. Plod comes in again, whether it is not a miserable thing for a man to have so many presents in one week? Ah! I knew you would say yes—I hope it will never be your case, my boy. I can assure you I was more rejoiced when the last "good night" had sounded at my door than I can express. It was but yesterday that this entertainment took place, and for about a fortnight I expect we shall have to live upon the cold meat and fragments that are left; for our small party performed a miracle in the fragment way. Come every day, Crockery, if you can, and help us off with it.

My friend ended just as Mrs. Plod returned to her seat; and upon retiring to my sanctum sanctorum I thought I could not do better than send you off an account of what I had heard.

TO THE GOD HYMEN, LICENSED CHAIN MANUFACTURER.

The Petition of a harrassed and suffering Worshipper of Venus,

Humbly Sheweth—That your Petitioner, was an unbending and stiff-necked creature, shielded equally from the darts of Cupid, and the fear of your chains, by the cooling hand 'of forty years apprenticeship, in the ways of women, till, in an inauspicious moment, he was pierced through the heart, by the lovely and penetrating rays shot from the eyes of one of the most bewitching of "witches" of sweet nineteen.

And that your Petitioner, from that moment, hitherto has enjoyed no alleviation, from the racking pains and torments which tear the admiring heart, but by the conduct of the dear creature, they are increased daily, and that if you do not lend, speedily, your fastening hand, your Petitioner will soon be distracted, and bereft of his senses.

Furthermore, the conduct of the "witch," whose name is ———, calls loudly for your strenuous and enchainning hand, to stop that mad career which she appears determined to pursue.

On Sunday, at St. Peters, she puts down her veil, which makes her beauty appear more interesting whilst partially concealed; then raising it again, darts forth such piercing rays, from her two sunny orbs, and smiling charmingly at the same time, so interests him that he continues gazing and standing long after the Doctor has pronounced "let us pray," and thus subjects him to the sarcasms of his companions, who whisper loudly, "behold! the DENIED PETER.

Your Petitioner, is also subjected to the most distressing inconveniences, by the careless flirting of this unthinking beauty,—when he meets her in the street she smiles benignantly on her rejected adorer, who returns the smile, and when she has passed, your Petitioner is so infatuated that he turns and gazes upon her receding form, absorbed in thought, until, perhaps, floundering in the mud by the jostling of passengers, he recovers his senses.

In the pursuit of his vocation, he is also under much inconvenience,—upon paying his creditors he is incessantly writing, "By cash to ———," which his partner observing, with a smile desires to know where this beauty resides, who is such an enormous expense to him.

Your Petitioner, therefore, earnestly desiring to avoid all the above mentioned inconveniences, requests you will either link us together in your well MANUFACTURED chains, or will publish this Petition, that it may reach the unthinking creature who thus torments him, and be a warning to all "witches" not to disturb the peace of OLD Bachelors, but to attack the YOUNG ones, who will joyfully accept them; by so doing you will have the thanks of the unhappy

PETER BACCALAUREUS.

Piccadilly, Nov. 26, 1823.

TO LIEUTENANT H. MACKWORTH,

Of his Majesty's ship Brazen, who, by jumping overboard at a desperate risk, succeeded in saving the life of a seaman on the point of drowning. The captain and crew shed tears on his bringing the poor fellow upon deck, but were unable to utter a word.

They shall not die, who dare to do
Heroic deeds; and this was one
That forc'd the tear-drop from the few
Who saw the feat of glory done.

Though few were by, though few could weep,
What time thou saw'st him in the wave,
And plunging in the ravening deep,
The sinking man thou dar'd'st to save.

Yet more have heard, and more have wept,
Than thou can'st ever know, beneath;
Thy deed is chronicled and kept,
To form thy fame's perennial wreath.

The tear that lovely woman gives,
Is oft the passport to a smile,
And, born of nothing, scarce outlives
The sigh, that 'scap'd' her lips the while.

When British tars bestow a tear,
'Tis valour's fall, or beauty's woe,
Or deed of mercy, doubly dear,
That bids the precious drop to flow.

Such drops are thine, thy honest prize,
The jewels of thy future crown,
Which God will grant thee in the skies,
While angels write its record down!

THE PLEASURES OF SOLITUDE.

Far from the world, and ruthless strife,
Beneath the foliage-shaded bowers,
Exempt from care, I pass my life,
Calm flows the tenor of my hours.

Here can I taste elysian bliss,
Yielding to man a thousand charms;
Here do I learn, of happiness,
The most is found in nature's arms.

And here is all that mortal needs,
The luscious fruit, the crystal stream;
Where lies my path?—mid flow'ry meads,
On which, the heavens refulgent beam.

What, though anon a fated storm
Casts o'er the mind a moment's fear,
See yonder floats the misty form,
The beauteous Iris now shines there.

And so enthralled in envious strife,
The soul becomes a prey to grief;
Retirement is the balm of life
Which yields the sufferer sweet relief.

Thus, have I seen in fury wild
Above the rock, the rushing foam;
But having gained the smiling field,
Partakes at length a tranquil home.

ANCIENT RESIDENCES.

The ruins of the Castle of the Feudal Baron, a few moss-covered stones famous from being the birth place or the residence of active spirits, who have either incited us to good by their example, or, when existing in remote solitudes, are visited with eager solicitude by the learned and the curious. It is not thus with the remnants of antiquity in London: the houses which belong to the most powerful grandees have been usurped by a vulgar race; no trace remains in the streets of the noble blood which has dyed the pavement with crimson hues; the noise and din of mechanic art drowns the powerful voice that speaks to us from the dead; and we hurry away from a scene of bustle and confusion, without giving a thought to the history of other days, to the calamities wrought by the wicked, and the sufferings endured by the virtuous,—titles which are extinct,—names of families as ancient as our earliest laws, are pronounced by us carelessly, as they denote some petty street. On the site of Westmoreland and Windsor Courts stood the noble mansion of the Nevilles, Earls of Westmoreland; and part of that once magnificent pile, divided and subdivided into various habitations, still remains. This great northern family, which so often gave the law to England, boasts, amid its descendants, six Earls of Westmoreland, two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, an Earl of Kent, a Marquis Montacute, a Baron Ferrers, Barons Latimer and Abergavenny, one Queen, five Duchesses, besides Countesses and Baronesses, and an Archbishop of York. These noblemen seldom visited London except when summoned by writ to attend upon the King, or when determined to brave the monarch by a display of their power, or to pluck a haughty favourite from the council board, or any other act of rebellion it was their pleasure to commit. Warwick, called "the King-maker," rode through the streets at the head of 600 men, with ragged staves, the badge of the family embroidered on their red jackets; a retinue which enabled him to enforce his will despite of all opposition.

One of his most illustrious victims was John Tipstaff, Earl of Worcester, a nobleman of learning and accomplishments far superior to the age in which it was his misfortune to live. He caught the earliest dawn of that bright light which began to shed its beams upon a darkened world; and was a scholar and an author. He had married the sister of Warwick: but espousing a contrary side from the one which the haughty peer at that precise moment happened to be of, in the fatal wars between the Roses, he was brought by his sanguinary brother-in-law to the block. Caxton, one of the few persons able to appreciate the Earl of Worcester's mental acquirements, deeply lamented his untimely end.

In the BARBICAN, which was originally a Roman Specula, or watch-tower, and so long as London possessed its walls, was a station of such importance, that it was always entrusted to a man of rank, stood a house tenanted by several noble families, and at last descending to Catherine Willoughby, the third wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, was chosen by her as her residence; when upon the death of that nobleman, she took for her second husband Richard Bertie, a person of obscure birth but liberal education. The lady became a zealous Protestant; amused herself during the reign of young Edward V. with ridiculing the church of Rome, by dressing one of her dogs in a surplice, and naming another after Gardiner. When the accession of Mary had given this cruel prelate the means of revenge, the Duchess prudently withdrew from a country, where apostasy or the stake would have been the only alternatives offered. Her courage, and the attentions of her husband, preserved her in many dangers incurred during her painful pilgrimage in Germany, where she was deserted by her servants, robbed by the natives, and refused admittance by more than one

"rude boor,
"Who 'gainst the houseless stranger shut his door."

Forced to take shelter in the porch of a church. Mr. Bertie addressed himself in Latin to two scholars whom he overheard speaking in that language, and through their interference they obtained more gentle treatment. The adventures of the fugitives, and the birth of a son, named, in consequence of his mother's wanderings, Peregrine, formed the subject of a long ballad preserved in the Roxburgh collection, "printed in Queen Elizabeth's time to the tune of Queen Dido;" the last verse will give a sample of the whole.

"A son she had in Germany,
Peregrine Bertie called by name,
Bornam'd the good Lord Willoughby,
Of courage great and worthy fame.
The daughter young that with her went,
Was afterwards Countess of Kent."

A legend more curious than the ballad, but not equally well authenticated, is attached to the story of the illustrious exile's first husband, and may beguile a lonely walk in the Barbican. The plot of Otway's tragedy, The Orphan, is said to have been taken from a fact related in a very scarce pamphlet, entitled, "English Adventures," published in 1667. Charles Brandon, afterwards Duke of Suffolk, is in this work reported to be the hero of the tale. He lived with his father and brother, and a beautiful young lady, the ward of the former, in a country residence in Hampshire; the same fatal mistake as that which Polydore makes in the play, led to the same dreadful catastrophe. A duel ensued between the brothers, in which the injured husband fell; the lady lost her reason and died; the father also by the story became the victim of a broken heart: but in truth, Sir William Brandon, father to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, was killed at Bosworth Field, bearing the standard of the Earl of Richmond; and had the honour to fall by the hand of the usurper, Richard, with that desperate valour which won for him a soldier's death, in his last struggle for the crown, dashed at the standard of his rival, and, though thrown from his horse by the stout resistance of Sir William, cleaved the skull of his adversary, and swept on in search of Richmond. The legend relates that the unintentional author of the misery of his family quitted England in despair, with the determination of wearing out his life in exile; but his relations, supposing him dead, prepared to take possession of his estate; and, roused by this intelligence, he returned to his native country, and resided incognito in the vicinity of his own mansion. Whilst in this retreat, the young King Henry VIII., divided from his retinue whilst pursuing the chase, (the usual fête of royalty in every account extant of a hunting party) heard the cries of a female in an adjoining wood; the monarch reserving to himself the prerogative of murdering women, immediately rushed to her assistance. Two ruffians left their prey to fall upon the intruder, and the King, in considerable jeopardy, was saved by the opportune interference of Charles Brandon. Roused from a melancholy reverie by the scuffle, he ranged himself on the King's side, disarmed one of the assailants, and forced the other to fly. The denouement is perfectly dramatic: Henry discovers his dignity and rewards his preserver; the lady is unaccountably left off, and Charles Brandon, instead of falling in love with her as in duty bound, gives his despair and his remorse to the winds, follows the King to court, and afterwards marries Henry's sister, the Queen Dowager of France.

It is supposed that the attachment of the Princess commenced long before she could entertain an idea that she should ever be united to the object of her secret choice. When obliged, by the cruel laws which bind royalty, to ratify the peace between England and France by a marriage with the old King Louis XII. her affections for the gallant English Knight were increased by the valour he displayed at the tournaments given on the occasion. His arms were so irresistible that the Dauphin, in a fit of jealousy at his superior prowess, clothed in the armour of a gentleman, a genetic German, who was considered to excel all his fellow men in strength, and opposed him to the accomplished Englishman. Brandon, penetrating the disguise, baffled the base plot; he grappled with his man, yet powerful adversary, and disdaining to strike him in the knightly mode of warfare, struck him repeatedly on the head with the hilt of his sword, and leaving him breathless and bloody on the earth, presented his shield to the Queen, who, in the course of the unequal combat, had been surprised into a tender exclamation: alarmed for his safety, she unconsciously murmured, "hurt not my sweet Charles." On the death of the King, Charles Brandon visited the French court as Duke of Suffolk, with condolence on his lips, and congratulation in his eyes, and in less than two months carried off the young widow from all competitors. The kind offices of Cromwell, Henry's minister, and the tenderness of a heart not yet lost to every feeling of humanity, procured a pardon from the King of England, and the Duke of Suffolk made his appearance at a tournament amid the haughty nobles of the land, in a charger caparisoned with a saddle cloth made half of frize, and half of cloth of gold, and with a motto on each half. One of the mottos ran thus:—

Cloth of frize be not too bold,
Though thou art match'd with cloth of gold.

The other:—

Cloth of gold do not despise,
Though thou art match'd with cloth of frize.

a felicity of idea and expression which displayed spirit without presumption, and humility devoid of meanness. In the court which is now called Bridgewater Square, stood the town-house of the Earls of Bridgewater; a family as ancient as the Conquest. It was celebrated for its orchards, and formed a beautiful retreat in the suburbs of the city. There are few places more replete with romantic associations than the now despoiled Barbican. To the appointment of John, first Earl of Bridgewater, to be Lord President of Wales, we are indebted for that exquisite dramatic poem of Milton's, "The masque of Comus." Lady Alice, the fair daughter of this nobleman, had been upon a visit with her brothers to the Egerton family, and passing through Heywood Forest on their return, the party were benighted and lost their way. The vivid imagination of the poet instantly suggested the beautiful imagery with which he has decked the Sylvan scene. The encounter with his train of Bacchanals—pleasure in its most bewitching shape the—gay and beautiful Euphrosyne arose—and delighted with the result of their adventures in the wood, the young people exhibited the Masque of Comus, as one of the festivities of Ludlow Castle, before the Earl their father, and his friends. The scene, elegantly designated by the author as "The masque performed by Lady Alice, and three of the principal male characters were supported by her brothers Lord Brackley, the Hon. Thomas Egerton, and the Lawes." In Beech Lane, adjoining the Barbican, are the remains of the house of Prince Rupert: a spot who in the most brilliant times cherished a love of the fine arts, which unfortunately were not patronized during the licentious freedom of his kinsman's reign, and languished under succeeding monarchs, more than upon preserving the balance of Europe than cultivating science at home. Prince Rupert was the inventor of mezz-tinto engraving. A private soldier scraping the rust from his fusil, attracted his attention; a more military man would have been wholly engrossed with the desire of seeing the musket restored to its pristine brilliancy, but the artist was struck with the possibility of turning the discovery to advantage, and subsequent experiments produced a style of engraving which Evelyn and contemporary amateurs beheld with delight. To ordinary minds, a midnight ramble in a wood, and the cleansing of a fusil, would have passed as common occurrences; but the slightest conceptions are sufficient for the foundations of noble works, when they fall under the observation of spirits gifted with genius. This is the enchanter's wand, the cabalistic word, which when wielded and uttered by a magician, creates out of the meanest materials, wonders and marvels, which charm and dazzle the admiring gaze of man.—Museum.

BREEDING OF LEECHES.

An interesting memoir on this subject has been published by M. Noble, in which he states that these useful animals may be preserved and bred in troughs, with a little care, and a few simple contrivances; the great mortality which occurs among them when crowded to small vessels, being owing to the stronger devouring the weaker for the sake of nourishment. M. Noble instructed a trough seven feet long, three wide, and many deep, with sloping sides, lined with clay. It had a constant stream of water passing through it, and one of the corners rushes were planted. It was exposed to the sun, but sheltered from the north wind. November he placed 200 grey and green leeches in where they passed the winter, buried in the mud. Towards the end of the following spring several young ones were seen sticking to the old ones, and swimming occasionally, as if to try their strength. In August observed conical holes in the mud, each of which attained a little oval cocoon, as big as that of a silk worm, and porous outwardly. Some of these were perforated at each end and empty, some were filled with a transparent jelly, and the rest contained from one to twelve young leeches, which in a few days shed their envelope, and swam vigorously about.

M. Noble could not observe the formation of any of the cocoons; but the mode of producing them has been long known to the people in the department of Finistère, who are thus enabled to supply Paris with leeches. The workmen dig them up from the bottom of the little muddy pools, and place them in small ponds prepared for that purpose. Six months afterwards the young are removed into larger ponds, on the banks of which cows and horses are brought to feed, experience having taught the country people, that the leech is never prolific till it has sucked blood.

SAINT ANDREW A WIT!

The smart answer of St. Andrew deserves mention. The devil, in the shape of a beautiful woman, being sitting at a bishop's table, Saint Andrew came there "as a pilgrim" to demand alms: upon which she (the devil) asked the Saint how far distant heaven was from earth? "Thou should'st better know than I," answered Saint Andrew, "because thou hast fallen from thence."

SINGULAR EXPERIMENT.

The Lancet, a medical weekly publication, has last week a description of a curious instrument, and no less curious operation performed with it by Sir Astley Cooper, at Guy's Hospital. The instrument, invented by a Mr. Reed, is for washing or cleaning out poison from the bowels; and to demonstrate its capability, a dog was poisoned for the edification of the students. "At the expiration of thirty-three minutes from the time the opium was given, the stomach was evacuated of its contents, and washed out, by means of the instrument. [It then describes the apparatus] "The instrument succeeded very well in the dog, which appeared to be little worse for the experiment. Mr. Reed was in the theatre during the whole of the time, and superintended the use of the instrument; on quitting, he received the unanimous applause of those present. Sir Astley Cooper, just after the experiment had been tried, looking at what had been removed from the stomach, smiled, and said that the instrument would do well for an alderman after a city feast."

CONJUGAL AFFECTION.

Some few days ago a vessel, in which was embarked two loving couples, struck upon a rock off the coast of Cornwall, and began to fill fast, in spite of all endeavours to clear her by exertion, or relieve her by the pump. The ladies importuned their husbands to give them their last embrace. They did so; and one of the parties clung together with a fervour which indicated a determination to die in that unity they had vowed to do. The other also embraced, but said, "my dear, the vessel is sinking and our children are unprovided for—you cannot reach the land, and I can, God bless you!" and he prepared to swim as the vessel was going down.

At this critical moment the captain announced that the vessel was safe, and the parties were shortly afterwards landed. It is as singular as painful to state, that the two who clung to each other in the moment of peril, have separated for ever, from some hidden cause, and they who were about to separate for their children's good, are living a happy and domestic life.

IMPROVEMENT IN BUILDING.

A Cotton Mill, thirty yards long by ten yards wide, situated at Golt-Stock, near Bingley, the property of Mr. J. G. Horsfall, of that place, has within a fortnight been raised a story, by the application of the Hydraulic Press, without disturbing the roof or displacing any of the machinery. This operation is performed by placing the pump under the rafters in succession, and working the piston, when the roof is seen to rise about eight inches at a time, and stones of the requisite dimensions are introduced in succession, till a course of stone is placed all round the mill: the pump is then again applied in the same manner as before, and other stones placed, till at length the story is completed, and the additional room gained without affecting the stability of the edifice. The saving of expence by this mode of elevating a building is considerable, and in the present case it is estimated at from 80*l.* to 90*l.* Our correspondent, who is highly respectable, adds, that the weight of the roof and timbers could not be less than eighty tons, that the room gained is ten feet high, and that not a single slate has been broken.

THE USEFULNESS OF CROSS-EXAMINATION.

In Clarkson's history of the abolition of the Slave Trade we are told of a witness, on his examination before a committee of the House of Commons, deposing as to the excellent treatment of the negroes when on board the slave ships: among other things he states, that "they were fed with pulse dressed after the English fashion, and that the dance was promoted, &c. Now at first this sounds not amiss: for it is well known we English like our peas with butter, salt, and pepper; and then nothing promotes the dance like music: so that we are disposed to consider the condition of a slave while on ship-board as rather to be envied than otherwise: but then comes the sequel, which is brought out by cross-examination; the "pulse dressed after the English fashion," turns out simply to be boiled horse-beans; and the whip is much cheaper than music for promoting the dance; which was merely jumping together for exercise as they were chained together round the hold of the vessel; for such was the admission wrung by counsel from this very credible witness.

LANGUAGES

Captain, afterwards Sir Alexander, Ball, was once stationed off Goree, on the coast of Africa, and had on board his ship a detachment of the 75th regiment, composed chiefly of Welshmen. A party of them had permission to land on the Continent, and commenced a little barter trade for articles of provisions, &c. with some of the natives who had come from the interior. To the surprise of the Cambrians they found that some Welsh words, used among themselves, appeared to be understood by the negroes. They then addressed them in Welsh, and received replies in a language something similar to Welsh, and thereby maintained an intercourse with the natives in a broken but intelligible manner. So extraordinary a circumstance could not fail to become known to the Captain, and he, with his usual sagacity, was determined to ascertain the fact. He accordingly invited some of the natives on board, and deputed a few of the most steady and intelligent men in the regiment, and who had not been on shore, to converse with them. A conference was accordingly held before him and the whole crew, of course occasionally interrupted by words which were strange to each party; but a conversation was held in a language understood by both.

The astonishment of the Cambrians is not easily conceived, at finding negroes speaking a language in which they could make themselves understood to Europeans of so peculiar a dialect! Captain Ball asked a sergeant what he thought of it; and the reply was, that the language was certainly not exactly Welsh, but it was so very much like it, that he understood the natives much better than he did a man in the regiment who spoke Irish.

SWALLOWING KNIVES.

A few days ago, William Dempster, a juggler, while exhibiting his tricks in a public-house in Butcher-gate, Carlisle, actually accomplished the sad reality of one of those feats, with the semblance of which only he intended to amuse the audience. Having introduced into his throat a common table knife which he was pretending to swallow, he slipped his hold, and the knife passed into the stomach. Surgical aid was procured, but the knife had passed beyond the reach of instruments, and now remains in his stomach. He has since been attended by most of the medical gentlemen of the city; and we understand that no very alarming symptoms have yet appeared. His sufferings at first were very severe, but he is now, when not in motion, comparatively easy. The knife is 9½ inches long, one inch broad in the blade, round pointed, and the handle of bone, and may be generally distinctly felt by applying the finger to the man's belly; but occasionally, however, from change of its situation, it is not perceptible. —A brief notice of the analogous case of John Cumming, the American sailor, may not be unacceptable: —About the year 1799, he, in imitation of some juggglers whose exhibition he had then witnessed, in an hour of intoxication, swallowed four clasp knives, such as sailors commonly use; all of which passed from him in a few days without much inconvenience. Six years afterwards he swallowed fourteen knives of different sizes; by these, however, he was much disordered, but recovered; and again, in a paroxysm of intoxication, actually swallowed seventeen, of the effects of which he died in 1809. On dissection, fourteen knife blades were found remaining in the stomach; and the back-spring of one, penetrating through the bowels, seemed the immediate cause of his death.

SOVEREIGN REMEDY.

LOVE, like the Scotsman's pills, has wonderful properties. According to the Salopian Editor [not the Shrewsbury Chronicle] it kept Capt. Parry physically warm amidst the rigours of an Arctic winter!!! We never knew before that LOVE had this surprising quality. But, if the writers have not exaggerated its wonderful properties, our youth, whether male or female, have only on the approach of winter, to fall desperately in LOVE, which will render them proof against the season, and they may then safely dispense with the cloaks, &c. with which they have heretofore, in the simplicity of their hearts, endeavoured to keep out the winter's cold.

MR. LOGIER'S SYSTEM.

It is with great pleasure we announce to our Musical readers the complete success of the Logierian System, in Berlin. An examination of Mr. Logier's Pupils, under the immediate sanction and direction of the King, took place on the 14th and 15th of January last; in consequence of which, Mr. L. received the following document from the Minister:—"Sir, you are herewith informed, that in consequence of the happy result of the examination of your pupils, on the 14th and 15th of January, together with the favourable report of the Committee appointed to investigate your system, his Majesty the King has been pleased to grant the necessary sums for defraying the expenses of introducing your system into the different States; and you are hereby required to declare, whether you are prepared to commence your instructions, upon the condition specified by you on the 15th of March; and whether you can finish six professors before the end of December in this year."—Academies on the Logierian System have already been opened at Leipzig, Naumburg, Potsdam, and various other places with the greatest success; and twenty professors (among whom is the celebrated Bach) have adopted it, under the immediate patronage of the King.—Mr. Logier received a letter of introduction to Sir G. Rose the British Ambassador, and through him has been introduced into the first society of Berlin.—Mr. L. has received the most pressing invitation from Vienna and St. Petersburg.—Sure the enemies of Mr. Logier must at length feel ashamed of their virulent and illiberal opposition, to a system which has thus been found worthy the patronage of a Prince and a nation, celebrated throughout Europe for their musical skill and talent.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CAVILLER.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—There is not a more abhorrent member of society, nor one who with a malignant and demonian smile, scatters discord and misery, with such an unpliant hand under the most specious and delusive appearances of learning and reasoning, than the hated caviller. This opinion was formed by the painful experience of having a friend, who in all other qualities of the mind, was a sensible and rational man; but possessed of this greatest of evils, which detracts supereminently from his other pleasing qualities, and throws a murky shade of impenetrable nigritude over him, which I can never divest him of, not even with the assistance of sound reason or good sense, for he tenaciously adheres to his own opinion, though convicted of an error in the minds of the auditors, and thus by his obstinacy in captiously cavilling, destroys the social peace and harmonious concordance of our fraternity.

On Saturday, in conformity with my established custom, I purchased a number of your amusing and interesting Iris, and had perused it with considerable satisfaction, and an increased determination of support, when up rose my friend Paul, this caviller and inimitable disputant, and with bistrionic attitude and peculiar grimace, uttered the following philippic:—

"It is no small matter of astonishment to me, how rational men, can prostitute their talents, to compose for so insignificant a paper as the Iris; here you behold Gimel tugging through three lengthened columns of uninteresting and unnecessary instruction, and seems by his style to consider his readers as having never learned the propositions in composition; but he commands attention and secures admiration by his Hebrician signature, or his writings would hebetate the most persevering.—There Caswin sighs on through unconnected and irregular verse, now presenting images to the eye, and then withdrawing them too hastily to make a lasting impression; his metrical compositions compel me to judge him some love-lorn SWAIN."

My friend thus descanted upon all the originals that presented themselves in your miscellany, but the above are sufficient.

In reply, it was observed, that if the Iris was beneath his learned notice, why endeavour by his malignant and incorrect assertions, to poison the minds of his friends, and cause impediments to their receiving that satisfaction which your paper universally gives to our circle.

Besides to every unprejudiced mind, the generous efforts of Gimel's labour, must be evident;—it was an interesting and learned disquisition, and to those who were versed in classic lore, it strengthens and refreshes the memory, of what has been perhaps too long neglected, and to those who have never studied the Latin language, it is an inestimable treasure; the derivatives of many hundred English words, may be discovered in his short letter which is not too verbose, but pithy and amusing.

Caswin's verses are irregular, and flighty; now grasping the skies with enthusiastic ardour, and now descending to terrestrial objects, he evidently is a man of genius, and knowledge and the irregularity of his metrical composition, does not in the least minorate the efficiency of the verse.

I have made known to you the trouble under which I at present labour, that it might meet the eye of those who are petulant, opinionated, and cavilling, and caution them to beware and not subject themselves to the just observation that, "Illi damnant, quod non intelligunt."

REMINISCENCES.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—My last treat of pulpit, and I will now give you two instances of

SENATORIAL ORATORY,

which having had the pleasure of hearing at the time, I can also testify to the incorrect reports made of them in the public papers—a general and crying evil—the House of Lords was crowded to suffocation—the subject was whether or not Great Britain should persevere in sending out an additional and powerful reinforcement to the peninsula.—Earl Grey, in a luminous and forcible harangue, protested against the measure—urged the inutility of it—the hopelessness. "What," said he, "shall we exhaust our blood and treasure in so doubtful a cause, or at so remote a distance wage uncertain war against the colossal power of France? in a country where we are denounced as heretics, where jealousy has already arisen amongst their leaders, and one entire army has surrendered? It would be madness! In this case, and as circumstances present themselves, we may despair of Spain!" "Never!" said the Marquis Wellesley, rising instantly as the noble Lord had seated himself, "never! is it characteristic of Englishman to abandon a brave people because the aspect of their affairs now wears a lowering complexion? Were the Spaniards conquerors themselves, where would be our glory? If I contribute to a man whose wealth places him above what it might prove an injury, but if I dispense it to the needy, and he recovers his misfortune, how grateful to my feelings!—Despair of Spain!

Think ye that yon ensanguined cloud
Raised by war's breath, hath quenched the orb of day?
To-morrow, he renews his golden flood,
And warms the nations with redoubled ray.

What, would you cast into the dust the laurelled flag of Britain, bright with the glory of conquest, or keep it on your own proud shore of liberty, when liberty pants for its presence elsewhere? For myself every tie of blood however near and however dear should be engaged in the glorious combat. Let not the hands of Britons at home, damp the hearts of Britons abroad, and they will conquer; I say again, NEVER DESPAIR OF SPAIN!"

The whole house rose simultaneously, and cheered the manly speech. On another occasion shortly afterwards, as Mr. Canning was pleading the catholic cause, against a most potent opposition, the Chancellor of the Exchequer handed to the Right Honourable Gentleman a memorandum in pencil of news he had just received of a great victory gained by the British in Spain, and as he was reading it, the park and tower gun made the august fabric ring. With that splendid versatility of talent for which the Right Honourable Gentleman is so remarkable, he communicated the news to the house in this short sentence—

"Why what an anomaly is this in withholding support to the measure? even now the cannon of the metropolis is pealing in honour of victory,—of victory gained by Protestant England fighting for Catholic Spain!" (Enthusiastic cheering)

The following letter from Stockport we received this morning, and insert it literally.—We are far from complaining that the original matter with which we are favoured, should be thought worthy of transposition, but we are more than displeased when an acknowledgment is not even granted us.—If this were the first time we might have passed it over, but an article headed The Test of Affection, inserted in our Iris of the 23rd March, 1822, was also copied by the European Magazine verbatim! We are willingly disposed to believe that the Editor of that respectable publication imposed upon. If so, he will only do himself and us harm by holding up to public exposure the individual who he deceives him.—Ed.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—You will, no doubt recollect the very excellent article, entitled "The Half Hangit," which appeared in your valuable publication about twelve months ago. The European Magazine published on the 1st December contains, among its ORIGINAL PAPERS, the same tale word for word! Perhaps the Editor of the European presumes, that because the Manchester Iris is a provincial paper, its circulation is very limited, but I fancy he is a little mistaken: at all events were I the Editor of the Manchester Iris, I should give him of the European a plain opinion of his piracy. I am, Sir, Your's &c.

BIOGRAPHY.

MEMOIR OF THE RIGHT HONORABLE LORD ERSKINE.

FEW individuals holding the rank in society that Lord Erskine did, have passed to the grave with so little notice as this distinguished orator and patriot. It is true that every newspaper has recorded his death, a few have inserted an account of his funeral, and some have given a memoir of his life, but still the country does not seem to have fully appreciated the worth of Lord Erskine, or it would have felt the loss of such a man more severely. It is true also that the noble lord was far advanced in years, that the fire of his genius burnt not with its wonted vigour, and that his eloquence had ceased, as in former time, to sweep away every thing before it; but to the last, listening senates applauded and respected his talents, and few individuals ensured a more respectful attention, or possessed a greater influence in the House of Peers than Lord Erskine, whose manly and honest patriotism secured him the esteem of all parties. But the services of Lord Erskine ought to secure him a dear remembrance in every British bosom. We erect monuments to warriors who have sustained the military glory of their country in a contest, which in itself perhaps, was any thing but honourable; we raise statues to statesmen whose policy has been equivocal, and of the merit of whose services the nation is by no means agreed; we perpetuate the memory of our authors and our artists, and long may they be perpetuated; but what are the services of the soldier, the intrepid seaman, the artist, or the author, compared with those rendered by Lord Erskine to his country? He was the preserver of the liberty of the press—that palladium of all the civil, political, and religious rights of an Englishman; he was the saviour of the trial by jury, which, while preserved, is an insuperable barrier against despotism,—a rampart which may bid defiance to every assault.

Lord Erskine, though the son of a peer, had few of the advantages which nobility is generally supposed to confer; he was poor and almost friendless; he felt a pride in avowing it, and well he might, for by the unaided power of his mind and the untutored graces of his talents he raised himself to the highest honours.

Thomas Lord Erskine was the third son of Henry David, Earl of Buchan, and was born about the year 1753. He fixed upon the navy or his profession, went to sea at a very early age, and served under Sir John Lindsay, nephew of the celebrated Earl of Mansfield; under this officer he acted in the capacity of lieutenant, though he had not a commission of that rank; and this circumstance is said to have caused him to quit the navy, as he was unwilling, afterwards, to return to sea in the inferior rank of midshipman.

Determined not to spend an inactive life, young Erskine, on quitting the navy, entered into the army as an ensign, in the Royals, or 1st Regiment of Foot, about the year 1768: in this regiment he served six years, three of which he passed in the Island of Minorca; and, while there, with a versatility and eccentricity which distinguished his character, he read prayers and preached two sermons to his regiment.

From his infancy, he was distinguished by a singular ease, humour, and acuteness in conversation; and Dr. Johnson, who met him in company, while in the army, says, he 'talked with a vivacity, fluency, and precision so uncommon, that he attracted particular attention.'

On the death of his father, the Countess of Buchan, a lady possessing a high degree of mental energy, and intellectual talents of the first order, prevailed on her son to quit the army, for the dry and tedious study of the law; his sword was exchanged for a brief—and his Vauban and Polybius were thrown aside for Bracton, Littleton, and Coke.

Mr. Erskine entered as a fellow-commoner of Trinity College, Cambridge, in the year 1777, and, at the same time, inserted his name in the books of Lincoln's-Inn, as a student at law. One of his college declamations is still extant, as it was delivered in Trinity College Chapel. The thesis was the revolution of 1688; and in treating upon that glorious event, Mr. Erskine gave a powerful prognostication of that forensic eloquence, which was afterwards to clothe the dull details of law in an immortal garment of light and beauty. This declamation gained the first prize; but with that delicacy which has always characterised his lordship, he refused to accept it, alledging that, as he had declaimed merely in conformity to the rules of the college, and without being a student resident within its walls, he did not deserve it, and ought not to take it.

Shortly afterwards, an ode appeared in the 'Monthly Magazine,' in imitation of Gray's 'Bard,' which was attributed to his lordship. The playfulness of a vivid imagination, and of a laughter-loving disposition, are its principal characteristics; but it cannot boast of any very distinguished poetical excellence. The origin of this production was a circumstance of a most humorous nature. The author had been disappointed by his barber, who had neglected to attend him as usual, and, consequently, prevented him from dining in the college hall. In the moment of disappointment, hunger, and impatience, he is supposed have poured forth a malediction against the whole tribe of the dressers of hair, with a prophetic denunciation of a future taste for cropped crowns and unpowdered heads.

When his lordship became a member of the university, he had no intention of deriving any other benefit from it than merely taking a degree, to which he was entitled as the son of a peer, and by which he saved two years and a half in his progress to the bar.

In order to acquire a knowledge of the mechanical part of his profession, Mr. Erskine entered as a pupil in the office of Mr. afterwards Judge

Buller, then an eminent special pleader; and, on the promotion of this gentleman to the bench, Mr. Erskine entered into the office of the present Baron Wood, where he remained a year.

While his days were devoted to the mechanical drudgery of his profession, his evenings were frequently spent at Coachmakers' Hall, where a debating society was then held, nor was Mr. Erskine the only orator that was indebted for much of his celebrity, to the practice afforded him by institutions of this nature.

After completing the probatory period fixed for attendance in the Inns of Court, Mr. Erskine was called to the bar in Trinity Term, 1778. He did not remain long without a brief, for, on the 24th of November, in that year, we find him astonishing the Court of King's Bench by his courage, and making Westminster Hall ring with his eloquence. His first brief was to defend Capt. Baillie, who, on being removed from the superintendence of Greenwich Hospital, by the Earl of Sandwich, the first Lord of the Admiralty, was charged with having published a libel on that nobleman. It was in the course of this, his first speech at the bar, that Lord Erskine displayed his fearless independence, and laid the foundation of his future greatness. Mr. Erskine attacked, with great severity and with the most pointed sarcasm, the several governors of the hospital, particularly the Earl of Sandwich, and when reminded, by Lord Mansfield, that his lordship was not then before the court, he thus burst forth in the most impassioned eloquence:—

"I know my lord, that he is not formally before the court; but, for that very reason, I will bring him before the court. He has placed these men in the front of the battle, in hopes to escape under their shelter; but I will not join in battle with them; their vices, though screwed up to the highest pitch of human depravity, are not of dignity enough to vindicate the combat with me. I will drag him to light, who is the dark mover behind this scene of iniquity. I assert, that the Earl of — has but one road to escape out of this business without pollution and disgrace; and that is, by publicly disavowing the acts of the prosecutors, and restoring Captain Baillie to his command. If he does this, then his offence will be no more than the too common one, of having suffered his own personal interest to prevail over his public duty, in placing his voters in the hospital. But if, on the contrary, he continues to protect the prosecutors, in spite of the evidence of their guilt, which has excited the abhorrence of the numerous audience that crowd this court.—If he keeps this injured man suspended, or dares to turn that suspension into a removal, I shall then not scruple to declare him an accomplice in their guilt—a shameless oppressor—a disgrace to his rank and a traitor to his trust.

"My Lords, this matter is of the last importance. I speak not as an advocate alone—I speak to you as a man—as a member of a state, whose very existence depends upon her naval strength. If a misgovernment were to fall upon Chelsea Hospital, to the ruin and discouragement of the army, it would be no doubt to be lamented; yet I should not think it fatal: but if our fleets are to be crippled by the baneful influence of elections, we are lost indeed!—If the seaman, who while he exposes his body to fatigues and dangers—looking forward to Greenwich as an asylum for infirmity and old age—sees the gates of it blocked up by corruption, and hears the riot and mirth of luxurious landmen drowning the groans and complaints of the wounded helpless companions of his glory,—he will tempt the seas no more. The admiral may press his body, indeed, at the expense of humanity and the constitution; but they cannot press his mind—they cannot press the heroic ardour of a British sailor; and, instead of a fleet to carry terror all round the globe, the admiral may not much longer be able to amuse us, with even the peaceable unsubstantial pageant of a review.

"Fine and imprisonment!—The man deserves a palace, instead of a prison, who prevents the palace, built by the public bounty of his country, from being converted into a dungeon, and who sacrifices his own security to the interests of humanity and virtue."

In the defence of Lord George Gordon, for his share in the riots of 1780, Mr. Erskine commenced his first opposition to the doctrine of constructive treason; he commenced his splendid speech by an ingenious exordium.

"I stand," said he, "much more in need of compassion than the noble prisoner. He rests secure in conscious innocence, and in the assurance that his innocence will suffer no danger in your hands, but I appear before you a young and inexperienced advocate, little conversant with the courts of criminal justice, and sinking under the dreadful consciousness of that inexperience."

Mr. Erskine's duty on this trial was to reply to the evidence, and in no part of his profession did he display greater tact than in this branch of it. Having stated the doctrine of high treason, as established by the celebrated act of Edward III., and as expounded by the best authorities, he made a most dexterous application of those rules to the evidence which had been adduced. Those who study his celebrated speech on this occasion, will observe, with admiration, the subtleties with which he abates the force of the testimony he has to encounter, and the artful eloquence by which he exposes its effects and contradiction, when he abruptly and violently exclaimed—"I say, by God, that man is a ruffian, who, on such evidence as this, seeks to establish a conclusion of guilt."

The sensation produced by this mode of address, which, though not without several examples in Cicero, is not altogether suited to the sober declamation of English eloquence, was extraordinary; and the magic of the voice, the eye, the face, the figure, and the manner in which it was uttered, was quite electrical, and baffled all power of description. The feeling of the moment alone, that sort of sympathy which subsists between an observant speaker and his audience,—which communicates to him, as he goes on, their feelings under what he is saying, deciphers the language of their looks, and even teaches him, without regarding what he sees,—to adapt his words to the state of their minds, by merely attending to his own,—this intuitive and momentary impulse alone could have prompted a flight, which it alone could sustain; and as its failure would have been fatal, so its eminent success must be allowed to rank it among the most famous feats of oratory.

In the defence of Paine, for publishing his "Rights of Man," Mr. Erskine delivered a most powerful address, rich in poetic eloquence. When Mr. Stockdale was prosecuted for a libel on the managers of Mr. Hastings's impeachment, he displayed an eloquence and an ingenuity fully equal to any of his preceding efforts. After shewing how much the imputed atrocities of Mr. Hastings's administration were to be attributed to his instructions, to the policy of Europe in distant countries, and to the tyranny of civilized man, he introduces a personal adventure of his own in North America, as bearing particularly on the subject. Speaking of the feelings of distant and reluctant nations submitting to our authority, he said,—

"I have heard them, from a naked savage, in the indignant character of a prince, surrounded by his subjects, addressing the government of a British colony, holding a bundle of sticks in his hand, as the notes of his unlettered eloquence. 'Who is it?' said the jealous ruler over the desert encroached upon by the restless foot of the English adventurer,—who is it that causes this river to rise in the high mountains, and to empty itself in the ocean? Who is it that causes to blow the loud winds of winter, that calms them again in the summer? Who is it that rears up the shades of those lofty forests, and blasts them with the quick lightning at his pleasure? The same Being who gave to you a country on the other side of the waters, and gave ours to us; and by this title we will defend it," said the warrior, throwing down his tomahawk upon the ground, and raising the war-sound of his nation.

"These are the feelings of subjugated man all round the globe; and, depend upon it, nothing but fear will control, where it is vain to look for affection."

In the state trials of 1794, Mr. Erskine, by his talents, not only procured an acquittal of all the prisoners, but he expounded and defined the law of treason so clearly, that he may be said to have saved, by anticipation, the lives of hundreds, who must have suffered had the doctrine of constructive treason, against which he so successfully contended, been established.

But we cannot follow Mr. Erskine through his long and glorious career at the bar, for it would demand from us an account of almost every important trial that occurred during a period of nearly thirty years. On all occasions in which the liberty of the press or trial by jury were to be defended, he was the eloquent and dauntless advocate; nor was he to be deterred from what he conceived to be his duty by any circumstances of a personal nature.

A proof of this occurred on the trial of Paine, to which we have already alluded. On the trial of Horne Tooke, Mr. Erskine declared that a conspiracy was formed among the higher orders to deprive Paine of a British trial: "I assert," said he, "that there was a conspiracy to shut out Mr. Paine from the privilege of being defended; he was to be deprived of counsel; and I, who now speak to you, was threatened with the loss of office if I appeared as his advocate. I was told, in plain terms, that I must not defend Paine. I did defend him, and I lost my office." The office to which Mr. Erskine alluded was that of attorney-general for the Duchy of Cornwall.

Mr. Erskine was always remarkable for the fearlessness with which he contended against the bench. When on the trial of the Dean of Saint Asaph, for a libel, Judge Buller, his former legal preceptor, interrupted him in his argument, and threatened to compel him to sit down,—Mr. Erskine said, "My lord, I will not sit down. Your lordship may do your duty, but I will do mine." On another occasion he acted equally firm towards Lord Kenyon, and, throughout, the whole of his conduct at the bar appears to have been, as he thus described it in one of his contests with the bench:—"It was," said he, "the first command and counsel of my youth, always to do what my conscience told me to be my duty; and to leave the consequences to God. I shall carry with me the memory, and, I trust, the practice, of this paternal lesson to the grave. I have hitherto followed it, and have no reason to complain that my obedience to it has been even a temporal sacrifice. I have found it, on the contrary, the road to prosperity and wealth, and I shall point it out as such to my children."

It was not to political subjects that the brilliant powers of Lord Erskine's mind were confined; no lawyer could point out with more eloquence, the happiness of domestic life, or the misery and desolation which follow every violation of it, as his speeches in actions of this kind amply prove.

The political life of Lord Erskine is brief. In the year 1783, he was elected member of parliament for Portsmouth, and continued to possess a seat in the house, until called to the House of Peers, and the woollack at the same time, in February, 1806. His lordship held his office of Lord Chancellor only during the brief administration with the whigs, a party with whom he has always acted, though he was perhaps one of the most liberal of the party, Lord Erskine retired with them, and received the usual pension of 4000*l.* a-year.

As a senator, Lord Erskine did not shine as he did at the bar, though many of his speeches display great eloquence and acuteness, and few members in either house commanded a more respectful attention than his lordship. As a lord chancellor, Lord Erskine's name will not rank high, and few of his decisions are likely to form precedents, but as a man, his memory will be long cherished, for he was honoured in his conduct, amiable in his manners, and firm in his friendships.

Lord Erskine had been nearly half a century absent from Scotland, when, richer in honour and fame than in wealth, he, about four years ago, visited the land of his birth, and a public dinner was given to him at Edinburgh. It was during a second visit to Scotland that he was seized with an inflammation of his chest of which he died, a fortnight ago, at the house of his brother, the Honorable Henry Erskine.

Lord Erskine has been twice married, and has left several children. His lordship was honoured with the order of the thistle by his present Majesty, who always considered Lord Erskine as one of the oldest and most faithful of his friends.—Literary Chronicle.

STANZAS ON A DECAYED YEW TREE IN A COUNTRY CHURCH-YARD.

WHILE silent ages glide away,
And turrets tremble with decay,
Let not the pensive muse disdain
The tribute of one humble strain,
To mourn in plaints of pity due
The fate of yonder blasted YEW.

Long blotted from the rolls of time
The day that mark'd thy early prime,
No hoary sage remains to say
Who kindly rear'd thy tender spray;
Who taught its slow-maturing form
From age to age to brave the storm.

Beneath thy widely branching shade
Perchance his weary limbs were laid,
Content, without a stone—to share
The umbrage of thy grateful care;
His utmost wish for thee to shed
Oblivion's dews around his head.

And long thy darkling foliage gave
A hallowed stillness to his grave;
For there—if legend's rightly tell,
No vagrant reptile dar'd to dwell:
Even sprights, by moonlight wont to sleep,
Scar'd at thy presence fled away.

As thus, in contemplative mood
The venerable trunk I view'd,
Forth issuing from the sapless rind
A hoarse voice trembled in the wind.
Amaz'd I stood: and wing'd with fear
These accents caught my wond'ring ear.

Me to the precincts of the place,
That antique hallowed pile to grace,
From native woods, in days of yore,
The fathers of the hamlet bore:
Foster'd by superstition's hand,
A late memorial now I stand.

My spreading shade, extending wide,
The village wonder—and its pride,
I mark'd as years revolv'd, the blow
That laid thy hardest grandsire's low.
Now worn with all-consuming age,—
I yield to Time's relentless rage.

Nor fondly blame, with strain severe,
The simple zeal that plac'd me here,
Nor dare thy fathers to despise,
And deem their upstart sons more wise:
Let self-conviction check thy pride—
To error both too near allied.

Of zeal's unletter'd warmth possess,
Yet still, Religion fir'd their breast;
Frequent the hallow'd court to tread,
Where Mercy bears Repentance plead,—
Constant the grateful hymn to raise,
Our Zion echoed with their praise.

Their sons—superior knowledge boast!
Knowledge how vain! since zeal is lost.
Now gradual, as my branches pine,
I see Devotion's flame decline.
And while, like me, Religion wanes,
Alas! her vestige scarce remains.

(Written for the Iris.)

A WEEK IN LONDON.

This day was marked out for a journey to Windsor, the Castle of which, independent of its antiquity, was then the mournful residence of the best of Kings;—we departed at an early hour, and passed through Brentford, and Hounslow, the Heath of which is notorious for its robberies and murders: at a small village we took up his Majesty's bread, carefully packed in tin cases, and which having always had a predilection for in the days of his vigour, had been furnished him up to that hour, as, through both mental and bodily darkness, he could discriminate between that and other.

On our arrival, and previously to an inspection of the Castle, which, it should be remarked, or many miles has a grand and imposing appearance, with the royal standard waving from the round tower, we heard at the Inn many interesting anecdotes of our "good old King," and had a personal narrative of his benevolence, from an actual dependant on his bounty. His eccentricities were mixed up with his general character, nay, his very foibles were proverbial; but there was but one opinion amongst all, even his enemies, (if he had any) as to his meek and generous nature. To this place he has often been known to come on foot from the castle, at the early hour of five;—on one of these occasions, he overheard his own servants in the stables disputing about the payment of some gin, which they had that morning been indulging in, and giving the landlord the mount, said, "tell them the King has settled their dispute, but if they attended to their duties as he does, and abstained from such practices, they might live to be as old as he is." A far stood in the eye of the worthy man as he related it, and communicated itself by sympathy to that of his wife. A visitor to this place I pause some time before he enters the Castle;—there is much to command his silent admiration. It belonged to William the Conqueror to mark out its intended grandeur, but it remained for George the Third to complete its beauty. There was a party waiting at the gates on our arrival, and amongst the rest, a French Nobleman with a Cross of Honour on his breast. We were shewn through a variety of spacious apartments, till we came to the Beauty Room, so designated from having the favourites of Henry the Eighth in miniature;—they are, indeed, justly praised, and if they bear any resemblance to the originals, do justice to the taste of that amorous, but cruel monarch. All the rooms we passed through were boarded with polished oak, and bass matting to the communicating apartments, his Majesty having a strong objection to carpets; but every place had a time piece, and most of them a marble bust of the Princess Charlotte.

The ceilings of many of the rooms are beautifully painted, and the King's fondness of the arts is most conspicuous throughout these noble apartments.

We now came to a large mahogany folding door—our guide made a pause: and listened—Reader! the mightiest Monarch in the world, was here, pacing in irregular steps, wrapt up in sad but happy insanity, "ever and anon" he touched the chords of his piano, then resumed his walk; his beard we understood was of venerable whiteness, flowing down to his chest;—we saw his favourite dish, the leg of mutton, come in, and our guide paid a tribute to the excellence of his appetite. Our French companion manifested his sense of the unhappy condition of the British Monarch, for he could not withhold the tributary tear. "He believes," said the guide, "he is always in the company of Angels"—happy idea!—we hope that his imagination is realized.

We were next conducted to a large room with a magnificent table in the centre; at each end were laid two flags, by the replacing of which annually, two noble Dukes preserve their titles—those of Marlborough and Wellington, the latter had only recently been placed there, and the French nobleman exclaimed, with a shrug, "Ah! le Duc de Wellington!" The Royal Bed-chamber is adjoining this, and is remarkable for the gorgeous tapestry of the curtains; it is the manufacture of ancient days, and not to be equalled now. There are some lovely pictures in this, as in all the rooms, but the Arms of England, in marble, by a youthful sculptor, snatched from oblivion by the King, cannot fail to arrest the attention, and was presented as a grateful tribute to his Royal benefactor. The Terrace is a noble walk, higher than the lofty trees which encompass it, and from hence are clearly seen the "antique towers" of Eton College;—this is an interesting object, having been fostered by every succeeding Monarch, but by none more than his late, and present Majesty. The view from hence comprises many counties, and is, without exception, the most enchanting prospect I ever saw—the vale of Clwyd not excepting. As we repassed through the apartments, the remains of some milk were in a bowl of silver gilt, that his Majesty had just been partaking of, and which I could not resist drinking to his health, for the affection I bore to his amiable character. We were now ushered into a spacious court-yard, and the different residences of the Royal family were described to us, without a permission to enter them, and were thence conducted to St. George's Chapel. This magnificent piece of architecture has improved under the hands of many successive monarchs, and the entrance to it stamps the mind with a religious awe. There are here many splendid monuments, but one tearfully struck us, if I may be allowed to manufacture an expression, which serves to illustrate the heart of that "good old man" on a subject that terminated in the subversion of his reason. It is a simple slab of white marble bordered with black, and bears this inscription—

To the Memory of

For fifteen years the faithful Servant of Her Royal Highness
the Princess Amelia,
And who died three days after her.
Erected by the command of His Majesty
King George the Third.

Could any thing speak more for the love of a daughter, the feelings of a father, or the regard for a domestic? for myself every other monument sunk into insignificance in the contemplation of so much virtue—such amiable condescension. I cannot quit his memory hastily, and I may at least be allowed to quote from myself

"Our sighs support thy bier,
And thy best epitaph is—every Briton's Tear."

The stained glass window is an object of great curiosity; the colours are superlatively fine, and were singularly preserved during the Revolution.

But while gazing on this, we were reminded on what we were standing—the entrance to the sepulchre of the Princess Charlotte. I must again tear a leaf out of my own book; for we had already trodden upon the graves of the illustrious Pitt, Fox, and Nelson, and now we were standing on the consecrated sepulchre of the Heiress to the British Throne!

"Lo! the Divine, in deep reflection, cries,
Whilst inspiration moves his sacred tongue,
Earth's highest title ends in—Here he lies!
And 'Dust to Dust' proclaims his noblest song."

This sepulchre is shelled all round, and of late has received many illustrious tenants; it was a mausoleum suggested by his late Majesty, and throughout superintended by him:—when finished he took a survey of it, and placing his cane on the shelf which was to be appropriated to his own coffin, said "Here I shall lie, and I do not think I shall be the worst man that will be buried here." The fret work is very exquisitely carved, and the banners of the Knights of the Bath add a solemnity to the whole. The organ is a very superior instrument, and has often been the solace of our lamented Monarch, who was by no means an indifferent performer.

We arrived in London time enough to pay a visit to the King's Bench, the rules or liberties of which are very extensive, but which are only to be obtained by satisfactory security. This is the place to see real "LIFE IN LONDON," from the pampered voluptuary to the desolate mechanic. It comprehends within its walls, a Green Market, a Butcher's Market, and a Fish Market—with all the et cetera which would form a village. The game of tennis is the chief amusement here, and is played in high perfection. Visitors to this place should be cautious—the traps laid for the unwary are ingenious and multifarious.

OPTICS AND CHARACTERS.

Sanctifying down St. James's-street the other day, with little occupation either for mind or body, I met with a fashionable friend, who, after a thousand expressions of delight at seeing me, and almost as many apologies for having only five minutes to speak to me, begged I would accompany him to a shop close by, where he must positively go without delay; "for," added he, looking at an eye-glass that was suspended round his neck by a chain of exquisite workmanship,

"this glass is absolutely too antique to be endured an hour longer, I must go to Rubergall's immediately and get something that will look a little more comme il faut!"

As I knew that my friend only wore the glass for fashion's sake, and not from any defect of vision, I was not a little surprised that he had not rather chosen Hamlet's than Rubergall's, as I thought that the jeweller's would have been a lounge better suited to one of his taste and pursuits than the mathematical recesses of the optician. But I soon found that novelty was the charm that brought the young idler to this abode of science, and that as there was no likelihood of his ever having any other occasion of entering its learned bound, he was glad of the opportunity afforded him by making a trifling purchase, of examining the many wonders of optical inventions, and of willing away an hour that might otherwise have hung heavily on his hands. I was almost ashamed of the trouble that he delighted in giving, and of the many puerile inquiries he made concerning every article that was exhibited for his inspection; and was really surprised at the number of curious instruments that were spread before him, ere his inquisitive spirit was satisfied.

Being rather apt to carry my thoughts farther than is common, or perhaps useful, I soon began to consider the variety of Glasses that were here displayed, with reference to the characters by whom they would probably be used, and thus in a manner identified these characters with the glasses themselves. Thus, the eye-glass, made more for ornament than use, conveyed to my mind the exact idea of my Friend, who by the occasional aid of a convenient shortness of sight, could, with the most perfect good breeding, pass by a very particular friend, if he were not dressed precisely as a man of fashion ought to be; or if he happened to encounter him at a time when he did not desire his company.—The Opera-glass, which in all its infinite varieties was laid before him, reminded me of the Critic, who can never be satisfied with a mere casual view, and must always inquire into the intrinsic merits of every thing that meets his eye; and, whether in the decorations of a theatre, the painting of a fine picture, or the architecture of a noble building, must always refer the decision of merits to the theory of taste and the rule of art. Microscope, the investigating, the scrutinising, the minute microscope, was the Virtuoso; the shell gatherer, the fossil fancier, the collector of coins; the searcher into the beauties of a fly's wing, the forceps of a spider, and the eyes of a magnified ant: The Telescope, which, unable to notice the objects that immediately surround it, always turns its light to prospects which distance alone renders worthy of its observation, was the coxcomb Traveller, who, despising his native land, its beauties, and its comforts, is ever wandering into foreign countries, in search of something to admire: or it might more strongly resemble the Poet, whose excursive fancy ranges with equal facility over earth, air, and sea. The night Telescope, contrived solely for the votaries of Urania, could be no other than the Astronomer, who prefers winter to summer, because the nights are longer; to whom daylight is tedious and uninteresting, and who hails the rising of the evening star almost as fervently as the Persians worship the sun. The darkened or smoked Glass, used for looking at the eclipsed sun, I did not at first apply to any character, but, determining that it should not be omitted, I fancifully converted it into the envious being, who, when a man of talent is under a cloud, will add to the shade by which he is enveloped, because the brightness of his genius has thrown his humble abilities into deeper obscurity. The Green Glasses, the preservers of the feeble sight, were very like people of weak minds, who must bring every thought and action to their own tone, before they can see or understand them.

My attention was next attracted to a pair of spectacles of a very strong magnifying power; which my companion in his idle folly chose to try on, when he was told that they were for extreme old age, and he seemed to please himself with calculating on the length of time that would elapse before he should be obliged to have recourse to them. These suggested to me the idea of a captions and querulous Old Age; which, though surrounded by infirmities and afflictions, yet adds to the heavy load that oppresses it, by aggravating every inconvenience, and enlarging every trifling ailment. I almost grew sad as I contemplated the picture of human suffering that I had brought so forcibly before my "mind's eye"—and was sinking into a deep reverie, when a loud laugh from my friend changed the current of my thoughts, and I found that he was amusing himself with the grotesque figures of some cleverly designed Magic Lantern Glasses, and instantly I flew from the decrepit and peevish old invalid, to the merry companion, the wit, the satirist, who turns every thing into a jest, to whom life is a perpetual round of gaiety and good humour, and who sets every character in the most ridiculous point of view, by the aid of a false light and a little exaggeration.

THE CLUB.

No. XXXVII.—FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1823.

To the Members of the Club at the Green Dragon.

GENTLEMEN,—It has afforded me more pleasure than I have experienced for some time to observe that you have resumed your literary labours. I unite my wishes to those of a great number of your readers that neither the ill health of your respectable chairman, nor any other unfortunate circumstance, may deprive the public for a considerable period at least, of the benefit of your interesting lucubrations.

You are not to infer that because few persons have come forward to offer you their assistance, that, therefore, there are but few who can appreciate the merit of your productions. As I have perhaps had greater opportunities of ascertaining the state of public opinion, permit me to redeem the town from the imputation that it would lie under if it should appear to be insensible of your merits. A very worthy motive to which I can do no more than allude, has probably prevented some of your best friends from relieving your labours by the substitution of their own. But I, gentlemen, am oppressed by but few scruples which are calculated to shew that I have formed a mean estimate of my own powers; and I have, therefore, the vanity to hope that my assistance, which it will be my pride to furnish, will not be altogether unacceptable, though my style, as well as that of some other scribblers of greater notoriety, has not received the unqualified approbation of the Club at the Green Dragon. My vanity, which my friends are pleased to assure me is my principal defect, was still gratified by your notice; and because I cannot be persuaded to conceal this foible of my nature, a quizzical friend of mine told me the other day, that, in this particular I resembled an interesting young lady of his acquaintance, who has no weak point in her appearance except her forehead, and yet is so very destitute of that native shrewdness which distinguishes her sex, as to range her hair so as to have it completely exposed. My friend read to her in vain the passage in one of your essays in which you caution your fair readers against leaving themselves so open to the impertinent examination of the disciples of Gall and Spurzheim, whose scrutiny might be so easily set at defiance by those graceful curls which might increase the personal charms of a lovely female. As I am sorry to observe that the fashion in question is rather general, I hope you will give the ladies some advice upon the subject. If they still persist, I fear that France or some other nation which we have been accustomed to despise on this account, will, notwithstanding the great natural advantages in our favour, bear away from us the palm of beauty. Let me remind our fair townswomen of a criterion which you stated in your paper on straight waists, when you appealed to the high authority of the artists, who have certainly never yet thought of drawing a nymph, a naiad or a grace, or, indeed, any thing better than a cassandra with a bare forehead. Only think how fatal it might be to expose the wrinkle which a curl would charmingly conceal! Besides, there is another circumstance of which the ladies seem to be very little aware; I mean the disclosure of their favourite secret, since there is no fashion by which their ages may be so easily discovered. I once knew a single lady who, for many years, passed off for five and twenty; but being resolved, on an unlucky occasion, to adopt the fashion of exposing her forehead, she, at the same time exposed her age, and was obliged ever after to submit to be treated as an old maid,—but I am unconsciously taking the subject into my own hands when I only intended to draw your attention to it.

You sometime ago made your readers a promise which I regret that you have so long delayed to perform. It was your intention you stated to give some further account of the different clubs which had been visited by the member whose adventures are related in your third number. As this is a season of the year at which clubs of every kind are generally formed, some observations on the subject from the Green Dragon might be productive of good effects, in giving a direction to public mind. The Card-Clubs, which have, I am assured, already become very numerous, deserves your representation in particular; for they not only engender angry passions and other injurious excitements; they not only cause discord among the best friends, and promote private scandal; but, if I am not greatly misinformed, they were last winter so organized by designing persons, and carried to so great an extent, especially among the fair sex, as to occasion much pecuniary inconvenience to individuals and in some cases to whole families. It has even been whispered that Mrs. —, who, during the last winter, played at cards oftener, it is suspected, than she did any thing better, was obliged to use paint to conceal the feelings which would otherwise have been exposed in the altered complexion of her once sweet and blooming countenance.

Hoping to see your attention very soon directed to this subject and to others by which the public taste may be improved, I remain, Gentlemen, your well wisher and ready assistant.

ANTHONY PRUDENT.

A THOUGHT ON DEATH.

By Mrs. Barbauld, written in her 60th year.

When life, as opening buds, is sweet,
And golden hopes the spirit greet,
And youth prepares his joys to meet,—
Alas! how hard it is to die!

When scarce is seiz'd some valued prize,
And duties press, and tender ties
Forbid the soul from earth to rise,—
How awful then it is to die!

When, one by one, those ties are torn,
And friend from friend is snatch'd forlorn,
And man is left alone to mourn,—
Ah! then how easy 'tis to die!

When faith is strong, and conscience clear,
And words of peace the spirit cheer,
And visioned glories half appear,—
'Tis joy, 'tis triumph, then to die.

When trembling limbs refuse their weight,
And films, slow-gathering, dim the sight,
And clouds obscure the mental light,—
'Tis Nature's precious boon to die!

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

(From the Literary Gazette.)

Here I am again.

- - Fol-de-rol de-rol-lol, fol-de-rol-de-ray. Ha! how are you, Mr. Editor?—here I am again, as staunch an old blade as ever knock'd a cock-maggot out of a king's biscuit, or shook a mosquito by the ears. Aye, aye, you may talk of your Penny-rammers and your Mar-maids in Chancery, your Mix-i-can scenes and Cracker-acts of the Ganges; but what are they to the sights I've seed in my life? This is a comical out-of-the-way world I must needs own, for a man no sooner dowses his coat than somebody else is ready to put it on, and swear point-blank they have had it ever since it was a jacket. Howsomer that says nothing:—here I am again, and if you wants a few more tough yarns from the same winch, I'm your boy. What! did you think I was going to desert? Lord love you, old Jack never was the lad to flinch from his gun or forsake his colours. Let but Humanity beat to quarters and Benevolence take command, I'm on deck in a minute, and clear for action. So you see here I am again—none of your Tom-Coxes-traverse gentry, up one hatchway, down t'other—in every body's mess and nobody's watch. No, no, all fair and square by the lifts and braces, that's poor Jack's plan. None of tea-for-two and toast-for-six without a friend to share it. Give me the feeling heart and the helping hand adorned with the richest of all earthly gems, the sparkling tear of gratitude; and this puts me in mind of a circumstance that happened the other day—There, don't be in a hurry, you gentlemen of the press are so impatient. "Let me gang ma ain gait," as old Hameish says; thnt is, hobble along as well as I can. You forget I've got one leg in the grave, and the other is longing to be with his mate; but wait a wee, wait a wee, Mr Editor, and you shall have it as clear as ink can make it. Why, d'y'e see, an old messmate of mine got married some years ago, and what then?—why, he'd a whole troop of children before he could look round him, and that's poor work upon three farthings a year, and receive it quarterly—it made him calculate his vulgar fractions. Howsomer he struggled with his difficulties, kiss'd his wife, nursed the bairns, and turned a penny when he could get it. Well, d'y'e see, about six weeks ago he was sitting on the bench a-top of One-tree-hill in the Park, in a lack-a-day-sigh-cal manner, swinging one leg for pastime, and beating a tattoo upon the other, occasionally picking his teeth to clear them of the remains of a cheesnut dinner. (By the bye they're good for nothing this year, and so our dessert's spoiled.) His last shilling was confounded restless, and had been driven from pocket to pocket undergoing fifty examinations to ascertain whether it was a good-oun. He was giving it another twirl in the air, when a poor ragged Tar ranged up alongside, and dowsing his truck, supplicated charity. He had not been accustomed to beg, for his head hung down with shame, without raising his eyes to the person he implored; and he was actually wearing round to sheer off without having his petition answered, when my messmate sprang up, grasp'd his hand—"What, Johnson, my worthy old soul, come to this!"—Aye, aye, Mr. T—, (said the veteran,) needs must when the old-in drives; and I'm sure, of all the foul fiends hunger's he worst. But what's the use of distressing you with my complaints? I know you've a generous heart, and twill only make you more unhappy, 'cause you can't relieve them. Heaven knows half-pay's little enough or a wife and family, for I hears you're married.—"Why aye, Johnson, I have a family, and they are so dear to my heart that I wouldn't part with one of them o be made Lord High Admiral, though I confess I'm ften obliged to sail c'ose-haul'd to get 'em a meal. However they will dine hearty to-day, God bless 'em! and so, my old boy, you shall share all I have in the world; and for to-morrow—why aye—to-morrow—no matter, Providence will never see that man wreck'd on a lee shore that takes in a tow an old shipmate in stress; so come along, Johnson—remember 'There's sweet little cherub that sits up aloft.' Come along, y old worthy,—a crust of bread and cheese, and a lass of grog to the King, will bowse all taut and get us in good sailing trim." And away they started for the town.—For several weeks after this, poor T— got lower and lower, and his half-pay was spent. Reduced to the greatest straits, in hourly expectation of being ejected from his lodgings for rent, his heart was fill'd with bitterness. A few days ago, having failed in an effort to procure a supply, he returned home half distracted. His wife sat, in calm dejection, with an infant cradled in her arms that vainly sought for nourishment, but not a tear, not a sigh, not a look escaped to wound the susceptible mind of her husband: the arrow rankled within, but the little innocents around were crying for food. (Oh what a scene was this for a parent! "Almighty Ruler! (exclaimed T—,) what have I done to merit thy wrath—why pour out the phials of indignation on my helpless offspring!" But a look from his partner calm'd the intemperance of the moment, and folding his hands upon his breast, he bowed his head with pious resignation—"Father, forgive!—not my will but thine be done!"—Sir, you're wanted, (said the landlady of the house, tapping at the door,) there's the postman with a letter for you.—"I have no money, my love, to pay for it, (said T—to his wife:) what's to be done?"—The postage is paid, (said the listening landlady;) I supposes they knew you were down in the mouth." His heart was wrung too bitterly to heed this sore hit, and hastening to the door, "Be you Mister Squire T—, of the Royal Navy? (titter'd the man)—be you the gemman?"—"I suppose that letter is designed for me, (taking it); yes, 'tis right." He returned to his room. "Who is it from?" inquired his wife. "I know not, (said he,) 'tis very carefully sealed at both ends; but the writing and direction lead me to imagine 'tis from some poor fellow that needs assistance like myself. Oh that the time should ever arrive that I'm debar'd the satisfaction of succouring a friend in distress! (He pass'd his hand across his face)—Well, open it and see." He unfolded the sheet, when the first thing that was presented to his sight was a Five Pound Note. Only those who have felt the pinching pangs of poverty, and witness'd the wants of those so dear to their hearts, without a shot in the locker, grasping at the last beam of expiring hope—only those can tell what the sensations are when unexpected, unlook'd-for succour comes. He fell upon his knees—his wife clung round his neck—the children gather'd round, while he pour'd forth his heart in gratitude to Heaven. The letter ran thus:

"DR SUR URE ONNER—This kums hoping to find u well, nd to let u sea the gud tun u did ould Johnson wull niver skip from his hart—fust i kud get—bownd to Ingee—dout hundestan letter righting—God bless u—OLD JOHNSON."

Need I tell you what follow'd? Oh no, you can picture it yourself. Worthy soul! may he never want a friend in this world, and have his name enter'd on the Book of Life in another and a better. Poor T—! we were shipmates together in the flag-ship under Lord H—, and that comical dog, Billy C—, was in the same mess. Billy was upwards of fifty; and though he had had several commissions, threw them all up, preferring rather to be honoured as the oldest midshipman in the service, than be pointed at as the youngest lieutenant. He was a great favourite with the Admiral, to whom he was distantly related. Just after we had refitted at Plymouth, orders came down for the fleet to sail. Up went blue Petre, and all hands prepared to pay their tailors' bills with the flag-end of the fore-top-sail sheet; for they knew by going to sea in his debt, he'd never cease praying for a fair wind to bring 'em home again. Well, d'y'e see, Billy was ashore, and no one could discover where he was stowed; but the Admiral, unwilling to leave him behind, requested the Lieutenant on duty to ferret him out and get him aboard. This was no easy task; and Mr. E—, after overhauling about fifty houses, was returning to make his report, when passing a door in — street, he heard the well-known voice singing, with great glee—

"Then hant away, pull away, jolly boys,
At the mercy of fortune we go."

Passing through the outer room and entering the kitchen, there sat Billy very comfortable by the fire, with one hand turning the spit to his own music, and with the other basting a fine fat goose that was roasting. His gold-faced cock'd hat ornamented the handle of a saucepan, his side-arms hung pendant from the leg of a gridiron, and his uniform coat and waistcoat dangled from the same peg with an old warming-pan—

"We're in for it now, 'tis a folly boys,
To be down-hearted, yo-ho!"

But observing the Lieutenant enter, his song ceased. "What cheer—what cheer? Glad to see you. What, are you come to dine with me?"—"No, Sir, (replied E—, scarcely able to refrain from a roar of laughter,) No, Sir; I come with the Admiral's orders for you to go on board."—"What, and leave the goose?"—"Come, come, Mr. C—, be serious; there's the signal for sailing at the mast-head, and the fleet are order'd to sea directly."—"Well, tell them to wait till the goose is done."—"Nonsense! would you skulk ashore when, perhaps, we may fall in with the enemy, and bring some of them home with us?"—"Why, not altogether that; but the goose will be spoil'd, for there's not a soul in the house beside myself."—"Oh never mind the goose, you'll take that with you. But come, bear a hand, you have already incur'd the Admiral's displeasure, and surely you wouldn't act ungratefully to him who has always behaved so generously to you."—"Touch my honour, touch my life. No, I'll only get a fresh scrape and a paint, clap my rigging over the mast-head, and then we'll make sail together; but the goose will be burned."—"Confound the goose! (said E—, stripping off his coat)—Look smart, and I'll turn the spit till somebody comes; and down he sat. Away went Billy, having mounted his uniform, to call the mistress of the house, and get shaved; but scarce had he turned the corner of the street when he ran full butt against the Admiral. "Halloo, Mr. C—! (said his Lordship,) I understa d your leave of absence is expired: what are you doing ashore?"—"I don't know, my Lord, I've been very unwell these two days—confined by a room-a-tism."—"Those are idle excuses, Sir. Pray have you seen Mr. E—? Ah, now, if I could see you copy that young man, what satisfaction and pleasure it would afford me!" Billy shrugg'd his shoulders and laugh'd. "What insolence is this, Sir! (said his Lordship)—I cannot express my indignation. Tell me directly—Have you seen that gentleman?" laying a particular stress on the last word. "Yes, my Lord, (replied Billy,) and so may you if you go to N—there," pointing down the street. "What do you mean, Sir?—your insinuations are base. But come, Sir, I'll be satisfied—show me the way;" and Billy conducted his Lordship to the door. But what was the Admiral's surprise and chagrin to see the person he had just been commending busily engaged in attending the sputtering bird, now almost burnt to a cinder! His back was towards them, but hearing some one behind, and concluding it was the proprietor of the rookery—"Come along, old Bet, a pretty kettle of fish I've made of it!—there's the fleet getting under weigh, and old shiver-the-wind will give me a sermon as long as the main-top bow-line. Here's the goose as brown as a berry, and I've burnt my fingers with the ladle." This was too much for Billy—he roared till his sides shook. But who can paint the astonishment and embarrassment of the young Lieutenant, on turning round and seeing who was present! "Old shiver-the-wind is greatly obliged to you, Mr. E—, (said his Lordship, bowing and walking off); and now I shall know in whom to place confidence again. Make haste down to the barge, and wait till I come;" and away he went. "What's the matter, what's the matter, Mr. E—? (said Billy, almost convulsed with laughter on seeing the young Officer throw himself into the chair in an agony)—What's the matter? Why, the Admiral knows that Spit-head's a naval station, and you are always fond of imitating the philosophers of grease."—"I'll have satisfaction, Mr. C—; this is your doing."—"So you shall, so you shall, (spreading a large sheet of brown paper, and packing the goose up in it.) You put the goose upon me, you know—I clapp'd it upon you—and now we'll go and saddle it upon the Admiral;" and off they set for the boat. His Lordship soon joined them, and the boat shoved off. "What, what is this smell, Coxswain?" inquired the Admiral. "'Tis Mr. E—'s goose, my Lord," said Billy. "How is this that you dare to presume upon my indulgence?"—"Indeed, my Lord, I—I—the goose—I—I—" replied the stammering Lieutenant. "The goose—I—I! (reiterated his Lordship,) what do you mean, Sir?" But Billy, seeing he had run his cable out to the clinch, and that the old gentleman began to get serious, made a thousand apologies, and explained the whole business, taking the blame to himself, and respectfully entreating pardon where he had so often obtained it before. But 'twas not till the general action fought soon after that the Admiral was any way reconciled. "How these balls hiss," said E— to Billy, both stationed on the quarter-deck. "Aye, aye, (retorted Billy)—Aye, aye, it puts one in mind of the goose."—"So, (exclaim'd his Lordship, who had overheard it, and turn'd short round)—So you can't forget the goose, Mr. C—! Well, well, baste the French as well as you did the goose, and I shall be satisfied." A few minutes afterward, and the enemy dropt along side. The boarders came rushing from their quarters, when Billy snatch'd up a cutlass, and springing from the nettings on to the Frenchman's deck, roared out, waving his sword, "Here's my spit; ev'ry mon his bird, and I'll tak gibbie;" and cutting down all before him, though severely wounded, fought his way to the taffrail. E— was close at his side, and together they dowsed the colours, amid three cheers from all who witnessed the exploit. The cheers were returned by the boarding party, for the finest ship in the enemy's squadron was now their own; and many an old goose* at Greenwich lives to tell the tale.

AN OLD SAILOR.

MOSQUITOS.

adit iter liquidum celeres neque commovet alas.—VING.

I was very tired, and went to bed about eleven. It was a hot summer night, and so light was my room with the soft yellow beams of the moon, that it was long before I could win "nature's sweet restorer" to my eyelids. As I am a gentleman of an exceedingly thoughtful disposition, I was not at a loss for amusement. I began to run over the events of the day that was gone; and after some little preamble, my meditations gathered around the pretty form of a certain lady of our city,* and I lulled myself into a gentle slumber by thinking of her. I lay for some time in that most luxurious state between sleeping and waking—just on the boundary line of mortality—with half my senses yet clinging to this earth, and the rest already beginning to rove in the lightness of freedom through the realms of fancy. I was indeed in a most delightful state of mind, and scarcely felt the couch that gave rest to my weary frame. Fairy visions, beautiful as the hues of the rainbow, floated in mine imagination. The conceptions of fancy embodied themselves—the very wishes of my waking moments were half accomplished; and I became as it were the mighty ruler of a world of mine own. Sometimes I thought I was falling through the immensity of space, and passed by planets in my way; but it was pleasant to me, and I seemed to be wheeling in graceful circles in the air, as in my younger days I have seen the eagle do, far away in the calm sky. Sometimes I thought I was sporting in the green meadow, romping and racing with the most lovely maidens that I had ever beheld; and in a "proh pudor" I dreamed I was actually kissing Mrs. L—. In short, gentle reader, some kind spirit had lifted me far above the scenes of earthly degradation, and I was revelling in the gay pleasures of another world.

At length my fancy began to cut terrible capers. The pretty girls—the green meadows—and Mrs. L—'s rosy lips—passed away; and methought I beheld a battle. I stood upon the brow of a rugged mountain. The sea dashed and foamed on one side, and the crash of war arose on the other. The wind blew in roaring whirlwinds, and bore the white foam of the ocean in snowy wreaths along the air. The sky was blacking with huge clouds, that rolled like a troubled ocean immediately over our heads. The lightning burst through the gloom in bright sheets of fire, or quivered in terrible lustre along the dark sky, as though its mighty vault had been rent in twain. The thunder crashed along the heavens with a noise as if ten thousand worlds had tumbled together and shivered into ruins. I turned mine eye from the stormy clouds to gaze upon the fight. I saw warriors bestriding fiery horses—they rushed over the shrieking bodies of the dying, and mingled their might in one terrible thunder of ruin. Sabres flashed—the thunder and the cannon shook the earth with their mingled tumult. Shrieks, shouts, and the clashing of arms, sounded in mine ear, and I was about to fly away from the scene, when I saw in the very midst of the battle, the form of a beautiful woman: her raven ringlets were streaming in the wind, and her white hands uplifted in terror at the desolation around. I was rushing to her relief, when I saw a huge ruffian approach to her side—he seized her silken ringlets—he tore them from her head—and dared, in the insolence of his triumph, to grasp her throat; and the shriek, that arose above the storm of war, was answered by a laugh. Another, and another, roughly seized the beautiful being: until I shouted revenge, and rushed to her rescue. Many a bright blade flashed around me, many a swift bullet whizzed by mine ear, but I tore the falchion from the clenched hand of a dying wretch, and mingled in the battle. The lofty figures of my enemies bore hack at my approach. I cut my way to the terrified girl: and when she saw her brutal insulters gnashing their teeth at my feet—she sprang to my side, and clung to my bosom. A giant monster struck at her white forehead. I turned my wrath on him—his blade shivered into a thousand atoms—I cleaved his coward skull to the jaw, and he fell shrieking from his horse. Dreadful were my struggles—terrible was my revenge. I bore her back amidst the maddened fury of all around—sprang with my lovely burden upon a fleet steed; the noble animal fled like the wind; the clouds disappeared as we rode; the sun shone again in bright cheerfulness—the birds sung music to our way—and in a few moments methought we were in one of the most beautiful countries I ever saw, and heard the clang of war only as some gentle breeze bore it at intervals to our ear. Reader, reader, who shall tell the happiness of my bosom, when I bore my pretty maiden from the saddle, and felt that we were free! Roses clustered in blushing wreaths around us, and perfumed breezes kissed away the drops that exertion had gathered to my brow. I looked upon the being I had rescued: and, looking—I loved. She smiled upon me—her lips parted—she was beginning to speak, when the voice of a distant trumpet broke upon our ears. Nearer, and more near, came the fatal sound; sometimes breathing soft music, but as it approached it gave a long loud thundering twang, and—I awoke. The fairy scene vanished; but the sound of the trumpet continued. I lifted myself in my couch—and, gracious fathers! it was a mosquito! a little vile rascally mosquito was flourishing in all the glory of long legs and sharp sting, around the very pinnacle of mine unhappy nose!

Now, was ever such a misfortune? To be dragged down from the fairy realms of imagination—from blushing cheeks and blushing roses—from fame—and victory—and love—to be torn away from these pleasures by the humming of a mosquito! at whose approach the enchanted spell was broken, and every vestige of my happy vision melted away—it was too bad—it was miserable. I lay upon my couch in a state of most pitiable melancholy, mourning over the sad certainty that I was only my poor humble self—that I had not been the wonder of the world—that I had not ever seen a battle. I had not rescued lovely innocence from ruin; and instead of cleaving the brutal ruffian from his stead, I had been, in all human probability, flourishing away at my poor unoffending bed-post, or heating, mayhap, the meek and unresisting form of my own pillow.

Pity me, indulgent reader; but do not laugh when I assure you, upon mine honour, I was exceedingly indignant; and what increased my passion to a most alarming degree, was the fact that the little rascal kept humming about my face—now sailing around mine ear—then cutting a few flourishes about my nose—and sometimes, with the most perfect sang froid, alighting upon my very cheek. I struck my face with all my might, in hopes of crushing the intruder to death, but he escaped from the blows, and all their fury fell upon myself. I began to be outrageous, and had already fretted myself into a copious perspiration, when to my inexpressible delight, the fury of the besieger abated—I heard his hum dying away in the distance—feebly, and more feeble, it just reached mine ear—and I could distinguish it no more.

I flung myself upon my pillow, and after a few moments repose, a gentle slumber began again to steal over my senses—mine eyes closed; the miseries of mankind were again passing rapidly from my recollection; my spirit began again to float through the creation of fancy, and mingle with the visionary wonders of the dreaming world. I was just forgetting myself and all my sorrows, when—"terrible den," the approaching music of my long-legged friend was audible away off in the farthest corner of the room; and, to my utter consternation, I could distinguish the varied hum of several of his companions. The persecuted Frenchman, when he beheld, for the fifth time, the exulting phiz of his waggish pursuer, and exclaimed in the miserable consternation of his half-broken heart, "Begar; here's Monsieur Tonson ree again," did not feel half the vexation experienced from my nocturnal visitor. In the name of comfort, thought I, when will misfortune end? Gently and playfully sported the little fellows, before they thought fit in their wisdom to sit down to supper. They sailed round and round; now retiring, so as to flatter my mind with the vain hope that they were leaving me for ever; and then coming boldly within an inch of my nose. Unhappy man, thought I, upon what trifles does your peace depend. I called my stoicism to my aid, and determined to sleep in spite of them. Yes, thought I, without opening mine eyes, for I was very sleepy with all my vexation, I will not let so small a trouble cause a single sorrowful—I was interrupted in my soliloquy by a sharp sting on my forehead, upon which my philosophy and equanimity vanished, I was compelled to act upon the defensive. I tried to catch some of them as they flew by me. I whirled around the clothes, in hopes of burying them in its folds. Alas! alas! I had no sooner composed myself to rest again, under the foolish supposition that I had driven them away, than the same everlasting hum came whizzing about mine ears, and sailing in the most provoking composure around every feature of my face. At length I sprang out of bed in despair—opened the windows and doors of my room, and paced the floor in angry sleeplessness. A gentle breeze came murmuring into the chamber, and bore away my tormentors. I looked out upon the silent world. The beautiful streaks of morning were just stretching along the eastern sky. I felt a little soothed by the beauty of the scene; my irritation gradually subsided—I flung myself again on my couch, and the bright beams of the morning sun awoke me from a refreshing slumber. When I arose, I happened to cast my eyes upon the white washed ceiling, and there I beheld a mosquito reposing his delicate frame, after the fatigues of the night. I mounted a table and two chairs—softly and carefully raised my extended palm, and gave a most terrible slap. There was blood on the place when I got down, and happening to look in the glass, I found my teeth set together, in a most revengeful manner.

MARY M'CLEOD.

"O'er thee the secret shaft
That wastes at midnight, or the undreaded hour
Of noon, flies harmless; and that very voice
Which thunders terror through the guilty heart,
With tongues of Seraphs whispers peace to thine!"

The wisdom of the Persian adage—"Begin nothing of which thou hast not well considered the end," need not be illustrated better than by the catastrophe of the following melancholy story, in which the eloquence of Sterne could hardly be required to render its termination additionally appalling;—fiction need not lend her aid to render the colouring more attractively impressive.

It was hardly possible to imagine the existence of a more amiable spirit than that which actuated the conduct of the charming Mary M'Cleod. The circle of friends which had assembled at the house of her uncle, at Lubeck, in Danish Pomerania, was composed of rather a large family circle of the youth of both sexes, and they formed a constellation of no ordinary interest; for there was more than one youthful Tyro of the number, of acknowledged talents, and yet none whose acquired principles could render the fondest parent solicitous to prevent the object of its affections from being blasted by its contagious influence. Amid all their dancing and revelry—in the deepest warmth of sparkling disputation—Mary M'Cleod always held a foremost rank; and, without intruding herself forward as the arbitress of any other person's opinion, she in reality gave a tone to that of the whole—for those who could not be convinced by the strength of her reasoning, were always ready to admire the manner in which it was delivered, and were always willing to believe that her eyes said less than her other arguments.

Boasting, one evening, how little she was subject to the impressions of fear, it was resolved, by her thoughtless juvenile associates, that an attempt should be made to expose what they considered vanity in the extreme; with this view, after some consultation, they resolved to introduce into her bed a portion of a human skeleton, with its head reclining upon a pillow, imagining that, when the unfortunate subject of this memoir should undraw the curtains of her bed, an involuntary scream would expose that even her fears could be easily worked upon. They listened, when she had retired from the dance, with no ordinary silence; but for such an exclamation they listened in vain; no scream—not the least sound was heard;—the light of the lamp, too, was extinguished, after a seemingly long interval, and all was apparently buried in a profound, uninterrupted silence. Concluding, therefore, that the fearless maiden had seen the skull, and removed it in silence, they retired with some little disappointment at the ill success of the plan they had laid to alarm her. In truth, Mary M'Cleod had not seen the horrid spectacle; she reposed in the same bed with a human skull, totally ignorant of so appalling a sight, and slept as sound as innocence always will, in peace by its side. The moon rising during the night, shed its rays through the window of her room, full upon the head of the skeleton, presenting an object barely visible to the eye, and for that reason more horribly awful than language could attempt to describe, more especially as there were no objects distinctly present to the eye which could dispel any dreadful illusion which such a spectacle, under such circumstances, could give rise to. Upon this scene, arranged by an unfortunate occurrence of events, as if laid out by the hand of a demon, beamed the bright eye of Mary M'Cleod, as she awoke from a dream—fell like the sparkling eye of an angel hovering over chaos. The shock was too exquisitely horrible to be endured; her fine spirits could not withstand the blow; and but a few minutes sufficed to convert the soaring spirit of her whose wit had lately abashed even the most presumptuous, into that wild horror-stricken essence which directed the wild motions of a beautiful unfortunate maniac.

Listen, said the wife of the worthy host, a physician of long practice in the most benevolent of the sciences—Listen to that curious, long-continued laugh! it is surely the laugh of your favourite, Mary M'Cleod! in a few moments all the inmates of the house were assembled at the door of the room, which contained the beautiful form from whence this wild laughing emanated; it paused for a few moments, and then again proceeded—again it ceased, and all became silent as the grave. Again the laugh went on—no entreaties could stop it—all questions passed away unheeded. It sounds, said one of the servants, as if it was approaching the window. This suggestion roused the weeping energy of the worthy doctor: he hastily burst open the door, and rushed into the room; but his benevolence came too late, for the unfortunate subject of the story had precipitated herself to the ground, and was borne back, by her agonized companions, more dead than alive. The doctor soon foresaw that the injury she had received would render all care useless—death had marked her for his own. The incessant care, however, which was bestowed upon her, brought her from a state of torpor to some little feeling. Her half-dead attendants had yet a hope for the best; but death came on apace—no balm could cure an injured frame, whose angelic spirit was, if possible, still more dreadfully wounded—her days of suffering were therefore few; and on the morning in which she fled into the field where folly never riots, the bright spark of reason returned to her once again—all her powers of mind came back with renewed strength; and calling around her the weeping group, with whom she had parted but a few evenings before, she begged of them to forget her fate as completely as she forgave those who were the unintentional cause of her death. Do not imagine, said the retiring angel—do not for one moment believe that I am sorry that the period is come when I shall be set free from a pilgrimage which might, perhaps, have ended still more unfortunately, and might not have afforded so useful an example of the dangers of working upon the fears of any one; nor should I have been so tried, had not my vanity laid claim to what no one ever possessed—a total absence of all fear. In all future periods, amid the gay scenes of life, when anger shall prompt you, you may recollect to forgive others as Mary M'Cleod forgave you; and if ever my spirit shall be deputed again to visit the earth, I shall, perhaps, be that very attendant spirit, who, at that very moment, will bring back to your recollection the fate of Mary M'Cleod.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

IMPROVED LAMP.

M. Fresnal has lately constructed, in France, lamps on the principle of M. Argand; but having, instead of one circular wick, two or three of such, concentrically placed, and admitting up a free current of air between each wick. The perfect combustion produced by the great heat and free access of air, to the oil thus volatilized at top of the wicks, is said to be productive of very great advantages, as to perfection and economy of light. Flat wicks have for a long time in this country been placed side by side, and near to each other, with similar advantages, by Major Cochrane and others.

VARIETIES.

SWALLOWING SWORDS.

It is not generally known, says a correspondent, that the juggling part of swallowing a sword, which has just produced so fatal a result to an awkward practitioner, and which Ramo Samee previously exhibited with so much eclat, is a very ancient conjuring trick, as appears from the following curious passage in Plutarch; "From hence resulted the pithiness of the Laconian speech, an instance of which we have in King Agis, who, when a pert Athenian laughed at their short swords, and said that the jugglers and mountebanks swallowed such upon the stage, answered him, 'Short as they are, we can give our enemies a home thrust with them.'"—Plutarch's Life of Lycurgus.

SELFISHNESS.

Some persons (we hope the number is small) seem perfectly callous to every thing, which does not immediately touch their own persons. Sympathy is a stranger to their bosoms; love and friendship, and every other generous sentiment, is as incomprehensible to them, as the theory of light and shade is to a blind man.

A man of this description, who was visiting the Vatican at Rome, "after staring some time, with marks of terror, at the Laocoon group, at length recovered himself, exclaiming with a laugh, 'Egad, I was afraid these serpents would have left the fellows they are devouring, and made a snap at me! but I am happy to recollect they are of marble.'"—"I thank you, sir, most heartily," said another spectator, "for putting me in mind of that circumstance; till you mentioned it, I was in agony for these two youths."

A COMMON TUNE.

A lady the other day, who had made some progress on the piano, and whose vanity prompted her to display proficiency on every possible occasion, asked another who was sitting by her, if she knew what she was playing? "I do," answered her friend, "you play it very often." "But what is it called?" "The fool," returned the other.

PORTRAIT.

"Could you not give a little expression to that countenance?" said a gentleman to an eminent English painter, who showed him a portrait that he had just finished; "I have made that attempt already," replied the painter, "but, what the picture gained in expression, it lost in likeness; and by the time there was a little common sense in the countenance, nobody knew for whom it was intended. I was obliged, therefore, to make an entire new picture, with the face perfectly like, and perfectly meaningless as you see it."

KEEP COOL.

Much good advice is given in these two words—keep cool. There is an old proverb which says, "When Passion takes the helm, the ship is in danger;" and few persons, we believe act from the impulse of feeling, without subsequent regret. "Give me the man, (says Hamlet) who is not passion's slave, and I will wear him in my heart." We presume our readers recollect the advice of the philosopher Athenodorus to Cæsar, when the former was about retiring from court, on account of his great age. "Remember, Cæsar, (said he) whenever you are angry, that you say or do nothing, until you have distinctly repeated to yourself the four and twenty letters of the alphabet." Upon this (says the historian) Cæsar, catching him hastily by the hand, cried out, "Stay, stay, Athenodorus! I have need of thy presence longer still;" and so detained him another year. This incident is celebrated by the ancients as a rule of excellent wisdom, and does high honour to this intrepid and honest counsellor to the world's master.

DOMESTIC YEAST.

Ladies who are in the habit (and a most laudable and comfortable habit it is) of making domestic bread, cake, &c. are informed that they can easily manufacture their own yeast, by attending to the following directions: boil one pound of good flour, a quarter of a pound of brown sugar, and a little salt, in two gallons of water, for one hour. When milk warm, bottle it and cork it close. It will be fit for use in twenty-four hours. One pint of this yeast will make eighteen pounds of bread.

CHARLOTTE AND WERTER.

A lady sometime ago took her daughter to the boarding-school for the purpose of education, when, after the first salutations were over, the matron fixed her eyes on some worked-picture subjects in the parlour, and pointing out one more attractive than the rest, asked, "What is that?" "That, (replied the lady of the school) is Charlotte at the tomb of Werter." "Vell, I sww, (rejoined the cockney) it is wassly beautiful! Betsy, my dear, you shall work Charlotte at the Tomb of Vater."

THE DANDIES.

That race of nondescript animals, which are now called dandies, or exquisites, were formerly called fops, and macaroni. The latter appellation arose from the following circumstance: "Polengio Theophilus, of Mantua, an Italian poet, gave the name of Macaroni to one of his poems, from an Italian cake, which is sweet to the taste, but has not the least alimentary virtue; palliating (on the contrary) the appetite, and cloying the stomach. These idle poems, thus called, consisting of buffoonery, became the reigning taste in Italy and France; Gill, at last, every thing insipid, contemptible, and ridiculous, in character, dress, or behaviour, was finally summed up in the despicable appellation of a macaroni, or a fop."

OIL GAS.

At a late meeting of the Edinburgh Oil Gas Company, Sir Walter Scott said, that he had had three months' experience of Oil Gas light in his house at Abbotsford, and he could assure the meeting, that nothing could be more pleasant, more useful, safe, and economical. He was sure the expense was not the twentieth part of what it formerly cost him for oil and candles. The light itself was greatly superior, was extremely cleanly, saved much trouble to servants, and did not produce the least smell, or the least injury. Not only could it be used in kitchens and dining-rooms, but it was extremely useful in bed-rooms, where a flame could be kept up during the whole night so minute as to be scarcely perceptible, which could be enlarged to a powerful light in an instant at any hour when wanted. It was also very safe, at least it was much safer than common lights, for it was not carried from place to place as common lights were, and unless combustibles were brought to it no danger could arise. The light was indeed so convenient, cheap, and delightful, that were it once introduced, he was convinced it would be used within two years in every private house in Edinburgh.

NORTHERN EXPEDITION.

Such extraordinary interest has been excited by Captain Parry's two Voyages, in search of a North-West passage, that any event having the least connexion with so adventurous an enterprise must be interesting. We are really glad to inform our readers that such an event has happened in the arrival, in this town, of two Esquimaux Indians, from Baffin's Bay. They are the only natives of that frozen region which are to be found on our hospitable shores.—They are about twenty-five years of age, not fair indeed, but not disagreeable in feature and expression. Their hair is a jet black, and nearly as strong as horse hair—Their dresses are singular, as might be expected, and any lady desirous of seeing a new fashion, may behold in the female's attire, one, which if very ambitious of novelty and notoriety, she may adopt with very little chance of having her example followed. The man exhibits himself in his canoe, which seems as secure as a life-boat, it being almost impossible to sink it. His fishing tackle, the dart with which he kills his food, his warlike weapons, sledge, and other articles of comfort, convenience, and defence, furnish half an hour's pleasant inspection for the curious as well as the inquisitive admirer of what is connected with the history of man. We have visited these very interesting persons, and we can without hesitation say, that we were gratified with what we saw, and should have been sorry if from neglect or carelessness we had not seen them. We shall now read with greater pleasure the descriptions which Captain Parry, Franklin and others give of the Northern people, their habits and amusements, for every such spectacle tends to enlarge the mind, and enables it the better to comprehend what is related. These Esquimaux contrive to amuse themselves with cards and toys; they can read a little; they have enjoyed tolerable health, except in the heat of summer, and they appreciate the pleasures of a good fire. They are accompanied by the Captain who brought them to England, and who is very polite in satisfying the enquiries of visitors.—These curiosities may be seen at the Exchange Rooms, Exchange-Street, from 11 till 3 in the Morning, and from 5 till 9 in the Evening.—Admittance 1s. CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR,

SIR.—The new Institution, concerning which such exertions appeared lately to be making and such expectations entertained, seems to be now almost forgotten. I hope it will not, however, be neglected. Any of your readers, who know any thing of the proceedings of the Committee which has been formed for promoting the undertaking, would, I am sure, perform an acceptable service to many of their townsmen by affording some statements upon the subject.

There appears to be much contrariety of opinion respecting a suitable place for the Institution. This point is, certainly, one of great importance. There are a few particular motives to the building that ought to be kept in view by those who have any influence in the matter.

If lectures be connected with the Institution, a noisy part of the town could have no recommendation which could be a compensation for this advantage. In reference to this particular the building in King-street appeared to have been judiciously selected. The piece of land in Mosley-street is, perhaps, in this respect, still better.

As Manchester contains an increasing population, and as the desire for information seems to increase still more rapidly, the edifice ought to be made, at first, so capacious as to accommodate more persons than could, for some time, be reckoned upon.

I have heard it mentioned in conversation that there was, some time ago, an intention to remove our Infirmary to a more airy situation. If the intention has not been altogether given up, the wants of the new Institution might, I think, supply an additional motive for the proposed removal.

The ultimate prosperity of the Institution would, as some of your correspondents have clearly shewn, be greatly promoted by abridging the privileges of the governors in respect to the lectures. Those who contend for the present arrangements on this point, (and I believe they are very few in number) should be reminded of the fable of the dog and the shadow. They certainly defeat their own objects. When it is too late they may see and lament their error.

From the tardiness of the proceedings it does not appear likely that the Institution will be ready for use in the course of next winter. It would, therefore, be probably desirable that a temporary place should be procured for the purposes of the Institution.

It seems to me that it would be of service to the new establishment if you could publish occasional reports of the proceedings of meetings on the subject. There can be no reasonable motive for reserve; and there would be an obvious advantage in keeping up public attention in reference to the project. In this particular your publication deserves credit for having done much. You have furnished the best letters which have been written on the occasion; and you have produced, I believe, a greater number of articles upon the subject than all the other Manchester papers put together. I hope you will find your very laudable labours and encouragement in this case to be an occasion of future congratulation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

In answer to R. L.'s note we have only to say that we decline offering any remarks of our own concerning Debating Societies.—We are of opinion, indeed, that they are good things when well conducted.—The ability to deliver our argument with ease and fluency, which can only be acquired by proper study, is certainly a very desirable attainment.—Oratory has, perhaps, been too much neglected in Manchester.—This is the reason that our meetings on public occasions, whether on the subject of politics, learning, or religion, excite so little interest.—We shall be glad to receive any articles respecting Debating Societies from some of our correspondents. For the beautiful little poem, by Mrs. Barbauld, inserted in the present Iris, we acknowledge ourselves indebted to the same gentleman who favoured us with a copy of her Lament on Life, both written in her 80th year. Neither of these poems, we have reason to believe, was ever printed before. We have to acknowledge communications from Ignatio; H. W. R.; Peter; Quis; I. K.; and P. W. H.

Those subscribers who intend binding the present volume of the Iris, and whose sets are incomplete, are requested to make early application for the deficiencies, as several of the numbers are nearly sold out.

MANNER.

Refine the taste, and elevate the mind.

I did not like it—there was something so imperative in the tone—so harsh and haughty; as though he had seen ill nature in my face, and determined to frighten me into respect. It was against mine importance—against mine honour—and (for I am an exceeding fiery-tempered old gentleman) mine honour took the alarm immediately. If he had only said, “Be so good, sir, as to get off my toe;” or, “Please not tread upon my foot, sir;” or if he had softened the command into something like a request, it would have been well: but sternly and angrily, “Get off of my toe! will you?” By all the dear courtesies of life, it was the most ungenerous way of asking a favour he could possibly have chosen.

I stepped aside, however, for I would not wantonly torture even a worm; but I did not feel at all satisfied with myself or him. Indeed, Mr. Editor, I was very angry, and the worst of it was, I did not know how to vent my spleen. I would have knocked him down; but he was a huge square-shouldered fellow, with a hand like a giant. Besides, if I had punished him as he deserved, there’s the law. And report, too—what would my friends say, if I should knock a man down, because he asked me not to tread upon his foot? No, I would not create as much confusion in the room: but I soon after, to my great satisfaction, found an opportunity to tell him, “You must pull off your hat, sir!” and made him so angry, that even to this day, when we pass each other in the street, we both hold up our heads so high, and look as fierce, as we possibly can. Now all this would have been prevented, had he only possessed the manner of a true gentleman, and said, “Be so kind, sir, as to stand off my foot.”

Be assured, Mr. Editor, there is something in the manner in which a word is said, or an action performed, that may entirely change its signification. An expression of the lip, a passing blush upon the cheek, a single glance from the eye, may soften the harshed word into a kindness, or a positive refusal into a reward as great as the one denied.

When Queen Elizabeth was leaning her royal ear to catch the fascinating whispers of the noble Leicester, we are told by a great writer, that she drew up her form in all its dignity, as she said, “No, Leicester, it can never, never be.” One would suppose that the word of England’s queen would have passed with her subjects; but there was a rich tenderness that trembled in her voice—a fond, lingering, tell-tale, something that rioted in her down-cast eye—a magic manner breathing around her, that flung out golden favours, in rich profusion, to the man she loved, and created hopes too powerful for even her words to destroy.

There are some persons in this world, who seem created with a thousand fairy enchantments woven around them. Say what they will—do what they will—scold, frown, or applaud—there is still the same beautiful manner, softening and brightening in every word, and breathing its dear, mysterious influence in every look. Such a one was my niece, Caroline M——.

A few years ago, I found it necessary to leave my home; and the day before my departure, I rode up to her summer residence, to pay my farewell visit to her, and her sister Annette. I recollect the day well: it was a beautiful summer afternoon, as we all stood upon the long piazza, with my good horse pawning in impatience for my return. The sun gleamed upon us through the trees, that waved their rich foilage around the house. The honey-suckle, that had clambered up one of the white columns, like the tender caresses of a fond child reposing its rosy cheek upon the bosom of its mother, flung out rich perfume to the air. There were blushing roses clustering around us; and, as I kissed cheeks as beautiful as they, I felt myself gradually yielding to the influence of the scene. The rougher and less elevated reflections of my mind passed away, and I felt the enthusiasm and ardent spirit of times long gone by, stealing with all its witcheries upon my foolish old heart. I was awake to every impression, and then I observed the difference between the manner of Caroline and Annette.

Annette was a more cold and stately beauty than her sister. Her features, indeed, were regular; her complexion was fair and fine, and her eye large and piercing; but there was a passionless hauteur in her demeanour, a cold stoical character in all her beauty, that I felt new pleasure in turning to look on the gay, pretty Caroline.

She was different from Annette—as much so, as the monarch eagle, that wings its way, stately and proudly, through sunshine and cloud, is unlike the beautiful dove that would nestle in the bosom of every being it loved. She was not so tall as her sister. There was more of the rose in her cheek; she smiled oftener; and her eye, though not so large and pensive as Annette’s, was far, far more lively and expressive. There was a brightening tenderness in them that went to the heart—a sweetness,

“Now here, and now there, giving warmth as it flies
“From the lips to the cheeks, and the cheeks to the eyes.”

animated her beautiful face, and made her that dear, fascinating being that no one could look upon but love.

With the freedom of an old uncle, I kissed Annette’s cheek, when I left her; and her thin, well-formed lips spoke words, “Good by, uncle, I hope soon to see you again,” with their accustomed smile: but it had not the charm—there was no magic in it—it did not go so direct to the heart as to start the tear into my eye.

She could not have said much more to a spindle-shanked old gentleman like myself; but she might have said it differently. She could have given a little more tenderness to the last words she might ever speak to her old uncle. But no; her lips wore the same character as it was wont to; and the last tones of her undisturbed voice died away as coolly upon mine ear as though we had parted but for a single day!

It was not so with Caroline, when she pressed the hand I extended to her, and ‘with a smile on her lip, and a tear in her eye,’ bade the last adieu to her poor uncle. The dear girl tried to smile away her grief, and be cheerful at her parting; but it would not do—the big tear came unbidden to her eye, and her silver voice was rich with all the tender affection of a lovely and devoted girl. There was a manner in her looks that showed how different a “good by” might be. I kissed away the tear from her cheek, as I drew her towards me, and pressed her in my arms. Visions of past times began to float in mine imagination. I recollected the bright scenes of my early loves; when young, and handsome, and gay, I had folded others in my arms, and kissed the fond tears from cheeks as beautiful as hers. I began to feel a melting in my own bosom; and, old and gray-headed as I was, I do actually believe that I was half in love with Caroline’s own dear self.

Be that as it may, the sun was departing in solitary grandeur behind the western hills, when I broke from the fascinations of Caroline’s manner. I kissed her dear lip as it said “Good by,” wiped away a tear, said a single “God bless you,” and the next moment was on my swift horse, dashing at full gallop down a steep hill, with Caroline’s “good by” still echoing, with all its soft, rich tenderness, in mine ear.

When I was tossing on the midnight deep, far from that lovely scene, I often lulled myself into a slumber by dwelling on the simple sweetness of Caroline’s “good by.”

THEODORE.

TO YOUTH.

Here Truth discards the dress which Fiction lent,
And clothes herself in sober argument.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SYSTEM IN EARLY PURSUITS.

THE language of experience may be spoken with boldness. It is the duty of every man to lay the gleanings of his observation, as well as his after-thoughts upon scenes in which he has been a principal actor, before those, who, younger than himself, are travelling after him, with an eagerness indicative of credulity, and the want of a settled aim.

Arrived at a period of life when early actions and early projects appear in their proper light, and when the world and man’s relative situation in it, are seen under the guidance of reason and truth, I deem it my privilege, as well as my duty, plainly and sincerely to offer to those who have yet to tread the ground which I have passed, a few items of caution and advice.

With a feeling of the deepest interest, I would warn the ardent, aspiring youth, of the quicksands on which my hopes, my peace, and almost every blessing of existence, except honour, have been jeopardized. I address myself to every heart just opening to the emotions of ambition; to all whose generous natures pant for eminence and honourable distinction; to all who can feel that the good Creator in forming man after His own bright image, intended that His creature should glorify Him by the practice of virtue, and should secure peace of conscience by industry and usefulness.

To prove the sincerity of my intentions, I do some violence to my pride by giving, for the benefit of my young readers, my own (I fear not uncommon) history.

Like many others, my father's good name, a healthy constitution, and a warm heart, were my only inheritance; of consequence I was exposed to many privations and sorrows. But life was new; the world beautiful; my heart was pure, and light, and innocent; and often, when a tear bedimmed one cheek, the smile of joy illumined the other. My friends told me that I was destined to build up my own fortune, or to starve. But inspired by an active enthusiasm I seldom permitted gloomy thoughts to shroud the fair sunshine of my mind. Through a kind Providence, opportunities of a competent education offered. They were cheerfully embraced; and during those most blessed days of existence, the summer days, when the whistling school-boy parades his well-stored satchel, I can say without vanity, that I had no competitor more industrious or more eager to excel.

My labours were rewarded in the acquirement of useful practical knowledge; my friends were pleased, and, at the age of fifteen, the path of future travel was marked out for me; it seemed devious, rugged, and beset with difficulties; but conscious of the necessity, and also, conscious that perseverance and application would make all things easy, I ventured upon the path, elate and confident. I was ambitious, patient of fatigue, and I knew that, upon myself alone depended the character of my future fortunes. My friends declared that my genius would ensure prosperity; would bend all circumstances to its purpose: they praised my ardour; they applauded my assiduity. I felt an internal conviction that their applause was just; that their praises were deserved. The feeling was sweet, and it urged me on to higher exertion.

Thus passed three years delightfully and honourably. My prospects were bright as the untouched sun! Already, in beautiful perspective, I beheld the sequestered cottage, where, surrounded by verdure and blossom—blessed with peace of soul—soothed by the smile of chaste affection, and lulled by the music of the happy family. I should calmly pass the closing hours of life, rewarded by my own reflections; esteemed, beloved, and spoken of by the virtuous; moderately using the blessings which early industry had procured.

Fair visions of an innocent heart! bright creations of youth's buoyant fancy! like light that dances on a summer sea, ye illumined while ye adorned, but ye passed fleetly and for ever, like stars that set in winter clouds!

Behold the picture reversed. "Why have those talents availed you nothing? Why have friends been estranged, hopes destroyed, and the sky of life enwrapped in storm?" These are questions, my young reader, which naturally arise in your mind; and, at the age of twenty-four, with a shattered constitution, a purse untenanted, and aimless as to the future, I am prepared in sorrow, and in remorse to answer them.

Those questions can be solved by one sentence—My heart was good in its intentions, but I wanted system in business, and stability of character. As time rolled on, and my faculties expanded, the illusive charms of fancy captivated me, and instead of pursuing with enthusiasm, the profession selected by kind friends, and approved by my own feelings, I wandered forth among the wilds of literature, and the weed-grown wildfeness of the world, and strove to attain to perfection in all things; and thus, deserting the study which had once been my pride, I became as every person pursuing a similar course must become, superficial in all things. Method became irksome to me—the details of the business by which I was to live were viewed by me as galling chains upon my aspiring mind—my thoughts, no longer turned towards one object, restive and impatient, strayed to other things, and in the fatal infatuation of the moment, I stigmatized my more confined and industrious competitors as poor plodding wretches, whose souls glanced not beyond the vulgar sphere of business, with expressions equally profound or silly, just as the reader pleases.

Instead, as was once my custom, of devoting my hours of leisure to such publications as tend to develop the intricacies of real life—to better the heart by unfolding to its view the unassailable beauties of truth, or such as have an immediate reference to the essential arts and sciences, and attempt the faculties of man to the performance of the duties of his station, I now read, with indiscriminate avidity, abominable verse, or questionable poetry; or revelled, with the delirium of a voluptuary, among the empoisoning flowers of romance. I am not averse from your unbending the mind over such reading; but, feelingly, would say, beware of its tyranny! Fatal was its influence to me! and it will ever prove the bane of the enthusiast, if his propensities are not governed by the strong arm of judgment.

Allowing this species of writing to gain a complete ascendency, I now can feel was the one irretrievable mistake of my life; for, when convinced by maturer reason that man does not inhabit a world of the imagination; that fancy and fiction are the very antipodes of philosophy and fact, I find it impossible to correct the evil. Such reading acted upon my ardent temperament like fire upon flax. I became a poet, (at least in my own estimation,) and flourished away in all the glory and rapture of newspaper immortality. Nothing in the form of paper escaped the inflictions of my insatiate pen. I wrote verses in day-books and ledgers; I cut verses upon trees, and many a vine-clad bower bore witness to the fertility of my genius. I had an hundred projects in my head at once—I commenced a novel, wrote half of a tragedy, and a few scraps of a comedy; I also finished a melodrama, which some of my kind friends—"genuine men of taste," pronounced superior to the "Seige of Tripoli," or even that sounding work for posterity, the "Mountain Torrent!"—Oh! then how sweet it was to hear the black-eyed maiden whisper to her simpering swain, "there he goes," the young poet; my heart was full of happiness to hear even a dustman sing my latest song!

But the sphere of poetry was now too confined. I turned politician, and was ever received with the most unbounded applause at many places, which shall be nameless. I wrote circulars, distributed tickets, harangued at the polls, and punctually attended all those "numerous and respectable" general meetings, which occurred for the time being. There was no place where the voice of debate could be heard, where I was not. I was clapped on the shoulder by the "men of genius" who led our party, with the honied expression of "a very promising young man." When I could not defeat my opponents by sound argument, and the irresistible force of calm reasoning, I, like many other "honourable men" of the day, resorted to noisy declamation, until, unable to make themselves heard they would leave the field, conquered by the roar of my artillery. I was praised—was invited to dine with the "men of genius" with what a charming condescension they would then notice my unstudied jests! how ready to give way to my arguments! how willing to listen! In every sentence which I then uttered, they discovered the wit of Foote, or the elegance and force of Sheridan! How often have I been taken most cordially by the hand by Judges, Squires, nay even by Governors. How often has my coat of sober black been lighted by the smile of some great man. In those days of splendid projects I had many friends: "they all foretold the progress I should make," and promised liberally. I was exalted above business—nonsense! it was contemptible, low, mean. "Nature intended you for something greater," they all said; they were my friends, I was, in my own opinion, the Atlas of the political world. I aspired to all the dignities, and to all the immunities of an office: which, in these times, seems to consist in much self-importance, many lucious dinners, and little to do.

But—there is a time and a season for all things, says the wise Solomon. He speaks truth. The purposes of our "men of genius," and also of our "great men," were answered; a change came over the aspect of my affairs, like a cloud over the brightness and beauty of the heavens. I began to observe a mysterious alteration in the deportment of my political friends towards me; my pride was wounded, my fears took the alarm; they passed me with faces averted; there were no more smiling greetings from camp windows—no more complaisant nodding, exciting the envy of the mere plebeian ruff; their doors and their hearts, were then exactly closed against such as me; they crossed the street whenever their eyes would encounter mine and nothing could insult them more than to say that a young man, without money, and without the claims of family, had ever dined, or associated with them! If they spoke of me, it was but to say, "He is a silly enthusiast," "he has wasted his time, his talents, and his health in the service of the party;" "it is strange that every poor assistant should expect us to notice him after the war is over!" "What a fool! he had better have attended to his business, and permitted richer men to embark upon the sea of politics." "Pitiful fool! why he must starve or beg; well, let him, it will teach others a useful lesson." Such was the language of cold-hearted baseness, which they then held—I shuddered. I started, I awoke!**

THE PRIMROSE.

Hush'd to repose the insidious blast

In distant murmurs dies away,
I mark the melting snow-drift's waste,
Dissolv'd by Sol's untimely ray.

Fallacious verdure decks the mold,
The woodlark prunes his trembling wing.
The hawthorn's silken buds unfold,
And fondly hail a dubious spring.

Yet soon, on clouds tempestuous borne,
The scowling war shall winter wage.
Again shall drooping nature mourn,
Assail'd with aggravated rage.

Child of a Beam! in evil hour
Yon primrose lifts its infant head:
Ill-fated—unsuspecting flow'r,
Why leave thy genial mossy bed!

Ere long, the treacherous parent ray
That bade thy opening beauties bloom,
Shall see that tender form decay,
Regardless of a nursing's doom.

Rude blasts shall wound thy gentle head,
Chill frosts thy smiling face deform;
And Innocence in vain may plead
To save thee from the ruthless storm.

As here—the muse affects the shade,
Far from the gay world's flippant throng,
Humblest of flowers that deck the glade!
Thy fate suggests the moral song.

Oft as Imposture weaves the lure
The unguarded bosom to betray;
Designing Caution laughs secure,
While simple Feeling, falls a prey.

Φ

A WEEK IN LONDON.

(Concluded from our last.)

The Scenes in the King's Bench, are, however, widely different to those of some other prisons, and Newgate presented to us a dreadful sight, although a recent classification of the prisoners has added much to the comfort and discipline of the place. Men and women were umbled together in one general mass, and it was truly painful to see and contemplate, the contrasts. Here was a delicate female incarcerated for a crime which the villany of seduction, and her consequent exclusion from her relations, had caused her to commit, pining in hopeless and unavailing sorrow;—before her a wretch ardened by repeated iniquities, and bronzed by innumerable transgressions, making a mock of her miseries, whilst all the coarse indelicacies of brutal auxiliaries were brought in aid of rounding a heart, torn by conflicting passions, and which, I will venture to affirm, was dissolving itself into penitence through tears of her heart's blood. I took this helpless individual aside, or rather led her—her poor frame was exhausted—she told me, in language not to be understood, but coupled with the greatest delicacy, of her first fall, of her past sorrow, and her present misery. Would any of your readers believe, that Man, the designed protector of woman, could add to the tortures of an unhappy female? but I mention this afflicting interview, not because it is still reeking on my memory, but to convince your readers what sorry it is possible to find in London. I do not wish to chronicle an act which every Man would have done, but to demonstrate the sad association of inebriety with misfortune—too often med as a practice, instead of being pitied as a fault.—I offered her a few shillings, which she used as perfect dross to her, but taking my id, and looking wistfully in my face said, "Will you my dear friend bring me in a drop of rum?"—I could not refuse—it was a comfort—a destruction—I went out and brought her a bane and antidote" she laid herself down on her wretched couch, and thus her slumber elicited by artificial, which no natural means could produce,

"Oh think not ye who sober are
That they who drink are lost to shame,
Look at the soul's distressing war,
And do not vilify their name."

have been perhaps too tedious, but to those our readers who may chance to go to London, I could wish to recommend, whenever you would go from the city to Westminster, the safest and the cheapest way is to take a boat from the Stairs at any of the nearest bridges; united to much personal comfort, the jostling of that busy scene in the Strand is avoided, and you are there in one fourth of the time—citizens from their birth had never found it out till I informed them, for with all their assumed consequence, and outside importance, they are the most shallow of all men I ever met in my travels. An example will illustrate this, though accompanied with some merriment:—We were passing down the Thames with other boats, and a gentleman had the tail of his coat in the water, another, in the true cockney phraseology called out, but in a sudden and alarming manner from the boat behind, "La! sir, your coat's on fire!" It had the intended effect to alarm the subject of the accident, but though he had not an idea beyond this thought, he was "applauded to the very echo," "which" did "applaud again!"

And now, Sir, in general terms, I must bring my descriptive account to a close, by observing that, on all occasions, an especial regard should be paid to the pocket—whether by legitimate or illegitimate depredators. Sorry I am, as an Englishman, to say, that London is a den of thieves. Look at the late melancholy catastrophe,—but I trust you have no such readers, and yet as a public Journalist, it is an imperative duty to run the chance and to tell them:

"Do what ye will ye sons of sorrow,
Beg, and have given you—but to plot and rob
Under a specious countenance, to spoil a man
Who never meant it you—Oh! it is base,
And for myself—those who such desolation wrought
To unoffending wife, and prattling child,
I would pursue them to the world's last verge
And make a gibbet of the first met tree:
And if he could not meet the sword of justice
I'd draw one of my own,—and of myself
Turn executioner."

The traveller should not miss, if it be open, Vauxhall—this enchanting place composed of a walled forest, the trees of which are lighted by myriads of lamps, has more resemblance to fairy stories than the fact. A beautiful Orchestra with a fine organ, is at the entrance, and the first rate singers are procured, in the intervals, and at appropriate stations are placed bands—some in Chinese dresses—some in Persian—but all the scenery is made to correspond with their habits, and the traveller will learn here, to his cost, the trite meaning of a "Vauxhall Slice." Bethlehem, or Bedlam Hospital is worth an introduction to, and on its gates are placed two excellent cut stone figures of Melancholy and raging madness—but let those who enter here study their nerves,—mine were strong then, but every one was unstrung. Before I conclude, and recommend the lonely environs of London, Kensington, Highgate, and Hamstead, to the notice of your friends, I must mention (but who has not heard of the "Lass of Richmond Hill." I made a literary visit there to the celebrated Dr. Walcot, better known by the name of "Peter Pindar"—and saw the individual alluded to in the song, she by no means answered the representation. The venerable and eccentric poet received my self-introductory note with much civility, and though completely dark in his optics, possessed all the fire of his writings and soon after we left, was gathered to the "great majority."

I have been hasty and unconnected, but I hope not uninteresting. Scenes of "real life" make an impression above those of fiction. If it has contributed to the amusement of your readers, I am content. Eloquence cannot be expected to be allied with description, and the delineation of such a world is not to be condensed but with difficulty! one merit, at all events will attach to it, that of originality and truth!

and as I began, so I end, by the observation of Prince Blucher, "There is but one London in the world!"

MR. EDITOR,—Agreeably to your request, I transcribe, with great pleasure, for insertion in your next Iris, the following excellent Fable, by Dr. Cotton, entitled, The Bee, the Ant, and the Sparrow. Some of your readers may possibly have formed a most imperfect idea of this Fable, from having seen only a short extract from it, in one of Mr. Lindley Murray's publications, his Introduction to the English Reader. He has called it, The Bee and the Ant, or the advantages of diligence and application in early years; omitting entirely the remainder of the fable, which constitutes, indeed, the main part of it, the Sparrow, being contrasted with the manners and habits of the Bee and the Ant,—

As worthless and as vain a thing,
Perhaps, as ever wore a wing!

There is, in fact, a fourth party concerned,—though not distinctly mentioned by the Author in his Dramatis Personæ, being introduced, at the end of the piece, without the reader being aware that another Character was necessary to the complete denouement of this little dramatic poem.

There is also another request of yours, it is my intention, after much cogitation, to comply with, which is, to furnish your readers with a list of all the answers to various Enigmas and Charades, which have been inserted, from time to time, without solution, in the first and present volumes of The Manchester Iris. I mean to arrange these Answers, alphabetically, in order that your readers may still exercise their ingenuity in appropriating them respectively to the different compositions to which they severally belong.

Yours very truly,

December 18, 1823.

THE BEE, THE ANT, AND THE SPARROW.

A FABLE.

By Dr. Cotton, Author of The Fireside, and various other popular poems.

Early one dewy summer's morn,
A Bee ranged o'er the verdant lawn;
Studious to husband every hour,
And make the most of every flower.
Nimble from stalk to stalk she flies,
And loads with yellow wax her thighs;
With which the artist builds her comb,
And keeps all tight and warm at home:
Or from the cowslip's golden bells
Sucks honey to enrich her cells;
Or every tempting rose pursues,
Or sips the lily's fragrant dews;
Yet never robs the shining bloom,
Or of its beauty, or perfume.
Thus she discharged, in every way,
The various duties of the day.

It chanced a frugal Ant was near,
Whose brow was furrow'd o'er by care.
A great economist was she,
Nor less laborious than the Bee:
By pensive parents often taught
What ills arise from want of thought;
That poverty on sloth attends,—
On poverty, the loss of friends.
Hence every day the Ant is found
With anxious steps to tread the ground;
With curious search to trace the grain,
And drag the heavy load with pain.

The active Bee with pleasure saw
The Ant fulfil her parents' law.

Ab! Sister labourer, says she,
How very fortunate are we!
Who, taught in infancy to know
The comforts which from labour flow,
Are independent of the great,
Nor know the wants of pride and state.
Why is our food so very sweet?
Because we earn before we eat.
Why are our wants so very few?
Because we nature's calls pursue.
Whence our complacency of mind?
Because we act our parts assigned.
Have we incessant tasks to do?
Is not all nature busy too?
Does not the sun, with constant pace,
Persist to run his annual race?
Do not the stars, that shine so bright,
Renew their courses every night?
Does not the ox obedient bow
His patient neck, and draw the plough?
Or when did e'er the generous steed
Withhold his labour or his speed?
If you all nature's system scan,
The only idle thing—is man.

A wanton Sparrow long'd to hear
Their sage discourse, and straight drew near.
The Bird was talkative and loud,
And very pert, and very proud;
As worthless and as vain a thing,
Perhaps, as ever wore a wing.
She found, as on a spray she sat,
The little Friends were deep in chat;
That virtue was their favourite theme,
And toil and probity their scheme.
Such talk was hateful to her breast;
She thought them arrant prudes at best.
When, to display her naughty mind,
Hunger with cruelty combin'd,
She viewed the Ant with savage eyes,
And hopp'd, and hopp'd, to snatch her prize.
The Bee, who watch'd her opening bill,
And guess'd her fell design to kill,
Ask'd her, from what her anger rose,
And why she treated Ants as foes?

The sparrow her reply began,
And thus the conversation ran—
Whenever I'm disposed to dine,
I think the whole creation mine;
That I'm a bird of high degree,
And every insect made for me.
Hence oft I search the emmet brood,
(For emmets are delicious food,)
And oft, in wantonness and play,
I slay ten thousand in a day.
For truth it is, without disguise,
That I love mischief as my eyes.

Oh! fie! the honest Bee replied,
I fear you make base men your guide;
Of every creature, sure the worst,
Though in creation's scale the first!
Ungrateful man! 'Tis strange he thrives,
Who burns the bees, to rob their hives!
I hate his vile administration,
And so do all the emmet nation.
What fatal foes to birds are men,
Quite to the eagle from the wren!
O! do not man's example take,
Who mischief do, for mischief's sake;
But spare the Ant!—Her worth demands
Esteem and friendship at your hands.
A mind, with every virtue blest,
Must raise compassion in your breast.

Virtue! rejoind'd the sneering bird,
Where did you learn that gothic word?
Since I was hatch'd, I never heard
That virtue was at all rever'd.
But say it was the ancient's claim,—
Yet moderns disavow the name:
Unless, my dear, you read romances,
I cannot comprehend your fancies.
Virtue in fairy tales is seen
To play the goddess, or the queen;
But what's a queen without the power?
Or beauty, child, without a dower?
Yet this is all that virtue brags,
At best 'tis only worth in rags.

Such whims my very heart derides:
Indeed, you make me burst my sides.
Trust me, Miss Bee,—to speak the truth,
I've copied men from earliest youth;
The same our taste, the same our school,
Passion and appetite our rule;
And call me bird, or call me sinner,—
I'll ne'er forego my sport or dinner.

A prowling Cat the miscreant spies,
And wide expands her amber eyes:
Near, and more near, Grimalkin draws,—
She wags her tail, pretends her paws;
Then, springing on her thoughtless prey,
She bore the vicious bird away.
Thus, in her cruelty and pride,
The wicked, wanton Sparrow died.

MANCHESTER.—AN ALEGORY.

A FRAGMENT.

—“If at great things thou wouldst arrive
Get riches first, get wealth, and treasure heap,
Not difficult, if thou hearken to me:
Riches are mine, fortune is in my hand;
They whom I favour thrive in wealth again.”

Milton's Paradise Regained.

Commerce volant.—As o'er Albion's Isle, the Goddess dived her trackless way extramundane! where the sub-tile æther, circulating in pristine pureness, before it is tainted with miasms, commixing from this—terrestrial sphere:—with eyes despicant, thus in conference communicative, addressed her attendant followers.

“Behold! O Profit and Perseverence, the destined spot; the surcease of all our perplexity and search,— here we will increase a Town; and by our combined exertions, raise her to the climax of commercial influence and unbounded wealth; no spot shall be hallowed by our sacred presence, no town shall stretch forth her imploing arms, in piteous invitation towards us, whom we will regard with propitiousness; no more will we be compelled to seek out an appropriate habitation, by the inertness and effeminacy of mankind;—this shall be our residence, and here through a long series of prosperous years, perchance for ever, we will cling adhesive, and bless the land with fertility.”

Thus spoke the all bounteous Goddess—her two companions respondent said:—

“Whatever was her gubernative will, that they would staunchly adhere to, what portion of earth, she chose to raise her imperial throne, there would they with affectionate regard, and loyal hearts, serve faithfully and with becoming submissiveness.”

With wings descendant; from her elevated altitude where nestling with the skies, she had brooded on her design, in preconsciousness of future greatness—on the joyous land bounded, with her accompanying associates.

No sooner were they arrived at the destined spot, than multitudes congregating, rent the air with loud ac-claims; the hills danced with joy as accipiens, the echoes vibrated in tremulous windings amongst their deepened cavities, and prolonged the joyous sounds; intoxicated with wildest pleasure at the unexpected blessing, the multitude proclaim her Queen; and with heartfelt “vivas” draw her with her two ministers on a triumphal throne, through their then smoky and irregular streets.

Mephitical Poverty heard of the unexpected and un-wished arrival in her territories, of the omnipotent Queen, at whose approach she stalked forth in pompous array, with her two grim and tattered ministers, Misery and Baddebt, to render up her domain, into the hands of Commerce. Surrounded by the exulting populace, the two mighty personages met in the street, and bending low, as to an acknowledged superior, Poverty presented the submission of the Town, which the Queen receiving, graciously condescended partially to raise from degrading servility; cringing Poverty half rising from her lowly posture with look apient by fright, would have addressed her dethroner, but no sooner did she behold in momentary gaze, that countenance, irradi-ated with divine effulgence, than with demoniac shriek, flashed this portion of earth, and winged her way to countries where she should be received with comity and reign despotic.

Not thus were Misery and Baddebt expelled, the former, still feeling a passionate regard for his late subjects, could not be ejected from the Town by all the cogent laws enforced against him, by the strenuous hand of the Queen and her zealous ministers, but still drops on his wretched existence, in the suburbs of this populous place, under the varying forms of Discontent, likeness, or Drunkenness.

The nobles, who, previously to the arrival of Commerce, had monopolised the profits arising from certain causes, were averse to sudden innovations, and dissembled totally from the democratic spirit which had placed Commerce so suddenly on the throne, without a resistance worthy their former aristocratic power; they, therefore, secretly fomented dissensions between the Queen and her ministers. Baddebt in consequence continued his seat in the legislative assembly, and met with companions in opposition in a considerable body of the delegates, called Decoyers, who, though they did not diametrically oppose ministers, yet by their ignorance and inconsistency in presenting new regulations and innovations, to the prescribed mode of business, considerably augmented the influence of Baddebt. The De-coyers were hitherto a non-descript race of men, and before this period were scarcely noticed either by minister or historic writers, but as they have made themselves superfluously conspicuous in opposing the Queen, I have penned a cursory account.

They are possessed of the shape and aspect of man, but, eminently partaking of the nature of goose, having the forward bearing of the former, with the piteous cackling of the latter. They are employed solely to decoy the sibilant tribe, into a decoy for the purpose of plucking them of the feathers, and then liberating them; the peculiar manner in which they effect this, is truly appalling,—painting their face of a brass hue, they dive out into the lake and will remain on the security for an incredible length of time, until separating a goose from the flock, by the allotment of Bait-Goods, draw the wayward animal into the decoy, and then strip him of his plumy honours; if this prove unavailing, he is dragged in by main force.

The ancient name was Hookersin, but in consequence of combining artifice with force, they are now called more appropriately Decoyers.

NEW MISERIES.

To be compelled to listen to the story of an honest man who has been unfortunate, and not to possess the means of relieving his distress.—A full heart and an empty pocket!

To have as much of sound principle as will keep you silent when a company of slanderers, like a flock of buzzards round a stray horse, are regaling themselves upon a character: knowing that you are deemed an idiot for not being fluent in scandal!

To be dunned by a wretch who stands before you with each fist resting upon money in his pockets, while you are full of honour, but empty of cash! feeling a painful desire to kick him down stairs, but constrained to soothe and to treat him with courtesy for the sake of those who look to you for bread.—Oh misery most refined!

Passing along the street in attendance upon a lady who speaks so loud as to leave you in a confusion of doubts, to know whether she is addressing the world or yourself—speaking to the public, or mildly replying in your private ear.—No small misery.

At an exhibition, to be seated behind the portentous skreen of a Leghorn, or the total eclipse of a dandy's dozen capes, and compelled to stretch your neck another joint—looking ever afterwards as if you had been half hanged!

Possessing a nice "musical ear," and to be doomed by un pitying custom, to listen to your favourite song murdered by some tasteless owl, with coffee-mill voice!—How must a professed amateur feel under such circumstance?

Trudging along beneath the burning glare of an August sun, to be blinded by dust: especially if it proceeds from the wheels of a coach bearing on its airy springs a man who you feel convinced, better deserves the most conspicuous place in the cart of Jack Ketch!—Money, like screws, will raise the heaviest substances.

While hanging in ecstasy over a beautiful woman as she gives language to the piano, or brings, with the light of her genius dancing on its chords, the voice of days gone by from the grace-displaying harp—to have your trance of bliss broken by the wild horse-laugh of some cream-devouring ephemera, without music in his mosquito soul! Starting back enraged, you tread upon some veteran's gouty foot; he, in anguish, jumps upon the cat—she dashes in torture from face to face, and exits through the window! the ladies scream—the children squall—the harp's untouched; and amid the "war of elements, the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds!" you stand—like a fool! Saving off a finger with a hacked iron hoop, is but a trifle compared with this.

Reading a poem of your own composition, and in the midst of what you think the best passage, for the inspiration of sweet applause, and looking up from the paper, to find your audience—asleep! Such poetry has, no doubt, a large quantity of "midnight oil" in it: let it burn.

To see the woman you most love, hanging on the arm of the man you most hate; and, ever and anon, to see that most beloved woman smile only at that most hated man! Oh, fire and fury, powder and ball, what a sight!—Who would be a lover?

Jumping aside, with all due agility, to let a ady pass on a wet day, you, in your eagerness to oblige, chance to scatter two small specks of mud upon her white flounce! You dye your white silk stockings black—ruin the gloss of your pumps—and are scolded for all your sacrifices!—Small inducement to politeness.

To be contradicted by a fool—jilted by a coquette—or cheated by a near relative—and, to meet them all, you have no other defence than sensibility!—Very common occurrences, but neither pleasant nor profitable.

"Biding the peltings of the pitiless storm," in the soiled and tattered garments of better days, while winter is brandishing his razor, and a fierce north-wester gives "dreadful note of preparation." But finding the chilling blast less hard to endure than the averted faces, or cold salutes of those who fattened on your prosperity, and whose cheeks caught the colour of the rose from the blush of your wine!—"Man's inhumanity to man, makes countless thousands mourn."

BRYANT.

THE ADELPHI.

Perhaps there is no architectural curiosity in London, of equal interest, so little known as the extraordinary vaults beneath the Adelphi Buildings—and thousands pass its Durham-yard entrance in the Strand, which, by the bye is immediately under the Institution of the Society of Arts, without knowing they are so near an object that would, by many, be thought worthy of particular notice, if a shilling was charged for the privilege of inspection. These vaults are the sub-structure of the whole Adelphi, and upon which it is supported in a similar way to those portions of the city of Paris which are above the Catacombs, except that the latter is a mere excavation producing caverns, whilst the former is a noble work of art—exhibiting the ingenuity of the architect, and the boldness of his enterprise.

This immense building-speculation was erected about the year 1770, by Robert, John, George, and William Adam; and each name is given to a street in these buildings called, from the Greek "Adelphi," or the Brothers, and the vaulted avenues beneath and which lead to the river side, were also named in correspondence with them. Robert Adam, the elder brother, had visited Palmyra and Balbeck, the remains of celebrated cities in the deserts of the east, and had thence acquired a peculiarity of style in architecture, and which he displayed in the ornamental portions of these buildings; to this manner he manifested a decided preference, introducing an exuberance of delicate ornament in all his after works and which were very considerable—in fact he exhibited no small portion of zeal in furthering any good object that had engaged his feelings, and amongst them was his attempt to import and benefit the lower order of his countrymen—North Britons.

When he commenced this extensive building, he sent to Scotland for ship loads of them, patronized all the robust sons of the Land-of-Cakes that were willing to rise, by shouldering the hod and mounting the ladder; and to the horror and mortification of the legitimates in that way—the Pats and the Murphies, who time out of mind had monopolized the honors of both—shoals of them arrived, and were duly entered at their posts.—but it was soon perceived that these laborious honours were not in accordance with their natural habits, for Saundy was thought too long pondering on the ponderosity of the burthen before it arrived at his shoulder, and too often making abstract calculation on the steps he was to take before it could arrive at its destination at the ladder top. The Adams' were good calculators too, and moreover gifted with a sort of national philosophy; so considering that the change of habit was perhaps too sudden for these candidates for London employment, they hastily sent back to Scotland for eleven Scotch agricultural accompaniments called Bag-pipers, and who were invoiced as the longest and soundest winded blowers that had been exported since the Union.—Months after their arrival they were to be heard in and about the buildings, from the barges of bricks that were unloading, to the middle and topmost scaffold: and below, the vaults were made to ring with the nasal sound, long before an echo had taken possession of their recesses and intricacies: this evidently revived the drooping spirits of these meditative labourers; but it was eventually discovered that Adams' had successfully bribed the DRONES to play in quicker time than had ever been practised in fair Scotia. From that moment the PIPER had lost his charm, the lofty ladder and the towering scaffold were despised, and the Saundies having had ample opportunity to look about them, relinquished, as they significantly called it, the CURSE OF ADAM, for less labour and more pay.

They were succeeded by the rejoicing Irish, who always labour cheerfully if treated kindly, and in this instance they were more than usually industrious; for, said a shrewd "Paddy" to his companions on the first Saturday night of their employment, "My darlings" said he to a bivouac of them—"these Scotch plodders, bodder them all, have a mind that we should do as much as themselves, and so, though they have taken away their bag-pipes, by the powers they have 'elegantly' left us their FIDDLE."

THE VESPER BELL.

The festal eve, o'er earth and sky,

In her sunset robe looks bright;

And the purple hills of Sicily,

With their vineyards, laugh in light.

From the marble cities of her plains

Glad voices mingling swell;

But with yet more loud and lofty strains

They shall hail the vesper-bell.

Oh! sweet the tones when the summer breeze

Their cadence wafts afar,

To float o'er the blue Sicilian seas.

As they gleam to the first pale star.

The shepherd greets them on his height,

The hermit in his cell;

But a deeper power shall breathe to-night;

In the sound of the vesper-bell.

REVIEWS.

The Village Schoolmaster. A Poem. By LANCELOT RAYMOND. 12mo. pp. 32. London, 1823, Hurst, Robinson, and Co.

This poem* is an avowed, and by no means an unsuccessful imitation of 'Shenstone's Schoolmistress,' without the adoption of that obsolete phraseology, which the author of the latter borrowed from Spencer. There is a great deal of nature in this unassuming poem, and it possesses considerable merit.—Literary Chronicle.

* Written by a young gentleman of this town, and printed at our office.

"While I live I love thee,"* an admired Ballad. The Air by Mr. S. SMITH, the Bass and Accompaniment by Mr. J. BARDSLEY, Manchester.

This air is so regularly and scientifically constructed, that we shrewdly suspect Mr. Bardsley to be entitled to a little more honour than he claims. If Mr. Smith was capable of imagining a series of passages as smooth, as connected, as consonant with each other, as those of the melody before us, he had little occasion for an assistant to provide him with a bass and accompaniment. That Mr. S.'s fancy might suggest a loose idea or two towards an air, we can easily believe; but the same skill must have converted them into a melody that suggested the other parts of the composition. This particular remark is suggested by our general experience. Now professors, we know, will assume to be magicians, and real masters will assist and flatter them.—Monthly Magazine.

BIOGRAPHY.

MARIE CHARLOTTE CORDAY.

This extraordinary young woman, so celebrated in the annals of the French revolution, was a native of St. Saturnin, in the department of the Orne, and had from her earliest years been carefully educated by an aunt who lived at Caen. Before she was twenty she had decided on taking the veil, and her noviciate was just expired when the constituent assembly interdicted all religious vows for the future. She then left the convent, and resided entirely with her aunt. The beauty of her person, and particularly her mental accomplishments, rendered her an object of much admiration. She spoke uncommonly well, and her discourse often turned on the ancients, and on such subjects as indicated that masculine turn of mind which ultimately proved her destruction.

Miss Corday was not only beautiful in person, but she possessed, also, an unblemished character, distinguished for dignity of sentiment and benevolence of heart, and had never given cause of suspicions of a disturbed understanding: nor, until she struck a poniard into the heart of Marat, any indication of a violent temper.

She was not prompted to this rash action by any personal indignity offered to herself, by rage, by love, by jealousy, by religious enthusiasm, or any of those sentiments which alone have been thought capable of urging women to such deeds. She saw her country in calamitous circumstances; she dreaded their increase from the wickedness of one man whom the law could not reach; she was convinced that by killing him, she would be of more service to her country than by all the exertions of a long life.—“I killed one man,” she declared on her trial, to “save a hundred thousand.” She formed her design coolly, without entrusting any mortal with her intention: she undertook a long journey to accomplish it: she weighed all its consequences: she calculated on death, and in a more dreadful shape than that in which she afterwards met with it; she expected to be torn in pieces by the mob, or that her body would be dragged through the streets. The idea of these horrors did not shake the steadiness of her mind. She looked for no recompense but in the reflection of having prevented the death of thousands. She was allowed an advocate to assist at her trial. M. Chaveau, when the evidence was finished, pronounced the following brief speech to the jury:—

“The prisoner acknowledges the act of which she is accused; she acknowledges that she has long premeditated it; she acknowledges the various circumstances; in short, she acknowledges the whole accusation, and takes no pains to justify herself. In this, gentlemen of the jury, lies her entire defence. This astonishing calmness, this total self-denial, which betrays no remorse, even in the very presence of death; this calm and this abnegation, seem not to be in nature; they cannot be accounted for but on the supposition that political fanaticism put the poniard into her hand; and it belongs to you, gentlemen of the jury, to determine what weight that consideration should have in the scale of justice.”

The jury unanimously found her guilty, and sentence of death was pronounced. She then addressed M. Chaveau to this effect. Sir, you have spoken in my defence in delicate and generous terms; it was the only style proper for me. I thank you. It has inspired me with esteem for you, of which I will give you a proof. The judges have informed me that my goods are confiscated. I am indebted for some things at the prison. I charge you to acquit that debt.”

A little before her execution, a confessor was introduced to her, and offered his services; she thanked him, and expressed a sense of obligation to those who had sent him; but said she had no need of his services.

When the officers entered her chamber to conduct her to death, she mildly begged to be excused for a few minutes until she had finished the letter she was then writing to her father.

The populace, in spite of their prejudice in favour of Marat, were so struck with her undaunted deportment, that they did not according to their custom, insult her as she was carried to execution. She occasionally smiled as she passed; and by that alone shewed that she paid them any attention. On the scaffold, her face displayed the bloom of health, and the serenity of a mind undisturbed.

The wretch who acted as the executioner of this brave woman, after her head was off, took it up, and holding it out to the multitude, with brutal exultation, slapped it twice on the cheek. Even the monsters who had condemned her to death, considered this as so inhuman an act, that they sentenced the villain to twelve years imprisonment in irons.

The heroic female was buried near to the grave of the unfortunate Louis XVI. in the church-yard of St. Magdelaine. This was occasioned by her having been executed in the same section.

In her way to execution, she excited a very strong and singular passion, in a young man of the name of Adam Lux, a commissary from Mayence. He published a few days after her death, a pamphlet, in which he proposed raising a statue to her honour, and inscribing on the pedestal, “Greater than Erutus.” He was sent to the prison of La Force, where he talked of nothing but Charlotte Corday—a few days after his imprisonment he was executed as a counter-revolutionist.

ANTIQUITIES.

A very interesting paper on the probable period when the use of brass or bronze for warlike weapons, utensils, &c. was superseded by that of iron and steel, has appeared in the first volume of the Newcastle Antiquarian Society. The author, the learned secretary of that Institution, after very ably tracing the use of the metals from the first “artificer in brass and iron, Tubal-Cain,” down to our own time, remarks:—“That as Moses mentions metal mirrors and tin, I infer that the Egyptians before this time were acquainted with the use of tin in hardening copper for edge tools; consequently that their most ancient arms and mining tools were made of bronze. That the era in which edge tools of bronze were in use in Britain, cannot perhaps be ascertained with any degree of certainty. There can be no reason to suppose that iron was introduced here, while bronze was used in Greece; or, that the Germans should be acquainted with it before the Britons. But when iron became plentiful amongst the Greeks, as it unquestionably was in the time of Lycurgus, 900 years before Christ, it would certainly be cheaper among the Phœnicians than either copper or tin. If, therefore, they traded in Britain at that time, it would be their interest to barter steel, for the goods they came for; and that of the Britons to receive it for edge tools, in preference of copper. The disuse of bronze tools, and the introduction of iron ones into this country, was probably gradual; but from the above reasons I would conclude, that bronze began to give way to iron here, nearly as soon as it did in Greece; and consequently that all the Celts’ spear-heads, swords, &c. found in our island, belong to an era about 500, or at least 400 years before Christ, for iron, at that period, seems to have been general, among all the people along the shores of the Mediterranean Sea. That the Celts were not imported into Britain, is plain: the moulds for casting them, and pieces of crude bronze being found in places where, from the cylinders that were with them, they appear to have been cast.” The learned author, which we regret our limits will not allow us to quote more copiously, observes in conclusion:—“The extracts I have given out of Homer and Aristotle, prove that the Phœnicians were in the habit of bartering their toys and baubles for valuable commodities in Greece and Spain. I would therefore infer, that they exchanged trifles of that sort among the Britons for tin; and consequently that the articles of jewellery found in our most ancient tombs are of Phœnician manufacture.” We hail the present paper, as an earnest of future communications of the kind, from the same learned source.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ACCOUNT OF A CARNATION, VIEWED THROUGH A MICROSCOPE.

“From an elegant bouquet, I selected a carnation, the fragrance of which led me to enjoy it frequently and near. The sense of smelling was not the only one affected on these occasions; while that was satiated with the powerful scent, the ear was constantly attacked by an extremely soft but agreeable murmuring sound. It was easy to know that some animal within the corolla must be the musician, and that the noise must come from some little creature suited to produce it. I instantly distended the lower part of the flower, and placing it in a full light, could discover troops of little insects frisking with wild jollity among the narrow pedestals that supported its leaves, and the little threads that occupied its centre. What a fragrant world for their habitation! What a perfect security from all annoyance in the dusky husk that surrounded the scene of action. Adapting a microscope to take in at one view the whole of the base of the flower, I gave myself an opportunity of contemplating what they were about, and this for many days together, without giving them the least disturbance. Thus I could discover their economy, their passions, and their enjoyments. The microscope, on this occasion, had given what Nature seemed to have denied to the objects of contemplation. The base of the flower extended itself under its influence to a vast plain; the slender stems of the leaves became trunks of so many stately cedars; the threads in the middle seemed columns of massy structure, supporting at the top their several ornaments; and the narrow spaces between were enlarged into walks, parterres, and terraces. On the polished bottoms of these, brighter than Parian marble, walked in pairs, alone or in larger companies, the winged inhabitants; these from little dusky flies, for such only the naked eye could have shewn them, were raised to glorious glittering animals, stained with living purple, and with glossy gold, that would have made all the labours of the loom contemptible in the comparison. I could at leisure, as they walked together, admire their elegant limbs.

their velvet shoulders, and their silken wings; their backs vieing with the empyrean in its blue; and their eyes each formed of a thousand others, out-glittering the little planes, and brilliant beyond description, and almost too great for admiration. I could observe them here singling out their favourite females—courting them with the music of their buzzing wings, with little songs formed for their little organs, leading them from walk to walk among the perfumed shades, and pointing out to their taste the drop of liquid nectar just bursting from some vein within the living trunk. Here were perfumed groves, the more than myrtle shades of the poet's fancy, realized. Here the happy lovers spent their days in joyful dalliance; or, in the triumph of their little hearts, skipped after one another from stem to stem among the painted trees; or winged their short flight to the close shadow of some broader leaf, to revel undisturbed in the heights of all felicity."

ON THE MANUFACTURE OF DIAMONDS.

A very pompous account having lately appeared in the American journals, of an immensely important discovery made by an American chemist, of a deflagrator whose gigantic powers have been successfully employed in the conversion of lamp-black into the most valuable diamonds, we have thought it a subject not uninteresting to our readers; we shall, therefore present them with a few facts, which will enable them to judge of the value and originality of this mighty discovery, from a land where every thing but man is found in its primitive, undegenerate size—a country whose lakes and rivers are the largest in the known world, and whose bays the sea-serpent considers to be the only arms of the sea commensurate to its size.

The diamond, the most beautiful of the gems, was known in the early ages of the world: the ancients, who obtained it from India, considered it to be an elementary body, and they instanced it as an emblem of eternal duration. Our immortal Newton was the first to suspect, from the optical powers which it possesses, that it was combustible or contained a combustible basis. The sagacity of this astonishing philosopher failed him not in this observation, for he even lived to see it verified by the Florentine Academicians, who consumed several diamonds by means of a burning glass, in 1694, before Cosmo the Third, Duke of Tuscany.

M. Lavoisier, the celebrated French chemist, first demonstrated that, by combustion, it gave decided evidence of containing carbon, of which substance lamp-black is an impure specimen? and Mr. Smithson, Tennant afterwards showed that it is composed entirely of carbon; and, like lamp-black, by being burnt, combines with the oxygen gas of the atmosphere, and forms fixed air.

It thus being demonstrated that lamp-black and the most valuable of the gems were composed of the same substance, it became an interesting enquiry to find a mode by which the transmutation of a substance like lamp-black, into a sparkling chrysal, could be effected, but little knowledge has been obtained by the research. The experiments, however, of Sir H. Davy, appear to have led the way to those emblazoned forth by the American chemist. The President of the Royal Society having subjected lamp-black to the immense powers of the galvanic battery belonging to the Royal Institution, and to the gigantic plates of that of Mr. Children, thus states the results, in the first edition of his Elements of Chemical Philosophy, published in 1812, p. 300:—

"A little hydrogen was given off from it, and it slowly volatilized in these experiments, and the part remaining was much harder than before, so as, in one case, to scratch glass? and the lustre was greater: but its other properties were unaltered, and there was no appearance of fusion.

The Editor of the Journal de Physique, published at Genoa, in commenting upon these experiments, stated that he had in his possession a diamond, on which there were several black spots, similar to charcoal.

Upon these facts we are much inclined to believe the American story is founded; but if we are mistaken, we shall hail the discovery with pleasure: for we are quite convinced of the truth of the observation, that science is of no country; but we must be excused if we are rather sceptical in regard to all those surprising accounts which cite as an authority an American Journal.

The glass manufacturers will look with anxiety for further accounts from the American chemist; for the next step will be the establishment of a manufactory in which diamond utensils will be made for all culinary purposes; and plates for windows, and drops for lamps, of sparkling diamonds, will soon be diffusing their brilliancy around us—for no one will use glass, when plates of diamond, of an eternal duration, can be easily procured.—The Magnet.

NORTH-WEST PASSAGE.

MR. EDITOR,—From the great interest which has been created by the late voyages of discovery to the Arctic Regions, for a North-West Passage, it perhaps may not be uninteresting to your readers, to present them with a Chronological List of all the Voyages which have been undertaken for the same purpose, by our adventurous Countrymen alone. In looking over this list, from the failure of so many attempts, it must strike every one with the very superior abilities of our great northern explorer, Captain Parry, who has added more to our geographical knowledge, of this part of the Globe, than any of his predecessors. TO THE EDITOR,

SIR,—I have again ventured a communication, once more have I embarked upon the sea of literature, and entrusted my little shallo; upon the stream of Poesy; but I have not dared to sail alone, I have sought me company, and have cheated Time of hours in such sweet converse as could only flow from the society I fixed on. Their names and attributes herewith will point out their recommendations, and my motives, but in what form do they appear,—I'll tell you as—

A few short lines, or long ones, 'tis the same,
 Cross is the purpose, crosswise trace the name,
 Read the first letter in each following line
 Of each first word, a true one they'll combine—
 So sweetly do they sound to lovers' ears,
 They banish quickly all unbidden tears—
 In dulcet numbers then let each one prove,
 Cool is the bosom that ne'er beam'd with love.

having now shewn the dress in which they appear, allow me, gentle reader, to solicit your kind allowances for errors of any description that may have unfortunately been cast upon my work; be ye sad, sorrowful, or sulken; pretty, peaceable, or passionate; woman, warlike, or wretched—attend, my aim is high. I hope my fall will not be great—Adieu, I recommend myself again to mercy,

The nine I sing, their presence I invoke—

Hear me fair Sisters, from your lofty throne,
 Each thought assist, and polish ev'ry stroke,
 My pen dares but your powerful influence own,
 Unloose the bonds that tie my roving hand,
 Sweet is my theme, my strain be sweeter still,
 Enlist me then within your sacred band,
 Such know but to obey your potent will.

Call on the name, each hero sound the shell,
 And whilst the crowding legions headlong swell,
 Lead on your armament, and trust to fame,
 Leave to Calliope your favour'd name—
 In battle mighty, and in battle strong—
 Of you alone shall sound her echoing song—
 Press forward then our hope a better fate,
 Earth may enfold, she will your deeds relate.

Can Clio then refuse her heavenly aid,
Laugh at the stricken hero's fitting shade!
In sweetest sounds Calliope may chime,
Of what you only shall preserve from Time.

Erato, loveliest of the lovely Nine,
Rapt in poetic visions at thy shrine,
A willing votary to thee I bend,
To thee for inspiration, prayers I send,
Oh, gentle one, then do thy power, thy influence lend.

'E'en Stoics halt, when in her powerful mood
Upstrung her lyre, Euterpe sends the flood
To distant ears, where reigning darkness lowers,
Enshrouds a host unskilled in music's powers:—
Round this fair muse each sense is lul'd to sleep,
Power yields beneath the tones so long and deep.
Each nerve she binds, her notes thro' ev'ry mortal creep.

Mark how the tragic muse, in solemn guise,
Erect, majestic, and with heavy pace
Lordly pursues her cause; her beaming eyes
Protrude with grief, her anguish stricken face
Of agony still tells, with solemn grace
Most mournfully she seeks a lover's shrine;
Eventful deeds were acted at that place.
Naked he fell—but they are o'er, nor mine
Each act to name—among the muses she shall shine.

Pride of all nations, who, with vocal strain,
Of old didst warble with the nightingale,
Lending your music to each am'rous swain,
Your powers hymning in the lowly vale,
Mine be the task such gentle notes to gain,
Not thro' a pipe to tell my simple tale;
In dulcet numbers then your praise I'd sing,
And echoing hills should with my numbers sing.

The deadly trumpet's sound had died away,
Earth once again enjoy'd a peaceful sway,
Replete with ease; dread war was known no more,
Peace beam'd upon our isle from ev'ry shore,
Sweet plenty pour'd upon us from her shore;
In heavy visions pass'd the lingering day,
Cheer'd, tho' the dreams that wil'd the night away;
How dull was morning, and when ev'ning came,
Only anxiety could fan the flame,—
Rapt in delight the God vouchsafed his lute,
Each heart was full—we heard thy sounding flute.

The comic muse—and wilt thou condescend,
High from thy seat a single ray to lend,
A single one upon thy subject reign;
Lowly and sad I pray thy valued aid
In deep devotion is my homage paid,
A votive creature seeks thy art to gain.

Urania, whilst I gaze upon the sky
Rapt in its spangled mantle, and would try
A wished for art, to know the starry train,
Night sheds her glories on my sight in vain,
In vain I seek thee, for thy power explains
All constellations, and when each one reigns.

THE DRAMA.

THEATRE ROYAL.—Our Theatre opened for the season on Monday last, and, though we are sensible of the pains and expense bestowed by the Managers on the decorations, we are sorry to say, that the glaring and vivid colours of the interior are equally disagreeable to the sight, and injurious to scenic effect.

The performers were received with all the gratulation of old and favourite servants, and individually, acquitted themselves so as to merit continued approbation and patronage.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. HOOPER from the Birmingham Theatre made his debut in the character of Tangent in The way to get Married. Of this gentleman, as a substitute for Mr. Brown, we are not yet qualified to speak; however, we think favourably, and hope he will be completely successful.

The same evening, Miss Clara Fisher sustained various characters in a most frivolous entertainment entitled Old and Young;—to children, such nursery scenes may be agreeable, to adults they will ever appear ridiculous and repulsive.

VARIETIES.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR PARLIAMENT.

"Why do you not present yourself as a candidate for parliament?" said a lady the other day to her husband, who was confined to his chair by the gout. "Why should I, my dear?" replied he; "I am not qualified for the station." "Nay, but I think you are," returned the wife; "your language and actions are truly parliamentary. When bills are presented, for instance, you either order them to be laid on the table, or you make a motion to rise; though often out of order, you are still supported by the chair; and you often poke your nose into measures which are calculated to destroy the constitution."

DOMESTIC LIFE.

No man ever prospered in the world without the consent and co-operation of his wife. If she unites in mutual endeavours, or rewards his labour with an endearing smile, with what spirit and perseverance does he apply to his vocation; with what confidence will he resort to either his merchandise or farm; fly over land; sail upon seas; meet difficulty, and encounter danger—if he knows he is not spending his strength in vain, but that his labour will be rewarded by the sweets of home! How delightful is it to have to cheer, and a companion to soothe, the solitary hours of grief and pain! Solitude and disappointment enter into the history of every man's life; and he is but half provided for his voyage who finds but an associate for happy hours, while for his months of darkness and distress, no sympathizing partner is prepared!

CRANIOLOGY.

We all know with what irresistible faith professors are generally wedded to a darling science. Many curious anecdotes might be adduced to illustrate this, but we have only room for the following, respecting Craniology, or the science of determining the characters of our neighbours by the shape of their skulls. We extract it from Grisoom's Year in Europe:

"A medical acquaintance of Dr. B. the anatomical lecturer, had taken a guide to conduct him to the top of one of the mountains, and while exploring the summit, the guide happening to pull off his bonnet, to scratch his head, exposed, to the alarmed vision of the doctor, the organ of murder, very strongly developed. With the greatest caution, the doctor, watching his opportunity, slipped from the guide, and took to his heels down the mountain, leaving the astonished man utterly at a loss to account for such a strange proceeding."

CANINE SAGACITY.

Isidore Froidure, servant to M. Ternisein, an inn-keeper at Boulogne, set out for Montreuil on the night of the 13-14th, ult., with a cart of herrings destined for Paris. He had performed the same journey for several successive nights; and overpowered with fatigue fell asleep upon his horse, as he travelled the forest of Longvilliers. He was thrown, and the wheel passed over his head. The horses continued their route, and reached Nenville, where their appearance without their driver led to the apprehension that some accident had befallen him. A postilion was mounted, and sent to explore the road. At the entrance of the forest, a league and a half from Nenville, he heard the howlings of a dog; and soon after discovered the animal by the corpse of his master, which he would not suffer him to approach? He therefore returned to Nenville for assistance; and a person named Dumontier was the only one the dog would allow to come near, he being dressed in a blue carter's garb, like that worn by Isidore. The dog was at last got away and taken to Nenville, while the body was buried; but he broke the cord with which he was tied, and made his way once more to the spot where his master had been killed. Taken finally to Boulogne, it was three days before he would touch food.

LANGUAGE.

A correspondent assures us, that a Native of Morocco, who accompanied Mr. Lancaster to Ireland, found the Irish language perfectly intelligible, and was himself understood by the people. The same person could converse with the Welsh, but not so readily.

BOUNDARIES OF CHRISTENDOM.

Take a map of the world, and encircle with your pencil those countries where woman is not a prisoner or a slave—where life and property are secured by a well regulated policy—where civilized manners have prevailed, and general science has burst the fetters of the mind—and you will encircle precisely those regions on which the rays of revelation shine.

PUNCH.

Efforts have been making to induce the famous Paris Punch to come over to illustrate the Pantomime at Covent Garden; but it is not yet certain whether the French Judy will consent to part from their favourite. This performer is equal, if not superior to the celebrated Follet, and his motions sadly puzzle anatomy.—Being of a small figure, and dressed like Punch, he perfectly imitates all the attitudes of that wooden puppet; puts one leg behind and another before in simple lines, while he knocks his head from side to side in the most Punchlike and marvellous manner, that, he is a living human Punch.!!

A NEW CRITIC.

The Stag under the Stage at Covent Garden had its most put Young out of Sir Pertinax on his first night. The animal happening to take a braying-fit with the performer was in one of his best parts, and the interruption came so appropriately and naturally, that poor Sir Pertinax fancied it was a dead set at him from some one of the audience in front of the House. As much was he affected by this determined opposition, that he was on the point of stepping forward to claim a candid hearing, when the mysterious cause of the punning was explained. It would have been curious to see a Man of the World put down by a Beast.

THE BRIDLE.

There is, in the church of Walton on Thames, a curious instrument, presented to the parish, about a century and a half ago, by a person of some consequence at that time, whose name was Chester. It was intended to be worn as a punishment by the fair sex, who had been guilty of defamation. It is of a singular construction, and, when fixed, one part enters the mouth, which prevents the possibility of articulation. It bears this very poetic inscription:

"Chester presents Walton with a bridle,
To curb women's tongues that talk idle."

Its presentation arose from the circumstance of the individual whose name it bears, losing a valuable case through the instrumentality of a gossiping lying woman.

TO ESCAPE FROM, OR GO INTO A HOUSE OF THE

Creep or crawl with your face near the ground, and although the room be full of smoke to suffocation, yet near the ground the air is pure, and may be breathed with safety. The best escape from an upper window is by a knotted rope; but if a leap is unavoidable, let the bed should be thrown out first, or beds prepared for the purpose.

TO YOUTH.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SYSTEM IN EARLY PURSUITS.—Concluded.

Disgusted with the littleness of the soulless politician, and, if possible, more disgusted with the inconvenient want of memory displayed by our men of genius, and our "great men;" and, being convinced that there are unapproachable masses in society, and that the omnipotence of mere money is acknowledged by all, I made a noble struggle. I shook off my patriotic associates, many of them men born for better things, but, like myself, cursed with more enthusiasm than judgment; and a majority consisting of men who could talk most eloquently about "our lives, our property, and our sacred honour,"—without scarcely the means or ability to support the first without one inch of the second, or an atom of the third. I again became diligent and attentive; neglected, but useful studies, were resumed; my voice was heard no more in the bar-room debate, nor at any "numerous and respectable meeting;" and those who sought me at ———, found me not.

How rich, in pleasure, was that period! the sweet feelings of earlier hours came thronging back upon my heart; my days were blessed by cheerfulness, my nights were undisturbed by uneasy dreams, and my mind felt the vigour of re-nu-nated ambition. I had conquered self, and I esteemed it a glorious victory, and it was one which even now calls forth sensations of honest satisfaction.

But it was the sun illumining a passing cloud, to be enshrouded the more effectually by its dark successors;—the poison had sunk too deep; my firmness was inadequate—I relapsed. I fervently hope that there are many, more fortunate than myself, who can

"On reason build resolve,
That column of true majesty in man:"

and who, more wise, can adhere to the good resolutions they may form, for in proportion to the number of resolutions which are broken, is the incapacity of the mind to keep those which makes.

Obedying my romantic feelings, I now read, Phillips, Curran, and Burke; and, burning to excel even a Demosthenes, I stood forth, "prouder than a sceptred king," as the principal spouter at literary club: and, judging from the long-continued roar which ever attended my displays, I acknowledged no superior, either remembered or existente.

Then, came to while my mind still farther away from more profitable pursuits, lectures on hominy, physics, and political economy; and they were advertised in the very papers which fostered my delusions by handing down my speeches and my poetry to an admiring posterity! I once more threw aside the shackles of mere business, and studied Linnæus and incomprehensible Godwin: and discoursed so learnedly of pistil, stamina, castrating and transplanting, and gave such vehement dissertations upon political justice, rights in common, &c. that, astonished at my return to former follies, my friends, justly offended, jeered me at the first, and then charitably pronounced me crazed.

But let me draw these desultory remarks to a close. All labour is now painful to my worn and wasted mind—but the task of thus sketching my own sad history is the extreme of anguish. I would willingly forget those days of delusion and of folly. To recall them for the benefit of others is a duty—it must be fulfilled. Memory compels the corroding reflection; she tells me of the many hours abstracted from business, most uselessly employed—of the many unprofitable acquaintances formed during that squandered period—of men who, slaves to indolence, and without a rational aim in life, strove to maintain a questionable respectability by mingling in the noisy, senseless, ward-meeting debate, or by flaming out like comets in the patriotism of these venal times to flutter their tarnished tinsel before the heavy eyes of a besotted audience.

As I now think of men and things with bitterness, I think correctly. I fear that my writing is like my mind, pointless and without force, but the intention is good. I can perceive the mistake and errors of my own life, and I wish others destined to a career of usefulness, (and who are not?) to restrain, in time, the misleadings of imagination. I am a privileged monitor: for, with a broken constitution—a mind incapable of firmness in resolution—its reason passively adopting the opinions, and, I might say, the instincts of habit—my profession but half understood—and myself utterly resourceless, I feel that the only duty left me to perform is to give my history to the young, that it may serve as a beacon to warn them of the many dangers in the ocean of life, and to shew the wisdom of their pursuing a correct course.

Oh ye youth! just entering upon the active duties of existence, be careful, I beseech you, to lay down a well-defined, rational, yet rigid system of conduct; let order and method govern all your actions, and prescribe all your studies—let nothing foreign to your business turn you aside from the path which leads to perfection in it. You owe to yourselves—to your country—to your God! a debt of immense amount; be useful to each, and you will cancel it.

Habits, like facts, are stubborn things; and when once disgraceful or improper habits have incorporated themselves with the very heart, it requires more than the strength of Hercules to dislodge them—it requires a continued exertion of moral power. It is better to resist at the outset than to depend upon our reason or our firmness in the future."

The preceding is the history of a friend once dear to me; he is now where, "deaf to the voice of censure or of praise," the sorrows of this life oppress him no more! His fine genius—his exquisite wit—his melancholy fate—will be remembered and mourned by a constant few. Thinking that the above sketch, left among his papers, hastily written and in an unfinished state, may, by its publication, serve the purpose apparently designed by its unfortunate author, I give it to the world.

The chasms in the preceding "essay to do good" might be filled by many useful reflections: I leave it to such as can think, and can profit by their thinking, to ponder on the important truths contained in it—highly important, inasmuch as they include the language of experience. A picture is presented to the mind of which it will not be difficult to discover many originals in real life; and that mind on which its features make the deepest impression will, of consequence, receive the largest and most lasting benefit from the study, and will be enabled to correct, by the melancholy fortunes of him who sketched it, the follies, and thereby prevent the tyranny of the imagination.

BRYANT.

THOUGHTS ON A RAINY DAY.

I am naturally of a gay and care-despising turn; abhorring metaphysics, hating melancholy, and but little given to those speculations which clothe the mind in mourning, and cast a cloud of soberness over the brow. I have heretofore considered religion a decent sort of thing in its way, easily understood, and not entitled to more respectful attention than our gallant heirs and heartless heiresses in these days of refinement generally bestow upon an affectionate guardian.

Common respect, according to modern ideas, seems to be all that is necessary to extend to those from whom we receive the most valuable and most disinterested benefits. But I now begin to think otherwise upon certain points; I grow wiser as I advance in years; or, at least, I wear the appearance of wisdom, and indulge less frequently in the thought-dispelling mirth of youth, and seldom raise "the loud laugh that speaks a vacant mind." And particularly on a gloomy day like the present, when the clouds hang low towards the earth—when the rain falls with a certain heavy and doleful sound, and the streets are as deserted as if an earthquake had just passed through them, I unconsciously fall into a solemn reverie, which is only broken occasionally by a shudder, as conscience reminds me of the lightness and irreverence with which I have often thought and spoken of sacred things. It is then I feel that it is good to be serious sometimes; and it is then I recall to my heart the features and expressions of an estimable friend who used to say, "that there never had existed a man, who, when reviewing life at the hour of his leaving it, was ever sorry that he had prayed." It is a beautiful remark, and it convinces me that we should be sometimes serious. Wit may pass for awhile—it may receive applause; and its light, like the evening star illumining dark waters, may give beauty wherever it falls; but, as those waters are more sublime left alone in their darkness, so when the light of wit leaves the mind, and a calm solemnity comes slowly over it, the strength of its thought is more apparent, and its greatness is increased.

The fear of being termed a preacher by the common majority of mankind, should never be permitted to deter us from useful reflections, even if they give a cast of pensiveness to the countenance; for the mind of man can never think too deeply when studying its own nature, or when dwelling upon things only inferior to itself by the disposition made of them for wise purposes at the creation of the universe.

By exploring the great works of an Almighty hand, which appear in perfect fitness or beauty wherever the eye can rest, we learn to repress the risings of self-importance, we are made acquainted with our rights and our rank, while convinced that, although ruling millions with the sceptre of reason, man is but an inhabitant of the earth in common with all that breathe. When thus employed, the meaner pursuits of life are excluded, the disposition to frivolity is weakened, and the mind appears in all the glory of its divine character. Who can feel the bitterness of earthly sorrow, or who can indulge in levity when placed amid a perfect landscape, to breathe the very spirit of the scene, and to see impressed on every thing around the evidences of a higher power? How the bosom swells while some wild cataract, roaring over its broken channel, pours upon the wind the music of its waters! its sensations are then closely allied to all that is pure in the nature of man, and, in some instances, must rise in communion with those which even angels may be supposed to cherish.

A forest, with its countless varieties of colour, its full masses of foliage, and the deep repose of its interior, should afford an idea of extent and sublimity; while the humbler family of flowers should convey a pleasant conviction that, throughout the wonderful economy of creation, beauty and sweetness are found accompanying and adorning strength, and lavishing the charm of their attractions upon the rude and the rough.

Yet, while nature holds an instructive volume, while she publishes to the heart her religion, a voice is heard from every moving sphere: it addresses itself to the reason of man—it is the voice of divine truth! It commands him to compare the religion of nature with that higher and holier system revealed, in beneficent goodness, from heaven to "Moses and the prophets."

And, on making the comparison, can no difference be discovered? Yes; the natural religion is but an evidence of the power, the illimitable dominion of God; and, as such, is entitled to the reverence of man; the revealed contains the sacred precepts of His grace, His mercy, and His love! It is all that mortality could require. It includes the only law that angels could obey! It supplies every deficiency; it inspires every rational hope: it speaks the language of inspiration. The comments of a Creator upon the perishable works of his hands, are discoverable in its truths: the glories of a blissful eternity shine upon the pages which contain its principles! Although the material world is beautiful, although its skies are bright—its streams are flowing in freshness—and its breezes move along in fragrance and in purity, and we may get knowledge by studying its parts—yet are we called upon by a feeling, innate and uncontrollable, that is instinct in childhood and reason in maturer years, to look beyond its narrow limits for the framer of its admirable symmetry, for the bestower of its beauties—for its Creator!

We turn for an explanation of the mysteries which surround us, to that Book in which is revealed a purer and a more sublime knowledge than mere earthly wisdom could ever have offered to our understanding. We almost instinctively turn to it; we look from "nature up to nature's God;" to whom conscience flies when danger threatens, to breathe forth the brief and fervent prayer; and to whom every action of our lives conveys an admission of His omnipotence. We subscribe to His superiority and to His goodness, often unconsciously. While surveying the vast world on which man lives, and moves, and has his portion of pleasure and of pain, the mind even of the dullest is filled with sensations of wonder and of gratitude. And why is that wonder excited? Towards whom do we experience those sweetest sensations of gratitude? A work far beyond our own capacity to execute, or even our fancy to suggest, is before us and around us, and therefore are we lost in wonder. "That work came not of chance," whispers every better thought. Reason, that portion of divine intelligence kindly lent to man, points out the Great First Cause: on the ocean as well as on the earth, it bids us to feel and tremble in the storm—to rejoice with gladness in the sunshine—to know His voice in the impartial thunder—to hail returning grace while His bow of promise is forming in the skies!

Oh, then the soul bows before its Maker! looks fearfully back upon the follies which may have sullied its purity; resolves against the passions which may degrade his nature; and acknowledges, with the sincerity of grief, the power and the misery of the only true God. Then, however gifted, however improved, the proudest and the vainest of men must, in conscience, admit bounds to human greatness: must deeply feel his inferiority to that incomprehensible perfection directing the movements of innumerable worlds, and speaking in thunders, or smiling in light, from His high throne in the heavens!

Yet such is the admirable structure of the mind, bestowed for the noblest purposes upon man, that, in proportion as it can become familiar with excellence—in proportion as it can receive delight from the study of scenes or powers superior to its own, will be its moral energy—its similarity to the objects of its study or its association. When that mind is directed to the contemplation of the attributes or the works of a Creator, the subjects appear too mighty for the grasp of created intellect: yet that He is—that he rules all-powerful, we are convinced by the incontrovertible evidence of His being all goodness—by the consciousness of our own existence. And while from the hills and the streams, the flowers and the fields, the bounded and the governed, yet apparently boundless ocean, reason might teach man to draw irresistible arguments, conscience breaks down all the barriers of doubt and of infidelity by the secret testimony of his own heart.

We possess, in a greater or less degree, the capacity to appreciate the beauties of nature; and it should be cultivated to the improvement of our hearts and to the enhancing of our happiness. For a habit of musing upon those beauties—of conversing with ourselves in the midst of nature's ever-varying scenes, will lead us to discover the connection between the harmony and propriety of created things and the power and benevolence of their Creator. It is an employment most innocent in itself, and one which, adding much to the stock of our earthly enjoyments, tends to fit us for a more exalted and more blissful state of existence.

Is there an unfortunate being among the millions of mankind who will claim the title of atheist? Go forth, thou man most worthy of compassion! in the calm of a summer midnight, when the skies are unclouded, and the stars are all out, trembling in their brilliance, and, calling to thine aid astronomy, that most beautiful of the sciences, gaze intently upon the objects then presented to thy view, and ask thyself whether such could be the work of chance? What should be thy answer? what will be the reply of thy conscience?—No!—for then thou wilt be alone with thy God!

It is in such a scene—when all the world is still, that the cares and the trials of this life—the ingratitude of friends, too deeply seated in our hearts—the inconstancy of those who vowed to love us for ever, come thronging upon our minds; it is in such a scene that bitter recollections cease to wring the unavailing tear. And then, robbed of every hope, deceived in every trust, and left to the severest of all life's ills—the misery of lonely reflection, where shall the unhappy fly for consolation, when the falsity of long-cherished opinions is discovered—when infidelity can afford no alleviation? It is to the precepts and practice of a rational religion—to the bosom of divine truth, that the lost one must fly when abandoned by the world, and awakened from the dream of error.

Can you imagine a Being suddenly appearing upon a dark and boundless ocean, when the thunders are roaring, when the lightnings are flashing, when the waves are heaving to the skies, when the storm is at the highest—can you imagine such a Being stretching forth his arm, and commanding the waves to recede, and the storm to pass away, and that they obey him? Then may you be entitled to form a faint idea of the might and the majesty of immortal truth. Truth comes, in the light of heaven, upon the dark ocean of humanity; she quells the wild waves of passion, she speaks, and the hoarse discord of error is heard no more!

BRYANT.

THE POET'S AERIAL VOYAGE

Imitated from Casimir—Lycior. Lib. II. Ch. I.

Homana linquo, tollite passum, &c.

Earth I forsake; through fields of azure light
I soar, and heaven-ward wing my ardent flight.
Bear me, ye fleecy clouds! and bid me rise
Propitious breezes! to empyreal skies.

See! fainter lustres gild each shrinking spot.
Mountains subside, and regal domes retire.
Your circling boundless, prolific haunts of Man,
And Earth's proud cities, dwindle to a speck.

Sublimar rising—from the ethereal way
Wide and more wide, the Nations I survey:
O Sons of Frailty! doom'd to toil in vain,
The unhappy slaves of Fortune's fickle reign!

There—measured fields aspiring walls surround,
And a new City rises from the ground.
There—monkling piles, and once fam'd tow'rs arise,
And scatter'd fragments scarce the site betray.

Lo! there—salubrious ether smiles serene,
But War and Tumult riot o'er the scene.
There—olive Peace her placid sway maintains,
But dire Contagion desolates the plain.

There—ferce Dissension half a world divides,
And Earth's discordant children shine in arms.
There—hesitating hooves survey the foe,
And dubious Fate awhile suspends the blow:

Whilst there—conflicting ranks with intercessing
Rush on the foe;—and furious battle wage:
Even now! wild Frenzy deals the mortal wound:
Earth teems with blood, and dying groans resound!

But what the imperious cause?—'Tis to reclaim
A vile adulteress! 'tis a speck,—a speck!
'Tis even for this—perverted Reason pleads;
While Discord rages—and while Fly Words!

Behold where Commerce spreads her smiling sails
And full-fringed vessels woo the favouring gales.
Teem the full ports you distant shores along,
And busy murmurs animate the throng.

On labouring waves there threatening bulwarks ride,
And stem with haughty prow the yielding tide;
Thunders the floating war! the echoing sound
Strikes the rent rocks, and cleaves the deep profound!

Forth from the green wave turbid smoke aspiras,
And death-fraught engines vomit missile fires:
Ocean indignant frowns—that Man should vie
With storms and rocks—his fellows to destroy!

There Realms are tottering: In yon treacherous ground
Mansions and Lords a common grave have found.
O'er yon lone plain the pensive traveller sighs:
'Here Empire stood:—here prostrate Glory lies.'

There—Inundations roar—and widely sweep
The pride of Ages to the oblivious deep:
What once were Cities—whelming billows lave,
And Wealth unheeded floats upon the wave!

Man, man destroys! with wild conflicting rage
The Elements in mutual war engage:
Howls o'er the scene with desolating ire
The fierce Tornado! Sea and Air conspire

Their own destruction! Hastes the fatal day
When self-devoted Nature sinks, a prey!
Enough.—Beyond this sublimity scene,
Waft me, ye Breezes! through the blue serene.

Woods! on your shadowy Car, the rapt bard hear
Through azure fields, and trackless wilds of Air,
Far as yon Orbs of silver light, that roll
With mild effulgence round the steadfast pole!

Or I dream! or through the yielding skies
Driven by obsequious gales, again I rise!
Earth's frail domains, Ambition's empty boast,
And the vain Glories of the World are lost!

Diminish'd to a point—its scanty round
See!—now floating mists my sight confound.—
Fain Earth adieu! thy form no more I trace,
Lost in the undistinguish'd name of Space.

Infinity! how wide thy realms extend,
What, less than Thought Divine can comprehend!
Ocean interminate! the Bard receive,—
As trembling, he explores thy everlasting wave!

REPARTEE.

A certain poet, who has written some of the best verses, and some of the worst lines of any American poet; and who, for some peculiar eccentricities, (which has at length thrown aside), has been reputed mad, some time since, in the assembly room, at the Hotel, was interrupted in his "dreams of fiction" by a stranger, who thus accosted him:

"Is your name C—e?"

"C—e, sir, is my name."

"I have come a great distance, sir, for the express purpose of seeing you."

"Indeed! And do you consider yourself amply reserved for the trouble and fatigue of a long journey, to view of my delectable person?"

"Yes; you are a strange looking creature. I have heard much of you. Some people say you are mad;
I have heard a number of ladies assert, that if you proper attention to your dress, you would be a pretty man."

"A pretty man! Now, by Heavens, sir, I consider as one of the most rascally compliments they could pay me. A pretty man, sir, (like yourself, for instance,) is, in my opinion, one of the most com-plicable objects that ever came from the manufactory heaven!"

"Why so, sir?"

"Because, sir, the epithet implies the absence of that is manly. They might as well apply the term to ocean in a storm, an eruption of Mount Etna, or Falls of Niagara."

"Well, you are really a strange fellow; and, in my opinion, more knave than fool."

"Do you think so, sir? I really wish that I could procure the compliment. But I am certain that no one in your character will bear any comparison with my silliness, which like Aaron's rod, or Pharaoh's kine, swallows up all the rest."

"You are severe."

"You say that you have come a great distance for the express purpose of seeing me, as you would go to see a bear, an elephant, or a Hottentot Venus?"

"Yes."

"Now, sir, comply with the terms—fifty cents a sight."

"Indeed! Well, there." (Gives him money)

"Stay, sir, take back twenty-five cents—Children half-price!"

"Again!—Why you show no mercy to one who is anxious to serve you."

"To serve me? Then unite your fortunes with mine.
Every wild beast that is exhibited in this city, is accompanied with a monkey."

The stranger finding the Poet rather "too much for him," as the pugilists say, and perceiving that he was no more deficient in feeling than in wit and talents, begged his pardon for having so rudely intruded upon his meditations, and was about retiring, when the Poet returned the rest of his money, and taking him by the hand, assured him, that as impudence and ignorance are always united, he could very safely pardon his presumption.

The above dialogue reminds us of the following anecdote:—

A pretty Man.—In speaking of the Duke of Marlborough, after the battle of Ramillies, a puny officer said he was a pretty man. The father of the young officer, who was present, turned to him, with an austerity in his countenance he was little accustomed to wear—"And you are a pretty fool, thus to characterise the greatest man in England." The sterling weight of words is not always known to our juvenile critics.

GEORGE.

THE HURRICANE OF NOVEMBER, 1821.

BY A PASSENGER.

(Written for the Iris.)

As there are few who can, or perhaps few, that from a recurrence to the event, will write the narrative of this awful event, I have recorded it for the Iris, and I think the situation I possessed, and the opportunities I had of observing its desolation on the Welsh Coast and in the Irish Channel, may prove interesting.

In the afternoon of a gloomy November day, I had obtained the polite permission of Colonel Woodford of the guards, to sail in his own packet, that fine body of men having been detained in Liverpool as well as myself, (and business was pressing) for seven weeks, by contrary winds. The troops embarked in the transports with great alacrity, and Colonel Woodford and the staff officers had already entered the cabin he was kind enough to grant me a shelter in, when suddenly the Colonel was called out, and immediately afterwards an order for disembarkation was issued, and to my sorrow the vessels were instantly vacated, and the troops sent to their quarters. At this moment (I will not for reasons hereafter to be explained, mention the vessel) a sloop with a part of the 19th regiment of foot, wives, children, and other passengers, was hauling from the basin for the port of Dublin. I threw my luggage upon deck, and springing from the quay on the shrouds, was on board immediately.

The Captain was strongly advised not to put to sea, for the commanders of the transports had foreseen the calamitous consequences which would have attended their charge, but he was an old, bold, and experienced navigator, and thirty-five years of discipline had confirmed him in his opinion, and though the wind was at north west, and fresh, with now and then an indication to the eastward, which was all he relied upon, he was resolute in his determination. We soon found ourselves, through a heavy swell, making our way down the Mersey, and we turned the Black Rock at about two P. M. The breeze continued to freshen, and the swell increased considerably, and this continued without intermission or variation till five in the afternoon, when we passed the Floating Light which was heaving heavily at the moorings. We were baffled greatly by the still strong and contrary wind, and all hope of an eastern breeze vanished.

At half past nine when in sight of the Skerries, a sudden and terrible gust of wind laid the vessel on her beam ends, and had it not been for her high bulwarks we should most of us have been precipitated into the ocean.
Fortunately the steersman, obliged to keep a strong hold of the pulley which directs the helm, preserved his station. Gust preceded gust in a stunning and deafening manner, and from this moment the hurricane began, and with it the horror of the night. In a short time the sea was frightfully agitated, the topsail threatened our immediate destruction, and by signs, the captain who had come on deck on the first calm, intimated to one of the crew to secure it—for the speaking trumpet was useless—with an intrepidity rarely witnessed did this brave Cambrian tar, crawl on his hands and knees, to the foot of the shrouds, and taking advantage of a momentary steadiness of the vessel, seized hold of the ropes, and mounted to the astonishment of the few of us who were on deck, accomplished his arduous duty, and descended! I blush to add, that, with many opulent cabin passengers, the poor fellow's heroism went unrewarded.

By this time it was evident that to stand out to sea was our only chance of salvation; two traders had struck on the coast only half a league from us, before day light had closed, and we wore the vessel accordingly,—in doing this, we shipped the first heavy sea, which completely satisfied us of the state we must be content to remain in, even if it pleased God we reached our destination;
but from the poor wretches in the steerage, which the sea had half filled, the most horrible shriek arose which pierced through the howling of the wind; let what would have happened them no help could be afforded, and the pumps, as circumstances would allow, relieved them. The hatchway was now put over the covering to prevent a similar accident, and it was well, for every minute afterwards had we to take breath for the coming deluge. We passed Holyhead Light House, and still the fury of the elements increased occasionally with vivid flashes of lightning,—the thunder was inaudible,—the moon, which now rose, dispelled in some measure the cheerless monotony which had been observed, and which could now only be relieved by looks, and those —looks of despair! The whole ocean, as far as the eye could reach presented a white surface, and the approaching waves seemed like a mountain of solid snow; with great hazard and difficulty, the mainsail was lowered and secured, leaving as much in the reefs, only, as served to answer the helm. Two vessels on our starboard side were firing constantly, guns of distress, which we could often discern only by the flashes, and at the best,
the report was feeble; as the moon brightened we observed one having lost her mainmast, and in half an hour afterwards we saw her no more!

Holyhead was a tempting refuge, but nothing of our pantomimic wishes, could induce the Captain to alter his resolution, he stood out to sea, in spite of the immersions we were constantly experiencing, and I could trace on the faces of my prostrate companions on deck, as I inwardly felt myself, a total indifference to death fast prevailing,—they, almost worn out with cold and weariness, scarcely could cling to the ropes, now as wet as themselves, but I more fortunately had my hands through two rings which by cleaving my fists prevented the possibility of being detached from the vessel, unless my shoulders were torn from my body; in this situation I often thought of that truly sublime sentiment of the Psalmist—

"The floods, O Lord, lift up their voice,
And toss their troubled waves on high."

and without any variation than that of the smothered shrieks below, we continued, till the Wexford mountains appeared in sight.

Mean while I had observed that the pitching of the vessel grew less and less, and in a little while after I was able to address my nearest companion, who was unable to return it, beyond a shake of the head. As no sea had broken over us for nearly ten minutes, the batches were now taken off the poor sufferers, and to the term of my days I shall never forget the vapour which arose; disengaging my hands, I resolved to crawl to the steerage which with difficulty I accomplished,— a sergeant came up the ladder and lay down by me, smoking as if he had been on fire, he could not speak but pointed to a bottle in his breast, I took it out, and it was nearly full of brandy, I poured a little into his mouth, and he intimated I should perform the same of-see myself, which I did most gladly and liberally; as soon as he could speak he informed me, that when the storm was at its height, the men grown selfish from despair, applied the spirits they had brought with them to their own purposes, and lay like pigs amongst the straw, and would have been suffocated but for the timely cover of the hatchway, which would have proved as fatal if it had not been partially opened; as for their poor wives and children I could not persuade myself, looking from deck, that they were alive,—a spectacle of greater horror I never beheld. We were fast approaching the Light House, and though in rough water, were now perfectly assured; the first object that met our sight was, the most of a vessel in the bay, above water!

We landed, in fine, at the Pidgeon House Battery, amidst the congratulations of the people, who informed us that the damage done in, and about the city was incalculable, and expressing their astonishment at our miraculous arrival. An officer of the service, a cabin passenger, was delirious when landed; one lady from the same part, a mute statue of despair. I have thus narrated the leading instances of a voyage, which, as the veteran Captain said, had not been equalled in the period of his service.

The English newspapers received subsequently furnished the most appalling proofs of the tempest's devastation, and we afterwards learned that on the coast of Sussex alone, upwards of two hundred sail of craft of different magnitude had been wrecked—the loss on the whole can never be estimated. G.

ORAIISON.

He comes, he comes, arrayed in glitt'ring vest,
Bright Phoebus, shedding beams of orient gold;
Responsive beats my sympathetic breast
As Memnon's once, in classic legends told.
Father of merries!—Thou, alone, whose hand
Doth guide yon planet on its fluent way,
Teach me to bow beneath thy dread command,
That calm may be the setting of my day.
Shouldst Thou afflict me with thy chast'ning hand
For misdemeanour—Oh! may it be mine
To breathe the submission to thy rod divine;
Should life's short hour be fraught with pleasure bland
Luring, seductive:—still, this truth I know,
The arm that lifts—in vengeance can o'erthrow!

SINGULAR BIOGRAPHY.

The Reverend Mr. Mattinson was minister of Pattersdale for sixty years, and died January 31, 1766. His stipend was only £12 per annum, till within twenty years of his death; and though it was augmented from Queen Anne's bounty, it never exceeded eighteen pounds. On this slender income he married, and brought up four children; and when he died, at the advanced age of eighty-three, he left £1000 to his family.—With that singular simplicity and inattention to forms which characterise a country like this, he read the burial service himself over his own mother; he married his father to a second wife, and afterwards buried him. The first infant whom he baptized was nineteen years old, and she agreed to marry him. He published the banns of marriage in the church. He married his four children, from whom he saw seventeen grand-children spring before his death.

With so small a stipend as the above, it appears scarcely credible, even that a miser should be able to accumulate such a sum. But it should seem that Mr. Mattinson had one or two other resources, which essentially aided his purse; though even with these additions, it is sufficiently extraordinary that he should have left so large an amount behind him. He and his wife carded and spun that portion of tithe wool which fell to his share, namely, one-third; and from a school that he taught, he added about £5 to his yearly income. His wife was expert as a midwife, performing her operations in that way for the small sum of one shilling! Her profits, however, on these occasions, were further increased by some culinary perquisites; as, in compliance with an ancient custom, she invariably officiated as cook, at the christening dinner. On the day of her nuptials with Mr. Mattinson, her father is said to have boasted, that his two daughters were married to two of the best men in Pattersdale—the priest and the bag-piper!

The property that was thus amassed by Mr. Mattinson, proved of little benefit to his successors; after his death it was soon squandered by his widow and children, and she was obliged to seek an asylum in the college of matrons, at Wigton, for the widows of indigent protestant clergy, Episcopally ordained.

ASSOCIATIONS.

There is scarcely any thing, from "the chaste cold moon," (that wins its way, in undisturbed serenity, through interminable space,) to the most common article of our good world, but that, when attentively observed by the mind of man, awakens remembrance in it of past times. When we look into the evening sky, when the moon is still smiling upon the beautiful world below, we can recollect the time when we used to sport with our young companions upon the green meadow, or wander with some pretty girl as youthful, as innocent, and as happy as ourselves. Now conversing on the past, now anticipating the future; dwelling upon the joys and sorrows of this varied world, and often pausing to look upon and admire some bright cloud that was floating silently on through the mellow light, like a fairy island that, guided by angel hands, was just crossing our sphere—revelling a few moments in the golden beams, and then passing away. As for me, when I gaze upon the moon, it always reminds me of past times. Rosy cheeks and laughing lips come across my fancy; and I can almost hear the silver voice of many a loved one who has long, long since mouldered in the tomb. I remember the stories of the poets—the fabled sports of those happy spirits who dance in the moonlight, and wanton on every breeze. Such are the associations that mingle with the pensive beauties of the silver moon.

A few weeks ago, I visited the scene where I had been educated—the spot where the first fleeting years of my boyhood had fled like a dream. It was a beautiful afternoon in summer, when I arrived at my hotel; the same house around which I had often played, and watched each successive carriage that rolled by. When I looked around me, every tree brought to mind some incident that would otherwise have been forgotten. I stood upon the meadow of my gay sports, and I could almost recognise the voices of my companions as they shouted in their play, "every man to his own den." The brook where I used to drop my line, and triumphantly draw my struggling victims to land, was still rippling in the breeze, and reflecting in its bosom the fairy world around. The old forest yet waved its rustling branches in the air; and I heard the same sounds as I was wont to, when, years and years ago, I rambled, a mere boy, through the same beautiful scenes, and leaned my young ear to catch the mingled music of the murmuring brook—the rustling branches—and the clear silver warbling of the nightingale. I almost imagined I was yet a boy, and that all the busy, stormy incidents of my past life were but a dark confused dream—it seemed like stepping back from the misty tunes and sad realities of my present situation, and revelling in the happiness of my youthful days. The whole vision (for it may be called one) was created by the associations that crowded around every object that met my view.

In our course through life, as in a journey of a day, we often behold scenes that we love to look back upon and contemplate. When, after riding through a beautiful country, we find ourselves far away from the object of our admiration—travelling, perhaps, over the unvaried surface of a desert, the shadow of a cloud may remind us of the beauties we have passed, and as it darkens for an instant the sunshine around, we can almost imagine it is kissing the same varied loveliness of nature that is, in fact, glowing in its summer beauty far away. It is just so in our path through life. We have all, during our existence, met with beings whom we loved, but from whom fate has parted us, and like the meteor in an evening sky, they just gleam in our sight—just brighten for a little while the shadows around, and we see them no more. They are gone, but there are many little objects which will remind us of them, and bring them in all their brightness to our view: again we see sparkling eyes smiling upon us, and happy pictures in life and loveliness, the image that is gone. A song we have heard her sing—a glove she used to wear—is associated with the beauty of the first object of our affection; and the very room in which she has moved seems still to echo to the voice of her who is there no more.

I remember, when I was a young man I passed a few weeks in a circle of company, lively, witty, beautiful, and all that could make a heart, young and ardent as mine then was, beat with pleasure. There was one, however, one single being, who still hallows the remembrance, and makes me look back upon the bright scenes that passed so swiftly away, with a feeling of mingled pleasure and pain. The fact is, we loved each other. I shall say nothing of the feelings with which I kissed the lip that told me I was not indifferent to her; but rather it to say, that she is no more! I was, the other day, looking over my drawers, when I saw a neatly folded paper, in which was enclosed a graceful ringlet of silken hair. It was Mary's. I looked at it for a few moments without speaking. Yes, it was Mary's—dear, dear Mary's. There it lay, the same beautiful ringlet that had once rioted in its privilege on her lovely neck. I could almost see her fair figure—her brow—her eye—her lip—seemed for an instant to live before me—and the lock to be re-attached in its former situation. For one fleeting moment, I almost believed that Mary was in my presence, and the next I felt a tear start from mine eye—and my lip (unusual as it was to quiver with emotion. I thought of her simple like form, as it was then, so graceful and lovely; and I pictured her as she is now—cold—inanimate—without life, feeling, or affection, passionless—dead. I recollected the time when I stole the pretty ringlet from her neck, and kissed her into a smile of forgiveness. The smile—her beautiful look—flashed across my mind, and then the stern certainty that all was changed—lost alike in the unthinking clod that moulders in the grave.

Now why was this? What was there in the lock that could awaken into life emotions that had long slumbered in silence? What was the power that breathed its magic around me, and bore me far back again over the dim lapse of ears, as though I had been spell-bound by an æstern enchantress? Another might have looked upon it—but no powerful emotion would have started at the sight—he might have vouchsafed a smile at the silken beauty of the curl, but he would have looked in vain for those thousand mysterious associations that crowded round it, invisible to every eye but mine. Such were the feelings that came across my mind as I surveyed the golden relic of my pretty fairy; and small as it was, and insignificant as it would have been to any other eye, to me it was rich with the mellowed associations of past times.—I looked upon it and wept. THE FLOWER-GARDEN.

In the morn of the year, when a soft-breathing show'r
Effus'd vigour and life on the soil,
Delighted I sought the retreat of my bow'r,
And gaz'd as I sat on each opening flow'r
That rewarded my pains with a smile.

Expand ye sweet nurslings! and riot in joy,
And exult in the genial time;
My Garden's gay bound shall an emblem supply,
And depict the soft season of life to the eye,
Of youth and of Beauty the prime.

But see! in despite of my caution and care,
How yon vile weeds your efforts impede;
When my flowrets expand, sure to vegetate there,
Of the sun's ray benign they usurp a large share,
And envelope your beauties in shade.

Ah! too true the similitude! Man is a flow'r
Whom the rank weed of Sorrow annoys:
And should he survive the rude blasts' chilling pow'r,
'Tis to shed his frail beauties in Autumn's lorn hour;
And ere Winter he withers, and dies.

THE CLUB.

NO. XXXVII.—FRIDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1823.

"Discipulos ad unum interim monco, ut preceptores suos non minus quam ipsa studia ament, et parentes esse non qualem corporum, sed mentium erudiant."
Quint de off: discip: Cap. 9.

HAVING an affair of some moment to communicate to the president of our club, I was under the necessity, though aware of his dislike to being interrupted in his professional duties, to call the other day at his school. On ascending the stairs, I was very well pleased to observe the profound silence which reigned in the school, though the number of pupils is by no means inconsiderable. Every one seemed intent on his own particular studies, with the exception of a little urchin who was mounted on a stool, and, under feelings which appeared by no means enviable, was exposed to the derision of his fellows. The countenance of the conductor of these tyros, though "more in sorrow than in anger," displayed a very unusual degree of motion; and formed a singular contrast with the large bronzed owl, bird of Minerva and Wisdom! which, amidst all the vicissitudes of this microcosm, had ever been noted for the profound ravity of his look, and which seemed the tutelary and inspiring deity of the occupant of the arm-chair below it.

On entering the school, my friend arose to meet me, and inquired after the health of my family. After having satisfied him in that particular, and communicated the business which I came upon, I was preparing to go away; and though somewhat curious to know what had interrupted his accustomed tranquillity, I did not venture to make any inquiries. As I was however turning about to depart, the worthy pedagogue, who had hitherto been silent on the subject, said, "Mr. —, you seem surprised at the discomposure which you have doubtless perceived in my countenance; and I can tell you that I am surprised at it too. Circumstances such as have occurred this morning ought not to disturb one who has been accustomed to the scholastic life, and who therefore should be prepared to meet them with composure."

Pointing to the youngster on the stool, he continued, "You see that child; he is a boy of promising parts, and, had his education been properly conducted, would have done credit to all who have been concerned in it. Owing, however, to the injudicious conduct of his parents, he is more troublesome, and makes a slower progress, than any other pupil in the school."

As I have several children of my own, to whose attainments I am very far from being indifferent, I inquired, with some earnestness, for an explanation. "That boy," answered the teacher, "when first sent hither, was committed to my care by parents who expressed themselves highly gratified by an opportunity of entrusting him to one, who, they were pleased to say, possessed every requisite that would entitle him to their highest confidence. Under these favourable auspices, I commenced the education of this boy; resolving, as I have often resolved, that no confidence in me should be misplaced. But mark the sequel. I classed him with some little fellows whose acquirements were, perhaps, rather above his own, hoping that example, acting upon a sense of inferiority, would be a stimulus to exertion. This stimulus, however, arising from a reciprocity of action, could only exist with a continued attention to study; but in a few days my new comer was absent a whole day, and on inquiring the cause, was informed that his mother gave him a holiday. As his class-mates had made some progress during his absence, I was somewhat inconvenienced by keeping him in his appointed class. Not a week had elapsed before he one morning forgot his task, which act of forgetfulness was soon followed by the loss of his grammar, which his mother sent to inform me had been torn in pieces by the lap-dog. Not long after, this careful parent took it into her head that her darling was too closely plied with his book, and by an act of maternal care, he was allowed to play for about a week, in order, as she said, to brace the nerves, and make him fitter for study. I had scarcely time to wonder at this piece of philosophy, when I was astounded by the intelligence that the father, having occasion to go into Yorkshire, had taken my scholar with him, to see a little of the world. What knowledge of the world my young gentleman acquired while absent I did not inquire; but I soon found his literary acquirements so little advanced, that he was quite unfit for the class to which he belonged, and I was therefore under the necessity of putting him into a lower. This removal made him quite sullen; and some days had passed, before he became so accustomed to his new companions, as to study with any advantage. But enough of this. Maternal tenderness and paternal philosophy, birth-day, slight indispositions, loss of books, neglect of tasks, and other occurrences, in rapid succession, have operated so powerfully, that the youth is now disqualified for studying even with children who are his juniors by four or five years. Yesterday was remarkable: a little girl came to spend her birth-day with her cousin, and as his mother is of opinion that it is proper to observe old customs, and to promote the social feelings among relatives, my hopeful pupil was detained to observe all the formalities of the day; and he has appeared this morning with the account that he had forgotten to attend to one part of his task, and that a little girl burned his exercises to light the spirits for the game of Snap Dragon. What can I do? The expectations of improvement entertained by his friends are as strong as ever; and I feel myself impelled to adopt measures, which, coercive as they may be, appear absolutely requisite to the boy's advancement in learning."

I left the school wondering at the inconsiderateness of those parents. It is to be feared that the complaints of our worthy president have a much more general application than is commonly imagined. Every degree of relaxation from proper study, has a tendency to give to the mind a vacillating character; one act of indulgence leads to another; on wishes, wishes grow; excessive fondness for play is superinduced; habits of application are eradicated; and he who by ill-timed indulgence has obtained the grant of an hour, seldom rests satisfied with a day or a week; till idleness succeeds to irresolution, disgust to satiety, and the youth of happy promise has dwindled into insignificance and contempt.

But there is another evil of no common magnitude, which invariably results from the practices I have been speaking of, differences in consequence but too frequently arise between teachers and parents. When a scholar discovers a dissimilarity in the directions or views of these, he will naturally tend to those which minister to his indulgences. Hence fretfulness and ill-humour at the commands of his teacher; and imagining the views of the parent to be reasonable and proper, he will be led to consider his master as a tyrant, whose commands are dictated by caprice or unfeelingness. Under the influence of such feelings, what rational hope can be entertained of ultimate success in his education? Where is the scholar who, under such circumstances, will listen to instructions dictated even by experience and skill? Improvement is founded on the esteem and reverence of the scholar arising from the learning and benignity which he discovers in the teacher; but while the precepts of the academy are counteracted by the sensual gratifications of home, disgust at learning, dislike of him by whom it is administered, and neglect and non-improvement, must be the necessary consequences.

To cause the efficient advancement of the pupil, it is evident that a good understanding should constantly exist among teachers and scholars; that the commands of a master ought to be respected by pupils, and furthered by their parents; that thus all who are under the care of others ought to be taught regard and submission to their precepts, and affection for their persons.

POLITENESS.

The hues of the rainbow are not more varied than the character of company. I mean those collections of ladies and gentlemen which our good people have denominated parties. Some of them possess the fascinating talent of making time glide instantly away. We sit by them—talk to them—listen to their beautiful conversation—and when we part, are astonished to find that we have spent hours in their company. There are others with whom we cannot be more than five minutes before we feel uneasy; we don't know what to do or say; are either alarmed with some strange piece of rudeness, or disconcerted with a copious overflow of politeness; and when at last the interview ends, we feel like some poor fellow who has just been released from the stocks. There are a hundred different sorts of ceremony, all of which go by the name of politeness; but how few persons are there who possess that real politeness—the will and the power to make all happy around them?

I remember once, my pretty reader, I was at a dinner party, where I was almost teased to death by the extreme kindness of an old lady at my right hand, who was continually heaping up my plate with all the delicacies within her reach.

"Do, my dear sir, take a little piece of this duck."

"No, I thank you, ma'am."

"But now, my dear sir, you don't eat at all. I must insist on your having this piece of the breast."

"But ma'am—"

"Now you must not refuse—here, Thomas, take the gentleman's plate, and tell Mr. So-and-so, to cut him a bit of the ham."

Upon which an aproned waiter snatched away my plate, and returned it so loaded with victuals that I had not room to eat what I really wanted, and was compelled to leave off altogether.

I once handed a plate of hot buttered muffins to a lady on the other side of the table—the plate was quite heated, and I could hardly hold it; the lady, with one of her very sweetest smiles, begged me to help myself first.

"Oh no, ma'am," said I.

"Oh yes, sir," said she.

"Do take one, ma'am."

"Well, help Mrs. Blue first."

My hand had by this time become quite painful, and I therefore handed the plate to Mrs. Blue, who, determined not to be outdone in courtesy, "beseeched" her antagonist to be helped first; and they were carrying the controversy to the most laudable lengths, when I found it absolutely necessary to withdraw my services; in the attempt the plate fell—dashed into a cup of coffee—away went one muffin, and off rolled another—and one in particular bounced into the lady's bosom, upon which she managed to scream in a most bewitching manner; and to my infinite mortification declared "that I had spoiled one of the most valuable gowns she ever wore."

THE SWALLOWS.

By the REV. ROBERT JAGO, Author of "Edge-Hill," and various other Poems.

Ere yellow autumn from our plains retir'd,
And gave to wintry storms the varied year,
The Swallow race, with foresight clear inspir'd,
To southern climes prepar'd their course to steer.

On Damon's roof a large assembly sat;
His roof, a refuge to the feather'd kind!
With serious look, he marked the grave debate,
And to his Delia thus address'd his mind:—

Observe yon twittering flock, my gentle maid,
Observe, and read the wondrous ways of heaven!
With us, through summer's genial reign they staid,
And food and sunshine to their wants were given.

But now, by secret instinct taught, they know
The near approach of elemental strife,
Of blust'ring tempest, and of chilling snow,
With every pang and scourge of tender life.

Thus warn'd, they meditate a speedy flight;
For these, e'en now, they prune their vigorous wing;
For these, each other to the toil excite;
And prove their strength in many a sportive ring.

No sorrow loads their breast, or dims their eye,
To quit their wonted haunts, or native home;
Nor fear they launching on the boundless sky,
In search of future settlements to roam.

They feel a power, an impulse all divine!

That warns them hence; they feel it and obey:

To this direction all their cares resign,
Unknown their destin'd stage, unmark'd their way.

And does no friendly power to man dispense

The joyful tidings of some happier clime?

Find we no guide in gracious Providence,

Beyond the gloomy grave, and fleeting time?

Oh! yes; the sacred oracles we hear,

That point the path to realms of endless joy;

That bid our trembling hearts no danger fear,

Though clouds surround, and angry skies annoy.

Then let us wisely for our flight prepare,

Nor count this stormy world our fix'd abode;

Obey the call, and trust our Leader's care,

To smooth the rough, and light the darksome road.

Let no fond love for earth excite a sigh;

No doubts divert our steady steps aside;

Nor let us long to live, nor dread to die:

Heaven is our hope, and Providence our guide.

* * * An incorrect and very inferior copy of the above poem is inserted in Mr. Lindley Murray's Introduction to the English Reader, at p. 243. Readers of taste will be gratified by comparing together these two editions of one and the same Poem.

HORTICULTURE.

ON THE CULTIVATION OF GOOSEBERRY AND CURRANT TREES.

Extracted from "A Treatise on the Culture and Management of Fruit Trees." By Charles Harrison, F.H.S.

ON THE GOOSEBERRY TREE.—Gooseberry trees like a good, deep, strong, rich, loamy soil, and almost any airy situation is suitable for them, but the crop is most abundant when the situation is favourable to their protection, in spring, from the cold east winds, which are frequently destructive to the blossom of those trees. Trees of this kind may be planted in quarters by themselves, in borders round the garden, or so as to train them against a trellis. In planting them in quarters, they ought to be six feet apart in the rows, and eight feet between the rows, and when it is designed to plant them against a trellis, they must be planted nearer or farther apart, according to the height of the trellis. A trellis of five feet high is what I prefer, for, when it is higher, it will shade the next row of trees behind, unless the trellis be fixed so as to point from south to north, but they are best when constructed from east to west, as the trees have the full advantage of the sun. Trees planted against a trellis, as described, should be set four feet apart in the rows, and six feet betwixt the rows. In planting the trees always spread the roots regularly round the bole, and at four inches from the surface; let the tree be mulched and watered immediately after being planted.

The trees, afterwards, require a summer and winter regulation. In furnishing the trees with wood, let the bearing shoots be six inches apart. The summer regulation must be performed about the end of June or early in July, in doing which, let any strong luxuriant shoots be taken away, also all suckers which may be arising. It is a practice with some persons, at this season of the year, to pinch off the ends of all shoots upon the tree, but I disapprove of it as a general practice, because I have had ample proof that it causes the tree to send forth a greater number of useless shoots, and thus its strength is thrown away.

There is also another injury done to the tree at the early part of the season, by the gathering of the fruit when it is green, and before it has attained half the size it would have done. In doing this, some persons clear whole trees of the berries which were upon them; the effect of which is, that the trees being so suddenly deprived of their produce, receive a very severe check, and the superabundance of sap is expended in a great production of suckers and luxuriant shoots, thus their strength is thrown away and the trees greatly injured. Instead of this, I always thin off the berries from every tree, and thus the fruit which remains is improved in size; and the object of a supply of green gooseberries is obtained, whilst a proper reserve is left for ripening. If it be desired to have very large fruit, it may be obtained by a judicious thinning, shading of the fruit from hot sun, and, when the fruit approaches maturity, from rain; also by watering the roots with manure water. The water which I use is, three quarts of drainings from a dung-hill, to one quart drained from fowls' or pigeons' dung, soaked for the purpose, which must be applied so as to keep the soil in a moist condition. Let manure water be used twice, and pure water once, in regular succession.

The winter pruning must be performed as early in the season as possible. A proper distribution of shoots must be left throughout the tree, so that the bearing shoots be six inches apart. In shortening the shoots of a good healthy tree, cut them to twelve buds, and reserve one lateral shoot as near to the origin of each main branch or shoot as possible. Cut clean every old shoot or branches not wanted, and let all suckers be pulled or grubbed up. As soon as the trees are pruned, let the mixture for the destruction of insects be applied.

When winter has set in, let a quantity of well rotted manure be spread upon the soil to the extent that the roots reach to. The strength of this will be washed down into the ground, and will enrich the soil, also be destructive of the larvae of any insects which may be in the ground. At the following spring, the best rotted part of the manure may be just turned under the soil, but not to dig deeper than three inches, as far as the roots extend, but the other part of the soil must be dug a spit deep. Where there is the convenience of having well rotted tanner's bark, I should recommend that it be occasionally used instead of manure.

ON THE CURRANT TREE.—The treatment of the currant tree is the same as that directed for the gooseberry, with the exception of pruning. In pruning the currant tree, always endeavour to keep a plentiful supply of young vigorous wood, as the fruit is much better when produced from such, than from short spurs. In order to obtain suitable wood, it is necessary to cut out a certain quantity of the old wood every year, and, with the exception of the main limbs, let no wood be retained that is more than four years old. The main limbs of the tree must always be disposed at a proper distance from each other, so that the bearing wood may not be crowded. The shoots retained must be left about four inches apart, and their ends be cut off; strong vigorous shoots must have about three inches cut off at the end and less vigorous ones in proportion. Always use a knife for pruning the trees, and not a pair of garden shears, as is generally practiced.

As connected with the subject, we add the method of destroying the caterpillar:—

The most formidable of this species are those which attack gooseberry and currant trees. The following is the practice I have adopted for many years, with very great success, upon trees of those kinds under my care.

During the winter season, the eggs of the insects are deposited in crevices and joints of the tree, also in the ground. It is whilst they are in this state that my applications are directed. As soon as the pruning of the trees is completed, I have all the refuse shoots, &c. raked clean away and burnt: the trees are then washed over with the following mixture. A good portion of quick lime is put into a tub with some water. In three or four days afterwards, this is sprinkled over the trees. When it is taken out of the tub, it is well stirred up, so that a portion of the lime is taken with the water. Immediately after this has been done, a quantity of powdered quick lime is cast in amongst the branches.—Instead of this, the trees may be washed with the following composition: to twelve gallons of water, add half a pound of tobacco and six ounces of black pepper; these must be boiled together for half an hour, and when cold, be used.

At the following spring, just before the trees come into bloom, I have all the trees sprinkled over with lime water, and whilst in a wet state, I have a quantity of fine powdered quick lime thrown amongst them, taking care to apply it at the under side of the foliage.

and that no part of the trees is omitted. Also, a little quick lime is spread over the roots of the tree, or some of the mixture as directed in the treatment of the American bug. Soon after the berries are set, I smoke the rees well by burning some moist straw near them, taking the advantage of a favourable day, so that the smoke will be conveyed to the trees. If the practice were laid down be fully attended to, it will be very rare that the trees will be attacked later in the season providing that there are no other trees in the neighbourhood, which are omitted. For when this is the case, the flies, during summer, will very probably visit the trees that have been treated as directed, and numerous progeny will be the consequence. When this occurs, let the trees be looked over immediately after it is discovered that the insects have begun their depredations, and all that can be found, be picked off. This is readily done, and is very effectual. If the insects increase very rapidly, let the trees be sprinkled over with lime water and powdered quick lime, as directed to be used in spring, also some lime be spread over the roots.

CURIOUS ACCOUNT OF THE HOTTENTOT WOMEN.

(From Burchell's Travels in Southern Africa.)

Their mothers allowed themselves more privileges, and felt no hesitation in answering my questions relative to their marriage customs. Such characters as men and women passing their lives in a state of celibacy do not exist among the wild nations of Southern Africa; and, in this particular, savages hold a superiority over the most polished nations in Europe. The women informed me, that girls are most commonly betrothed when not older than a child whom they pointed out to me, and whose age appeared to be about seven years; that is the husband early bespeaks her, in order to preclude, every other man, in the meanwhile, from all pretensions, and from all hope of gaining her; and, as these men generally take a second wife as soon as the first becomes somewhat advanced in years, this custom of securing mother beforehand is perhaps necessary, in order to avoid those contentions which might otherwise arise in cases of this nature, and where the girl herself is seldom allowed a voice in choosing her husband. In two or three years, or less, according to circumstance, after being thus betrothed, the girl changes her abode from her mother's but to that of the bridegroom. These bargains are made with her parents only, and without ever consulting the wishes (even if she had any) of the daughter. They are made by offering them a leathern bag, or some similar article, which, if accepted, ratifies the match. I saw at this time several mothers who could not have been more than ten or twelve years old.

When it happens, which is not often the case, that a girl has grown up to womanhood without having previously been betrothed, her lover must gain her own approbation, as well as that of her parents; and on this occasion his attentions are received with an affection of great alarm and disinclination on her part, and with some squabbling on the part of her friends.

Several of these girls might be said to be pretty, more in account of their youth and the pleasing expression of their countenances, than of any beauty of features; but it is doubtful whether, throughout the whole nation, one could be found whom a European could deem handsome. When, in the morning, they came to the general distribution of tobacco, they had not yet performed the duties of their toilet; but I now had the pleasure of beholding them as fine and as captivating as black and red-ochre could make them. The former, a green powder, was sprinkled over their head and neck, and the latter, mixed with grease, was applied in daubs or streaks over or along the nose, and across the cheek-bones; and what was thought by these simple Africans to be the most graceful and fascinating style of adorning themselves was precisely the same as that which the clowns and ruffians at our fairs have adopted in order to render their appearance absurd and ridiculous.

Many of the women were distinguished by having the hair of the forehead, by the constant accumulation of grease and red-ochre, clotted into large red lumps like stone: this was not through neglect of cleaning it away, but from a fancy that it added greatly to their charms. Some had the crown of their heads shaved, or, rather, scraped bald, and a row of buttons fastened round the remaining hair which had been left in its natural state. All of them wore bracelets, either of leather, or of twisted silver, or copper; and most of them were decorated with some kind of ornament hanging from the ear. Their stature was extremely small, and their figure in general delicate; their height being universally less than five feet.

I noticed a singularity of figure, which I had not hitherto observed among Hottentots; nor was it since found to be, in any tribe, so remarkable as in Bushwomen. The thigh-bones of those who were above the middle age appeared bowed outwards in an unusual degree, or rather, the outer part of them was exceedingly protuberant. As to the cause of this deformity, I can only venture a supposition, that it may be an enlargement of that process of the bone called trochanter major. But in this I do not pretend to any positive opinion; and leave it to be determined by those who may hereafter have an opportunity of examining the skeleton of a Bushwoman of this conformation.

With regard to polygamy, I was told that a second wife is never taken, until the first, as before stated, has become old, not in years, but in constitution; and sometimes, though rarely, a third supplies, in like manner, the place of the second. This was generally the greatest extent of their polygamy; nor were the old wives, on that account, neglected or left unprovided for by their husbands; but constantly remained with him on the same terms as before. I could not learn that any nice feelings of jealousy between these wives ever disturbed the harmony of the family.

Some men passing by, seemed much amused at my questions, and joined us: on which I inquired of the women if their husbands ever beat them; well knowing that this subject was one of great importance in their domestic arrangements. The men laughed, and quickly replied, "No, no." The women as loudly cried, "Yes, yes; they beat us on the head—so." And sufficiently proved the truth of their assertion, by the ready and natural manner in which they imitated this act of conjugal discipline.

REPOSITORY OF GENIUS.

"And justly the Wise-man thus preach'd to us all,—
"Despise not the value of things that are small."—
Old Ballad.

ORIGINAL.

CHARADE.—BY A LAD.

My First, a boon from nature's bounteous store,
Is freely given alike, to rich and poor;
Lightly regarded, where most useful found,
And wanted most where most it does abound.

My Second is the world's epitome,
Where all are striving for the mastery;
Where conquest does not always crown the brave,
And he thrives best, who most can play the knave.

My Whole was once the scene of glorious deeds,
And he who with a patriot's ardent reads
England's proud history, o'er those deeds of fame,
Will pause, exulting, as he marks my name.

ENIGMA.—BY THE SAME.

Down in a prison dark and deep,
Where Sorrow sits forlorn,
Where Misery and Misfortune weep,—
There was I bred and born.

Yet through the child of grief and woe,
Love oft employs my aid,
When he would melt the breast of snow,
Thus guards some cruel maid.

And even in his deep design,
And every hostile plan,
When all his forces he combines,
I mostly lead the van.

Yet oft am I a prisoner held,
But struggle to be free;
Until my keeper is compell'd
To grant me liberty.

When, in revenge for this abuse,
What he would thin conceal,
The secrets of my prison-house,
I instantly reveal.

But vain for freedom all my care,
So soon my life is past,
For when I breathe the vital air,
That moment is my last.

ANOTHER.—BY THE SAME.

I, who am constantly in love,
Am sure in piteous case,
Yet this I hope you ne'er can prove
A crime or a disgrace.

In lonely groves I take my seat,
And sigh in mournful mood,
While echo does the sound repeat,
In many a rock and wood.

With the cold moon I love to stray,
And haunt the lover's bower;
But hide me from the light of day,
In some old fort or tower.

You'll deem this folly, and 'tis true
To folly I incline;
Yet, lovely maids, 'tis seen in you,
I most conspicuous shine.

Though from the great I turn my face,
Yet history records,
At court I always hold a place,
And in the House of Lords.

ANOTHER.—BY THE SAME.

My friends and patronesses true,
Accept from Me the homage due;
Since man with Me claims no alliance,
And boldly sets me at defiance;
His own proud character exalts,
And finds with Me a thousand faults;—
Says I am peevish, I am proud,
Nay, passionate, though never loud.
That I have faults there is no doubt,
And pray what mortal is without?

Yet of my failings I repent,
And oft am truly penitent.
Yet even then man's tyrant spirit,
Will not allow Me any merit,
Do what I will, I cannot please him,
He says that I was born to tease him;
And often with indignant spite,
He brands Me as a hypocrite!

Thus stigmatized, what can I do,
But for redress appeal to you?
Who still my injuries resent,
And give me due encouragement.
But take a gentle blot from Me,
Nor of your favours be too free;
For much indulgence makes me proud,
And then I'm follow'd by a crowd
Of Miscreants, who forget their duty,
And spoil your temper and your beauty.
Then, if I'm troublesome, refuse Me,
Only on great occasions use Me;
So may I come in time of need,
And prove myself a friend indeed.

VARIETIES.

SON MOT.

A gentleman, in conversation, was railing at the present race of raffish Dandies rolling and swaggering about in their shaggy white great coats; upon which J— observed, that their appearance in this very way proved them to be the most liberal and charitable race of puppies which had ever sprung up in society. "How so?" said their antagonist. "Why (was the reply) because their hands are never out of their pockets."

ANOTHER.

The same parties carrying on the keen encounter of wit, the first observed, "But there is — (one of these Dandies;) can you deary that he is utterly insignificant?" "On the contrary, he appears to me to be all Soul." "All soul! the coxcomb?" "Yes, for you yourself acknowledge that he is so insignificant as to be Nobody."

QUOTATION.

"Ah, (exclaimed the same jocular companion, looking at a fine turkey garnished with sausages,) how much that bird reminds me of Milton's beautiful description of Lydian music, with its

In knots, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out."

A few days back, as Lord S— was preparing to attend his parliamentary duties, he requested his servant to procure some of Crabb's different degrees of pencils; the man forgetting the latter word, went round to all the fishmongers, and inquired for some of the different degrees of Crabs!

LUDICROUS MISTAKE.

People who are resolved to please always at all events, frequently overshoot themselves, and render themselves ridiculous by being too good. A lady going to eat plum-cake and candy at a friend's house one morning, ran to the cradle to see the fine boy, as soon as she came in: unfortunately the cat had taken up the baby's place; but before she could give herself time to see her mistake, she exclaimed, with up-lifted eyes and hands, "Oh what a sweet child, the very picture of its father!"

BRITANNIA.

To Charles the Second's partiality for his graceful and accomplished cousin, Frances Stuart, we owe the elegant representation of Britannia on our copper coin. His admiration of this celebrated beauty, induced him to assail her with compliments of various kinds, but in vain; and it was from one of the medals struck to perpetuate his high opinion of her delicate symmetry, that Britannia was stamped in the form she still bears on our half-pence and farthings.

HUMBUG.

The learned Dr. Waterhouse, justly denominated the "American Jenner," while professor of Natural History in Harvard University, some years ago, made an artificial insect, to the limbs of which he could communicate motion, while he held it in his hand. After exhibiting it to the class he was lecturing, and permitting every pupil to inspect it, none of whom could tell to what class of insects it belonged, though they all believed it to be a real living creature, the Doctor thus addressed them:—"I suppose, young gentlemen, you wish to be informed of the name of this bug; had you examined it more attentively, you would have all perceived that it was a humbug!"

NOVEL MODE OF PUFFING A FACT.

A certain clerk, residing within a little space of a learned University, lately built some houses which he called "Mount Zion"—first cousin no doubt to the "Paradise Row" and "Mount Pleasants" so humourously described in Canto VII. of Don Juan—Well, this clerk, finding that "Mount Zion" was at a discount, and that his houses would not let, took the opportunity which his office gave him, of giving out every Sunday, as one of the hymns to be sung, that beginning, "Mount Zion is a pleasant place," which he dwelt upon with great emphasis.

OLD FRIENDS.

The very ingenious and amiable Bishop Berkely, of Cloyne in Ireland, was so entirely contented with his income in that diocese, that when offered by the Earl of Chesterfield (then Lord Lieutenant) a bishopric much more beneficial than that he possessed, he declined it with these words, "I love my neighbours, and they love me: why then should I begin in my old days to form new connexions, and tear myself from those friends whose kindness is to me the greatest happiness I enjoy?" Acting in this instance like the celebrated Plutarch, who being asked why he resided in his native city, so obscure and so little—"I stay," said he, "lest it should grow less."

A FREE TRANSLATION.

A certain Noble Lord, who resides not far from Aylesbury, lately sent the venerable Corporation of that town a buck, and divers large quantities of game, for their corporation dinner—and the Mayor, as in gratitude bound, requested the honour of the Noble Donor's presence to partake thereof. This worthy head of the corporation (glad, doubtless, of the opportunity of securing the interests of "the Family") shortly before the important meal, begged leave to present his son—a likely lad of ten years' growth—to his future patron, as he then fondly hoped. Fatal request! as the sequel will shew. The lad was introduced, and the Noble Guest asked him, amongst other questions, where he went to school, what he was learning, &c.; and was told that he was at the Grammar School, and "in Sallust."—Now it so chanced, that the family-arms of the Noble Lord decorated the wall of the room in which they were talking,—on which was displayed the family motto, FUTURUS (alluding to the tradition of their descent from the "King of the East Angles," or some other such potentate.) This motto was painted, half on one corner, and half on another, of the escutcheon, and stood therefore thus: FUT—MUS.—The Mayor, proud of the opportunity of displaying to his Lordship the boy's abilities, and desirous of impressing on the mind of his son, the dignity of the great Man's family, told the lad to construe this unlucky heraldic inscription: which he immediately did, thus—"FUT, I have been, MUS, a Mouse!"

ADDRESS.

THE Proprietor of the Manchester Iris respectfully announces to his Friends that they have now the last number of that work before them.—The active management of an extensive business, in which he has gratefully to acknowledge the most flattering support, together with a series of ill health, renders it impossible for him longer to continue the additional discharge of editorial duty; requiring, it is obvious, the devotion of much time and attention, united with a very great degree of anxiety.

He returns his warmest acknowledgements for the obliging assistance which he has experienced in the prosecution of his undertaking. Many of the original papers in the Iris possess considerable merit, and have been freely copied into other publications. The contributions from the Green Dragon, which will shortly be published in a separate form, have been supplied to him, with few intermissions, during the whole period of his literary career. There are numerous other Correspondents whose labours he shall always gratefully remember. Many other parts of the work, which he conceives to be interesting, have been selected with every possible care, and at considerable expense.

The Proprietor must be permitted to say, that he looks with some complacency upon his publication.—With the assistance of his correspondents, he has, he believes, produced the best periodical work that has ever emanated from his native town, and has no hesitation in courting a comparison of the two volumes of the Iris with any work on a similar plan which has existed, even in the Metropolis, in the course of the same period.

Something might be said respecting personalities.—The Conductor of this work can truly affirm that no one can be more guiltless of that charge than himself. At the commencement of his undertaking he formed the determination not to interfere with private character, and, notwithstanding a false impression to the contrary, he has the pride and pleasure to aver, that in no one instance has he inserted an article, which, in his own judgment, was calculated to wound the feelings of an inoffensive individual.

It is at the expense of much sacrifice of feeling that he severs the thread which connects him with those persons from whom he has received the most friendly assistance. He assures them that he will carry with him into private life, and ever retain, the kindest recollection of the valuable services they conferred upon him in the course of his public capacity.
